These two verses are found in the Hemavata Sutta of the Sutta Nipāta. According to the explanations in the commentaries (Aṭṭhakathā) related to this sutta, Sātāgira and Hemavata were two Yakkha generals. In the past, during the time of Kassapa Buddha, they had ordained as monks and practiced the monastic life well. However, at some point, due to partiality when resolving a disciplinary dispute (a vinaya question), a mistake was committed by these two bhikkhus. It is said that due to the remorse arising from this, instead of being reborn in the celestial realms after death, they took rebirth as long-lived Yakkhas. Among the two, the elder monk became a Yakkha general named Hemavata on Mt. Hemavata in the Himalayas. The other monk became a Yakkha general named Sātāgira on Mt. Sāta in the Middle Country of India. These two had a custom of meeting from time to time at the annual Yakkha assemblies, similar to the meetings in the assembly of devas. Having met at such a Yakkha assembly, and remembering their past acquaintance, they made an agreement with each other: if any wonderful or miraculous event occurred in either the Himalayan region or the Middle Country, they would inform each other.

It was during such a period that the Buddha delivered the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta. At that moment, the Yakkha Sātāgira came with his Yakkha retinue and listened to the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta, but it is mentioned that he was unable to concentrate his mind. Remembering his friendship, he looked to see if the Yakkha Hemavata was also present. Since he was not there, after the sermon, the Yakkha Sātāgira flew through the sky with his retinue to find the Yakkha Hemavata. Meanwhile, the Yakkha Hemavata, having witnessed the miraculous events that occurred in the Himalayas at the time of the preaching of the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta, set out through the sky with his retinue toward the Middle Country to inform his friend. According to the commentary story, the two groups met in the sky above the city of Rājagaha, and the dialogue they held concerning the virtues of the Buddha is what is contained in this sutta.

Of these two Yakkha generals, the Yakkha Sātāgira initiates the sutta by announcing the news of the Buddha's appearance. He invites the Yakkha Hemavata to go and see the Buddha: "Today is the full-moon uposatha day. This is a beautiful night; shall we go to see the Teacher, Gautama of incomparable name?" Then, to further confirm that this is indeed a Buddha, Hemavata asks: "I think He keeps His mind well-established, possessing a mind of equanimity toward all living beings, and that He controls His thoughts regarding agreeable and disagreeable objects." Then Sātāgira says that it is exactly so. Although we do not repeat the entire verse, yes, the Teacher Gautama has His mind well-established, is endowed with the quality of suchness (tādī) toward all beings, and remains neutral toward agreeable and disagreeable objects.

Again, Hemavata asks: "I think He abstains from unwholesome deeds such as killing living beings and taking what is not given, is free from negligence, and is constantly engaged in meditation." Sātāgira says: "Yes, He is detached from bodily unwholesome deeds, free from negligence, and is constantly in meditation." Again, Hemavata asks: "I think He is free from false speech, malicious speech, harsh speech, and frivolous talk." To this too, Sātāgira replies: "Yes, He is free from unwholesome verbal deeds." Again, Hemavata asks: "I think He is free from sensual thoughts, has removed them, and is constantly endowed with wisdom regarding all phenomena." To this also, Sātāgira replies in the same manner.

Again, Hemavata says: "I think He is endowed with knowledge and conduct (vijjācaraṇasampanna), has destroyed the taints (āsava), and has no future Bhava (Becoming)." Sātāgira declares that it is indeed so. Now, what follows from there is: "Come, let us go! Let us go to see the Buddha of few wishes, who meditates in the forest. Let us go to see that Teacher. Having met Him, who is like a lion king in the forest, let us ask how to be released from the snare of Māra." From this point on, the narrative in the sutta is presented in a dramatic dialogue form. Then, having approached and addressed the Blessed One, the Yakkha Hemavata asks: "Blessed

One, please answer these questions for us." This question is the first of the two verses we have placed as our theme.

He asks the Buddha:

> Kismiṁ loko samuppanno, kismiṁ kubbati santhavaṁ

> Kissa loko upādāya, kismiṁ loko vihaññati.

Where is the world born? Where does the world maintain its intimacy—its association? Grasping what does the world get vexed, and where is it vexed? Here are several questions. Then, the answer given by the Buddha is recorded:

> Chasu loko samuppanno, chasu kubbati santhavaṁ

> Channam-eva upādāya, chasu loko vihaññati.

The world is born in the six; its association and maintenance are in the six. Grasping those very six, the world is vexed in the six. To help you remember this story of the six, if we present it as a verse:

> Born within the six,

> In the six it seeks intimacy,

> Taking the six as its Upādāna (Grasping),

> In the six itself, the world suffers vexation.

This is the idea presented by the Buddha. Next, the dialogue continues with questions and answers to clarify the meaning of this verse. The Yakkha Hemavata specifically asks what this Upādāna (Grasping) is. Grasping something, the world is vexed. The Buddha's answer to this is:

> Kāmaguṇā loke mano chaṭṭhā pavedità

This means the five cords of sensual pleasure, the fivefold sensual enjoyment, with the mind declared as the sixth. Thus, it is caught within the sixfold sense sphere (saḷāyatana). Often, we only talk about the five sensual pleasures. But along with the five cords of sensual pleasure, there is also the mind. That is why it says, "Kāmaguṇā loke mano pavedità". It is there, indeed, that the five cords of sensual pleasure and the mind exist—this is the Upādāna.

Next, he asks about release from this: "How does one cross over this world, how is one released from this Dukkha (Suffering)?" The Yakkha general asks this. The answer given is that by removing desire (chanda) and Taṇhā (Craving) for these six sense bases, Dukkha is ended, and this is called the end of the world—one crosses over the world by this means, as the Buddha declares.

To clarify this dialogue even further, the path (paṭipadā) is given as the answer: through the development of virtue, concentration, and wisdom (sīla-samādhi-paññā), by developing mindfulness (sati) and the like, and by abandoning the desire for Bhava (Becoming), one can cross over the world. In this way, after clarifying the primary question through the subsequent verses, these two Yakkha generals are highly pleased and express their joy like songs of praise: "Today is a wonderful morning, a beautiful awakening, a wonderful vision we have received in seeing this Teacher." Then they say: "We shall go from village to village, from mountain to mountain, singing the virtues of the Buddha and the virtues of the Dhamma." This is how the sutta ends.

So, on one hand, the story of these two Yakkha generals contained in the Hemavata Sutta is inspiring enough to generate faith (saddhā). The manner in which even Yakkha generals express their faith in the Triple Gem is an excellent example for those who lack faith. Next, let us come directly to the deep meaning of these verses. What is meant by this "six"? "Chasu loko samuppanno"—it became clear that these are the six sense bases (saḷāyatana). What are called sense bases are the eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind. These are the six bases of Phassa (Contact).

In many instances when explaining this Dhamma, the analysis is carried out in terms of the five aggregates of Upādāna (pañc'upādānakkhandha). When discussing Nibbāna or meditation, in other instances, they are shown as the six sense bases: the eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind, which, when taken together with their corresponding objects, constitute the six bases of Phassa. Thus, what is said here is that the world has arisen in these six bases of Phassa. This might be difficult for someone to understand all at once—that the world is born in these six. Next, all the intimacies, associations, and relationships in the world exist within these six. Furthermore, it is by grasping these very six that the world is vexed. This is the story of the six. To impress this question of the six even deeper into our minds, let us try to understand it by bringing forward relevant suttas from various places.

On many occasions, disciple bhikkhus asked the Buddha, "Venerable Sir, 'the world, the world' it is said. What is this world?" They asked this because it is indeed a problem. For someone who has an understanding of this Dhamma, such a question arises. Perhaps they ask this because they are not satisfied with the conventional concept of the world. There are many such suttas.

Let us take, for instance, Ven. Ānanda, the personal attendant of the Buddha. He himself asks on one occasion, "Venerable Sir, 'the world, the world' it is said. To what extent does the world exist?" Then, the answer given by the Buddha, Ānanda, employs a term: "paloka-dhammaṁ" (subject to crumbling). The meaning of the word paloka-dhammaṁ is "having the nature of crumbling or disintegrating". The word paludu (damaged/broken) is used in Sinhala; when something is damaged, it is said to be paludu. In Pali, both lujjati and palujjati are used. Lujjati means to crumble. Ludu-venavā is not a common usage in standard Sinhala. I do not know if paludu-venavā is used in certain regions in that sense. Paludu-venavā means to break or disintegrate. What is the etymology given by the Buddha? "Whatever is subject to crumbling, that is the world." This is a unique etymology.

Then He asks Ven. Ānanda: "And what, Ānanda, is subject to crumbling? The eye is subject to crumbling, forms are subject to crumbling, eye-Viññāṇa (Consciousness) is subject to crumbling, Phassa associated with the eye is subject to crumbling, and any Vedanā (Feeling)—whether pleasant, painful, or neutral—arising because of that Phassa is also subject to crumbling. Because each and every one of these is subject to crumbling, it is called the world." From this too, we see that this discussion is about the six sense bases (saḷāyatana). Saying so, He concludes with a specific phrase used in this training. This is a unique analysis of this Dhamma.

The unique analyses given by the Buddha are introduced with the text: "In the discipline of the Noble One" (ariyassa vinaye). According to the Noble usage or the Noble discipline, this is what is called the world. If anything is subject to crumbling, what crumbles are the eye, ear, nose, and so on, and their corresponding objects. Every single one of them crumbles. It is in the sense of crumbling (paloka) that it is called "the world".

Now, the problem with us is that scholars often pay little attention to this phrase "in the discipline of the Noble One" (ariyassa vinaye) and return once again to conventional definitions. In truth, because there was a problem, those Venerable Ones asked the Buddha what the world is. If the Buddha wanted to, He could have replied, "Is that even a question? Just look around you and see." Instead of saying that, He gave such a deep answer because of this Dhamma-conforming analysis. Since the explanation is given as "in the discipline of the Noble One", that is where our attention should be directed. The depth of the Dhamma lies precisely there.

He did not stop there. There are other suttas related to this. To be brief, on another occasion, a Venerable monk named Samiddhi also asks the Buddha, "Venerable Sir, 'the world, the world' it is said. To what extent is there a world or a designation of the world?" Here too, the Buddha declares: "Samiddhi, where there is the eye, where there are forms, where there is eye-Viññāṇa, and where there are things to be known by eye-Viññāṇa—there is the world, and there is the designation of the world." You can understand it in the same way for the ear, though we do not repeat it.

Finally, regarding the mind, we state it specifically because of its unique nature: "Where there is the mind, Samiddhi, where there are mind-objects, where there is mind-Viññāṇa, and where there are things to be known by mind-Viññāṇa—there is the world."

The Buddha did not stop there; He also showed where the world is not. This is where we reach the deepest point. The Buddha declares: "Samiddhi, where there is no eye, where there are no forms, where there is no eye-Viññāṇa, and where there are no things to be known by eye-Viññāṇa—there, there is neither a world nor a designation of the world." Understand the rest in the same way, leaving room for you to reflect.

Finally, concerning the mind: "Where there is no mind, where there are no mind-objects—that is, dhammā, the objects that come to the mind just as forms come to the eye are called dhammā—where there is no mind, where there are no mind-objects, where there is no mind-Viññāṇa arising from those two, and where there are no things thought to be known through mind-Viññāṇa—there, there is neither a world nor a designation of the world." Here too, He presents an analysis according to the Noble usage.

Thus, we can see that the world we conventionally take to exist is shown by the Buddha to be something relative to the six sense bases (saḷāyatana). Not only that, He also showed how the world ceases through the discourse delivered to Ven. Samiddhi. As long as the eye, ear, and so on exist, there is a world. Where they are not, there is no world. What is this place where they are not? This is the problem—this is the problem that many people have. Can there be a state where the eye and so on are not? Can there be a state where the eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, mind, and their corresponding objects are not? That is what is called the cessation of the six sense bases (saḷāyatana-nirodha). The cessation of the six sense bases means escaping from this sixfold sense sphere which we have taken to be the world. Therefore, what is called the eggshell of ignorance is this very sixfold sense sphere. The cessation of the six sense bases is indeed the transcending of the world (lokuttara). This is what is meant by breaking open the eggshell and coming out.

When the Buddha declared Himself to be the first chick, some of you might think it was said to disparage the Buddha. It is not His birth as a Bodhisatta that is referred to here. It was at the moment of Supreme Enlightenment (sambodhi) that the Buddha, like a chick, broke that eggshell of ignorance. He broke the eggshell of the six sense bases and emerged. Although many peripheral stories are told, this too is a valuable sutta. Let us state it briefly. This is recorded as the word of the Buddha in the Verañja Sutta.

On one occasion, a brahmin named Verañja, having conceived a dislike for the Buddha and believing that He disparaged brahmins, approached and used many disparaging words against the Buddha. He called Him an annihilationist (ucchedavāda), childless/barren (apagabbha), and used various other bad words current at that time. The Buddha took each term and explained it in accordance with the Dhamma: "Yes, I am indeed so, but in this particular sense." Ultimately, He inspired faith in the brahmin and brought him to take refuge in the Buddha.

On that occasion, the Buddha declared: "Brahmin, you are well-aware of this matter—especially those who know about chickens—a hen might sit on eight, ten, or twelve eggs. Having incubated them, if a certain chick, using its claws or its beak, breaks open the eggshell and safely emerges first, what, Brahmin, do they call that chick? Is it not called the eldest, the foremost, the best?" "Yes, indeed, Venerable Sir, that is what they call it." "In the same way, Brahmin, among the world of beings trapped inside the eggshell of ignorance, I am the first to break open the eggshell and emerge."

Thus, the eggshell was broken at the moment of Supreme Enlightenment (sambodhi). Therefore, Nibbāna is the direct realization of the six sense bases. It is a realization attained in this very life (diṭṭheva dhamme).

If the world exists within the six sense bases, if everything is within the six sense bases, then all the scientific instruments you use to point here and there—every single telescope, microscope, and device—has an eye at one end. Some instruments have an ear at one end. In this way, every device is merely an extension of the six sense bases (saḷāyatana). They are trapped within it. Science too is trapped within it. There are many who are trapped inside this eggshell. If we can present this truth to the world, especially to the Western world, as a profound aspect of the Dhamma—the depth of the Dhamma concerning Dependent Arising (paṭiccasamuppāda) and Nibbāna—then at least some of those brilliant minds trapped within these shells might make an effort to break the eggshell and come out.

How does one break the eggshell? To put it briefly, they might say it is the Noble Eightfold Path. In another way, it is virtue, concentration, and wisdom (sīla, samādhi, paññā). Looking even deeper, it is the cultivation of the Three Characteristics (tilakkhaṇa): Anicca (Impermanent), Dukkha (Suffering), and Anattā (Not-self).

The Buddha has powerfully described the insight (vipassanā) used to transcend these six sense bases in various suttas. By taking this eye as permanent and thereby developing desire for it—desire arises from taking things as permanent—having desire is what keeps one trapped inside. Desire (chanda) is Taṇhā (Craving). Freedom is found at the moment desire is eliminated. What aids this is the cultivation of the Three Characteristics. Removing the sign of permanence, one strives to see them as Anicca through Yoniso manasikāra (Wise attention). That is what must be taken as the beak of the chick.

One constantly scrutinizes them as Anicca: if something is subject to breaking, if it changes, if it is subject to crumbling (paloka-dhammaṁ), then maintaining it is a great trouble—it is Dukkha. Next, if it cannot be kept under one's control, how can one say "This is mine, this is my self" (Anattā)? This is the Three Characteristics brought to light by the Buddha. If we align ourselves there, it is through the cultivation of the Three Characteristics, when developed intensely, that one can emerge from this eggshell through those insight knowledges (vipassanā-ñāṇa). This is the teaching found within the Buddha's dispensation.

However, many are afraid to eliminate Dukkha. The Buddha has said that Dukkha itself is the world. Just like two panels of a door closing together, the world exists within Dukkha, and Dukkha exists within the world. Or rather, it is a completely simple equation: the world equals Dukkha. This is the word of the Buddha. Even if we are not prepared to accept it, "saṅkhittena pañcupādānakkhandhā dukkhā" means exactly that. In brief, Jāti (Birth), Jarāmaraṇa (Decay and Death)—all of these are indeed Dukkha, but ultimately, the five aggregates of grasping are Dukkha.

The world exists because of the sense bases, the objects present within the daily experienced six sense bases, the attachment to them, and the Papañca (Conceptual proliferation / Prolific conceptualization) built upon them. Even if one reaches the far limits of science, that is where the world remains. From suttas such as the Samiddhi Sutta, we see that the Buddha points out the wearing-away nature of these six sense bases. For one who constantly reflects on this, there gradually arises disenchantment (nibbidā) and dispassion (virāga)—which is also called non-attachment—and these are shown as the gateways that aid one's exit. They are also called liberations (vimokkha).

You, especially those who meditate, have heard that the ultimate end of seeing the sign of permanence as Anicca is that no "sign" (nimitta) arises in the mind. The impermanence is seen so intensely, its crumbling nature is seen so acutely, that the mind cannot grasp a sign. At that moment, the mind cannot take a sign—this is the signless (animitta). When one does not take a sign, one cannot dwell there. Paṇidhi means establishing an aspiration or expectation; there is no place to establish an expectation—this is the desireless (appaṇihita).

The end of cultivating Anicca is signless liberation (animitta-vimokkha). Cultivating the perception of Dukkha ends in the desireless (appaṇihita-vimokkha); there is no aspiration, no Taṇhā—there is only a sense of detachment. Next, if the wise understand this as Anattā, realizing there is nothing to be taken as "I" or "mine", the final stage of that cultivation is the void (suññata)—they see it as void, realizing there is nothing to take as "I" or "mine". Thus, it is through the cultivation of the Three Characteristics that one transcends this world of the six sense bases.

This story of the cessation of the world has been analyzed by the Buddha in various other suttas. Furthermore, the manner in which the Buddha presented Himself as a Teacher, as a Guide, is magnificent. Even modern teachers have things to learn from it—the way He presented deep matters, the way He presented Dhamma concepts.

On one occasion, He was delivering a discourse in the midst of the Sangha. This was not in response to a question asked by anyone. He said: "Bhikkhus, I declare that the end of the world cannot be reached by traveling. At the same time, I say that without reaching the end of the world, there is no making an end of Dukkha." This is a contradictory statement. First, remember what was said: "I declare that the end of the world cannot be reached by traveling." Next: "Without reaching the end of the world, there is no making an end of Dukkha." Having said this, the Buddha did not go on to analyze it. He stood up and entered His dwelling.

So, what was to be done? The bhikkhus, not knowing what to do, looked around and saw Ven. Ānanda. The Buddha had constantly praised Ven. Ānanda, and the other bhikkhus also respected him greatly because of his close association with the Buddha. They said, "Let us go and ask Ven. Ānanda." Without troubling the Buddha again, they approached Ven. Ānanda and asked what the meaning of this brief statement of the Buddha was.

Ven. Ānanda, showing some hesitation, said, "Why did you not ask Him at that very moment? Why do you come to someone like me?" and then gave the answer: "Friends, that by which one has a perception of the world (loka-saññā), that by which one has a conceit of the world (loka-māna), that is what is called the world in this Noble discipline." According to the Noble usage, according to the unique dispensation definition, that is the world. Next, by what does one measure the world? By the eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind. Other than these, there is nothing to measure it with. Thus, that which measures is the world—this was the explanation he gave. And the Buddha later approved this explanation.

Thus, we can understand that what the Buddha pointed out was that this world, and the story of crossing over the world, are entirely connected with the six sense bases (saḷāyatana). The connection between the world and the six sense bases becomes even clearer to you through a very special sutta which many of you may have read, known as the Rohitassa Sutta, which even scholars consider a unique word of the Buddha. It is a wonderful discourse.

There too, speaking about the world, the Buddha declares: "Within this very fathom-long carcass, endowed with perception and mind, I declare the world, the arising of the world, the cessation of the world, and the path leading to the cessation of the world." "Within this fathom-long body itself, endowed with perception and mind"—the phrase "body-carcass" is used. If we remove those, it is indeed a corpse, a dead body; but here it is "endowed with perception and mind". That is the unique part. It is within this living body, endowed with perception and mind, that the world exists, the arising of the world exists, the cessation of the world exists, and the path to the cessation of the world exists. Not in another world, not in another place.

This discourse is indeed the best opportunity for those in this era who have become trapped in science to understand the Buddha's word. Many of you may have heard from those who speak from the side of science that many brilliant minds in the Western world are today trapped in physics, specifically in modern quantum physics. Yet, all of them ultimately come to understand that there is no world independent of a point of view. This is where we arrive. But they are not ready to accept that there is no world independent of a point of view, so they search further. However, their research—their search for the ultimate particle—becomes futile. Because this word of the Buddha was already spoken before.

The world arises relative to some point of view. It is when the conceit "I am" (asmi-māna) is taken—that is what is called the conceit "I am"—the moment "I am" is assumed, and where there is a concept of a living being, it is from the six sense bases relative to that being that a world arises.

Now, what has happened to us is that, being humans, we pay no attention to other worlds. We do not consider the animal world. Some think of animals merely as things to assist our lives. But there is a world relative to each animal. We cannot understand the world of an ant. We cannot understand the worlds of other animals. There is a world relative to each animal. Even if we were to be born there, we would exist in a completely different world. Those scientists who conduct great research on science, if after death they go to some unwholesome state due to some unwholesome karma—let us say they become a dog or a chicken—then there is no quantum physics there. Then they will have to eat rubbish.

The world exists within the six sense bases—the forms that come to the eye, the sounds that come to the ear, and we can understand this from their reactions. Pigs do not eat the food we eat. What we perceive as a bad smell is a fragrance to them. It is fragrant to pigs, but bad-smelling to us. That is how we must understand it. However, there exists within worldly beings what we may call "human pride" (mānavābhimāna); they develop a certain conceit and claim the world as their own. This is the law of the world. We must seek the end of this. For this, they spend billions of dollars, using various space vehicles. Yet, they remain inside the eggshell. Thinking that one has traversed outer space is not a crossing of Bhava (Becoming). They will merely crash somewhere inside the eggshell and fall back.

Even if one goes to the end of the universe, this eggshell of ignorance, to put it briefly, is the very six sense bases (saḷāyatana). Thus, all problems exist within the six sense bases. Getting vexed within it means grasping the six sense bases, taking the six sense bases to be substantial. But if we understand according to the Buddha's word, there is no way for a perception of permanence to exist here. If the eye is also Anicca, constantly crumbling—we have shown such a sutta on previous occasions as the Buddha's word. In terms of meditation, the Buddha describes these as calaṁ (unstable/shaking), vayaṁ (decaying), and vipariṇāma-dhammaṁ (subject to change). These are constantly shaking, changing, and undergoing alteration (aññathābhāva).

They are only unseen because of the delusion we hold, our wrong perception, our perception of a self, and our Sakkāya-diṭṭhi (View of existing group/body). Sakkāya means taking this group as existing together. Because of this, one is ignorant of those facts and thinks this is the end. But it is only when the eggshell is broken that one understands. Breaking the eggshell means that if all of those are Dukkha and a vexation, then liberation is found there. It is not a different world.

When someone dies, the word you use for it is a funeral (avamaṅgula—an inauspicious event). Why did the Buddha's Parinibbāna become a blessing (maṅgula)? We said that you use the term "the Triple-Blessed Day". Coming out of the mother's womb is Jāti. Supreme Enlightenment (sambodhi) means coming out of that eggshell of ignorance and realizing it as a direct experience in this very life (diṭṭheva dhamme); after that, there is no doubt. From then on, the story is very beautiful.

The Buddhas and Arahants "live in the world, unsullied by the world" (loke ṭhito lokena anupalitto). They live in the world possessing that direct realization; that is what becomes manifest at the moment of Parinibbāna. If they experienced the deathless state while still living, when Arahants are in the attainment of the fruit of Arahantship (arahatta-phala-samāpatti), they are temporarily detached from the sufferings and troubles of this world, enjoying the direct realization of the cessation of the six sense bases (saḷāyatana-nirodha). To show this, Nibbāna is described by words such as an island, a cave, a refuge, and a shelter. It is not something existing in a different world. It is the experience of that realization right here.

The Buddha and other Arahants, during the attainment of the fruit (phala-samāpatti), detached themselves from the world—that is the state of liberation where they abandoned the five aggregates of grasping (pañc'upādānakkhandha). This is done through wisdom (paññā). The primary factor for that wisdom exists within every living being: attention (manasikāra). It is by applying that attention as Yoniso manasikāra (Wise attention) that one can proceed toward liberation.

We have had to mention on several occasions, according to the theme taken, the relationship between Viññāṇa (Consciousness) and Nāmarūpa (Name-and-Form). Everyone is trapped within the illusion of Viññāṇa. Why is it called an illusion? Because Viññāṇa stands between Nāma (Name) and Rūpa (Form). We have spoken about the word Nāmarūpa on previous occasions. "Name" (nāma) does not mean a mere bending. According to the Dhamma, in the Buddha's own words, it is Vedanā (Feeling), Saññā (Perception), Volition (cetanā), Phassa (Contact), and Attention (manasikāra). Vedanā, the perception that follows Vedanā, the volition formed in accordance with it, the Phassa that is the object of volition, and finally, the attention paid to it. It is through these mental phenomena (nāma-dhamma) that one recognizes something in the world.

Because we need to exchange ideas generally, we use words. But whenever we use words, the other person does not get the exact same feeling as ourselves. Let us take an illustration: if someone fell into a river and barely escaped, when the word "river" is spoken to him, what comes to his mind is that past memory of the river, and perhaps even fear. In that way, we cannot convey the complete idea to someone through a word. Then, how do we recognize things? It is through Vedanā, Saññā, Volition (cetanā), Phassa, and Attention (manasikāra). That is the most personal and unique recognition. General recognition is a convention (sammuti) used to exchange ideas within regions or between countries.

Now, what has happened is that worldly beings get trapped within the convention they have created, and they forget the ultimate truth. The Buddha brought to light the ultimate truth through the concept of Nāmarūpa. Between this Viññāṇa and Nāmarūpa, there is a constant, wonderful delusion of the world. We have given many illustrations of this. To remind you, we have often told the story of the dog on the plank bridge (edaṇḍa). What the dog sees is the reflective nature of the water.

Therefore, the dog walking on the plank bridge sees what appears to be another dog. Thinking it is another dog, it reacts to it.

Similarly, Viññāṇa also has a deceptive nature because it stands in the middle, between Nāma and Rūpa. The dog thinks it sees because it looks. But in truth, it is because it looks that it sees. When we say "it is because it looks that it sees", we arrive at the story of attention (manasikāra). "Manasikāra-sambhavā sabbe dhammā"—the Buddha's word says that all phenomena have their origin in attention. "Chanda-mūlakā sabbe dhammā"—all phenomena are rooted in desire.

Now, why do those scientists, amidst so many troubles, search further and further? Sometimes, as we said on a previous occasion, modern physics is like someone who, when unable to solve a math problem, finally throws in a random symbol because they have nothing else to do, lacking the word of the Buddha. The Buddha has pointed out something that can never be completed by searching: that there is no world independent of a point of view. Yet, these people are driven to search for a world independent of a point of view. Consequently, they cannot recognize those phenomena as they truly are.

That is what is contained within the term Nāmarūpa. Rūpa (Form) is a form for a name; Nāma (Name) is a mental representation of form—it is not the actual convention, but something like a personal name, a mental representation of form. That is what was analyzed as Vedanā, Saññā, Volition, and so on. Why did He call it a name-matter form? When the Buddha speaks about Rūpa, He constantly reminds us that there are four great elements (mahābhūta): earth, water, fire, and wind, which are interwoven. Depending on their dominance in a mixture, we experience them as hardness, heat, and so on. Yet, we recognize them only through mental phenomena (nāma-dhamma).

Therefore, the perception of form (rūpa-saññā) that we form regarding the great elements recognized through mental phenomena cannot go beyond them. One cannot recognize form in isolation. Thus, what comes as the object of Viññāṇa is once again Nāmarūpa itself. Other than that, form cannot be recognized in isolation. That is what we explained through the story of Narcissus. Just as the youth Narcissus, seeing his own face, thought it was a water nymph, so too the ordinary world, seeing the world around them, develops the perception of a self. The Buddha preaches that the perception held by worldly beings is a complete delusion—taking things as "I" and "mine" is a complete delusion, which is the Sakkāya-diṭṭhi (Dogma of self-illusion). That is where ignorance lies. Because of this, they form a perception of permanence, due to grasping it.

In describing worldly beings, the Buddha gives a wonderful simile. This is a simile that not only you, but even an animal can understand. Just as a dog bound to a post with a chain walks around that post, sits right by the post, stands right by the post, walks close to the post, and lies down right by the post—because it cannot go beyond the post—similarly is the Sakkāya-diṭṭhi. One who has grasped the Sakkāya-diṭṭhi carries these five aggregates of grasping wherever they go. They carry them and go everywhere with them.

In truth, although they are called five aggregates, when they emerge through reflection, it is seen that they are five groups constructed by the mind itself. At any given moment, what arises are only phenomena (dhammā). But just as the dog thinks the reflection is there even when it is not looking, the world, due to the Sakkāya-diṭṭhi, cannot understand this. If we say this, they might ask, "If I don't look, does that thing disappear?" But what did he see? He saw only "the seen". We think we saw a "thing"—a "substance". But the Buddha says it is not a thing that was seen; only "the seen" was there. Then, what was heard? It was not the song that was "heard". The same applies to the others. What is said about the sensed? Only "the sensed" was there. What was thought of thoughts? Only "the thought" was there. Therefore, according to the Buddha's word, in truth, there is only the seen, the heard, the sensed, and the thought. Going beyond that is Papañca (Conceptual proliferation). This is the deepest aspect.

Although we state this in words, to directly realize it, one must apply attention (manasikāra). Through those very mental phenomena (nāma-dhamma), the Buddha reveals the things that aid one's liberation at some point. Remaining inside the eggshell, one applies the tip of the beak to break that eggshell through Yoniso manasikāra in accordance with the Three Characteristics of Anicca, Dukkha, and Anattā.

Attention (manasikāra) is something that belongs to Nāmarūpa. That attention can be unwise (ayoniso) or radical (yoniso). Generally, worldly beings possess unwise attention (ayoniso manasikāra). Unwise attention means taking the Anicca as permanent, taking what is associated with Dukkha as happiness, taking the foul as beautiful, and taking what is Anattā as self. Instead of that wrong grasping—instead of "clinging" (parāmāsa) or Upādāna—the Buddha points out something called "scrutinizing" (sammasana).

You have often heard the simile given for this. Saṅkhāra (Preparations) are compared to a banana trunk. A man, thinking there is heartwood in a banana trunk and intending to make a cupboard or a chair, cuts it at the top and the bottom and carries it on his shoulder, embracing it. But to find out if there is actually any heartwood in it, what does he do? He peels off a layer of bark. Peeling off one layer and gently touching it, behold, there is another layer. And another layer. To know this, one must touch it gently. "Scrutinizing" (sammasana) means such an action—a touching with the mind. For this, the term "noting" (salakkhaṇa) is used; those who practice insight meditation have heard this. Salakkhaṇa means observing, examining with wisdom. The insight meditator, therefore, does not grasp these. Following the instructions given by the Buddha, they carefully reflect on this gently, not giving room to the perception of permanence. The word "reflecting" is often used, but we must understand it not in a superficial way, but as Yoniso manasikāra—reflecting with wisdom.

The insight meditator, by making that reflection increasingly subtle and rapid, understands that what exists here is a pile of Saṅkhāra—a pile of fabrications, one inside the other. But there is no core here, no heartwood. When that understanding becomes sharp, there is the effortless seeing of things as they are. That is what is called the knowledge of things as they are (yathābhūta-ñāṇa). Wordly beings remain within delusion. With unwise attention (ayoniso manasikāra), no one can see this state as it truly is.

Instead, the Buddha shows that if one raises insight-wisdom (vipassanā-paññā) and reflects properly, at that moment, the five aggregates of grasping (pañc'upādānakkhandha) are gradually seen. The first step for this is the breaking of the Sakkāya-diṭṭhi (Dogma of self-illusion) at the moment of stream-entry (sotāpatti). This Sakkāya-diṭṭhi is the post to which one was bound. It goes even further when we speak of the conceit "I am" (asmi-māna). But primarily, through that wrong grasping—taking all forms, whether past forms that are gone, present forms seen now, or future forms to be seen, as "I" and "mine"—those aggregates of grasping are accumulated. One carries this burden.

But for one who practices insight, they understand that this exists only as often as it is reflected upon, as often as it arises. Only as often as it arises. When we reflect on the past, without our knowing it, we live in the past. If we recognize it at that very moment as "this is the past", it ends right there. When reflecting on the future, we go on making various plans about it. But if even for a moment we understand that "this is only the future", we do not make it into the present.

Next, looking at the present, even this present is relative to our grasping, relative to our holding. "Now" is an indefinable word; it is understood only according to the context. What is meant by "now"? The meditator, ultimately, through very subtle and gentle scrutinizing, understands that at the root of what we take to be a "thing" is desire (chanda). Next, its arising occurs through reflection. The place where it emerges is Phassa. That is why they are called the bases of Phassa—the entire world is formed there, based on the eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, mind, and their corresponding objects.

Next, without stopping at those points, one goes further and further into Papañca along the path of delusion. The Buddha points out their true nature: how they cease right there, and at some point, disenchantment arises toward them. It is through that disenchantment that, understanding them as Saṅkhāra through insight, one removes wrong views. Next, the conceit "I am" (asmi-māna) remains like the final trump card; ordinary worldly beings have the notion "I am". Every being has the conceit "I am".

The Buddha points out that this measuring exists relative to a certain center. When that center itself is uprooted—at the moment Taṇhā and ignorance (avijjā) are destroyed—that is final liberation. If the world seeks liberation, everyone talks about liberation. There are liberations attained while remaining inside the world. These are not only those accepted by society; even the great meditators like Āḷāra Kālāma and Uddaka Rāmaputta, who had attained high meditative absorptions (jhāna) before the appearance of the Buddha, thought they had attained liberation. But when the Buddha realized that even they remained within a certain delusion, they left Him. Later, the Buddha knew that if this Dhamma were properly presented to them, they would be able to abandon that delusion and attain Arahantship.

Thus, even those who had attained meditative absorptions were ultimately trapped in a self. Those who sought liberation through tranquility (samatha) alone, even though they temporarily enjoyed the bliss of those absorptions and lived for aeons in the Brahma worlds according to the force of their kamma, would still return to the round of rebirth (saṁsāra). The Buddha alone showed them that the path of the round of rebirth exists within this. Every one of them is trapped within the Phassa of the six sense bases.

The cessation of the six sense bases (saḷāyatana-nirodha) is ultimately Nibbāna itself. The Buddha has pointed out the path to be taken for this: having developed a certain strength of concentration through tranquility, one must proceed to insight (vipassanā). Insight becomes sharp—insight means subtle seeing. For that, the mind must be strong, it must be concentrated. With a strong, concentrated mind, as one directs the mind in accordance with the Three Characteristics as instructed by the Buddha, one ultimately sees the impermanence—not as an imposition of impermanence, but the impermanence that was hitherto unseen is finally seen.

When that is seen, as these things crumble, disenchantment naturally arises. What is described as the knowledge of dissolution (bhaṅga-ñāṇa) and so on is this crumbling nature. It is not a disease, but a sign of recovery. Next, having seen that, disenchantment arises, and ultimately, through that detachment, the grasping that was hitherto held as "I" and "mine" is abandoned. When that grasping is gone, it is at that moment that one emerges from the eggshell, when ignorance and craving are destroyed.

This cessation of the six sense bases, which is detached from the world—what the Buddha declares about the world is that the cessation of the world is realized right here, within this very body. The Buddha did not go to another world at His Parinibbāna. The realization He obtained at the moment of Supreme Enlightenment, the realization obtained through that living body, remained as long as His life-faculty existed; hence, various sensations relative to the body and to the eight worldly conditions occurred in accordance with kamma.

But on certain occasions, the Buddha directed His mind to the cessation of the six sense bases and the attainment of the fruit of Arahantship, which is why it is described as a cave, a refuge, and an island. He experienced that transcendental peace. That is what is called experiencing the deathless nectar of Nibbāna—the nectar enjoyed by the Buddha and the Arahants. At the final moment, this naturally manifest state arises, and what happens? The four elements of this body return to the four elements. But why is this not annihilationism (ucchedavāda)? Because there is nothing here to be destroyed. But for many, they want to be free from Dukkha, yet they also want to remain within Bhava. Both cannot be done. The cessation of becoming (bhava-nirodha) is indeed the cessation of suffering (dukkha-nirodha). The cessation of the world is indeed the cessation of suffering. This is an equation.

If we have understood that matter, on a Vesak day like today, when so many brilliant minds are lost, if we can explain this Dhamma to them deeply in terms of Dependent Arising (paṭiccasamuppāda) and the like, then as said before, at least a few more chicks might try to break the eggshell and come out. Today, on this valuable day, we have presented a deep sermon. Within this, there is both faith (saddhā) and wisdom (paññā). In truth, some scholars lack faith, which is why they do not become active and no effort arises. But faith is also necessary. That is why we said faith is required. With the help of that faith, there follow faith, effort, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom—wisdom comes at the end. This is not something obtained through mere book-learning or scholarship. It is through the effort generated by faith, the mindfulness developed, and the concentration developed, that wisdom can be obtained.

Therefore, we hope this sermon will help you look at the Dhamma in a balanced way. On this valuable day, you have dedicated yourselves to this, and many have undertaken the noble precepts. In the meantime, you have practiced meditation and Dhamma-contemplation. Now, at this moment, you have listened to a sermon that aids insight (vipassanā). Utilizing all of this, in this rare era of a Buddha's appearance—this highly difficult-to-encounter era of a Buddha's appearance—everyone should strive as much as possible to break the eggshell of ignorance. We wish that this sermon may support you in that endeavor.

By the delivery of this sermon and by the listening to this sermon, if any beings from the lowest hell (Avīci) to the highest heaven (Akaniṭṭha) expect to share in these merits, may they, through sharing in these merits, realize the supreme goals they aspire to. Recite these verses and dedicate the merits.

Pali Stanza:

From:

Cūḷagopālaka Sutta, Majjhima Nikāya

Dear Listeners,

The Noble Eightfold Path, placed before the world by the Teacher of the Three Worlds, the Fully Self-Awakened One, on an Esala Full Moon Poya day like today, is the only transcendental path to cross over from this shore to the other shore, parting the fierce flood of this terrifying saṃsāra. It is the salvific path that leads to the further shore of Nibbāna, escaping the realm of Māra and remaining beyond his grasp. Just as a skilled cowherd safely guides his herd of cattle across a river from this bank to the other during the rainy season, the Teacher of the Three Worlds, the Fully Self-Awakened One, revealed the Middle Path to lead worldly beings across the fierce flood of saṃsāra to the other shore.

In the Cūḷagopālaka Sutta of the Majjhima Nikāya, the Buddha illustrated His peerless, supreme enlightenment through the simile of a cowherd. The three verses that come at the very end to culminate this Sutta discourse are what we have taken as our topic today. According to the Sutta, the background story is as follows: On one occasion, the Blessed One was staying among a group of monks on the banks of the River Ganges near the town of Ukkācelā in the Vajjian country. As it appears to us, this was not due to some unusual problem or event. It may be that the Buddha wished to deliver a heart-touching sermon to the Sangha, drawing inspiration from a common sight frequently witnessed on the River Ganges. In any case, He began the discourse in this manner. In the Pali language, there is a word, bhūtapubbaṃ. Its meaning is a true event—indeed, such an event actually occurred. It begins with that word: "Monks, once upon a time, such an event occurred. What was it? A foolish cowherd of Magadha, in the last month of the rainy season, during the autumn, tried to drive his herd of cattle across the River Ganges to the Videhan country on the opposite bank, without properly examining this bank, without properly examining the further bank, and at a place that was not a ford (anotitithena)." As you merit-seeking devotees know, a ford is the shallowest place in a river, where it is easy to cross. He tried to cross his herd not at a proper ford, but at a non-ford. "But monks, that herd of cattle got caught in the current in the middle of the river and met with destruction." What was the reason? That cowherd of Magadha was unwise. Furthermore, before undertaking that task, he did not properly examine this bank, nor did he properly examine the further bank. And he tried to cross the cattle at a non-ford. That is why it was not successful. "In the same way, monks, if any ascetics and brahmins are unskilled regarding this world"—the word used there is akusalā—"unskilled regarding the next world, without comprehension, unskilled regarding the realm of Māra, unskilled regarding what is not the realm of Māra, unskilled regarding the region subject to death (Maccu); if anyone decides to place faith in such ascetics and brahmins, and decides to listen to them, that will lead to their harm, suffering (dukkha), and misfortune for a long time." Thus, the Buddha declared.

In line with that simile, the Buddha next presents another factual event: "Monks, such an event also occurred. A skilled, wise cowherd of Magadha, in the very same way, in the last month of the rainy season during autumn, properly examined this bank of the river, properly examined the further bank, and crossed his herd of cattle at the proper ford." The Buddha beautifully describes the manner in which they were crossed. First, that cowherd took the bulls who were the leaders of the herd (gopitaro gopariṇāyakā), the chief cattle, and they cut across the river's current, went forward, and crossed over safely. Secondly, the strong cattle and cows of the herd similarly cut across the river's currents, went forward, and crossed over. Thirdly, the grown heifers and young bulls likewise cut across the river's current, went forward, and crossed over safely. Fourthly, the weak calves of the herd were also taken across, cutting through the current, going forward, and crossing over safely. Then the Buddha declares something further, something very special: "Monks, such a thing also occurred on that occasion. There was a newborn calf in that herd, born that very day, who, being urged on by its mother's lowing"—there is a unique phrase mentioned there, which scholars interpret in various ways: mātugoravena vuyhamāno. As you merit-seeking devotees know, after a cow gives birth to a calf, she makes a special protective sound, like "hum, hum." Urging the calf forward with that sound, or searching for it when lost; encouraged by that lowing sound of the mother, the newborn calf also went forward safely through the water parted by its mother’s chest and crossed over.

Then the Buddha explains according to that simile: "What was the reason? That cowherd was wise. He properly examined this bank, he properly examined the further bank, and he crossed the cattle at the proper ford. That is why it was successful. In the same way, monks, if any ascetics and brahmins are skilled regarding this world, skilled regarding the next world, skilled regarding the realm of Māra, skilled regarding what is not the realm of Māra, skilled regarding the region subject to death, and skilled regarding the region free from death; if anyone thinks it fit to listen to such ascetics and brahmins and thinks it fit to place faith in them, that will lead to their benefit and happiness for a long time." Having declared this, using the actions of the skilled cowherd as a simile, the Buddha next explains the corresponding reality regarding the individuals in this Dispensation (Sāsana): "Just as, monks, that cowherd first crossed the bulls, the leaders of the herd, so too, monks, the Arahants in this Dispensation, having severed the ten fetters (saṃyojana) that bind one to saṃsāra, and having destroyed the taints (āsava)"—many other terms describing Arahants are mentioned there—"the Arahants in this Dispensation cross over safely to the further shore of Nibbāna, having cut all ten fetters." Thus, that is the simile for them. The Arahants, having destroyed all defilements and become pure, cross over safely.

Secondly, showing the second point, just as the strong cattle and cows of the herd crossed over safely next, in this Dispensation, what is spoken of next—as you merit-seeking devotees know—is about the Non-Returner (Anāgāmī) noble individuals. Now let us define the ten fetters (saṃyojana) for those who do not know. Fetters are described as the bonds that tie one to saṃsāra. They are: dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi), skeptical doubt (vicikicchā), adherence to rules and rituals (sīlabbata-parāmāsa), sensual lust (kāmarāga), ill-will (paṭigha), craving for fine-material existence (rūparāga), craving for immaterial existence (arūparāga), conceit (māna), restlessness (uddhacca), and ignorance (avijjā). These ten are known in the Dhamma as the ten fetters (saṃyojana). The ten fetters are divided in the Dhamma, dear devotees, into the lower fetters (oramabhāgiya) and the higher fetters (uddhambhāgiya). The lower fetters belong to this side—when we look from this side, the five fetters on this side. The higher fetters belong to the upper side. So, regarding the Non-Returner (Anāgāmī), it is mentioned that they have severed those five lower fetters, and as you may have heard, they are reborn spontaneously (opapātika), without parents, in the Pure Abodes (Suddhāvāsa). They take birth in the Pure Abodes of the Brahma world: Aviha, Atappa, Sudassa, Sudassī, and Akaniṭṭha. Moreover, the meaning of the word Anāgāmī is "one who does not return here." The Non-Returner does not come back to this world. Another phrase is used in the Dhamma for this: anāvattidhammo tasmā lokā—not returning from that world. They do not turn back from the Brahma world. The Non-Returner who has attained that state is compared to the second category of cattle. Thus, regarding those individuals, the Buddha declares that while the Arahants have crossed over, these individuals "will cross over." It is stated in the future tense; they will definitely cross over, with certainty. The Buddha affirms this decisively regarding Non-Returners. Now you can understand that second point.

Thirdly, just as the grown heifers and young bulls were crossed over, in this Dispensation, we next have the Once-Returner (Sakadāgāmī). You have probably heard the meaning of the word Sakadāgāmī: one who comes to this world only once more. Regarding Once-Returners (Sakadāgāmī), this is how it is described in the Dhamma, and in this Sutta too, it is said that they have severed the first three fetters—the dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi), skeptical doubt (vicikicchā), and adherence to rules and rituals (sīlabbata-parāmāsa)—and in addition, they have thinned out the defilements of lust, hatred, and delusion. So, they have severed three fetters and thinned out lust, hatred, and delusion. To cut through the river's current, the Buddha here compares it to cutting through Māra's stream: Mārassa sotaṃ chetvā—having cut Māra's stream. Māra's stream is craving (taṇhā). Cutting through the stream of craving (taṇhā), this third group will also cross over. They will definitely go. It is something that happens in the future. They return only once, but they will definitely realize Nibbāna. That is the third category.

In the fourth category are the weak calves. That simile is shown regarding the Stream-Enterer (Sotāpanna). Regarding those who have severed only the first three fetters—dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi), skeptical doubt (vicikicchā), and adherence to rules and rituals (sīlabbata-parāmāsa)—the Buddha often mentions sambodhiparāyaṇo (bound for awakening) and avinipātadhammo (not subject to ruin/rebirth in lower worlds). They do not go to the hells anymore; they do not go to states of misery. Special things are mentioned about the Stream-Enterer too. Just as Arahants are spoken of from that end, if we look from this end at the level of ordinary people, the Stream-Enterer is indeed a noble being. Yet, here they are compared to the weak calves. Why is that? "Calves" because they have severed only three out of the ten fetters. This is not said to disparage them, but this much is certain. It is mentioned in other places regarding them—even if not in this Sutta, you merit-seeking devotees have heard it—the Stream-Enterer is described as sattakkhattuparama, meaning they take birth at most seven more times. Within seven lifetimes, they will somehow bring an end to saṃsāric suffering (dukkha). There are the words niyato sambodhiparāyaṇo—destined with certainty for awakening. "Awakening" (sambodhi) means Nibbāna, or Arhatship. They will attain Arhatship. That reassurance exists for the Stream-Enterer too. Moreover, avinipātadhammo means they are free from rebirth in the hells and states of misery. Thus, they are compared to the weak calves.

Now comes a deeper part. For the next, fifth category, the Buddha shows words that most of you have probably not heard: "Just as, monks, that newborn calf, born that very day, crossed over urged by its mother's lowing and with her assistance, so too in this Dispensation there are two groups of individuals: those called Dhammānusārī (Dhamma-followers) and Saddhānusārī (Faith-followers)." These two groups are even below the level of Stream-Entry (Sotāpanna). Yet the Buddha declares even of these two groups that, like the newborn calf, these two tender ones will also definitely cross over. This is a source of great consolation in this Dispensation. It shows that it does not end only with the Stream-Enterer; there is still room for others. This means that the Buddha has revealed a Middle Path by which even those newborn calves can cut through Māra's stream and cross over. So, those two categories of individuals, the Dhammānusārī and Saddhānusārī, cross over in that manner. We shall speak of them to you devotees in due course. Let us first finish this story. In brief, this is all that is said here. Compared to that calf are the noble individuals in this Dispensation named Dhammānusārī and Saddhānusārī. Those two groups, who are mentioned in places describing virtuous people (sappurisa), will also, just like the others, definitely cross over someday.

Having said this, the Buddha explains the reason for it by making a declaration akin to a lion's roar: "Monks, why is this so? Because, monks, I am skilled regarding this world"—the word used is kusalo (skilled)—"I am skilled regarding the next world, skilled regarding the realm of Māra, skilled regarding the region subject to death, and skilled regarding the region free from death. Therefore, monks, if any deem it fit to listen to me, and deem it fit to arouse faith in me, that will lead to their benefit and happiness for a long time." Having declared this, He uttered the three verses we have taken as our topic, which culminate that discourse.

Ayaṃ loko paro loko jānatā suppakāsito... The meaning of this verse is: This world and the world beyond have been well declared by the One with deep understanding—it is understood here that it refers to the Buddha, the Fully Self-Awakened One. Next, it says: yañca mārena sampattaṃ—that which can be reached by Māra; appattaṃ yañca maccunā—and that which cannot be reached by Death. Both of these have been declared by the Fully Self-Awakened One.

Sabbaṃ lokaṃ abhiññāya sambuddhena pajānatā, vivaṭaṃ amatadvāraṃ khemaṃ nibbānapattiyā. Having known the entire world through direct knowledge (abhiññā), with supreme wisdom, the Fully Self-Awakened One who understands, has opened the door to the Deathless (amatadvāraṃ), the secure door to the Deathless, for the attainment of Nibbāna.

The next verse says: Chinnaṃ pāpimato sotaṃ viddhastaṃ vinalīkataṃ, pāmojjabahulā hotha, khemaṃ... bhikkhavo. That victory is then declared by the Buddha in the next verse: chinnaṃ pāpimato sotaṃ—the stream of the Evil One, that stream which was mentioned, has been severed. viddhastaṃ—it has been destroyed; vinalīkataṃ—the pride of Māra has been rendered useless. Therefore, pāmojjabahulā hotha—be full of joy and happiness, O monks. "Seek the secure..." Here, it means to aspire for Nibbāna. So, we have discussed almost the entirety of that Sutta.

Now, what remains is for us to say something by way of commentary. Especially from the points mentioned in the Sutta, through the comparison of the simile and the reality, you merit-seeking devotees can understand this. Even though more details are not given, everyone has heard at this point the descriptions of the Stream-Enterer, Once-Returner, Non-Returner, and Arahant. Something unique mentioned here, however, is the Dhammānusārī and Saddhānusārī. It is on this that we will make a special commentary. These two groups are only briefly mentioned in this Sutta. However, in certain places in several Suttas, the Buddha describes these two generally unrevealed/uncommon individuals in this manner. Specifically, in the Alagaddūpama Sutta, it is mentioned that the Dhammānusārī and Saddhānusārī are indeed destined with certainty for awakening (sambodhiparāyaṇo), bound for Nibbāna or Arhatship in this Dispensation.

Their qualifications are mentioned next in the Kīṭāgiri Sutta of the Majjhima Nikāya, where they are presented more clearly at the end of a list of seven types of individuals. Regarding the Dhammānusārī individual, it is mentioned in the Kīṭāgiri Sutta as follows: that Dhammānusārī individual has, to a certain extent, reflected upon and scrutinized with wisdom the teachings declared by the Tathāgata, and has gained a conviction in them. The Pali phrase used for this is also deep: mattaso nijjhānaṃ khamanti. To a certain degree or measure, nijjhānaṃ khamanti means we can say they have become convinced. Having thought and reflected, they have reached a certain conclusion: "Ah, this is indeed so." That is on their part. Next, the special thing is that within this Dhammānusārī individual, there are established—as you merit-seeking devotees have also heard among the thirty-seven aids to awakening—the five spiritual faculties (indriya): faith (saddhā), energy (viriya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). Thus, the five spiritual faculties—the faculty of faith (saddhindriya), energy (viriyindriya), mindfulness (satindriya), concentration (samāhindriya), and wisdom (paññindriya)—are established within this Dhammānusārī individual. That is why an ordinary worldling (puthujjana) does not possess them. Even if they think they do, in no way whatsoever—sabbena sabbaṃ sabbathā sabbaṃ—are these five faculties established in an ordinary worldling. Faith may be present, and the other qualities may be present, but they have not reached the status of a spiritual faculty (indriya). Thus, at the very least, that status has been attained by this Dhammānusārī individual. So, why is the word Dhammānusārī used? There is a deep meaning for the reason here. Among those five faculties, some have developed a particular one strongly in saṃsāra. For some, the faculty of faith (saddhindriya) is strong. Now, in this Dhammānusārī individual, the faculty of wisdom (paññindriya) is strong. While all five are established, the faculty of wisdom is particularly strong, enabling them to proceed with their practice. Further details are mentioned about this. If we speak systematically, that is what is described in the Kīṭāgiri Sutta.

Similarly, next, regarding the Saddhānusārī individual, they differ from the Dhammānusārī in that while the former walks this path in accordance with the Dhamma, the Saddhānusārī individual crosses over in accordance with faith, utilizing faith as their support. Therefore, regarding that person, the Buddha does not speak of a conviction in the Dhamma, but something special is said there: yassa saddhāmattaṃ hoti pemamattaṃ—"who has a mere degree of faith, a mere degree of love" toward the Tathāgata. They have faith and love toward the Tathāgata. Now we can think of cases like Ven. Vakkali, whom you have heard of. Due to a highly developed faculty of faith (saddhindriya), perhaps from associating with Buddhas in past saṃsāric lives, they have without any doubt a deep faith and love toward the Tathāgata. That is why they are called Saddhānusārī. Thus, the Dhammānusārī individual has the Dhamma convinced to some extent. The Saddhānusārī individual does not even have that, but they have faith and love toward the Tathāgata. In addition to that, just like the former individual, they also have the five faculties established: faith (saddhā), energy (viriya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). They possess that qualification as well. Now you merit-seeking devotees have some understanding of these two.

Next, if anyone wishes to find a good Sutta to learn more about these two, there is a section of teachings in the Saṃyutta Nikāya called the Okkantika Saṃyutta—a word of the Buddha, a Buddha-discourse. Okkantika is a word that carries the meaning of "entering into" or "descending into." Indeed, it is in that Okkantika Saṃyutta that these two are specifically spoken of. In that Okkantika Saṃyutta, the Buddha declares as follows: "Monks, the eye is impermanent (inconstant), subject to change, subject to becoming otherwise." The words used are aniccaṃ, vipariṇāmi, and aññathābhāvi. Just like the eye, all six—including the ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind (mano)—are impermanent (inconstant), subject to change, subject to becoming otherwise. Regarding these declared facts, a person has, to a certain extent, gained a conviction. That is, the Dhammānusārī individual has not yet realized them through direct knowledge and vision (ñāṇadassana). Yet, by directing the mind to them, they have become convinced to a certain degree: "This is indeed so." Paññāya mattaso nijjhānaṃ khamanti—they have accepted it through wisdom to a certain measure. Thus, something is declared there regarding that Dhammānusārī individual. Along with that, several other details are mentioned to identify that individual. Regarding that person, the words okkanto sammatta-niyāmaṃ are used. Then the Buddha declares that, in addition to the aforementioned qualification, this person:

The meaning of okkanto sammatta-niyāmaṃ, dear devotees, is: sammatta means correctness or rightness. You devotees know the word sammā. Sammatta means the state of being correct or right. Therefore, they have entered the path of certainty, which is correctness. When the mind has entered this certainty of correctness, it does not turn back to the wrong side again. There are two states: micchatta and sammatta. Micchatta is the state of wrongness, while sammatta is the state of rightness. Thus, this Dhammānusārī individual has entered into the certainty called sammatta, having arrived at the correct path, the right way. Alongside that, it is said: sappurisabhūmiṃ okkanto—the Dhammānusārī individual has entered the plane of the virtuous (sappurisa). Devotees, the terms sappurisa (virtuous) and asappurisa (non-virtuous) are not used in the Dhamma merely in their worldly social meanings. The word sappurisa is applied to individuals. In the Sappurisa Sutta of the Majjhima Nikāya and other texts, it is applied to the noble (ariya) individual. The true sappurisa is that person—the noble individual. Therefore, sappurisabhūmiṃ okkanto means that this Dhammānusārī individual has also entered the plane of the noble ones. Next, another qualification is mentioned:

vītivatto puthujjanabhūmiṃ—they have transcended the plane of the ordinary worldling (puthujjana), going beyond the worldling's plane. Next, another thing is said: abhabbo taṃ kammaṃ kātuṃ yaṃ kammaṃ karitvā nirayaṃ vā tiracchānayoniṃ vā pettivisayaṃ vā... That means this Dhammānusārī individual is incapable of performing any unwholesome karma (kamma) that would cause rebirth in hell, the animal realm, or the ghost realm. They cannot do it. That is what abhabba (incapable) means. This too is a massive qualification. Now, we cannot say this about any one of you devotees—that you are incapable of doing so. This is the Buddha's word. The word abhabba is a special word. It means they can never do it again. And finally, the most special point is shown: that Dhammānusārī individual will not pass away without realizing the fruit of Stream-Entry (sotāpattiphala). They will not die without realizing the fruit of Stream-Entry. Therefore, if by any chance the Dhammānusārī individual fails to become a Stream-Enterer beforehand, at the very last moment, before death, they will definitely become a Stream-Enterer. This is the word of the Buddha. That is why you merit-seeking devotees have now understood something about the Dhammānusārī individual.

Explaining the Saddhānusārī individual is easy now, because in addition to the other points, it is also mentioned here. The Saddhānusārī individual does not have those insights regarding impermanence (inconstancy) to that extent; they have not even gained a slight conviction in that way. But they possess faith and love. Now, whatever we mentioned as the special qualifications of the Dhammānusārī individual, all of those are possessed by the Saddhānusārī individual as well. What are they? Having entered the certainty of correctness, having entered the plane of the virtuous, having transcended the plane of the ordinary worldling, they are incapable of performing any karma that would lead to rebirth in states of misery such as hell, the animal realm, or the ghost realm. Next, they will definitely attain the fruit of Stream-Entry before death. Thus, for you devotees who previously knew only of the four types of noble disciples, there is this kind of refuge in the Dispensation. Therefore, it is not just those four. Indeed, if one walks the path of the Dhamma correctly as introduced by the Buddha with genuine faith, then at the very least, like that newborn calf crossing over under its mother's protection, they too can cross over. The special thing is that before death, according to the Buddha's word, even when facing the death-sensation (moraṇa vedanāva / pain of death), they will practice insight (vipassanā) and become Stream-Enterers. That is what is declared there.

From there, let us proceed. You devotees have heard that on a day like today, in the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta, the Buddha introduced this Noble Eightfold Path as the Middle Path. I believe you all know this. If we briefly consider at this moment what the Middle Path is: you devotees have heard of the two extremes that existed in the world, namely kāmasukhallikānuyoga (devotion to sensual pleasure) and attakilamathānuyoga (devotion to self-mortification). Devotion to sensual pleasure can be understood as living a loose life, eating and drinking and enjoying the fivefold sensual pleasures without any belief in a next world, and without a correct understanding of this world. Devotion to self-mortification means needlessly torturing the body in order to save the soul, believing that Nibbāna can be realized through that alone—thus having no understanding of the further shore. Both of those groups continue endlessly in saṃsāra. That is why the Middle Path discovered by the Buddha—which He identified as the Middle Path—is indeed the Noble Eightfold Path itself, which is secure. Such is the declaration.

Even if we do not discuss that Sutta at length: to convey the meaning, among whatever beings there are—footless, two-footed, four-footed, many-footed, with form, formless, percipient, non-percipient, neither percipient nor non-percipient—the Tathāgata is declared supreme. If anyone places faith in the Tathāgata, they have placed faith in the supreme being in the world. Next, it says finally: ye buddhe pasannā, agge te pasannā; agge kho pana pasannānaṃ, aggo vipāko hoti—"Those who have confidence in the Buddha have confidence in the supreme; and for those with confidence in the supreme, supreme is the result." If someone has aroused faith in the Tathāgata Fully Self-Awakened One, they have aroused it toward the supreme being in the world. Therefore, that speaks of its benefits. They do not go to those extremes mentioned.

So, to speak further, first we must now discuss some deeper matters regarding the Noble Eightfold Path. You devotees might have heard of a Sutta called the Aggappasāda Sutta. The Buddha has preached the Aggappasāda Sutta in a way that deeply touches a faithful person, speaking about Himself. Since we are speaking of faith here, we have mentioned this on certain occasions. This discourse is such a powerful declaration: Yāvatā sattā apadā vā dvipadā vā catuppadā vā, bahuppadā vā, rūpino vā, arūpino vā, saññino vā, asaññino vā, nevasaññināsaññino vā, tathāgato tesaṃ aggamakkhāyati, arahaṃ sammāsambuddho… "To whatever extent there are beings—footless, two-footed, four-footed, many-footed, with form, formless, percipient, non-percipient, neither-percipient-nor-non-percipient—the Tathāgata is declared supreme among them, the Worthy One, the Fully Self-Awakened One." The benefits of gaining faith in the supreme person are likewise supreme. In the same way, the Sutta speaks of the Dhamma. Let us bring out the portion regarding the Dhamma here, as a deep point is mentioned: Yāvatā, bhikkhave, dhammā saṅkhatā… "Monks, to whatever extent there are Preparations (saṅkhāra)…" Dear devotees, saṅkhata (prepared/conditioned) means things that are constructed out of causes and conditions. Everything in the world is like that—something constructed out of causes and conditions. Asaṅkhata (the Unprepared/Unconditioned (asaṅkhata)) refers to Nibbāna, in the sense of not being constructed out of causes and conditions. There are these two: saṅkhata and asaṅkhata. Among all conditioned things (saṅkhata): yāvatā, bhikkhave, dhammā saṅkhatā, ariyo aṭṭhaṅgiko maggo tesaṃ aggamakkhāyati—of all conditioned things, the Noble Eightfold Path is declared supreme. Having said that, it continues in the same way: Ye kho pana ariye magge pasannā, agge te pasannā; agge kho pana pasannānaṃ, aggo vipāko hoti… Therefore, if one establishes confidence in the Noble Eightfold Path, that confidence yields the supreme result and benefit.

Why do we highlight this here? Because the Noble Eightfold Path is conditioned (saṅkhata). This is a great wonder: through something conditioned (saṅkhata), one proceeds toward the Unconditioned (asaṅkhata). A logician of today might argue: "How can one go from the conditioned to the Unconditioned?" That is precisely where the genius of the Buddha lies! Utilizing the conditioned, the Middle Path—just as that cowherd understood this bank and the further bank, and crossed over one group first with wisdom at the proper ford, and then through the faith generated by that, crossed the second group with a specific examination, finally crossing the entire herd down to the newborn calf born that very day. In the same way, we must understand that the Buddha crossed beings over through this Noble Eightfold Path.

Next, let us turn to another aspect. You devotees have heard so much about the Noble Eightfold Path and its eight factors. But many have not even reflected on why it is called a single unit, the "Noble Path" (ariyo maggo). All these eight factors form a single unit. Maggo—the path is actually the Right Concentration (sammā-samādhi) that comes at the end. Right Concentration is the actual path. To explain this, we must point out that the Eightfold Path has both a mundane (lokiya) and a supramundane (lokuttara) aspect. There is a profound Sutta discourse in the Majjhima Nikāya that reveals this, named the Mahācattārīsaka Sutta. Drawing from that Mahācattārīsaka Sutta, let us proceed forward from there. In this Mahācattārīsaka Sutta, the Buddha declares: "Monks, I shall expound to you Noble Right Concentration (ariya sammā-samādhi) with its vital conditions (saupanisaṃ) and its requisites (saparihāraṃ)." You devotees know what parikkhāra (requisites) means—requisites offered to the Sangha are things that support life, things relevant to it. In the same way, the Buddha delivered this discourse saying, "I shall expound to you Noble Right Concentration with its supporting conditions (saupanisaṃ) and its requisites (saparihāraṃ)." Through this, the Buddha directly shows that the first seven factors stand as requisites for Right Concentration. The seven factors—Right View (sammā-diṭṭhi), Right Intention (sammā-saṅkappa), Right Speech (sammā-vācā), Right Action (sammā-kammanta), Right Livelihood (sammā-ājīva), Right Effort (sammā-vāyāma), and Right Mindfulness (sammā-sati)—are required for establishing Right Concentration. This is a very deep matter. Given the time we have, let us mention this at least to generate interest, as it is highly relevant and important, especially since this aspect is barely considered in this day and age.

Thus, in speaking of Noble Right Concentration, the Buddha repeatedly utters a highly astonishing sentence that highlights the importance of Right View (sammā-diṭṭhi): "Monks, therein Right View comes first (tatra, bhikkhave, sammā-diṭṭhi pubbaṅgamā)." He constantly reminds us: Right View comes first, Right View comes first. Many people raise the question of why it is placed at the front. Right View comes first. What is the reason for this? Now, consider this: even to acquire Right View, a form of Right View is required! Sometimes we have to state things that seem like riddles: even to develop Right View, one needs Right View. What is the reason? The Buddha explains it in this way: Right View is the forerunner because, before acquiring Right View, one must recognize Wrong View (micchā-diṭṭhi) as Wrong View. For that too, Right View is required! Thus, in defining Right View, that is how the Buddha shows why Right View is the forerunner: one understands Wrong View as Wrong View, and one understands Right View as Right View.

Then, He shows something further—from here onward, the path becomes extraordinary. At this point, the Buddha declares Right View in a manner not found in other places: "Monks, I say Right View is twofold (sammā-diṭṭhiṃ pahaṃ, bhikkhave, dvayaṃ vadāmi)." What is this twofold nature? He shows the two types next: "Monks, there is a Right View that is accompanied by taints (sāsavā), siding with merit (puññabhāgiyā), ripening in the acquisitions (upadhivepakkā)." "Acquisitions" (upadhi) refers to worldly resources and possessions that support one in saṃsāra. There is a Right View that yields these; that is mundane Right View. "And there is, monks, a Right View that is Noble (ariyā), taintless (anāsavā), supramundane (lokuttarā), which has become a factor of the supramundane path." Those are the two.

Out of these two, many people only know or have heard of the ten-point Right View. Perhaps you devotees have heard the opposite—the ten claims made by those with Wrong View about the world. In brief, they say: "There is no giving, no sacrifice, no offering; there is no fruit or result of good and bad actions; there is no this world, no next world; there is no mother, no father; there are no spontaneously born beings; there are no ascetics and brahmins who have correctly understood this world." This ten-point doctrine of "there is not" is called Wrong View. To all ten, the Buddha says "there is." That is mundane Right View: there are benefits and results of giving; there are results of wholesome and unwholesome actions; there are results of supporting parents; there are spontaneously born beings in this world; and there are ascetics and brahmins who explain this world and the next. This "is" perception replaces the "is-not" perception—asserting "there is" for what the others denied. That is the Middle Path. Those who make the "is-not" claims go to hell. If they say "there are no such things, let us eat, drink, and perish," they go to hell. At that level, the Buddha expounded this mundane Right View, which helps one avoid misery and attain happy states. Yet, one does not cross over from saṃsāra through this alone. That crossing over is achieved through the second type of Right View.

The Buddha accepts the former as sāsavā—that Right View is accompanied by taints, yet it is puññabhāgiyā (siding with merit). It leans toward merit. Unlike the other group that leans toward demerit with Wrong View, this leans toward merit, toward the side of goodness. It also yields acquisitions as results (upadhivepakkā) in saṃsāra, bringing good rebirths. That much is there, and it is good for that purpose. But one must also be liberated from saṃsāra, must one not?

Now, that is achieved through supramundane Right View. What is described there is an extraordinary thing. That Noble, taintless (ariyā anāsavā) Right View arises in that supramundane path-moment. Within an extremely brief moment, an incredibly wondrous thing occurs: at a certain point, all eight factors align and arise simultaneously in a single mind-moment to cross over. It is a highly wondrous event, about which various controversies exist. In that moment, Right View is described not through the ten mundane items, but as wisdom (paññā), investigation of states (dhamma-vicaya), and so forth, relevant to that state. In that moment, Right View manifests in the form of investigation of states (dhamma-vicaya), wisdom (paññā), and the faculty of wisdom (paññindriya). That is supramundane Right View.

Similarly, we may not be able to describe each factor in detail due to time constraints. But keep this in mind: the Buddha shows that while you devotees may have heard to some extent about Right View, Right Intention, and so on—and can read about them in books—here, in the supramundane path, each of these is defined in a unique way. In that path-moment, they manifest in an extraordinary form. Right Intention does not manifest merely as ordinary thoughts (vitakka). It is not like how people think in the world. Even in terms of Wrong Intention (micchā-saṅkappa), Right View is required to recognize Wrong Intention as wrong, and Right Intention as right. First, Right View must lead. Next, while in the ordinary world, the three intentions—intention of renunciation (nekkhamma), non-ill will (avyāpāda), and non-cruelty (avihiṃsā)—are called Right Intention, in the supramundane state, it is the application and directing of the mind (takko vitakko) toward concentration; that mental power of directing is what is called Right Intention (sammā-saṅkappa).

Furthermore, what must be specifically noted is that Right Speech (sammā-vācā), Right Action (sammā-kammanta), and Right Livelihood (sammā-ājīva) do not manifest in the supramundane path-moment as they do in ordinary situations. One has already abstained from those wrong behaviors beforehand. When that moment arises, the abstinence is already complete. Therefore, they manifest as abstinences (virati). There is no special effort to abstain in that moment; the abstinence is already established. Thus, one is detached from those three.

In this manner, next, He reveals something highly wondrous. In the supramundane state, protection is provided to that mind in three ways by the three factors: Right View, Right Effort, and Right Mindfulness. In that supramundane state—that is, when path-knowledge (magga-ñāṇa) arises—they perform a special function, a special task. The words the Buddha uses for their action toward that mind are anuparidhāvanti and anuparivattanti. Anuparidhāvanti means they run along in association with it; anuparivattanti means they revolve in association with it. Thus, this supramundane path-moment—the journey of using the conditioned (saṅkhata) to reach the Unconditioned (asaṅkhata)—is a highly wondrous and miraculous event. In it, protection is provided to that mind. Right View leads, Right Effort supports from behind by giving a push and providing security, and Right Mindfulness remains close at hand to assist.

Even if it is not an orthodox simile from the texts, we have on some occasion expressed this in a way that touches your hearts. Today, when prominent politicians or VIPs travel, there is no need to explain—one group of security personnel moves ahead, another group follows behind to protect them from danger, and another group stays right next to them. It is exactly like that. Just as the great figures of the world travel with such security, the two beautiful words anuparidhāvanti and anuparivattanti appear there to describe the retinue that accompanies Noble Right Concentration as it performs its immense, powerful task. These three factors—Right View, Right Effort, and Right Mindfulness—provide security during the supramundane path-moment. Similarly, with the other three factors we mentioned earlier, in daily life one constantly makes an effort to abandon Wrong Speech and practice Right Speech. In that way, it is merely a training (sikkhā). That training is practiced over a long time. When that training is perfected, in that moment it is described as ārati (avoiding), virati (abstinence), and pativirati (refraining)—that person has distanced themselves far from it. This abstinence (virati) itself becomes a protection for Noble Right Concentration.

The internal, inner nature of these eight factors is truly wondrous and miraculous. We simply go on repeating "eight," but through these eight, on one hand, a being is prevented from falling into states of misery and is directed toward happy realms by that mundane Right View accompanied by taints (sāsava). Supramundane Right View performs an even more powerful task: transcending this worldliness in the state of path and fruit. To put it briefly, let us consider it this way: while practicing a concentration such as mindfulness of breathing (ānāpānasati) as shown by the Buddha, if one also develops insight (vipassanā) into the Three Characteristics (anicca, dukkha, anattā), then by the time the factors of awakening—specifically, the thirty-seven aids to awakening (of which those five we mentioned are the spiritual faculties)—are perfected, it happens almost effortlessly. It occurs naturally, and at that point, there is a powerful disenchantment (nibbidā) toward the five aggregates (pañcakkhandha). Through that disenchantment, one attains the supramundane state. One lets go of this bank and leaps to the other bank. In that moment, protection is provided to that Right Concentration. Devotees, it is about that Right Concentration that you have all heard in the Ratana Sutta:

> Yaṃ buddhaseṭṭho parivaṇṇayī suciṃ, samādhimānantarikaññamāhu, > samādhinā tena samo na vijjati…

"The pure concentration which the supreme Buddha praised, and which they call the 'immediate concentration' (concentration with immediate result)—no equal to that concentration is found." It is that immediate concentration (ānantarika-samādhi) that is spoken of there. The ānantarika-samādhi highly praised by the Buddha is indeed path-concentration (magga-samādhi). Immediately following that path-concentration, one realizes the fruit (phala). That is why it is called "immediate" (ānantarika).

It is mentioned in the commentaries that scholars of the past had various controversies regarding this. But to be brief due to time constraints: you devotees have heard of the eight noble individuals. If asked, you might immediately answer, "The one on the path of Stream-Entry, the one in its fruit," and so on. That is how people answer: the four paths and the four fruits. But, devotees, this is how it is mentioned in the Dhamma. The eight noble individuals are mentioned in several places, not just one, as follows: sotāpanno, sotāpattiphala-sacchikiriyāya paṭipanno (one practicing for the realization of the fruit of Stream-Entry), sakadāgāmī, sakadāgāmiphala-sacchikiriyāya paṭipanno, anāgāmī, anāgāmiphala-sacchikiriyāya paṭipanno, and so on. That is how the eight are spoken of. Thus, what must be specially noted here is that although we use the words magga (path) and paṭipadā (practice/way) as synonyms, there is a certain difference between them. One enters the path by fulfilling a course of practice (paṭipadā); it is within that course of practice. Now this aligns. We began this sermon, or rather highlighted as a special point, the two individuals: Dhammānusārī and Saddhānusārī. It is often said of these two that they are "on the path of Stream-Entry" (sotāpatti-magga). What we must say is that they are those who are in the course of practice (paṭipadā) leading to that supramundane path. It was mentioned, was it not: sotāpanno, sotāpattiphala-sacchikiriyāya paṭipanno. If it could be said briefly, the Buddha would have said directly "those on the path of Stream-Entry." Since the path of Stream-Entry is momentary, how can it apply to all eight? If the mind-moment is just one flash, how can gifts be given to all eight? Now here, we showed that those two individuals, the Dhammānusārī and Saddhānusārī, are in the category of sotāpattiphala-sacchikiriyāya paṭipanno (practicing for the realization of the fruit of Stream-Entry). It is clearly visible, is it not? The Buddha declared that before death, these two will somehow reach the fruit of Stream-Entry. Therefore, they too are noble (ariya) individuals. They have entered the plane of the virtuous, having transcended the state of the ordinary worldling. The problem lies right there. Therefore, in accordance with the Dhamma and the Suttas, we must apply this to the course of practice (paṭipadā). Those who have entered the practice that leads to entering the path of Stream-Entry are called paṭipanna (practitioners). Those who have entered that practice are the Saddhānusārī and Dhammānusārī. It is not the path of Stream-Entry itself—if the path of Stream-Entry arises, the fruit follows directly, immediately. That is what "immediate" (ānantarika) means. Thus, the supramundane path is different. What is spoken of here is the course of practice (paṭipadā). Hence, there is a verse in the Aṅguttara Nikāya that makes this very clear:

> esa saṅgho ujubhūto, paññā-sīla-samāhito

"Four practicing and four established in the fruit, this is the upright Sangha, composed of wisdom, virtue, and concentration." Paṭipannā—it could have said maggaṭṭhā (established in the path) there. But it does not. You devotees have heard the word maggastha (on the path). There is no mention of maggastha here; it is paṭipanna. "Four practicing (paṭipannā) and four established in the fruit (phale ṭhitā)"—there are the eight. The four who have entered the practice (paṭipadā) and the four established in the fruit. "This is the upright Sangha" (esa saṅgho ujubhūto). These are described as the eight upright noble individuals, "endowed with wisdom, virtue, and concentration" (paññā-sīla-samāhito). The eight shown in this verse are what we specifically mentioned. Although we generally treat "path" (magga) and "practice" (paṭipadā) as synonymous, there is a distinction here. Therefore, in identifying and introducing noble individuals, we must be careful: it is not "established in the path" (maggaṭṭha) that is meant, but rather having entered the practice (paṭipadā) for realizing the fruit of Stream-Entry. This would need to be explained in more detail; it is not simple.

Who are the eight? The Stream-Enterer; the individual who has entered the practice for realizing the fruit of Stream-Entry; the Once-Returner; the individual who has entered the practice for realizing the fruit of Once-Return. We spoke specifically of the one who has attained the fruit of Stream-Entry. You devotees can deduce the rest. Suppose someone has attained the fruit of Stream-Entry. If they do not fall into negligence as a negligent disciple (sekha), but continue to work further, walking that path of knowledge, then from that point on, the practice they undertake from being a Stream-Enterer until they become a Once-Returner is called sakadāgāmiphala-sacchikiriyāya paṭipanno—striving to reach the fruit of Once-Return. One can understand it in that way, up to the last one: the Arahant, and arahattāya paṭipanno—the Arahant, and the individual practicing for the realization of Arhatship.

Thus, what we have expounded to you devotees is deep. If deep Dhamma is unnecessarily simplified and presented as shallow, it would lead to the destruction of the Dhamma. Without simplifying it in that manner, but presenting the Dhamma as Dhamma, we have explained this Middle Path as set forth by the Buddha to some extent within one hour to you devotees on this valuable day. This aspect of the Dispensation is now largely forgotten. Therefore, you devotees have kept virtue (sīla) today on this valuable day to the best of your ability. Many lay devotees who come to us now say: "I do not want to be born in saṃsāra anymore. I must go somewhere and attain the paths and fruits as quickly as possible. I want to go somewhere and ordain." Everyone speaks in this way. Thus, we presented this to help those people, so that they may reflect. Even if one cannot attain the fruit of Stream-Entry, this is a great consolation. Let us at least strive to be like that calf urged on by its mother's protective lowing. That is what we have to say to you devotees.

Thus, through the virtue kept today, the meditation practiced, and this insight-oriented Dhamma sermon heard, may you devotees be able to bring your learning and meditation to fruition as quickly as possible, realize those noble states mentioned, and cross over the entire wilderness of saṃsāra, facilitating this crossing from this shore to the other shore. In the past, "going from this shore to the other shore" did not mean traveling abroad; it meant crossing over this ocean of saṃsāra. May you devotees receive the necessary strength, power, and massive energy for that purpose. May your learning and meditation quickly bear fruit, and may you gain the ability to reach that peace of Nibbāna. From the Avīci hell to the Akaniṭṭha heaven, if there be any who wish to rejoice in the merits of this Dhamma preaching and Dhamma hearing, may they, through that rejoicing, realize the supreme, great, deathless Nibbāna by means of their aspired-for enlightenment (bodhi). May you devotees also receive the strength and power to realize that supreme, great, deathless Nibbāna very soon. With that aspiration, let us recite these verses.

Pali Stanza:

Cattāro ca paṭipannā, cattāro ca phale ṭhitā; Esa saṅgho ujubhūto, paññāsīlasamāhito. Yajamānānaṃ manussānaṃ, puññapekhāna pāṇinaṃ; Karotaṃ opadhikaṃ puññaṃ, saṅghe dinnaṃ mahapphalaṃ.

From:

Aṭṭhapuggala Sutta (AN 8 tradition)

Dear Listeners,

It was on an Esala full-moon poya day like today that the Tathāgata, the Blessed One, the Fully Enlightened Samma Sambuddha, after attaining supreme enlightenment, delivered his first Dhamma sermon, the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta, to the group of five monks—Kondañña, Bhaddiya, Vappa, Mahānāma, and Assaji—at the Deer Park in Isipatana, Benares. Upon hearing that sermon, Ven. Koṇḍañña realized the noble fruit of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala), marking the very first appearance of the Noble (Ariya) Saṅgha in the world. It is indeed this Noble Saṅgha that is referred to in the virtues of the Saṅgha (Saṅghaguṇa) which you, meritorious friends, frequently recite. In that recitation of the Saṅgha's virtues, mention is made of eight individuals belonging to the Blessed One's disciple-community (Sāvaka Saṅgha). Today, we have chosen as our theme two verses from the Aṭṭhapuggala Sutta in the Book of Eights (Aṭṭhaka Nipāta) of the Aṅguttara Nikāya, which speak about these eight individuals.

"Cattāro ca paṭipannā cattāro ca phale thitā" — The four who have entered the path of practice and the four established in the fruit.

"Esa saṅgho ujubhūto paññā-sīla-samāhito" — This is the upright Saṅgha, endowed with the virtues of wisdom, ethical conduct, and concentration.

"Yajamānānaṃ manussānaṃ puññapekhāna pāṇinaṃ" — For those humans who make offerings, for living beings seeking merit,

"Karotaṃ opadhikaṃ puññaṃ saṅghe dinnaṃ mahapphalaṃ" — for those performing merit that leads to rebirth-assets, what is given to the Saṅgha yields great fruit.

This same quality of yielding great fruit is what is found in the passage on the virtues of the Saṅgha that you often chant:

Supaṭipanno bhagavato sāvaka-saṅgho, ujupaṭipanno bhagavato sāvaka-saṅgho, ñāyapaṭipanno bhagavato sāvaka-saṅgho, sāmīcipaṭipanno bhagavato sāvaka-saṅgho, yadidaṃ cattāri purisayugāni aṭṭha purisapuggalā, esa bhagavato sāvaka-saṅgho, āhuṇeyyo pāhuṇeyyo dakkhiṇeyyo añjalikaraṇīyo anuttaraṃ puññakkhettaṃ lokassa.

Since you recite this passage frequently, many of you likely know its meaning as well.

"Supaṭipanno bhagavato sāvaka-saṅgho": The community of the Blessed One's disciples has entered the path of good practice.

"Ujupaṭipanno": They have entered the path of upright practice.

"Ñāyapaṭipanno": They have entered the path of practice in accordance with the law/method (ñāya).

"Sāmīcipaṭipanno": They have entered the path of proper practice.

"Yadidaṃ cattāri purisayugāni aṭṭha purisapuggalā": That is, the four pairs of persons, the eight individual persons.

"Esa bhagavato sāvaka-saṅgho": This is the Blessed One's community of disciples. After declaring their virtues, their qualifications to receive offerings are then shown:

Āhuṇeyyo: They are worthy of gifts brought from afar.

Pāhuṇeyyo: They are worthy of hospitality.

Dakkhiṇeyyo: They are worthy of offerings given with the next world in view.

Añjalikaraṇīyo: They are worthy of reverential salutation with hands joined above the head.

Anuttaraṃ puññakkhettaṃ lokassa: They are the incomparable field of merit for the world.

Now, let us first present the analysis and exposition of this passage found in the Commentaries. In the Visuddhimagga, in the section on recollections (Anussati Niddesa), Ven. Buddhaghosa explains these main terms. Someone might ask, "What is this 'pair' (yugala)? Who are the eight individual persons?" To this, the commentators present the meaning as follows. The four pairs of persons are shown as: "Cattāri purisayugānīti paṭhama-maggatho phalaṭṭho"—one who is on the first path and one who is established in its fruit. That is, one on the path of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-magga) and one established in the fruit of Stream-entry (Sotāpattiphala). In the same manner, one on the path of Once-returning and one established in the fruit of Once-returning, and so on, up to one on the path of Arahantship and one established in the fruit of Arahantship. The Commentary applies the exposition of "one on the path" (maggaṭṭha) and "one established in the fruit" (phalaṭṭha). It is according to this that the popular usage of "the four paths and the four fruits" (satara-maṅga satara-phala) has come about today.

However, a certain problem arises from this. What is it? It is mentioned in the Dhamma, when speaking of the unmediated concentration (ānantarika-samādhi), that the realization of the fruit occurs immediately after the supramundane path. Let alone other places, this is mentioned even in the Ratana Sutta, which you know so well:

Yaṃ buddhaseṭṭho parivaṇṇayī suciṃ, samādhimānantarikaññamāhu, samādhinā tena samo na vijjati...

It is stated that the pure concentration praised continuously by the Buddha is called "unmediated" (ānantarika), and there is no concentration equal to that concentration. The meaning of this word ānantarika is that immediately after the path-concentration, one falls into the fruit. Therefore, if one enters the fruit immediately after the path-concentration, how can we distinguish the four on the path from the four established in the fruit? This very question has been discussed among the Saṅgha since ancient times. Many people have presented this question to us too, in person. Although I have given various answers, I thought at this moment that if I deliver a sermon on this, it will be easier in the future to just tell people to listen to this discourse in order to express my view on the matter. That is why I am specially delivering this sermon.

When speaking of this discussion on maggaṭṭha and phalaṭṭha, it is found in the Ratana Sutta itself, which you know very well, at the point of declaring the virtues of the Saṅgha:

Ye puggalā aṭṭha sataṃ pasatthā, cattāri etāni yugāni honti, te sugatassa sāvakā dakkhiṇeyyā, etesu dinnāni mahapphalāni, idampi ratanaṃ paṇītaṃ, etena saccena suvatthi hotu.

There too, it is told to us: "Ye puggalā aṭṭha sataṃ pasatthā"—which means, meritorious friends, "the eight individuals praised by the virtuous (sato/sataṃ)." "Cattāri etāni yugāni honti"—there are four pairs here. "Te sugatassa sāvakā"—those disciples of the Sugata are worthy of offerings; that is how it is mentioned here.

However, when trying to explain this, our Commentator Ven. Buddhaghosa begins with the first line of the verse we quoted: "Cattāro ca paṭipannā cattāro ca phale thitā". But when explaining it, he only uses the two words maggaṭṭha and phalaṭṭha. Not only that; it is a very surprising thing. We can clearly point out an instance of distortion of meaning even during the Commentarial period. Because, in analyzing this verse, those who know the Pali language understand that "ye puggalā aṭṭha sataṃ pasatthā" refers to eight individuals praised by the virtuous. But someone who is incompetent and does not know Pali might mispronounce this verse and say "Ye puggalā aṭṭhasatā" (pronouncing it as aṭṭhasataṃ, meaning one hundred and eight). Even the pronunciation there is wrong; it distorts the meaning. Yet, even to this, the Commentator says as follows: after first stating the correct meaning, "praised by the virtuous," he then says, "or else..." (athavā) and makes it one hundred and eight by adding and multiplying. That is why even today, preachers often talk about "one hundred and eight persons," having with great effort constructed a list of one hundred and eight. This does not fit at all. It does not fit at all. Here, it is not talking about one hundred and eight. If we look at the word of the Buddha, "ye puggalā aṭṭha sataṃ", this word sataṃ can be understood even by those who do not know Pali if we give an example. In the Dhammapada it is said: "Sataṃ hiso priyo hoti, asataṃ hoti appriyo" ("He is dear to the virtuous, and disliked by the unvirtuous"). Therefore, sataṃ refers to virtuous people, not the number one hundred. Thus, it appears that even the Commentator has left room for that incompetent exposition. Well, let us take that as an incidental matter.

But the main point is that, in explaining this, although the verse says "cattāro ca paṭipannā cattāro ca phale thitā", they have not seen—or they have not accepted—as important that there is a difference in meaning between "path" (magga) and "practice" (paṭipadā/paṭipanna). We said that the supramundane path is instantaneous. Immediate to it, the fruit is received. Yet, the Buddha uses the word paṭipanna—one who has entered the practice. So, understand the difference between the path (magga) and the practice (paṭipadā) in this way: the path may exist, but the training in accordance with the path, or the practicing of that way, is what is indicated by the word paṭipanna. If the Buddha wanted to, he could have stated this verse as: "cattāro ca maggaṭṭhā cattāro ca phale thitā", couldn't he? Think about it. He could have said maggaṭṭha and phalaṭṭha, just as the commentators say. But how was it used here? "Cattāro ca paṭipannā cattāro ca". Not only that. Now we will introduce to you the context, as we have quoted the first two verses of this discourse. Prior to these two verses, the Buddha begins that discourse in the Book of Eights of the Aṅguttara Nikāya as follows: "Aṭṭhime bhikkhave puggalā āhuṇeyyā pāhuṇeyyā dakkhiṇeyyā añjalikaraṇīyā anuttaraṃ puññakkhettaṃ lokassa." "Monks, there are these eight persons..." endowed with those virtues of being worthy of gifts, worthy of hospitality, etc. Even if I do not recite it in full, try to understand it. Next, those eight are identified in this way: the Buddha lists them as sotāpanno, sotāpattiphala-sacchikiriyāya paṭipanno; sakadāgāmī, sakadāgāmiphala-sacchikiriyāya paṭipanno; anāgāmī, anāgāmiphala-sacchikiriyāya paṭipanno; arahā, arahattāya paṭipanno (one who is practicing for the realization of Arahantship). Why did the Buddha use this long phrase? For ease, he could have just said maggaṭṭha, couldn't he? See indeed, the word magga is not even used there! Instead, remember that in supaṭipanno, ujupaṭipanno, and in every other place in the passage on the Saṅgha's virtues, it does not speak of magga (path); it speaks of paṭipanna (practice). This is an extremely important point. For all this time, people have not paid attention to this. Supaṭipanno, ujupaṭipanno—the practice is something that goes on over a certain duration of time. However, with the supramundane path, one immediately falls into the fruit. Therefore, you cannot divide them and give alms separately to eight distinct individuals.

Yet, the commentators present another almost humorous reason for this. Our Ven. Buddhaghosa himself raises the question: "How can we not give to these eight?" and presents this as an illustration: Supposedly, a monk who has begun insight meditation—an āraddha-vipassaka monk—goes near a house, stands in front of it (while still meditating), and hands his bowl to the household. While they are offering alms into the bowl, this monk enters the path. This is how they explain it! That is a highly unnatural explanation. There is no such trouble once we bring the word paṭipadā (practice) forward. That is what is in the word of the Buddha. Why was it stated in this long form: "practicing for the realization of the fruit of Stream-entry"? There is no mention of "path" (magga) at all. "Practicing for the realization of the fruit of Once-returning..." Therein lies a deep matter. Keep in mind that this is the Buddha's own word. We give priority to the word of the Buddha over the commentators, and over the words of Buddhaghosa. That is why I say this. I am reminding you of this because for a long time, a wrong idea and to some extent a distortion of this Dhamma has existed. Because of that, a problem has arisen. But if we take the word paṭipadā, there is no problem; we can perfectly give alms to eight distinct individuals.

Next, one may ask: "Who are those included in this category of 'practicing for the realization of the fruit of Stream-entry' (sotāpattiphala-sacchikiriyāya paṭipanno)? Who are the ones practicing for the realization of the fruit of Stream-entry?" It is there that we must bring to light several discourses on this matter. In relation to this point, we have previously delivered a sermon based on the Cūḷagopālaka Sutta. But to put it briefly here, there are two types of special individuals who belong to this category: the "Dhamma-follower" (dhammānusārī) and the "Faith-follower" (saddhānusārī). They have not yet become stream-enterers, but they are two highly special individuals. Why? As we go further into the sutta, you will see. So much so that it is said in the Buddha's own words that those individuals belonging to the category of Faith-follower and Dhamma-follower will not pass away without realizing Stream-entry. Therefore, those two are certainly training in the path of Stream-entry—they are training in that practice.

Indeed, let us quote from those discourses themselves. The Alagaddūpama Sutta of the Majjhima Nikāya is a discourse that wonderfully emphasizes the well-expounded (svākkhāta) nature of the Buddha's teaching. That discourse concludes as follows: "In this well-expounded Dhamma, whoever is a Dhamma-follower or a Faith-follower is bound for enlightenment (sambodhiparāyaṇā)." Generally, the term "bound for enlightenment" (sambodhiparāyaṇā) is used for those established in Stream-entry. Yet, the Buddha uses the term "bound for enlightenment" even for these two who are on this side of Stream-entry. See, that is how it was said there.

Let us go further. Next, there is a better explanation in the Cūḷagopālaka Sutta, along with a very beautiful simile. The Buddha preached the Gopālaka Sutta in the city of Ukkācelā on the banks of the Ganges in the Vajjian country, addressing the monks with a profound simile. "Monks, in the last month of the rainy season, a foolish herdsman of Magadha, of very little wisdom, tried to cross his herd of cattle in this way: Without properly examining this shore, and without properly examining the opposite shore, he tried to cross his cattle at a non-crossing place (not the correct ford), and the herd was swept away by the current and met with destruction. But a certain wise herdsman of Magadha, having well examined this shore and well examined the opposite shore, crossed his herd of cattle at the correct ford." The Buddha beautifully presents the manner of crossing: "First, the bull-leaders and the guides of the herd crossed over first. Next, behind them, went the strong bulls and the steer to be tamed (balavagāvo dammagāvo). Then, behind them, went the heifers and the young bulls. After them, went the weak calves." And then, a wonderful thing is said: so great was the skill of this herdsman that finally, even the calf born that very day crossed over, drawn by the lowing of its mother (mātugāviyā rāvena—the mother cow lowing to urge the calf). Encouraged by the sound of its mother, even the newborn calf crossed over. This is not just an ordinary simile. To put it briefly, that unskilled herdsman represents the ascetics and brahmins of other sects. That herdsman knows neither this shore nor the other shore. Trying to cross at the wrong ford, they lead to destruction. But the Tathāgata, the Fully Enlightened One, (referring to himself), like the wise herdsman, crosses them over at the correct ford, systematically and after careful examination. It is this last category that should receive our attention. Who is this calf born that very day? In that context, the Buddha identifies them as the "Dhamma-follower" (dhammānusārī) and the "Faith-follower" (saddhānusārī). Thus, the Dhamma-follower and Faith-follower represent the entry-level or minimum stage. Yet, even those two ultimately cross over. That is why they are called "bound for enlightenment." That is the Cūḷagopālaka Sutta. There is much to say, but that is why I am explaining it briefly.

Next, there is another discourse where we find more details about these two, in the Okkantika Saṃyutta of the Saṃyutta Nikāya. More details are mentioned there. There, addressing the monks, the Buddha says: "Monks, the eye is impermanent (anicca), subject to change, subject to becoming otherwise." In the same way, he speaks of the six senses: ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind. "If anyone accepts this fact with faith and applies themselves to the practice, that person is a Faith-follower (saddhānusārī)." "Next, if anyone accepts this fact to a certain extent with wisdom and trains accordingly, that person is a Dhamma-follower (dhammānusārī)." This means that among our faculties (indriya), the person in whom the faith-faculty (saddhindriya) is dominant goes toward the side of the Faith-follower, while the person in whom the wisdom-faculty (paññindriya) is dominant becomes a Dhamma-follower. These two are indeed special individuals. Next, the Buddha says something very unusual about them here, showing that they are not ordinary or insignificant persons.

In the Okkantika Saṃyutta, the Buddha declares concerning those two that they have "entered the path of rightness" (sammatta-niyāmaṃ okkanto)—there is an unusual term there. Meritorious friends, we can describe sammatta-niyāma as: both of them have fallen into the natural law of correctness. To put it even more clearly, they have entered the plane of the virtuous (sappurisa-bhūmi). The word sappurisa is often applied to the Nobles (Ariya). Next, it is said that those two have entered the plane of the virtuous, having transcended the state of a worldling (puthujjana). Then a special thing is said: these two individuals, the Faith-follower and the Dhamma-follower, do not commit any evil deed that would lead them to hell, the animal realm, or the ghost realm. Next, it is said that these two will not pass away without realizing Stream-entry. The word abhavya (incapable / impossible) is used there. "Abhabbo"—there is the Buddha's word that they are incapable of passing away without realizing Stream-entry. Now, we get further details about these two who possess such distinguished qualities from the Kīṭāgiri Sutta. In the Kīṭāgiri Sutta, the Buddha states that both of them possess the five spiritual faculties—faith (saddhā), energy (viriya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā)—which are unique to the Nobles and not possessed by ordinary worldlings. Anyone might say, "We have them too." But the faculties are not established in them. Yet, in these two, they are indeed established. So, there is some deficiency, and it is that deficiency which must be filled. But we have to understand that this deficiency will somehow be filled within this very life.

However, unfortunately—though we should perhaps not say this, and some might criticize us—yet, in the Puggalapaññatti treatise, when attempting to explain the "incapability" (abhavyatā) declared by the Buddha regarding these two, the Faith-follower and the Dhamma-follower, they provide a somewhat unfitting explanation. There, these two are referred to as ṭhitakappī. Ṭhitakappī supposedly means that these two can arrest or halt the eon (kappa). They say that these two can stop the running and destroying of the eon. How do they stop it? In this manner: Now, imagine for a moment that the eon has life. Now is the time the eon is running/ending. While running, the eon looks around and sees that there are a Faith-follower and a Dhamma-follower who have not yet attained Stream-entry. So, the eon supposedly stops—without running further—until those two attain Stream-entry! To us, this seems like putting the cart before the horse. If we reflect deeply on the Buddha's word, we must understand that a person's most precious moment is the moment of death. We have heard that some have attained Arahantship at the moment of death. Although it is a disputed story, we have told you about three monks who attained Arahantship even as their throats were being cut. That is to say, the moment of death is the occasion to decide between death and deathlessness. If there was a slight deficiency in this life, there is no need for any external talk about the eon. In that very context, the Buddha's word "incapable" (abhabba) meant that if the Faith-follower and the Dhamma-follower do not realize the fruit of that path during this lifetime, they will realize it at least at the moment of death. It is enough to state just that. But preachers still use that kind of story and the term ṭhitakappī today. They say ṭhitakappī means these two can stop the running of the eon. We have to say that this is somewhat unfitting.

Well, that is the story of the eight persons; keep it in mind. The Buddha does not just say maggaṭṭha and phalaṭṭha. He uses a long phrase: "practicing for the realization of the fruit of Stream-entry," and so on. He had to speak in that way because of that reason: the supramundane path is instantaneous. It is instantaneous. You cannot isolate it to give alms to it. But you can do so for someone training in the practice. See in our recitation of the Saṅgha's virtues: supaṭipanno, ujupaṭipanno—it is the word paṭipanna. There is no talk of magga (path) in it. It is paṭipanna, paṭipanna. Merely by training in the practice, they are worthy of receiving alms and offerings. I mentioned this specifically because someone might ask about the path and fruit of Stream-entry. You can infer the rest, meritorious friends. Let us assume someone has become a Once-returner. They do not just remain inactive from that point. There, the word sekha (learner/trainee) is used. Sekha means a training person. They train all the way up to Arahantship. Their work is not yet finished. Some, due to various reasons, fall into negligence. They are called pamāda-sekha (negligent trainees). Visākhā, Anāthapiṇḍika, and others could not go beyond that level due to various worldly reasons. That is a different matter. But the general rule is that after becoming a Stream-enterer, one enters the next path of insight (vipassanā-vīthi).

Now we have finished talking about the eight persons. Next, we bring forward the story of nine persons. What is that? In the Book of Nines (Navaka Nipāta) of the Aṅguttara Nikāya, there is a discourse like this: "Nava ime bhikkhave puggalā āhuṇeyyā pāhuṇeyyā... añjalikaraṇīyā anuttaraṃ puññakkhettaṃ lokassa." "Monks, there are these nine persons in the world who are worthy of gifts, worthy of hospitality... an incomparable field of merit for the world." How did the "eight persons" we mentioned become "nine persons" here? I am mentioning this because it is also a disputed point. Now, everyone knows the eight persons. In addition to those eight, there is the word gotrabhū (one of the lineage / change-of-lineage). This word gotrabhū is indeed a word that is also used when describing the cognitive series of insight-knowledge (vipassanā-ñāṇa-vīthi). It is the brief, instantaneous moment that exists between being a worldling (puthujjana) and receiving the path-fruit. If I illustrate this with a simile from the Visuddhimagga, it will be easy for you, meritorious friends, to understand this. This entire activity of insight, this practice, exists by depending on some aid. What is used as an aid for insight? The investigation of Preparations (saṅkhāra-sammasana). Having investigated Preparations, at the end, one lets go of Preparations (saṅkhāra) as well. This is illustrated with a good simile, which is an acceptable simile: During the rainy season, when trying to cross a stream, if there is no bridge, what do you do? A strong man, thinking wisely, grabs a hanging creeper from a tree and swings. Having swung and swung, as soon as he gets close to the opposite bank, he lets go of the creeper. If he keeps holding on, he will swing back to this side, won't he? So, in that brief moment, he lets go of the creeper and lands on the opposite side. That momentary, suspended time of letting go of the creeper is called gotrabhū. Understand it in that way. It is an extremely subtle moment, an extremely subtle stage in the cognitive series of insight, until one falls into the fruit. So, how can one catch that moment to give alms? That is why they said that when standing in front of a house, while alms are being served into the bowl, the monk practices insight! That is the kind of artificial explanation they give. None of that is necessary. As we said, these people also explain the word solely on the basis of insight meditation. That is wrong. Why? The gotrabhū stage is already included in "practicing for the realization of the fruit of Stream-entry." Keep in mind that "persons practicing for the realization of the fruit of Stream-entry" is a broad stage. You cannot isolate gotrabhū as a separate category in that way.

Then, how do we explain this word gotrabhū? That is the question. To find the answer to this, we must go to the Dakkhiṇāvibhaṅga Sutta. The Dakkhiṇāvibhaṅga Sutta in the Majjhima Nikāya is highly popular among Dhamma preachers. You, meritorious friends, must have heard it frequently at almsgivings during the sharing of merits (bhattānumodanā). The introductory story of that discourse is extremely special when we discuss the virtues of the Saṅgha. It is shown as follows: When the Buddha was residing at the Nigrodhārāma in Kapilavatthu, the city of the Sakyans, Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī (the Buddha's foster-mother), brought a pair of new cloths she had spun and woven with her own hands, and offered them to the Buddha. "May the Blessed One, out of compassion for me, accept this." What did the Buddha say? A very surprising thing was said on that occasion: "Saṅghe, gotami, dehi; saṅghe dinne ahañceva pūjito bhavissāmi..."—"Gotamī, give it to the Saṅgha. When it is offered to the Saṅgha, I too will be honored." A second time and a third time, Pajāpatī Gotamī made her request. In addition, Ven. Ānanda joined in and said, "O Blessed One, please accept this. When the Blessed One lost his mother, it was this foster-mother who nursed him. She is the one who raised you." When that was said, the Buddha addressed Ven. Ānanda and delivered a sermon. That sermon presents a wonderful analysis regarding almsgiving. To put it briefly, it begins like this: "individual offerings" (pāṭipuggalikā dakkhiṇā). Fourteen such individual offerings are shown. Let us consider them briefly. First is an offering given to the Tathāgata, the Samma Sambuddha, personally. This is the kind of offering Pajāpatī's was, because it was a personal thing. It was his foster-mother, offering it to her child; a personal gift. See, what a wonderful quality of the Buddha: he redirected even a personally offered gift to the Saṅgha. Right there, the world has a great lesson to learn. He offered it to the Saṅgha because he himself is included in the Saṅgha. Next, he mentions a personal offering given to a Paccekabuddha. Next are the eight persons mentioned earlier: to an Arahant, then to one practicing for the realization of Arahantship, then to a Non-returner (Anāgāmī), to one practicing for the realization of the fruit of Non-returning, and so on—the eight persons mentioned. Thus, if we take those eight and the first two, understand them as ten. Now, about the eleventh: the eleventh is "one who is free from lust regarding sensual pleasures among outsiders" (bāhiresu kāmesu vītarāgo)—there could be outside ascetics or rishis. They come at the next level, the eleventh. This is in terms of the order of respect. Next is shown the virtuous worldling (sīlavanto puthujjano). As the thirteenth, the unvirtuous worldling (dussīlo puthujjano). As the fourteenth, an animal. In that instance, the Buddha described these fourteen in descending order.

But when explaining the benefits of giving (dānāniśaṃsa), the Buddha explains it in ascending order. In these times, someone might call it exaggeration, or say these were added later. However, this is how the Buddha explains it: Giving an offering to an animal—one can expect a hundredfold benefit. Giving to an unvirtuous worldling, a thousandfold. Giving to a virtuous worldling, a hundred thousandfold. Giving to an outsider ascetic free from sensual lust, a hundred thousand times ten million fold. Next, giving to one practicing for the realization of the fruit of Stream-entry—such as the Faith-follower or Dhamma-follower—the Buddha says it is incalculable (asaṅkheyyaṃ), immeasurable (appameyyaṃ); it cannot be counted, it cannot be measured. From that point upward, he says something wonderful. If it is already incalculable and immeasurable, you cannot increase it further, can you? Therefore, from that point upward, the Buddha uses the exact same phrase. "Ko pana vādo"—which means, meritorious friends, "What then to speak of...?" In old books, they translate this as "what need is there to speak of...?" Thus, by offering alms to that person practicing for the realization of the fruit of Stream-entry, the benefit is incalculable and immeasurable; and for those higher than that, he continues to say: "ko pana vādo"—what need to speak of it? What need to speak of it? This demonstrates the power of the benefit. You can understand this, meritorious friends. It is shown in ascending order, starting from the animal and going upward. Next, he says that these are the individual offerings (pāṭipuggalikā dakkhiṇā).

Next, the Buddha shows seven kinds of offerings made to the Saṅgha (saṅghagatā dakkhiṇā). He shows them as follows: In the terms we use today: an offering to the dual Saṅgha (both communities) headed by the Buddha. During the Buddha's lifetime, lay disciples like Anāthapiṇḍika offered such alms to both the bhikkhu and bhikkhunī communities with the Buddha at the head. This is of the greatest fruit and benefit. After the dual Saṅgha headed by the Buddha, next is an offering to the dual Saṅgha of bhikkhus and bhikkhunīs after the parinibbāna of the Tathāgata. That is the second. The third is an offering to the bhikkhu Saṅgha after the parinibbāna of the Tathāgata. The fourth is an offering to the bhikkhunī Saṅgha. The fifth is shown in a different way: A donor requests from the Saṅgha: "Please give us a certain number of bhikkhus and bhikkhunīs on behalf of the Saṅgha." That is the fifth offering. The sixth is shown as requesting only bhikkhus: "Please give us only bhikkhus." The seventh is requesting only bhikkhunīs and giving to them. Those are the seven offerings to the Saṅgha.

After that, the Buddha mentions an unusual thing. "Monks, in the future there will be unvirtuous, evil-natured monks, with yellow robes around their necks, who are regarded as gotrabhū." Those unvirtuous, evil-natured ones who wear the robe hanging around their neck are called gotrabhū. The word gotrabhū in this context should be understood not in the sense of insight (vipassanā). According to the donor's understanding and the person's appearance, this individual represents the Saṅgha—by the mere fragment of the robe hanging around their neck. That is to say, it is merely an indication of the Noble lineage (ariya-gotra). It is in that sense that we explain this word. Next, the Buddha says that even if one makes an offering to such individuals on behalf of the Saṅgha, that offering too is incalculable and immeasurable. This has been a subject of controversy. Western critics, in particular, reject this discourse because of this. Those people say that this is a discourse fabricated by monks during the decline of the dispensation in order to secure alms. This is a very profound discourse. Not a single word can be removed. But the way it is understood is wrong. So, this point is indeed highly controversial—this matter of unvirtuous monks with robes around their necks. Yet, the donor offers alms to them by keeping in mind the Saṅgha.

To beautifully answer any question that might arise regarding this, the Buddha states a certain point. He shows four kinds of purification of an offering (dakkhiṇā-visuddhi). Meritorious friends, "purification of an offering" refers to the ways in which an offering made to the Saṅgha is purified. The first purification is shown as: dāyakato visujjhati no paṭiggāhakato—purified on the part of the giver, but not on the part of the recipient. The next one is purified on the part of the recipient, but not on the part of the giver. Then, purified neither on the part of the giver nor on the part of the recipient. The last one is purified both on the part of the giver and on the part of the recipient. Consider this division of pure and impure briefly: The giver being pure means they are virtuous and of good character (sīlavā kalyāṇadhammo). The recipients being impure means they are unvirtuous and of evil character (dussīla pāpadhamma). So, here too, the Buddha has shown a certain hint. This kāsāvakaṇṭha gotrabhū individual reminds that faithful giver of the Noble Saṅgha-treasure (Ariya Saṅgha-ratana). This is something you know very well: one can go to a heavenly world by giving alms. But think about it, can one go to a heavenly world merely by consuming alms? So, what happens is that the giver, seeing the robe hanging from the neck of the unvirtuous one, arouses faith through that, offers the alms, and goes to heaven. While that evil monk, by consuming those alms, goes to hell. There is no contradiction in the Buddha's word, is there? Why do we say this? Because this discourse is indeed magnificent. Yet, for some reason, some people use this discourse as a way to beckon the decline of the dispensation. You know this, meritorious friends. They say: "This is not a time when Noble Ones and Arahants exist. Now, what lies ahead is the era of the robe-wearers-in-name-only. There is nothing wrong with giving to them." The fact may be true, but that is the secret. The meritorious person who gives the alms goes to heaven; the monk who consumes the alms goes to hell. Thus, there is no contradiction in the Buddha's word. It is like a double-edged weapon.

Let me give a small simile for this. My similes are rustic ones, of course. Suppose you bring a sack of paddy to your house—a sack of seed paddy. Having emptied the sack of paddy and transferred it into some box, you take the empty sack to the backyard of the house and shake it. A single grain of paddy that was stuck to the sack falls onto a heap of mud. Without you even knowing, a fine cluster of paddy grows behind the house because the ground is fertile. In the same way, this Noble Saṅgha is called a field of merit. It is not just anything; it is a fertile field of merit. In this field of merit, even a grain of paddy that falls stray sprouts. Think of it in that way. So, that gotrabhū kāsāvakaṇṭha monk gives that perception (saññā) to the world. He symbolizes it. He indeed helps the giver to remember. But that alone is not enough for him to escape hell. Let us think about it. The world exists within perception (saññā). Even if I mention this as a small illustration, meritorious friends, do not take it too seriously. Think for a moment: if King Duṭugämuṇu had placed those relics in a small casket at the site of the Ruwanweliseya, would the hearts of humans have been inspired in this way for centuries? That is the "perception of a stupa" (cetiya-saññā). Within the perception of a stupa, the world is drawn. That robe—it is not only today; it is found even in the Jātaka stories. You must have heard Jātaka stories showing the wonderful power of the robe even during times when no Buddha had appeared. According to that Jātaka story, the Bodhisatta was an elephant king. He had a large herd of elephants. Devadatta was an elephant hunter. What does he do? He wraps himself in the robe of a Paccekabuddha and sits down. While he sits there, all the elephants salute him as they pass. He must have had some weapon hidden—perhaps a boomerang, we do not know. He throws it, and throws it to kill the elephant that goes last. Killing elephants in this way to take their tusks, eventually the Bodhisatta thought, "Why is our herd diminishing?" Thinking thus, the Bodhisatta elephant walked at the very rear. When the elephant hunter threw his weapon, the elephant turned around, blocked it, and spared the man's life without killing him—all because of that robe! Because of the robe! Therefore, we must reflect on this. Indeed, although the Buddha used this story of gotrabhū to illustrate the supremacy of the offering and the value of this field of merit, we must not start interpreting it from the wrong end. If we start from the other end, it is an invitation to the decline of the dispensation.

We must think of the reality. Why? Because you apply the perception of "treasure" (ratana) to all three: the Buddha-treasure, the Dhamma-treasure, and the Saṅgha-treasure. On the Vesak full-moon poya day, the Buddha-treasure appeared in the world. On the Esala full-moon poya day, both the Dhamma-treasure and the Saṅgha-treasure appeared in the world. Because, with the teaching of the Four Noble Truths and the Noble Eightfold Path, at the conclusion of that sermon, the Saṅgha-treasure appeared through Ven. Koṇḍañña who realized it. That is the Triple Gem. During the times of Paccekabuddhas, there is no such thing; there is no Saṅgha-treasure either. That is precisely why, in the Aggappasāda Sutta which you have heard, the Buddha states:

"Yāvatā bhikkhave gaṇā vā saṅghā vā, tathāgatasāvakasaṅgho tesaṃ aggamakkhāyati, yadidaṃ cattāri purisayugāni aṭṭha purisapuggalā, esa bhagavato sāvaka-saṅgho... anuttaraṃ puññakkhettaṃ lokassa."

Having said so, he continues: "Ye saṅghe prasannā agge te prasannā, agge kho pana prasannānaṃ aggo vipāko hoti."

In that Aggappasāda Sutta, after speaking of the Buddha-treasure and the Dhamma-treasure, when finally speaking of the Saṅgha-treasure, he shows it in this manner. Everyone knows the explanation mentioned at the beginning. There is no need to repeat it. As far as there are groups or assemblies in the world, the disciple-community of the Tathāgata is supreme among them, according to the details mentioned. Next, he says that whoever has confidence in the Saṅgha has confidence in the supreme; and for those who have confidence in the supreme, the result is supreme.

Thus, one must understand that here, the Buddha demonstrates the supremacy of the Saṅgha-treasure by redirecting that personal offering. How hard that Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī, that nun, must have labored to weave that robe! She did so with the same thoughts as when she nursed him as a small child. Having woven that cloth with her own hands with great effort, she was impatient until she could offer it. See what the Buddha said when she finally offered it! It was not out of unkindness. At the same time, when Ven. Ānanda spoke, the Buddha acknowledged that Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī had been of great help to him, and also stated that he too had been of help to Mahāpajāpatī Gotamī. What did the Buddha do? By redirecting this, to use a modern expression, he "paid the milk bill." He paid the milk bill at the highest level. He could have accepted it himself. But in order to make it of greater fruit and benefit, and at the same time to introduce the value of the Saṅgha-treasure to the world, he redirected it and said: "If you give, give to the Saṅgha. Then I too will be offered to." See, what a valuable example! He turned that personally intended offering into a communal offering. Therefore, one must reflect on the value of the Saṅgha. Many know that in the disciplinary acts of the monks, the word Saṅgha is an extremely powerful word. Saṅgha—when that word is used, there is a great power within it. A group of more than four is known as the Saṅgha. A smaller group is known as a chapter (gaṇa). This is a dispensation usage. Saṅghaṃ uddissa—"on behalf of the Saṅgha"—there is a deep meaning in this phrase.

Not only that. Unfortunately, there are shortcomings in certain places in the commentaries. We have pointed them out. Ven. Buddhaghosa, in trying to explain the word supaṭipanno, explains it like this: atītaṃ paṭipadaṃ nissāya supaṭipanno—he is "of good practice" by depending on his past practice. That is to say, the terms supaṭipanno, ujupaṭipanno, etc., are applied because of their past practice, to show that they arrived through that practice. It is not so, meritorious friends! It is because they are training in the present. It is not past practice, but present practice. See, in that very Ratana Sutta it is said:

"Those who, with a firm mind, well-applied, are free from desire in Gotama's dispensation..."—if anyone trains regardless of body and life, that quality is what was taken for the act of truth there, and not that story of path and fruit. But because this has come down for a long time, for convenience, when asked "who are the eight persons?", we say "the four paths and four fruits, the four paths and four fruits." This is a usage that arose during the Commentarial period. Yet, the Buddha used the word paṭipanna. He gave prominence to the practice, in that supaṭipanno verse. In this story of nine persons, starting with "practicing for the realization of...", this can indeed become a subject of controversy. I know that Westerners sometimes ridicule this: "How can one receive benefits by giving alms to those who just have a robe hanging around their neck?" That is why we said it is like a double-edged weapon. But the truth is this: by that alone, they benefit the giver. Dāyakato visujjhati no paṭiggāhakato—it was with a certain reason that the Buddha, after mentioning that kāsāvakaṇṭha story, spoke of the purification of the offering. This seems to be a good explanation. So, among those four ways, what is the first way? The offering is purified from the side of the giver, but impure from the side of the recipient. Yet, it is endowed with great benefit. It is incalculable, immeasurable, and cannot be counted. Saying "ko pana vādo" shows that this is no small matter.

Meritorious friends, we do not declare these things as a "pulling hook"—not to tell you to give more. We express this on a day like today in order to bring the Buddha's word to light. It is not like what some say: "Now, the time of Arahants and Noble individuals is over. Now we are looking at that kāsāvakaṇṭha era, so give without fear." That is not what is here. Remember the simile of the sack of paddy. So supreme are the virtues of the Saṅgha—"an incomparable field of merit for the world"—and so great is the power of this supreme field of merit, that the robe which reminds one of that Saṅgha is used to assist in this. That is why we have the eight requisites (aṭṭha-parikkhāra). If we believe those stories, they say that Ghatīkāra the Brahma king brought and offered them to the Buddha. In fact, during times when no Buddha has arisen, there are only the requisites of ascetics, like water-pitchers. It was only the Buddha who prescribed the eight requisites as the minimum requisites for the monks. Therein lies that value. In later times—one should perhaps not say this—they began to describe the various benefits of offering the eight requisites with great exaggeration. But the real reason is that these eight requisites are the basic support for ordination (pabbajjā). That is why when someone comes and asks for ordination, they are asked: "Are your bowl and robes complete?" So, they have to find those items somehow. This demonstrates the value of the eight requisites. When you, meritorious friends, offer the eight requisites, you should think: "I am offering these eight requisites as an aid for someone to enter ordination, to join this dispensation, and to join this community of monks." Even if we do not describe its benefits separately, you should understand it in that way.

Thus, it is during the era of a Buddha's appearance that the Saṅgha-treasure arises. What sustains the minimum existence of the Saṅgha-treasure is called the eight requisites. The great Arahants of the past, especially the Arahants who observed the dhutanga (ascetic) practices, were content with just those eight requisites. Within them, all needs are met if one travels the true path of Dhamma. As additional worldly things increased, the eight requisites have become not "eight" but "sixty" requisites today! You know better than we do what those young novice monks ask for. When we look at it, the "eight requisites" (aṭa-pirikara) have become "sixty requisites" (häṭa-pirikara). Things have increased to that extent. But we should at least maintain the concept. We must offer the eight requisites properly. If we do do it carelessly, saying "it is the decline of the dispensation anyway," then that is a failure on the part of the giver. We say this because today, these things are done based on various indirect or worldly motives. In doing so, that symbol, the symbol of the robe, might gradually disappear; and if one day, by some means, a lay dress is offered as the "eight requisites," you can consider the dispensation finished on that day. If we can at least see that symbol, and if that symbol is presented correctly, then within it, the Noble Saṅgha-treasure is remembered. That symbolic power—see, even during times when no Buddha had appeared, that elephant king could have killed that man, but did not kill him because his head was covered with the robe.

In this day and age, we do not need to speak of such things. It has fallen to the lowest state of decline. But we must not use that as an excuse. We must not generate unwholesome states (akusala) because of it. Instead, what the wise, meritorious person does upon seeing the robe is that they do not go investigating it. In a Dhamma sermon we delivered earlier, we mentioned one of the outstanding qualities of the lay disciple Ugga Gahapati of Hatthigāma (do not use this in a bad way, as mentioned before), but in that previous sermon, we spoke of that great quality. Ugga Gahapati was a Non-returner (Anāgāmī), a highly capable lay disciple. The night before the almsgivings, deities would come and tell him: "Among the monks you intend to invite, such-and-such a monk is an Arahant, such-and-such is a Non-returner," and going down the list, they would even say, "such-and-such a monk is unvirtuous." But as a distinguished quality, that lay disciple says: "Even though I heard that, when I served the alms, I made no distinction. I made no distinction when serving the alms." He does not think about those things. On the part of the giver, that is how it is. If you go investigating these things, there is no end to it. How can you know about the monks? It is up to the Saṅgha to protect the purity of the Saṅgha. But for the lay devotee, the Buddha has taught that way; if we try to dissect it, we will end up going to extremes. Therefore, dāyakato visujjhati—the giver offers the alms with a pure mind, recollecting the Noble Saṅgha-treasure. That is why we said this cuts both ways. The giver, having given alms, goes to a happy destination; while the unvirtuous gotrabhū kāsāvakaṇṭha monk, having consumed the alms, goes to hell. There, the Buddha's word is correct on both sides. Nowhere is there any contradiction. What was declared there is the reality. Therefore, you must reflect on this, meritorious friends.

So, we say these things on a day like today because everyone is talking about the decline of the dispensation. They say it cannot be restored now, even by a team of elephants. But we know that when we fall ill, even if doctors say we cannot be kept alive for long, what an effort we make! What energy we exert! We take the patient to the doctor, and if that fails, to traditional physicians. We do various things. Why? Just to keep this body alive for one more day. For what? To enjoy the five cords of sensual pleasure, nothing else. We spend hundreds of thousands on bypass operations and such to join pieces back together, just to preserve this body and life. Then, if such an effort is made to preserve life, why don't we think in the same way about the dispensation? Do we just abandon it, saying "it is impermanent (anicca)"? Meritorious friends, that is the point you must understand. We must not use impermanence (aniccatā) as an excuse. Even if it is impermanent, if we just allow it to go... Instead, what we must do is, to the best of our ability, the lay givers from their side, and the monks from their side, must bring out those virtues of the Saṅgha shown by the Buddha—supaṭipanno, ujupaṭipanno, etc.—along with their qualities of being worthy of gifts, worthy of hospitality, etc. Even if one is not "established on the path" (maggaṭṭha), merely training in the practice (paṭipadā) is enough. It is quite enough. If one trains properly in the practice, realizing the fruit within it is an absolute certainty.

On a day like today, you, meritorious friends, must reflect on the value of the passage on the Saṅgha's virtues. The Triple Gem—the Buddha-treasure, the Dhamma-treasure, and the Saṅgha-treasure—cannot be separated from one another. We have stated on certain occasions that the eight Noble individuals of the Saṅgha-treasure can be compared to eight lamp-posts on a street. Imagine the Noble Eightfold Path as a street. The question arises: "How do we travel on this?" When the Dhamma is preached, the question of how to realize the fruit comes to everyone. That is when—these Arahants and Non-returners of the past, especially during the Buddha's time—served as lamp-posts for traveling on that path. That is why we said so. That is precisely why the Buddha has declared that even a Paccekabuddha cannot preach the Dhamma that helps one escape from Saṃsāra. It is such a profound Dhamma, as we have shown in our sermons on Dependent Arising (paṭiccasamuppāda). It is not because of any selfishness on their part. A Paccekabuddha cannot point out this path to the Mind Stilled (Nibbāna in a way that the world can understand. It is such a wonderfully profound Dhamma. But the Tathāgata, the Fully Enlightened Samma Sambuddha, through his wonderfully great power of wisdom, preached the Dhamma to the world. And the proof that this Dhamma was practiced is the Saṅgha. That is what is called the Saṅgha-treasure.

Those three treasures are interconnected. Because of the Buddha-treasure, the Dhamma-treasure appeared; because of the Dhamma-treasure, the Saṅgha-treasure appeared. It is the practical aspect that is demonstrated by the Saṅgha-treasure. That is the Triple Gem. You, meritorious friends, often declare the great, powerful nature of the Ratana Sutta. We hear everywhere that even by mere chanting, some power and some benefit can be obtained, capable of doing powerful things—even by the very words used in them. That is why we spoke even of the misuse of words—not that we are merely finding fault with the commentators. See that verse; in the word of the Buddha, it is: ye puggalā aṭṭha sataṃ pasatthā. But those who do not know the language turn it into: ye puggalā aṭṭhasataṃ. If the commentators validate this, it is a great mistake, isn't it? That is what we are saying. This rich meaning is "with meaning and with phrasing" (sātthaṃ sabyañjanaṃ). This Dhamma must be understood both in terms of meaning (attha) and phrasing (byañjana). If we recite these verses with such understanding, what powerful benefits we can obtain! But now, as we said, it is only for the sound. Paritta recitations, even suttas like the Ratana Sutta, become like music, because there is no understanding of the meaning of those words; they are just recited anyway. Even so, there may be some power in that sound. But if recited with right understanding—with understanding of the virtues of the Buddha-treasure and the Saṅgha-treasure—then we too have to say that it is incalculable and immeasurable; there are limitless benefits. That is why it was said: agge kho pana prasannānaṃ aggo vipāko hoti.

On a valuable day like today, we mentioned these facts to you because everyone asks us about them, and we must give an answer. Even though we point out the shortcomings of the commentators in our writings and sermons, we accept that they were extremely great individuals. If those reciting monks (bhāṇaka) had not preserved these, we would have no power to say even this much. But for some reason, because of traditionalism (ācariyakappa), because past teachers said so, some people accept these without questioning, showing a tendency to accept even highly weak points. When the monks say something, the laity accept it too. That is natural. It is to correct those points that we mentioned these various things—not in a critical spirit to disparage them. While accepting their greatness, certain shortcomings must be pointed out.

Today, as usual, you, meritorious friends, must have observed your respective precepts and engaged in Dhamma discussions and meditation. If there is anything to be taken from this sermon for your future progress, for training in the practice, and for realizing the fruit, take those things and do so as quickly as possible—as we always say, "before the lamp of the dispensation is extinguished." We have to say this because it appears to us that it is moving in that direction. Therefore, we speak these words for the sake of diligence (appamāda). It is not with the wish that it should be extinguished, but because we actually see those signs. Therefore, it is up to you, meritorious friends, to make use of it. Wishing that this sermon may be a source of strength and power for you to reach those noble goals you hope for as quickly as possible; and wishing that whatever living beings from Avīci to Akaniṭṭha wish to rejoice in the merits of this preaching and hearing of the Dhamma, may they by doing so find peace in the supreme, deathless Extinction (Nibbāna through a Bodhi of their aspiration—please recite these verses:

Anāthapiṇḍikovāda Sutta, Majjhima Nikāya

Dear Listeners,

Among the circle of lay disciples of the Buddha, the householder Anāthapiṇḍika is a noble person who attained the foremost (etadagga) position. He is a person so worthy as to be like the letter "A" in the list of lay disciples during the time of the Buddha. The verses we have chosen today as our theme are those uttered by this householder Anāthapiṇḍika, who, after passing away and being reborn in the Tusita heaven, returned at midnight to Jetavana monastery to see the Blessed One.

These verses are found in the Anāthapiṇḍikovāda Sutta of the Majjhima Nikāya. That sutta describes the last moments of the householder Anāthapiṇḍika. The sermon he heard in his final moments is his near-death sermon, his final sermon. This event is shown in this manner. In that sutta, while the Blessed One was residing at Jetavana monastery, the householder Anāthapiṇḍika became gravely ill and diseased. He told his servant to go and pay homage to the Blessed One: "Go and bow down at the feet of the Blessed One on my behalf, saying that the householder Anāthapiṇḍika is gravely ill." Next, he asked him to go to Venerable Sāriputta as well, pay homage in his name, and say, "Out of compassion, please come to the home of the householder Anāthapiṇḍika."

When that man went and delivered the message to Venerable Sāriputta, Venerable Sāriputta took Venerable Ānanda as his attendant monk and came to the mansion of the householder Anāthapiṇḍika. Having arrived, in accordance with the usual manner of inquiring after one's health, as is frequently seen in the sutta discourses, Venerable Sāriputta asked the householder Anāthapiṇḍika: "Householder, are your painful sensations (vedanā) abating? Are you in a tolerable condition? Can you get by?" and so on.

The householder Anāthapiṇḍika described the severity of his illness: "Venerable Sāriputta, my painful sensations (vedanā) are not abating, they are increasing. They are getting worse and worse. My condition is not tolerable, nor can I get by. There is a state of severe pain," thus expressing the painful (dukkha) nature of his sensations (vedanā). "Just as if a strong man were splitting my head with a sharp sword, such is the extreme pain in my head. Just as if a strong man were binding my head with a leather strap, such are the painful wind-sensations in my head. Next, just as a skilled butcher would slash my belly with a sharp carving knife, such is the painful sensation (vedanā) I feel. Then, just as if two strong men were to grab a weak man by his two arms and roast him over a pit of hot coals, such is the burning sensation (vedanā) in my body," he expressed in this manner.

To this, Venerable Sāriputta did not administer a physical medicine, but a medicine of the Dhamma. "In that case, householder, you should train yourself in this way," and Venerable Sāriputta presented the Dhamma-medicine in this manner: "In that case, householder, you should apply your mind to the Dhamma in this way: 'I will not grasp (upādāna) the eye.' To say 'I will not grasp (upādāna)' means 'I will not tightly hold onto the eye with craving (taṇhā).' 'My consciousness (viññāṇa) will not be dependent on the eye.' That training means one does not hold onto the eye through grasping (upādāna), and my consciousness (viññāṇa)—my mind—will not hold onto and be dependent on the eye. One should train oneself in that way."

Next, as you all know, regarding these six internal sense-spheres—eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind—Venerable Sāriputta spoke about each of them one by one: "Householder, do not seize the ear through grasping (upādāna). Train yourself thus: 'I will not have a consciousness (viññāṇa) dependent on the ear.' Moving on in this way, he also spoke about the mind: 'I will not hold onto the mind through grasping (upādāna). I will not have a consciousness (viññāṇa) dependent on the mind.' Having spoken in this manner about the six internal sense-spheres, he spoke likewise about the objects of the external sense-spheres: 'I will not grasp (upādāna) form. My consciousness (viññāṇa) will not be dependent on form. I will not grasp (upādāna) sound. My consciousness (viññāṇa) will not be dependent on sound.' He asked him to train in this way."

Finally, he spoke of the objects that come to the mind, which in the Dhamma are shown by the name dhammā. Dhammā means things, thoughts that come to the mind. "I will not firmly grasp the objects that come to the mind. I will not have a consciousness (viññāṇa) dependent on the objects that come to the mind." Having spoken in this way about the internal and external sense-spheres, Venerable Sāriputta next showed how one should train.

"I will not grasp (upādāna) eye-consciousness (cakkhu-viññāṇa). My mind will not be dependent on eye-consciousness." In the very same way, he spoke about the six kinds of consciousness (viññāṇa)—ear-consciousness (sota-viññāṇa), nose-consciousness (ghāṇa-viññāṇa), tongue-consciousness (jivhā-viññāṇa), body-consciousness (kāya-viññāṇa), and mind-consciousness (mano-viññāṇa). Next, after speaking about consciousness (viññāṇa), comes contact (phassa). He spoke about that contact (phassa) too: "I will not firmly grasp eye-contact (cakkhu-samphassa). I will not have a consciousness (viññāṇa) dependent on eye-contact (cakkhu-samphassa). I will not grasp eye-contact. I will not have a consciousness (viññāṇa) relying on eye-contact." Just as he spoke about eye-consciousness (cakkhu-viññāṇa), next he does not hold onto eye-contact (cakkhu-samphassa). In that way, just as with contact (phassa), he speaks about the feeling (vedanā) born of that contact (phassa): "I will not seize through grasping (upādāna) the feeling (vedanā) born of eye-contact. I will not have a consciousness (viññāṇa) dependent on the feeling (vedanā) born of eye-contact."

Continuing in this manner, finally: "I will not grasp the feeling (vedanā) born of mind-contact (mano-samphassa)—the contact (phassa) that arises when thoughts strike the mind. I will not have a consciousness (viññāṇa) dependent on that feeling (vedanā)." Thus, having spoken by way of the six sense-spheres (saḷāyatana), he does not stop there. This is the medicine that Venerable Sāriputta gave to the householder Anāthapiṇḍika, who had complained of having so much painful sensation (vedanā).

Next, he declared how one should train, step by step, regarding the six elements (dhātu) mentioned in the Dhamma—perhaps some of you have not even heard of them—earth (paṭhavī), water (āpo), fire (tejo), air (vāyo), space (ākāsa), and consciousness (viññāṇa). Many have heard of four elements, but in certain places the Blessed One declares that what is called "person" or "individual" is just these six elements. Which six elements? Earth, water, fire, air, space, and consciousness (viññāṇa). It is these six elements that we designate as a person. Venerable Sāriputta spoke about those six elements in the same manner: "I will not seize the earth element through grasping (upādāna). I will not have a consciousness (viññāṇa) dependent on the earth element. I will not seize the water element through grasping (upādāna). I will not have a consciousness (viññāṇa) dependent on the water element." Having spoken in this way, he spoke about the earth, water, fire, air, and space elements: "I will not grasp (upādāna) the space element. My consciousness (viññāṇa) will not be dependent on the space element." Then, finally, which is difficult to understand: "I will not seize the consciousness element (viññāṇa-dhātu) through grasping (upādāna). I will not have a consciousness (viññāṇa) dependent on the consciousness element." This is the moment of death, and this is spoken as a way to prepare for death. The word is used there to remove grasping (upādāna) even in regard to the six elements. It has the meaning of "dependent on." The two words, grasping (upādāna) and reliance/dependence (nissaya), are two very important words in this Dhamma. We will explain them in due course.

Next, he spoke in the same way about the aggregates (khandha). "I will not grasp form. My mind, my consciousness (viññāṇa), will not be dependent on the aggregate of form subject to grasping (rūpupādānakkhandha)." Likewise, regarding the five aggregates subject to grasping (pañcupādānakkhandha)—form, feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), Preparations (saṅkhāra), and consciousness (viññāṇa)—Venerable Sāriputta taught a very deep meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna) on how to develop a state that is free from grasping (anupādāna) and free from dependence (anissita).

He did not stop there. Next, he spoke about the formless absorptions (arūpa-jhāna): "I will not hold onto the formless absorption called the sphere of infinite space (ākāsānañcāyatana) through grasping (upādāna). My mind..." and likewise, "I will not take the formless states of the sphere of nothingness (ākiñcaññāyatana) and the sphere of neither-perception-nor-non-perception (nevasaññā-nāsaññāyatana) through grasping (upādāna)." Finally, whatever there is that one can hold onto with the mind, Venerable Sāriputta brought all of it in and gave the final medicine: "I will not hold onto this world. My consciousness (viññāṇa) will not be dependent on this world. I will not hold onto the next world through grasping (upādāna). My mind will not be dependent on the next world." Therefore, there is neither this world nor the next.

Next, he declared, using the Pali words: diṭṭha, suta, muta, viññāta. These Pali words exist in the Dhamma to condense the objects perceived through the six sense-spheres (saḷāyatana) into four. Sometimes, diṭṭha means the seen, suta means the heard, muta means what is sensed by the nose, tongue, and body—taking those three as one—and viññāta means thoughts in the mind. Thus: the seen, heard, sensed, cognized (diṭṭha, suta, muta, viññāta); and not only that, "what is attained, sought after, and pondered over by the mind" (pattaṃ pariyesitaṃ anuvacaritaṃ manasā). Whatever objects can be grasped by the mind, "I will not hold onto any of them through grasping (upādāna). I will not have a consciousness (viññāṇa) that makes any of those things its object." This points directly to Nibbāna. Neither this world nor the next. The advice Venerable Sāriputta is giving here is: do not take any of those thoughts that come to the mind through grasping (upādāna) at this moment of death, and do not maintain a consciousness (viññāṇa) that relies on them. To put it briefly, this is like the potent medicine (sinduram) that some physicians give at critical moments; Venerable Sāriputta is giving the deepest Dhamma here.

When this discourse was finished, the householder Anāthapiṇḍika began to weep. He began to shed tears. Venerable Ānanda thought he was weeping out of fear of death. "Why, householder, are you sinking down?"—there is a word used there, "sinking down"—"Are you holding back at the moment of death, and is that why you are weeping?" Then, he replied: "No, no, Venerable Sir, I have associated with the Teacher and the Sangha, who help develop the mind, for so long. Yet, I have never heard a Dhamma discourse like this before." When he expressed this, Venerable Sāriputta explained the reason why such discourses are not usually taught: "Householder, such discourses are not clear to laypeople who wear white garments. That is to say, when we look at the life lived by white-clad laypeople, we do not think of delivering such discourses to them. We think of delivering this kind of discourse to the monastics, who are dedicated solely to this."

When Venerable Sāriputta said that, the householder made a special invitation. He made an invitation on behalf of laypeople, just like the Brahma's invitation (Brahmā-ārādhanā). What was that invitation? "In that case, Venerable Sāriputta, let such Dhamma discourses be made clear to laypeople as well! There may be laypeople among the devout laity who have little dust of defilements in their eyes. If they do not get to hear such Dhamma discourses, they will decline." Thus, he made an invitation. He made a final request of the householder Anāthapiṇḍika: to preach such deep discourses to laypeople from now on.

Then, Venerable Sāriputta and Venerable Ānanda departed. Not long after they left, the householder Anāthapiṇḍika passed away and was reborn in the Tusita heaven. Having been reborn, that very night, he came to see the Blessed One. Now, as you devout people have often heard in protective chanting (paritta) discourses, it is first mentioned that a deity came to Jetavana monastery, stood there, and spoke to the Blessed One in this way. Now, who is this that comes? It is the young deva Anāthapiṇḍika. Having arrived with such a radiant light and paid homage to the Buddha, he uttered those verses, which we have preached to you devout people at this time as our theme.

Now let us look at their meaning. Idaṃ hi taṃ Jetavanaṃ isisaṅghani sevitaṃ āvutthaṃ dhammarājena pītisañjananaṃ mama. This Jetavana, isisaṅghani sevitaṃ—meaning this Jetavana frequented by the community of sages—āvutthaṃ dhammarājena—inhabited by the King of Dhamma, the Blessed One—pītisañjananaṃ mama—inspires joy in me.

Having declared that, next he says: Kammaṃ vijjā ca dhammo ca sīlaṃ jīvitamuttamaṃ etena maccā sujjhanti na gottena dhanena vā. Here, "action" (kamma) is to be understood as wholesome action (kusala-kamma). Since it is expressed very briefly in this verse, various meanings can emerge. We should understand it as wholesome action (kusala-kamma). Vijjā means understanding, knowledge, which includes right view (sammā-diṭṭhi). And dhamma... knowledge and Dhamma... sīlaṃ jīvitamuttamaṃ: a life led in accordance with virtue (sīla)—these are the supreme things. Etena maccā sujjhanti: by these, mortals are purified. Na gottena dhanena vā: not by lineage, nor by wealth.

Tasmā hi paṇḍito poso sampassaṃ atthamattano: therefore, the wise man, seeing his own good, yoniso vicine dhammaṃ: investigates the Dhamma with wise attention (yoniso manasikāra). Yoniso vicine dhammaṃ relates to the investigation of states (dhamma-vicaya), meaning that he scrutinizes and investigates Dhamma with wisdom. This is precisely what Venerable Sāriputta expressed concerning the Dhamma in that final sermon. Thus, the young deva Anāthapiṇḍika says here that a person analyzes and investigates Dhamma-matters with wisdom. Evaṃ tattha visujjhati: in this way, one is purified.

Next is a praise of Venerable Sāriputta: Sāriputtova paññāya sīlena upasamena ca yo hi pāragato bhikkhu etāva paramo siyā'ti. If any monk goes to the further shore, Venerable Sāriputta is supreme in these qualities mentioned. It means one cannot go higher than that state. "Only Sāriputta, by wisdom, virtue (sīla), and peacefulness..." Venerable Sāriputta is supreme among those monks who have gone to the further shore in terms of wisdom, virtue, and peacefulness—this is what is declared by that verse. The Blessed One approved of it. Next, having uttered these verses, the young deva Anāthapiṇḍika paid homage to the Blessed One, circumambulated him, and disappeared.

The next morning, the Blessed One addressed the monks, saying, "Monks, last night a certain young deva"—he said "a certain"—"paid homage to me in this way, uttered these verses, and departed." Then Venerable Ānanda said, "Surely, that must have been the young deva Anāthapiṇḍika. Because the householder Anāthapiṇḍika had a very special devotion toward Venerable Sāriputta." The Blessed One confirmed that it was so. With that, the sutta discourse ends.

Now, when you devout people hear of the householder Anāthapiṇḍika, stories of giving (dāna) immediately come to mind. But now you can understand what kind of a person he was. The householder Anāthapiṇḍika was a great, noble person. Indeed, the concept among laypeople in this era, especially those living a lay life, is that they sometimes neglect insight (vipassanā) sermons and meditation. However, it is because of the invitation made by the householder Anāthapiṇḍika that we have these insight (vipassanā) sermons. If you devout people gain something from this sermon, it is fitting to share those merits with the young deva Anāthapiṇḍika in the Tusita heaven. We can understand why Venerable Sāriputta delivered such a deep discourse to the householder Anāthapiṇḍika at his final hour. If we bring to light a hidden aspect of the householder Anāthapiṇḍika's life, we can understand the reason why Venerable Sāriputta presented such a deep discourse.

You devout people have often heard how the householder Anāthapiṇḍika purchased this Jetavana monastery. When Prince Jeta declared, "I will not give it unless you cover it with gold coins (kahāpaṇa)," the householder Anāthapiṇḍika said, "In that case, it is bought." At that very moment, there were no second thoughts. You all know how he brought gold coins in carts, spread them out, and covered the entire ground of Jetavana monastery to purchase it. What a power of letting go must have existed within the householder Anāthapiṇḍika! Furthermore, he did not give Jetavana monastery his own name. In common parlance it came to be called Anāthapiṇḍikassa (Anāthapiṇḍika's park), but the name remains Jetavana. Prince Jeta, in the end, having witnessed his faith (saddhā), requested a portion of it back. But by that time, the ground of Jetavana monastery had already been covered with gold coins. That is one aspect.

In the same way, the householder Anāthapiṇḍika used to offer daily alms in his home to hundreds of monastics, with the Buddha at the head. In the end, he did not pursue his debtors or those from whom he was due income. Somehow, gradually, his wealth declined. Finally, on one occasion, the Blessed One asked the householder Anāthapiṇḍika: "How is it, householder, are alms still being given in your home?" "Yes, Venerable Sir, sour gruel broth and coarse broken rice. Sour gruel broth and coarse broken rice." Even when reduced to that level, he still gave alms. What a wonderful equanimity! What a wonderful generosity! What a power of letting go! Right there, the vision of non-self (anattā) is present within that; there is no such thing as "I" or "mine." He let go of everything for the sake of the Triple Gem—that very action.

In addition to that aspect, a certain account revealing the intellectual capacity of the householder Anāthapiṇḍika is found in a sutta of the Upāli Vagga in the Book of Tens of the Aṅguttara Nikāya, if you wish to look it up. One day, at midday, this householder Anāthapiṇḍika set out to see the Blessed One. Having gone a short distance, he thought, "This is not a good time; the Blessed One is resting, and the monks are resting, engaged in meditation. I should go a bit later." Thinking, "I should go later," he went to a nearby monastery of other sectarians (aññatitthika). It is often mentioned there that, seeing from afar that a disciple of the Buddha was coming, those sectarians silenced their group. After the householder Anāthapiṇḍika went and exchanged pleasantries, one of those sectarians asked: "Householder, tell us, what is the view (diṭṭhi) of the ascetic Gotama?" Then the householder Anāthapiṇḍika replied: "Venerable Sirs,"—he addressed them as "Venerable Sirs" since these sectarians were ascetics of a sort—"Venerable Sirs, I do not know all the views (diṭṭhi) of the Blessed One. I do not know them entirely." "Well, then, you do not know the view of the ascetic Gotama. Tell us, then, what is the view of the monks, the bhikkhus?" Then the householder Anāthapiṇḍika said, "Venerable Sirs, I do not know the views of all the bhikkhus either." "Well, then, householder, you do not know the view of the ascetic Gotama, nor do you know the views of those bhikkhus. Tell us, then, what is your view?"

Thereupon, the householder Anāthapiṇḍika said: "It is not difficult for me to declare what my view (diṭṭhi) is. But first, please declare your own views." And he invited them to do so. Then, those wanderers (paribbājaka) declared their respective views one by one. These are frequently mentioned in the Dhamma as the ten undeclared points (dasa avyākata vatthu). They are presented as follows. One says: "This is my view: the world is eternal. Eternal means everlasting. Only this is true, everything else is false; that is my view." Next, a second one says: "My view is that the world is not eternal. That is my view, and everything else is false." In this manner: the world is finite; the world is infinite; the soul (atta) and the body are the same; the soul is one thing and the body is another. I am stating briefly what is contained in these ten points. The next four are: the Tathāgata—the person who has attained the supreme state in a dispensation—exists after death; another says "my view is that he does not exist after death"; another says "he both exists and does not exist after death"; and the last one says "he neither exists nor does not exist after death." These views (diṭṭhi), which are frequently mentioned in the Dhamma, were often presented to the Blessed One as well. Here, those who held these views expressed them.

Thereupon, the householder Anāthapiṇḍika said: "You have presented your views (diṭṭhi). Whichever of you said, 'The world is eternal; only this is true, everything else is false,' that view (diṭṭhi) has arisen from your own unwise attention (ayoniso manasikāra)—wrong reflection. Or, it is a view formed by listening to someone else—heard from others (paratoghosa). Every single one of them is impermanent (anicca), conditioned (saṅkhata), mentally concocted—volitional (cetayita). It is merely a concept concocted by the mind, dependently co-arisen (paṭiccasamuppanna). All of them are impermanent (anicca). You are holding onto such a view (diṭṭhi) which is impermanent (anicca) and constructed. You are holding onto something that is painful (dukkha)." In this manner, the householder Anāthapiṇḍika rejected the views (diṭṭhi) of all ten of them, showing that every single one is conditioned (saṅkhata), impermanent (anicca), dependently co-arisen (paṭiccasamuppanna), and painful (dukkha).

When he had spoken thus, those wanderers (paribbājaka) said: "In that case, householder, tell us: what is your view (diṭṭhi)?" Then came the householder Anāthapiṇḍika's turn. The householder Anāthapiṇḍika declared: "Whatever there is in the world that has arisen from causes and conditions, volitional (cetayita), conditioned (saṅkhata)—by conditioned (saṅkhata) is meant whatever is prepared by Preparations (saṅkhāra)—all of that is impermanent (anicca). All of that is painful (dukkha). I see all of that as non-self (anattā). I do not hold onto any of it as 'This is mine, this I am, this is my self' (etaṃ mama, eso hamasmi, eso me attā). I do not hold onto even one of these as 'This is mine, this I am, this is my self'."

When he said that, they said, "Well then, householder, is this your view? Is what you just said your view?" He clarified a bit further: "That is not my view either. I have realized through right wisdom (sammā-paññā) that everything—everything that is conditioned (saṅkhata), everything that is dependently co-arisen (paṭiccasamuppanna)—is impermanent (anicca), subject to passing away. I have realized this. And I have experienced an even higher liberation, an escape, which is Nibbāna." This means he was answering as a stream-enterer (sotāpanna), established in right view (sammā-diṭṭhi), not in the aforementioned wrong views (micchā-diṭṭhi); he was established in right view (sammā-diṭṭhi). After he gave that answer, it is mentioned there that those wanderers were left speechless. In that state, looking down, they remained completely silent and quiet, accepting their defeat.

The householder Anāthapiṇḍika then departed and reported this event to the Blessed One, saying: "The wanderers asked me such questions, and I answered in this way." Then the Blessed One declared: "Sadhu, sadhu, very well, householder! Those foolish men (mogha-purisa) should be refuted in this manner from time to time," and he praised the householder. After the householder paid homage and departed, the Blessed One addressed the monks, saying: "Monks, even a monk of a hundred years' standing since his higher ordination (upasampadā)—that is, a monk of a hundred Rains retreats—should answer those sectarians in the very same way the householder Anāthapiṇḍika answered." What a feat! At that moment, the Blessed One described the householder Anāthapiṇḍika—whom we usually regard merely as a generous donor—as someone who could present the Dhamma in such a Dhamma-conforming way as to silence those wanderers, showing a skill equal to that of a monk of a hundred years in the Dispensation.

We can understand that although the householder Anāthapiṇḍika had only attained the state of stream-entry (sotāpanna), his vision of non-self (anattā)—as expressed here also: "This is mine, this I am, this is my self" (etaṃ mama, eso hamasmi, eso me attā) is not my vision. My vision—meaning the insight (vipassanā) understanding referred to here—what the ordinary world takes as self, the householder Anāthapiṇḍika saw as non-self (anattā). It is in perfect alignment with that very vision of non-self (anattā) that Venerable Sāriputta presented this final sermon. Because when a person is about to die, what do they hold onto? It is precisely these things. In the words of the Blessed One:

Chasu loko samuppanno, chasu kubbati santhavaṃ, channaṃ eva upādāya, chasu loko vihaññati.

"In the six (sense-spheres) the world has arisen; in the six it makes familiarity; grasping (upādāna) these six indeed, in the six the world is vexed."

The six sense-spheres (saḷāyatana) are shown on various occasions. It is the method of relinquishing grasping (upādāna) in regard to this that Venerable Sāriputta reminded the householder Anāthapiṇḍika of in his final moments. In the Dhamma, there are two words used to describe Nibbāna: anissito anupādāno. Nissita means leaning on something, being dependent on or relying on something. Upādāna means grasping or holding onto. The place freed from these two is called Nibbāna: anissito anupādāno. It is for this very purpose that the mind was prepared in Venerable Sāriputta's sermon. Look: "I will not seize the eye through grasping (upādāna). My mind will not proceed being dependent on the eye." There is that word nissita. This is a deep aspect of insight (vipassanā) revolving around these two words, grasping (upādāna) and dependence (nissaya). It is this very portion that the ordinary world seizes and holds onto in the final moments. It is this holding on that creates another state of becoming (bhava). As you devout people have heard: "With grasping (upādāna) as condition, becoming (bhava); with becoming (bhava) as condition, birth (jāti)"—as shown in dependent co-arising (paṭiccasamuppāda). Due to holding onto, existence/becoming (bhava) arises. Due to that existence, birth (jāti) occurs; and where birth (jāti) has arisen, there is decay and death (jarāmaraṇa) and all the rest. Therefore, if one holds onto something with the mind at the moment of death, one takes birth (jāti) according to that object.

Not only ordinary objects, but Venerable Sāriputta also showed extremely subtle objects, even in the formless worlds. "Do not hold onto any of those. Do not hold onto this world, and do not hold onto the next world," he said at last. What this indicates is that he said not to direct the mind to anything other than Nibbāna. When we say Nibbāna, we can understand it in that very sense. Venerable Sāriputta's instruction was: at the very least, do not hold onto the thoughts that come to the mind, or anything that the mind has searched out and seized, through grasping (upādāna); do not take them as a reliance (nissaya).

From this we can understand that in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta too—as those who have studied that sutta must have seen—at the end of each section there is a portion related to insight (vipassanā) meditation, called satipaṭṭhāna. That too ends with the words reliance (nissaya) and grasping (upādāna): anissito ca viharati na ca kiñci loke upādiyati—he dwells independent, and does not grasp (upādāna) anything in the world. He does not lean on anything, he does not rely on anything, and he does not hold onto anything in the world. Thus, even for the devout person practicing satipaṭṭhāna meditation, the Blessed One has shown what the purpose of practicing satipaṭṭhāna is. That too is stated in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta itself. As you devout people know, in developing satipaṭṭhāna meditation, there are four objects: body, feeling (vedanā), mind, and Dhamma—dhamma meaning the objects that come to the mind. The householder Anāthapiṇḍika complained through a state of severe pain (vedanā): "I have such severe painful sensations." Yet, Venerable Sāriputta did not give him a painkiller. It was not a painkiller as the ordinary world thinks. It is the way to conquer painful sensation (vedanā) through that very nectar of Nibbāna. It is within grasping (upādāna) that this painful sensation (vedanā) holds sway.

That is why in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta too it is said: Atthi kāyo'ti vā panassa sati hoti, yāvadeva ñāṇamattāya patissatimattāya. Even to the devout person developing mindfulness of the body (kāyānupassanā) in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, what does the Blessed One say in the end? To think "there is a body" is not for any other purpose, but merely ñāṇamattāya—for the sake of developing one's knowledge—and patissatimattāya—for the sake of developing one's mindfulness. In the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, it is mentioned, "I go forward, I go backward," in this manner. It mentions "I" in reference to one's body, but in the end, it says that to think "there is a body" is merely for the sake of developing one's knowledge and mindfulness. Finally, it says: anissito ca viharati na ca kiñci loke upādiyati. He does not hold onto even that. He does not take even that through grasping (upādāna). The same applies to feeling (vedanā) and other factors. The Blessed One has shown not to firmly seize any of those objects. That very point is shown in this discourse of Venerable Sāriputta.

Especially at the approach of death, if we consider the state of affairs in the world today, this is the final sermon of the householder Anāthapiṇḍika. Every Buddhist devout person thinks deeply about their final moment. No matter what they have been doing, some think that if they can bring in a few monks at the last moment and somehow compose their mind at that time, everything will be fine. But in this perilous era, what we must think of is that indeed we must remain with a near-death mind at all times. Now, some of you devout people, well-dressed, might be traveling in a vehicle for a wedding or some important journey. Suddenly, a loud crashing sound is heard. When consciousness returns, you are in a hospital—it is the time to hear the near-death sermon. In such a situation, this sermon preached by Venerable Sāriputta to the householder Anāthapiṇḍika can be of help, for at that moment there is no opportunity to bring in the Sangha. That is what needs to be said. If we grasp (upādāna) something at the moment of death, and if our kamma aligns with it, our birth (jāti) occurs accordingly.

Now, there may be some devout people who take the life of the householder Anāthapiṇḍika to some extent as an exemplar, or try to emulate him by making large financial donations. However, in making those donations, sometimes the purpose might be different. Sometimes, they perform large acts of giving (dāna) and meritorious deeds expecting positions, titles, and status. But at the final moment, they cannot compose their mind. Unable to compose their mind, in the end, they might be born right in their own homes, coming to the front door as a dog. Or they might go under the cupboard as a frog or a rat-snake. That is precisely because of grasping (upādāna). Because of that holding onto. What is needed there is to free the mind. At the moment of death, one must free the mind from grasping (upādāna). The mind that is in a place of reliance (nissaya)—relying on things—must be broken away from it. That is what is required.

When we say that in this insight (vipassanā) sermon, at the moment of death, everything else is let go—in the end, that letting go is not a physical letting go. We hold onto things with the mind. Having seen that holding onto with the mind through wisdom, seeing their impermanent (anicca) nature and non-self (anattā) nature, the Blessed One highlights what causes this holding onto. Venerable Sāriputta also spoke about eye-consciousness (cakkhu-viññāṇa). He spoke about the contact (phassa) arising because of that consciousness (viññāṇa). He spoke about the feeling (vedanā) arising because of contact (phassa). Looking at the mind in that way—these are the places of attachment. That is what is called wise attention (yoniso manasikāra). Even in that verse, the householder Anāthapiṇḍika declared: yoniso vicine dhammaṃ evaṃ tattha visujjhati. One must investigate wisely with wise attention (yoniso manasikāra). Or else, by directing the mind to the place where they arise.

The Blessed One shows perception (saññā) as a mirage. All perceptions (saññā) taken from the eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind—the Blessed One shows them all as a mirage. If it is a mirage, why be deceived by it? If so, one must consider that internally: this eye, and because of form, this arising consciousness (viññāṇa), and the contact (phassa) arising therefrom—if one holds onto these, for the one who holds onto them at that moment, these are not external things. One can understand that these are generated by oneself. In that way, one goes on being born again and again in becoming (bhava) according to the objects taken by the mind. That is what is mentioned in the Dhamma.

Regarding these, Nibbāna is mentioned as appaṭiṭṭhaṃ, appavattaṃ, anārammaṇaṃ—the supportless, non-occurring, objectless state, where no object at all is taken. This is a state where no object of the next world or anything else is taken. The object that is taken is what emerges as a new birth (jāti). This is mentioned in the Dhamma itself:

Yañca ceteti yañca pakappeti yañca anuseti, ārammaṇametaṃ hoti viññāṇassa ṭhitiyā. Ārammaṇe sati patiṭṭhā viññāṇassa hoti.

"If one wills (ceteti), if one plans (pakappeti), or if one has a lingering underlying tendency (anusaya) toward something, that becomes an object for the stationing of consciousness (viññāṇa). When there is an object, there is a support for consciousness (viññāṇa)."

At the moment of death, consciousness (viññāṇa) goes and lands somewhere along that object. That becomes a support (patiṭṭhā) for consciousness (viññāṇa). Therefore, the state where consciousness (viññāṇa) does not obtain a support is called appaṭiṭṭhaṃ. It is a term for Nibbāna. The mind does not establish itself on any object; it does not take an object. Because it does not take an object, there is no establishing. Because there is no establishing, there is no continuation (pavatta). That is why the words appaṭiṭṭhaṃ, appavattaṃ, anārammaṇaṃ are mentioned.

The same is said in another way through the Three Characteristics (tilakkhaṇa). As you devout people may have heard, when the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā) is developed to the end—we use something in front of us to help develop the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā). But as we go deeper, in the end, the sign (nimitta) disappears. We begin to develop the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā) based on some sign (nimitta). But in the end, the final result is that one arrives at a state of not taking a sign (animitta). Likewise, the Blessed One has declared that whatever is impermanent (anicca) is painful (dukkha). For the one who has developed that perception to the highest degree, after the desire for perception (saññā) is gone, the mind's paṇidhi—meaning aspirations—disappears. That is why appaṇihita (the desireless) is also a name for Nibbāna; there is no aspiration, no desire. No desire at all. Next, for the one who has deeply developed the vision of non-self (anattā), in the end, it is realized as empty (suñña)—this is empty, a vacant thing. There is nothing to be taken here. Empty of any essence (sāra), a vacant thing, nothing to be taken. It is according to what is held by the mind as having essence (sāra) that one takes birth (jāti) again and again. Nibbāna is described by these three, as you devout people may have heard: animitta, appaṇihita, suññata (the signless, the desireless, the empty).

Now, what helps bring one to that state is the relinquishing of grasping (upādāna) which causes further birth (jāti). To relinquish grasping (upādāna), one must thin out craving (taṇhā). In the life of the householder Anāthapiṇḍika, there was a power to let go of that craving (taṇhā) very instantly. Moreover, because his mind was developed according to that Dhamma-knowledge, although he was reborn due to not having attained the other paths and fruits (magga-phala) in his final moments, it must have been a help to him. We too must think about our own lives, whether lay or ordained. If we do not understand the depth of this Dhamma at some point, and if we do not conduct our thoughts accordingly, we will have to wander further and further in saṃsāra. Some people, having no place to ordain, unable to break free, come seeking us with a great desire to ordain at least in the mind. For such people, even while staying in their own homes, managing to save themselves somehow, in a friendly manner—since often various complications can arise in lay life because of this—discussing it wisely, mindfully, and amicably, those who try to arouse their fear of saṃsāra through the Dhamma and make use of it, they are not afraid of this kind of sermon. This insight (vipassanā) sermon, because some day we must put an end to this repeated birth (jāti) in saṃsāra. Even if we stay together, where will we end up being born? No matter how much we pray. Therefore, staying together is not what is important. In this rare opportunity, having encountered the Buddha's Dispensation, having had the opportunity to hear the Dhamma, if one makes an effort, as the householder Anāthapiṇḍika said, there might be those among the devout laity who can understand the deep Dhamma and practice accordingly. It is because they would otherwise decline by not hearing the Dhamma that the householder made an invitation like the Brahmā's invitation on behalf of lay disciples.

Therefore, you devout people should consider it in this way. As a preparation for that, even if one does not go far into the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, nowadays many laypeople think of the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta as something to be recited at a funeral house. Thus, the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta has been relegated to the same fate as the pumpkin in the old story at funeral houses. That is not the case; there is something much deeper here. Why is the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta recalled at funeral houses? Because at that moment of grief (saṃvega), one can gain true understanding, even if one usually lives in a daily self-created world. However, many people think it is just something to be chanted. Or, even some educated people think of this Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta as something inauspicious, to be said only at funeral houses. Yet, whether lay or ordained, it is this Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta that we must bring close to our lives. Laypeople of old during the Buddha's time, like Isidatta, declared to the Blessed One himself: "Whenever we directed our minds to satipaṭṭhāna, we felt a great sense of relief even while living the lay life."

Therefore, you too must reflect: this saṃsāra is terrifying, and these dangers can arise to someone through grasping (upādāna). Sometimes, even if one has lived as a generous donor, if those weaknesses exist and one has been holding onto these with the mind, one cannot tell what the final thought at the last moment will be. If one has developed various attachments, whether out of affection for the people one associated with in one's home, or due to one's wealth and belongings, accordingly, one might be born not only in the realm of departed spirits (peta) or as an animal, but sometimes even as a demon (yakkha) or a monster (rakkhasa) to guard them. If we have understood the value of this precious human life, that is why the householder Anāthapiṇḍika said: etena maccā sujjhanti na gottena dhanena vā—by this are mortals purified, not by lineage or by wealth. It is by living in accordance with what was mentioned—action (kamma), Dhamma, and knowledge (vijjā). Vijjā means understanding. Yoniso vicine dhammaṃ refers to the investigation of states (dhamma-vicaya).

Wise devout people, having reviewed your lives in this manner: even if everyone else leaves us at the moment of death, in the end, what we have to let go of is this very body with its perception (saññā) and mind. That is where we must direct our attention, not to external things. That is what is meant by the six sense-spheres (saḷāyatana). The Blessed One declared that the world exists within the six internal sense-spheres and the six external sense-spheres. And within that world lies the secret to Nibbāna. If we hold onto that world in that manner, the mind takes birth (jāti) in some place according to that holding onto. There, a state of becoming (bhava) is prepared. "With grasping (upādāna) as condition, becoming (bhava); with the cessation of grasping (anupādā), Parinibbāna." Becoming (bhava) arises due to grasping (upādāna). The cessation of becoming (bhava-nirodha) occurs in non-grasping (anupādāna)—in letting go. The devout person who practices this moment by moment is gradually able to free the mind. The Blessed One has given hints as to how that freeing is possible: the impermanent (anicca) nature of all these things. If something is impermanent (anicca), one has to keep maintaining and repairing it. That is a painful (dukkha) thing. Within that itself lies the fact that it cannot be kept under one's control. That is what is meant by the vision of non-self (anattā)—it cannot be kept under one's control.

The Blessed One often asks many people, sometimes even brahmins—he asks because it is such an obvious fact—"What do you think, brahmin, is form permanent or impermanent (anicca)?" "Impermanent (anicca)," comes the reply. "If something is impermanent (anicca), is it easeful or painful (dukkha)?" "Painful (dukkha)," they declare. If it is impermanent (anicca), subject to change (vipariṇāma) and alterity (aññathābhāva), if everything is of a nature to become otherwise, and if it cannot be kept under one's control, is it fit to regard it as "This is mine, this I am, this is my self" (etaṃ mama, eso hamasmi, eso me attā)? He questions the person themselves. He leaves it to the inquirer himself to reflect whether it is fit to take it as "This is mine, this I am, this is my self"—to take it by way of craving (taṇhā), conceit (māna), and view (diṭṭhi).

In that very way we must reflect. The Blessed One has declared that even this body is not one's own. That is why it cannot be kept under one's control. The same applies to the others. Because not even one of these—feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), Preparations (saṅkhāra), and consciousness (viññāṇa)—can be kept under one's control, and because they are impermanent (anicca), devoid of any essence, core, or substance, the Blessed One has given the similes that you devout people have heard: form is like a lump of foam; feeling (vedanā) is like a water bubble; perception (saññā) is like a mirage; Preparations (saṅkhāra) are like a heap of banana plantain trunks—a banana trunk; and finally, when speaking of consciousness (viññāṇa)—and here, Venerable Sāriputta constantly referred to consciousness (viññāṇa)—he declared that consciousness (viññāṇa) is an illusion. There is a nature in this consciousness (viññāṇa) to show what is not there as if it exists. What, then, does one hold onto? In accordance with the Dhamma, one holds onto it as an object. That is what the practitioner of insight (vipassanā) takes as Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). What is held onto is Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). And the Blessed One declares that Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) is merely a shadow cast on consciousness (viññāṇa).

A small illustrative story somewhat relevant to this is found not in ancient Buddhist literature, but in ancient Greek literature. There was a certain Greek youth named Narcissus. This Greek youth Narcissus was very handsome, but he had never seen his own face. He had never looked into a mirror. One day, he went into the forest and bent down over a pond to wash his face. For the first time, he saw his own face, and was deceived, thinking it was a water-nymph. A goddess living in the water. Confused by love, he tried to embrace her. The moment he put his hands in, the water rippled. He looked again and again, but failed. He returned the next day, and the day after that. He could not embrace the water-nymph. In the end, out of grief of separation, or rather due to his inability to grasp her, he wasted away and died right there, and the flower that grew in that spot was called "Narcissus." This is a Greek myth. But within this story lies the tale of being deceived by one's own reflection. If we speak in Dhamma terms, it is self-love (ātma-sneha). That is precisely what the Blessed One has highlighted. There is a verse in the Magga Vagga of the Dhammapada:

Ucchinda sinehamattano, kumudaṃ sāradikaṃ va pāṇinā, santimaggameva brūhaya, nibbānaṃ sugatena desitaṃ.

The Blessed One also gives a similar simile. A simile of a flower: pluck out your self-love (ātma-sneha)—affection for oneself—just as one would pluck an autumn lily (kumuda) with one's hand. "Pluck out affection for oneself… cultivate the very path of peace, Nibbāna, as taught by the Well-Gone One (Sugata)," which is the Noble Eightfold Path.

Thus, what this simile indicates to us is that it is the attachment to Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) that we are asked to let go of. This is not annihilationism (uccheda-vāda). Many people think that this talk of the cessation of becoming (bhava-nirodha) and Nibbāna in the Dhamma—even what we write and say—might appear to some as annihilationism. However, the Blessed One showed only one side of the illusion of consciousness (viññāṇa-māyā). What is cast as a shadow by the illusion of consciousness (viññāṇa) is shown in the Dhamma as Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). It is form in name only; looked at from the other side, it is the appearance of form. It is neither a real name nor a real form. It is not a name, nor is it a form. Form in name only, the appearance of form—that is what is called Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). "Name" (nāma) refers to mental factors: feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), intention (cetanā), contact (phassa), and attention (manasikāra). "Form" (rūpa) refers to the great primary elements (mahābhūta), which cannot be understood in their true nature or identified individually, but are the perception of form derived from earth, water, fire, and air. That is what is called Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa).

It is within this reflection of Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) that anything the world holds onto entirely exists. Only Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). Feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), intention (cetanā), contact (phassa), attention (manasikāra), and on the other hand, the perception of form derived from the four elements. It is through that very understanding that the practitioner of insight (vipassanā) gradually goes forward, with the help of the Three Characteristics (tilakkhaṇa) introduced by the Blessed One—impermanent (anicca), painful (dukkha), and non-self (anattā)—and by understanding the perverted perceptions (vipallāsa) existing in the world regarding all these things: seeing the impermanent (anicca) as permanent, the painful (dukkha) as pleasant, the non-self (anattā) as self, and the foul as beautiful. If one understands the true nature of that perverted vision and treads the path of insight (vipassanā) with the help of the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, even while living a lay life, among the white-clad laypeople, there can be those who attain Dhamma-realization.

Therefore, let us make use of this opportunity. Indeed, you devout people should share merits with the young deva Anāthapiṇḍika. It is our wish that this sermon preached for so long, in the manner described, may be of assistance to you devout people at some moment—even if we wish it not to be so—in a sudden crisis, or when gaining consciousness in a hospital.

Making as much use as possible of this insight-oriented Dhamma sermon heard by you devout people so far, we wish that you may gain the strength and power to realize the noble deathless Nibbāna in this very life through the penetration of the paths and fruits (magga-phala) of Stream-entry (sotāpanna), Once-returning (sakadāgāmi), Non-returning (anāgāmi), and Arahantship. At the same time, we wish that whatever living beings there are from Avīci to Akaniṭṭha in this universe, including the young deva Anāthapiṇḍika, who are able to rejoice in the merits of such a Dhamma sermon and Dhamma hearing, may, by rejoicing therein, find peace in the supreme deathless Nibbāna through the Bodhi of their aspiration. Let us share merits by reciting these verses:

From:

Sabhiya Sutta (Sn 3.6) from the Sutta Nipāta

Dear Listeners,

During the time when the Buddha appeared, there was a group of people in India (Dambadiva) who made the search for truth the supreme goal of their lives, known in society by the name 'Paribrājaka' (wanderers). The general meaning of that word 'Paribrājaka' is 'one who walks everywhere.' They did not walk everywhere in vain; they were searching for the truth. In their search for truth, they mostly made use of the question-and-answer method. When they met a teacher who proclaimed a certain philosophy, they would present a list of questions. If they received appropriate answers, they often had the humility and love of truth to become a disciple of that teacher. A good example of this is found in the Sabhiya Sutta of the Sutta Nipāta, in the account of Sabhiya the wanderer. There are several past stories about Sabhiya the wanderer mentioned in the commentaries with slight variations. In addition to the background story given in the Sutta Nipāta, according to those accounts, in the past, during the time of Kassapa Buddha, Sabhiya the wanderer was a monk who had ordained in that Dispensation (Sāsana). Seven monks, seeing how the Sāsana of Kassapa Buddha was falling into decline, became deeply moved by emotion (saṁvega), entered a forest, climbed a mountain cliff with the help of a ladder, threw the ladder down, and began to meditate with intense effort, with the thought, "We will realize Nibbāna somehow." Among those seven monks, one monk attained Arahantship with higher knowledges (abhiññā) in a single night. Although he went for alms-round by air the next morning and brought that food to offer to the other six, those six did not accept it. On the second day, the second monk attained the state of a Non-returner (Anāgāmī) with higher knowledges, and he too went for alms-round in the same way and offered it to the remaining five. It is said that they did not accept it, considering it a conceptual proliferation / prolific conceptualization (papañca) or a delay, and meditated without food. That Arahant monk passed away into Parinibbāna. The Anāgāmī monk was reborn in the Suddhāvāsa Brahma world. The other five monks, meditating with life-sacrificing effort without food, passed away on the rock itself. Having passed away, according to those books, they wandered in the heavenly worlds, etc., for an entire interval between Buddhas (buddhantara), and were reborn in different places during the time of our Buddha. They are recognized in the Dhamma in this manner: Pukkusāti, Kumāra Kassapa, Bāhiya Dārucīriya, Dabba Mallaputta, and Sabhiya Paribrājaka. These five are found in the Sāsana in later times.

Regarding Sabhiya the wanderer, it is also mentioned that he was born as the son of a female wanderer (paribrājikā), gained a good understanding of the Vedas and other sciences, and established a hermitage. One night, the aforementioned Suddhāvāsa Brahma-king, with the intention of making Sabhiya the wanderer meet the Buddha, came during the night, addressed him as "Sabhiya," and taught him twenty questions. He advised him that if any recluse or brahmin could answer these twenty questions, he should ordain under that teacher and practice the holy life. Accordingly, Sabhiya the wanderer went to meet the famous teachers of that time—as you may have heard: Pūraṇa Kassapa, Ajita Kesakambalī, Pakudha Kaccāyana, Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta—and asked them these questions. Instead of answering these questions, they became angry and agitated. They even asked Sabhiya the wanderer himself for their meaning. He too was unable to answer. Then, his disillusionment was such that Sabhiya the wanderer thought it would be better to return to lay life and enjoy the fivefold sensual pleasures. Then he remembered that although the ascetic Gotama was very young in age, perhaps he might know the answers to these questions. Having thought so, he traveled a long distance to Rajagaha. He went and met the Buddha at Veḷuvanārāma. Having met him, he addressed him in verse, saying that he had come with such doubts and hesitation, and requested the Buddha to answer these questions. When he invited the Buddha, the Buddha very gently and reassuringly said: "Very well, I shall answer the questions you ask. Ask them in sequence." It was indeed a long series of questions, twenty questions in total. Sabhiya the wanderer presented those twenty questions in five verses, four questions per verse. However, the Buddha answered each question individually with twenty verses, one verse for each question. The first four questions asked are what we have taken as our topic today:

By what attainment is one called a monk (bhikkhu)?

By what is one called gentle (sorata)? How is one called tamed (danta)?

How is one called a Buddha?

O Blessed One, being questioned by me, please explain this.

This was his request.

Now, the Buddha answers them:

Pajjena katena attanā

Through the path cultivated by himself,

Parinibbāṇagato vitiṇṇakaṅkho

Having reached Parinibbāna (ultimate extinguishment) and crossed over doubts,

Vibhavañca bhavañca vippahāya

(Vibhava means the annihilationist view, bhava means the eternalist view) Having abandoned those views and becoming / existence (bhava),

Vusitavā khīṇapunabbhavo sa bhikkhu

Having lived the holy life in the Sāsana and destroyed rebirth (renewed existence), he is indeed a monk (bhikkhu).

In the next verse, the word sorata (gentle/mild) is explained:

Sabbadhi upekkhako satimā

Mindful and equanimous everywhere,

Na so hiṁsati kañci sabbaloke

He does not harm anyone in the entire world,

Tiṇṇo samaṇo anāvilo

A recluse who has crossed over, unperturbed,

Ussadā yassa na santi sorato so

In whom there are no swellings/prominences (such as craving, conceit, and views), he is called sorata.

Next, in the other verse, the word danta (tamed) is explained:

Yassindriyāni bhāvitāni bahiddhā ca sabbaloke

Whose faculties (indriyas) are developed, both internally and externally, in regard to the entire world,

Imañca parañca lokaṁ nibbidha

Having penetrated this world and the next,

Kālaṁ kaṅkhati bhāvito sa danto

With a developed mind, awaiting his time (death), he is indeed danta.

And finally, it is said:

Kappāni viceyya kevalāni, saṁsāraṁ ubhayaṁ cutūpapātaṁ, vigata rajamanaṅgaṇaṁ, visuddhaṁ pattaṁ jātikkhayaṁ tamāhu buddhaṁ.

Kappāni viceyya kevalāni

Having scrutinized with wisdom all constructs (kappas - things fashioned by the mind through craving and views),

Saṁsāraṁ ubhayaṁ cutūpapātaṁ

Likewise, having investigated with wisdom the entire saṁsāra with its dual aspects of passing away and arising,

Vigata rajaṁ

Free from defilement,

Anaṅgaṇaṁ

Free from blemish,

Visuddhaṁ

Pure (referring to the Buddha),

Pattaṁ jātikkhayaṁ tamāhu buddhaṁ

Having attained the destruction of birth / arising (jāti), him they call 'Buddha'.

So, the Buddha answered the four questions asked by Sabhiya the wanderer in a single verse, using four verses. Sabhiya the wanderer was highly pleased and went on to ask many other questions. We will not detail them individually. But before that, something must be said about the nature of these questions. Based on the basic structure of these questions, they seem to revolve around twenty key terms related to the spiritual life that were in common social usage at that time. As already mentioned: bhikkhu, sorata, danta, buddha, etc. Further on, there are words like brāhmaṇa, nahātaka, samaṇa, vedagū, etc., which were accepted terms in society at that time, and their true meaning is what is being asked.

In this regard, we can observe something special. The Buddha's fourfold analytical knowledge (catu-paṭisambhidā) shines throughout this sutta. So much so, that after being answered with these twenty verses, Sabhiya the wanderer was satisfied and ordained in the Sāsana. This word we use, 'Sivu-pilisimbiyā' (four analytical knowledges), is Catu-paṭisambhidā. Since the four paṭisambhidā are explained very briefly in books, many people often come and ask us about them. In the Dhamma, they are shown as: Attha, Dhamma, Nirutti, and Paṭibhāna. Attha (meaning/effect) is explained as the matter/result before us—the cause and effect that stands before us. Dhamma (cause/text) is the underlying cause. Nirutti (language/linguistic expression) is the understanding of the words and language used to describe them. Paṭibhāna (ready wit/intellective response) is the analytical comprehension of illumination, which everyone knows as the wisdom of understanding. The uniqueness here is that when a certain question or word is presented, the Buddha has the ability to see the distinctions of meaning within it—many distinctions of meaning within a single word. This is called atthanānatta (diversity of meanings). He has the ability to see these distinctions, express them, make them clear, and convince others. Next, he has the strength to bring out the underlying Dhamma behind those meanings—the dhamma-pabheda (distinctions of natural laws/principles). Next, those with this paṭisambhidā have great power in using the appropriate nirutti (linguistic expression/etymology) to present them, in mastering language and penetrating words. Finally, paṭibhāna is, as you all know, specific insights such as similes, metaphors, etc. Similes and metaphors that help to clarify and convince others of those aforementioned points. This special understanding is what is contained within this analytical knowledge (paṭisambhidā-ñāṇa).

Let us give only a few examples of this. This is a long sutta. Apart from what was just said, the next question the wanderer asks is: "Who is a Brahmin?" In the definition given by the Buddha, it is said: Sabbapāpaṁ bāhita—one who has warded off all evil. This means he has discarded all sins. In that sense, he becomes a brāhmaṇa. In the Sāsana, the word brāhmaṇa refers to the Arahant monk. Next, kevalī. Kevalī means "one who has attained unity." Among brahmins, it refers to union with Brahma. But here it is not used in that sense, but in the sense of saṁsāraṁ aticca kevalī—one who has transcended saṁsāra. In this manner, there are many meanings in this verse, especially regarding nirutti (etymology). Similarly, the word samaṇa (recluse) is explained in the sense of samitāvī—one who has quieted both merit and demerit. Both merit and evil have been quieted. Through this, the aspect of quietening of all preparations / Preparations / volitional activity (sabba-saṅkhāra-samatha) is shown. In the Buddha's Sāsana, a samaṇa is one who has quieted both merit and demerit. Next is the word nahātaka (one who has bathed/cleansed). This is frequently used among brahmins. As you have heard, it was the custom of brahmins to go down into the water three times a day to wash away their sins. Instead of this, the Buddha says here: Ninhāya sabbapāpakāni ajjhattaṁ bahiddhā ca sabbaloke—having washed away those evil states (pāpaka dhamma) regarding the entire world, both internally and externally. Not that kind of external cleansing. In that sense, this refers to the Arahant monk.

Next, regarding the word nāga, he asks, "How does one become a nāga?" For this, the Buddha uses an etymology (nirutti): āguṁ na karoti kiñci—since he does no wrong (āgu means wrong/sin). In the sense of doing no wrong whatsoever in the world, he is called nāga. Observe how the etymology is applied. Then, having broken all bonds, with the power of a bull elephant (nāga), it is shown in the Dhamma as being liberated from all fetters (saṁyojana). Next is the term khettajina (conqueror of fields). This is also a word with a deep meaning. The ordinary meaning of khettajina is "one who has won fields." The Buddha explains it as: khettāni viceyya kevalāni dibbaṁ mānusakañca brahmakhettaṁ—having understood all fields: divine, human, and brahma fields; sabbakhettamūlabandhanā pamutto—liberated from the root-bond of all fields. Here, we can understand what "fields" means. As you may know, it is said in the Dhamma: kammaṁ khettaṁ viññāṇaṁ bījaṁ taṇhā sineho—karma is the field, consciousness (viññāṇa) is the seed, craving / thirst (taṇhā) is the moisture. Thus, cutting the root of the field means being liberated from all wholesome and unwholesome karma. The same meaning is used to explain the next word, kusala (skilful/wholesome): kosāni viceyya kevalāni dibbaṁ mānusakañca brahmakosaṁ—the person who has the true meaning of kusala is one who has dismantled the tendency to enter into "sheaths" (kosa) such as divine, brahma, etc. sabbakosamūlabandhanā pamutto—in the sense of having cut the root-bond that leads to those sheaths, he is called kusala. Similarly, the word vedagū (one attained to knowledge) is explained. Everyone knows vedagū as one who has mastered the three Vedas. But the Buddha explains it in a novel way: vedāni viceyya kevalāni—understanding all those "vedas" concerning brahmins and recluses. But next, he says: sabbavedanāsu vītarāgo—passionless towards all feelings / sensations (vedanā). Based on that word (veda), the Buddha brings out feeling / sensation (vedanā) itself. Bringing out the fact of feeling / sensation (vedanā) that everyone has, he states: sabbaṁ vedaṁ aticca vedagū so—in the sense of transcending all feeling / sensation (vedanā), he is called vedagū in this Sāsana. In this manner, many other points are shown. Next, the meaning of the word anuvidita (fully understood). Anuvidita means having understood something thoroughly. There too, the Buddha presents a deep Dhamma principle:

anuvicca papañca nāmarūpaṁ, bahiddhā ca rogamūlaṁ, sabbatogamūlabandhanā pamutto, anuvidito tādi pavuccate tathattā.

Having thoroughly understood Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) created by the world through this conceptual proliferation / prolific conceptualization (papañca). That indeed is bahiddhā ca rogamūlaṁ—the root of all disease, both internally and externally. The one liberated from the bond of the root of all disease is called an anuvidita (fully understood) person, the "such-like" (tādi).

Finally, even if we do not speak of everything in detail, what is particularly visible is the word paribbājaka (wanderer). At the beginning, we mentioned the ordinary meaning of paribbājaka—wandering from place to place. Or, if one prefers, wandering in search of truth. But the Buddha, according to the etymology and phonetic resonance of the word paribbājaka, shows that it means the complete avoiding (parivajjana) of all evil deeds, and having avoided them, pariññācārī—faring with full understanding. Next, in the sense of being external to them. Then it says: pariyantaṁ akāsi nāmarūpaṁ—pariyanta means the end/limit. In the sense of having seen the end of Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa), he is called a paribbājaka. All the remaining terms were presented by the Buddha after enriching them with further aspects. Hearing this, Sabhiya the wanderer was highly pleased and then uttered seven verses of praise to the Buddha. This is a very long sutta. The faith (saddhā) that arose in Sabhiya the wanderer was such that he immediately rose from his seat and thought: "I was unable to obtain anything from those other teachers. Let alone answering, they did not even listen to them. In contrast, the Buddha explained them so well in this manner." With this thought, he thanked the Buddha with seven verses of praise. We will mention only the first verse because of its special meaning.

In the first verse, it is said:

Yāni ca tīṇi yāni ca saṭṭhi, samaṇappavādasitāni bhūripañña, saññānisitāni osaraṇāni, vineyya oghantamagā.

This is a verse that is somewhat difficult to understand. We will analyze it as time permits. There is a very deep meaning in it. Yāni ca tīṇi yāni ca saṭṭhi samaṇappavādasitāni bhūripañña—"O One of vast wisdom, whatever sixty-three assertions of recluses (samaṇa-ppavāda) there are..." The nature of those assertions of recluses is saññā-nisitāni—resting on perception and words/letters. Regarding those sixty-three assertions of recluses, having understood each of them, they are next described as osaraṇāni—things that have the nature of pulling inwards (resorts). vineyya oghantamagā—having removed them, he went to the end of the flood (ogha). The Dhamma speaks of a fourfold flood—the swift-flowing currents that sweep the world away. He reached the end of the swift-flowing currents. Having declared this, he says a series of verses in praise. The final verse of that series is also of special value:

Puṇḍarīkaṁ yathā vaggu, toyena na upalippati, evaṁ puññe ca pāpe ca, ubhaye tvaṁ na lippasi, pāde vīra pasārehi, sabhiyo vandati saññuno.

The verse concludes in this manner:

Puṇḍarīkaṁ yathā vaggu toyena na upalippati—Just as a beautiful white lotus, a white lily, is not smeared or defiled by water, evaṁ puññe ca pāpe ca ubhaye tvaṁ na lippasi—in the same way, you are not smeared by both merit and demerit.

pāde vīra pasārehi sabhiyo vandati saññuno—"O Hero, stretch out your feet; Sabhiya bows down to the Wise One."

Having declared this, and in addition, as in the usual suttas, expressing his faith by saying, "Magnificent, Lord! Magnificent, Lord!" and stating that he has taken refuge in the Triple Gem, he then asks permission from the Buddha to receive ordination and higher ordination (upasampadā). "May the Blessed One ordain me, may he give me higher ordination." Then the Buddha states: "Sabhiya, there is a practice in this Sāsana of mine: if someone who was previously a sectarian (titthiya) wishes to ordain in this Sāsana, he must undergo a four-month probationary period (parivāsa). After that probationary period, only if the monks give their approval and are willing, is he ordained. However, I can show favor by considering the difference in persons (puggala-vemattatā)." Then Sabhiya, showing great faith, says: "O Blessed One, if there is such a rule in the Sāsana, I am willing to undergo the probationary period not just for four months, but even for four years. Thereafter, if the Bhikkhus are willing, let them ordain me." Even though he said so, the Buddha gave ordination and higher ordination to Sabhiya the wanderer immediately. Then, as mentioned in many places, having gone into seclusion and strived diligently, not long after, Venerable Sabhiya attained Arahantship.

Thus, according to this story of Sabhiya, on one hand, this sutta is important for gaining an understanding of the four analytical knowledges (catu-paṭisambhidā). We have only briefly highlighted it. We understand that the Buddha used key terms to convey entirely new meanings, as seen in the way he explained words like brāhmaṇa, nahātaka, etc. He gave a new, deeper meaning to the words existing in society. That indeed is the power to penetrate language. Next, the skill to handle it, to explain it in a way that is comprehensible and fitting, using similes, etc. That is one aspect. Next, as we mentioned, for some reason, the first of the verses presented by Sabhiya the wanderer: Yāni ca tīṇi yāni ca saṭṭhi samaṇappavādasitāni bhūripañña—here, sixty-three assertions of recluses (samaṇappavāda) are mentioned. This often becomes a problem for scholars. We are familiar with the sixty-two views of the Brahmajāla Sutta. The commentaries explain how the sixty-three are formed by adding the dogma of self-illusion / view of existing group/body (sakkāya-diṭṭhi) to the sixty-two views mentioned in the Brahmajāla Sutta. However, as we can see, this is not very acceptable, because we find evidence for this. In the Sutta Piṭaka itself, in the Saḷāyatana Saṁyutta of the Saṁyutta Nikāya, in a question asked by Citta the Householder and answered by Venerable Isidatta, we can see that this commentarial view is unacceptable. The question is as follows: Citta the Householder asks Venerable Isidatta: "Venerable sir, in the presence of what do the sixty-two views in the Brahmajāla arise? In the absence of what do they not arise?" Then the answer given by Venerable Isidatta is: "When the dogma of self-illusion / view of existing group/body (sakkāya-diṭṭhi) is present, the sixty-two views arise. When the dogma of self-illusion / view of existing group/body (sakkāya-diṭṭhi) is absent, those views do not arise." Therefore, we can see that if those sixty-two views arise due to the dogma of self-illusion / view of existing group/body (sakkāya-diṭṭhi), it is difficult to accept the dogma of self-illusion / view of existing group/body (sakkāya-diṭṭhi) as the sixty-third view.

Then the next question arises: "What is it then?" In this regard, we have a valuable sutta in the Gahapati Vagga of the Dasaka Nipāta of the Aṅguttara Nikāya, which gives us a clue. We think of Anāthapiṇḍika the Householder as the chief supporter of the Buddha, at most an Upāsaka who is a Stream-enterer. That the Householder was no ordinary person is seen from the way he answered the questions asked by several wanderers of other sects. The incident is described as follows: One day, while Anāthapiṇḍika the Householder was on his way to Jetavana to see the Buddha, he thought it was too early to see the Buddha and the Saṅgha, and turned aside into a certain monastery of another sect. When he entered and sat down, those sectarians asked Anāthapiṇḍika the Householder: "Householder, what is the view of the recluse ascetic Gotama?" Then Anāthapiṇḍika says: "Venerable sirs, I do not know fully what the view of the Buddha is." Then they say: "So, you do not know the view of the Buddha. Tell us then, householder, what is the view of the monks?" Anāthapiṇḍika says: "I do not know the view of the monks fully either." Then they say: "Well, then you do not know the view of the recluse ascetic Gotama, nor the view of the monks. Tell us, householder, what is your view?" Then Anāthapiṇḍika the Householder answers: "That is not difficult for me to say. But before that, please tell me your views."

When he said so, one of the wanderers said: "The world is eternal. This alone is the truth, everything else is false. This is my view." Another wanderer says: "The world is not eternal. This alone is the truth, everything else is false. This is my view." A third says: "The world is finite. This is the truth, everything else is false." "Loko sassato, loko asassato, loko antavā..." and so on. These are the ten undeclared (avyākata) questions. Next, a fourth comes forward and says: "The world is infinite—this is my view." Consider this briefly in this manner. Next, a fifth comes forward and says: "The soul and the body are the same (taṁ jīvaṁ taṁ sarīraṁ)." Here, jīva is used in the sense of a self/soul. Another says: "The soul is one thing, the body is another." After these six had spoken, four more come forward. One says: "The Tathāgata exists after death." In those days, Tathāgata meant the supreme person, who had attained the highest state in any teaching (uttama-puriso parama-puriso paramapattipatto). "He exists after death—this is my view." The next one says: "The Tathāgata does not exist after death"—that is the eighth. The ninth says: "The Tathāgata both exists and does not exist after death—this is my view." The tenth says: "The Tathāgata neither exists nor does not exist after death." These are the ten undeclared questions to which the Buddha did not give answers, which we have introduced in previous suttas.

Having said so, these wanderers then ask: "Well, now we have stated our views. Householder, now you tell us, what is your view?" From this point onwards, listen very carefully. That Anāthapiṇḍika the Householder was no ordinary person can be understood from the answer he gives. "Now, if any venerable sir said: 'The world is eternal, all else is false,' that view arose through unwise attention (the opposite of yoniso manasikāra)." This means that all these views were created through unwise attention / lack of radical attention / wise attention. "They are preparations / Preparations / volitional activity (saṅkhata), volitionally thought out (cetayita), and dependently arisen (paṭiccasamuppanna)." Then, a sectarian says: "Ah, well then, tell us what your view is. Is your view that what is volitionally thought out (cetayita), prepared (saṅkhata), is impermanent / inconstant (anicca), and that this is your view? Are you not attached to that view?" Then Anāthapiṇḍika the Householder says (expressing it in a unique way): "Whatever exists in that manner as volitionally thought out (cetayita), prepared (saṅkhata), and dependently arisen (paṭiccasamuppanna), that is sudiṭṭhaṁ—I have seen it well with wisdom. I have seen it with wisdom as impermanent / inconstant (anicca). But I do not grasp even that. Along with that, I have seen the escape (nissaraṇa) from those views, the departure from them." Try to understand this. There is a very deep point here. Since Anāthapiṇḍika says this as a householder, it should not be impossible for you to understand this as well. If we look at this from the perspective of insight (vipassanā), Anāthapiṇḍika the Householder does not grasp even the view: "All preparations / Preparations / volitional activity (saṅkhata) are impermanent / inconstant (anicca), suffering / unsatisfactoriness / stress (dukkha), and not-self / non-self / unsubstantial (anattā)." Why? Because he says: "I know the escape (nissaraṇa) beyond that." Remember that word. "I have seen the escape from those views. Therefore, I do not grasp anything."

After he said this, the sutta continues as follows: Having said this, those sectarians and wanderers, unable to give an answer, sat down in silence, downcast. Anāthapiṇḍika the Householder departed and told this incident to the Buddha. "I went to the monastery of the wanderers and they asked me these words, and I answered them in this manner." Then the Buddha said: "Sadhu, sadhu, householder! Very well, very well, householder! In this way, from time to time, you should refute those foolish men. You have presented such an argument." Having said so, after Anāthapiṇḍika the Householder departed, the Buddha addressed the Bhikkhus and said: "Bhikkhus, even a monk of a hundred rains (vassa) should answer sectarians in the very same way Anāthapiṇḍika the Householder did." This is something extraordinary. Although Anāthapiṇḍika the Householder understood it, you might not fully understand the point here. Let us relate that point to the verse. The verse says:

Yāni ca tīṇi yāni ca saṭṭhi, samaṇappavādasitāni bhūripaññā,

saññānisitāni osaraṇāni, vineyya oghantamagā.

That is, samaṇappavāda means the assertions among recluses. It speaks of sixty-three assertions. Regarding them, it says saññā-akkara-saññā-nisitāni—resting on perceptions and letters, as we briefly mentioned earlier. Next, osaraṇāni—they pull inwards. If nissaraṇa means escape, departure, then osaraṇa (resort/inflow) means pulling towards this side. Osaraṇa is an extraordinary word. Sabhiya Paribrājaka uses it to mean things that drag one down into the world, not things that lead to escape. Therefore, osaraṇāni vineyya oghantamagā—having abandoned all those sixty-three, he went to the end of the flood (ogha-anta). We mentioned the fourfold flood—crossing over the swift currents of saṁsāra means crossing over the four currents of sensual desire (kāma), becoming / existence (bhava), views (diṭṭhi), and ignorance (avijjā). Through that crossing over, the Buddha transcended all sixty-three assertions of recluses. To clarify this point further, in the Brahmajāla Sutta, the Buddha, after explaining the sixty-two views, does not grasp even that analysis of the sixty-two. Why? Because anupādā vimutto tathāgato—the Tathāgata, without grasping / holding / fuel (upādāna), saw the nature of those views with wisdom, but does not grasp them. He does not grasp even that vision, even that understanding. Instead, anupādā vimutto—he is liberated through non-grasping. Similarly, in another place, Vacchagotta Paribrājaka asks the Buddha: "Master Gotama, do you have any standpoints of views (diṭṭhigata)?" The Buddha answers: "Standpoint of views (diṭṭhigata), Vaccha, is something that the Tathāgata has put away (apanītaṁ etaṁ tathāgata-ssa)." For what reason? Because the Tathāgata has seen with wisdom. What has he seen? A process (practical path): "Such is form, such the arising of form, such its passing away; such is feeling / sensation (vedanā), such the arising of feeling / sensation, such its passing away; such are preparations / Preparations / volitional activity (saṅkhāra), such the arising of preparations / Preparations / volitional activity, such their passing away; such is consciousness (viññāṇa), such the arising of consciousness, such its passing away." "I have seen with wisdom the arising and passing away of the five aggregates of grasping / holding / fuel (pañcupādānakkhandha). But I do not grasp even that vision. I do not cling to it. Instead, having seen it with wisdom, having abandoned all those sabba-maññita-mathita—all those fabrications of the mind, anupādā vimutto—I am liberated through non-grasping."

This matter might raise a question for someone: "Do we have to abandon even Right View (sammā-diṭṭhi)?" That is where the question lies. We are holding onto Right View as something great. If the sixty-third view, as we said, is Right View, then even that must be abandoned. If it is abandoned, what happens? If even that is abandoned, our 'Buddhism' is gone. This is where we must recall the Alagaddūpama Sutta (The Simile of the Snake Sutta). You may know from our sermons and books that the uniqueness of that sutta lies in the simile of the raft (kulla) and the simile of the water-snake (alagadda). There are two special similes. Regarding the simile of the raft, the Buddha declared, not only in the Alagaddūpama Sutta but also afterwards, reminding the Bhikkhus: "I have taught this Dhamma for the purpose of crossing over, not for the purpose of grasping."

Let us dismantle the raft in that story of the raft. What is there when you dismantle it? There may be branches of trees on this shore, creepers, etc. These are gathered to make the raft. For what was this made? To hold onto? To decorate? No, isn't it? It is solely for crossing over. How does one cross over? Why was a raft mentioned instead of a ship? hatthehi ca pādehi ca vāyamamāno—using the raft as support, one must make an effort with hands and feet to cross over with this raft. After crossing over, one does not carry the raft on one's shoulders. Why? Because the raft has no value once one has crossed over. What does this show us? Right View (sammā-diṭṭhi) is solely, solely for the purpose of crossing over, not for the purpose of grasping. If, like other things, we grasp even that, what are we grasping? Those very perceptions and letters. We too are doing exactly what those others did. It is very difficult to understand this. Now, the opposite has happened. Whichever it may be, through our grasping, we say, "This alone is the truth (idam eva saccaṁ)." We can show another reason for this.

We have mentioned in some of our sermons a term that appears in several places: dvayatatā (duality). A term that has been suppressed/forgotten in our tradition—the talk about duality. The Buddha is one who has transcended this duality. That is why the Buddha says here: puññapāpa-pahīna—one who has abandoned both merit and demerit. It is said in many other places in this manner. There is a Dhammapada verse: Yassa pāraṁ apāraṁ vā, pārāpāraṁ na vijjati—speaking of Arahants and Buddhas: "For whom there is neither the far shore nor the near shore, nor both the far and the near shore." This is the state of being freed from duality. This is a very deep matter. Because through crossing over, in the end, one does not grasp even the knowledge that helped one to cross over: anupādā vimutto. That is why a distinction is shown here. Here, the term used is samaṇappavāda (assertions of recluses), not even the word diṭṭhi (view). That is why we say to make Right View straight/upright. Right View actually arises in a person at the stage of the Path (magga). Until then, there is only a vocabulary. True, it has a practical value. It is made of words and letters in common usage, just as the raft was made of trees and branches. One must use Right View like the raft, solely for crossing over, not for grasping. This is the idea. At the same time, we have the word used by Sabhiya the wanderer: osaraṇāni—if we grasp them, we will be dragged back to this side. Escape and departure lie in abandoning (nissaraṇa). In this, a wonderful aspect of the Dhamma is revealed. That is why we said Anāthapiṇḍika the Householder was no ordinary person. From one perspective, it might seem like a small thing. The true vision of the Path of Stream-entry (sotāpatti-magga-ñāṇa). As you say: diṭṭhiñca anupagamma, sīlavā dassanena sampanno—"not clinging to views, but endowed with vision." That is why Anāthapiṇḍika spoke without fear. Look at what a wonderful praise the Buddha gave to Anāthapiṇḍika! Why can't you think of going in that direction? Look at how wise his way of answering was. He told the others to state their views. After they stated them, he analyzed them. All of them are generated by unwise attention (ayoniso manasikāra). They are conditioned/prepared (saṅkhata) things made by the mind. Every one of them is impermanent / inconstant (anicca). If you grasp them, you are grasping what is impermanent. If it is impermanent, it is suffering / unsatisfactoriness / stress (dukkha). If it is suffering, and you grasp it, you cannot go beyond. That is the deep meaning spoken of there. Instead, Anāthapiṇḍika said in the end: "I see an escape (nissaraṇa) beyond that." That escape is the escape that comes after crossing the flood (ogha-taraṇa) shown by the Buddha. There are many words related to that escape (nissaraṇa) in the Dhammapada, etc., which people are sometimes unable to understand, showing liberation from duality.

Someone might doubt: "How can we abandon both merit and demerit?" Here, this does not mean dismantling the raft while still on this shore. Such dismantling is what is described in the second simile of the Alagaddūpama Sutta, the simile of the water-snake. If you grasp a water-snake by its tail, the snake will bite you. Theorizers grasp it in that way. "The Buddha has said to abandon merit and demerit; saṁsāra grows through performing merit and demerit." That is going to the other extreme. A stage comes when these must be abandoned. In this regard, we have often used a simile from the Visuddhimagga. While a stream is flowing rapidly, a person who wishes to cross it has a method. He grasps a creeper hanging from a tree on this side and swings. Having swung back and forth, as soon as he reaches the other side, he lets go of the creeper. If he does not let go of the creeper, he will swing back to this side, won't he? That creeper is what is called preparations / Preparations / volitional activity (saṅkhāra). The practitioner (yogāvacara) looks at all these as preparations / Preparations / volitional activity (saṅkhāra). Preparations / Preparations / volitional activity are impermanent / inconstant (anicca). If they are impermanent, they are suffering / unsatisfactoriness / stress (dukkha). If they are suffering, they are not-self / non-self / unsubstantial (anattā). Isn't that what the Buddha declares? He tells Vacchagotta Paribrājaka when explaining the five aggregates of grasping / holding / fuel (pañcupādānakkhandha): "I have seen with wisdom: n'etaṁ mama, n'eso ham asmi, na me so attā—'This is not mine, this I am not, this is not my self.'" But I do not grasp even that view, because I have crossed over using it as support. He says he has reached the state of non-grasping (anupādā vimutto). If one at least directs the mind to the fact that there are two extremes. Those who do not train in this path at all, without even expecting them, take the word of the Buddha wrongly and go to the other extreme. Like grasping the snake by its tail. They try to dismantle the raft and finish the job even before crossing over. But on the other hand, there are those who carry the raft on their shoulders. Now, most of the people among us are of this kind. They carry the raft back and forth on this very shore. They do not even have the hope of crossing over. And that raft is now very large, getting larger and larger. They carry it back and forth. That is why it is said in the Dhammapada:

Appakā te manussesu, ye janā pāragāmino, athāyaṁ itarā pajā, tīram evānudhāvati.

"Few are those among men who go to the far shore; the rest of mankind only run up and down this shore."

Such is the case here. Therefore, we say all this not to make you take it as a view (diṭṭhi), but to awaken you. To keep you awake. What is our practice for? As we always say, learning (pariyatti) is for practice (paṭipatti). Practice (paṭipatti) is for penetration (paṭivedha). Next, even if we look at the sequence of purification, in the Rathavinīta Sutta etc., which we showed on a previous occasion, this entire True Dhamma is encompassed.

A successful sermon—it may not be successful, but a rich sermon can be delivered by presenting a single word. What is that word? yāvadeva—the meaning of this word, friends, is "solely/merely/just for." Now, I do not know if that word is used in common parlance. The word yāvadeva means "solely for this purpose." That is what we showed in the Rathavinīta Sutta, etc., through various similes of the relay chariot. In the end, when you look at it, there is no winner. One is for the sake of another, one is for the sake of another. King Kosala, in his urgent journey from Sāvatthi to Sāketa, had chariots prepared; because the horses were tired, after running one stage, he would leave that chariot and mount another. Leaving that, he would mount the third. Going on in this manner, after reaching Sāketa, if someone asked: "Great King, how did you come?" he would have to tell the whole story. Not by the first, nor by the second, nor by the third. But using them as support, and not without them either. Such a wonderful state exists in this Dhamma. That indeed is the Middle Path (majjhimā paṭipadā). Because the world exists in the dual views of "it is" (atthi) and "it is not" (natthi). All views exist within these two. Therefore, one must purify one's view. One purifies it not by going down into the river like the brahmins, but by engaging in this. Through that engagement, when at some stage a practitioner (yogāvacara) uses that Buddha-teaching on the three characteristics (tilakkhaṇa) and reaches the destined state, it becomes a direct vision (dassana), through the opanayika (leading-onwards) quality of the Dhamma; on such occasions, they see through an inner light, or rather, through penetration. That is what is called the Dhamma-eye (dhamma-cakkhu).

Anāthapiṇḍika the Householder was one in whom that Dhamma-eye had arisen. That is why he spoke without fear. "I do not take even this as a view. I do not take even the understanding of n'etaṁ mama, n'eso ham asmi, na me so attā as a view. I know the escape (nissaraṇa) beyond that," he said. That is the crossing over the fourfold flood. How beautifully this was presented to Sabhiya the wanderer for the first time will be understood if the entire sutta is read carefully. By means of the four analytical knowledges (catu-paṭisambhidā), the Buddha wonderfully used each word existing in that society as a vehicle to present his Dhamma. Using its meaning (attha), text/nature (dhamma), linguistic expression (nirutti), and the analytical response (paṭibhāna) that followed. According to this, we must reflect. When we say Right View (sammā-diṭṭhi), many people think of something connected with books, or rather, that word. They are not unnecessary. They are helpful to the one who is striving to cross over with them. For others, it is like grasping the snake by its tail. They reject them at the very beginning, dismantle the raft, and meet with disaster. One must understand this Middle Path well. Today's sermon will help in that. Since this is a long sutta, we cannot translate each and every part. We have only briefly highlighted them. In this light, one must understand that the four analytical knowledges (catu-paṭisambhidā)—just as for a Buddha, Venerable Sāriputta says that the four analytical knowledges arose in him two weeks after his higher ordination. It is mentioned in the Dhamma in this manner. Those who have the ability to penetrate language and explain things in a convincing manner through the four analytical knowledges. It is mentioned that those with such ability attain that state in no long time. For all this, what helps is not reciting the Dhamma like parrots. Reflecting on them by means of such deep suttas, and trying to understand them by applying the insight (vipassanā) gained through the power of tranquility (samatha), a stage comes when even the raft can be abandoned—that indeed is the deepest part of this Dhamma. This is wonderfully shown in various places in the Sutta Nipāta. Just as abandoning both the far shore and the near shore, abandon both merit and demerit. Abandon both black and white. That talk is meant to bring out this point. A wonderful thing that is not found in any other philosophy is found here within the sixty-third assertion of recluses. Not for the purpose of grasping / holding / fuel (upādāna), but for the purpose of crossing over.

I believe you understand these to some extent. In this light, we must reflect on the noble conduct and the noble character of Sabhiya the wanderer, and the depth of the verses spoken by the Buddha in reply. In our life as practitioners (yogāvacara), whether lay or ordained, we must not merely memorize the theoretical side (pariyatti). We must understand them. Penetrating it deeply and comparing it with our own direct experience in daily life. This is nothing foreign. Within this very fathom-long body, endowed with perception (saññā) and mind, lie the world, the origin of the world, the cessation of the world, and the path leading to the cessation of the world, as the Buddha has declared. Therefore, one does not need to go far. Search for these. Having scrutinized them with wisdom within one's own five aggregates, seeing their impermanent / inconstant (anicca) nature: if something is impermanent / inconstant (anicca), it is suffering / unsatisfactoriness / stress (dukkha); if it is suffering / unsatisfactoriness / stress (dukkha), there is nothing to be taken as "mine"—it is through this line of thought, by cultivating insight (vipassanā), that it becomes a direct vision (dassana). Therefore, by means of these few words, may you shape your lives as practitioners (yogāvacara), and may you be able to end this suffering / unsatisfactoriness / stress (dukkha) of saṁsāra as quickly as possible and cross over to the noble, deathless Nibbāna. Furthermore, from Avīci to Akaniṭṭha, whatever beings wish to rejoice in this merit of sharing and hearing the Dhamma, through that rejoicing, may they be comforted by the noble, deathless Nibbāna through a Bodhi of their aspiration. With these aspirations, recite these verses.

From:

heragāthā (Khuddaka Nikāya) of the Pali Canon, specifically from the verses of Elder Jenta (Jentattheragāthā, Thag 1.111).

Dear Listeners,

The Buddha has praised the perception of the impermanent (anicca-saññā) as a meditation capable of uprooting all defilements. Developing the perception of the impermanent paves the way to understanding the Three Characteristics of existence: the impermanent (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and not-self/non-self (anattā). Today, we have chosen as our theme a joyful utterance (udāna) of a certain Arahant who attained Arahantship by constantly developing the perception of the impermanent. During the time of the Buddha, Jenta, the son of a regional king in the Magadha country, was inclined toward the going-forth even in his youth due to the power of his past merit; however, a doubt (vicikicchā) arose in his mind. The going-forth is extremely difficult. Dwelling in the household life is equally arduous. Realizing this Nibbāna is also a very deep matter; the Dhamma is profound. On the other hand, earning wealth while living in the household life is also difficult. Spending some time in hesitation, wondering what he should do, he eventually came to meet the Buddha, listened to the Dhamma, developed a certain degree of faith (saddhā), and went forth. Although he went forth, it appears that for a certain period of time, such hesitant thoughts (vitakka) continued to dominate his mind. Nevertheless, putting forth great effort, he developed the perception of the impermanent as his meditation, and through that meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna), he attained Arahantship. After becoming an Arahant, remembering the hesitation that had been in his mind, he joyfully made this utterance of joy with great delight. That verse is the one we have presented as our theme.

“Duppabbajjaṁ me duradhivāsā gehā” — Going-forth is extremely difficult for me, and dwelling in the household life is equally arduous. “Dhammo (gambhīro) duradhigamo” — the Dhamma is profound and difficult to penetrate. Acquiring wealth and material resources is also difficult. “Kicchā vutti no itarītareneva” — after going forth, one has to utilize the four requisites in the spirit of contentment with whatever is received (yathālābhasantosa). When going on almsround (piṇḍapāta), on some days one receives little, and on other days one receives much. On some days it is coarse; on other days it is delicious. It is one of the two. This is how the going-forth is. Therefore, “kicchā vutti no itarītareneva” — our livelihood in this going-forth is also very difficult. But conquering all those thoughts, in the end, that Venerable One states: “Yuttaṁ cintetuṁ satatam-aniccataṁ” — "It is indeed proper to constantly contemplate this impermanence (aniccata)." Because he saw its benefits, this is briefly what is narrated in this story.

With this as our starting point, let us try to bring out some Dhamma points that the Buddha declared concerning the Dhamma of impermanence (aniccata). Indeed, there is a certain passage wherein the Buddha addressed the Saṅgha on one occasion, declaring the powerful strength of this perception of the impermanent. If we express it in Sinhala: "Monks, the perception of the impermanent, when developed and cultivated frequently, brings to an end all sensual lust (kāmarāga). It brings to an end all lust for form (rūparāga). It brings to an end all lust for existence (bhavarāga). It brings to an end all ignorance (avijjā). It brings to an end and uproots all conceit of 'I am' (asmi-māna)." Having declared the strength and benefits of the perception of the impermanent in this manner on that occasion, he addressed the Saṅgha and further explained how the perception of the impermanent is to be developed to yield such great benefits. Generally, where the meditation on the perception of the impermanent is shown, you devotees might have seen, especially in discourses like the Girimānanda Sutta, where ten perceptions are mentioned. When listing those ten meditation subjects in the Girimānanda Sutta, the perception of the impermanent is placed right at the beginning. So here too, the Buddha declared that the Saṅgha could attain these benefits by developing the contemplation of the impermanent regarding the five aggregates of grasping/holding (pañcupādānakkhandha).

These five heaps—form (rūpa), feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), preparations/volitional activity (saṅkhāra), and consciousness (viññāṇa)—are what you devotees have heard of as the five aggregates of grasping/holding (pañcupādānakkhandha). Upādāna means grasping or holding on. What the Buddha has shown is the constant contemplation of the impermanence of these five heaps that are held onto. The manner of this contemplation is also shown in some places in this way. Here too, he declares to the monks: "Iti rūpaṁ, iti rūpassa samudayo, iti rūpassa atthangamo"—"such is form, such the arising of form, such the passing away of form." In the same way, "such is feeling (vedanā), such the arising of feeling, such the passing away of feeling," and likewise for perception (saññā), preparations (saṅkhāra), and consciousness (viññāṇa). The Buddha declared that a practitioner (yogāvacara) must constantly contemplate impermanence in whatever way these arise in the mind. These five heaps are indeed the five heaps that we embrace, which we declare as 'I' and 'mine'.

Why these are called "heaps" (or aggregates) is also analyzed. It is declared in the Buddha's own words. They are analyzed in eleven ways. Each of these heaps can be past, future, or present—there are three right there. It could be a past form that comes to mind, a future form, or a present form. Likewise, internal (ajjhatta) or external (bahiddhā)—it could be a form regarding oneself, or a form regarding another. Sometimes, a form regarding oneself is compared with a form regarding another: "I am more beautiful than them," or "uglier," and so on. These too are things grasped. Thus: past, future, present; internal, external; further, gross or subtle; inferior or superior; and finally, far or near. This completes the eleven-fold classification. Past, future, present, internal, external, gross, subtle, inferior, superior, far, and near—this is the eleven-fold way the Buddha's word analyzes them. Thus, regarding form, feeling, and so on, these are the heaps. We live with these heaps, we carry them on our shoulders, they constantly flow into our minds—either as past things, past forms, future forms, and so on. Now, all these five heaps are described in the Dhamma as the prepared/conditioned (saṅkhata)—as things that have been prepared or constructed.

What is the nature of these prepared/constructed things? They appear to us as permanent (nicca); through that very preparation, we try to establish ourselves in them as something stable. This is why they are called saṅkhata. Though they are preparations (saṅkhāra), they are prepared (saṅkhata). Saṅkhata means prepared or constructed things. Now, the Buddha points out three characteristics of the prepared. "Monks, there are three characteristics of the prepared. What are the three characteristics? In every prepared thing, an arising is discerned: 'uppādo paññāyati'. Likewise, a passing away is discerned: 'vayo paññāyati'. An arising is discerned, a passing away is discerned. Thirdly, it is said: 'ṭhitassa aññathattaṁ paññāyati'. Even regarding that which we assumed to be stable or static (ṭhiti), an alteration—a change into something other—is discerned." So the Buddha is pointing out the actual state of arising and passing away.

But within the prepared (saṅkhata), we construct a state called "existence" or "stability" (ṭhiti). We construct a "present moment". What is now being shown is that this present moment is constantly changing. Thus, in true insight (vipassanā), rather than past or future preparations (saṅkhāra), it is the present preparations that are taken as the object in intense insight. The Buddha declared on one occasion: "Monks, past forms and future forms are impermanent (anicca). What need is there to speak of present forms?" He reminds us that even this "present" which we think of as so significant is likewise impermanent. It also changes, being subject to alteration (aññathābhāvī). Yet, it is this very nature of alteration that the world grasps onto as existence (bhava) and grasping/holding (upādāna), trying to establish an existence there. It is within that mental state that various kinds of sorrow (soka), lamentation (parideva), suffering (dukkha), and despair (domanassa) arise due to these five aggregates. Why? Because when that foundation we constructed decays, cracks, and collapses—forgetting that it collapses without our knowledge—when we stand upon it, we fall down with its collapse. Those are the characteristics of the prepared (saṅkhata). Some people present uppāda, ṭhiti, and bhaṅga (arising, static phase, dissolution) as equivalent. But the important point the Buddha brings out here is that even that which we assumed to be static (ṭhiti) is constantly changing. Because of this,

In discourses like the Bhaddekaratta Sutta, it is shown that generally, worldly beings have a longing for the past. "Ah, if only that past thing were still there, how good it would be!" They also look forward to the future. Thus, the Buddha declared: "Yad-atītaṁ pahīnaṁ"—the past is abandoned, what is gone is gone; "Appattañ-ca anāgataṁ"—the future has not yet arrived. Therefore, longing for the past is futile. Since future things have not yet arrived, taking delight in them is also futile. Next, "Paccuppannañ-ca yo dhammaṁ tattha tattha vipassati"—one should see the present phenomenon right there, in each place. One should see it right there through insight (vipassanā). To see it right there through insight means to see those preparations (saṅkhāra) that construct the prepared (saṅkhata). The things that help to construct a prepared thing (saṅkhata) are called preparations (saṅkhāra). No matter how often we hear these words, their meaning is sometimes not clear. These saṅkhāra mean preparations or constructions. It is through these preparations that a prepared/constructed thing is made.

But what lies at the root of these preparations/constructions? Ignorance (avijjā). You devotees have heard the phrase "avijjā-paccayā saṅkhārā" (dependent on ignorance, preparations arise) in discourses on Dependent Arising (paṭicca-samuppāda). The most fundamental preparation pointed out by the Buddha is this body we grasp onto, which is prepared/constructed through in-breathing and out-breathing (assāsa-passāsa). It was because they could not understand even its impermanence (aniccata) that ancient Hindu yogis took this breath as a "life-force" (prāṇa) or soul (ātman). What a foolish thing to do! This life-force, which is in-breathing and out-breathing, is constantly changing; even within a single breath, the insight-practitioner perceives it in waves, realizing that there is a vast amount within a single inhalation. Yet, the ordinary world grasps tightly onto those preparations (saṅkhāra). Thus, the body is prepared/constructed by this in-breathing and out-breathing. This is the primary preparation. Of course, food, drink, and so forth also play a part. Similarly, speech—the words we speak—we take very seriously, as we must in ordinary life. But its true nature is shown to be prepared/constructed by thought-conception and discursive thinking (vitakka-vicāra), which is a stream of thoughts within the mind. That too is constantly changing. It is from those preparations (saṅkhāra) that speech is prepared. Next is this mind which we think of as so colorful and complex, which we take so seriously. It is prepared/constructed by perception (saññā) and feeling (vedanā). Because of this, perception and feeling are called mental preparations (citta-saṅkhāra). Thus, what do these preparations—bodily preparation (kāya-saṅkhāra), verbal preparation (vacī-saṅkhāra), and mental preparation (citta-saṅkhāra)—do through these constructive processes? What they do is what comes next in Dependent Arising (paṭicca-samuppāda): consciousness (viññāṇa) and Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa).

The Buddha has pointed out this consciousness (viññāṇa) as an illusion (māyā). This consciousness always co-exists with Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). Consciousness grasps an object, and the Buddha presents that grasped object as Name-and-Form. Regarding this Name-and-Form, no matter how much we think about it, we cannot understand form on its own in that way. Name (nāma) also assists in it. The mind cannot grasp a form in isolation; Name and Form always go together. Therefore, the object that comes to the mind is designated as 'Name-and-Form'; otherwise, the Buddha could have called it 'mind-form' (citta-rūpa). Now, the ordinary world thinks that 'mind' and 'form' exist as two separate things. Physical scientists also think that form exists separately on its own. If so, the Buddha could have called it 'mind-form' (citta-rūpa) or 'mental-form' (mano-rūpa). Why did he call it 'Name-and-Form' instead? It is because form can only be recognized through the naming (nāma) that is given to it. And it is through the resistance or impingement (paṭigha) presented by form that the concept of impingement comes to the Name (nāma). This relationship is shown by a well-known simile accepted in Buddhist thought since ancient times, which you devotees may have heard—the journey of a blind man who can walk and a lame man who can see. The lame man climbs onto the back of the blind man and shows the way. Similarly, Name can see but cannot walk, while Form can walk but is blind. Everyone knows these two as Name-and-Form. Insight-practitioners identify the object that comes to the mind as Name-and-Form. Thus, contemplating these preparations (saṅkhāra) of Name-and-Form is what belongs to the insight-practitioner. Through this, the capacity to quickly see that widely assumed impermanence (aniccata) right there, is present within those very phenomena (dhamma) of Name-and-Form.

What is analyzed as Name-and-Form phenomena—specifically Name-phenomena (nāma-dhamma)—are the five phenomena: feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), intention/volition (cetanā), contact (phassa), and attention (manasikāra). You can think of them like the five fingers of a hand: feeling, perception, volition, contact, attention. Many people, not only in modern times but since the distant past, have tried to alter this classification of Name-phenomena. Some suggest putting contact (phassa) at the beginning. But the Buddha's word says: feeling, perception, volition, contact, and attention. Feeling is the first. Next are perception, volition, contact, and attention in that order. However, logically speaking, it is true that contact (phassa) occurs before feeling. But one should not move contact to the front. That is what we have to say. Contact must remain in its place. Feeling, perception, volition, contact, attention. What is the reason? Think about it for a moment. Our hand touches a hot object. After touching it, we do not think about the contact (phassa) first. We think first of the feeling (vedanā). Activity arises through feeling, and it is through feeling that those physical phenomena are identified. Primarily, although we describe it, this does not take a long time. In a split second, as soon as the hand touches the hot object, it is instantly withdrawn. Within that, there is the entire group of Name-phenomena just mentioned. Through feeling (vedanā), there arises the perception (saññā) that the hand is burning. Through perception, there arises the volition (cetanā) that the hand must be withdrawn. Next, attention (manasikāra) is directed to the burnt spot. Thus, it is through the Name-phenomena of feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), volition (cetanā), contact (phassa), and attention (manasikāra) that form is identified.

Next, as for things belonging to Form—what is called Form (rūpa)—you devotees have heard of the great primary elements (mahābhūta-dhamma), namely earth (pathavī), water (āpo), fire (tejo), and wind (vāyo). They are called "great primaries" because they cannot be identified individually; they always exist in a mixed state. But we identify them according to their characteristics. Those characteristics are what are called Name-phenomena (nāma-dhamma). That is why we said form is recognized through those Name-phenomena. What gives Name-phenomena the concept of resistance, the concept of contact, are the physical phenomena. This point is shown very deeply in this Dhamma. The Buddha divides the word contact (phassa) into two parts: designation-contact (adhivacana-samphassa) and resistance-contact (paṭigha-samphassa). "Designation" (adhivacana) refers to Name (nāma). Thus, within this contact, there is both a naming and an impingement/resistance, and they are mutually supportive. From that simile, you devotees can understand why all these points are shown in the Dhamma: it is on the day we understand the true nature of this illusion of consciousness (viññāṇa) that weariness (nibbidā) toward preparations (saṅkhāra) arises. As long as weariness toward preparations does not arise, and as long as there is attachment to preparations, the prepared (saṅkhata) continues to be constructed.

The Buddha shows this next: where is this prepared/constructed (saṅkhata) manufactured? This prepared is manufactured within the six sense-bases (saḷāyatana). In modern times, one may understand "bases" as spheres of experience, and that is fine if it helps. It is within these six sense-bases that the five aggregates of grasping/holding (pañcupādānakkhandha) are prepared, created, and produced. What are the six? Eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind. They are called the base of eye-contact (cakkhu-samphassāyatana), the base of ear-contact (sota-samphassāyatana), and finally, the base of mind-contact (mano-samphassāyatana). Why are they called bases (āyatana)? They belong to two sides; to be a base, there must be two. The eye and forms, the ear and sounds, and so on, going down to the mind and thoughts/ideas (manodhamma) that come to the mind. Although we do not list them all, you devotees can infer all six. The eye and forms, the ear and sounds, and so on. Now, the deepest point is the sixth: the mind.

The objects that come to the mind are called dhamma (phenomena/ideas). We are frequently reminded of the Dhammapada verse: "Manopubbaṅgamā dhammā, manoseṭṭhā manomayā". According to this verse spoken by the Buddha, regarding these dhamma or "things"—we in the world think that things exist separately on their own. But what is the actual state of affairs? The mind precedes these "things". Furthermore, between the two, the mind is supreme. Finally, it says manomayā—these things are made of the mind. That is what is difficult for the world to accept. It is a very difficult state to accept: that these things in front of us are prepared/constructed by the mind. It is a very profound matter.

So to clarify this point and the impermanence (aniccata) in it, the Buddha impresses this perception of the impermanent (anicca-saññā) upon the minds of the Saṅgha in a very powerful discourse, the Dvaya Sutta. He presents it in a wonderful way. The theme of that discourse is Dvayaṁ—meaning 'dyad' or 'pair', concerning 'two'. "Monks, consciousness (viññāṇa) arises dependent on a dyad." We think that consciousness exists independently on its own. But consciousness arises dependent on a dyad. What is the dyad? The eye and form; thus, eye-consciousness arises dependent on the eye and form. Ear-consciousness arises dependent on the ear and sound. Infer in this way. Finally, mind-consciousness arises dependent on the mind and mind-objects (dhamma). Apart from this, there is no such thing as consciousness (viññāṇa) on its own. Thus, in accordance with the Dhamma, there are six types of consciousness. As we mentioned earlier, there is a rapid, reciprocal conditioning (aññamañña-paccayatā) or mutual causal relationship between consciousness (viññāṇa) and Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). Thus, what is called consciousness (viññāṇa) is those six. Eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind. How does the Buddha demonstrate the impermanence (aniccata) of each of those types of consciousness? Consciousness arises dependent on a dyad, such as the eye and form. Then he tells the Saṅgha: "Monks, the eye is impermanent (anicca), subject to change, subject to alteration. Form is also like that; impermanent, subject to change, subject to alteration." In all of these, the word cala (unstable/moving) is used. Even in modern times, we speak of movement/oscillation (calanaya). The eye, form, and everything are in constant motion. They are constantly moving. They are constantly wearing away. "Calā ca eva vayā ca, aniccā vipariṇāmino"—they undergo change/transformation, and they undergo alteration (aññathābhāvī). This is said to impress it upon the mind. Thus, the eye is impermanent (anicca), constantly trembling and changing. Forms are also like that. Next, he says that the consciousness (viññāṇa) that arises from the coming together of the eye and form is also impermanent and subject to change.

Then the Buddha asks the Saṅgha a question: "Monks, how could consciousness (viññāṇa), which arises from the coming together of two impermanent things, be permanent?" He asks this. Thus, that eye-consciousness (cakkhu-viññāṇa) is also impermanent. But he does not stop there. Next, the Buddha declares that the coming together of the eye, form, and eye-consciousness is contact (phassa). The meeting of these three—the eye, form, and the eye-consciousness arising from them—is the moment of contact. That eye-contact (cakkhu-samphassa) is also impermanent. It also changes. It also undergoes alteration. There too, the Buddha asks: if eye-contact arose dependent on certain causes and conditions (hetu-paccaya), those causes and conditions are also impermanent and subject to change. Then he asks, how can that which depends on changing causes and conditions be permanent? In this manner, the Buddha attempts to impress upon minds the impermanence of every single aspect of these six sense-bases (saḷāyatana). Thus, the insight-practitioner realizes this truth of impermanence through constant perception of the impermanent (anicca-saññā) and by applying attention (manasikāra) to those Name-phenomena. When contemplation is applied more and more subtly, that "foundation"—that state of stability (ṭhiti) we assumed—becomes narrower and narrower. Indeed, the "present" is not something that can be measured. It is a squeezed state between the past and the future. If someone is asked, "What is 'now'?", can they answer? What is 'now'? One has to answer according to the context. 'Now' could sometimes refer to a long period. Sometimes, depending on the situation, it could be very narrow. Thus, for the insight-practitioner, 'now' becomes narrower and narrower as attention becomes subtler, as attention becomes stronger. Through this insight-attention—this radical attention/wise attention (yoniso manasikāra) which sees things right there—that perception of permanence (nicca-saññā) wears away. When the perception of permanence wears away, a prepared/constructed thing (saṅkhata) is not built up there. Within these few words, you devotees can understand many points relevant to insight (vipassanā).

Next, the Buddha points to the common term applied to these words about impermanence: "knowledge of things as they are" (yathābhūta-ñāṇa). On one occasion, the Buddha declares how Nibbāna emerges through these six sense-bases. Or rather, how instead of the five aggregates growing, they wear away. First, he shows how they are built up. If someone does not know the eye as it really is (yathābhūta), and does not know forms as they really are. By "as they really are," one must understand: they do not know their impermanence (aniccata). Not knowing their impermanence, disregarding their impermanence, disregarding the impermanence of the consciousness (viññāṇa) that arises dependent on the eye and form, disregarding the impermanence of the contact (phassa) that arises therefrom, disregarding the impermanence of the felt experience, feeling (vedanā), and so forth arising from that contact—if one does not know them as they really are, that person develops attachment toward them, develops craving (taṇhā), and through that arising of craving, they are built up. That anchors itself. Let us think of the form components present in that moment—say, a moment one is pleased with. Those relevant aspects of form come together and build up one's aggregate of grasping/holding for form (rūpa-upādānakkhandha). The feelings relevant to that compile together, and "I experienced such feeling on such a day, in such a situation"—thus feelings are built up. "I was one who had such a form," "I was one who had such feeling," and so on, and regarding the other aggregates too, in this way, the five aggregates of grasping/holding (pañcupādānakkhandha) are separated and constructed, flowing out from those six sense-bases (saḷāyatana). This happens by taking the six sense-bases as permanent, taking each part of the six sense-bases as permanent, due to the lack of knowledge of things as they are (yathābhūta-ñāṇa). Next, the Buddha shows the other side of this: going toward Nibbāna. So that is how the prepared (saṅkhata) is made, that is how it is built up.

He also shows how they wear away. How is that? If an insight-practitioner sees right at each point: "the eye is impermanent (anicca), it changes, it undergoes alteration, it undergoes aññathābhāva," and lives constantly with this understanding, then in that moment, those experiences wear away right then and there; they do not go and pile up. They do not pile up as grasping/holding (upādāna) or as the prepared (saṅkhata). When this becomes powerful, it is then that one can realize even that noble Nibbāna called the cessation of the six sense-bases (saḷāyatana-nirodha). The cessation of the six sense-bases is the state of the cessation of existence (bhava-nirodha). This is what is called Nibbāna. That is why the Buddha declared: "Within this very fathom-long body, I declare the world, the arising of the world, the cessation of the world, and the path leading to the cessation of the world." The Buddha points this out based on these very six sense-bases (saḷāyatana). The culmination of impermanence (aniccata) is the signless (animitta). Three things are shown as aids to Nibbāna: the signless (animitta), the desireless/uncommitted (appaṇihita), and the void/empty (suññatā). The signless (animitta) refers to the culmination of the perception of the impermanent. When the perception of the impermanent is developed to its utmost, no sign (nimitta) comes to the mind. A state arises where the mind cannot take up any sign. It is then signless (animitta). This is itself a name for Nibbāna. For that very reason, if something is impermanent,

...it is of the nature of suffering (dukkha). Where there is the nature of suffering, there is no desire. Paṇidhi means desire or aspiration. Thus, it is called the desireless/uncommitted (appaṇihita). Why did we say that by developing the perception of the impermanent (anicca-saññā), all Three Characteristics are developed? It is because it is stated in the Dhamma: "Yad-aniccaṁ taṁ dukkhaṁ, yaṁ dukkhaṁ tad-anattā"—a passage frequently mentioned in the Dhamma. Whatever is impermanent (anicca) is suffering (dukkha). If it is suffering, it cannot be a self (attā); it cannot be maintained as 'I' and 'mine'. Thus, when these Three Characteristics are developed to the highest level, when impermanence is developed to the highest, the mind goes to the signless (animitta). It is like the gateway to Nibbāna. Next, the desire called aspiration (paṇidhi) disappears because of that nature of suffering. That is called the desireless/uncommitted (appaṇihita). Next, if there is no state of self (attā), it is void/empty (suññata). Where there is a self, one grasps a "thing". Where there is no state of self, it is void. This indeed approaches the subject of voidness (suññatā).

In the past, when the Buddha preached this Dhamma, he brought up and compared various teachings and views (diṭṭhi) of the teachers of that time, polishing and highlighting this Dhamma. Today, we are compelled to speak in the same way in this Dhamma. Why is that? In this era, physical science is something that many people talk about, and to which many minds are drawn. Even nuclear physicists themselves have now realized the shortcomings in some of the fundamental hypotheses of physical science. What was the mistake they made? Instead of what we mentioned earlier from the Dhammapada verse, "Manopubbaṅgamā dhammā, manoseṭṭhā manomayā", those people thought that there was some separate thing, distinct from the mind and undetected by the mind, existing on its own. This is not just their delusion; it is an idea coming down from the past. The view that there is some truly existing substance, a reality existing permanently, has existed since ancient times. Next, that there is an "atom" as something real, some truth independent of the mind. But now, they have come to understand the Buddha's word to such an extent that those nuclear physicists themselves—even the leading ones of this recent era—say that as long as something is not measured, one cannot attribute qualities or characteristics to it as "such-and-such a thing".

Furthermore, let alone anything else, one cannot even say that something exists as long as it is not measured. What this demonstrates is—as you devotees may have heard in our previous sermons—that Nibbāna is described as "the crushing of the conceit 'I am'" (asmi-māna-samugghāta). It is according to this viewpoint of 'I am' (asmi) that these five aggregates operate. When one assumes 'I am', one measures accordingly. There is a valuable discourse in the Buddha's own words that declares this measuring. On one occasion, Ven. Ānanda explains to the Saṅgha something declared by the Buddha: a definition of the word "world" (loka). What is the "world"? "That by which one gains a perception of the world, that by which one does a measuring of the world, that is called the 'world' in this Noble Discipline." That by which one identifies the world, that by which one does a measuring of the world, is what is called the "world" in this Dispensation, according to this Noble Discipline (ariya-vinaya). With what does one measure? Here are the things with which one measures: with the eye, the ear, the nose, the tongue, the body, and finally, with the mind—with these six sense-bases. It is stated that without these measurings, there is no world. So this is the very story that these people have had to accept. Without a measurement, where there is no measuring, one cannot attribute anything to a thing; one cannot even say that it exists. Likewise, one cannot speak of any characteristic of that existing thing.

To what extent—those devotees who do science may have heard—this is called quantum physics. This is the latest branch of physical science considered the most advanced in recent times. Even the philosophers presenting quantum theory have now had to accept that where there is no observation, one cannot say that something exists. As long as there is no observation, one cannot say that something exists; that is to say, without observation, one cannot say that something exists separately on its own. One cannot say that there is a separate world independent of the mind. To what extent—some of those leading nuclear physicists say that when their observations become contradictory, when with every observation their premise that 'there is a separate thing on its own' is disproved, having nothing else to do, in the end they say: "If I had known earlier that one could not escape this quantum leap after seeing the results of these observations, I would not have laid my hands on this." Those scientists say this. Having nothing they can do, they have become perplexed. They started from the wrong end: assuming that things exist independent of the mind. They still continue to look with that idea, assuming that such a thing exists. But in the end they realize, and they are forced to say, especially regarding whether electrons exist: "If by the mere act of our looking, that electron is disturbed, how can we know its true state?" Thus, if it changes even by the mere extent of our directing the mind to it, how can we say what it is? They have had to face such a dilemma. What is the reason for this? Now, let us state the corresponding part in our Buddha-Dhamma. The Buddha has preached a discourse—since we have declared this discourse on previous occasions, it is nothing new to those devotees who have heard our sermons.

On one occasion, the Buddha said to the Saṅgha: "Monks, if other sectarians (aññatitthiyā) come and ask you such questions, what answers would you give them?" This shows that the Buddha had prepared the minds of the Saṅgha to answer when such questions arose. The Buddha says: "Other sectarians might come and ask you questions like this: 'What is the root of all things? What is the arising of all things? Where do all things originate? Toward what are all things directed?'" There are many such questions. We will shorten them according to the situation in a way relevant to this topic. Then the monks say: "We do not have the ability to answer these. May the Blessed One himself explain." Thereupon, the Buddha delivers that discourse: "If they ask so, monks, say this:

"Chandamūlakā, āvuso, sabbe dhammā"—'Friends, all things are rooted in desire/interest (chanda).' Chanda means desire or interest. Our mind is directed toward something first of all because of the desire for it. Let us take chanda as a lighter shade of craving (taṇhā). Thus, it is within a sense of purpose or need that even those scientists engage in research—it is because of chanda. They expect to analyze the atom or its components; they have a great interest in it. That chanda—all things are rooted in desire (chanda). Next, it says: "Manasikārasambhavā sabbe dhammā"—all things originate in attention (manasikāra). To express sambhava in Sinhala, it means the arising of all things; everything is met by us when our attention, our contemplation, is directed to it. That is the very point about "observation" mentioned earlier. If by our very act of observing, the thing we subject to observation changes, how can we know its true state? That is the question they ask. This demonstrates that there is nothing apart from the mind. This is manomayā! If those scientists had correctly understood these three phrases—"Manopubbaṅgamā dhammā, manoseṭṭhā manomayā"—they would not have fallen into this. They started from the wrong side, saying that "things" exist.

Next, there is another aspect: "Phassasamudayā sabbe dhammā"—all things arise from contact (phassa). What is called contact? Just now we spoke of the six sense-bases (saḷāyatana). Each of these bases is called the base of eye-contact (cakkhu-samphassa), the base of ear-contact (sota-samphassa), the base of nose-contact (ghāna-samphassa), and so forth. Both words phassa and samphassa are used. Thus, it is through these bases that contact arises, and it is from contact that a thing originates. It is by mental contacting that those things are constructed. Regarding "Manopubbaṅgamā dhammā", it is when there is mind-contact (mano-samphassa) that the thing taken as its object emerges: contact (phassa). Furthermore, the Buddha used this word contact (phassa) in the Brahmajāla Sutta to dismantle all speculative views (diṭṭhi). How did the Buddha reject even those views established by the ancient sages who, far exceeding the achievements of modern scientists, developed the mind, developed all five supernormal knowledges (pañca-abhinna) to the extent of seeing past births, and stood upon that direct experience? "That too is dependent on contact." "That too is dependent on contact." He dismantles them by that very fact. What does it mean to say that it arises dependent on contact? It is connected to the mind. It is not something correct, not the ultimate reality. That is the point. Now, to clarify these points further, later two illustrations are given, which have been frequently shown to you devotees. But before that, let us mention another thing stated by those nuclear physicists, which was referred to earlier: "If by the mere directing of our mind to something—by the mere directing of our mind toward what we intend to observe—it is disturbed, how can we know its true state?"

The best answer to that question is found in two points we previously presented as similes when explaining the phenomena of Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). One is the dog walking across a footbridge, who is deceived by his own reflection. Thinking it is another dog, if he is angry, he growls, or if he is pleased, he wags his tail. Otherwise, he keeps looking to see who is there. But that problem is resolved in this way: as we briefly mentioned, the dog thinks: "I look because it is visible." But "it is visible because I look." What happened to this dog is what happens to most people. That dog on the footbridge, going to the middle of the bridge, looks at the reflection cast in the water and thinks: "I look because it is visible." But it is visible because he looks. That "looking" is what is called observation. Now, connect those words. Through this, one can understand that regarding this Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa), even scientists are already caught up in the Name-phenomena (nāma-dhamma) within that act of looking. A separate reality cannot be seen on its own. "Manopubbaṅgamā dhammā, manoseṭṭhā manomayā."

Another simile for this was presented recently when explaining Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) phenomena, and it seems this simile has become popular with many for various reasons. What is it? We illustrated it using an ancient Greek myth. Briefly, there is an ancient myth about Narcissus, a beautiful Greek youth who had never seen his own face. While walking in the forest, as he bent down over a pond to wash his face, he mistook his own reflection for a water nymph dwelling in the water and tried to embrace her. He tried all day, and for many days, and in the end, he sacrificed his life. When Narcissus reached his hands into the water to embrace the nymph, each time he did so, the water was disturbed and rippled. Now, consider that it is through our very attention (manasikāra), through our very attempt to know what it is, that it is disturbed—this is the kind of disturbance meant. What, then, is being looked at here? It is Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). Although it is taken as a separate thing, what is constantly the object of our mind and consciousness (viññāṇa) is Name-and-Form. This is a form merely in name. It is not real form. It is not the reality (yathā). As we said, form is recognized through name because of that naming. And the concept of impingement/resistance is given to name through form. Why is it said that one cannot attribute qualities or characteristics to either of them? This too has been shown very well by the Buddha in a very profound discourse named the Mahānidāna Sutta.

A discourse showing a very profound aspect of Dependent Arising (paṭicca-samuppāda), a very profound aspect concerning the word contact (phassa), was preached step by step by the Buddha to Ven. Ānanda. We have also shown this on various occasions. Briefly, he demonstrates contact through the relationship between Name and Form, stating that without those modes, signs, and characteristics by which the group belonging to Name is designated, no concept of designation regarding physical form would be manifest. That is to say, without those Name-phenomena of feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), volition (cetanā), contact (phassa), and attention (manasikāra), no identification of physical form can be made. Next, without those physical impingements/resistances arising from earth (pathavī), water (āpo), fire (tejo), and wind (vāyo) which belong to Form, no talk of sensory contact, impingement, or experiencing regarding Name-phenomena would be manifest. These two aspects are shown. There too, those characteristics can be attributed only after the mind is applied to it. Apart from that, there is no such thing as characteristics inherent or intrinsic to them on their own. It has to be accepted that they are attributed by the mind. Regarding this point, there is a valuable discourse in the text Sutta Nipāta named the Mahāviyūha Sutta. In those days, intense debates and disputes existed in India, even more than today. The Buddha has delivered an extraordinary sermon that pacifies those debates and disputes. In it, a valuable verse is shown:

> Passaṁ naro dakkhati nāmarūpaṁ,

> Disvāna vā ñassati tānimeva;

> Kāmaṁ bahuṁ passatu appakaṁ vā,

> Na hi tena suddhiṁ kusalā vadanti.

This verse is specifically cited here because it is also relevant to the problem of those nuclear physicists mentioned earlier.

"Passaṁ naro dakkhati nāmarūpaṁ"—"A man seeing, sees only Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa)." There is nothing apart from Name-and-Form. "Disvāna vā ñassati tānimeva"—"having seen, what he knows is just that." It is nothing apart from it.

"Kāmaṁ bahuṁ passatu appakaṁ vā"—"Let him see much or little, it is of no use." "Na hi tena suddhiṁ kusalā vadanti"—"the wise do not say that purity comes by that, nor do they say it is complete." That is the story. Thus, the Buddha rejected all sixty-two speculative views (diṭṭhi) in the Brahmajāla Sutta—all views concerning both the past and the future—showing that they are dismantled through this teaching, and the Buddha concluded the Brahmajāla Sutta with an extraordinary simile.

I hope to bring that simile to the minds of you devotees on this occasion. In it, the Buddha shows why this should be called Brahmajāla (the Net of Brahma / the Supreme Net). The Buddha presents the story of this Supreme Net in this way: "Monks, suppose a skilled fisherman or a fisherman's apprentice casts a very finely woven net, with very fine mesh, over a small pond. After covering the pond containing the fish with that fine net, that fisherman knows very well that whatever fish are in it, whenever they rise to the surface, they are caught within that net. They cannot rise above the mesh; they remain trapped in the net. That is what is meant by saying any speculative view (diṭṭhi) is caught in this net." What, then, is this mesh of the net? The mesh of the net is indeed contact (phassa). That is why every speculative view in that discourse is dismantled. The Buddha dismantles all sixty-two views saying: "Tad-api phassa-paccayā, tad-api phassa-paccayā, tad-api phassa-paccayā"—"that too is dependent on contact, that too is dependent on contact, that too is dependent on contact." This is the very same story we have to say here regarding the problem of those scientists. They must realize one day that they cannot see this apart from the thing they observe. What they see is that very Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). They think they are seeing an independently existing thing there. That is why it is said: "If by the mere act of our looking to see if this electron exists, it is disturbed, how can we know its true state?" It is from the very degree of mental application—through attention (manasikāra)—that these arise. They originate from contact (phassa). That point of origin is what the Buddha brought out in the Brahmajāla Sutta. All those speculative views contact again and again through the six sense-bases (saḷāyatana): "phussa phussa paṭisaṁvedenti". Contacting through those six sense-bases, they experience feeling (vedanā) through them. Through that, they develop perceptions and cravings (taṇhā). Developing perception and craving, they rotate again in existence (bhava)—in this way, those speculative views are dismantled. Apart from contacting through the six sense-bases, they cannot know. What they see is not ultimate reality; that is what the Brahmajāla Sutta points out.

What, then, is the truth? What is the truth discovered by the Buddha? It is the very thing we mentioned earlier: the ultimate culmination of the view of not-self/non-self (anattā) is voidness (suññatā). Voidness is the truth. Worldly beings are trapped within things measured by that wedge they have driven in, called 'I am' (asmi), assuming "they exist, they exist." The Buddha showed that when that wedge of 'I am' (asmi) is pulled out, nothing remains. He declared this: "Sassato-r-iva khāyati, passato natthi kiñcanaṁ"—in an inspired verse on one occasion, the Buddha declared: "It appears as if eternal, but to one who sees (passato), there is nothing." It appears as if eternal. He points this out on another occasion: "Jānato passato natthi kiñcanaṁ"—"to one who knows and sees, there is nothing in the world." That is also a realization; there is a moment when it is directly experienced. That is exactly what the Buddha meant when he said that the cessation of the world is also right here. The arising of the world is due to craving (taṇhā); "taṇhā ponobhavikā"—it is by craving that existence (bhava) is prepared. The Buddha has declared this in various ways: the hindrance of ignorance (avijjā-nīvaraṇa) covers up the impermanence (aniccata) of these things. The glue of craving sticks them together. Within that, in the present, one assumes that "a thing exists", assuming a state of stability (ṭhiti). In that darkness of ignorance, with that force of craving called thirst, it is also described as the glue of craving. It is by gluing with that glue of craving that this existence (bhava) is constructed. It is within that constructed world that one travels further and further in this saṁsāra.

Thus, to escape from saṁsāra, the Buddha points to that true state of affairs (yathā-tatta). What is true realization? "Jānato passato natthi kiñcanaṁ". As for those names for Nibbāna we mentioned—the signless (animitta), the desireless/uncommitted (appaṇihita), and the void (suññata)—there is a place where signs disappear, desires disappear, and there is no stable self assumed as 'I' and 'mine'. That is what is called the cessation of existence (bhava-nirodha), experienced in this very life. Therefore, the liberation that humans seek—the Buddha has pointed out that speculative views (diṭṭhi) are like a headache. Regarding what those nuclear physicists declared, one nuclear physicist stated at one point: "If we had known that we could not escape this wretched quantum leap, we would not have laid our hands on this quantum theory." They say so when they are helpless. Why did he call it wretched? Because in the end, what is done in this observation is merely the expansion of saṁsāra, not the realization of reality. In reality, the Buddha points out that voidness (suññatā) comes at the end. Because each of these worlds is constructed through one's own six sense-bases (saḷāyatana). Our world is not the dog's world. Other animals construct their worlds through their six sense-bases. It is that very world that the Buddha described as suffering (dukkha); there is no satisfaction in it. There are the sufferings of birth (jāti), decay and death/aging and death (jarāmaraṇa), sickness (vyādhi), and death. If one hopes to escape from it, one has to start from that very impermanence (aniccata). If something is impermanent, one understands that it is suffering (dukkha). All these reconstructions—these preparations/constructions (saṅkhāra)—are:

> Aniccā vata saṅkhārā,

> Uppādavayadhammino;

> Uppajjitvā nirujjhanti,

> Tesaṁ vūpasamo sukho.

This is frequently heard in houses of mourning; you devotees might think of it as something inauspicious. But within it lies the entire truth. "Aniccā vata saṅkhārā"—preparations (saṅkhāra) are indeed impermanent. "Uppādavayadhammino"—they are of the nature of arising and passing away. They arise only to be destroyed. "Tesaṁ vūpasamo sukho"—the calming/stilling of those preparations is bliss. This is why you devotees have heard that Nibbāna is described as "sabbasaṅkhārasamatha"—the stilling of all preparations. When preparations are stilled, a prepared/constructed thing (saṅkhata) does not arise. When a prepared thing is not constructed, those graspings/holdings (upādāna) called the five aggregates of grasping/holding are not built up. The Buddha declared that this state can be realized in this very life. This is what is called "extinguishment without grasping/holding" (*anupādā-pariNibbāna. When all that is let go, the mind is liberated; it is not some strange thing, not something to be grasped—that mind. If within this grasping/holding (upādāna), there are birth (jāti), decay and death/aging and death (jarāmaraṇa), sickness, and death, and they are responsible for them, then the moment of letting go of this is the bliss of liberation. The understanding within that is indeed "Jānato passato natthi kiñcanaṁ"—to one who sees, there is actually nothing here. When that knowledge and vision (ñāṇadassana) is developed to the highest level, that conjuring of a existence (bhava) by craving (taṇhā)—the Buddha has on some occasions compared craving to a seamstress (sibbānī). Think of how a stitch is made, how a sewing machine makes a stitch. Each time the needle goes down, a thread passes underneath and forms a knot. That is "taṇhā-paccayā upādānaṁ"—dependent on craving, grasping/holding arises; because of grasping/holding, a existence (bhava) is woven. The Buddha has shown this in a verse:

> Yo ubhantena viditvā,

> Majjhe mantā na lippati;

> Taṁ brūmi mahāpurisoti,

> So'dha sibbanimaccagā.

The Buddha declares an extraordinary verse: "He who, having understood both ends, does not cling to the middle with wisdom (mantā)—him I call a Great Man; he has escaped from that seamstress (sewing work) here."

The Buddha declares an extraordinary verse. One who, having correctly understood both ends (ubhante), does not cling to the middle with wisdom (mantā)—"taṁ brūmi mahāpurisoti"—"him I call a Great Man." "So'dha sibbanimaccagā"—that person has escaped from that seamstress (sewing work) here. He went beyond the seamstress; he was not caught by the seamstress. Now, the Buddha shows how the ordinary world is caught by the seamstress. What are these two ends, and what is the middle? One end is contact (phassa). The second end is the arising of contact (phassa-samudaya). In the middle is the cessation of contact (phassa-nirodha).

What, then, does this seamstress do? Gluing with the glue of craving (taṇhā), she glues together, disregarding the cessation (nirodha) in the middle. With every contact, there is a cessation. But because of craving, forgetting that cessation, we collect those contacts together and construct a "thing". Regarding this, there is a passage about the insight-practitioner making attention subtle: "phussa phussa vayaṁ passaṁ, evaṁ virajjati". "Phussa phussa vayaṁ passaṁ" means seeing the passing away of contact with each and every contact, and in this way, one becomes dispassionate, developing non-attachment. As long as one does not see cessation, gluing with that glue of craving, one weaves a existence (bhava). That is the stitch of becoming (bhava-sibbanī). What, then, does that Great Man do? He sees cessation (nirodha). That is why the Buddha declares that both the beings in the form realms and the beings in the formless realms return to existence again and again because they do not know cessation (nirodha). You devotees may have heard that craving is described as "taṇhā ponobhavikā"—it creates renewed existence. It links existence to existence. Forgetting cessation, through craving, one brings out contact and the arising of contact, generating another contact, while disregarding the cessation of that contact. In this very way, what the Buddha does is to bring out that cessation which the world had forgotten. That cessation is itself called Nibbāna. That noble state, ending in the cessation of the six sense-bases (saḷāyatana-nirodha), is what the Buddha brought out. This is not only for those times. This is not only for the recluses and brahmins of that day. Even today's philosophers and scientists can learn something from it. Therefore, you devotees must take this matter of the perception of the impermanent (anicca-saññā) deeply to heart. Although we preach this much about meditation, some minds are drawn to that scientific physical philosophy, taking it as the latest and most modern philosophy. Those who have got lost within it as a philosophy are not ordinary people; the purpose of saying these words was to show that nuclear physicists are among them. According to these most modern concepts and discoveries, we ultimately return once again to that very Dhammapada passage declared by the Buddha: "Manopubbaṅgamā dhammā, manoseṭṭhā manomayā".

Therefore, today, I hope you devotees have gathered at least some small fragment regarding that powerful perception of the impermanent (anicca-saññā) which, as mentioned earlier, is capable of destroying the entire mass of defilements, and which supports insight (vipassanā). May the virtue practiced, the meditation cultivated, and this Dhamma sermon heard by you devotees today support you to escape from this world situated within this fathom-long body—from this entire existence (bhava) which brings the suffering of birth (jāti), decay and death/aging and death (jarāmaraṇa), and so forth—and may this Dhamma sermon support you to realize that noble state of Nibbāna through the penetration of the paths and fruits of Stream-entry (sotāpatti), Once-returning (sakadāgāmitā), Non-returning (anāgāmitā), and Arahantship. Let us aspire that whatever beings from Avīci to Akaniṭṭha wish to rejoice in the merit of this Dhamma preaching and Dhamma hearing, may they realize those highest goals expected through that rejoicing. May everyone, through the power of this merit, attain the supreme, deathless, great Nibbāna. Let us share the merit by reciting these verses.

Theragāthā, Rāhulattheragāthā

Dear Listeners,

In this Dispensation, Ven. Rāhula, who attained the foremost position among the monks who love the training, was known among the Sangha by the name "Rāhula Bhadra" (Rāhula the Fortunate / Rāhula the Good). That epithet "Bhadra"—meaning "good" or "fortunate"—indicates that he was extremely dear and pleasing to the Sangha. He was not so dear and pleasing to the Sangha merely because he was the son of the Buddha, but also due to his good qualities, his obedient, humble, and disciplined behavior. Indeed, the character of Rāhula is a supreme ideal of obedience. He was a son of the Buddha in the truest sense of the word. The verses from the Theragāthā Pāli that we have taken as our theme today are accepted as the joyous utterances (udāna) expressed by Ven. Rāhula after he attained Arahantship. In these verses too, it is mentioned that he was known by this name, "Rāhula Bhadra."

"Ubayen'eva sampanno, Rāhulo Bhaddo'ti maṃ vidū" — "Endowed with both, they know me as Rāhula Bhadra." Because of two reasons, they know me by the name Rāhula Bhadra:

"Yañca'mhi putto Buddhassa, yañca dhammesu cakkhumā" — "In that I am the son of the Buddha, and that I have the eye (of wisdom) regarding the Dhammas." One reason is that I am the son of the Buddha. The other reason is that I possess the Dhamma-eye, which has the power of understanding the Dhammas.

"Yañca me āsavā khīṇā, yañca natthi punabbhavo" — "And that my taints (āsavas) are destroyed, and that there is no more renewed existence (punabbhava)." Because my taints are destroyed, and because there is no renewed becoming (bhava) for me,

"Arahā dakkhiṇeyyo'mhi, tevijjo amataddaso" — "I am an Arahant, worthy of offerings, possessed of the Threefold Knowledge, and a beholder of the Deathless." I am an Arahant, worthy of receiving gifts called offerings (dakkhiṇeyyo), possessed of the Threefold Knowledge (tevijja), and a beholder of the Deathless (amata-dassa), which is Nibbāna.

"Kāmandhā jālapacchannā, taṇhāchadanachāditā; Pamattabandhunā baddhā, macchāva kumināmukhe" — "Blinded by sensual pleasures, covered by the net, shrouded by the canopy of craving, bound by the kinsman of the negligent, like fish in the mouth of a funnel-net." Beings who are blinded by sensual pleasures, entangled in the net of sensuality, and covered by the shroud of craving (taṇhā), are bound in the net of Māra (the kinsman of the negligent) like fish caught in the mouth of a wicker-trap (funnel-net).

This is what is declared regarding those beings. Next, he speaks about himself:

"Taṃ kāmaṃ chetvā Mārassa, bandhanaṃ samūlaṃ taṇhamabbuyha, sītibhūto'smi nibbuto'ti" — "Having cut off those sensual pleasures, having severed the bonds of Māra, and having uprooted craving (taṇhā) completely, I have become cool, extinguished (nibbuto)." Thus, these are the verses declared by Ven. Rāhula after attaining Arahantship.

You all must have heard that the immediate cause for Prince Siddhartha's Great Renunciation was the news that a son had been born. Prince Siddhartha received the happy news of a son's birth with the reaction, "A Rāhula (a bond/fetter) is born." Not only that, on that very night, without informing anyone, suppressing his paternal affection, he made the Great Renunciation for the sake of us all. Thus, Prince Rāhula, who did not receive paternal affection, got to see his father for the first time only when the Buddha visited the city of Kapilavatthu about a year after His Enlightenment. Having arrived at Kapilavatthu, while residing in the Sakyan monastery named Nigrodhārāma, one day the Buddha visited the palace of King Suddhodana. Having arrived, He sat on the prepared seat. Rāhula's mother, Princess Yasodharā, said to Prince Rāhula: "There, Rāhula, is your father. Go and ask for your inheritance." So, Prince Rāhula went before the Buddha and began to speak endearing words, saying, "Ascetic, even your shadow and your shelter are pleasant to me." When the Buddha started to return to Nigrodhārāma, Prince Rāhula followed closely behind Him, repeatedly saying, "Ascetic, give me my inheritance! Ascetic, give me my inheritance!"

Once the Buddha returned to Nigrodhārāma, He said to Ven. Sāriputta, "Well then, Sāriputta, ordain Prince Rāhula." At that time, there was no established monastic procedure regarding the ordination of novices (sāmaṇeras). Therefore, Ven. Sāriputta asked, "Venerable Sir, how shall I ordain Prince Rāhula?" At that moment, the Buddha laid down a Vinaya rule, having assembled the monks and delivered a Dhamma talk: "I allow you to ordain novices by the threefold recitation of the going-for-refuge (saraṇāgamana)." In this manner, Ven. Sāriputta ordained Prince Rāhula.

Upon hearing the news of this ordination, King Suddhodana came to the Buddha, paid homage, and sitting to one side, said, "Venerable Sir, I would like to ask for one boon." The Buddha addressed His royal father as "Gautama": "Gautama, the Tathāgatas are beyond the custom of granting boons." "No, Venerable Sir, what I ask is something allowable and blameless." "Then speak, Gautama." Then King Suddhodana said, "When the Blessed One went forth, it caused me great pain. Likewise, when Prince Nanda went forth. And when Prince Rāhula went forth, it was even more painful, Venerable Sir. Paternal love cuts through the outer skin; having cut the outer skin, it cuts the inner skin; having cut the inner skin, it cuts the flesh; having cut the flesh, it cuts the sinews; having cut the sinews, it cuts the bones; having cut the bones, it strikes and remains in the marrow. Therefore, Venerable Sir, it would be well if the Noble Ones do not ordain a son who has not been permitted by his parents." Thereupon, the Buddha, having delivered a Dhamma talk, consoled King Suddhodana and sent him away, assembled the monks, and laid down a Vinaya rule: "A child, a son, who has not been permitted by his parents should not be ordained. If a monk ordains such a person, he commits an offense of wrong-doing (dukkaṭa)." In this manner, the way the Buddha ordained Prince Rāhula and gave him his heritage in the Dispensation—the heritage of the Dhamma—is mentioned in many discourses.

In Dhamma portions such as the Ambalaṭṭhikā-rāhulovāda Sutta, Mahā-rāhulovāda Sutta, Cūḷa-rāhulovāda Sutta, Rāhula Sutta, and the Rāhula Saṃyutta, it is next mentioned how the Buddha systematically, step-by-step, revealed the heritage of the Dhamma to Ven. Rāhula. The discourse that is most widely known is the Ambalaṭṭhikā-rāhulovāda Sutta. While the Buddha was residing at the Veḷuvanārāma monastery in Rājagaha, Ven. Rāhula was staying in a hut at a nearby place called Ambalaṭṭhikā. In the evening, the Buddha arose from His meditation and walked to see Ven. Rāhula. Seeing Him coming from afar, Ven. Rāhula prepared a seat and placed a vessel of water for washing the feet. After the Buddha had finished washing His feet, leaving a little water in the vessel, He asked Ven. Rāhula, "Rāhula, do you see this little bit of water left in this vessel?" "Yes, Venerable Sir." "Rāhula, for anyone who has no shame in telling a deliberate lie, their monkhood is just as little as this water left in the vessel." Next, the Buddha threw away that little bit of water. Having thrown it away, He asked Ven. Rāhula, "Rāhula, did you see how that little bit of water was thrown away?" "Yes, Venerable Sir." Then the Buddha said, "For anyone who has no shame in telling a deliberate lie, their monkhood is cast aside just like that water thrown away"—declaring that their monkhood has been discarded and cast out.

Next, the Buddha turned the water vessel upside down. Having turned it upside down, He asked Ven. Rāhula, "Rāhula, do you see this water vessel turned upside down, inverted?" "Yes, Venerable Sir." "For anyone who has no shame in telling a deliberate lie, their monkhood is turned upside down just like this," He declared in that manner. Next, the Buddha declared another simile to Ven. Rāhula: "Rāhula, a state war-elephant taken into battle fights with its forelegs, fights with its hindlegs, fights with its head, fights with its tusks, but keeps its trunk curled back. Then the elephant-trainer thinks, 'This elephant has not yet sacrificed its life.' But when that elephant begins to fight even with its trunk, the trainer thinks, 'Now this elephant has sacrificed its life. There is nothing that this elephant cannot do now.' In the same way, Rāhula, for anyone who has no shame in telling a deliberate lie, there is no evil that they cannot do. Therefore, Rāhula, you should train yourself thus: 'I will not tell a lie, even in jest.'" Behold, the Buddha gave that fundamental advice and instruction to the young novice on that occasion. Likewise, how Ven. Rāhula was shaped under the constant instructions of the Buddha and the guidance and mentorship of Ven. Sāriputta as his preceptor (upajjhāya) is mentioned in many places throughout Dhamma literature.

One such incident is the sand play of young Ven. Rāhula. What was it? It is mentioned that upon waking up in the morning, he would take a handful of sand, throw it up in the air, and say: "May I receive as many words of advice and instruction from the Buddha and my fellow companions in the holy life as there are grains of sand here." Hearing the monks talking about his love for advice, the Buddha preached Jātaka stories such as the Tipallattha-miga Jātaka and the Tittira Jātaka, as is recorded in the Jātaka Book itself. Likewise, another such incident is mentioned in the Vinaya Piṭaka, demonstrating the humility of Ven. Rāhula. On one occasion, the Buddha laid down a Vinaya rule that a fully ordained monk (upasampanna) should not sleep under the same roof with an unordained person (anupasampanna), which means novices and so forth. After this Vinaya rule was laid down, while the Buddha was residing at Badarikārāma in Kosambī, the monks told the young Ven. Rāhula, "The Blessed One has laid down such a Vinaya rule. Therefore, find a place for yourself to sleep." Ven. Rāhula looked around, but there was no place. It is mentioned that, in the end, he spent that night in the Buddha's toilet-chamber. As the Buddha approached the toilet-chamber at dawn, He cleared His throat—which is a custom and Vinaya rule to make one's presence known. When the Buddha cleared His throat, Ven. Rāhula, who was inside, also cleared his throat. "Who is inside there?" He asked. "It is I, Rāhula, Venerable Sir, I, Rāhula." "Why are you staying here?" He asked. Once Ven. Rāhula explained the situation, the Buddha assembled the monks, delivered a Dhamma talk, and relaxed that Vinaya rule, allowing an unordained person to reside with a fully ordained monk for two or three nights. Thus, numerous such incidents are recorded concerning Ven. Rāhula and his virtuous qualities. In present times, some young children, harboring pride over their parents' positions or power, have a habit of saying the moment they cross paths with someone, "Just wait, I'll tell my father and teach you a good lesson!" But this Ven. Rāhula turned even the cold-shouldering and shortcomings of others into a lesson for himself, and nowhere in Dhamma literature is it seen that he ever went to tale-bear or complain to the Buddha.

Next, the systematic way in which the Buddha disciplined him is especially revealed in the Mahā-rāhulovāda Sutta. This is an extremely important discourse, even for meditating yogi monks. On one occasion, while the Buddha was residing at Jetavanārāma in Sāvatthī, He took His bowl and robes in the morning and set out for alms. Ven. Rāhula was also walking for alms, right behind the Buddha. The Buddha turned around, looked at Ven. Rāhula, and said, "Rāhula, whatever form (rūpa) there is..."—and there it is shown in eleven ways: whether past, future, or present; internal or external; coarse or subtle; inferior or superior; far or near—whatever form-aggregate, whatever form there is: "This is not mine, this I am not, this is not my self." Thus it should be seen with wisdom as it really is (yathābhūta). Then Ven. Rāhula asked, "Blessed One, Fortunate One, is it only form?" "No, Rāhula," the Buddha declared, "Just like form, feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), preparations (saṅkhāra), and consciousness (viññāṇa)—indeed, the entire five aggregates should be viewed in that same manner as not-self (anattā)." Thereupon, while the Buddha continued on His alms-round, Ven. Rāhula thought, "Who, having met the Blessed One and received such a meditation subject directly, would go into the village for alms?" Rejecting the alms-round, he sat down straight under a tree for meditation. He sat down and began to meditate. Just then, Ven. Sāriputta, who came behind him, saw Ven. Rāhula and gave him a brief piece of advice: "Rāhula, develop mindfulness of breathing (ānāpānasati). Mindfulness of breathing, when well-developed and practiced frequently, is of great fruit and great benefit."

Then, Ven. Rāhula meditated the entire afternoon, and in the evening, he visited the Buddha and asked Him, "Venerable Sir, in what way is mindfulness of breathing developed so that it is of great fruit and great benefit?" Thereupon, the Buddha mentioned a host of meditation methods that must be practiced as a preliminary phase to mindfulness of breathing. This is a very good lesson for meditators (yogāvacaras), because some people who start directly with mindfulness of breathing go and get stuck. On that occasion, the Buddha first spoke about the four elements present in one's body. He gave a meditation subject on the attention to elements (dhātu-manasikāra): "Rāhula, whatever is coarse, rough, and solid in this body, such as hair of the head, hair of the body, nails, teeth..."—showing nineteen such solid parts up to feces. In the sutta text, thirty-one parts are recorded. Later on, the brain in the head was added to make it twenty parts. All those nineteen are the internal earth element (pathavī-dhātu). Next, there is no need to speak separately about the external earth element—the solid substances outside. Whatever internal earth element there is, whatever earth element belonging to oneself, and whatever external earth element, it is simply the earth element. "This is not mine, this I am not, this is not my self"—thus it should be seen with wisdom. This was the first instruction He gave.

Next, you may understand the other elements in the same way as the earth element. Since we have spoken in detail about these matters regarding the attention to elements, (we can summarize): concerning the water element (āpo-dhātu), the liquid parts of the body such as bile, phlegm, saliva, urine, and so forth are shown as the internal water element; and considering both the internal and external water elements as one, it is simply the water element: "These are not mine, this I am not, this is not my self." In the same way, the fire element (tejo-dhātu)—the parts related to the heat in the body and the external fire, etc.—and then the wind element (vāyo-dhātu)—the winds that go upward and downward in the body, inhalation and exhalation, and the external wind element. Next, there is additionally the space element (ākāsa-dhātu); what is shown as the space element in the body are the cavities of the ears and nose, the hollow space within the intestines where food is stored, and so forth. Those are the internal space element. The external space element can be easily understood in the same way. One should contemplate it in that very manner: "This is not mine, this I am not, this is not my self." Thus, in this way, He showed how to elevate the attention to elements, including the space element, into meditation.

Next, the Buddha declared another unique meditation: "Rāhula, develop a meditation like the earth (paṭhavī-sama bhāvanā)." "Meditation like the earth" means equating oneself to the earth. It is a unique meditation. This is also mentioned in the discourses of Ven. Sāriputta. It means to contemplate in this way: the earth does not make a distinction regarding clean and unclean things thrown upon it. Even if someone throws feces, urine, saliva, phlegm, or snot on the earth, the earth does not feel disgusted or repulsed by it. In the exact same way, in accordance with the nature of the earth, you too should establish equanimity like the earth. Then, the mind will not be troubled by agreeable and disagreeable contact (phassa), and it will not grasp them tightly. That is the meditation like the earth. Likewise, there is the meditation like water (āpo-sama bhāvanā). Just as water does not show any aversion whether it washes away clean things or unclean things, so too should you contemplate yourself as water. Here, "like the earth" means contemplating that one is the earth. Why? Because as mentioned earlier, both the earth element inside oneself and the earth element outside are simply the earth element. This can also be understood logically. Thereafter, one contemplates without any distinction between internal and external. Then, one takes as an exemplar the external, insentient earth element, the insentient water element, the insentient fire element, the insentient wind element, and the insentient space element. The Buddha is telling us to behave in that manner. That is to say, it is a method to bring the mind to equanimity. Just like the earth and so forth. Next, fire burns anything without discriminating between clean and unclean; wind blows on everything, whether foul-smelling or fragrant. In this way, you may briefly consider all four. The space element is spoken of in a special way because it is unique: just as space does not rest anywhere, so too you do not cling to anything anywhere. Thus, this is shown there as a meditation to eliminate craving (taṇhā), conceit (māna), and the dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi) regarding one's body. So, that is the second step.

The Buddha showed a third step as well: "Rāhula, develop loving-kindness (mettā-bhāvanā) to eliminate ill-will. Develop compassion (karuṇā-bhāvanā) to eliminate cruelty. Develop appreciative joy (muditā-bhāvanā) to eliminate boredom or discontent (arati) towards monastic practice. Develop equanimity (upekkhā-bhāvanā) to cease the friction of repeated aversion (paṭigha) towards things, bringing the mind to equanimity. Next, develop the meditation on foulness (asubha-bhāvanā) to eliminate lust. Develop the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā) to eradicate the conceit 'I am' (asmi-māna)." Behold, He spoke of that step too.

It was only after that, at the very end, that the Buddha declared the meditation of mindfulness of breathing (ānāpānasati). At that point, the Buddha finally declared all sixteen steps of mindfulness of breathing. From this we can see that it is by practicing mindfulness of breathing with such accompanying practices that it becomes of great fruit and great benefit. The Buddha concluded that discourse by stating that for one who has developed mindfulness of breathing in this manner, even their final breath, their last inhalation and exhalation, fades away with full awareness, and even the final breath can be let go of mindfully. We will not detail the sixteen steps on this occasion, as we have spoken about these things previously. In this manner, the Buddha explained in detail to Ven. Rāhula how to make the meditation of mindfulness of breathing of great fruit and great benefit.

Furthermore, a series of verses with which the Buddha constantly advised and admonished Ven. Rāhula is also mentioned in the text called Sutta Nipāta, under the name Rāhula Sutta. According to that Rāhula Sutta, the Buddha first asks Ven. Rāhula, "I hope that, due to constant association, you do not disregard or show disrespect to your preceptor." In that context, the Buddha refers to Ven. Sāriputta as "ukkādhāro manussānaṃ"—meaning, one who holds up a torch for mankind, one who gives light through wisdom. That was how the Buddha described Ven. Sāriputta on that occasion. Ven. Rāhula also replies, "Yes, Venerable Sir, I do not disrespect my preceptor. I always respect him."

Next, with another set of verses, the Buddha further shows how Ven. Rāhula should train himself: "Rāhula, having abandoned the five sensual pleasures which have an attractive appearance, and having gone forth out of faith, bring to the forefront your ultimate goal of ending suffering (dukkha). Next, associate with noble friends (kalyāṇa-mittas). Reside in secluded, quiet lodgings. Eat food with moderation. Likewise, eliminate craving (taṇhā) for the four requisites—robes, almsfood, lodgings, and medicinal requisites. Avoid beautiful themes (subha-nimittas) that fuel lust and are connected to lust. Unify the mind and attain concentration through the meditation on foulness. Next, develop the signless concentration (animitta-samādhi). 'Signless concentration' means that by deeply contemplating impermanence (aniccatā), the perception of permanence (nicca-saññā) is erased and the 'signless' (animitta)—the state devoid of signs—emerges. Develop this signless concentration. By developing the signless concentration, eliminate conceit (māna). Eliminate the conceit 'I am' (asmi-māna). By eliminating the conceit 'I am', in the end, you will become one who makes an end of suffering (dukkha)."

It is recorded in the texts that the Buddha constantly advised Ven. Rāhula through those few verses. This is known as "constant advice" (abhiṇhaso avavāda). "Abhiṇha" means advice given continuously. Thus, on one hand, Ven. Sāriputta gave instructions as his preceptor. At the same time, the Buddha also witnessed His son's tender maturation in the Dispensation. Through the giving of these instructions, it is clearly shown to us how the Buddha was constantly keeping watch over Ven. Rāhula's inner progress.

The final discourse shown in this regard is the Cūḷa-rāhulovāda Sutta. In the Cūḷa-rāhulovāda Sutta, it is recorded as follows: On one occasion, the Buddha, having walked for alms and finished His meal, said to Ven. Rāhula in the afternoon, "Rāhula, take your sitting cloth (nisīdana). Let us go to the Andhavana forest for the day’s abiding (divāvihāra)." Lay disciples, "day’s abiding" refers to a custom of the Sangha in the past, where after taking their meal, they would spend the hot afternoon meditating, often in the open under a tree. That is what is called the day’s abiding. "Let us go to the Andhavana forest for the day’s abiding," said the Buddha, and Ven. Rāhula followed behind Him. At that time, as recorded in the texts, many thousands of deities, hearing the news that "Today the Blessed One will give Ven. Rāhula meditation subjects leading to Arahantship," also followed behind the Buddha. So, the Buddha went to the Andhavana forest and sat under a tree on a prepared seat. Ven. Rāhula sat nearby and paid homage to Him. Thereupon, the Buddha gave the Dhamma instruction on that occasion in this manner:

"Rāhula, is the eye permanent or impermanent (anicca)?" This discourse is delivered here in a question-and-answer format. "Impermanent (anicca), Venerable Sir." "Is that which is impermanent (anicca) pleasant or painful (dukkha)?" "Painful (dukkha), Venerable Sir." "Is it fit to regard that which is impermanent (anicca), painful (dukkha), and subject to change, as: 'This is mine, this I am, this is my self'?" "No, indeed, Venerable Sir." Next, He asks in the same way about forms—the objects that are the range of the eye: "Are forms permanent or impermanent (anicca)?" "Impermanent (anicca), Venerable Sir." "Is that which is impermanent (anicca) pleasant or painful (dukkha)?" "Painful (dukkha), Venerable Sir." "Is it fit to regard that which is painful (dukkha) and subject to change, as: 'This is mine, this I am, this is my self'?" "No, Venerable Sir."

In this manner, you can understand how He questioned him about the eye, about forms, about eye-consciousness (viññāṇa) arising dependent on the eye and forms, and about eye-contact (phassa / cakkhu-samphassa) arising in dependence on eye-consciousness. Next, concerning whatever feelings (vedanā), perceptions (saññā), preparations (saṅkhāra), and consciousness (viññāṇa) that arise due to eye-contact—expressed as "vedanā-gataṃ, saññā-gataṃ, saṅkhāra-gataṃ, viññāṇa-gataṃ"—if any of these arise from the impingement of the eye and forms, one grows weary of them too. Now, this is where we arrive at deep insight (vipassanā). The cessation of the six sense-bases (saḷāyatana-nirodha) is what is called Nibbāna. Realizing the cessation of these six sense-bases is true Nibbāna. The Buddha delivers this discourse, this instruction, by putting the six sense-bases at the forefront. First, He made Ven. Rāhula realize the impermanent (anicca) nature, the changing nature, and the not-self (anattā) nature of the eye. Next, concerning forms: it is dependent on the eye and forms that eye-consciousness (viññāṇa) arises. This consciousness (viññāṇa) is not something stored up somewhere. Right there is the deep part of this Dhamma—it is dependent on the eye and forms (that consciousness arises). That is why it is called dependently arisen (paṭicca-samuppanna). Dependent on the eye and forms, eye-consciousness arises. Next, at the point where these three factors meet, a person separates the eye through that consciousness, and separates the form. From that point onward, there is the talk on contact (phassa / cakkhu-samphassa). The idea of the form impinged on the eye occurs. The Buddha makes Ven. Rāhula realize that eye-contact (cakkhu-samphassa) too is impermanent (anicca), painful (dukkha), and not-self (anattā). Next, whatever feelings (vedanā), whatever perceptions (saññā), whatever preparations (saṅkhāra), and whatever consciousness (viññāṇa) arise through that eye-contact, they ultimately group together and fall into the five aggregates.

This is a somewhat deep matter. Those lay disciples who know something about these meditations might understand it at once. For others, it might be difficult. It is an extremely deep section, because this is connected to dependent arising (paṭicca-samuppāda). The mode of thinking here is not how the ordinary world thinks; it is something completely unique. Thus, due to the lack of real understanding (yathā-anavabodha) regarding the eye and forms, by ignoring their impermanence (aniccatā) and taking them as permanent, a consciousness (viññāṇa) arises. Dependent on the eye and forms, consciousness arises. What is called consciousness (viññāṇa) separates those two. Forgetting that separation, taking the eye, forms, and consciousness—all three together—as one, is contact (phassa). That is contact. From there on, because of contact, there is feeling (vedanā). Next, through the effort to identify the feeling, there is perception (saññā). Next, through perception, the internal active nature, which is performed as if personally, is the active nature. It is at this stage that karma is accumulated in the form of preparations (saṅkhāra). Next, what is called consciousness (viññāṇa) is taken as "this is my mind" once all of these are deposited. That gets added to those five heaps called the five aggregates of grasping (pañcupādānakkhandha). The products made through these six sense-bases go, accumulate, filter down, and it is through them that we construct what is called the five aggregates of grasping in saṃsāra. That is an extremely deep matter. This very same Dhamma-principle (dhammatā) applies to each and every sense-base. Forgetting their impermanent nature, driving a peg where the eye is, driving another peg where the form is, and taking this consciousness (viññāṇa) arising therefrom as a self, and from that point, experiencing a contact, having a feeling of "I contact"—in that manner, through contact, one generates feelings (vedanā) as painful, pleasant, or neither-painful-nor-pleasant. Through identifying those feelings, one creates various perceptions (saññā) and signs (nimittas). Next, by acting in accordance with those signs of perception, through that delusion, one accumulates preparations (saṅkhāra). All those preparations are then in the illusory consciousness (viññāṇa), and one thinks they are stored up. One stores them up as "this is mine, this I am." Thus, this is how these five grabbed heaps, or five heaps of grabbing, are called the five aggregates of grasping (pañcupādānakkhandha).

Just as the Buddha spoke here about the eye, about forms, about eye-consciousness (viññāṇa), about eye-contact (cakkhu-samphassa), and about feeling (vedanā) and perception (saññā) arising dependent on eye-contact, He spoke in the same way about the other sense-bases: the ear and sounds, the nose and smells, the tongue and tastes, the body and tactile objects, and finally, the mind (mana) and mind-objects (dhamma). This is the deepest place. When the word "dhamma" is used here, you might think it refers to our True Dhamma (Saddhamma). But, lay disciples, in these sutta discourses and in Buddhist philosophy, this word "dhamma" is used in many senses. Just as form (rūpa) is to the eye, mind-objects (dhamma) are to the mind. The objects that come to the mind are known by the name "dhamma". Finally, the Buddha asks Ven. Rāhula: "Is the mind permanent or impermanent (anicca)?" "Impermanent (anicca), Venerable Sir." "Is that which is impermanent (anicca) pleasant or painful (dukkha)?" "Painful (dukkha), Venerable Sir." "Is it fit to regard that which is impermanent (anicca), painful (dukkha), and subject to change, as: 'This is mine, this I am, this is my self', Rāhula?" Then Ven. Rāhula says, "No, indeed, Venerable Sir."

Just as He spoke about the mind, so too regarding those mind-objects (dhamma)—which must be understood here as the objects that come to the mind: "Are mind-objects permanent or impermanent (anicca)?" "Impermanent (anicca), Venerable Sir." "Is that which is impermanent (anicca) pleasant or painful (dukkha)?" "Painful (dukkha), Venerable Sir." "Is it fit to regard that which is impermanent (anicca), painful (dukkha), and subject to change, as mine, as 'I am', or as my self?" "No," Ven. Rāhula replies there too. That is precisely where the deepest part comes. Why? Because regarding these objects that come to the mind, the ordinary world thinks that objects exist separately, and we merely think about them. But the deepest part of the Dhamma is what is declared at the very beginning of the Dhammapada verses. We have probably mentioned this on many occasions in connection with the themes of our sermons. That Dhammapada verse is both the beginning and the end of this Dhamma literature. That is to say, it is through the principle declared in the first two verses of the Dhammapada, "manopubbaṅgamā dhammā manoseṭṭhā manomayā", that the most profound part of this dependent arising (paṭicca-samuppāda) shown by the Buddha emerges.

Manopubbaṅgamā—mind precedes.

But consider the attitude of the world—even you yourselves, lay disciples. We think about something because a "thing" exists, don't we? We first take a grasp, a hold, thinking that a thing exists. Only after that do we think about it. Not only do we think about it, we engage in thoughts (vitarka) about it. Those thoughts turn into conceptual proliferation (papañca). Having turned into conceptual proliferation (papañca), in the end, we fall into delusion. This can often be observed when some people get lost in the past; sometimes you have to shake their bodies and ask, "Where are you?" The mind is in the past. Only then do they wake up. In that manner, what remains when one goes into the past is that sign (nimitta) grabbed from the past. One does not know that the sign grabbed from the past is something of the past. Getting deluded about it, one turns it into a "thing". It was there, and it is gone. Yet, we turn it into a thing and then get trapped within it. It is the same with the future; with various plans of ours, we fall into thinking about a future sign, resting our chin on our hand in a different world. There too, we think that the thing which has not yet arrived in the future exists. This is the illusion, the gravest illusion in the world. Thus, the world thinks that mind-objects (dhamma) exist beforehand, and the mind comes later to understand them. But the Buddha turns that upside down: "manopubbaṅgamā dhammā"—the mind is what precedes mind-objects. It is not the mind-object that precedes; the mind is what precedes. Next, there is: "manoseṭṭhā"—of the two, the mind is supreme. Why is the mind said to be supreme? "Manomayā"—those mind-objects (dhamma). Here, "dhamma" must be understood in the sense mentioned earlier. Many people explain these terms differently nowadays. But here, "dhamma" must be understood in the sense of the objects that come to the mind. It is not other kinds of dhamma. It is not wholesome or unwholesome dhammas and so forth; it means the objects coming to the mind. They can be wholesome, or they can be unwholesome. That is a different, incidental matter. But the fundamental principle, as anyone who knows something about the Dhamma is aware, is that "manopubbaṅgamā dhammā manoseṭṭhā" is found in both of the opening verses. It is as a result of this that one gets bound to wholesome and unwholesome karmas. The mind precedes, and the mind is supreme between them. Thirdly, it says: "manomayā"—which means those mind-objects, those objects thought up by the mind, where did they arise from? From the mind itself. They are created by the mind itself. This is exactly where we are trapped—by not knowing that these are things created by the mind itself. We think of them as a "thing," get lost there, and wander on and on in saṃsāra. This is what a Buddha reveals: "manopubbaṅgamā dhammā manoseṭṭhā manomayā".

Why is this not understood? It is because of that perception of permanence (nicca-saññā) held by the world—through the perception of permanence that takes both the mind as permanent and mind-objects as permanent. Yet, a thought arises and passes away. But regarding that, what we call a memory trace or similar, we take such a thing as real; and based on that bit created by the mind itself, we spend the rest of our entire lives. This is how we accumulate preparations (saṅkhāra) in saṃsāra, and this is how we go on and on in saṃsāra. Thus, the Buddha shows that the mind is what precedes. It is from the mind itself that the object is created. But by neglecting and not knowing that the grabbed object is something created by the mind, through the delusion concerning it, we separate the mind as one thing and the mind-object as another. That moment of separation is what is called the arising of mind-consciousness (mano-viññāṇa). Otherwise, this is not stored. Mind-consciousness is not stored. The greatest delusion in the world is the belief that consciousness (viññāṇa) is stored within the mind. To express it with a simple simile, as we have had to state on some occasions, it is like believing that fire is stored inside a matchbox. Fire only comes after you strike a matchstick against the matchbox. Yet, we conventionally call it a "matchbox". Similarly, we think that within this body connected to the mind, a consciousness (viññāṇa) is stored up inside. But the Buddha shows that consciousness (viññāṇa) is constantly dependently arisen (paṭicca-samuppanna). Apart from causes and conditions, no consciousness (viññāṇa) arises. Thus, it is from the impingement of the mind and mind-objects that mind-consciousness arises. But after mind-consciousness has arisen, forgetting that this mind-consciousness was born due to those two, one then begins to separate those two; and the acrobatics that start from there go on as thoughts (vitarka), conceptual proliferation (papañca), and so forth. What happens if this is understood? If this is understood, right there, consciousness (viññāṇa) subsides. Preparations (saṅkhāra) are no longer constructed. Right there is Nibbāna—something a person cannot even conceive. In fact, Nibbāna is described as an awakening that is like falling asleep. An awakening like falling asleep. To say "falling asleep," if viewed from the world's perspective, it is like falling asleep. Why? Because what is called waking life—what the world calls waking life—is actually a dream. As we said before, the past is a kind of dream. The future built inside the mind is also a dream. And the stream of thoughts that constructs the present, as long as one does not understand its impermanent (anicca) and dependently arisen (paṭicca-samuppanna) nature, is also like a dream. That moment of waking up from that dream is indeed this: the understanding that this is dependently arisen (paṭicca-samuppanna); and along with that realization, consciousness (viññāṇa) subsides. Consciousness (viññāṇa) can no longer function.

Simultaneously with the arising of the realization that this mind-consciousness (mano-viññāṇa) occurred due to the impingement of both the mind and the mind-object coming to the mind, mind-consciousness (mano-viññāṇa) can no longer function. It cannot go beyond that. That is precisely what is called "the cessation of consciousness" (viññāṇa-nirodha). The cessation of consciousness is described as peaceful and sublime, and this is what is called the stilled calming of preparations (saṅkhāra-samatha). So, this is Nibbāna: "etaṃ santaṃ etaṃ paṇītaṃ yadidaṃ sabbasaṅkhārasamatho"—all preparations (saṅkhāra) are calmed at that moment. The acrobatics performed by taking the mind and the object as two separate things cease at the moment when one directly realizes that this consciousness (viññāṇa), which aids in performing those acrobatics, is itself something that arises due to those very two. It can only be understood through contemplating this. If at any moment that truth is understood, right there, Nibbāna is realized.

But how does this discourse end? Next, the Buddha speaks about each of these and brings out weariness (nibbidā) and dispassion (virāga) regarding them. Once they are understood properly, one grows weary of the eye, weary of forms, weary of eye-consciousness (viññāṇa), and weary of eye-contact (phassa). Through that weariness, the mind steps back. "Nibbidā" means the weariness arising through this real understanding (yathā-avabodha). It is through not knowing the reality as it is, and through the perception of permanence, that the world grasps these and holds on to them as grasping (upādāna). By understanding that these are impermanent (anicca) and born of causes and conditions, there automatically arises "nibbidā"—a valuable word of the past, though people do not bring it out much these days. We use the term "weariness with saṃsāra" in a casual way; when someone is sulking, we say, "Oh, why are you weary of saṃsāra?" But that is the door to Nibbāna shown by the Buddha. If it arises properly, it is not something that leads to suicide. If this reality is properly understood as it is, "nibbidā" (weariness) will inevitably arise. "Nibbidā" is also referred to as disenchantment or "nirveda" (transcendence of feelings). In present times, using the word "nirveda" is quite risky, because some people confuse it with artificial numbness. The word "nirveda" and the word "nibbidā" are used together. That "nirveda" is not an artificially induced numbness. Here, the realization comes that there is nothing to be felt (vedanā). That is also why preparations (saṅkhāra) are no longer accumulated. What arises through that weariness (nibbidā)? Dispassion (virāga)—non-clinging. Through that dispassion, the mind is liberated. That is what is called the liberation of mind (citta-vimutti).

Simultaneously with the conclusion of the Dhamma analysis and the question-and-answer explanation based on the Three Characteristics of existence regarding the six sense-bases in this Cūḷa-rāhulovāda Sutta, Ven. Rāhula's mind was liberated from all taints (āsavas), and he realized supreme Arahantship. Not only that, it is mentioned at the same time that the Dhamma-eye arose in the thousands of deities who were listening: "yaṃ kiñci samudayadhammaṃ sabbaṃ taṃ nirodhadhammaṃ"—"Whatever is subject to origination is all subject to cessation." That fundamental principle of dependent arising (paṭicca-samuppāda) arose in those deities. In many places, the attainment of the fruit of Stream-entry (sotāpatti-phala) is designated by this brief passage. The deepest realization a person can attain can be summarized in this short phrase: "Whatever is subject to origination is all subject to cessation." For someone listening to that Dhamma sermon with their mind fully applied, contemplating with wise attention (yoniso manasikāra), step-by-step as Ven. Rāhula was answering the Buddha's questions, this realization is directly experienced. He did not answer by imagining things in his mind. They must have been directly experienced by him. When asked whether the eye is permanent or impermanent, and if impermanent, whether it is fit to be regarded as self, he did not say it merely because the Buddha asked. Because Ven. Rāhula had deeply developed all those previously mentioned meditations like mindfulness of breathing, the Buddha understood at that moment that Rāhula's spiritual merits had matured—or as we say, his conditions for liberation (vimutti-paripāka) had ripened, and the dhammas helpful for liberation had matured. It was at that moment that the Buddha delivered this discourse. From this, we can see that if we are to summarize everything, the cessation of the six sense-bases (saḷāyatana-nirodha) is indeed Nibbāna; it was because he directly realized the ceasing nature, the ceased state of these sense-bases, that Ven. Rāhula realized Arahantship as that discourse concluded.

Therefore, this systematic group of meditation subjects given to Ven. Rāhula can be helpful to some extent to any meditating lay disciple (yogāvacara). As we said earlier, it is incorrect to think that the meditation of mindfulness of breathing (ānāpānasati) is merely applying the mind to inhalation and exhalation. Although that helps to go up to a certain point, in order to complete mindfulness of breathing through tranquility and insight (samatha-vipassanā), prior to those sixteen steps, one must practice to some extent those meditations shown by the Buddha, such as the attention to elements (dhātu-manasikāra), the meditation like water, like fire, etc., along with loving-kindness, compassion, appreciative joy, equanimity, foulness, and the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā). If even Ven. Rāhula, who followed the Buddha for such a long time in saṃsāra, needed all of this to become an Arahant, what need is there to speak of people like us? Therefore, instead of clinging to a single meditation subject, thinking "I will attain it through this alone," it is good if one contemplates and applies the mind to those other mentioned meditation subjects as well.

Nowadays, some people have created various disputes over these, as if they were separate sects. But based on the instructions the Buddha gave us, we can understand something practically. It is to such a matured insight (vipassanā) that discourses of that nature become applicable. Otherwise, someone in this day and age might think that a person can become an Arahant at any time simply by reading these sutta discourses. But in the past, how did they listen to those discourses? Just as it is said: "atthikatvā manasikatvā sabbacetaso samannāharitvā ohitasoto dhammaṃ suṇāti"—thinking, "there is benefit in this," contemplating, paying close attention, and with the entire mind directed to it, they listened to the Dhamma. Thus, because his conditions had matured in that manner, Ven. Rāhula was able to answer the questions asked by the Buddha regarding the Three Characteristics of existence without any hesitation. Finally, as that discourse concluded, Ven. Rāhula directly realized that the six sense-bases themselves are impermanent (anicca), painful (dukkha), and not-self (anattā). It was through that realization that he attained his goal. Therefore, from the character of Rāhula, we must understand both his tender maturation in the Dispensation and the way the Buddha gave him his Dhamma heritage. Through this, what a valuable example was given to the world by the virtuous qualities of the young Ven. Rāhula! Retaining all of this in our minds and bringing it close to our own lives, you, lay disciples, must strive to use this sermon to make your own Dhamma-contemplation and meditation successful. By using it thus, without treating them as extraneous, and by practicing all those various mentioned meditation subjects in a way that helps your own Nibbāna, may this be a supportive condition for you to put an end to all suffering (dukkha) such as birth (jāti), decay and death (jarāmaraṇa), disease, and so forth, and to attain the supreme, deathless Nibbāna through the penetration of the paths and fruits starting from Stream-entry. I wish you all that supportive fortune.

Likewise, from the Avīci hell up to the Akaniṭṭha heaven, if there be any beings who wish to rejoice in the merits of this preaching of the Dhamma and hearing of the Dhamma, may they, by rejoicing, realize the deathless Nibbāna through a Bodhi of their aspiration. Praying thus, please recite these verses and share the merits.

Nālaka Sutta tradition from the Sutta Nipāta

Dear Listeners,

Today is an exceptionally precious day for Buddhist devotees, being the anniversary of the day the Tathāgata, the King of Dhamma, the Fully Self-Awakened One, set the Wheel of Dhamma rolling up to the Akaniṭṭha Brahma world. On that day, in the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta, the entire Sublime Dhamma was encapsulated within the Four Noble Truths presented by the Blessed One to the world. The Blessed One also nurtured a community of disciples who were capable of explaining that deep Dhamma as occasion demanded. Among those disciples skilled in analyzing and explaining in detail and depth the meaning of a Dhamma passage preached in brief, the position of etadagga—the foremost—was received by the Great Arhat Mahā Kaccāyana. The three verses he uttered on one occasion are what we have selected as our theme today.

If we look at the background story as presented in the Commentaries and other texts, it is explained that with regard to Ven. Kaccāyana, he fulfilled his perfections (pāramīs) over a long period during the dispensations of past Buddhas for this aforesaid position of eminence. Next, in this present Buddha-dispensation era, Ven. Kaccāyana was born in the Avanti country as the son of the Brahmin chaplain of King Caṇḍappajjota. Since his body was golden in color, his mother gave him the name 'Kañcana' (Golden). Having learned the three Vedas and other sciences, this young man succeeded his father in the position of royal chaplain upon the latter’s passing. He was known by his clan name, Kaccāyana. King Caṇḍappajjota came to hear that a Buddha had appeared in the world. He commissioned this Brahmin chaplain to go and invite the Buddha to visit the country of Avanti. Accordingly, the chaplain Brahmin Kaccāyana went with seven others to see the Blessed One. Having traveled a great distance and met the Blessed One, it is mentioned in the texts that through the very first Dhamma sermon they heard from the Blessed One, all eight attained Arhatship with the four analytical knowledges (paṭisambhidā) and received ordination through the 'Ehi Bhikkhu' formula. Subsequently, Ven. Kaccāyana conveyed the King's invitation to the Blessed One. However, the Blessed One said, "Kaccāyana, there is no need for me to go. Even if you go, the King will gain confidence." Accordingly, Arhat Kaccāyana and the other seven returned to the Avanti country. Residing in the King's park for a certain period, Ven. Kaccāyana established the Buddha's dispensation in the Avanti country, inspiring confidence in the King as well. It is mentioned that later he traveled to see the Blessed One again. He also visited the Avanti country from time to time as the occasion demanded.

Now, a series of advisory verses uttered by him on one occasion is found in the Theragāthā Pāli. We have taken three of those verses as our theme. The meaning of those verses needs to be explained in some detail.

Jīvite vāpi sappañño api vittaparikkhayo — "Even if wealth and possessions are ruined, the wise person still lives."

Paññāya ca alābhena vitto vāpi na jīvati — "On the other hand, if wisdom is not attained, even if one has wealth, one does not truly live."

Sabbaṃ suṇāti sotena sabbaṃ passati cakkhunā — "He hears everything with the ear; he sees everything with the eye."

The wise person should not completely discard everything he has seen and heard; discarding is not appropriate. Now, here is a special verse:

Cakkhumāssa yathā andho — "Though possessed of eyes, let him be as one blind."

Sotavā badhiro yathā — "Though possessed of hearing, let him be as one deaf."

Paññavāssa yathā mūgo — "Though possessed of wisdom, let him act as if dumb."

Balavā dubbaloriva — "Though strong, let him act as if weak."

Atha atthe samuppanne sayetha matasāyikaṃ — "Then, when the need arises, let him lie down like a dead man." (That is, like someone lying on their deathbed). We need to analyze these a little.

"Even if wealth is exhausted, the wise person still lives." This was said with the following meaning: even if a wise person's wealth is lost, by being content with what is received, through wise courses of action, and without falling into corruption, they live through righteous means. Therefore, that is a true life. On the other hand, paññāya ca alābhena—the foolish person without wisdom, no matter how much wealth they have, falls into vice, ruins both this world and the next, and destroys their life. From this, we can see that during the Buddha's time, unlike today, wise thinking was valued over positive (wealth-oriented) thinking. Why? We can find many supporting facts in the Suttas.

When a deity asked, "What is the best treasure of humans?" (kiṃsu narānaṃ ratanaṃ...), the answer was paññā narānaṃ ratanaṃ—"Wisdom is the treasure of humans." Likewise, in response to the verse asked by Ālavaka the Yakkha, when asked, "Whose life is said to be the best?" (kathaṃ jīviṃ jīvitamāhu seṭṭhaṃ), the Blessed One declared, paññā jīviṃ jīvitamāhu seṭṭhaṃ—"Living by wisdom is said to be the best." From this, we can see that according to the values of that time, wisdom was appreciated more than wealth. That is why it was said that the wise person lives even without wealth, while the wealthy person without wisdom is like the dead, not truly living.

Some important points are mentioned here. Sabbaṃ suṇāti sotena—one gets to hear many things with one's ears. Likewise, sabbaṃ passati cakkhunā—one gets to see everything with one's eyes. Na ca diṭṭhaṃ sutaṃ dhīro sabbaṃ—the wise person does not completely discard all that is seen and heard. However, now he states what should be abandoned (or how to behave): cakkhumāssa yathā andho—though possessed of eyes, he behaves as if blind according to the occasion. On certain occasions, one has to act as if one has not seen. If defilements arise within oneself through seeing, or if various complications arise, one must remain as if one has not seen. Cakkhumāssa yathā andho—one must act like that as the situation demands. Likewise, sotavā badhiro yathā—even if heard, one must remain like a deaf person. One has to live as if one has not heard, as if one is blind and deaf to those things. Similarly, paññavāssa yathā mūgo—though possessing wisdom, one should act like a mute. If one tries to speak with all one's wisdom at the wrong time, one will get into trouble. Balavā dubbaloriva—though possessing strength, one must act as if weak. Atha atthe samuppanne sayetha matasāyikaṃ—furthermore, as the occasion demands, if a certain course of action would hinder one's progress in this world or the next, one must remain inactive, like a dead man. This is the advice given by Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana through those verses.

Just as he received that etadagga position, it is mentioned in many Sutta discourses that lay and ordained disciples inquired from Ven. Kaccāyana about the meaning of certain Dhamma portions preached in brief by the Blessed One. Although we cannot recount all of them, on one occasion it is mentioned as follows. While Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana was residing in the town of Kuraraghara in the Avanti country, the householder Hāliddakāni came to him, sat on one side, and asked this: "Venerable Sir, in the Māgandhiya Pañha of the Aṭṭhaka Vagga, the Blessed One has uttered this short verse, a brief Dhamma point. I will recite that verse:

> Okaṃ pahāya aniketasārī,

> Gāme akubbaṃ muni santhavaṃ,

> Kāmehi ritto apurekkharāno,

> Kathaṃ na viggayha janena kayirā.

This is the Buddha's word. Realizing that there is a deep meaning here, this householder must have asked. He inquired from Ven. Kaccāyana about the meaning of this Dhamma portion preached in brief. It is only when listening to this exposition that one understands that there is a depth in these Dhamma portions far beyond the ordinary meaning we usually grasp. Ven. Kaccāyana explains it like this. If we summarize it according to the occasion, its general essence is: okaṃ pahāya—the word oka is used in the Pali language for a home or house. Okaṃ pahāya—leaving home and going forth into homelessness (anokaṃ āgamma). But Ven. Kaccāyana explains this in a very deep manner. He explains that the form element (rūpa-dhātu), which we conventionally refer to as ourselves, is a home/abode for consciousness (viññāṇa). Furthermore, the form element is where consciousness (viññāṇa) becomes established; that is why it is called a home. It is with the idea that consciousness (viññāṇa) becomes established in the elements of feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), and Preparations (saṅkhāra) that they are called oka (home). But the Tathāgata has abandoned that home—meaning, not a physical house, but those homes where consciousness (viññāṇa) becomes established: the form element, the feeling element, the perception element, the Preparations element, and the consciousness element—having abandoned lust, affection, craving (taṇhā), thirst, etc., towards them. It is in this sense that okaṃ pahāya (abandoning the home) was said. Next, aniketasārī (wandering shelterless)—niketa means a residence or dwelling. Therefore, niketasārī means one who wanders among homes. But aniketasārī is explained here as follows:

You have heard many times about forms, sounds, smells, tastes, touches, and ideas (rūpa, sadda, gandha, rasa, phoṭṭhabba, dhamma) which are the objects of these six sense bases. These are the signs (nimitta) within the range of the senses: eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind. It is these signs that have been designated as niketa (abodes). With the meaning of "not being drawn along those signs," he is called aniketasārī. Since the Tathāgata has removed attraction, affection, lust, and craving (taṇhā) toward the objects of those sense bases, he is not drawn along by them; hence aniketasārī. Thus, okaṃ pahāya aniketasārī.

Next, the second line: gāme akubbaṃ muni santhavaṃ—the sage (i.e., the monk) does not make intimacy/connections in the village. Santhava means keeping company/intimacy. "Not having friendly intimacy in the village" means avoiding inappropriate relationships with householders, the lack of association with laypeople. This is often mentioned in the Dhamma as follows. Regarding a monk who associates with laypeople, it is said: sahananandī, sahasokī, sukhitesu sukhito, dukkhitesu dukkhito etc.—rejoicing when laypeople rejoice, grieving when laypeople grieve, sharing the happiness and suffering of laypeople. Not only that, but in their duties and tasks (kicca-karaṇīyesu), he takes part (yogaṃ āpajjati) and joins them in doing those things. That is what intimacy is. The sage does not do that.

Next, kāmehi ritto—ritta means empty. Kāmehi ritto means the Tathāgata is empty of sensual pleasures; empty of the five cords of sensual pleasure. By removing desire, affection, lust, etc., towards them, he is free from the five cords of sensual pleasure, hence kāmehi ritto. Next, apurekkharāno (not looking forward) has a deep meaning. It is shown like this: forming future aspirations regarding the five aggregates of grasping, such as "May I have such a form, such a feeling, such a perception in the future!" is what is meant by purekkharāno (looking forward/preferring/putting in front). It puts becoming (bhava) in front. It aspires: "May I have such and such in the future." That is wishing for becoming (bhava). Apurekkharāno means not putting it in front in that manner. If someone does not put it in front, it is considered an excellent practice. Then one becomes kāmehi ritto apurekkharāno (empty of sensual pleasures, not looking forward).

Next, it says: kathaṃ na viggayha janena kayirā—he does not engage in disputatious speech with people. It is explained like this: at that time, there was a custom among other ascetics and Brahmins. They would gather in assembly halls and argue, challenging one another. There are several phrases of disputation mentioned here: "You do not know this Dhamma and Discipline; I know this Dhamma and Discipline," "You are practicing wrongly; I am practicing rightly," "You say last what should be said first, and first what should be said second." There is a whole set of such verbal challenges used in those debates. Kathaṃ na viggayha janena kayirā means that when speaking with people, he does not enter into such disputations. He does not engage in debates and challenges. Thus, Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana explains the aforementioned verse in depth. There are many other such instances; let us discuss them according to the occasion.

Among the expositions given by Ven. Kaccāyana, the most outstanding, deepest, and most highly valued exposition of that time is found in the Madhupiṇḍika Sutta of the Majjhima Nikāya. We hope to speak a little about that, right from its introductory section. On one occasion, the Blessed One was residing at the Nigrodhārāma in Kapilavastu. One day, after consuming his almsfood, he entered the Great Forest for his afternoon abiding (divāvihāra—daytime rest) and sat at the foot of a Bel tree. At that moment, the Sākyan named Daṇḍapāṇi—the name Daṇḍapāṇi was given because wherever this Sākyan went, he carried a walking stick or a staff—while walking for exercise, came up to the Bel tree where the Blessed One was sitting. He did not pay respects, but after exchanging pleasantries, he asked a question: kiṃvādī samaṇo kimakkhāyīti—"What is your doctrine, ascetic, and what do you proclaim?"

Then the Blessed One gave a unique answer. He gave an answer that this Sākyan could not grasp. Let us try to state it in English. It is a long passage. He addressed this Sākyan as "friend" (āvuso). "Friend, I declare such a doctrine whereby one does not dispute with anyone in this world, with its deities, Māras, and Brahmās, in this generation with its ascetics and Brahmins, its devas and humans; and furthermore, whereby concepts do not lie latent as underlying tendencies (anusaya) in that Brahmin who dwells detached from sensual pleasures, free from doubts, and liberated from craving for becoming (bhava-taṇhā). I present such a doctrine." The Blessed One gave this unique answer. Unable to understand this, the Sākyan shook his head, wagged his tongue, wrinkled his forehead, and departed.

Afterwards, the story goes like this: having spent the evening, the Blessed One arose from his meditation, returned to Nigrodhārāma, and addressed the Sangha, recounting the question asked by Daṇḍapāṇi Sākyan and the answer given by the Buddha. At that moment, a certain monk questioned the Buddha about the meaning of that answer. Thereupon, the Blessed One laid down a brief exposition before the monks. It is as follows:

"Monks, if, owing to whatever cause, concepts, reckonings, or designations characterized by the prolific tendency of concepts (papañca-saññā-saṅkhā) beset a man, and if there is nothing therein to be delighted in, welcomed, or grasped, then this is the end of all underlying tendencies (anusaya) of lust, the end of the underlying tendencies of aversion (paṭigha), the end of the underlying tendencies of views (diṭṭhi), the end of the underlying tendencies of doubt (vicikicchā), the end of the underlying tendencies of conceit (māna), the end of the underlying tendencies of craving for becoming (bhava-rāga), and the end of the underlying tendencies of ignorance (avijjā). This itself is the end of taking up rods and weapons, quarrels, disputes, recriminations, and other evil, unwholesome states." The Blessed One delivered this unique discourse, leaving a certain puzzle unsolved. It was not clear what those papañca-saññā-saṅkhā actually were. In short, the Blessed One declared that if, owing to whatever cause, a man is beset by papañca-saññā-saṅkhā, and if one does not delight in, welcome, or cling to that cause, this itself is the end of the sevenfold defilements of underlying tendencies (anusaya), as well as quarrels, disputes, etc. Having declared this, he rose from his seat and entered his dwelling. Then, this became a puzzle for the monks. The Blessed One had not given the complete explanation. The monks then pondered, "How can we understand the meaning of this Dhamma taught in brief by the Blessed One?" While they were talking, they recalled that the venerable Mahā Kaccāyana had been highly praised and commended by the Blessed One, and was deeply respected by his companions in the holy life. "Perhaps Ven. Kaccāyana can explain this for us." This group went and invited Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana: "The Blessed One has declared such a thing, please be compassionate enough to explain this to us."

Then, as was his usual custom, Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana said: "Indeed, Venerable Sirs, your action is like that of a man who, seeking the heartwood of a tree, bypasses its root and trunk and searches for the heartwood among its leaves. While the Blessed One is present, you come to me to find its meaning; that is what your action is like. Go and ask the Blessed One himself." Then those monks said: "The Blessed One has entered his dwelling, and our time is passing. If it is no trouble, please clarify its meaning for us." When they repeatedly requested and invited Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana, it was on that occasion, through an extremely deep passage that has captured the minds of many, that Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana analyzed that utterance of the Buddha. Some parts of it are explained in Pali. The exposition given by Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana to explain the Buddha's passage is extremely deep. In any case, he says this:

"Friends!" addressing those monks, he took one of the six sense bases—the eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind—and explained, and the devotees should apply it to the other sense bases as well. It begins like this:

Cakkhuñca āvuso paṭicca rūpe uppajjati cakkhu-viññāṇaṃ—"Friends, dependent on the eye and forms, eye-consciousness (viññāṇa) arises." You can understand that much. Next, he says: tiṇṇaṃ saṅgati phasso—the coming together of these three is contact (phassa). Those three mean the eye, forms, and the consciousness (viññāṇa) that arises dependent on them. The moment of their coming together, the moment they meet, is designated as contact (phassa). Next: phassa-paccayā vedanā—dependent on contact (phassa) as condition, feeling (vedanā). Now, he expounds the next part in a unique way: yaṃ vedeti taṃ sañjānāti—what one feels, that one perceives. Yaṃ sañjānāti taṃ vitakketi—what one perceives, about that one thinks. Yaṃ vitakketi taṃ papañceti—what one thinks about, that one conceptually proliferates (papañceti). I will explain these words later. For now, understand it as "conceptually proliferates." Yaṃ papañceti—what one conceptually proliferates...

Now, next he says: tato nidānaṃ purisaṃ papañca-saññā-saṅkhā samudācaranti—owing to that cause, those aforesaid papañca-saññā-saṅkhā (concepts, reckonings, or designations characterized by the prolific tendency of concepts), whatever they may be, beset and overwhelm that man who set those Dhamma processes in motion. Regarding what? Atītānāgatapaccuppannesu cakkhuviññeyyesu rūpesu—the man is overwhelmed by the papañca-saññā-saṅkhā built up regarding forms cognizable by the eye in the past, future, and present. This was the answer given by Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana.

He adds a bit more to the end. Although there is no opportunity to explain all of it, to make it complete, it must be said in brief. Next, he states: "When there is the eye, forms, and eye-consciousness, it is possible to point out a designation (paññatti) of contact (phassa). When there is the designation of contact (phassa), there is room for a designation of feeling (vedanā). When there is the designation of feeling (vedanā), there is room for a designation of perception (saññā). When there is the designation of perception (saññā), there is room for a designation of applied thought (vitakka). When there is the designation of applied thought (vitakka), there is the onset of papañca-saññā-saṅkhā." He also states the reverse:

"Where there is no eye, no forms, and no eye-consciousness, there is no way to designate contact (phassa). In the absence of that, one cannot designate feeling (vedanā); there is no perception (saññā), no applied thought (vitakka), and no papañca-saññā-saṅkhā." Ven. Kaccāyana stated this as well. Having finished this exposition, Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana said to the monks: "Friends, this is how I understand it. Go to the Blessed One and ask about the meaning of this brief sermon, and in whatever way he explains it, preserve it accordingly."

Then, these monks—it may not have been at that very moment, but on a later occasion when they found the Blessed One at leisure—went and presented the entire account. After the Buddha arrived, they explained: "We invited Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana, and he analyzed it for us in this manner," presenting the exposition in full. The Blessed One declared: "Monks, Mahā Kaccāyana is wise. Even if you had asked me, I would have explained it in this very same way. Therefore, this indeed is its meaning. Preserve it thus." The Blessed One approved it entirely. At that moment, Ven. Ānanda, who was standing nearby, made a unique comment. He used a simile: "Venerable Sir, just as a man oppressed by hunger might find a ball of honey (madhupiṇḍika), a honeycomb, and from whatever side he tastes it, licks it, or sucks it, sweet honey flows out endlessly; even so, Venerable Sir, if a wise monk examines the meaning of this Dhamma portion with wisdom, endless sweet meaning flows out." Expressing his joy, Ven. Ānanda asked: "Blessed One, what name should be given to this Dhamma portion?" He asked with a hint. "Then, Ānanda, call this Dhamma discourse the Madhupiṇḍika (The Ball of Honey) Sutta." From this, we see that Ven. Ānanda too realized that this discourse contained immense meaning. That is why he gave the simile of the ball of honey.

So, it is this very ball of honey that I am trying to offer you to suck, according to my ability. Try to suck this honey. There is extremely deep Dhamma here. Indeed, this is the section that has drawn the attention of most scholars today. First, let us try to understand the word papañca.

In everyday usage, even as it is used today, if someone gives a long-winded, roundabout explanation instead of directly answering a question, we say, "Speak without papañca." So, unnecessary circumlocutions and wordiness are also called papañca. But here, it refers to a papañca of the mind (conceptual proliferation). I will explain the other words as the occasion demands. The uniqueness of the exposition given by Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana is that he first shows that what is called consciousness (viññāṇa) is dependently co-arisen (paṭicca-samuppanna). It is something that arises from causes and conditions. An ordinary untaught person, lacking Dhamma knowledge, takes this consciousness (viññāṇa), this mind, as the self. That is exactly what all other religions firmly grasp as the soul or self. But here, it is clearly shown that dependent on the eye and forms, eye-consciousness (viññāṇa) arises: cakkhuñca paṭicca rūpe ca uppajjati cakkhu-viññāṇaṃ. Consciousness is neither in the eye nor in the forms. If these two come together at some point, through the direction of attention (manasikāra), something called consciousness arises at that moment: eye-consciousness. Just as fire does not arise without friction, the Blessed One declared that consciousness does not arise without a cause.

Eye-consciousness, ear-consciousness, nose-consciousness, etc., are all born of causes and conditions. Aññatra paccayā natthi viññāṇassa sambhavo—"Apart from conditions, there is no origination of consciousness." This is shown as the most important point in this Dhamma. Here, it is clearly shown that dependent on the eye and forms, consciousness arises. In that consciousness, both the eye and forms are reflected. Then there is the eye, there are forms, and there is consciousness. These three are taken together. The moment they are taken together is called contact (phassa). Tiṇṇaṃ saṅgati phasso—the coming together of these three is contact. Contact is a very deep matter. It is shown to be dependently co-arisen. No one actually "made" contact; contact is something that emerged through those causes and conditions. Next, it is stated: phassa-paccayā vedanā—dependent on contact as condition, feeling (vedanā). Here too, the conditional relation is stated, showing it is dependently co-arisen. No one "made" contact; contact arose through other causes and conditions. Dependent on that contact, there is feeling (vedanā). But going forward from there, it is after feeling arises that the hidden "self" wakes up. As mentioned in another Sutta, the Buddha asks: "Ānanda, if there were no feeling (vedanā) at all, would there be any room for a self?" The answer is "No." This shows that after reaching the stage of feeling, let us see how Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana's exposition proceeds.

"Cakkhuñca paṭicca rūpe uppajjati cakkhu-viññāṇaṃ, tiṇṇaṃ saṅgati phasso, phassa-paccayā vedanā." From there, it goes in a unique way: yaṃ vedeti taṃ sañjānāti—what one feels, that one perceives. So, one perceives that feeling: what one feels, that one perceives. Next, yaṃ sañjānāti taṃ vitakketi—what one perceives, about that one thinks. Yaṃ vitakketi taṃ papañceti—when one thinks about it, without one even knowing it, one gets carried away by those thoughts. Why does one get carried away? That too is in the Buddha's teaching.

Wherever there are conceptual proliferations (papañca-saññā) due to some cause, the Buddha uses three words: abhinanditabbaṃ, abhivaditabbaṃ, ajjhosetabbaṃ—to be delighted in, to be welcomed, to be grasped. These words refer to what you know very well as craving (taṇhā), conceit (māna), and views (diṭṭhi). One delights through craving (taṇhā); one welcomes/asserts through conceit (māna); one grasps/clings through views (diṭṭhi). That is why all three words are connected. Thus, due to forming craving, conceit, and views (taṇhā, māna, diṭṭhi) regarding those thoughts (vitakka), those conceptual proliferations (papañca) overflow. Those thoughts overflow, and what happens in the end? The person who directed their intellect in that way is overwhelmed. Therein lies papañca-saññā-saṅkhā samudācaranti—the concepts, reckonings, or designations characterized by the prolific tendency of concepts beset and overwhelm that man.

"Saṅkhā" derived from conceptual proliferation (papañca-saññā). Now, the word saṅkhyā is used in daily life for numbers/figures. Everyone knows that. Actually, when we think about it, in language usage, for humans to exchange ideas, the easiest way they first use to communicate is numbers. One can even point with fingers and reckon. This reckoning is called counting. The same reckoning done with numbers is later done with words. Therefore, papañca-saṅkhā means the reckonings or designations created by conceptual proliferation. Why is it called designations? In another place, if we seek the etymology of this word based on the Buddha's teaching, there are three words: saṅkhā, samaññā, paññatti. These are synonyms—meaning they have similar meanings. Saṅkhā is a reckoning, arriving at a convention. Next, paññatti is like the first presentation of something like a "clock" through some reckoning. Then it is conventionally agreed upon. We all call it a "clock." If we used another name, it would cause confusion. Thus, the convention arose. So, the "clock" became a convention. First, the reckoning was done, putting the pieces together. At that point, let's say we decided to call it a "clock," and thereafter it was conventionally agreed upon. Next, once it is established as a designation (paññatti), no one doubts it because it has been accepted. That reckoning called saṅkhā goes very far. Through those thoughts, through that reckoning, that person is unknowingly overwhelmed by papañca-saññā-saṅkhā. Samudācaranti—due to that overwhelming, they slip into the three periods of time: past, present, and future (atīta, anāgata, paccuppanna). Confusing the three periods of time, there is a past. One thinks the past is the present, and one thinks the future is also the present. That is why the Buddha preached that wise ascetics and Brahmins do not confuse these three periods of time. For past things, they say "it was"; for future things, "it will be"; for present things, "it is." But the ordinary world confuses this. This happens mostly due to being overwhelmed by craving (taṇhā) and conceit (māna).

Explaining this story in this way, many might not understand. Therefore, let us tell a small, heart-touching story that anyone can relate to. The Buddha did similar things. Some of you might have heard that during the Buddha’s time, there was an Arhat monk named Saṅgharakkhita. A nephew of his was ordained under him. Therefore, that monk was called Bhāgineyya Saṅgharakkhita (Nephew Saṅgharakkhita). This young monk observed the rainy retreat (vassa) in a temple in a certain remote village. At the end of the retreat, he received a piece of cloth of seven cubits and another of eight cubits as retreat garments to make a robe. This young monk thought: "I will use this seven-cubit cloth. I must offer the eight-cubit cloth to my teacher." He returned to the monastery. Since the senior monk was out on almsround, he planned to make a grand offering to his teacher. When the venerable elder returned, the young monk placed the cloth at his feet, offered it, saying "I offer what I received to you," and began to fan him. The elder Saṅgharakkhita said: "You keep it, my robes are complete." The young monk repeated: "I had intended to offer this robe only to you." Yet, the elder Saṅgharakkhita refused. Because of this, the nephew monk’s mind became deeply disappointed.

This young monk thought: "Even though we are related, he did not even consider that." He thought, "Now, there is no use in my being a monk," and while fanning, he planned to disrobe. "After disrobing, I cannot live doing nothing. I will sell this eight-cubit cloth and buy a she-goat. She-goats give birth quickly. By selling the kids, I will get a wife to look after the house. After we have a child, I will name him after my uncle, and taking the child in a carriage, I will go to visit my uncle, the elder Saṅgharakkhita. On the way, I will ask, 'Give the child to my hands.' My wife will say, 'You drive the carriage, I will look after the child.' Somehow, due to carelessness, the child will fall. The wheel of the carriage will run over the child. I will get angry. Because she did not give me the child when I asked, I will get angry and beat my wife with the goad." But whom did he actually beat? With the palm-leaf fan, he struck the head of the chief monk! Since Ven. Saṅgharakkhita could read the minds of others, he looked to see what had happened. "Aha! You were striking your wife, but you struck the old monk, didn't you?" At that, the nephew monk thought, "I am ruined!" and dropping the fan, he started to run. The other monks caught him. Later, when they brought him to the Buddha and explained the matter, the Buddha uttered the verse from the Dhammapada: dūraṅgamaṃ ekacaraṃ ("wandering far, wandering alone"), to show how far the mind can travel.

Though it is not a long story, regarding what happened at that moment, he projected a future. Then, he was overwhelmed by those papañca-saññā-saṅkhā—things created entirely by his own mind. He had not bought a she-goat, he had not married a wife, he had not had a child. Nothing had happened. Yet, in his mind, he took all of those, became overwhelmed by them, and got into an entanglement. This happens to everyone in some way, at various levels.

But here, let us take the word saṅkhā. This is a linguistic matter. When a word is formed, we think it is a "thing." In grammar, there is a nature that deludes the world. That is where ignorance (avijjā) lies hidden. Through nouns, verbs, and the general connection of subject and object, in the structures of agent and action, the ordinary world easily falls into delusion. That is why this Dhamma is difficult to understand. These aspects are found everywhere in this world. When the Blessed One explained dependent co-arising (paṭicca-samuppāda), he showed: think of the beginning of a river flowing from a mountain. Sometimes, when rainwater falling from a roof mixes with water coming from around, it becomes a stream, a brook, a river, and flows into the ocean with a great roar. We call that a stream, a brook, a river. We conceive of a "thing" through words, but the world exists only as a continuity (santati). It arises due to causes and conditions. From whichever side it flows, we have given it a name—the Kelani River or the Mahaweli River. But there is nothing of the sort. We are overwhelmed by that word. There is such a thing within language. It is within this that ignorance (avijjā) lies hidden. An example of this is papañca-saññā-saṅkhā. Even if we do not have long stories to illustrate these saṅkhā, consider it in brief.

In Western literature, a similar event is mentioned. There is the story of the goose that laid golden eggs. There was a goose that laid one golden egg a day. Its owner thought: "Since she gives one egg a day, I can get all of them at once." But when he cut open the belly of the goose, there were no eggs. Why? He thought the future was in the present. He took the future to be the present. This kind of thing happens constantly.

This is an extremely deep Sutta. On one hand, it is the disregarding of the fact that things arise from causes and conditions. That is why even consciousness (viññāṇa) was shown here as not existing on its own. To explain this: when we say "matchbox," there is no fire in the matchbox, nor is there fire in the matchstick. Yet, when they strike together, fire emerges due to causes and conditions. The Blessed One says that consciousness (viññāṇa) is also such a thing. It is an arising due to causes and conditions. But through forgetting this, and thereafter turning them into "things," one separates the "eye" and separates the "form." This is the kind of thing that happens. This is a deep matter. I am trying to explain it in brief.

On certain occasions, the Blessed One has given wonderful similes regarding this "duality"—regarding taking the eye and forms as two separate things. Sometimes, he gives the simile of a seamstress. The seamstress is craving (taṇhā), which ties the knot. The seamstress takes two ends and ties them in a knot. One end is the past; the other end is the future. The seamstress takes the past and the future and ties them in a knot, disregarding the present. This is what happened to the monk Bhāgineyya Saṅgharakkhita. He tied the past and the future in a knot. He forgot the act of fanning.

In other places, it is shown that between the internal sense base and the external sense base lies consciousness (viññāṇa). Disregarding this, one ties them together. Think of a mirage. Through memory/perception, why does a deer mistake that distant shimmer for water? Because of craving (taṇhā) and conceit (māna), it thinks, "There is water over there, and here am I," and goes in search of water. But what appears as a mirage is a vision arising through causes and conditions. In that same way, the world is trapped between the two ends and the middle. It tries to knot the two ends together. In that attempt, it is craving (taṇhā) that comes forward. That is why craving is called yāyaṃ taṇhā ponobhavikā nandīrāgasahagatā tatra tatrābhinandinī ("this craving which leads to renewed existence, accompanied by delight and lust, finding delight here and there"). Craving has a nature of finding delight here and there. It has a nature of reproducing. This craving is described as a sticky sap (glue). Why is it shown in so many different ways? Within craving, there is both the covering nature of ignorance (avijjā) and the sticking nature of craving. Thus, this illusion is exposed here. Disregarding that things have arisen from causes and conditions, after that personal feeling (vedanā) arises, one thinks: "Ah! This is my feeling, now I have recognized it."

Next, one thinks about that recognized perception. This is what a person keeps doing. Having gone on thinking, a point comes when, without even knowing it, that person is overwhelmed by those reckonings, or rather those feelings they created themselves, through the papañca-saññā-saṅkhā born of those thoughts. For this, many more stories have to be told.

Another small story, also from Indian literature. There were three magicians. Having learned the art of magic from their teachers, they were returning home through a forest. A good opportunity arose to show their skills. The bones of a tiger were scattered here and there. Among them, the first one, to show his skill, collected the bones of the tiger and reconstructed the form of the tiger. After the skeleton was made, the second one, to show his cleverness, filled the skeleton with flesh, skin, and blood. That was the magic method he had learned. What did the third one do? He gave life to the tiger. What happened to the three of them after that? The tiger leaped up and ate all three. This simile fits here perfectly. These people were overwhelmed by the papañca-saññā-saṅkhā they themselves had created. There are many other similes in all literatures, like the story of the man with the pot of flour on his head. These demonstrate the nature of papañca in daily life. No extraordinary stories are needed; everyone can experience it themselves. At a moment when a great, powerful craving or desire arises, someone nearby has to shake you and ask, "Where are you?" In the meantime, one goes further and further into that papañca and, like that monk, does not know until one falls into a great disaster.

So, what is the cause of this? It is due to not knowing the reality, the lack of Yoniso manasikāra (Wise attention). In the Dhamma, yoniso manasikāra means returning to the place where things started. Ayoniso manasikāra (unwise attention) is running after the mirage. Think of it that way. Yoni means the source, the place of origin. That is what was said: dependent on the eye and forms, eye-consciousness arises. The contact of these three means, in truth, one turns them into three. Then one counts them as three. One forgets that consciousness arose because of these two. At the moment of counting them, one takes it as contact (phassa). This is a very deep matter. That is what lies at the end of Ven. Mahā Kaccāyana's sermon. Let us mention that part too. Where there is an eye, a form, and eye-consciousness, there is a designation (paññatti) called contact (phassa). Because of that itself, there are other designations like feeling (vedanā), etc. Where they are not, there is no contact (phassa), no feeling (vedanā), no craving (taṇhā), no applied thought (vitakka), and nothing called papañca-saññā-saṅkhā. What does that mean? We did not mention that earlier. That is what is called Nibbāna, the asaṅkhata-dhātu (the unconditioned element). Why? At some point, through yoniso manasikāra—the ultimate end of yoniso manasikāra is wisdom (paññā). Yoniso manasikāra is the seed of wisdom. When one reaches the next stage of yoniso manasikāra, consciousness subsides. Sabba-saṅkhāra-samatha—all preparations are stilled. Along with that, consciousness too must subside. It is because of preparations (saṅkhāra) that consciousness (viññāṇa) exists. At that moment, the subsiding of consciousness is the rise of wisdom. On one hand, when the light of wisdom arises, the reality of the illusion of consciousness is understood. Right there, that indeed is the supreme, deathless Nibbāna.

So, considering the time, I have said this much. Devotees may ask for further details from someone else. Consider this as a highly valuable ball of honey. If you suck this ball of honey well, you can extract the taste of Nibbāna from within it. Reminding you of this, today is the valuable Esala Full Moon Poya day, the day the Blessed One presented the sublime Dhamma to the world. In the first sermon, as everyone knows, only Ven. Aññā Kondañña understood that deep Dhamma to that extent. But subsequently, a large number of monks realized it. Through the expansion of the Dhamma, you devotees too might be thinking, "I must not be born again." So, to fulfill that, may this Dhamma sermon, supported by the virtue (sīla) you have observed, by engaging in sermon-hearing and meditation, and by completing both serenity and insight (samatha and vipassanā), lead you at some point to realize the noble cessation of the six sense bases (saḷāyatana-nirodha) in this very life, to realize the cessation of becoming (bhava-nirodha) in this very life, and to attain the supreme, deathless Nibbāna, liberated from all suffering of saṃsāra! Through the sermon delivered so far, from the Avīci hell up to the Akaniṭṭha Brahma world, if any being wishes to rejoice in the merit of hearing this Dhamma, may they, through that rejoicing, realize the supreme, deathless Nibbāna through a wished-for Bodhi (awakening)! For you devotees too, may this merit be a cause and condition for the swift realization of the paths and fruits, starting from Stream-entry (Sotāpanna), within this very Buddha-dispensation! Now recite these verses:

Ghaṭīkāra tradition, connected with the Ghaṭīkāra Sutta (MN 81)

Dear Listeners,

This noble Vesak Full Moon Poya Day is the day on which the extremely rare, miraculous event of the arising of a Buddha in the world naturally comes to our minds. Although it is an event that occurs very rarely, we, as Buddhists, believe that the arising of a Buddha in the world takes place in accordance with a certain natural law (dhammatā). This matter becomes very clear to us, especially through the Sutta discourses in which our Blessed One spoke about the Buddhas of the past. The Ghaṭīkāra Sutta in the Majjhima Nikāya is one such discourse. As an introduction to that Sutta discourse, we presented as our theme two verses extracted from the Ghaṭīkāra Sutta in verse form, found in both the Devatā Saṁyutta and the Devaputta Saṁyutta of the Saṁyutta Nikāya. On an occasion when the Blessed One was residing at Jetavana monastery in Sāvatthi, during the night, the Brahmā king Ghaṭīkāra—these Brahmā kings are also referred to by the names devatā (deities) and devaputta (sons of devas)—came during the night, paid homage to the Blessed One, stood to one side, and gave a piece of news or information to the Blessed One. What was that? It was the fact that seven Non-returner (anāgāmi) bhikkhus who had passed away in this Dispensation, immediately upon being born in the Aviha Brahmā world, attained the Fruit of Arahantship and achieved liberation. The names of those seven bhikkhus are mentioned as follows: Upaka, Palagaṇḍa, Pukkusāti, Bhaddiya, Bhaddadeva, Bāhudantī, and Piṅgiya. The Brahmā king came and declared that these seven had attained Arahantship immediately upon birth in the Aviha Brahmā world. At the same time, while that verse dialogue was taking place, this Brahmā Ghaṭīkāra related his past history in the two verses we quoted earlier.

"In the past, I was a potter in the village of Vehaḷiṅga (Kumbhakāro pure āsiṁ Vehaḷiṅge)."

"In the past, I was a potter doing the work of Ghaṭīkāra."

"I was one who supported his mother and father (Mātāpettiharo āsiṁ)."

"I was a lay disciple of Kassapa Buddha (Kassapassa upāsako)."

"Abstaining from sexual intercourse, I was a celibate free from sensual attachments (Virato methunā dhammā brahmacārī nirāmiso)."

"I was a co-villager with you (Ahuvā te sagāmeyyo)."

"In the past, I was your friend (Ahuvā te pure sakhā)."

After he said this, the Blessed One also confirmed that fact, saying, "Yes, indeed we are old friends." That old friendship is revealed to us in the aforementioned Ghaṭīkāra Sutta of the Majjhima Nikāya. The origin (nidāna) of that Sutta is recorded in the books as follows.

On one occasion, while the Blessed One was wandering on a tour in the Kosalan country with a large community of bhikkhus, he stopped at a certain place, stepped off the road, and at a certain spot, displayed a gentle smile. Ven. Ānanda thought, "What is the cause, what is the reason for the Blessed One to display a smile at this place and at this moment?" Knowing that the Tathāgatas do not smile without a cause, he arranged his robe over one shoulder, paid homage, and asked the Blessed One, "What is the cause, what is the reason for the Blessed One to display a smile?" When asked thus, the Blessed One revealed a certain history: "Ānanda, in the past, in this very region, there was a market town called Vehaḷiṅga. It was depending on that market town that Kassapa Buddha resided. Ānanda, right here was the monastery of Kassapa Buddha. Sitting right here, Kassapa Buddha gave advice to the Saṅgha." When this was said, Ven. Ānanda folded his double-layered outer robe into four, prepared a seat, and invited the Blessed One: "In that case, Venerable Sir, let the Blessed One sit on this seat. Thereby, this place will become a site used by two Buddhas." The Blessed One agreed and sat there. He then continued to relate that story further: "Kassapa Buddha resided depending on that village of Vehaḷiṅga. His monastery was right here. Kassapa Buddha had a chief attendant named Ghaṭīkāra, who was a potter. A potter by the name of Ghaṭīkāra. That potter Ghaṭīkāra had a very dear and close friend named Jotipāla. Now Ānanda, on one occasion, this potter Ghaṭīkāra said to the young man Jotipāla: 'Come, Jotipāla, let us go and see the Blessed One. Seeing such Buddhas is highly acclaimed. Come, let us go.' When he said this, the young man Jotipāla rejected it, saying: 'What is the use, Ghaṭīkāra? What is the use to me of seeing that bald-headed recluse?' For a second and a third time, Ghaṭīkāra the potter made this request. But the young man Jotipāla did not wish to go and see the Blessed One. Then the potter Ghaṭīkāra said to his friend Jotipāla: 'In that case, let us go to the river to bathe. Take your bathing requisites,' and they went to the river. Even there, the potter Ghaṭīkāra said to his friend: 'Jotipāla, the monastery of that Blessed One is very close by. Come, Jotipāla, let us go to the Blessed One.' Then, once again, the young man Jotipāla said: 'What is the use, Ghaṭīkāra? What is the use of seeing that bald-headed recluse?' and rejected it three times. Thereupon, Ghaṭīkāra grabbed the young man Jotipāla by his waist-cloth and said: 'Come, let us go and see the Blessed One.' Even so, the young man Jotipāla released his waist-cloth and rejected it, saying: 'There is no use in going,' and refused. This happened three times. Next, both of them bathed in the river. After bathing, when they came ashore, this potter Ghaṭīkāra grabbed the young man Jotipāla by his hair-lock. Holding him by the hair-lock, he said: 'Come, Jotipāla, the monastery is right here, very close. Come, let us go and see the Blessed One.' At that moment, the young man Jotipāla thought, 'I am a Brahmin. Although this potter Ghaṭīkāra is of a low caste, for him to grab me by my hair-lock like this after bathing, there must indeed be something of great value here.' Having undergone a certain awakening, he said: 'In that case, let go of my hair-lock. I will come to see the Blessed One.' Thereupon, going to Kassapa Buddha, the potter Ghaṭīkāra paid homage with great faith and sat to one side. The young man Jotipāla exchanged polite and friendly greetings and sat to one side. The potter Ghaṭīkāra introduced his friend: 'Venerable Sir, this Jotipāla is a very dear companion of mine. Please preach some Dhamma to him,' thus requesting the declaration of the Dhamma. The Blessed One delivered a Dhamma talk to both the potter Ghaṭīkāra and the young man Jotipāla, giving them a gladdening Dhamma instruction. After listening to it, as the two of them arose, paid homage to the Blessed One, and were leaving, the young man Jotipāla asked the potter Ghaṭīkāra: 'Why, Ghaṭīkāra, having heard such Dhamma, do you not ordain?' Then the potter Ghaṭīkāra replied: 'Why, Jotipāla, don't you know that I am one who supports his blind and elderly parents?' Then Jotipāla said: 'In that case, I shall ordain.' Once he said that, Ghaṭīkāra took him back to the Buddha and said: 'This is my friend, Jotipāla, who wishes to ordain. May the Blessed One ordain him.' Thereupon, the Blessed One ordained the young man and gave him higher ordination (upasampadā)."

Two weeks after that ordination and higher ordination ceremony, the Blessed One set out on a tour towards Vārāṇasī with the community of bhikkhus. Having arrived in Vārāṇasī—behold these wonderful events! Kassapa the Blessed One resided in the Isipatana Deer Park in Vārāṇasī. At that time, the name of the King of Kāsī was Kikī. Kikī, the King of Kāsī, heard that the Blessed One had now arrived in Vārāṇasī and was residing in Isipatana. The King came with his retinue. When the King came to see him, paid homage, worshipped him, and sat down, the Blessed One gladdened the King with a talk on the Dhamma. King Kikī invited the Blessed One, along with the Bhikkhu Saṅgha, to the palace for the almsfood the following day. The Blessed One accepted the invitation. The following day, once the preparations had been made and the King sent word, the Blessed One proceeded to the palace with the community of bhikkhus. The King personally served the almsfood to the Blessed One and the community of bhikkhus, and at the end of the meal, he sat near the Blessed One and said: "Venerable Sir, please spend this rainy season (vassa) in Vārāṇasī. I shall attend on the Saṅgha in this manner," thus making an invitation for the rains-residence. Then Kassapa Buddha said: "Great King, I have already accepted an invitation for the rains-residence. Therefore, I cannot accept this." When he said this, the King requested for a second and a third time. Sadness (domanassa) arose in the King's mind over the rejection of his invitation. The King asked: "Is there an attendant for the Blessed One who is superior to me?"

The Blessed One declared: "There is, Great King. In the village of Vehaḷiṅga, there is a potter named Ghaṭīkāra. He is my chief lay disciple. Great King, your mind became sad because I rejected this. But the mind of this potter Ghaṭīkāra would never harbor such displeasure or sadness towards me." Saying this, Kassapa Buddha went on to declare numerous virtues of the potter Ghaṭīkāra to the Great King. "Great King, as to what kind of person this lay disciple, the potter Ghaṭīkāra, is: he has gone for refuge to the Buddha, gone for refuge to the Dhamma, gone for refuge to the Saṅgha; furthermore, abstaining from taking life and so forth, he observes the five precepts with excellent understanding. He possesses unwavering confidence (aveccappasāda) in the Buddha—what is called aveccappasāda is the pure faith in the Triple Gem that arises through the realization of the Paths and Fruits (magga-phala), through the realization of the Dhamma. He possesses unwavering confidence in the Buddha, which arises from realization. He is possessed of such confidence in the Dhamma, and likewise in the Saṅgha." Explaining that aspect, he continued further as follows: "Moreover, this potter Ghaṭīkāra partakes of food only once a day. He leads a celibate life. Not only that, but this Ghaṭīkāra does not handle money, gold, silver, pearls, or gems. What does he do instead? Since he is a potter, he must obtain clay, mustn't he? Instead, this potter Ghaṭīkāra does a very wonderful thing: he does not dig the earth with his own hands. He brings clay from the collapsed banks of the river, or from earth piled up by mice, fashions vessels, shapes them, and even then, he does not sell them for money. Having made them, he places them in front of his house and tells people: 'Take these vessels, and leave for our use something like rice, mung beans, or chickpeas.' That is his trade. He is one who possesses such a wonderfully righteous livelihood. He also supports his blind parents. Furthermore, finally, he declares that this potter Ghaṭīkāra, having destroyed the five lower fetters (orambhāgiya-saṁyojana) that drag one down in this saṁsāra, is a person who has attained the stage of a Non-returner (anāgāmi)."

The Blessed One did not stop there; he went on to relate certain unusual incidents. You lay devotees will find them amazing. The incidents you will hear next are of a wonderfully fresh fragrance, unique to the era of a Buddha's arising. He declared several such incidents: "Great King, on one occasion when I was residing in the market town of Vehaḷiṅga, while walking for almsfood (piṇḍapāta), I went to the house of this potter Ghaṭīkāra. Since only his blind parents were there, I went and asked: 'Where has Bhaggava gone?' The Blessed One addresses the potter Ghaṭīkāra as 'Bhaggava'. Those blind parents said: 'Venerable Sir, your attendant has gone out of the house at this moment. There is rice in the pot, and soup in the soup bowl. Please take and partake of it.'" This is what they said to the Blessed One. "Then, having been given permission by the parents, I took rice from the pot and soup from the soup bowl, and sat there and partook of it. After I partook of it and departed, the potter Ghaṭīkāra returned home and asked his parents: 'Who has taken rice from the rice pot and soup from the soup bowl and eaten?' Then they said: 'Son, Kassapa Buddha came, and when he inquired thus, we gave him permission, and he partook of it.' Thereupon, the potter Ghaṭīkāra said: 'It is a great gain for me, a massive gain, that the Blessed One places such trust in me!' He expressed the joy (pīti) that arose due to that event. Because of that joy, the potter Ghaṭīkāra experienced that joy and happiness (pīti-sukha) for two whole weeks, and his blind parents experienced it for one week."

He then related another such incident: "On another day, while I was again on almsround, I went to the house of the potter Ghaṭīkāra and asked his parents: 'Where has Bhaggava gone?' On that occasion too, he had gone out of the house. They said: 'There are flour-cakes (kumāsa-piṇḍa) in the pot, and soup in the soup bowl. Please take and partake of it.' I took those flour-cakes along with the soup from the soup bowl, partook of them, and departed. When the potter Ghaṭīkāra returned and asked: 'Who has taken these flour-cakes?', and was told that the Blessed One had come and taken them, he exclaimed: 'A valuable thing, a great gain has come to me, that the Blessed One came to my house and partook of food with such trust!' Here too, it is said that due to that joy, the potter experienced that joy and happiness for half a month—two weeks—and his parents experienced that joy and happiness for a week."

Then, the Blessed One related yet another unique incident to King Kikī: "Great King, on another occasion when I was residing in the village of Vehaḷiṅga, the roof of my hut began to leak due to the rain. I told the bhikkhus to go and see if there was any thatch at the house of the potter Ghaṭīkāra. Then the bhikkhus said: 'Venerable Sir, there is no loose thatch at the house of the potter Ghaṭīkāra. However, there is thatch covering his roof.' 'In that case, go and bring that thatch.' The bhikkhus went and began to take the thatch that was on the roof of that house." Now, there is a slight difference of opinion there. In modern translations, it is often presented not as the roof of his house, but as the roof of the potter's workshop. However, the Commentaries (aṭṭhakathā) indicate that it was indeed the roof of the house. In any case, this was a very miraculous event that occurred. When the Saṅgha was taking the thatch from the roof, the blind parents asked: "Who is removing the thatch from the roof?" Then they replied: "We are bhikkhus. The hut of the Blessed One is leaking. We are taking it for that." "Take it, please take it!" said the blind parents, expressing great joy. Then the bhikkhus took the thatch from that roof and thatched the hut of the Blessed One. When the potter Ghaṭīkāra returned home—the Blessed One is still speaking to the King—he asked his parents: "Why is there no thatch on this roof?" Then they told him: "The bhikkhus took this thatch." Even on that occasion, the potter Ghaṭīkāra said: "A great gain has come to me! Such trust has been placed in me by the Blessed One." There too, it is mentioned that the potter experienced that joy and happiness (pīti-sukha) for half a month, and his parents for about a week. Not only that, but a miracle is also recorded here. For three whole months, the sky was the only roof over the house of the potter Ghaṭīkāra. Yet, it is said that it did not get wet in the rain. That is to say, there was no roof, but it did not get wet in the rain. Greatly miraculous things regarding this are mentioned in the Commentaries. Be that as it may, the Blessed One declared these events to the King. When he said this, the King exclaimed: "A massive gain has come to this potter Ghaṭīkāra! A massive gain!" Expressing his appreciation, the King, in order to manifest his delight, sent five hundred cartloads of red hill-rice, along with suitable condiments and provisions, to the market town of Vehaḷiṅga through his royal officers. When the royal officers who brought it said: "Venerable Sir, the King requested us to hand these over to you," the potter Ghaṭīkāra replied: "Kings are people with many duties and much business. Let these remain for the King himself. I have no use for them," and rejected them. The Blessed One declared: "Such a person, Great King, is the potter Ghaṭīkāra."

Next, the discourse is concluded; that Ghaṭīkāra Sutta ends like this: "Ānanda, perhaps you may think that the young man Jotipāla was someone else. But, Ānanda, I myself was the young man Jotipāla. I was that young man Jotipāla." This is a very wonderful story. Anyone listening to this might be astonished. This Bodhisatta, who was destined to become the next Buddha, when invited by his friend as many as nine times, saying, "Come, let us go see the Blessed One," said, "What is the use of seeing that bald-headed recluse?" Even for a Bodhisatta, actions of this nature are called "abuse of noble ones" (āriyūpavāda). Disparaging a Buddha is a grave unwholesome deed (akusala). The reason for this is shown to be Brahmin pride, or whatever it was, which led to it being uttered nine times. There are various opinions regarding this matter. In the Pāli canon, there is a section called the Pubbakammapiloti Apadāna. In that section, our Blessed One on one occasion gives an account to the bhikkhus of the past unwholesome deeds (kamma) that affected his life. On that occasion, it is shown there: "Being the young man named Jotipāla, because of the disparagement I directed towards Kassapa Buddha in that era, the Path to Supreme Enlightenment was obstructed for me for six years, and I was compelled to practice self-mortification (dukarakiriyā) for those entire six years. My mind was inclined to perform those self-mortifications." Now, we know that not every Buddha practiced self-mortification. The reason he had to practice self-mortification for six years was that he followed the teachings of the Nigaṇṭhas in that direction until he found the Middle Path. This occurred, as mentioned, as a result of the disparagement directed at Kassapa Buddha. Some say that unwholesome results do not affect Buddhas. But you devotees know that even for the Blessed One, and likewise for Ven. Moggallāna the Great Arahant—who was so highly psychic-powered—various events of this kind are mentioned, where he was beaten until his bones were crushed in his final moments because of having killed his parents in a past life. Even after attaining Arahantship, one must pay off those remaining kammic debts in a severe manner. Why? Because the attraction is towards this physical body; both wholesome energy and unwholesome energy are attracted to this body. Even Arahants experience gain and loss; the eight worldly conditions (aṭṭha-lokadhamma) are common to all. One must understand it in this way.

Through this story, you lay devotees can obtain a very important lesson and an excellent example. Indeed, the life of this potter Ghaṭīkāra was a truly wonderful life; it culminated in the Brahmā world. At that time, he had to take care of his parents. It was due to that sacrifice that he did not ordain. As he told the young man Jotipāla, the reason he did not ordain after hearing such Dhamma was to support his parents. How did he live? It was a highly miraculous life. What a pure livelihood (ājīva) it was, in a way that lay devotees of today cannot even imagine! That is to say, he did not handle money. He did not dig the earth with his own hands, and he did not engage in deceptive trade under the name of commerce. He supported his parents in that very manner. Consider this: it was because he performed service to the Buddha while supporting his parents that the potter Ghaṭīkāra was appointed to the position of chief attendant. Now, in the case of our Blessed One, it was always a member of the Saṅgha (Ven. Ānanda) who was the attendant. This is a very wonderful thing. The chief attendant of Kassapa Buddha was this layman. Furthermore, in addition to those virtues of the potter Ghaṭīkāra, think of what a valuable spiritual friend (kalyāṇa-mitta) he was! Even when his friend refused nine times, without quarreling with him, he advised him repeatedly, and finally, even dragging him by his hair-lock, he directed the young man Jotipāla towards the monastic life. What a precious spiritual friend! According to our books, even after an intervening period between two Buddhas (buddhantara) had passed, and finally while residing in the Brahmā world, he continued to perform that very act of spiritual friendship.

This is an account from the Nidānakathā of the Jātaka Commentary, which you devotees must have heard many times. When our Blessed One, as Prince Siddhartha, renounced the world and went to the far bank of the river Anomā, deciding to ordain, and cut his own hair with his sword—reminiscent of being held by the hair-lock—it was that very spiritual friend, the Brahmā king Ghaṭīkāra, who brought the eight monastic requisites (aṭṭha-parikkhāra), as recorded in the books. Thus, as you lay devotees can understand, the character of Ghaṭīkāra is a great example. At the same time, we see that the Buddha was not biased. Had he accepted the invitation of a king, a king's invitation for the rains-residence, it would have been highly advantageous for the bhikkhus and the Blessed One. Yet he rejected all of that. It is virtue (guṇa) that Buddhas respect. It is virtue, not power or status. For this reason, accepting the rains-residence invitation made by that poor potter, he rejected the King's invitation. Next, look at the greatness of that potter Ghaṭīkāra: he rejected all the red hill-rice sent by the King in so many carts. He lived by making pots after bringing clay with great difficulty. See how a person who did such work, carrying on one hand the heavy responsibility of supporting his blind parents, and on the other hand, serving as the chief attendant of the Blessed One—with all of this, how did this person live? In that very manner, possessing a highly righteous livelihood, while observing virtue (sīla), he led a wonderfully miraculous life. If we go a bit deeper, from this story into the deeper aspect of the Dhamma, let us now direct our minds along the message brought by the Brahmā king Ghaṭīkāra.

You devotees have heard that this stage of Non-returner (anāgāmi) is the state just below that of an Arahant. To say something about it, ten fetters (saṁyojana) that bind one to this saṁsāra are mentioned in this Dhamma. Among them, the fetters that drag one downwards are called lower fetters (orambhāgiya-saṁyojana), namely: the dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi), doubt (vicikicchā), adherence to rules and rituals (sīlabbata-parāmāsa), sensual lust (kāmarāga), and aversion (paṭigha). Those five fetters drag one downwards. After transcending them and becoming a Non-returner, there remain the higher fetters (uddhambhāgiya-saṁyojana) that pull one upwards. What are they? Attachment to form (rūpa-rāga), attachment to the formless (arūpa-rāga), conceit (māna), restlessness (uddhacca), and ignorance (avijjā). Those five still remain. They are extremely subtle, and that is why Non-returners have not yet attained Arahantship, but remain in that stage. Furthermore, why is it called anāgāmi? Because they do not return to a mother's womb. They have absolutely no energy left to go to a mother's womb. Instead, they are born in the Pure Abodes (suddhāvāsa), of which there are five worlds. Some of you may have heard of them: Aviha, Atappa, Sudassa, Sudassī, and Akaniṭṭha. Thus, the highest point of existence (bhava) is considered to be Akaniṭṭha. Those five are the Pure Abodes, and among them, this word "Akaniṭṭha" is a puzzle to many. As far as we understand, it is precisely due to these higher fetters that these Non-returners are called "those of upward stream" (uddhamsoto). Normally, a stream flows downwards. When caught in a stream, the tendency is to be dragged downwards. But here, what is meant by uddhamsoto is a journey towards final extinguishment (*pariNibbāna. That is why Akaniṭṭha is considered the highest point of existence. Now we speak of "from Avīci to Akaniṭṭha."

Next, the Blessed One has delivered a special discourse concerning those Brahmā worlds and the manner in which Non-returners attain Arahantship, in the Sattaka Nipāta of the Aṅguttara Nikāya, titled Satta Purisagatiyo ("Seven Destinations of Persons"). "Seven Destinations of Persons" means that the Buddha has illustrated the manner in which seven types of Non-returner persons attain Arahantship, using unique similes as follows. Let us first state those similes. The Blessed One preaches: Just as when an iron slab that has been heated all day—now, when an iron slab is beaten on an anvil in a smithy, sparks of fire arise, sparks leap up; let us call it a flake, a tiny flake—in the first instance, when that iron slab is beaten, a spark or flake arises, and as soon as it arises, as soon as it leaps up, it is extinguished right there. That is the first instance. Next, the second instance is shown as follows. We shall state the similes first. While beating that iron slab in the smithy, that spark leaps up, goes high into the air, and is extinguished up there. The third instance is where that spark goes high and, as it descends towards the earth, is extinguished before it hits the ground. Those are the three instances. Those three instances are shown, devotees; now, when describing Non-returner persons, not only in that Sutta but also in other places, they are divided into five categories or five groups according to the manner in which they attain Arahantship. Let us state that first. It is mentioned as follows: they are divided into five categories: antarā-parinibbāyī, upahacca-parinibbāyī, asaṅkhāra-parinibbāyī, sasaṅkhāra-parinibbāyī, and uddhamsoto-akaniṭṭhagāmī. However, those five categories are shown here as seven. Now, those first three categories we mentioned belong to the antarā-parinibbāyī—attaining final extinguishment (*pariNibbāna in-between. Now, understand that the spark represents the kammic velocity, or rather, the force of preparations / Preparations (saṅkhāra-bala), the energy of preparations / Preparations (saṅkhāra-sakti), that the Non-returner person carries. To show how quickly this happens after passing away from here, it is compared to when that iron slab is beaten and a spark arises, and immediately upon arising, it is extinguished. In the second instance, it goes some distance and is extinguished. In the third instance, it flies through the air and is extinguished before hitting the ground. All three of these instances belong to the antarā-parinibbāyī. Next, it is said that the iron flake flies through the air and is extinguished after falling onto the ground. This illustrates the upahacca-parinibbāyī. In this case, they attain Arahantship after some delay. Next, the simile the Blessed One shows is that as the iron is cut, a piece, a flake, or a spark, let us say, flies through the air and falls onto a small heap of wood-chips or a heap of grass. Falling there, it burns it up and is extinguished. This is called asaṅkhāra-parinibbāyī. There are some very subtle distinctions here. Then, the next instance is shown where that spark falls on a large heap of grass or a large heap of wood-chips. Falling there, it burns it, and after completely burning up that large heap of grass or heap of wood-chips, it is extinguished. This is called sasaṅkhāra-parinibbāyī. Next, it says that in the final instance, falling on a large heap of grass or wood-chips, it burns it completely, but does not stop there. It burns the nearby bushes, and burns parks and gardens. Burning along in this way, it reaches some water, a rock, or a road, and being deprived of fuel (indhana), it is extinguished. That final instance is what is called uddhamsoto-akaniṭṭhagāmī. That is to say, this simile was spoken to illustrate the case of that Non-returner person who, passing through the Brahmā worlds of Aviha, Atappa, Sudassa, and Sudassī, finally attains the liberation of the Fruit of Arahantship in the Akaniṭṭha Brahmā world. From this simile of the spark shown to us, what we must understand is that what the Blessed One called Nibbāna is extinguishment. This entire becoming / existence (bhava) is burnt up. To apply our simile further, think for a moment: we highlighted in our discourses on Dependent Co-arising (paṭicca-samuppāda) that the secret of this becoming / existence (bhava) lies between consciousness (viññāṇa) and Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). This is proved in one place in the series of verses we selected as our theme, where the Brahmā king Ghaṭīkāra indicates the attainment of Arahantship by those seven bhikkhus with this kind of statement, in this verse:

> ‘Yattha nāmañca rūpañca

> asesaṁ uparujjhati’

"Where Name-and-Form are ceased without remainder,"

> ‘Taṁ dhammaṁ pariññāya

"Having fully understood that Dhamma, they have cut the bond of becoming / existence (bhava)." That they, having understood this, cut the bond of becoming / existence is what is declared in that verse. From this, it is clear that the bond of becoming / existence lies between this Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) and consciousness (viññāṇa). As we have said before, if we think about it for a moment to understand that simile, the collision between consciousness (viññāṇa) and Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) is like the beating of that heated iron slab. It is through this that all the six sense-bases (saḷāyatana) arise—as we said before, from preparations / Preparations (saṅkhāra) caused by ignorance (avijjā), and then through that energy, becoming / existence (bhava) is built up. Kamma and so forth are also built up by that. Finally, we understand from what was said about those Brahmā kings; according to the books, even Non-returner Brahmā kings, sometimes even after attaining Arahantship, remain for aeons (kalpas), because the lifespan in those Brahmā worlds is extremely long. That is why it is often said that the human world is the best place to attain Arahantship. Even after attaining Arahantship in those places, there is still an existence that has no real meaning. What is the reason? One has to exhaust the extremely subtle kamma attracted to this body, attracted to this existence, as long as the life-faculty (jīvitindriya) persists. Therefore, they say that lifespans of aeons exist in those realms. Even after attaining Arahantship, those Brahmā kings sometimes have to remain. For this reason, because the lifespan in the human world is very short, it ends right there. All those affairs are finished. That is why Ven. Sāriputta said: "I do not wish for death, nor do I wish for life. I wait, like a worker waiting for his wages." He waits for death. That is why in the final moments of the Blessed One, as recorded in the Mahāparinibbāna Sutta, even such a supreme Buddha did not easily get even a little water. Even so, through various remnants of kamma, even the Blessed One's life was spent amidst a great mass of suffering / unsatisfactoriness / stress (dukkhakkhandha) related to the eight worldly conditions. You devotees have also heard about other Arahants. Take Aṅgulimāla, who killed so many people; it is recorded in the books about him, in the Aṅgulimāla Sutta. Even after attaining Arahantship, when he went on almsround, he would sometimes return with his head broken and blood flowing, having been hit by discarded potsherds or clods thrown by lay devotees. Why? Because of that kammic attraction. Even if they did not throw them intentionally at him, when boys threw stones, they would go and hit Ven. Aṅgulimāla's head. Therefore, one must contemplate the danger inherent in this becoming / existence (bhava). As long as this cage of a body remains, Buddhas, Paccekabuddhas, and Arahants all have to experience those kammic results (kamma-vipāka). The cycle of kamma is that dangerous. It was within such a cycle of kamma that the young man Jotipāla, due to some delusion or pride, rejected the invitation nine times in that manner; one cannot think that no unwholesome deed was committed thereby. As recorded in the books, the Blessed One himself declared to the bhikkhus on a certain occasion: "It was due to such and such kamma that I suffered in this way in my life." We must take this as a lesson. It is said that the reason he practiced self-mortification for six years was also due to this. That is one aspect.

Even if we look at it from the other side, we spoke about the state of a Non-returner (anāgāmi). What is meant by Akaniṭṭha? In terms of becoming / existence (bhava), if one passes away from a deva world or a Brahmā world, one usually goes to a lower realm. But here, a very wonderful thing happens. Suppose one does not attain Arahantship in the Aviha Brahmā world itself. Next, think of that simile of the spark. If the spark is not extinguished as soon as it falls—being "extinguished" means attaining Arahantship. Otherwise, if it is not extinguished in the air, or after falling, then at least in those wood-chips... that is how the story goes. Because they progressively take birth in the Brahmā worlds of Aviha, Atappa, Sudassa, Sudassī, and Akaniṭṭha. The reason for this, in an indescribably subtle manner, depends on the strength of wisdom (paññā-sakti) of each individual; all of this is ignited and cleared through wisdom. According to this force of preparations / Preparations (saṅkhāra-sakti), until that strength of wisdom is fully developed, even for the Non-returner person... That is why the Blessed One declared on one occasion: "Just as even a tiny bit of feces is foul-smelling, I do not praise becoming / existence (bhava) even for a single moment." Becoming / existence is that dangerous. In the same way, consider, devotees, the danger in preparations / Preparations (saṅkhāra), which the Blessed One has explained and highlighted in another discourse. A verse is mentioned in the Dhammapada, which some people interpret very superficially:

> Jigacchā paramā rogā

> saṅkhārā paramā dukhā

> Etaṁ yathābhūtaṁ ñatvā

> nibbānaṁ paramaṁ sukhaṁ

We explained this on one occasion. When one says "hunger is the ultimate illness," doctors might object. If one tries to interpret it, one would have to say that the biggest sickness in the world is hunger. Who would accept that? They would point to other things. But why it is called the greatest illness, the ultimate (parama), is because even if all other illnesses are eliminated, this subtle illness we pointed out—this illness called the digestive fire (jaṭharāgni)—is indeed the most dangerous illness. Jigacchā paramā rogā: that is why people say "it is a sickness that makes one groan involuntarily"; hunger is that dangerous. It must be taken as a simile for that.

Jigacchā paramā rogā, saṅkhārā paramā dukkhā: preparations / Preparations (saṅkhāra) are indeed the ultimate suffering / unsatisfactoriness / stress (dukkha). We do not think so; we think that our troubles—illnesses, pains, worries, and various other disasters—are the great suffering. But the Buddhas declare: saṅkhārā paramā dukkhā—preparations / Preparations themselves are suffering / unsatisfactoriness / stress (dukkha). Preparations / Preparations (saṅkhāra) arise due to ignorance (avijjā). Why? Because as long as one remains in the darkness of ignorance, preparations are prepared. Some are gross, some are subtle. Some bring about kammic results. Some maintain becoming / existence (bhava) continuously. These are called preparations for becoming / existence (bhava-saṅkhāra). It is because of unfinished preparations for becoming / existence (bhava-saṅkhāra) that those Non-returners are born in a separate world and spend aeons in that manner. When one thinks about it, it is a very wonderful thing. We have given similes for this, for you devotees to understand. The existence in those Brahmā worlds is like a spinning top, which from a distance appears perfectly still. But it is spinning at high speed. In the same way, becoming / existence is sustained by the velocity of these preparations / Preparations (saṅkhāra-vega). In those Brahmā worlds, it is a meaningless existence, yet one is compelled to wear them out. The difference between that and Arahantship is found in the Suttas. If we try to explain it using those passages, it is stated as follows. Sometimes, when describing Arahantship, it is said: asmimāna-samugghātaṁ pāpuṇāti diṭṭheva dhamme nibbānaṁ—"one attains the uprooting of the conceit 'I am' (asmimāna) and Nibbāna in this very life." It is said that the conceit "I am" is eradicated from its root. As long as the conceit "I am" (asmimāna) is not uprooted from its root, the suffering of saṁsāra is not ended. Thus, that conceit, the conceit "I am", still remains within the Non-returner person. In some places, it is stated in another way: that Non-returner person is said to have attachment to the Dhamma (dhamma-rāga) and delight in the Dhamma (dhamma-nandī). Attachment to the Dhamma also ultimately becomes a bond. It is said that by that very attachment to the Dhamma (teneva dhamma-rāgena) and by that delight in the Dhamma (tena dhamma-nandiyā), they do not return to this world, which is why they are called Non-returners. From this, it is clear that those are the subtle attachments (bandhana) existing in the world.

This is further revealed in a Sutta we have mentioned before in these discourses, namely the Khemaka Sutta. When a bhikkhu was sent to inquire about the health of Ven. Khemaka, he replied: "I do not see any of these—form, feeling / sensation (vedanā), and so forth—as 'this I am' or 'this is my self (attā)'. Yet, I am not an Arahant either." When he said this, those sixty bhikkhus did not believe it. "How can this be?" they thought. "If one does not see the five aggregates (pañcakkhandha) as 'I' and 'mine', one must indeed be an Arahant." Being unable to avoid it, Ven. Khemaka went, taking his walking staff, and explained it to the bhikkhus using two similes. Let us recall those two similes. He gave two wonderful similes. Suppose the scent of a certain flower wafts. We know that the scent is present. But we cannot say whether that scent comes from the petals, from the stalk, or from the pollen. In that very manner, this Venerable One says: "None of these appear to me as self. Yet, a very subtle underlying tendency (anusaya) of the conceit 'I am' (asmi) remains within me." Thus he gave the simile of the flower. Likewise, Ven. Khemaka gave another subtle simile on that occasion. Just as a washerman washes a soiled cloth. Using something like the soap we use today—let us call it soap for the sake of the simile—applying something like soap, he removes the dirt from the cloth and hands it back to the owner. Although the cloth is washed and the dirt is gone, yet the scent of the soap still remains, the scent of the soap still remains. When the owner places it in a chest or wardrobe, after some time, even that scent fades away. What is shown by this is how subtle it is. The journey from there onwards consists of the extremely subtle fetters: attachment to form (rūpa-rāga), attachment to the formless (arūpa-rāga), conceit (māna), restlessness (uddhacca), and ignorance (avijjā). It is through their binding that those Pure Abodes (suddhāvāsa) exist; if they are not ended right here in this very life, those like Upaka and Pukkusāti, who had developed their minds over a long period in saṁsāra and became Non-returners, attained Arahantship immediately upon birth in the Aviha Brahmā world, as declared by the Brahmā king on that occasion. However, some Brahmā kings spent aeons in that manner. Yet, it is not a downward journey. A downward journey is one that goes according to the force of kamma (kamma-sakti), the velocity of kamma (kamma-vega). This is not like that. This is a far more subtle velocity of preparations / Preparations (saṅkhāra-vega). Many speak of these things in a confused manner. But it is through the preparing (saṅkhāra) caused by ignorance (avijjā) that the two, consciousness (viññāṇa) and Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa), rotate, just like a water-wheel; it is through this rotation that the six sense-bases (saḷāyatana) and kamma are produced. Keep that in mind. We spoke about mental factors (nāma-dhamma). Look at feeling / sensation (vedanā), perception (saññā), volition (cetanā), contact (phassa), and attention (manasikāra). We take volition (cetanā) as the middle finger. When the Buddha says, "Volition, O bhikkhus, I declare to be kamma" (cetanāhaṁ bhikkhave kammaṁ vadāmi), you devotees must bear in mind: within those mental factors (nāma-dhamma), there is the moment when kamma is prepared. It is through the collision of consciousness (viññāṇa) and Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) that the kamma affecting numerous future lives is prepared. The Blessed One has declared this as well:

> 'Nāhaṁ, bhikkhave, sañcetanikānaṁ kammānaṁ katānaṁ upacitānaṁ appaṭisaṁviditvā vyantībhāvaṁ vadāmi'

The Blessed One shows there the danger of kamma: "Bhikkhus, I say that accumulated kamma does not wear away without giving its result." When it is said that it does not wear away without giving its result, one feels afraid. But the Blessed

One explains it further in a subtle manner; if one had to experience the result of every single kamma committed, as the Nigaṇṭhas claim, one could never escape from saṁsāra. But the Blessed One presents a wonderful analysis there. We have explained these in detail before. The Blessed One divides them into three parts: some kamma is experienced in this very life (diṭṭhadhamma-vedanīya) and thus ended. Other kamma is experienced in the next birth (upapajja-vedanīya) and thus ended. Yet other kamma is experienced in subsequent periods (aparāpariya-vedanīya). Thus, it was in a deep sense that he said all kamma wears away according to the manner in which kammic results are experienced. But the manner of wearing away varies. That is why we spoke of the liberation of mind through loving-kindness (mettā-cetovimutti) on a previous occasion, concerning certain wholesome deeds (kusala-kamma). It is through their vast energy that the ability to wear away kamma exists. That is why within this Dispensation, one can end the suffering of saṁsāra and realize Nibbāna. But just because this was said, we must not think that this is an easy task. On one hand, that cycle of kamma operates in a terrifying manner. Let us consider it this way. Even when we are told to observe virtue (sīla), and all these things, it does not mean one does them only as long as one lives in the world. On occasions that present themselves, without even knowing it, just like the young man Jotipāla—did he do it intentionally?—those words escaped his mouth nine times, even though he was to become a Buddha next. Thereby, a great unwholesome deed was accumulated. Devotees, understand it in this way. As long as ignorance (avijjā) remains in any of us, preparations / Preparations (saṅkhāra) accumulate; a preparing is performed. Through that preparing, the aforementioned collision between consciousness (viññāṇa) and Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) takes place with extreme rapidity. Now, many interpret the phrase "swiftly changing is the mind" (lahuparivattaṁ cittaṁ) very simply, as if the mind spins like turning a stick. It is not so. We have shown that lahuparivattaṁ cittaṁ means a turnaround, a translation. A turnaround between what? A turnaround between consciousness (viññāṇa) and Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). With extreme speed, that consciousness grasps and releases Name-and-Form. It grasps another and releases it. Within that velocity, various unique values are derived from it. That is to say, with an unimaginable velocity. It is precisely because of this velocity that it appears to us as a single, continuous thing. For this very reason, the true nature of this world is veiled by the perception of compactness (ghana-saññā) and so forth. Through insight (vipassanā), through radical attention / wise attention (yoniso manasikāra), one must progressively understand the mental and physical phenomena (nāmarūpa-dhamma), and understand this state which goes as "tangled within, tangled without" (anto jaṭā bahi jaṭā).

We have analyzed these on a previous occasion. Between name and form, there is a wonderfully strange tangle called "tangled within" (anto jaṭā). The great elements (mahābhūta-dhamma) are recognized through those aforementioned mental factors (nāma-dhamma): feeling / sensation (vedanā), perception (saññā), volition (cetanā), contact (phassa), and attention (manasikāra). These great elements are things that cannot even be recognized directly; according to the state of existence we acquire, an animal recognizes them in one way. A human recognizes them in another way. A deva recognizes these great elements in yet another way. Mental factors (nāma-dhamma) are what go along with such great elements. That is the danger in Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). That Name-and-Form is, from that side, a tangle within (anto jaṭā). Next, mental consciousness. We said that Name-and-Form has a nature of being reflected in consciousness (viññāṇa). This is just a reminder. What is reflected in consciousness is called "name" (nāma). That is why on various occasions, papers are presented analyzing physical phenomena (rūpa-dhamma) in a highly academic manner nowadays. Nevertheless, we have shown in a very simple way: this form (rūpa) is a perception of form (rūpa-saññā). It is only the form created in the mind based on the elements, through those mental factors (nāma-dhamma). Remember the story about Narcissus. The very drama played with that shadow is what goes on throughout this entire saṁsāra. Narcissus, because of the reflective nature of his image in the water, repeatedly tried to embrace the water-deity and died. We too, not knowing the reflective nature present in consciousness, take these things presented to us as real things and run after a mirage; that is why the Blessed One preached in that manner. The serious becoming / existence (bhava) arising through this proceeds, on one hand, in a subtle manner. In this way, those like attachment to form (rūpa-rāga) go up to the highest point of existence, up to the Akaniṭṭha Brahmā world. That is precisely why the Blessed One said: saṅkhāras are the ultimate suffering / unsatisfactoriness / stress (saṅkhārā paramā dukkhā). The subtlest of all suffering / unsatisfactoriness / stress in the world is preparations / Preparations (saṅkhāra). Then, how does one destroy preparations? By destroying ignorance (avijjā).

Devotees, bear in mind that passage we took as the theme of our sermons on Nibbāna:

> ‘Etaṁ santaṁ etaṁ paṇītaṁ

> yadidaṁ sabbasaṅkhārasamatho

> sabbūpadhipaṭinissaggo taṇhakkhayo

> virāgo nirodho nibbānaṁ’

"This is peaceful, this is excellent, namely, the stilling of all preparations (sabba-saṅkhāra-samatha), the relinquishment of all assets (sabbūpadhi-paṭinissagga), the destruction of craving / thirst (taṇhakkhaya), dispassion (virāga), cessation (nirodha), Nibbāna." This can also be connected to the simile of the spark we discussed. "This is peaceful, this is excellent." What is sabba-saṅkhāra-samatha? It is because all preparations (saṅkhāra) are not stilled (samatha) that one goes to those Brahmā worlds. Along with the stilling of all preparations, there is sabbūpadhi-paṭinissagga. "Assets" (upadhi) means those assets built up in this saṁsāra—the five aggregates of grasping; as long as one does not relinquish them, one has to experience that suffering / unsatisfactoriness / stress. Therefore, sabbūpadhi-paṭinissagga means past preparations, future preparations, and present preparations. All of them must be relinquished. The state where all of them are relinquished is sabbūpadhi-paṭinissagga. Going hand in hand with that is taṇhakkhaya—the destruction of craving / thirst. Virāgo—all those things are washed away. Virāga means fading away of lust, complete non-attachment; along with that, the cessation of becoming / existence (bhava-nirodha). This cycle, which has been spinning for so long, ends right there. It culminates in Nibbāna. That is "Nibbāna is the ultimate happiness" (nibbānaṁ paramaṁ sukhaṁ). Devotees, you are going forward in a very difficult time. Even though you devotees bless us in various ways, we are compelled to remind you that we will not live much longer. Therefore, at this moment, you must strive to accomplish your own work. If you devotees have gained some strength from this discourse on this Vesak day, instead of just listening and throwing it away, if you make use of it to support your own practice, keeping the life of the lay disciple Ghaṭīkāra as your exemplar, and try to walk this path of Dhamma, you must firmly believe that you can, at the very least, at the very least, become a Non-returner (anāgāmi). No matter what anyone says, today's discourse is special. Making this the basis to strengthen your future journey in the Dhamma, and using the virtue (sīla) observed by you devotees today—especially on this noble day of Vesak—may everyone receive the strength to make their Dhamma studies and meditation fruitful with more and more diligence in the coming year, and to reach the supreme goals they aspire to! This is my wish.

If there is anyone from Avīci up to Akaniṭṭha who wishes to rejoice in this merit of preaching and hearing the Dhamma, may they, by so rejoicing, realize the noble, deathless, great Nibbāna through a Bodhi of their aspiration! Say these verses with this thought.

Namo tassa bhagavato arahato sammāsambuddhassa

(Homage to the Blessed One, the Worthy One, the Fully Self-Enlightened One)

Pali Stanza:

Samāhito sampajāno sato buddhassa sāvako, Āsave ca pajānāti āsavānañca sambhavaṃ; Maggañca khayagāminaṃ, āsavānaṃ khayā bhikkhu nicchāto parinibbuto.

From:

Verse 373 from the Bhikkhuvagga (Chapter on the Monk) of the Dhammapada

Dear Listeners,

The most distinctive characteristic of the fruit of Arahantship is the destruction of the influxes (āsavas). It is precisely because of this that Arahants are known as khīṇāsava (those whose influxes are destroyed) and Nibbāna is known as the destruction of influxes (āsavakkhaya). Accordingly, one can comprehend the significance given to the word āsava in the path leading to Nibbāna. The two verses extracted from the Itivuttaka Pāḷi that we have chosen as the theme for today's sermon are indeed like an introduction to the exposition of the term āsava. That sutta begins in this manner, to quote the words of the Buddha:

“Vuttaṁ hetaṁ bhagavatā vuttamarahatātipi me sutaṁ: ‘Tayo me, bhikkhave, āsavā. Katame tayo? Kāmāsavo, bhavāsavo, avijjāsavo. Ime kho, bhikkhave, tayo āsavā’ti.”

"This was said by the Blessed One, said by the Arahant, so I heard: 'Monks, there are these three influxes. Which three? The influx of sensual desire (kāmāsava), the influx of Bhava (Becoming) (bhavāsava), and the influx of ignorance (avijjāsava). These, monks, are the three influxes.' Thus having begun, the meaning declared there by the Buddha is presented in this sutta through two verses. It is those two that we have chosen as our theme:"

Samāhito sampajāno sato buddhassa sāvako,

Āsave ca pajānāti āsavānañca sambhavaṁ, maggañca khayāgāminaṁ āsavānaṁ khayā bhikkhu nicchāto parinibbuto.

The meaning of this is: the disciple of the Buddha, concentrated, endowed with clear comprehension (sampajañña) which is right wisdom, and mindful, understands the influxes, and also knows the origin of the influxes. Where the influxes cease, he knows that too. He also knows the path leading to their cessation. With the destruction of the influxes, the monk, free from the hunger of Taṇhā (Craving), is fully extinguished. This is the meaning of those verses. Guided by these verses, we can understand that a disciple of the Buddha must necessarily understand the influxes, the origin of the influxes, their cessation, and the path leading to their cessation.

Similarly, we come across the Sammā-diṭṭhi Sutta of the Majjhima Nikāya. In that Sammā-diṭṭhi Sutta, dear devotees, our chief disciple, the Great Arahant Sāriputta, sets out sixteen ways of defining right view (sammā-diṭṭhi). He analyzes sammā-diṭṭhi in sixteen ways, progressing from the simple to the deeper and deeper. Having analyzed it, finally, as the sixteenth explanation of sammā-diṭṭhi, he presents the aspect of the influxes (āsavas). To express in Sinhala what Ven. Sāriputta the Great Arahant presents, it is in this manner: 'When a noble disciple knows the influxes, knows the origin of the influxes, knows the cessation of the influxes, and knows the path leading to the cessation of the influxes, to that extent, too, a noble disciple is one of right view (sammā-diṭṭhi).' Having said so, he then explains what these three influxes are: kāmāsava, bhavāsava (the influx of existence), and avijjāsava. Next, he shows the origin of the influxes as: 'avijjāsamudayā āsavasamudayo'—with the arising of ignorance, the influxes arise. Next, he explains the cessation of the influxes: 'avijjānirodhā āsavanirodho'—with the cessation of ignorance, the influxes cease. The path leading to the cessation of the influxes is shown as the Noble Eightfold Path. From this, the point necessary for sammā-diṭṭhi is directly expressed in relation to those influxes.

Now let us directly look at the word āsava. In understanding certain words, we are compelled to go as far as their etymology. If we look at how this word āsava is formed: 'āsavantīti āsavā'—they are called āsavas in the sense of 'flowing in' or 'flowing out' (oozing). In common parlance, the word āsava is used for alcoholic liquor, for spirits. Through that, we can extract two meanings relevant to this. When we think of alcoholic spirits, they have an intoxicating nature; likewise, the intoxicating quality produced by stagnation and fermentation in one place is called āsava. Furthermore, that āsava, or the essence of spirits, has a potency to produce more spirits; it has the power to flow into other things added to it and turn them also into an intoxicating state. When we contemplate according to this, the three greatest intoxications by which the world is intoxicated are what the Buddha has presented as kāmāsava, bhavāsava (the influx of existence), and avijjāsava. Due to being lured by sensual pleasures over a long period, being intoxicated within those sensual pleasures, stagnating and fermenting within them, the influxes that arise are kāmāsava. Stagnating within that existence called Bhava (Becoming) which is mentally constructed and thought of as 'I' and 'mine', being intoxicated and stagnating in that manner, the influxes generated are bhavāsava (the influx of existence). Understand that the influxes coming from stagnating for a long period within ignorance (avijjā) itself, by preferring darkness and remaining within it, are avijjāsava. Generally speaking, in simple terms, what we have to say is that this meaning of 'flowing' is what is important here. The reason for this can be understood as this sermon progresses. Furthermore, the reason why the Great Arahants who compiled the Dhamma (saṅgītikiārakas) decided to compile the Sabbāsava Sutta as the second sutta of the Majjhima Nikāya is because this term āsava is extremely important.

The Sabbāsava Sutta is the second sutta of the Majjhima Nikāya. The Buddha begins it with this passage: 'Sabbāsava-saṁvara-pariyāyaṁ vo, bhikkhave, desessāmi'—'Monks, I shall teach you the exposition of the restraint of all influxes.'

Now, in the first sutta of the Majjhima Nikāya, the Mūlapariyāya Sutta, it is stated: 'Sabbadhamma-mūlapariyāyaṁ vo, bhikkhave, desessāmi'—the sutta begins saying, 'Monks, I shall expound to you the root-scheme of all things, of every object that comes to the mind.' Thus the Mūlapariyāya Sutta was preached. Here, in the Sabbāsava Sutta, it is declared: 'I shall preach the method of restraining all influxes.' Next, another important point is expressed right at the beginning. Regarding this restraint or destruction of the influxes, the Buddha declares thus:

'Jānato ahaṁ, bhikkhave, passato āsavānaṁ khayaṁ vadāmi, no ajānato no apassato'—'Monks, I say that the destruction of the influxes is for one who knows and sees, not for one who does not know and does not see.' From that, we can understand that if the influxes arise because of ignorance, it is through knowing and seeing that the influxes can be destroyed. We can comprehend that. Next, it is said: 'Kiñca, bhikkhave, jānato kiñca passato āsavānaṁ khayaṁ vadāmi?'—'Knowing what, monks, and seeing what, do I say there is the destruction of the influxes?' Here, an important point comes to light: 'yoniso manasikārañca ayoniso manasikārañca' (Yoniso manasikāra (Wise attention) and unwise attention). Therefore, what the noble disciple must primarily understand is the difference between Yoniso manasikāra (Wise attention) and ayoniso manasikāra (unwise attention). The Buddha explains the reason for this. First, he speaks of ayoniso manasikāra. Since we have explained this word to you before, there is no need to analyze it anew. Generally, those who are hearing this for the first time can consider: ayoniso manasikāra is what is most prevalent in the world. Think of it as improper reflection. Yoniso manasikāra (Wise attention) is proper reflection. Now, first he speaks about ayoniso manasikāra:

'Ayoniso, bhikkhave, manasikaroto anuppannā ceva āsavā uppajjanti, uppannā ca āsavā pavaḍḍhanti'—'Monks, in one who attends unwisely, unarisen influxes arise, and arisen influxes increase.' On the other hand: 'Yoniso ca kho, bhikkhave, manasikaroto anuppannā ceva āsavā na uppajjanti, uppannā ca āsavā pahīyanti'—'Monks, in one who attends with Yoniso manasikāra (Wise attention), unarisen influxes do not arise, and arisen influxes are abandoned.' Within this, regarding the significance of the two words Yoniso manasikāra (Wise attention) and ayoniso manasikāra, a highly important point is raised here. In fact, many people, including Western scholars who question this matter, find it a problem. At first glance, there is a seemingly contradictory statement in the declaration of Ven. Sāriputta. What is it? He introduces the influxes as kāmāsava, bhavāsava (the influx of existence), and avijjāsava. The word ignorance (avijjā) is mentioned there too. Thus, ignorance is also an influx. Next, when showing the origin of those influxes, it is said: 'avijjāsamudayā āsavasamudayo'—with the arising of ignorance, the influxes arise. Contemplate on this, dear devotees: at first glance, is it not a dilemma, an inconsistent statement? Ignorance is one of the influxes. Even so, it is said that the influxes arise because of ignorance. This is a somewhat deep matter. However, it is according to the point we mentioned about stagnation, and the point about knowing, that this must be resolved.

This is precisely why, first of all, this vision (dassana) regarding this is shown in the Sabbāsava Sutta. There has come an ignorance that is difficult to resolve, a wonderful ignorance whose end cannot be found. Yet, through stagnating within ignorance, there is a tendency to drag on continuously in the manner described. The only way to restrain and prevent it from dragging on continuously is Yoniso manasikāra (Wise attention) which was brought to light by the Buddha. As we have told you before, Yoniso manasikāra (Wise attention) is indeed the primary seed of wisdom. One might say, 'We are worldlings (puthujjanas); we have no wisdom. Wisdom belongs only to Arahants and noble ones (ariyas).' But everyone has attention (manasikāra). We have explained much about these in our sermons on dependent arising (paṭiccasamuppāda). Anyone can turn ayoniso into yoniso. Yoniso manasikāra (Wise attention) is the primary seed of wisdom. That is why the Buddha highlights that the first thing a noble disciple must know, must see, is the difference between Yoniso manasikāra (Wise attention) and ayoniso manasikāra. For it is through Yoniso manasikāra (Wise attention) that the backbone of ignorance is broken, let us say. Because it is Yoniso manasikāra (Wise attention) that helps us to prevent unarisen influxes of ignorance from arising, and to abandon arisen influxes of ignorance. Let us proceed from there.

The more one contemplates this sermon, the second discourse in the Majjhima Nikāya, the deeper and more wonderful it becomes, just like the first discourse. There, the Buddha further speaks about two individuals: the uninstructed worldling (assutavā puthujjana)—the one who does not know—on one side, and the instructed noble disciple (sutavā ariyasāvaka) on the other. First, he speaks about the uninstructed worldling. The uninstructed worldling does not know the things fit for attention, nor does he know the things unfit for attention. Because he does not know the things fit for attention and does not know the things unfit for attention, he attends to things unfit for attention and does not attend to things fit for attention. Next, the danger of that is shown. As mentioned before, by attending to things unfit for attention, unarisen influxes of sensual desire (kāmāsava), Bhava (Becoming) (bhavāsava), and ignorance (avijjāsava) arise, and those already arisen increase. Understand it briefly, as described earlier; thus, through Yoniso manasikāra (Wise attention), unarisen influxes do not arise, and arisen influxes do not increase. That is the benefit. So, due to not knowing Yoniso manasikāra (Wise attention), the uninstructed worldling reflects in an incorrect, ayoniso manner.

Next, the ways of incorrect reflection are set out in that sutta. Since there is much to say, I will try to state it briefly. As these have been mentioned on various occasions, this is how the Buddha shows the thought-process of the uninstructed worldling. How does that person reflect improperly? By putting forward the concept of 'I'. Regarding the past, the uninstructed worldling thinks thus: 'Was I in the past? Was I not in the past? What was I in the past? How was I in the past? Having been what, what did I become in the past?' It is by putting the story of 'I' forward that he reflects and thinks in this manner. Next, regarding the future, he reflects thus: 'What will I be in the future? Will I not be in the future? How will I be in the future? Having been what, what will I become in the future?' That is about the future. Regarding the present, too, he harbors an inner doubt in this manner: 'Am I? Am I not? What am I? How am I?' Next comes: 'Where has this being come from? Where is it bound?' It is clear that all this is because he starts to reason with ayoniso manasikāra, putting forward the 'I' as a soul (ātman). Everything found in all other religions in the world is what has been constructed through this ayoniso manasikāra.

The Buddha points out that by reflecting in this way on the past, the future, and the present, one falls into one of six views. What are those six views? Either one takes up the view: 'A self exists for me' (atthi me attā), or 'No self exists for me' (natthi me attā). He takes that to be a true view. Or else, he thinks, 'With self I perceive self.' Or else, 'With self I perceive non-self.' Or else, 'With non-self I perceive self.' The last, sixth one, is presented as: 'This self of mine that speaks and feels, which experiences the results of good and bad deeds in this saṁsāra—that self is stable, eternal, and does not change.' There, he has firmly stood on the self-view. In that manner, the uninstructed worldling falls into one of six views.

Next, the thinking of the instructed noble disciple. He knows the things fit for attention. He knows the things unfit for attention. He knows the danger that arises from attending to things unfit for attention. Let us consider briefly what those things fit for attention are. Next, the Buddha shows how he reflects: he reflects, 'This is dukkha' (suffering / unsatisfactoriness / stress)—'idaṁ dukkhan'ti'; he reflects, 'This is the origin of dukkha'; he reflects, 'This is the cessation of dukkha'; he reflects, 'This is the path leading to the cessation of dukkha.' In short, it is reflecting in accordance with the Four Noble Truths. Reflecting in accordance with the Four Noble Truths, without stories of 'I' or 'person', is Yoniso manasikāra (Wise attention). As the ultimate end of that reflection, the Buddha shows that through that reflection, the noble disciple—whether instantly or after some time, though there is no fixed time limit—breaks the three fetters: sakkāya-diṭṭhi (dogma of self-illusion / view of existing group/body), vicikicchā (skeptical doubt), and sīlabbata-parāmāsa (attachment to rules and vows). This is regarding the noble disciple. There lies that vision (dassana).

Next, the Buddha points out the methods of restraint. 'Monks, there are influxes to be abandoned by vision (dassana-pahātabbā).' We shall mention them briefly. There are influxes to be abandoned by restraint (saṁvara-pahātabbā). There are influxes to be abandoned by using (paṭisevanā-pahātabbā), which means proper utilizing. There are influxes to be abandoned by tolerating (adhivāsanā-pahātabbā), which means patience. Next, there are influxes to be conquered and restrained by avoiding (parivajjanā-pahātabbā), which means steering clear. Next, there are influxes to be restrained by removing (vinodanā-pahātabbā), which means dispelling. Finally, it is said there are influxes to be restrained by developing (bhāvanā-pahātabbā), which means meditation. Let us consider each of these briefly.

The influxes to be abandoned by vision are sakkāya-diṭṭhi (dogma of self-illusion / view of existing group/body), vicikicchā, and sīlabbata-parāmāsa. They must be abandoned through the aforementioned attention. That is why the Buddha declared—let the devotees recall: 'Sahāvassa dassanasampadāya, tayassu dhammā jahitā bhavanti' (With his achievement of vision, three things are discarded). Next, recall: 'Diṭṭhiñca anupagamma, sīlavā dassanena sampanno' (Not falling into wrong views, virtuous, endowed with vision). All of these point to the value of vision; they are abandoned by vision, and cannot be abandoned by any other method. They cannot be grabbed and thrown away. Sakkāya-diṭṭhi (dogma of self-illusion / view of existing group/body), vicikicchā, and sīlabbata-parāmāsa must be abandoned solely by reflecting in accordance with the Truth. When speaking about wrong views, I missed mentioning some of the words used by the Buddha. The Buddha describes how the uninstructed worldling ends up in his thinking with a wonderful sequence of words: 'Monks, this is finally a thicket of views (diṭṭhigataṁ), a wilderness of views (diṭṭhigahanaṁ), a desert of views (diṭṭhikantāraṁ), a contortion of views (diṭṭhivisūkaṁ), a vacillation of views (diṭṭhivipphanditaṁ), a fetter of views (diṭṭhisaṁyojanaṁ)...' there are many such words. That person, going through those views, gets lost in a desert of views, in a wild jungle. That uninstructed worldling is never freed from jāti (birth / arising) and jarāmaraṇa (decay and death / aging and death). The instructed noble disciple, without putting 'I' forward, reflects according to the Truth which is presented as the unique teaching (sāmukkaṁsika desanā) of the Buddhas, and thereby breaks sakkāya-diṭṭhi (dogma of self-illusion / view of existing group/body), vicikicchā, and sīlabbata-parāmāsa which he was unable to break so far.

Next, regarding 'abandoned by restraint', let us consider it briefly. It refers to guarding the sense doors (guttadvāratā), which is the restraint of the senses. The term vighāta-pariḷāha (vexation and distress) is mentioned when speaking of this restraint; also, the word vighātapariḷāha is applied there in relation to incorrect reflection. If some weariness, distress, or dust (defilement) arises due to non-restraint of the senses, they are removed by restraint. Think about it a little: if certain influxes, weariness, and dust can arise due to not restraining the eye, they are eradicated by restraining the eye. The Buddha preaches in that manner about all the six sense bases, including the eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind. That is about those 'to be abandoned by restraint' (saṁvarā pahātabbā). If certain influxes flow in due to non-restraint, they cease to exist through restraint, along with the vexation and distress (vighāta-pariḷāha) that arise in connection with them.

Next, 'to be abandoned by using' (paṭisevanā pahātabbā). In our words, dear devotees, paṭisevana means utilizing or using. There, the Buddha points out what is truly the bare minimum required for the Saṅgha to survive: clothing, food, lodging, and medicine. Indeed, in all instances where these restraints are mentioned, the occurrence of the phrase 'paṭisaṅkhā yoniso' (reflecting wisely) is important. It is the very same importance given to the term Yoniso manasikāra (Wise attention). 'Yoniso' means contemplating with wisdom. Even when speaking of restraint, it is 'paṭisaṅkhā yoniso'—reflecting wisely, one closes the eye. Actually, when we speak of restraint, one cannot keep the eye, ear, and nose closed all the time. Instead, we have shown the correct term: guarding the doors (guttadvāratā), having a gatekeeper, which means one must be able to close the door according to the situation. That is restraint. Restraint happens based on that. That is 'paṭisaṅkhā yoniso'—reflecting wisely, one closes the eye, ear, and nose against those defiled sense objects according to the situation.

Likewise, let us say a robe is necessary; considering its minimal utility, as stated in the passage of reflection (paccavekkhaṇa): 'patisaṅkhā yoniso cīvaraṁ paṭisevāmi, yāvadeva sītassa paṭighātāya, uṇhassa paṭighātāya, ḍaṁsamakasavātātapasiriṁsapasamphassānaṁ paṭighātāya, yāvadeva hiri-kopīna-paṭicchādanatthaṁ'—in this way, one uses the robe considering its minimal utility, to ward off the trouble from cold, heat, gadflies, mosquitoes, wind, sun, and creeping things, and simply for the sake of covering the parts that arouse shame. Next, regarding alms-food (piṇḍapāta), 'patisaṅkhā yoniso'—we have spoken about these many times. You too, dear devotees, must be practicing this to some extent. That is the reflection on food. Contemplating with wisdom: 'I do not take this food for amusement, nor for intoxication, nor for physical beauty, nor for beautification' (neva davāya na madāya na maṇḍanāya na vibhūsanāya), unlike how ordinary people do. Not for entertainment or building up the body, but 'only for the support and maintenance of this body' (yāvadeva imassa kāyassa ṭhitiyā). 'Only'—the word 'only' comes first. Only for maintaining this body, for keeping it going (yāpanāya), for ending the harm of hunger (vihiṁsūparatiyā), as an aid to the holy life (brahmacariyānuggahāya); and because one cannot survive without taking food. 'Thus I shall eliminate the old Vedanā (Feeling) (of hunger), and I shall not generate new Vedanā (Feeling) (from overeating).' One takes food in a manner suitable for meditation, intending: 'Thus my easy living (phāsuvihāra) will be secured.' Next, regarding lodging (senāsana), it is similar to what was said about clothing: to ward off the distress of cold, heat, gadflies, mosquitoes, and so on, and 'yāvadeva utuparissayavinodanatthaṁ'—only to dispel the trouble of the seasons.

Lastly, medicine (gilanappaccaya) is spoken of in the same way: 'uppannānaṁ sārīrikānaṁ veyyābādhikānaṁ vedanānaṁ paṭighātāya'—to ward off arisen physical Vedanā (Feeling) due to illness; because if they are not treated, they will cause the aforementioned distress, so one takes medicine. These are 'to be abandoned by using' (paṭisevanā pahātabbā)—the influxes to be removed by proper utilization.

Next is shown 'to be abandoned by tolerating' (adhivāsanā), which is patience. If, for some reason, we do not receive those bare minimum requisites, we must train ourselves to bear it without shouting and making the mind corrupt. The things to be tolerated are mentioned in this way: a certain monk is patient (khamo hoti); he has the capacity to endure. If cold, heat, hunger, thirst, trouble from gadflies and mosquitoes arise, and if they cannot be stopped, he endures them. Likewise, he cultivates the strength to endure illnesses and severe bodily pains. 'Duruttānaṁ durāgatānaṁ vacanapathānaṁ'—the capacity to bear harsh and ill-spoken words of criticism from others. In this manner, if weariness and distress arise due to not bearing or not tolerating certain things, they are dispelled through endurance. That is 'to be abandoned by tolerating' (adhivāsanā pahātabbā).

Next, 'to be abandoned by avoiding' (parivajjanā pahātabbā), which is avoiding and steering clear. This is illustrated as follows: a certain monk avoids wild elephants, wild horses, wild dogs, and similar beasts. Next, he avoids thorny places, pits, and so forth. Not only that, he keeps away—keeps far away—from associating with evil friends and visiting unsuitable places (agocara) that might bring him disrepute. For, by not avoiding them, various troubles such as blame, and vexation and distress (vighāta-pariḷāha) might come upon him. These can be overcome through avoidance. That too is a method of restraint.

Next, 'to be abandoned by removing' (vinodanā pahātabbā). Vinodana means dispelling, not 'amusement' (as in common Sinhala vinoda). What is shown there are the very points presented as the perception of abandoning (pahāna-saññā) in the Girimānanda Sutta. What are they? A certain monk 'does not tolerate an arisen sensual thought (kāmavitakka), he abandons it, dispels it, ends it, and brings it to non-existence' (uppannaṁ kāmavitakkaṁ nādhivāseti, pajahati, vinodeti, byantīkaroti, anabhāvaṁ gameti). This is how it is said. Regarding thoughts of sensual desire (kāmavitakka), thoughts of ill-will (byāpādavitakka), thoughts of cruelty (vihiṁsāvitakka), and any arisen evil unwholesome states, what is the course of action to be taken? He dispels them. The series of words used for this dispelling is also extremely important. If we think about it deeply: 'nādhivāseti, pajahati, vinodeti, byantīkaroti, anabhāvaṁ gameti'. Let us explain these words with a small simile. Suppose you are in your house doing some important work, and some useless drunkard comes in. We say, 'You are not needed here, get out.' He does not listen. He tries to enter. We push him out. Even so, he tries to come back. Next, what do we do? We push him further and further away, all the way to the gate. Then, we push him out of the gate and close it. Think about it a bit: nādhivāseti means 'does not tolerate'—the first step we mentioned. 'You are not needed here, go away.'

Nādhivāseti, pajahati—telling him to go again. Vinodeti—pushing him along. Byantīkaroti—pushing him right to the edge of the garden and putting him outside the gate. Anabhāvaṁ gameti—locking the gate so he cannot return. This is just a small simile. In that manner, one must be restrained by dispelling thoughts of sensual desire (kāmavitakka), thoughts of ill-will (byāpādavitakka), thoughts of cruelty (vihiṁsāvitakka), and evil, unwholesome states. For, if any weariness or distress arises due to not dispelling them, they are removed by dispelling them.

Finally, there is development (bhāvanā). 'Monks, there are influxes to be abandoned by development (bhāvanā-pahātabbā).' What are they? There, it directly mentions the factors of enlightenment (bojjhaṅgas): mindfulness (sati), investigation of states (dhammavicaya), energy (viriya), joy (pīti), tranquility (passaddhi), concentration (samādhi), and equanimity (upekkhā). These are to be developed leaning towards Nibbāna. 'Here, monks, a monk, reflecting with yoniso (radical attention / wise attention), develops mindfulness... based on seclusion (viveka-nissitaṁ), based on dispassion (virāga-nissitaṁ), based on cessation (nirodha-nissitaṁ), culminating in relinquishment (vossagga-pariṇāmiṁ).' Understand the others in the same way. The four terms—based on seclusion, and so forth—all refer to Nibbāna. Basing on and aiming at Nibbāna, which is seclusion and cessation, one develops the factors of enlightenment like mindfulness and investigation of states. There too, it is said that if any weariness and dust (defilement) arise from not developing them, they are removed by developing them. That is the general introduction. Because 'vision' (dassana) comes first when explaining these, someone might think: 'Then to become a Sotāpanna, it is enough to hear the Dhamma and gain that vision. The rest are not needed. The other activities like the reflection on food are not needed. Meditation is not needed either.' That is a wrong view. Whatever discourse the Buddha presented, it is highly systematic. That vision is important. 'Sammā-diṭṭhi-pubbaṅgamā'—right view (sammā-diṭṭhi) leads the way. We mentioned that the influx of ignorance (avijjāsava) and the influx of views (diṭṭhāsava) must be suppressed first before doing all the other things. It does not occur by itself. The others are also relevant to it. Therefore, one should not think in that way. Those other factors are indeed relevant to meditation itself. However, at the end, it is presented systematically: finally, 'abandoned by development' (bhāvanā-pahātabbā), which is the development of the factors of enlightenment. Consider it briefly in this manner.

We have shown the seven methods of abandoning the influxes as the summary of the Sabbāsava Sutta. The Buddha concludes it thus: when a monk has abandoned by vision those influxes to be abandoned by vision, has abandoned by restraint those influxes to be abandoned by restraint, has abandoned by using those influxes to be abandoned by using, has abandoned by tolerating those influxes to be abandoned by tolerating, has abandoned by avoiding those influxes to be abandoned by avoiding, has abandoned by removing those influxes to be abandoned by removing, and has abandoned by development those influxes to be abandoned by development—then that monk has destroyed Taṇhā (Craving). He has overturned all hindrances (nīvaraṇas) and all fetters (saṁyojanas). He has become an Arahant. That is the end of the Sabbāsava Sutta.

Next, let us contemplate a little more on this sutta. There are things in it to go even deeper. Now, we spoke about these āsavas. The āsavas are kāmāsava, bhavāsava (the influx of existence), and sometimes diṭṭhāsava is also mentioned. As we mentioned earlier, within the intoxicating quality, there is a nature of flowing forward. Within sensual pleasures and temptations, there is that intoxicating nature, and it has the tendency to bring more temptations. Next, regarding views (diṭṭhi), it is the same. One who remains in them for a long time cannot get free from them. They are entangled in them to that extent. In some places, it is called diṭṭhāsava (influx of views) as well. But that generally belongs to ignorance (avijjā). Bhavāsava refers to existence, which is Bhava (Becoming). The craving for existence (bhava-taṇhā) is extremely severe, is it not? Next, ignorance is liking darkness, disliking light, and being pleased only with darkness. It does not like light. Keep in mind that what are mentioned are kāmāsava, bhavāsava (the influx of existence), avijjāsava, and in some places, diṭṭhāsava as well.

Now next, there is a word called ogha (flood), which is a closely related word. We must show the difference between these two. On a previous occasion, I pointed this out briefly. Now, to see how significant this word ogha is, despite the availability of countless suttas, the Great Arahant compilers of the Dhamma presented the Oghataraṇa Sutta as the very first sutta of the Saṁyutta Nikāya. In brief, it is like this: during the night, a deity comes and asks the Buddha, 'How, dear sir (mārisa), did you cross over the flood?' There are four floods: kāmogha, bhavogha, diṭṭhogha, and avijjogha. Four of them: the flood of sensual desire, the flood of existence, the flood of views, and the flood of ignorance. He asks the Buddha how he crossed over these four floods. The Buddha gives a brief answer in a very riddlesome verse: 'Without halting and without straining, I crossed over the flood' (appatiṭṭhaṁ anāyūhaṁ). When the deity asks why he says so, he explains further: 'If I halted, I sank; if I strained, I was swept away. Therefore, without halting and without straining, I crossed over safely.' That is the sutta. But there is a very deep meaning here. We pointed this out on a previous occasion too. The Middle Path (majjhimā paṭipadā) is found right here. That is why we showed it through words like 'practical' and 'relative'. This discourse is about the flood (ogha).

Now let us try to bring the word āsava close to this. When we go near a stream, we see a torrent of water flowing along. We want to cross over it. Once we step into it to cross over, it does not appear to us simply as a flowing flood (ogha), but as water flowing against us. Think about it. The moment we step in, we cannot even trust our foothold; we are swept away. We cannot even take the next step. We are swept along by the current. Then, we look at that same flood not as water flowing away, but as water flowing towards us (or rushing upon us). There lies the term āsava (flowing in/upon). When the noble disciple crosses over these four floods, it is not easy to escape from this current, from this flow—especially with that 'intoxicating quality' we mentioned earlier, which has been flowing for a long time due to its momentum. You know, dear devotees, that at the beginning, the Buddha spoke of two extremes: indulgence in sensual pleasures (kāmasukhallikānuyoga)—there is nothing new to tell you about that. Next, due to the Niganṭha view that 'pleasure is to be attained through pain' (dukkhena sukhaṁ adhigantabbaṁ), he performed painful austerities for six years to torture the body. He went to that extreme. It is between those two extremes that the Buddha discovered this Middle Path. Here, halting is indulgence in sensual pleasures; within that, one sinks down even unto hell. Next, just as the Niganṭhas did, the Buddha too finally realized that he was straining, and through straining, he was swept away. Instead, one must cross over carefully. It is that very thing, dear devotees, which is found in this Sabbāsava Sutta.

So why is this called 'the exposition of the restraint of all influxes' (Sabbāsava-saṁvara-pariyāya)? Because once we step into the water, in crossing over, when we look at the world, there is a situation where some things are such that we cannot do with them, yet we cannot do without them either. Contemplate on it a little. If we contemplate from the very beginning, some vision (dassana) is necessary for our life. If we grasp the aforementioned views, we will revolve within them forever. The Buddha spoke about the person subject to sakkāya-diṭṭhi (dogma of self-illusion / view of existing group/body) using the simile of a dog. Now, if a dog is tied to a post or a leash, it just revolves and revolves around it. It cannot go beyond that. In the same way, 'assutavā puthujjanassa gaddulabaddho'—just as a dog tied to a post only revolves around it without any escape, so there is no escape for one who has taken up sakkāya-diṭṭhi (dogma of self-illusion / view of existing group/body). Therefore, the Buddha showed another standpoint in its place: the Four Noble Truths. That is indeed what we do, dear devotees, by keeping sammā-diṭṭhi at the forefront (sammā-diṭṭhi-pubbaṅgamā), and walking this path. That is how view (diṭṭhi) becomes primary. Next, think of how to escape the torrent of water in the journey from there. Dear devotees, regarding restraint (saṁvara), we cannot keep our two eyes closed. Certain Brahmins held such a view: they said that sense restraint means not seeing with the eye and not hearing with the ear. The Buddha ridiculed those views. To remain in that way (is impossible).

Instead, the Buddha said to be a true gatekeeper when necessary. That is 'paṭisaṅkhā yoniso'—reflecting wisely, one restrains the eye, restrains the ear. That is how the Middle Path is. Likewise, regarding food, the Buddha went to the extreme, did he not? He completely rejected food until his body was extremely emaciated, and having performed great difficult practices, he realized that this was not correct. Instead, we have to take food. Thus, considering the bare minimum requirements, namely the four requisites. Now, unlike the sense restraint (indriya-saṁvara) mentioned earlier, teachers of the past refer to this as the 'restraint through knowledge' (ñāṇa-saṁvara). One becomes restrained through wisdom by reflecting, so that one does not get swept away by craving for food, craving for taste, and so forth. 'Only'—the term 'yāvadeva'—'Only as a support to the holy life do I take this food,' thus turning even that into a meditation. That is paṭisevanā (using). There too, understand that one cannot do without food. We must go on this journey to Nibbāna keeping some vision at the forefront. That was given through the Four Noble Truths. Next, in going on that journey, we need the four requisites: clothing, food, lodging, and medicine. Considering their minimal value, considering their necessity, 'paṭisaṅkhā'—one takes alms-food while reflecting wisely. Next, consider the others in the same way. Suppose we go for alms-food and do not receive any. The Buddha is speaking with focus on the lives of the bhikkhus. If, for some reason, we do not have lodging or other deficiencies exist, instead of going to fight with lay-donors saying, 'Why don't you look after us who have ordained?'—one must have the strength to bear them. That is adhivāsanā (tolerating). Endurance of paṭisevanā is also needed for that. What is tolerated is cold, heat, hunger, thirst, trouble from gadflies and mosquitoes when living in the forest—every single one of them. Not only that, but also the taunts, insults, and various other things spoken by humans; those too must be tolerated. Because if defilements arise due to not enduring them, vexation and distress (vighāta-pariḷāha), weariness, and fever will arise.

Understand that these are the very same things. Particularly when speaking of restraint, recall that it is generally mentioned: 'viharantaṁ pāpakā akusalā dhammā'—to prevent the flowing in of evil, unwholesome states related to covetousness and dejection, one restrains the eye, ear, nose, and so forth. Likewise, patience. We usually expect certain things, but when what we expect is not received, there arises in the mind vighāta-pariḷāha—meaning the weariness and fever arising from disappointment and dejection. The strength to bear them to eradicate that distress is adhivāsanā (endurance). Likewise, some things are to be avoided (parivajjanā). Now, one has to go to the forest to meditate. Just because one goes, saying 'I am a yogi (yogāvacara)', one does not go in front of wild elephants, tigers, or bears. One tries to stay safe from those dangers as much as possible. Not only that, one avoids evil friends. One avoids unsuitable places (agocara). For, they can bring disrepute. It is by contemplating wisely that one does so. That is 'to be abandoned by avoiding' (parivajjanā pahātabbā).

Next, 'to be abandoned by removing' (vinodanā pahātabbā). This too can be easily understood: by contemplating the stream of thoughts that arise in the mind, contemplating their dangers, and dispelling them. Finally, it is said 'to be abandoned by development' (bhāvanā pahātabbā): if any influxes arise through (not developing) states like mindfulness (sati), investigation of states (dhammavicaya), energy (viriya), and joy (pīti), they are eliminated through development. Why is all of this stated? It is to cross over the four floods (caturogha). Crossing over the four floods is not something one does by merely looking on. These problems are for the person who has actually stepped into it to cross over. The Buddha showed the answer to those problems in the Sabbāsava Sutta: the methods of restraining them. Next, recall what we have mentioned before: the depth of this Middle Path shown by the Buddha. The aspect of attention (manasikāra). We have told you on previous occasions, in the talk about nāmarūpa-viññāṇa (Name-and-Form and Consciousness), that it is not something found in the forest; out of the five factors—Vedanā (Feeling), saññā (perception), cetanā (volition), phassa (contact), and manasikāra (attention)—the Buddha utilized attention (manasikāra) to aid his Middle Path. As we said in that simile, if there is no witness for a court case, one of the respondents is pardoned and made a state witness to get the story out; in the same way, what the Buddha did was catch this attention (manasikāra) which is hidden among the mental states (nāma-dhammas). He himself was the biggest thief as ayoniso-manasikāra; gathering Vedanā (Feeling), saññā, cetanā, and phassa (contact), he has dragged us through saṁsāra for so long. The Buddha caught him by the neck and said, 'You shall be our witness. But from today, you must abandon ayoniso and become yoniso. We pardon you.' And finally, it is from him that we get everything revealed. That yoniso-manasikāra (radical attention / wise attention) is what we called the primary seed of wisdom. That is why, taking 'dassanā pahātabbā' in that way, and separating ayoniso and yoniso, it is based on this that the Buddha brought forth the courage necessary for us to practice the path. Otherwise, there is no standpoint. One cannot start from here. For, recall again the point we mentioned earlier.

Ignorance is one of the influxes. Yet, it is because of ignorance that the influxes arise. To tame that arising, we put aside wrong view (micchā-diṭṭhi), keep right view (sammā-diṭṭhi) at the forefront, and walk this journey with yoniso-manasikāra (radical attention / wise attention) itself. In this manner, we can understand the values related to the path of these influxes from this perspective. Within that state of intoxication, the world continuously has a higher power of temptation within sensuality (kāma), becoming (Bhava (Becoming)), views (diṭṭhi), and ignorance (avijjā). To break these, the Buddha presented this Noble Eightfold Path. That too begins with sammā-diṭṭhi (right view). The path of sammā-diṭṭhi, sammā-saṅkappa, sammā-vācā, and so on, ending in sammā-samādhi. That is why it is said that the Noble Eightfold Path itself is to be taken as the destruction of the influxes. Just like these āsavas, think of the word ogha (flood) as representing the habitual currents of saṁsāra that have come over a long period. It is for these saṁsāric habitual currents that words like āsava and ogha are used. Escaping that current is like escaping a torrent of water; it is extremely difficult. That is why it is said that once you step into it, you are either swept away or you sink. Those two extremes are the deepest matter in the Buddha's Dhamma. That is what is called the Middle Path. The Buddha too realized this through his search. He fell from one extreme to the other. Finally, he understood. Having understood the true nature of this world, (he saw that) regarding these four requisites and other things, we cannot do with them, yet we cannot do without them either. There, the word yoniso—reflecting wisely—it is through that, at some point, that one proceeds carefully. Stepping into a rapidly flowing torrent of water, without halting and without straining, one cannot bet and say, 'I will go from here to exactly there, as if drawing a straight line.' Once you step into it, you must proceed gradually, yielding to the water as well. Dear devotees, contemplate on this carefully. One who crosses over a torrent of water must proceed while yielding to it, yet he must also make progress; he must cut across it. That is the strength found in this Dhamma. The Buddha has shown this in various ways through the verses of the Dhammapada.

Where does one go when freed from the floods of these influxes? That is indeed why Nibbāna is presented as an island. That island is shown as the place crossed over from those floods: 'Dīpaṁ kayirātha medhāvī, yaṁ ogho nābhikīrati'—'Let the wise man make an island which the flood cannot overwhelm.' If one has cut through the floods and gone to the other side without being swept away by the torrents of water, at that moment, that person is on an island. What is that island? It is the liberation of the fruit of Arahantship (arahattaphala-vimutti). We have highlighted this in various sermons. There are certain suttas that mention this: 'Evaṁ sammā vimuttassa, bhikkhave, bhikkhuno cebi cakkhuviññeyyā rūpā āpāthaṁ āgaccheyyuṁ, amissīkatamevassa viññāṇaṁ hoti ṭhitaṁ āneñjappattaṁ.' To that monk of fully liberated mind, even if many forms cognizable by the eye come into the range of his vision, his viññāṇa (Consciousness) remains unmixed with them; it does not get mixed with those influxes. It remains unmixed, steady, and has attained imperturbability (āneñjappattaṁ). He is not swept away by them. The word 'āneñja' means that the Arahants do not shake—their minds are directed to conquering the objects flowing in from the six sense bases. That itself is spoken of as the concentration of the fruit of Arahantship (arahattaphala-samādhi), in terms like 'sabba-saṅkhāra-samatha' (the stilling of all saṅkhāra), and so forth. In some places, it is said of those Arahants:

Yassāsavā parikkhīṇā, āhāre ca anissito,

Suññato animitto ca, vimokkho yassa gocaro,

Ākāseva sakuntānaṁ, padaṁ tassa durantayaṁ.

That is a verse from the Arahant Vagga of the Dhammapada. 'Yassāsavā parikkhīṇā'—he whose influxes are completely destroyed; 'āhāre ca anissito'—who is unattached to food. Why is he unattached to food? 'Animitto ca vimokkho yassa gocaro'—'gocara' means pasture or grazing ground. What is the grazing ground of the Arahants? It is not food. It is 'suññato animitto ca'—the voidness (suññatā) and the signless (animitta). You have heard about the three liberations (vimokkhas): suññata (void), animitta (signless), and appaṇihita (undirected). That is where Nibbāna is. The place freed from the aforementioned sense objects. 'Suññato animitto ca'—that is their true grazing ground. The Arahants and the Buddhas dwell in that grazing ground. The Buddha went into the forest and stayed for three months, saying, 'Let no monk come to see me, except the one who brings alms-food because it is necessary for survival.' What was his grazing ground? It was the aforementioned suññata, animitta, and appaṇihita. At that moment, that was the island we spoke of. A simile is given there: 'Ākāseva sakuntānaṁ, padaṁ tassa durantayaṁ'—when a bird flies in the sky, can its path be traced? In the same way, the track of the Arahants' minds cannot be known. There is no object of mind (ārammaṇa). That is what is called 'anārammaṇaṁ cittaṁ' (the objectless mind). In some places, as mentioned in our sermons, deities, Sakka, and Brahmas are said to come and worship the Buddha in this manner:

Namo te purisājañña, namo te purisuttama,

Yassa te nābhijānāma, yam'pi nissāya jhāyasi.

'Homage to you, O noble thoroughbred of men, homage to you, O supreme among men! We do not comprehend what it is relying upon which you meditate.' For it is animitta (signless), appaṇihita (undirected), and suññata (void). There is no sign (nimitta). 'Paṇidhi' means there is no desire. 'Suññata' means there is no perception of self (attā-saññā). That state of liberation is indeed the island. Therefore, understand that crossing over the four floods, escaping the power of those influxes, the Arahants finally land on that island. That island is what is called their liberation (vimutti), because they experienced the cessation of Bhava (Becoming) (bhava-nirodha) in this very life. All those others are things related to Bhava (Becoming). There are many such valuable verses here and there. We shall mention just one. There is a sutta called the Sundarika Bhāradvāja Sutta in the Sutta Nipāta. In it, it is stated:

Bhavāsavā yassa vacīkharā ca, vidhūpitā atthaṅgatā na santi.

This is said about that Arahant. This is the word of the Buddha. 'Bhavāsavā yassa vacīkharā ca'—that Arahant's influx of existence (bhavāsava) is destroyed. Likewise, there is a strange word vacīkhara (or vacīkharā). The commentary explains vacīkhara as 'harsh speech'. But our view is that vacīkhara refers to something belonging to this linguistic usage, to Bhava (Becoming) and the world. One must get free from that too. Vacīkhara means 'linguistic rubbish'—the papañca (conceptual proliferation / prolific conceptualization) found in linguistic usage. Arahants are freed even from this linguistic rubbish. That is why they are called 'papañca-saññā-saṅkhā-pahāna' (those who have abandoned concepts, reckonings, or designations characterized by the prolific tendency of concepts). We are mentioning this briefly. At times, they direct their minds to that animitta-dhamma (signless state) freed from those worldly conventions, where there is no earth (paṭhavī), water (āpo), fire (tejo), or air (vāyo). There is no sun, moon, or stars. There is no going, no coming. There is no birth, no death. The reason why the descriptions regarding this Nibbāna could not be understood for so long is because they could not understand the island we spoke of. Instead, those people called the island 'Siyadoris's Nibbāna'—something that happens after death. We have pointed out that it is the very direct, experiential state that the Arahants experience in this very life. Arahants are freed from the influxes of becoming (bhavāsava), in short, even from the linguistic usages that deceive humans. In some places, regarding the liberation of those Arahants, it is mentioned in this way:

'So kāyo'ti pi na hoti, so vācā'ti pi na hoti, so mano'ti pi na hoti, khettaṁ taṁ na hoti, vatthu taṁ na hoti, āyatanaṁ taṁ na hoti, adhikaraṇaṁ taṁ na hoti, yampaccayāssa taṁ uppajjati sukhadukkhaṁ.'

There ceases to be the perception of a body through which pleasure and pain are felt within. The perception of speech ceases. The perception of mind ceases. In modern terms, all 'activities' take place within body, speech, and mind. In the mind of the Arahant, then, there is no place for body, no place for speech, and no place for mind. That is what is shown in many suttas regarding Nibbāna through various negative terms, through many terms of negation. Why can that liberation not be expressed in words? Because the world is connected to Bhava (Becoming). If they ask about something, they speak of it in terms relevant to that Bhava (Becoming). Complete liberation is the state of being freed from all of this at some point.

The Buddha uses language and linguistic usage. That is indeed what we have mentioned on many occasions—at the end of the Poṭṭhapāda Sutta, the Tathāgata declares concerning himself: 'Itimā kho, Citta, loka-samaññā loka-niruttiyo loka-vohārā loka-paññattiyo yāhi Tathāgato voharati aparāmasaṁ.' Addressing that person, 'Citta, these are worldly names, worldly expressions, worldly usages, and worldly designations (loka-paññatti), which the Tathāgata uses and speaks of, but without misapprehending (aparāmasaṁ) them.' He does not hold onto them firmly. That is what we refer to when we say that just as adults use baby talk, he uses the language of the worldlings. In that case, such is the nature of the Arahant's mind towards language. It is not only regarding the arisings, passings away, fallings (cuti), rebirths (upapatti), heavenly worlds, and Brahma worlds of ordinary worldlings; in short, even the great primary elements like earth (paṭhavī), water (āpo), fire (tejo), and air (vāyo) are erased from the mind.

Now, those scientists are struggling to understand what these four are. Having distanced them from the mind, having distanced them from thought, they have gone to the ultimate extreme, and having nothing else to do, a moment has arrived where they even deprecate science as 'this miserable science.' That is the end of science. The Buddha pointed out the ultimate end of that science in passages like 'manopubbaṅgamā dhammā' (mind precedes all states). Looking at the final chapter, that liberation through the cessation of becoming (bhava-nirodha-vimutti) of those Arahants is something we cannot even conceive. For if there were no such liberation, then they would remain in doubt after doubt. Think about it for a moment: if this Nibbāna were something after death, at the moment of death they would have to remain in doubt. The Buddhas and the Arahants experienced the state of the cessation of Bhava (Becoming) in this very life, in the manner described. Whatever things exist related to Bhava (Becoming), including the great primary elements like earth, water, fire, and air, they erased all of them from the mind; this is called 'virājitā' (faded away). The Buddha experienced the emptiness and voidness of even those concepts of earth, water, fire, and air, and of the various heavenly worlds, Brahma worlds, goings and comings arising because of them. That is what is called liberation: the liberation of the fruit of Arahantship (arahattaphala-vimutti).

Therefore, recall and meaningfully reflect on that Dhammapada verse: 'Dīpaṁ kayirātha medhāvī, yaṁ ogho nābhikīrati'—'Let the wise man make an island which the flood cannot overwhelm.' We tried to speak briefly because there are a great number of suttas to be discussed. What we have to say to you, dear devotees, is to try to understand this through a thousand methods, in connection with the other things we have discussed. All of this is Dhamma that must be understood individually by the wise, each according to his own wisdom. It is not solely through the sermons, meditation, and studies that one has done; as one progresses further and further on the path of meditation, the things we have spoken of here will become clear.

Today, as everyone has inclined towards this path, established in mindfulness and clear comprehension (sati-sampajañña), established in high virtue (sīla), on such an occasion today, many can understand this Dhamma more clearly. In the future as well, utilizing this, by proceeding on this path of the Dhamma, keeping Yoniso manasikāra (Wise attention) at the forefront in accordance with the practical and relative principles of the Middle Path we discussed, may these few words help you to realize the supreme goal you hope for in this very life, through the penetration and fruit of the path as a Sotāpanna, Sakadāgāmi, Anāgāmi, and Arahant. We pray that whatever beings exist from Avīci to Akaniṭṭha may rejoice in this merit of sharing and hearing the Dhamma, and through that rejoicing, may they attain the deathless, great Nibbāna through a Bodhi of their aspiration! Please recite these verses to share the merit:

Verses 188-192 from the Buddhavagga (Chapter on the Buddha) of the Dhammapada

Dear Listeners,

Today is the Esala full-moon Poya day. Indeed, the Triple Gem, which serves as the refuge from the suffering (dukkha) of saṃsāra, truly became manifest on an Esala full-moon Poya day such as this. Why do we say so? We all know that the Buddha realized supreme enlightenment at the foot of the Bodhi tree on a Vesak full-moon Poya day. However, he preached that supramundane realization he attained to the world of devas and humans at a level they could comprehend, as an auspicious Dhamma sermon—the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta—on an Esala full-moon Poya day. Furthermore, among the group of five monks who were the recipients of that sermon, Venerable Aññākoṇḍañña realized Nibbāna with the path-knowledge of Stream-entry at the end of the discourse. Thus, we must understand that the Dhamma Gem became manifest through the preaching of the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta. Next, this can also be considered the beginning of the manifestation of the Noble Saṅgha Gem. That is why we say that the Esala full-moon Poya day is the day on which the Triple Gem, the only refuge for this saṃsāric suffering (dukkha), became manifest.

When we reflect in this manner, what is declared and emphasized in this series of verses, which is the theme of our sermon today, is that the only refuge for the saṃsāric suffering (dukkha) of living beings is the Triple Refuge, the Triple Gem itself, and that the path to escape from this saṃsāric suffering (dukkha) is none other than that supramundane path of liberation. The Buddha preached these few verses to a brahmin named Aggidatta. The background story (nidāna-kathā) regarding this is recorded as follows.

In Sāvatthī, King Mahā Kosala—that is, the father of King Pasenadi Kosala—had a royal priest (purohita) brahmin, who was the aforementioned brahmin Aggidatta. After King Mahā Kosala passed away, King Pasenadi Kosala, who succeeded him, also retained the brahmin Aggidatta—who was by then quite advanced in age—in the position of royal priest with great respect. To show how much respect he had, whenever the priest came to the royal palace, the King himself would go forward to receive him. Moreover, out of respect for him as a teacher, he would offer him a seat equal to his own. That is how well he treated the royal priest, Brahmin Aggidatta.

However, this brahmin thought wisely: "Young kings prefer young royal priests. I am too old. I will not be able to retain the King's favor forever in this way." Thinking thus, he obtained permission from the King. He understood that ordination (going forth) is not merely a change in external appearance, but requires renunciation (nekkhamma). Therefore, how did he free himself from his vast wealth and great treasure? He sent town-criers through the city with drums, opened his doors, and gave it away in charity. Within seven days, he opened the doors and told anyone to take whatever they wanted from his entire wealth, and having freed himself from those riches, he went forth. Along with his departure, a large number of city-dwellers, said to be about ten thousand people, departed with this royal priest brahmin to practice asceticism under the sage's going-forth (rishi ordination). This group went and prepared a hermitage in a certain habitation between the kingdoms of Anga-Magadha and Kuru, where they practiced asceticism.

What was the advice that the brahmin Aggidatta, as their leader, gave to this group? "Whenever a defiled thought such as a sensual thought (kāma-vitakka) arises in you, at that very moment, go, bring a bag of sand, and dump it in this place." Thus, he gave them a meditation instruction. As a result of this, after some time, a huge mound of sand was formed there. This shows how obediently they brought and dumped a bag of sand for every defiled thought that arose in them. After such a massive mound of sand was formed, it is said that a king of serpents (nāga king) named Abhicchatthaka took guardianship of that sand pile. This is not like the cobras we see today; what is referred to here is a kind of non-human/spirit entity (bhūta). Like what is said about the Nāga King Mucalinda, this was a powerful nāga king possessing special powers, psychic power (iddhi-bala), and the ability to change his physical form. That Nāga King Abhicchatthaka took up residence there.

Furthermore, large crowds of people from the kingdoms of Anga and Magadha regularly visited to offer alms and respect to this brahmin and his group. What was the advice that this brahmin sage gave to them? "Go for refuge to mountains, parks, trees, and forests. Only by going for refuge to them can one be released from this saṃsāric suffering (dukkha), from all suffering (dukkha)." In this way, he advised them to take refuge in those things. He also gave the same advice to his own disciples.

While things were going on in this way, as time passed, the Buddha appeared in the world. On one occasion, while residing at the Jetavana monastery in Sāvatthī, as he surveyed the world in the morning through the attainment of great compassion (mahā-karuṇā-samāpatti), he saw that this brahmin Aggidatta and his group possessed the supportive conditions to attain Arahantship. Having seen this, and devising a skillful means (upāya-magga), he invited the great Arahant Moggallāna: "Moggallāna, do you not see? This brahmin Aggidatta is misleading a large crowd, preaching to them, 'By taking refuge in these mountains, forests, trees, etc., you can bring an end to suffering (dukkha).' Go and turn this brahmin toward the Dhamma." The great Arahant Moggallāna replied, "Blessed One, there is a very large crowd there. I cannot do this alone. If the Blessed One also visits, perhaps it will be possible." Then the Buddha said, "Moggallāna, you go ahead first," and sent the great Arahant Moggallāna on his way that very evening.

Before arriving at that place, the great Arahant Moggallāna also thought: "If I go before this massive crowd and say something, and if they start leaving in groups, I will not be able to accomplish what I intend." It is said that using his psychic power (iddhi-bala), he created a heavy drizzling rain. Because of that rain, those ascetics retired to their respective quarters, that is, their huts.

Then, the great Arahant Moggallāna went near the hut of the brahmin Aggidatta and called him by name: "Aggidatta, Aggidatta!" Aggidatta, due to his conceit (māna), felt some anger at this. Thinking, "Who in the world is calling me by my personal name?", he asked, "Who is that?" "I am a renunciant. Please give me a place to stay tonight." Aggidatta replied, "Each of us has separate huts; we have no space."

"Do not say so. It is the custom for humans to go to humans, cattle to cattle, and renunciants to renunciants. Therefore, please give me a place to stay tonight." He then said, "Since there is no other place, I can stay on that sand mound." Aggidatta warned him, "A great serpent king (nāga) lives there. It is dangerous. Do not go there under any circumstances." But saying it did not matter, as the great Arahant Moggallāna walked toward the sand mound to spend the night there, the serpent king became extremely angry. It is then mentioned that through his psychic power, the serpent king began to emit a powerful blast of smoke. The great Arahant Moggallāna also emitted smoke through his own psychic power. The serpent king was overwhelmed by this, while the great Arahant Moggallāna suffered no harm whatsoever.

Next, the serpent king began to spit fire. The great Arahant Moggallāna, entering the fire-element attainment (tejo-dhātu-samāpatti), also emitted fire in the same way.

Eventually, in one way or another, the serpent king was tamed. Having been tamed, it is said that the serpent king spread his hood around the great Arahant Moggallāna as a shelter, enabling him to spend the night there. Meanwhile, the brahmins, seeing the smoke and fire, thought, "This recluse, this monk's life must have been destroyed." When they looked in the morning, the great Arahant Moggallāna was perfectly fine. When they heard the details of what had occurred, they were all astonished, thinking, "What an incredibly powerful renunciant this is!"

Just as they were expressing their joy, the Buddha arrived at the scene. When the great Arahant Moggallāna stood up and paid homage to the Buddha, these people were even more astonished. When they asked, "Is this someone even more powerful than you?", Moggallāna replied, "This is my Teacher." At that moment, the Buddha asked the brahmin Aggidatta: "Brahmin, in what manner do you preach the Dhamma to this crowd?" Then the brahmin Aggidatta declared, "I tell them that by taking refuge in mountains, forests, parks, and trees, they can be freed from this suffering (dukkha)." It is recorded in the texts that the Buddha then proclaimed the series of verses we mentioned earlier.

Now let us look at the general meaning of those verses.

Bahuṃ ve saraṇaṃ yanti pabbatāni vanāni ca ārāmarukkhacetyāni manussā bhayatajjitā

Many people, driven by fear, go for refuge to mountains, forests, parks, and tree-shrines; they go seeking protection in them.

N'etaṃ kho saraṇaṃ khemaṃ n'etaṃ saraṇamuttamaṃ n'etaṃ saraṇamāgamma sabbadukkhā pamuccati

But these things are not a secure refuge or protection. "That is not a safe refuge, that is not the supreme refuge." This is not the truly supreme refuge. The Buddha explains in detail that by going to such a refuge, one cannot be released from all suffering (dukkha). Next, he declares how one is released from suffering (dukkha).

Yo ca buddhañca dhammañca saṅghañca saraṇaṃ gato cattāri ariyasaccāni sammapaññāya passati Dukkhaṃ dukkhasamuppādaṃ dukkhassa ca atikkamaṃ ariyañcaṭṭhaṅgikaṃ maggaṃ dukkhūpasamagāminaṃ

But whoever goes for refuge to the Triple Gem—the Buddha, the Dhamma, and the Saṅgha—and sees with right wisdom (sammā-paññā), with great wisdom, these Four Noble Truths: suffering (dukkha), the arising of suffering (dukkha-samuppāda), the transcending of suffering (dukkhassa ca atikkamaṃ), and the Noble Eightfold Path that leads to the calming and appeasing of suffering (dukkhūpasamagāminaṃ);

Etaṃ kho saraṇaṃ khemaṃ etaṃ saraṇamuttamaṃ etaṃ saraṇamāgamma sabbadukkhā pamuccati

This indeed is the secure refuge, the true protection. "This is the supreme refuge." This is the truly supreme refuge. "Having come to this refuge, one is released from all suffering." The Buddha declared that only by coming to this refuge, this protection, can one be released from all the suffering (dukkha) of saṃsāra.

From these verses and this story, we can extract many Dhamma principles. Even if we reflect on the story itself, according to the standards of the present day, there are things in it that appear miraculous, especially concerning psychic miracles (iddhi-pātihāriya). Nowadays, these are things that people might doubt. However, during the time of the Buddha, when we speak of the great Arahant Moggallāna being the foremost among those possessing great psychic power, wonderful things are recorded in the texts. Now, the most important point here is the ordination (going forth) of the brahmin Aggidatta.

Going forth is something done very easily even in this day and age. But regarding the ascetic going-forth—how did the brahmin Aggidatta go forth? It was not because of a lack of food, drink, clothing, shelter, or social status. It was not due to illnesses. Even while receiving royal honor at the highest level, even while possessing the privilege to sit on a seat equal to the King's, and even while having the power to get "anything whatsoever" done, and having such great favor of both the country and the King, he reflected with far-sighted wisdom: "This status will not last forever. I am now old. I must retire now, retire completely."

When we talk about retiring, what that brahmin did was not what people do nowadays when they retire. When he retired, he did not do so keeping a little savings for himself. He gave everything away in charity. He opened the doors of his treasuries, announced it with the beat of drums, gave away all his wealth, and went forth only after freeing himself from those riches. That is a lesson for us. Even though we might call those external ascetics "wrong-viewed" (micchā-diṭṭhi), they have given us a valuable lesson, especially when we think about ordination in the present era. It is the very strength that comes from renunciation (nekkhamma) that helps to carry the ordination forward. Where there is no renunciation (nekkhamma), it is a mere ordination—a totally empty ordination. There is no strength within it; one cannot progress; one spins back to lay life. But concerning the ascetic going-forth in the past, even during times when no Buddha had appeared in the world, even great kings were called "royal sages" (rāja-rishi). They abandoned kingship and went to practice asceticism in the Himalayan forests, discarding all sensual pleasures like a glob of spit spat out in the early morning; it was not done lightly.

That is how it is mentioned. So here too, according to the ascetic going-forth, that custom is an eternal custom regarding renunciation (nekkhamma). Respecting that custom, the departure of the brahmin Aggidatta is a lesson for us when we reflect on our present times. So let us look at what is said from that point onwards.

Next, indeed, that brahmin taught a certain skillful method to his disciples for eliminating defiled thoughts such as sensual thoughts (kāma-vitakka). It is also apparent that the disciples acted obediently according to it. As soon as defiled thoughts arose—such as sensual thoughts or angry thoughts—what did they do? They ran, brought a bag of sand right at that moment, and dumped it. If we contemplate the Dhamma-principle behind this, they cut off that defiled thought by directing their minds to another activity without giving room to the defiled thought (kilesa-vitakka). There is such a technique there, a certain skillful device. It was through this that those brahmins developed great strength. So much so that, at the end of the sermon, all those ascetics attained Arahantship with the analytical knowledges (paṭisambhidā) and became disciples of the Buddha through the "come, monk" (ehi-bhikkhu) ordination.

Thus, what helped them to develop such great strength was that this work of suppressing the defilements had begun from that very moment. It was precisely because of this that a massive crowd supported them as their patrons. In the end, having heard the Dhamma sermon of the Buddha, they understood: "This is not the true way of taking refuge and seeking protection. Taking refuge in mountains and forests is not it. It is taking refuge in this Triple Gem." It was because of this understanding that, upon hearing the Buddha's sermon containing those verses, the cognitive revolution—the transformation—that occurred within those brahmins was so great that they attained Arahantship. Next, the Buddha granted them ordination through the ehi-bhikkhu formula.

That is how it is mentioned in the Dhamma. Just as devotion toward the Triple Gem arose within a massive crowd, we generally understand "taking refuge" as going for refuge to the Buddha, the Dhamma, and the Saṅgha. However, this verse states that it is not merely that; taking refuge begins there, but it culminates in the realization of the Four Noble Truths. This saṃsāric existence is suffering (dukkha), its cause is craving (taṇhā), the extinguishment of that craving (taṇhā) is Nibbāna, and the path to it is the Noble Eightfold Path. By properly understanding the meaning of those verses, that large crowd finally became disciples of the Buddha. At that very moment, a large crowd of other patrons from the kingdoms of Anga and Magadha arrived. Seeing the transformation that had occurred, they initially thought, "The Buddha is a disciple of this brahmin Aggidatta." It is mentioned that to dispel this, the Buddha spoke to the brahmin Aggidatta at that moment, asking him to settle the doubts of the crowd. Then, using the psychic power (iddhi-sakti) he had attained, the brahmin Aggidatta rose into the air and paid homage to the Buddha seven times, declaring: "The Blessed One is my Teacher, I am the disciple; I am the follower," thereby dispelling the doubts of the visiting patrons, as the story further records.

Thus, through this story, we must reflect not only on the model of ordination shown at the beginning, but also on the cognitive revolution and transformation that occurred within the ordained group as a result of this sermon. Nowadays, many people, due to their saṃsāric suffering (dukkha) as well as the various suffering-filled situations that arise in life, go searching for protection, searching for refuge. How this search for protection and refuge can become truly fruitful and successful is what is declared in this sermon. Regarding taking refuge in the Buddha, Dhamma, and Saṅgha—the ordinary world thinks that there is some occult/mysterious power in trees, rocks, and mountains, and they expect protection from those forces; that is how the ordinary world thinks.

But the Buddha pointed out that the true shelter for the world to escape saṃsāric suffering (dukkha)—in short, to be released from all saṃsāric suffering (dukkha) such as birth (jāti), decay and death (jarāmaraṇa), and sickness—is to seek refuge in this Triple Gem, namely the Buddha-gem, the Dhamma-gem, and the Saṅgha-gem. That is why, as you devotees know, it is stated in the Dhamma that a person becomes a lay follower (upāsaka)—the minimum requirement being described as: "Buddhaṃ saraṇaṃ gato hoti, Dhammaṃ saraṇaṃ gato hoti, Saṅghaṃ saraṇaṃ gato hoti"—that is, when someone goes for refuge to the Buddha, the Dhamma, and the Saṅgha, by that much they become a lay follower. Then, for that lay follower to become virtuous, they undertake some precept-discipline such as the five precepts (pañca-sīla). However, just because it is described in this minimum way, one should not think, "We have said 'Buddhaṃ saraṇaṃ' three times, so everything is complete." That is precisely why the verse states that immediately after taking refuge, one must see with right wisdom (sammā-paññā), with great wisdom, the Four Noble Truths: suffering (dukkha), the arising of suffering (dukkha-samudaya), the transcending of suffering, the cessation of suffering (dukkha-nirodha) which is Nibbāna, and the Noble Eightfold Path that assists it. It is by seeing this that one truly attains release from saṃsāric suffering (dukkha). Therefore, to complete the act of taking refuge (saraṇāgamana), one must walk on this path.

Next, even if we think only of this act of taking refuge, you devotees have heard of a protection chant (paritta) called the Dhajagga Sutta. There, the Buddha declares that even for monks meditating in forests, at the foot of trees, or in empty dwellings (suññāgāra), if any fear, terror, or hair-standing-on-end should arise, they should recollect him. How should they recollect him? As you all know, through the Itipi so passage. They should recollect the passage on the nine supreme qualities of the Buddha, starting with "Itipi so bhagavā..." If they do not recollect this, they should recollect the Dhamma—the six qualities of the Dhamma starting with "Svākkhāto..." If they do not recollect that, they should recollect the nine qualities of the Saṅgha, starting with "Supaṭipanno..." The Dhajagga Sutta presents these twenty-four great qualities as a protective chant, stating that when one recollects them, any fear, terror, or hair-standing-on-end will disappear. Therefore, it must be remembered that the only refuge for the world is these twenty-four great qualities. That is why in the Ratana Sutta, the qualities of the Triple Gem, such as the qualities of the Buddha, are used as the foundation even for an asseveration of truth (sacca-kiriyā).

In the background story of the Ratana Sutta, it is mentioned that during the great devastation in the city of Vesālī caused by the three fears—the fear of non-humans, the fear of disease, and the fear of famine—the Buddha commissioned Ven. Ānanda to wish peace for that region using the power of truth, the power of asseveration of truth, through the verses in the Ratana Sutta, chanting "Etena saccena suvatthi hotu" (By this truth may there be well-being). From this too, we see a good example: the power within the Triple Gem. The power within the Triple Gem is the power of truth. It is a Dhamma-principle that exists eternally in the world. There is immense power within truth, within an asseveration of truth. In the Jātaka stories, it is often seen and stated that due to various weaknesses, the Bodhisatta broke other precepts on various occasions, but regarding truth—that is, lying (musāvāda)—he strictly kept that training rule and preserved the truth. That is why there is the miracle of truth in the life of the Buddha.

So that is exactly what we find here: the qualities of the Triple Gem. Those twenty-four great qualities are a truth. It is by the power of that truth that, in various ways, in blessing-verses, well-wishes are made for the world by focusing on and taking refuge in the Triple Gem, chanting "Etena saccena suvatthi hotu". Even in the problems and crises of daily life, it is worthwhile to consider the Triple Gem as one's refuge. Moreover, especially concerning what is called the suffering (dukkha) of saṃsāra—that terrifying suffering, that disaster—one cannot escape from it easily. One cannot be released merely by going for refuge to the Triple Gem in word only. For the refuge in the Triple Gem to be complete, one must see the Buddha, one must see the Dhamma, and one must personally see that realization seen by the Saṅgha Gem; one must walk on the path trodden by the Great Saṅgha Gem of the eight noble individuals (aṭṭha-ariya-puggala) and see its fruit. That is what is declared here: to realize it with right wisdom (sammā-paññā).

Therefore, reflecting from that perspective as well, we must direct our minds to these Four Noble Truths. If we describe the entire Dhamma in brief—what the Buddha preached—it is indeed this preaching of the Four Noble Truths. That is exactly what the Buddha presented in detail in the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta. It is this entire mass of saṃsāric suffering (dukkha), such as birth (jāti), decay and death (jarāmaraṇa), and sickness, that the Buddha pointed out there as the Truth of Suffering (dukkha-sacca). Its cause was pointed out by the Buddha as craving (taṇhā). It is due to this craving—described as sensual craving (kāma-taṇhā), craving for becoming (bhava-taṇhā), and craving for non-becoming (vibhava-taṇhā) existing in living beings—that the world of beings suffers birth (jāti), decay (jarā), and so forth for an infinite time in saṃsāra. The state of having eliminated this craving (taṇhā), of having appeased this craving (taṇhā), is indeed called Nibbāna. That extinguishment and the path leading to it is the Eightfold Path, namely sammā-diṭṭhi (right view), sammā-saṅkappa (right intention), sammā-vācā (right speech), sammā-kammanta (right action), sammā-ājīva (right livelihood), sammā-vāyāma (right effort), sammā-sati (right mindfulness), and sammā-samādhi (right concentration). Thus, by completing this path—by completing it supramundanely—one is able to be released from the entire suffering (dukkha) of saṃsāra. That is how it is shown.

When we contemplate this a bit more carefully, what is called "right wisdom" (sammā-paññā) here is a capacity to comprehend and realize that exists within all of us. However, this wisdom is not something to be acquired through reasoning and logic (tarka). It must be developed through meditation (bhāvanā). Everyone makes a certain effort in practicing the Noble Eightfold Path. That is a somewhat piecemeal effort. Step by step, they try to practice that Eightfold Path to the best of their ability. But there are various twists and distortions in it. That is why it is shown as a separate wholesome action called "straightening one's view" (diṭṭhijju-kamma). An ordinary worldling (puthujjana) makes an effort to straighten their view.

The Eightfold Path is not fully present in an ordinary worldling (puthujjana). It has twists and distortions. What they do is make an effort to align and straighten it. Such an effort to align it becomes successful when meditation reaches its culmination, when it bears fruit. Established in virtue (sīla), having developed concentration (samādhi), if at some point one realizes the truth through insight (vipassanā), it is at that moment that the Noble Eightfold Path—which is described in the Dhamma as the supramundane path (lokuttara-magga)—is realized. Indeed, mundanely, one practices it in a piecemeal fashion; however, on the supramundane path, it is said that all eight factors arise simultaneously in a single mind-moment. All eight factors arise in a single mind-moment, which is extremely brief. It is mentioned that path-concentration (magga-samādhi) arises as a momentary concentration (khaṇika-samādhi). This is an extremely profound matter. One can understand to some extent that although right view (sammā-diṭṭhi) leads the way, the other factors may be scattered in different directions. They have many twists and distortions. When these are aligned and straightened, this right view (sammā-diṭṭhi) ultimately develops and becomes right vision (sammā-dassana).

That is precisely what occurs at the moment of path-knowledge (magga-ñāṇa). That is why the Buddha declared this Noble Eightfold Path to be a straight path. One has to straighten this. It manifests as perfectly straight at that supramundane level—for the first time at the stage of Stream-entry (sotāpanna). Why is this straightening necessary? A powerful mass of defilements (kilesa), a mountain of defilements, is deposited within this mental continuum (citta-santāna). It completely covers it, like a thick layer of rust. This cannot be cut away by ordinary thinking power. It can only be cut away by the concentration of the path-consciousness (magga-citta-samādhi). The supramundane mind is an immensely powerful concentration. In terms of meditation, the absorptions (jhāna)—described as the first absorption, second absorption, and so on—are indeed very powerful minds. Yet, a supramundane path-concentration is even more powerful than those ordinary absorption-minds. It is through this that these defilements (kilesa) can be cut away. That is why it is stated: "Yaṃ buddhasettho parivannayī suciṃ, samādhimānantarikaññamāhu, samādhinā tena samo na vijjati"—indicating that this supramundane concentration is so powerful and mighty that no other concentration can be compared to it. This power is obtained because all eight factors come together, and in a single moment, right view (sammā-diṭṭhi) arises as right vision (sammā-dassana). Through this, at the stage of the path of Stream-entry, those powerful defilements are broken at one level, leaving at most seven lifetimes. At the second stage of Once-returner (sakadāgāmi), it is reduced further so that one returns to this world only once more. At the stage of Non-returner (anāgāmi), one goes to the Brahma-world and ends it there. Finally, at the stage of Arahantship, one is completely released from all saṃsāric suffering (dukkha) such as birth (jāti), aging and death (jarāmaraṇa), and sickness; having broken that karmic force, one is brought to the state of non-arising. That is what is called release from all saṃsāric suffering (dukkha). Therefore, this meritorious crowd should reflect that there is a profound aspect to this taking of refuge. Otherwise, one might generally think that just because we say "Buddhaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi, Dhammaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi, Saṅghaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi," we are all Buddhists and all our work is complete. However, here we generally use the term saraṇāgamana. If we consider saraṇāgamana according to the grammar of the language, it means "arriving at a refuge," "attaining protection." Yet, in truth, saraṇāgamana itself is "going in search of refuge."

So, this journey in search of refuge is completed through the realization of the Four Noble Truths. The proper term is the "going to the three refuges"—going for refuge to the Triple Gem. The target, the end of this taking of refuge, is Nibbāna. The journey up to that point is indeed something that must begin with faith (saddhā). Now, let us next reflect on this faith (saddhā). Here too, we know that to develop the recollection of the Buddha (buddhānussati), the recollection of the Dhamma (dhammānussati), and the recollection of the Saṅgha (saṅghānussati), a certain faith (saddhā) must arise within us. For one who lacks it—one who has taken only to logic and argument—there is no meaning visible in this. To the extent that it is felt in the heart, that abundance of qualities—the qualities of the Buddha, the qualities of the Dhamma, and the qualities of the Saṅgha—must penetrate the mind.

For such a person, next, as recollection of the Buddha (buddhānussati)—which means contemplating, recollecting the Buddha's qualities over and over; recollection of the Dhamma (dhammānussati), which means repeatedly contemplating and bringing to mind the qualities of the Dhamma; and recollection of the Saṅgha (saṅghānussati), repeatedly bringing to mind the qualities of the Saṅgha. Through such recollection, a certain development takes place within this person's character. One who constantly contemplates virtue becomes like an ocean of virtue. In short, it is mentioned in the scriptures regarding a person who constantly practices the recollection of the Buddha (buddhānussati) that they become just like the fragrant chamber (gandha-kuṭi) of the Buddha. The person who constantly contemplates the Buddha's qualities becomes like the fragrant cell (gandhakiḷi), the fragrant chamber, where the Buddha resides. Because when one constantly develops that mass of qualities, there is no room for unwholesome states (akusala). There is no room for unwholesome states to enter. One constantly lives in virtue itself—the qualities of the Buddha, the qualities of the Dhamma, the qualities of the Saṅgha. It is the very protection obtained from this that is mentioned in suttas like the Dhajagga.

When recollecting the qualities of the Buddha, if there are certain karmic forces (kamma-vega) about to ripen, their ripening force is also averted. Furthermore, because the most powerful principle in the world is the principle of truth, by the power of truth, a certain force from the universe is also added to it. One might call it invisible. However, it is not an occult/mysterious force of the kind the ordinary world imagines. In the past, the aforementioned brahmin Aggidatta said that in trees, rocks, mountains, and places considered as shrines, there exists some occult force through which suffering can be ended. But what is spoken of here is not such a thing. By contemplating the qualities of the Buddha, Dhamma, and Saṅgha, and bringing them to mind, one generates their power within oneself. Through that power, those karmic forces are worn away, and one receives a certain relief, even a limited relief in daily life. That is why the Buddha spoke of the ordinary world as "manussā bhayatajjitā"—it is the ordinary nature of people to live driven by fear in the face of hazards and disasters that come in daily life. At that moment, if one contemplates the qualities of the Buddha, Dhamma, and Saṅgha, one can obtain a substantial Dhamma-comfort through that Dhamma-power. Moreover, a capacity to withstand those incoming hazards is also developed.

Often, we are agitated and troubled by the disasters that come our way because our minds are not prepared to accept them. However, when we keep that mass of qualities regarding the Buddha-gem, Dhamma-gem, and Saṅgha-gem sustained in our minds, a capacity to withstand those disasters is also developed in the mind. By that too, the power of those disasters is broken. Not only that, through that very Dhamma-power, those karmic forces are worn away. This is the kind of Dhamma-principle that is present here. Therefore, one should not think wrongly: "At the beginning, it was said that people driven by fear go seeking protection in mountains, forests, trees, and shrines, and that this is not a refuge, not a protection." Looking at these verses, someone might say, "If so, are not these Bodhi-puja and stupa-worship performed by some Buddhists also wrong-viewed (micchā-diṭṭhi) things like that?" There is a point that needs to be clarified there.

In this day and age, we hear some people who follow that line of logic saying, "Those are empty things." They say it is the work of undeveloped minds. However, what we must understand here is that the journey to Nibbāna begins with faith (saddhā). The meaning of the word saddhā is "establishing the heart." Therefore, if a person has a heart, some development must occur regarding it as well. If one develops intellect (buddhi) alone, an imbalanced development occurs within that person. We know that even when a fruit ripens, there is a difference between it ripening well or becoming stunted/withered. If it does not ripen well, if there are some deficiencies, it becomes stunted. Similarly, those who take intellect alone, disregarding feeling—not that they have no feeling, and not that they have no heart—but they sometimes hold rigidly to intellectualism, applying logic, and regard things like stupa-worship as things done by foolish people. However, in our Dhamma, it is shown that the stupa-worship in this dispensation is done with a profound meaning. You devotees have heard that there are three types of shrines (cetiya): bodily relics (sārīrika), items of use (pāribhogika), and memorial symbols (uddesika).

Shrines in which the bodily relics of the Buddha are enshrined are sārīrika; next, the Bodhi tree which he associated with, his alms-bowl relic, etc., are pāribhogika; next, uddesika refers to Buddha-statues and images made in his honor—these are symbols of the Buddha, objects that assist in the recollection of the Buddha (buddhānussati) and in remembering the Buddha's qualities. It is by associating with these that humans purify, inspire, and gladden their minds. Therefore, if someone treats such an object with contempt, or destroys such a thing, saying, "This is the work of fools, there is no use in this, it is just a pile of stones and bricks," that person commits a grave unwholesome deed (akusala). It is due to a lack of understanding regarding wholesome and unwholesome actions that some people undervalue these, calling them foolishness done out of faith (saddhā). However, through this, the wise, meritorious person regards it as part of Buddha-worship itself, used to bring the Buddha to mind. We know that in daily life, people who live in houses use photographs or other symbols to remember their deceased relatives or other loved ones. Even those intellectualists do so. But when we come to this point, we must understand that to bring to mind the Buddha who is no longer physically alive, we need certain objects and assistance. It does not always come to our minds automatically. When we see it, that faith (saddhā) arises within us. That is where the beginning lies. That is why such objects have been used for so long.

Next, those offerings (pūjā) are made as an expression of the response that arises upon bringing the Buddha to mind. Regarding these too, some people accumulate unnecessary unwholesome karma (akusala) by criticizing them. That faith (saddhā) is something another person cannot understand. That person's faith—even the Buddha remained equanimous (upekkhā) toward the way different individuals express their faith. Yet, through that, a spiritual development occurs within that person. If one insults it or destroys those objects, one commits a grave unwholesome deed (akusala). That is why we expressed these points, because there is a possibility of misunderstanding this sermon.

Therefore, one must contemplate that the things that assist in this taking of refuge, the taking of refuge in the Triple Gem, are to daily sustain and deposit in one's mind this mass of qualities of the Triple Gem as recollection of the Buddha (buddhānussati), recollection of the Dhamma (dhammānussati), and recollection of the Saṅgha (saṅghānussati). Why is the Triple Gem important? Because for this journey of ours, the Buddha is our Teacher. Next, why is he our Teacher? Because he declared a certain Dhamma. That is why we said that the Triple Gem fully became manifest on the Esala full-moon Poya day. The collection of Dhamma discourses that began with that auspicious Dhamma sermon starting with the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta is what we consider as the Dhamma Gem. Next, that Dhamma Gem can be put into practice; if it were something that could not be put into practice, the Saṅgha Gem would be of no use to us. What is demonstrated through the Saṅgha Gem is that this Dhamma can be practiced, and its practicality.

Next, if we consider this entire practice—or this supramundane practice—as a great highway, the Great Saṅgha Gem of the eight noble individuals (aṭṭha-ariya-puggala) is like eight lamp-posts or lampposts. Those respective stages demonstrate that this or that stage can be attained—the stage of Stream-entry, Once-returning, and so on—giving that signal of possibility to the world. That is why the qualities of the Saṅgha are important, because of that richness of qualities they have attained. Along with this is the quality of "Arahaṃ"—"worthy of offerings," meaning the quality of being fit to receive offerings. When we constantly say that the Buddha is one worthy of offerings, our mind naturally says, "Ah, we must offer whatever we can." The cleanest, most naturally pure thing that nature constantly provides to the world is the flower. That is why, instead of the celestial flower offerings (parasatu) made by deities, we, according to our capacity, make offerings with wild flowers plucked from the forest. In this way, each person makes some offering to the Buddha according to the level of their faith (saddhā).

The same applies to the offerings made to the Dhamma and to the Saṅgha. Through this, what do we do? We cultivate that quality of faith (saddhā) within. Where there is no moisture of faith (saddhā), there is no cultivation of virtuous qualities. Some people go shopping with money in their pockets. They go from shop to shop, peering through the glass windows, but they do not buy anything. They return home empty-handed. There are many such people in the world. They poke their noses in everywhere, but they derive no benefit. They have no real faith (saddhā); faith (saddhā) does not truly settle anywhere. That is why if one wants to utilize this Dhamma to end saṃsāric suffering (dukkha), one must have this faith (saddhā). That is why the Buddha declares: "dukkhūpanisā saddhā" (suffering is the proximate cause of faith). For faith (saddhā) to arise, some level of understanding of suffering (dukkha) must occur. The Buddha has declared that faith (saddhā) has suffering as its support. Even in society today, we can see some people who have absolutely no interest in the Dhamma, and we meet many such people even in these times. Through those who come to discuss with us, we learn that initially their lives followed that aforementioned intellectualism, or they went searching for other things. While going on like that, when crises such as illnesses or domestic troubles come upon them, they realize: "This life is not a bed of roses." It is full of terrifying suffering (dukkha) and hardships, and one does not know at what moment this life will be lost.

Next, a certain level of understanding regarding suffering (dukkha) arises. They think: "This is indeed what the Buddha has explained better than me, and more deeply than I could comprehend." Then, they understand that Truth of Suffering (dukkha-sacca) to a certain extent. Next, they understand: "Is not the cause of this suffering (dukkha) my own craving (taṇhā)?" They realize: "To the extent that craving (taṇhā) is reduced, this suffering (dukkha) is also reduced, is it not?" That is indeed the Four Noble Truths.

Even if one reflects on one's own life this very day, one can understand it to a certain extent; that is why there is right view (sammā-diṭṭhi). One does not have to wait until becoming a Buddha or an Arahant. One can realize this Four Noble Truths—the suffering (dukkha) of saṃsāric existence—at one's own level. Some people wait until suitable opportunities arise. For those who have cultivated spiritual perfections (pāramī) in past saṃsāra and have traveled far on this path, there is no need for such a massive revolution, disaster, or crisis to occur. Even before that, some wake up. Some wake up on their own in the morning, some need alarm clocks, some do not even wake up with that but wake up when a bomb explodes, and some do not wake up even when a bomb explodes.

No. Therefore, we must reflect that each individual's saṃsāric intellect is a different thing altogether. It is not like mundane intellect. Sometimes, the saṃsāric intellect can be matured even in a seven-year-old child. Such are those who, using the skin-pentad meditation subject (taca-pañcaka-kammaṭṭhāna)—"kesā, lomā, nakhā, dantā, taco"—attain Arahantship at the very moment their hair is shaved and they are ordained. Having understood the suffering-nature and repulsive nature of the entire body, and the suffering-nature of saṃsāra and the world, they realize these Four Noble Truths. Therefore, saṃsāric intellect in the world is one thing, and the intellectual level the ordinary world thinks of is another. It is that mundane intellect that is used to pass exams and such.

The person with sharp saṃsāric intellect thinks: "This is not a journey to be traveled half-heartedly." We daily refer to this in terms of the intellectual side and the emotional side, which exist in everyone. Because we need physical concepts to represent them, we say "the brain and the heart." Even though we express it that way, everyone has an intellectual side and an emotional side. If one develops the intellect alone without purifying that emotional side and without paying attention to it, one becomes cunning and deceitful. That is what is shown in the Dhamma. In some instances, it is shown: "balava-saddho manda-paññho"—one who is strong in faith but weak in wisdom goes to the side of delusion. One's faith is high but wisdom is low; such a person turns toward the foolish side. On the other hand, it is said that when faith is low and wisdom—or the power of realization, the intellectual level—is high, such people go to the deceitful/cunning side. Such people extremistically reject all these things, making disparaging remarks about stupa-worship and efforts made to develop the recollection of the Buddha (buddhānussati), thereby committing unwholesome deeds (akusala). Therefore, one must be careful about this as well.

Therefore, through this sermon, we see the value of this taking of refuge. Indeed, in this crisis-ridden era, we see in society that people look in all directions, hoping for pacification rituals (śānti-karma) to comfort their minds during their difficulties. This is an era where people run here and there, in all directions. However, as Buddhists, if we have come to recognize the Triple Gem—whether through parents or through books—there is no use in running here and there anymore. Regarding taking refuge in the Triple Gem, the Buddha has declared with absolute emphasis, concluding this series of verses: "Etaṃ kho saraṇaṃ khemaṃ, etaṃ saraṇamuttamaṃ, etaṃ saraṇamāgamma, sabbadukkhā pamuccati." It is not that other refuge mentioned earlier; this refuge is the supreme refuge, the secure refuge. It is by seeking such a refuge that one can be released from all suffering (dukkha).

Thus, that journey begins by hearing the Dhamma in that manner, comparing it with the experiences of one's daily life, and attaining a certain understanding: "This is acceptable; this indeed is the true path." From there, one must move forward. One must go right up to direct realization. When it is said "sammā-paññāya passati" (sees with right wisdom), it means one must develop wisdom for that purpose. That journey is not an ordinary journey traveled on foot. It is traveled along those steps called virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). Or in other words, through sammā-diṭṭhi, sammā-saṅkappa, and so on of the Noble Eightfold Path. There itself we can see why it is called a path. We can see this when we reflect a little on the Noble Eightfold Path.

What is present there as steps—these steps are not the kind of steps we think of in the world. What is called right view (sammā-diṭṭhi) is shown. The Buddha has declared that in one who has right view, right intention arises: "Sammādiṭṭhissa sammāsaṅkappo pahoti". That occurs naturally. When right view (sammā-diṭṭhi) develops well, when right vision is properly cultivated, right thoughts arise. Next, it is shown in the same way, connecting one factor to another: when right thoughts arise, that person's mind inclines to utter right words. When the utterance of right words is purified, one is directed toward right courses of action. When right courses of action are completed, as one eliminates the defilements (kilesa) within oneself and corrects deficiencies, one's very livelihood—the true livelihood, the way of living—is also corrected. In the effort made to correct that way of living, a fourfold effort (vīriya) is developed, which consists of: not giving room to defilements (kilesa) that may arise within oneself, eliminating existing defilements (kilesa), bringing close unarisen wholesome qualities (kusala-dhamma), and developing existing wholesome qualities (kusala-dhamma).

To prevent the arising of unarisen unwholesome states, to abandon arisen unwholesome states, to produce unarisen wholesome states, and to stabilize arisen wholesome states. In this way, the fourfold effort develops as right effort (sammā-vāyāma). In applying that effort, as right mindfulness (sammā-sati) is applied in that manner, right mindfulness—the proper mindfulness—develops. The stabilization of that mindfulness is what is called concentration (samādhi). That is why we stated that when this Noble Eightfold Path, from right view (sammā-diṭṭhi) right up to concentration (samādhi), has its twists straightened out and is aligned, it is at that moment that a supramundane path-knowledge (lokuttara-magga-ñāṇa) arises as right vision (sammā-dassana). It is through that path-knowledge (magga-ñāṇa) that one breaks through those thick, dense levels of defilements (kilesa), that darkness of ignorance (avijjā), and is able to realize Nibbāna through the light of wisdom.

Certain teachers have illustrated this with two excellent similes. There are two valuable similes that can encompass all of this. One is the lighting of a lamp. When a lamp is lit—it is compared here to the Four Noble Truths—it is said that four things occur simultaneously. We know that when a lamp is lit, the wick burns down to a certain extent; likewise, the darkness is dispelled; the light spreads; and the oil is consumed, decreasing bit by bit. These four similes are compared to the Four Noble Truths. Like the burning of the wick, the understanding of suffering (dukkha) develops gradually. Like the dispelling of darkness, craving (taṇhā) is abandoned (pahīṇa), decreasing bit by bit. Like the spreading of light, the Noble Path (ariya-magga) is developed. Like the consuming of the oil, the levels of defilements (kilesa) are reduced, and Nibbāna is realized.

Another simile is given concerning the rising of the sun. When the sun rises, with the support of that light we see forms. Next, as the sun rises, darkness is dispelled to a certain extent; likewise, light spreads; and due to the sun's warmth, the cold is also reduced. This is compared to: just as we see forms when the sun rises, we gradually understand this Truth of Suffering (dukkha-sacca) through this light of wisdom. With the arising of the sun, next, darkness is dispelled. Similarly, craving (taṇhā) is reduced to a certain extent. The spreading of light is the development of the path (magga). Finally, like the reduction of cold, the levels of defilements (kilesa) are reduced, and the realization of Nibbāna is attained.

Cessation (nirodha) is compared to the Four Noble Truths in this way through similes. Whichever way it is explained, it is through this wisdom—right wisdom—that the defilements (kilesa) are ultimately dried up and destroyed. Having appeased the defilements (kilesa), one is able to be released from the entanglement of karma (kamma) that causes this saṃsāra. Why is it that we are born in this saṃsāra for such a long time, even if we do not wish for it? Reflect on this a little: in our mental continuum (citta-santāna), there exist Preparations (saṅkhāra)—a nature of preparing and constructing things due to delusion and ignorance (avijjā)—accumulating karma (kamma). We accumulate karma (kamma), whether wholesome (kusala) or unwholesome (akusala). There is a nature of those accumulated karmas to give results; that is a natural law. If something has been accumulated, one must experience its results. The journey between that karma and its result is what we call the saṃsāric journey. In it, we do not experience only the pleasures we hope for, but we have to experience a mass of suffering (dukkha) as the result of the things we have done. Even if there were no other additional suffering (dukkha), there is the suffering (dukkha) rooted in birth (jāti). If one is born, from that point on, one decays, is harassed by illnesses, and eventually must die. That is the greatest fear. In this way, a massive crowd of suffering (dukkha) comes as the suffering of birth (jāti-dukkha).

So, release from this entire mass of suffering (dukkha) is possible only through those supramundane path-knowledges (lokuttara-magga-ñāṇa) we mentioned: the supramundane path-knowledges of Stream-entry, Once-returning, Non-returning, and Arahantship. Therefore, properly understanding this Triple Refuge, may this meritorious crowd seek protection only in the Triple Gem on this valuable Poya day, without searching for other protections. To strengthen this Triple Gem, may they engage in cultivating virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā), and in practicing meditation, which assist in attaining that supramundane right wisdom (sammā-paññā). May this listening to the Dhamma definitely assist them in this very life to be freed from all saṃsāric suffering (dukkha) such as birth (jāti), decay and death (jarāmaraṇa), sickness, and death (maraṇa), and to be comforted by the supreme, deathless, great Nibbāna! May those qualities of faith (saddhā), effort (vīriya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā) that arise through this listening to the Dhamma become Dhamma-powers (bala-dhamma). Through association with good friends (kalyāṇa-mitta), making this human existence obtained during a rare era of a Buddha's appearance fruitful, may this listening to the Dhamma definitely be a cause and support for this meritorious crowd to be comforted by the deathless, great Nibbāna!

Likewise, may this mass of merit we accumulated today through preaching the Dhamma and listening to the Dhamma be shared with the deities who protect the Dispensation, as well as our deceased relatives, and any beings from Avīci up to Akaniṭṭha who wish to rejoice in these merits! May they all rejoice in these merits and realize the supreme, deathless, great Nibbāna through whichever Bodhi (enlightenment) they aspire to! Holding that aspiration, let us share merits by reciting the verses in this manner.

Pali Stanza:

Sabbhireva samāsetha, paṇḍiteh'atthadassibhi; Atthaṃ mahantaṃ gambhīraṃ, duddasaṃ nipuṇaṃ aṇuṃ. Dhīrā samadhigacchanti, appamattā vicakkhaṇāti.

From:

Khuddaka Nikāya

Dear Listeners,

The Buddha has declared that the greatest blessing one can obtain through association with the virtuous (sappurisa) and through association with noble friends (kalyāṇa-mitta) is the opportunity to listen to Dhamma discussions directly relevant to Nibbāna. The Buddha designated those members of the Sangha who possessed a special skill in conducting such Dhamma discussions by the title 'Dhamma-speakers' (dhamma-kathika). In accordance with this special skill, it was the great Arahant Puṇṇa Mantāniputta who attained the foremost (etadagga) position among the Dhamma-speaker monks in this Dispensation of the Buddha. A verse of Dhamma declared by him as an utterance of joy after attaining Arahantship is what we have taken as our theme today: Sabbhireva samāsetha – "Associate only with the virtuous, with wise sages who see the true benefit." Atthaṁ mahantaṁ gambhīraṁ duddasaṁ nipuṇaṁ aṇuṁ, dhīrā samadhigacchanti appamattā vicakkhaṇā – "The wise, diligent and discerning, realize the great, deep goal, hard to see, subtle, and infinitesimal"—this is the meaning of this verse.

Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta was born into a Brahmin family in a Brahmin village in the city of Kapilavatthu. He is mentioned in the Dhamma as a nephew of Venerable Aññā Koṇḍañña. It is recorded in the texts that at the very inception of this Dispensation, Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta, as a young Brahmin layman, went to Venerable Aññā Koṇḍañña, received ordination and higher ordination (upasampadā) from him in the city of Rājagaha, returned to Kapilavatthu, and having developed insight meditation (vipassanā-bhāvanā) there, attained Arahantship. Furthermore, after attaining Arahantship, he instructed a large retinue of about five hundred disciples according to a course of talk highly praised and spoken of by the Buddha, known as the "ten bases of talk" (dasa kathāvatthu). Devotees, these "ten bases of talk" are ten types of talk declared by the Buddha that help cut away the defilements, bring out mental strength, and are directly relevant to absolute disenchantment, dispassion, cessation, calming, and Nibbāna. They are designated as follows: appiccha-kathā (talk on wanting little), santuṭṭhi-kathā (talk on contentment), paviveka-kathā (talk on seclusion), asaṁsagga-kathā (talk on aloofness / non-association), vīriyārambha-kathā (talk on arousal of energy), sīla-kathā (talk on virtue), samādhi-kathā (talk on concentration), paññā-kathā (talk on wisdom), vimutti-kathā (talk on deliverance), and vimutti-ñāṇadassana-kathā (talk on the knowledge and vision of deliverance). Let us try to understand these ten bases of talk briefly. Appiccha-kathā means talk concerning the quality of fewness of wishes and having little desire. Santuṭṭhi-kathā means talk expressing the benefits and quality of being content with what one receives. Paviveka-kathā means talk praising the value of living in deep physical and mental seclusion. Asaṁsagga-kathā means talk on living apart from crowds, dwelling away from groups for the sake of meditation, and the benefits thereof. Vīriyārambha-kathā means talk expressing the value of arousing energy for the sake of Nibbāna. Sīla-kathā means talk spoken about the value of virtue (sīla). Samādhi-kathā means talk on the value of concentration (samādhi). Paññā-kathā means talk related to wisdom (paññā). Vimutti-kathā means talk concerning deliverance and Nibbāna. Vimutti-ñāṇadassana-kathā refers to talk regarding the knowledge and vision of deliverance, which is the direct knowledge and vision of the realization that yields deliverance. He constantly encouraged his disciples by speaking to them about these very ten bases of talk.

Having received assistance from those talks of the great Arahant Puṇṇa Mantāniputta, that group of disciples quickly attained Arahantship. Having attained Arahantship, they on one occasion requested permission from their preceptor (upajjhāya), saying: "We wish to go and see the Blessed One. Now our monastic task is complete." Then, Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta thought: "If I go to see the Buddha surrounded by this large group of disciples, it would not harmonize with my talk on aloofness (asaṁsagga-kathā) and the benefits of living apart from crowds." Therefore, he told his disciples to go ahead of him. The occasion of those disciples going and visiting the Buddha is what is first recorded in the Rathavinīta Sutta of the Majjhima Nikāya. In the Rathavinīta Sutta, it is told as follows: On one occasion, the Blessed One was residing in the Veluvana monastery in the city of Rājagaha. At that time, a large number of 'native-born' (jātibhūmaka) monks—devotees, 'native-born' means they were from the Buddha's birthplace—who had journeyed from his birthplace to see the Buddha arrived, paid homage to the Buddha, and sat to one side. Then the Buddha asked them this question: "Monks, who among the native-born monks is held in such high esteem and honor by his fellow-celibates (sabrahmacārī) through a recital of his virtues? In what manner is this done?" The Buddha described him: "Himself of few wishes (appiccha), he talks to the monks on wanting little. Himself content (santuṭṭha), he talks to the monks on contentment and its benefits. Himself fond of deep physical seclusion, he talks to the monks on the benefits of seclusion (paviveka-kathā). Himself living apart from crowds (asaṁsagga-kathā), he talks to the monks on the benefits of living apart from crowds. Himself with energy aroused (vīriyārambha-kathā), he talks to the monks on the benefits of arousing energy. Himself endowed with virtue, he talks to the monks on the benefits of being endowed with virtue. Himself endowed with concentration, he talks to the monks on the value of concentration. Himself endowed with wisdom, he talks to the monks on the value of matters related to wisdom. Himself having attained deliverance, he talks to the monks on the value of attaining deliverance. Himself having attained the knowledge and vision of deliverance, he talks to the monks on matters related to the knowledge and vision of deliverance. Who is it among the native-born monks that is thus respected and honored with such a reputation and praise of virtue?" the Buddha asked.

The disciples of Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta declared: "Venerable Sir, it is the Venerable Mantāniputta who is respected and honored with such a reputation among the native-born monks." While this conversation was taking place, the chief disciple, Venerable Sāriputta, was seated near the Buddha. He thought: "It is a great gain, a grand blessing for the Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta that his disciples speak of his virtues in this manner in the presence of the Buddha, and that the Buddha too approves of it." Then, Venerable Sāriputta thought: "If only I could meet Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta, if only I could get an opportunity to have a Dhamma discussion with him!"—such a thought arose in Venerable Sāriputta. Next, as recorded in this sutta, the Buddha, having resided in Rājagaha for some time, set out on tour by stages and arrived at Jetavana monastery in the city of Sāvatthi. Having heard that the Buddha had arrived at Jetavana, Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta put his lodging in order and journeyed by stages to Jetavana monastery in Sāvatthi. In due course, he went to see the Buddha, paid homage to him, and sat to one side. The Buddha engaged in friendly greetings, and delivered a Dhamma talk to Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta that was encouraging and gladdening. Having listened to that Dhamma talk, Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta set out for the forest for his day's abiding (divāvihāra—day's abiding means spending the daytime in secluded meditation).

At that moment, a certain monk who was present there went to Venerable Sāriputta and said: "Venerable Sāriputta, Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta, whose virtues you constantly praise, has just visited the Buddha, listened to a Dhamma talk, and has now departed to the Blind Men’s Grove (Andhavana) for his day's abiding." Venerable Sāriputta quickly took his sitting rug (nisīdana) and set out. Having set out, while Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta was walking to the Blind Men’s Grove, he followed him from behind at a distance keeping just his head in sight, in a manner unnoticed by him. Venerable Mantāniputta entered the Blind Men’s Grove and sat at the foot of a tree in meditation. Venerable Sāriputta also entered the Blind Men’s Grove and sat at the foot of another tree in meditation. Both Venerables spent the entire afternoon in meditation. Rising from meditation in the evening, Venerable Sāriputta went to Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta, exchanged friendly greetings, and asked him a Dhamma question: "Friend, is it under the Blessed One that you live the holy life (brahmacariya)?" (Living the holy life means, is it under the Blessed One that you spend your monastic life?) "Yes, friend," he replied. Next, Venerable Sāriputta asked: "Friend, is it for the sake of purification of virtue (sīla-visuddhi) that you live the holy life under the Blessed One?" Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta replied: "No, friend." Then Venerable Sāriputta asked: "Then is it for the sake of purification of mind (citta-visuddhi)?" "No, friend." "Is it for the sake of purification of view (diṭṭhi-visuddhi)?" "No, friend." "Is it for the sake of purification by overcoming doubt (kaṅkhāvitaraṇa-visuddhi)?" "No, friend." "Is it for the sake of purification by knowledge and vision of what is and what is not path (maggāmagga-ñāṇadassana-visuddhi)?" "No, friend." "Is it for the sake of purification by knowledge and vision of the way (paṭipadā-ñāṇadassana-visuddhi)?" "No, friend." "Is it for the sake of purification by knowledge and vision (ñāṇadassana-visuddhi)?" "No, friend." Thus, he replied "No" to all seven questions.

Before proceeding further with this Dhamma discussion, it is necessary to briefly explain to you, devotees, what these seven purifications (visuddhi) are. 'Purification of virtue' (sīla-visuddhi) means the purity obtained by abstaining from wrong actions of body, speech, and livelihood, according to the respective levels of a layman or a monk. 'Purification of mind' (citta-visuddhi) means the purity obtained by cleansing the mind of the hindrances (nīvaraṇa) that obstruct mental concentration. 'Purification of view' (diṭṭhi-visuddhi) means the purity obtained by separating the mind from wrong views (micchā-diṭṭhi). 'Purification by overcoming doubt' (kaṅkhāvitaraṇa-visuddhi) is the purity obtained by removing doubts and hesitations regarding existence in Saṁsāra. 'Purification by knowledge and vision of what is and what is not path' (maggāmagga-ñāṇadassana-visuddhi) means the purity obtained by freeing the mind from the defilements of insight (vipassanupakkilesa) such as light, etc., that present themselves during insight meditation, and by correctly distinguishing what is the path from what is not the path. 'Purification by knowledge and vision of the way' (paṭipadā-ñāṇadassana-visuddhi) means the purity obtained by removing the defilements that obstruct the practice leading to Nibbāna. 'Purification by knowledge and vision' (ñāṇadassana-visuddhi) means the purity obtained by eradicating the defilements that obstruct the supramundane path. These seven purifications are what are known as the 'seven stages of purification' (sapta-visuddhi) in this Dispensation. Thus, Venerable Sāriputta questioned Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta one by one as mentioned before: "Is it for the sake of purification of virtue?" "No." "Is it for the sake of purification of mind?" "No." "Is it for the sake of purification of view?" "No," and so on. After he had said this, Venerable Sāriputta, echoing those "No" responses, presented them again and asked his second question:

"Friend, just now when I asked you whether you live the holy life under the Blessed One for the sake of purification of virtue, you said 'No'. You also said 'No' to purification of view. When asked if it was for purification by overcoming doubt, you said 'No'. When asked if it was for purification by knowledge and vision of what is and what is not path, you said 'No'. When asked if it was for purification by knowledge and vision of the way, you said 'No'. When asked if it was for purification by knowledge and vision, you said 'No'. If so, friend, for what purpose do you live the holy life under the Blessed One?" This was the question asked by Venerable Sāriputta. Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta replied: "Friend, it is for the sake of final liberation without grasping (anupādā-pariNibbāna) that I live the holy life under the Blessed One." Devotees, when you hear the words parinibbāna or parinirvāṇa, you might think it refers to the final moment of an Arahant's life. That is not what is meant here. It refers to the complete extinguishment (Nibbāna attained by not grasping anything (upādāna – grasping/fuel). It is a moment realized in this very life, realized during the attainment of the fruition of Arahantship (arahatta-phala-samāpatti). So, Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta replied: "It is for the sake of that complete extinguishment through non-grasping, that I live this holy life."

Then, Venerable Sāriputta presented a series of questions to Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta: "Friend, is purification of virtue itself final liberation without grasping?" "No, friend," Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta replied for the second time. "Is purification of mind final liberation without grasping?" "No, friend." "Is purification of view?" "No." "Is purification by overcoming doubt?" "No." "Is purification by knowledge and vision of what is and what is not path?" "No, friend." "Is purification by knowledge and vision of the way?" "No, friend." "Is purification by knowledge and vision?" "No, friend." He stated that not one of these is final liberation without grasping. Then Venerable Sāriputta asked: "Then, friend, does final liberation without grasping exist apart from these states?" "No, friend," he replied. Now, a sort of riddle has arisen. It seems contradictory. Thereupon, Venerable Sāriputta pointed out that apparent contradiction with another series of questions.

"Now, friend, you said that purification of virtue is not final liberation without grasping. You said purification of mind is not it either. You said purification of view is not it. You said purification by overcoming doubt is not it. You said purification by knowledge and vision of what is and what is not path is not it. You said purification by knowledge and vision of the way is not final liberation without grasping. You said purification by knowledge and vision is not final liberation without grasping. Furthermore, when asked whether final liberation without grasping exists apart from these states, you also replied 'No'. How, friend, am I to understand the meaning of your words? How should I understand what you are saying?" Venerable Sāriputta thus highlighted that apparent contradiction. Now, it is at this point that Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta gave the correct explanation. "Friend, if the Blessed One had declared purification of virtue to be final liberation without grasping, he would have declared something that is still accompanied by grasping (sa-upādāna) to be final liberation without grasping (anupādā-pariNibbāna). Devotees, you must have heard the word upādāna. It means grasping or holding. Anupādā means not grasping. Here, what is the reason given by Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta? If, in some way, the Buddha had said that purification of virtue is anupādā, he would have shown something with grasping to be final liberation without grasping. The same applies to purification of mind. If the Buddha had shown purification of mind to be final liberation without grasping, there too, he would have presented something still accompanied by grasping as final liberation without grasping. Having spoken of all seven in this manner, the sentence he said at the end is even more important: "Friend, if there were final liberation without grasping apart from these seven states, then the worldling (puthujjana) would have already attained final liberation." For the worldling does not possess these seven; not even one of these seven is possessed by the worldling. Having said this, to clarify further, Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta said: "Well then, friend, I will give you a simile to make this matter clear. For some wise people in this world understand the meaning of what is said by means of a simile." And then he gave this simile. If there is anyone who has not understood this line of argument so far, try to understand it through the simile that follows. The simile that Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta gave next is a very wonderful one. It goes like this:

"Friend, while King Pasenadi of Kosala is residing in Sāvatthi, some urgent business arises for him to go to the city of Sāketa—which was also a city belonging to the King of Kosala. For the sake of such urgent journeys, seven relay-chariots (ratha-vinīta) have been placed for King Pasenadi of Kosala along the long road, at intervals. Leaving Sāvatthi, this King of Kosala mounts the first chariot at the palace gate. Having traveled in the first chariot and reached the second chariot, he dismounts from the first chariot and mounts the second chariot. Having traveled in the second chariot and reached the third chariot, he dismounts from the second chariot and mounts the third chariot. You can now imagine the rest in this manner. Traveling from the third chariot to the fourth, he dismounts from the third and mounts the fourth. From that, he reaches the fifth; from the fifth, he reaches the sixth; and finally, from the sixth, he changes to the seventh chariot. It is by means of the seventh chariot that the King arrives in the city of Sāketa."

"Afterwards, his relatives, well-wishers, and friends in Sāketa ask the King: 'Your Majesty, did you travel from Sāvatthi to Sāketa in this very chariot?' How, then, should King Pasenadi answer? How should he answer so that it would be a correct reply?" Raising that question, Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta immediately explained the manner in which the King would reply: "The King would say, 'While I was in Sāvatthi, some urgent business arose for me to go to Sāketa. Seven relay-chariots were stationed. I set out in the first chariot. By means of that chariot, I reached the second. I left the first chariot and mounted the second. By means of the second chariot, I reached the third, and left the second chariot... and in this manner, it is by means of the seventh chariot that I have now arrived.' The King would have to explain the entire sequence of events." That was the simile given.

The significance of the simile—meaning the Dhamma point highlighted by the simile—was then brought out by Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta: "In the same way, friend, sīla-visuddhi yāvadeva citta-visuddhatthā." Because an important phrase is mentioned there, we stated it in Pali. If we look for a Sinhala meaning for the Pali phrase yāvadeva, we must use the word 'merely' or 'solely'. It means 'solely for the sake of that'. Thus, purification of virtue is solely for the sake of purification of mind. Purification of mind is solely for the sake of purification of view. Purification of view is solely for the sake of purification by overcoming doubt. In this manner, each purification assists the next purification. Finally, it is shown that going in this manner, purification by knowledge and vision (ñāṇadassana-visuddhi) assists in the final liberation without grasping (anupādā-pariNibbāna). Therefore, one cannot obtain purification by knowledge and vision all at once. It is only by going through that lineage of purifications that one realizes Nibbāna through purification by knowledge and vision. Final liberation without grasping means that even purification by knowledge and vision is not grasped. I repeat: let alone anything else, even purification by knowledge and vision is not grasped. He clarified the Dhamma principle by explaining that it is by relinquishing one stage through another that one arrives at the complete extinguishment of non-grasping, where absolutely nothing is held.

Gladdened by this, Venerable Sāriputta asked: "Friend, what is your name? How do your fellow-celibates address you?" Then Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta replied: "My name is Puṇṇa. My fellow-celibates know me as Mantāniputta." Thereupon, Venerable Sāriputta, expressing his joy, exclaimed: "It is wonderful! It is marvelous! The manner in which the Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta has answered these deep questions. It is a great gain for his fellow-celibates to have the opportunity of associating with someone like you. Even if they had to carry the Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta around on their heads on a cushion of silk, to associate with him and serve him would be a great gain. We too have received a great gain in meeting you and holding such a Dhamma discussion." Thus he expressed his deep joy and appreciation.

When Venerable Sāriputta spoke in this manner, Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta also asked: "What is your name, friend? How do your fellow-celibates address you?" Then Venerable Sāriputta said: "My name is Upatissa. My fellow-celibates know me as Sāriputta." Thereupon, Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta exclaimed: "Oh! Indeed, I have been conversing with a disciple who is like the Teacher himself! I did not know that you were Venerable Sāriputta. Had I known you were Venerable Sāriputta, I would not have addressed you simply as 'friend' (āvuso). Then, I would not have explained this line of argument and these similes in this manner!"—and he praised him in the same way. "If any fellow-celibates get the opportunity to associate with a monk who has the ability to present such deep questions in such a systematic manner, like the Venerable Sāriputta, it is a great gain. If they could carry such a monk around on their heads and serve him, it would be a great gain. For us too, to see Venerable Sāriputta and to hold a discussion with him is a great gain." Thus he expressed his appreciation and joy. Next, the Rathavinīta Sutta ends with a very valuable passage, the meaning of which is as follows: The discourse ends by noting how these two great tuskers (ubho mahānāgā) in this Dispensation rejoiced in each other's well-spoken words, praised one another for the discussion they held, and expressed mutual appreciation.

From this alone, this Dhamma discussion may not be completely clear to you, devotees. We shall now provide an exposition on it. Before that, let us highlight an exemplary lesson that this modern era can draw from this sequence of events. We all know that Venerable Sāriputta was no ordinary person. He was the chief disciple. Yet, when the disciples of Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta came before the Buddha and praised his virtues, with what a great quality of empathetic joy (muditā) did he think! Even though he was such a wise person, he thought with profound empathetic joy: "Oh, if only I could meet this Venerable one someday and speak with him." Furthermore, as soon as he heard that Venerable Puṇṇa had arrived in Sāvatthi, he immediately took his sitting rug and set out. Even though he went, and no matter how hurried he was, see what a valuable quality is shown there: he did not barge in abruptly. He did not barge in demanding, "Are you the Venerable Puṇṇa?" Instead, he walked slowly behind Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta at a distance, keeping just his head in sight. When Venerable Puṇṇa sat in meditation, he too sat in meditation under another tree. He spent an entire afternoon waiting for the right opportunity. There too, we see his precious quality. That is an exemplary lesson for this era. Those great masters of the past did not highlight their personal identity; they highlighted the Dhamma. They gave priority to the Dhamma, not to building up a personal image. They strove to present the Dhamma for the benefit of future generations to build up this Dispensation. That is why Venerable Sāriputta did not say as soon as he arrived: 'I am the chief disciple of this Dispensation, Sāriputta Mahā Thera.' He did not introduce himself in that manner. Instead, without even asking 'who are you' or 'where are you from', he simply started. Through a few Dhamma questions, Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta recognized Venerable Sāriputta, and Venerable Sāriputta recognized Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta. This is a valuable lesson for this era.

Furthermore, if we are to say something more in connection with this story, a question that many people ask these days is about the 'four analytical knowledges' (catu-paṭisambhidā). In Dhamma talks everywhere, we hear about Arahants possessing these four analytical knowledges. So, almost everyone asks: what are these four analytical knowledges? Let us try to present how these four are utilized, in a manner we can understand. Devotees, the four analytical knowledges are: Attha, Dhamma, Nirutti, and Paṭibhāna. Attha (meaning/effect) refers to whatever phenomenon is right in front of us. What is before us is merely cause and effect; we see the effect. We do not immediately see the underlying cause behind it. Attha-paṭisambhidā is the comprehension of the presented effect—its correct understanding. Dhamma (cause/principle) refers to the underlying natural law or cause. Dhamma-paṭisambhidā is the knowledge of the cause. Nirutti-paṭisambhidā (analytical knowledge of language/expression) means presenting that cause to make others understand it. It is the linguistic aspect concerning grammar, language, and explanations, adapting debates or arguments to the occasion according to how they present themselves. Then, Paṭibhāna-paṭisambhidā (analytical knowledge of perspicuity/inspiration) is the capacity to strike upon appropriate similes, etc., to drive that point home to the mind as a whole, presenting its essential meaning in a timely manner.

Now, if we analyze this in the light of our story, Venerable Sāriputta asked Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta: "Friend, for what purpose do you live the holy life under the Blessed One?" That was the question. When that question was presented, what was the answer? The underlying cause—the natural law. It was declared by Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta: "It is for the sake of final liberation without grasping (anupādā) that I live this holy life." But that cannot be understood by someone all at once. It is not that Venerable Sāriputta did not understand it. These explanations are for our sake. This was a discussion conducted by Venerable Sāriputta for our sake, acting as if he did not know, in disguise as it were, without asserting his greatness. We must be deeply grateful to Venerable Sāriputta. Next, through the questions and answers presented, we see the nirutti-paṭisambhidā—the analytical knowledge of expression of Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta. To the questions raised, he said 'yes' where 'yes' was due, and 'no' where 'no' was due. Finally, in a situation where neither 'yes' nor 'no' applied, he brought out the fact that it is neither 'yes' nor 'no', but this is the reality. This belongs to nirutti-paṭisambhidā. Yet, no matter how much is said, an ordinary person cannot fully comprehend this story; it remains just a heap of words. It is the next part that clarifies the Dhamma talk, as illustrated by the story of King Pasenadi of Kosala.

Now, from that point on, devotees, let us try to understand the part relevant to this Dhamma principle using the simile. In our society today, there is a thing called running races. In these running races, we have heard of what is called a relay race. In a relay race, the baton is the symbol, and that baton symbolizes momentum/energy. So, in order to complete a relay race, the team must run collectively in stages, carrying the baton. Think about it: the first runner runs as fast as possible to hand it over to the next runner. The second runner waits impatiently to receive it. What is present there is expectation. This is what we call relativity—that is, one thing is relative to another.

Thus, in running by stages, it is just like what was said about the chariots. He traveled in the first chariot with the expectation of the second chariot. Leaving the first chariot and mounting the second, while traveling in the second chariot, he was looking forward to the third chariot. That is the kind of process taking place here. Within this sequence of purifications, what is present is the ultimate goal called final liberation without grasping (anupādā-pariNibbāna). It brings out the momentum required for Nibbāna, which is the non-grasping of anything. One does not grasp purification of virtue. One does not grasp purification of mind. One does not grasp purification of view. Not a single one is grasped. But if one simply discards them, then even the worldling would have attained Nibbāna. So, one cannot simply discard them either. That is why, in the final part of the discussion, Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta declared: "Not one of these is final liberation without grasping. Yet, there is no final liberation without grasping apart from these. If we say there is final liberation apart from these, then the worldling too would have already attained final liberation." There is a very deep matter within this.

Next, we can show this as a part of the Middle Path itself contained in this Dhamma. The characteristics of the Middle Path are spread throughout this. It is in direct relation to this Middle Path that you, devotees, have heard to some extent about dependent arising (paṭicca-samuppāda). Think about the word paṭicca. Paṭicca implies two things, connected to each other—one thing exists for the sake of another, there is a connection between the two. The second chariot waits for the first chariot to arrive. The third chariot waits for the second chariot to approach. Such a dependent (paṭicca) nature is what exists in the world. The river of Saṁsāra is a flowing river. Even though we show it in parts, it flows continuously. It is a continuity (santati). That is why the Buddha brought to light a natural law inherent in the continuity of existence in the world. He brought to light a group of Dhamma principles, a Dhamma continuity, relevant to the path leading from existence to cessation. Those are these seven Dhamma stages. To make use of each one without grasping a single one—that is a truly wondrous thing. That is why, on certain occasions, the Buddha expressed this natural law in a single sentence: "Iti kho, bhikkhave, dhammā dhamme abhisandenti, dhammā dhamme paripūrenti apārā pāraṁ gamanāya." "Thus, monks, Dhamma states flow into Dhamma states, Dhamma states fill up Dhamma states, for the sake of going from this shore to the other shore." Going from this shore to the other shore is done in that manner.

This is not a journey undertaken by any 'someone'. No 'someone' goes to realize Nibbāna. It is a movement from suffering (dukkha) to the cessation of suffering (dukkha-nirodha). Otherwise, it would become a doctrine of self (atta-vāda), whereas this is a teaching of non-self (anattā). These are the difficulties everyone faces. The relevance to dependent arising (paṭicca-samuppāda) and non-self (anattā) is contained within this simile. In truth, what exists in these practices is indeed a collection of Dhamma states. They flow systematically from one to another toward the Dhamma. Through this flowing, they reach completion. Through the flowing of purification of virtue, it joins with and completes purification of mind. Purification of mind flows into purification of view. It is in this manner that the Buddha declared in that short sentence. Here, when we describe the Middle Path, we can summarize it in two words. We mentioned the word 'relative' (sāpekṣaka). To understand that, we spoke of the relay race running in stages. The next valuable word is 'practical' (prāyogika). Practical means that for a certain purpose, the King had a journey he had to complete quickly. He had to generate the necessary momentum/energy for it. To generate that, he used seven chariots in that manner.

He did not hold onto a single chariot, yet he utilized them. He relinquished them all. This is what is called 'practical'. If the Middle Path is to be correctly fulfilled, we must remember both of these words. For one supports the other. Not a single one possesses absolute value. There is nothing to be grasped in any single stage. One merely assists the next. For Nibbāna is ultimately shown by the Buddha as final liberation without grasping (anupādā-pariNibbāna)—a complete extinguishment through non-grasping.

Within the path leading to it, too, on one hand, it is relative. The various stages and factors are interconnected. In the order of dependent arising (paṭicca-samuppāda), as cause and effect, they are wondrously linked to one another. Just because these are relative, they cannot be rejected either. If rejected, one would have to say that even the worldling has attained Nibbāna. Nor does it happen automatically. That is the greatest problem in this Saṁsāra. One cannot discard them all, nor can one hold onto them. The Buddha brought to light how one, in a very subtle manner, makes use of one stage for the sake of another. If we are to express this matter in two words, we can describe the Middle Path as 'relative and practical'. 'Relative' (sāpekṣa) means those causes and conditions (hetu-paccaya) are bound to one another. Within the word paṭicca, there is the meaning of being interconnected, in a manner that they support one another. Likewise, 'practical' (prāyogika) means something taken up for a specific purpose or goal, not just for nothing.

Now, if we direct our minds to another sutta regarding these two points—briefly, as appropriate—many devotees who know this Dhamma would have heard of that valuable discourse, the Alagaddūpama Sutta. It is a sutta discourse delivered by the Buddha on one occasion addressing the Sangha. Let us mention only the essence: "Kullūpamaṁ vo, bhikkhave, dhammaṁ desessāmi nittharaṇatthāya, no gahaṇatthāya..." The Buddha shows the matter concerning crossing over Saṁsāra. When a person traveling on a long journey comes across a great expanse of water, and there is neither a ship nor a bridge to cross over, what is there to do? He collects grass and branches nearby, binds a raft, and with the help of his hands and feet, crosses over with the aid of the raft. Having crossed over, if he were to carry the raft on his shoulders out of gratitude, that would be a foolish act. That is one extreme. But in that manner, another extreme is also shown in that sutta. If one says 'I don't want any of those rafts at all', then another thing is shown by a different simile. Alagadda actually means a water-snake. A person who does not know how to catch a water-snake catches it by the tail. As soon as he catches it by the tail, it turns around and bites him. "We only want final liberation without grasping (anupādā-pariNibbāna). We do not need all this talk of purification of virtue and purification of mind. We only want anupādā-parinibbāna." There, they have caught it by the tail! There are many who catch it by the tail in this manner. "We don't need virtue (sīla), we don't need concentration (samādhi); we can directly attain final liberation without grasping. We don't need to perform meritorious deeds, we don't need Saṁsāra, we don't need anything." Those are the ones who catch the snake by the tail. Yet, we must remind ourselves that the Middle Path lies between those two extremes. These must be considered relatively. We do not grasp them, nor do we abandon them prematurely. If caught by the tip of the tail, it is wrong. Utilizing the raft means arousing one's energy. What is represented by the raft is actually the Noble Eightfold Path. The Eightfold Path is not a path constructed by the world; it is a path one must construct for oneself. That characteristic of the Noble Eightfold Path is what was illustrated by the Buddha in the simile of the raft. One gathers branches from here and there, binds them together, and constructs a raft in that manner. Not carrying it on one's shoulders means that not a single factor of it is held onto / grasped. The other aspect is that if one discards all of these, then that person falls into the extreme where the worldling would be said to have attained Nibbāna. Through that, he goes to ruin. There were such people even during the time of the Buddha, like Ariṭṭha and others. When the Buddha declared certain things to be obstructive states, and Ariṭṭha asserted 'These are not obstructive,' the Buddha strongly admonished him, calling him a 'foolish man' (mogha-purisa), and ultimately laid down disciplinary rules forbidding monks from even associating with those holding such wrong views. But such things are common in this day and age. That is taking things in the wrong way. Therefore, the Middle Path means correctly combining, synthesizing, and understanding both the relative aspect and the practical aspect.

The confusion arising from the inability to understand this is mentioned in another place. In the Sutta Nipāta, there is a discourse called the Māgandiya Sutta. The Brahmin Māgandiya asks the Buddha a question in verse. It concerns what the wise call 'inner peace' (ajjhatta-santi). "How is that obtained?" Inner peace refers to Nibbāna itself. The Brahmin asks how this inner peace is to be attained. The answer the Buddha first gave to this was very much like the answer given by Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta. The Buddha declared: "Na diṭṭhiyā na sutiyā na ñāṇena, sīlabbatenapi visuddhimāha." He answered in that manner: "I do not say that purification is attained by view (diṭṭhi), nor by learning (suta—meaning knowledge obtained through hearing, etc.), nor by knowledge (ñāṇa), nor by vows and observances (sīlabbata)." Having said that as one side, he also stated the other side: "Adiṭṭhiyā assutiyā aññāṇā, asīlatā abbatā no pi tena." "Nor is it obtained without view, without learning, without knowledge, without virtue, or without vows." Having first said that it cannot be obtained by view, learning, knowledge, or vows and observances, he next said that it cannot be obtained without them either. When this was stated, the Brahmin Māgandiya—unlike Venerable Sāriputta who asked follow-up questions for our sake, this Brahmin asked out of ignorance: "You said it is not by view, not by learning, not by knowledge, and not by vows and observances. Yet in the very next breath, you say it is not without view, not without virtue, and not without knowledge, stating the opposite. If we look at it this way, to me, this seems to be a delusion (mohumeva dhammaṁ)—a great delusion!" The Buddha briefly explained: one utilizes these states, yet one does not grasp a single one of them—ete ca nissajja anuggahāya (relinquishing these, not grasping them). It is through non-grasping that one realizes this inner peace.

The dogmatists of the past did not arrive at Nibbāna because of this very deep aspect. A certain group firmly grasped views, etc. They held onto them. Another group, under teachers like Sañjaya Belaṭṭhiputta, discarded everything. Some wriggled like eels, avoiding any commitment by saying 'no, no'. The Buddha does not declare either of those. This is a practical purpose. Often, when explaining dependent arising (paṭicca-samuppāda), the Buddha gives a simile of rivers flowing: when it rains on a mountain peak, the water flows down according to the low-lying lands, filling up the creeks, streams, and rivers, and finally flows into the ocean. Likewise, when the water level of the ocean falls, the water levels of the creeks and streams fall. Such a natural law exists in the world—one stage assisting another, from one to the next. Yet, from the past, as mentioned in the oldest historical texts like the Vedas, the undeveloped mind thought that someone was residing inside these phenomena. Let alone other things, you devotees would have heard that even lightning, thunder, etc., were regarded as things done by 'someone'—that the rainbow, fire, etc., occurred because someone lived inside them. Such thinking is refuted by dependent arising (paṭicca-samuppāda). The Buddha shows that there is no creator here. Likewise, there is no one who can create deliverance for us. There is no god, Brahma, or Lord Creator. What exists here is merely a lineage—understand this through a lineage of Dhamma states.

With ignorance (avijjā) as condition, certain preparations (saṅkhāra) are prompted to operate. Because of not knowing the Four Noble Truths, the end result of accumulating those preparations is suffering (dukkha). Through those actions, wholesome and unwholesome deeds are accumulated within a heap of preparations. The texts illustrate this with a simile: performing unwholesome actions and committing sins in Saṁsāra is like giving hot water to a cow being led to the slaughterhouse. Performing wholesome deeds is like giving cold water to a cow being led to the slaughterhouse. Whichever water it drinks, it will meet its death. The accumulation of preparations is just like that. What the Buddha points to is the journey leading to the stilling of preparations (saṅkhāra-samatha). Where preparations are stilled—that indeed is where suffering ends. Because of not knowing the Four Noble Truths, there is an accumulation of preparations. Having separated oneself as a 'person' from the world, from this nature—the person who calls himself a 'hero' or speaks of 'truth' thinks in a peculiar way. People talk about being eco-friendly and such. However eco-friendly they might be, the eco-friendliness shown by the Buddha in meditation is like this: the internal earth element (paṭhavī-dhātu)—hair of the head, hair of the body, nails, etc.—and the external earth element are one and the same. That is true eco-friendliness—being one with the environment. Blood, phlegm, snot, urine, etc., are the same as what is found outside. Through such attention to the elements (dhātu-manasikāra), the Buddha shows that the environment and this bodily cage which this person grasps as 'I' and 'mine' are the same. Yet, it is through this separation that this person travels endlessly in Saṁsāra. That very separation is what is called consciousness (viññāṇa). This consciousness, which is said to be something trees and plants do not possess, this consciousness which we hold in high regard—the Buddha shows it to be a great suffering (dukkha). That is the greatest suffering. He calls it an illusion. Caught up in that illusion, this being is born again and again in Saṁsāra, going from becoming (bhava) to becoming. Therefore, to bring birth (jāti) to an end, one must gain comprehension of those Four Noble Truths. Through that comprehension, one must still the preparations. The path leading to that stilling is the Noble Eightfold Path.

That was something no other sages or anyone else could discover. It belongs only to a Fully Self-Awakened One (sammā-sambuddha). Even though Paccekabuddhas also realize it, why is it that, like a dream seen by a mute person, they cannot explain it to the world? Because this natural law is beyond the sphere of reasoning (atakkāvacara). It cannot be grasped by logic. It is precisely because it cannot be grasped by logic that Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta had to debate in that manner with Venerable Sāriputta. It does not yield to reasoning. One cannot say 'yes', nor can one say 'no'. Something of that nature is what is present here. It is such a deep Dhamma that is called atakkāvacara. Devotees, you would have heard that the Dhamma is atakkāvacara (beyond reasoning). Usually, one must say either 'yes' or 'no', like in a court of law. Logic operates in a world constructed by words, dividing and pieceing things together. Thus, human beings are deluded within the very language of this world. We can imagine how difficult it is to show the path of deliverance using that very language.

The Buddha spent seven weeks pondering how to declare this realized Dhamma, this Dhamma of dependent arising (paṭicca-samuppāda), to the world, and who would understand it. It was not out of craving (taṇhā) that he hesitated to teach the Dhamma, but, as we can see, due to the depth of the Dhamma. It is extremely subtle. Just now it was mentioned as duddasaṁ—hard to see. In the Ariyapariyesana Sutta, the Buddha declares two matters that are extremely difficult for the world to understand. These are: this very specific conditionality (idappaccayatā) along with the word paṭicca—dependent arising. "With this as condition, this comes to be; with the absence of this, this does not come to be." In that manner, it is because that principle of specific conditionality is so difficult for the ordinary world to understand, and likewise this state of Nibbāna—which is the stilling of all preparations (sabba-saṅkhāra-samatha) and the relinquishment of all—is so difficult for the world to understand, that the Buddha was hesitant to teach it. After the Great Brahma made his request, the Buddha delivered this extremely deep Dhamma for the sake of the world.

The Buddha declares that whether Tathāgatas arise or do not arise, this natural law always remains: "Uppādā vā tathāgatānaṁ anuppādā vā tathāgatānaṁ, ṭhitāva sā dhātu dhammaṭṭhitatā dhammaniyāmetā idappaccayatā paṭiccasamuppādo." Whether Tathāgatas arise or do not arise, that element, that stability of Dhamma, that orderliness of Dhamma, specific conditionality, dependent arising, always stands. Whether Tathāgatas arise or not, this natural law, specific conditionality, is always in the world. Next, the Tathāgata awakens to that natural law, comprehends it. "Abhisambujjhitvā abhisameti, ācikkhati deseti paññāpeti paṭṭhapeti vivarati vibhajati uttānīkaroti." Having awakened to it and comprehended it, the Tathāgatas declare it, teach it, describe it, set it up, open it, analyze it, and make it plain. Uttānīkaroti—analyzing it and showing it, saying 'look at this', bringing down that deep Dhamma which is placed high up, making it plain and saying 'behold this'. In that manner, the Fully Self-Awakened One analyzed and showed this Dhamma, this deep principle, which cannot be understood by the ordinary world. We must realize at this moment that it is this very Dhamma that great Arahants like Venerable Sāriputta and Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta discussed through their Dhamma discussions, acting as if in disguise, for our sake. Venerable Sāriputta could have gone directly and announced: 'I am the chief disciple.' Had he said so, that inspired perspicuity (paṭibhāna) of Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta would not have arisen. Now, when we go to someone, it is through the Dhamma discussions we hold that things are brought to light. When a question is asked, it is through that question that similes occur to us on how to explain this to a person. That is a natural occurrence. Similarly, in this instance too, wishing for a Dhamma discussion with Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta, Venerable Sāriputta went in disguise, as it were, without revealing his identity, acting as if he did not know, and asked: "If this is so, how does that come to be?" Through that, we have received such a valuable Dhamma discussion within this Rathavinīta Sutta.

That was something no other sages or anyone else could discover. It belongs only to a Fully Self-Awakened One (sammā-sambuddha). Even though Paccekabuddhas also realize it, why is it that, like a dream seen by a mute person, they cannot explain it to the world? Because this natural law is beyond the sphere of reasoning (atakkāvacara). It cannot be grasped by logic. It is precisely because it cannot be grasped by logic that Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta had to debate in that manner with Venerable Sāriputta. It does not yield to reasoning. Through that, we have received such a valuable Dhamma discussion within this Rathavinīta Sutta.

Not only that. It was not for nothing that Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta received the foremost position among the Dhamma-speaker monks. Even Venerable Ānanda on one occasion states: 'When we were newly ordained monks, the Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta was of great assistance to us in explaining deep Dhamma points.' There are such records in the texts. On this occasion, the mass of virtue (guṇa-kkhandha) of Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta, and automatically the mass of virtue of Venerable Sāriputta, have been presented through this sermon. Through that dialogue, you, devotees, had the opportunity to hear many Dhamma points relevant to the seven purifications, the ten bases of talk, and so forth. Now reflect: to derive benefit from this Dispensation means that starting from this virtue (sīla) which we have established, strengthening it with concentration (samādhi), and next through insight-wisdom (vipassanā-paññā), through the realization of the paths and fruits, we can attain that state called final liberation without grasping (anupādā-pariNibbāna).

As time permits, you, devotees, must contemplate these matters deeply, bear them in mind, and without stopping there, bring them close to your lives. To derive the true benefit of this Dhamma and the Dispensation, you must strive to realize these Dhamma principles for yourselves. I wish that through the virtue practiced by you devotees today, through the meditation developed, and through this Dhamma talk heard, it may serve as a supportive condition to realize as quickly as possible those noble goals you aspire to. Likewise, if any being from the lowest hell (Avīci) to the highest heaven (Akaniṭṭha) wishes to share in these merits by hearing such a Dhamma sermon and listening to the Dhamma, may they by sharing in these merits find peace in the supreme deathless Nibbāna through their aspired Bodhi. With this aspiration, recite these verses and share the merits.

Theragāthā

Dear Listeners,

Venerable Anuruddha Maha Thero was a great Arahant who is placed in the very forefront among the eighty chief disciples of the Supreme Buddha. He was declared by the Blessed One to be the foremost (etadagga) among the bhikkhus who had attained the divine eye (dibba-cakkhu). He had highly developed the powers of absorption (jhāna) and higher spiritual knowledges (abhiññā) to the highest degree. Even today, for yogis who aspire to develop their mental power, the life of Venerable Anuruddha Maha Thero can serve as an ideal. In the Dhamma literature, various colorful narratives are recorded as the background to the life of Anuruddha. However, in this brief period, we hope to summarize certain facts in a manner relevant to our theme.

Venerable Anuruddha Maha Thero was the son of Amitodhana, the Sakyan king who was the paternal uncle of the Supreme Buddha. Having decided to ordain under the encouragement of his brother, Mahanama the Sakyan, Prince Anuruddha asked his mother for permission, but she opposed it. When he repeatedly urged her, his mother, as a stratagem, said: "Only if your friend, King Bhaddiya, who is currently ruling as the Sakyan king, ordains, will I give you permission to ordain." Prince Anuruddha, in a very clever manner, persuaded King Bhaddiya to give up his wife and children, renounce the kingdom, and agree to ordain within a week. Ultimately, the six Sakyan princes—Anuruddha, Bhaddiya, Ānanda, Bhagu, Kimbila, and Devadatta—set out with Upāli the barber, pretending to go to the pleasure garden.

Stopping their army at a distance, these six crossed the border with Upāli the barber, removed their royal ornaments, tied them in a bundle, and gave them to Upāli. They sent him off, saying, "Take these, go back, and live comfortably." Upāli the barber also went a short distance and began to reflect: "Now, if I take these back, the Sakyans will think that I killed these princes and took their ornaments. Why do I need these ornaments that they have abandoned? Let whoever wants them take them." So, hanging them on a tree, he returned and joined the six princes. In the end, these six princes and the barber went to the Anupiya Mango Grove of the Mallans, where the Buddha was residing at that time, and were ordained in the presence of the Blessed One. It is a significant event that the princes themselves requested Upāli the barber to be ordained first, in order to crush their Sakyan pride. To put it briefly, after Venerable Anuruddha was ordained, he made great efforts to attain jhānas, abhiññās, and the paths and fruits (magga-phala), while observing strict ascetic practices (dhutaṅga). Several sutta discourses reveal how hard he strove.

Even today, yogis can derive practical insights from the discussions Venerable Anuruddha had with the Supreme Buddha and Venerable Sāriputta Maha Thero regarding his meditation. As the most important event, it is mentioned that on one occasion, Venerable Anuruddha was meditating in the Pacīnavaṁsa park in the country of the Cetis. At that time, the Supreme Buddha was residing in the Bhesakalā Forest in the Saṁsumāragiri region of the Bhagga country. While Venerable Anuruddha was meditating, seven thoughts of a great man (dhamma-vitakka) arose in his mind in sequence:

1. Appicchasāyaṁ dhammo, nāyaṁ dhammo mahicchasassa: This Dhamma is for one of few wishes, not for one of many wishes.

2. Santuṭṭhasāyaṁ dhammo, nāyaṁ dhammo asantuṭṭhassa: This Dhamma is for one who is contented, not for one who is discontented.

3. Pavivittasāyaṁ dhammo, nāyaṁ dhammo saṅgaṇikārāmassa: This Dhamma is for one who is secluded, not for one who delights in company.

4. Āraddhaviriyasāyaṁ dhammo, nāyaṁ dhammo kusītassa: This Dhamma is for one who is energetic, not for one who is lazy.

5. Upaṭṭhitasatissāyaṁ dhammo, nāyaṁ dhammo muṭṭhassatissa: This Dhamma is for one of established mindfulness, not for one of muddled mindfulness.

6. Samāhitasāyaṁ dhammo, nāyaṁ dhammo asamāhitassa: This Dhamma is for one who is concentrated, not for one who is unconcentrated.

7. Paññavantasāyaṁ dhammo, nāyaṁ dhammo duppaññassa: This Dhamma is for one who is wise, not for one who is unwise.

While he was reflecting on these seven thoughts of Dhamma that had arisen, the Supreme Buddha perceived the manner in which Venerable Anuruddha was reflecting on these thoughts. Seeing this, through psychic power, with a mind-made body, He disappeared from the Bhesakalā Forest and appeared before Venerable Anuruddha. After the Buddha sat on the prepared seat, Venerable Anuruddha paid homage to Him. Then, the Supreme Buddha said to him: "Sadhu! Sadhu! Anuruddha, it is very good that you are reflecting on these seven thoughts of a great man (mahāpurisa-vitakka). Add to these seven the eighth one as well, the eighth thought of a great man," and the Supreme Buddha declared the eighth thought of a great man:

Nippapañcārāmassāyaṁ dhammo nippapañcaratino, nāyaṁ dhammo papañcārāmassas papañcaratino: "This Dhamma is for one who delights in the non-prolific, who rejoices in the non-prolific, not for one who delights in conceptual proliferation (papañca), who rejoices in conceptual proliferation."

We will explain the word papañca in due course. What is important here is only this: having presented this eighth thought of a great man, the Supreme Buddha went on to give instructions on the benefits of that thought: "Anuruddha, if you now work with all these eight thoughts of a great man, you will soon be able to enter and dwell in the first, second, etc., absorptions (jhānas) and develop skill in those absorptions. Likewise, you can also develop the quality of contentment with whatever is received." The Supreme Buddha also gave another special advice: "Anuruddha, spend the upcoming rainy season (vassa) right here in this Pacīnavaṁsa park." The Supreme Buddha must have seen that there was a good environment there for attaining Arahantship. In any case, Venerable Anuruddha, in accordance with the instruction of the Supreme Buddha, meditated diligently and attained Arahantship during the following rainy season. The three verses we placed at the beginning as our theme were those expressed by him after attaining Arahantship, mentioning and expressing gratitude for the advice received from the Supreme Buddha.

> "Knowing my thought, the Teacher, unsurpassed in the world, > Came to me through psychic power with a mind-made body."

> *"Whatever thought I had, the Buddha taught me further still;

> He, who delights in the non-prolific, taught the non-prolific (nippapañca)."*

> *"Therefore, knowing the Dhamma, I dwelt delighting in the Dispensation;

> The three knowledges have been attained, the Buddha's bidding has been done."*

This means, "I have attained Arahantship."

These three verses also reveal that the instruction given by the Supreme Buddha was particularly helpful to Venerable Anuruddha in attaining Arahantship. Likewise, it is revealed that the credit for listing those first seven thoughts of a great man in that manner goes to Venerable Anuruddha. It is mentioned in that sutta that after the Supreme Buddha had instructed Venerable Anuruddha in this way and returned to the Bhesakalā Forest, He addressed the Sangha: "Monks, I shall teach you the eight thoughts of a great man," and delivered the complete discourse. However, right here, a peculiar word emerged for us: 'papañca'. Likewise, its opposite word, 'nippapañca', was also expressed. Indeed, the word papañca is a very useful word for meditators, yet for many, it is a word that is difficult to comprehend. This word nippapañca is, in fact, applied to Nibbāna as well. Nippapañca is shown as a state of Nibbāna.

Let us try to understand this word papañca. Even in society today, when someone speaks extensively instead of briefly, people say: "Speak without papañca (prolific details); say what you have to say briefly without papañca." Therefore, when looking at speech, 'papañca' means talking unnecessarily and at length in a way that is irrelevant to the topic. However, when we consider this in relation to meditation and the mind, its depth is revealed to us. If we consider briefly according to the context of suttas like the Madhupiṇḍika Sutta of the Majjhima Nikāya, we can understand from the details mentioned in that sutta: through the collision of the six sense faculties—eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind—with their respective objects, first a feeling or sensation (vedanā) arises within us. Some kind of feeling is born. Conditioned by that feeling (vedanā), perception arises. One reasons about what one perceives. One maintains thoughts. It is said that through maintaining those thoughts, conceptual proliferation (papañca) arises. The sutta expresses that having arisen, one becomes overwhelmed by the various ideas created due to that papañca. What is the reason for becoming subject to papañca? In meditation, it is because of the proliferation created in the mind by extending the thoughts that come through the sense objects of those six sense faculties into the time cycle of past, future, and present, under the instigation of defilements present within the being, namely craving (taṇhā), conceit (māna), and views (diṭṭhi). That is to say, a multitude of unnecessary thoughts often arise for these meditators. Without even realizing it, they go off-topic. Next, if we analyze those thoughts, beneath them lies either craving (taṇhā), conceit, or views. Once they go into those conceptual proliferations (papañca) and become overwhelmed by them, they do not even know where they are. Next, the things they construct from them—a future event appears as present, a past event appears as present. They are even prompted to act accordingly. There are various illustrations of this; there is no need to repeat them. Why there is no need to mention them here is because the meditators themselves would have experienced this. Be that as it may, this word papañca is extremely important.

It is to show that this state of papañca does not exist in Nibbāna that Nibbāna is called 'nippapañca'. Now, even in that verse, it is stated that the Supreme Buddha delights in nippapañca and preached nippapañca to me. From this, what we have to understand is that although they were good thoughts, the Venerable Thero went into papañca through them. This is exactly where many meditators get caught. Let us say one sat down for mindfulness of breathing (ānāpānasati). But in the end, when they observe, they find themselves thinking about the virtues of the Buddha or something else. That is not relevant to that meditation. We find another short sutta discourse which clearly shows that the conceptual proliferation (papañca) created through those thoughts is an obstacle to meditation. It is a short, instructional discourse preached by Venerable Sāriputta Thero to the bhikkhus. There, Venerable Sāriputta Thero says: "Friends, there are five things that can lead to the decline of a monk's meditation. What are they? Kammārāmatā (delight in work)." To put it briefly, kammārāmatā means engaging the mind and body in various activities irrelevant to meditation, a liking for work. Bhassārāmatā—delight in constant talking, chattering. Niddārāmatā—delight in sleep. Saṅgaṇikārāmatā—delight in socializing, and finally, papañcārāmatā—delight in papañca (conceptual proliferation), delight in thoughts. Perhaps because of the importance of the word papañca, Venerable Sāriputta Thero uttered two verses at the end of that short discourse:

> Yo papañcaṁ anuyutto, papañcābhirato mago;

> Vīrādhayī so nibbānaṁ, yogakkhemaṁ anuttaraṁ.

> Yo ca papañcaṁ hitvāna, nippapañcapathe rato;

> Ārādhayī so nibbānaṁ, yogakkhemaṁ anuttaraṁ.

These are two identical verses showing the two sides. Here, the word mago (or mūgo) is used. Mago means a fool (or beast-like fool). If any foolish person is engaged in conceptual proliferation (papañca) and becomes one who delights in papañca, that person falls away from Nibbāna. Vīrādhayī so nibbānaṁ yogakkhemaṁ anuttaraṁ—yogakkhema means being freed from the yoke. He falls away from Nibbāna. But if someone, yo ca papañcaṁ hitvāna, abandons conceptual proliferation (papañca) and nippapañcapathe rato, delights in the path free from conceptual proliferation, ārādhayī so nibbānaṁ yogakkhemaṁ anuttaraṁ, that person wins Nibbāna. This also shows us how extremely important the words papañca and nippapañca are. From this, we can understand that this subtle attachment we have is the attachment to thoughts. In suttas like the Satipaṭṭhāna, these are expressed as dhamma—that is, mind-objects or thoughts. Taṇhā loke piyarūpaṁ sātarūpaṁ, etthesā taṇhā uppajjhamānā uppajjati, ettha nivisamānā nivisati: that is, in the world, this category called thoughts is extremely dear and pleasant. There, this craving (taṇhā) arises and settles. No one can see this, generally speaking. These are subtle thoughts within. Yet, that is the subtlest entanglement of all at the very end.

We find another beautiful incident in the sutta discourses which shows that Venerable Anuruddha had this 'entanglement of thoughts' (vitakka-paṭalavilla). Venerable Anuruddha went directly and discussed his meditation problems with Venerable Sāriputta Thero. He presented his questions like this: "Friend Sāriputta, with the purified divine eye, which surpasses human vision, I see and perceive a thousandfold world system. My energy is aroused, my mindfulness is well established, my body is tranquil, and my mind is concentrated. Yet, my mind is not liberated from the influxes (āsava) without grasping; it does not attain Arahantship." Thus he declared his illness. Then, Venerable Sāriputta Thero, like a highly skilled psychiatrist, wonderfully revealed the illness from that very statement of Venerable Anuruddha. This is how Venerable Sāriputta Thero analyzed it: "Now, friend Anuruddha, did you not say, 'With the purified divine eye surpassing human vision, I see a thousandfold world system'? That is your conceit (māna). You said, 'My energy is aroused, my mindfulness is established, my body is tranquil, and my mind is concentrated.' That is your restlessness (uddhacca). Next, you said, 'Yet, my mind is not liberated from the influxes.' That is your worry (kukkucca).' Therefore, Anuruddha, abandon these three defilements, and without directing your mind to them, direct your mind to the deathless element (amata-dhātu), which is Nibbāna."

Devotees, Nibbāna is not something of the sort that one thinks of now. It is the state of releasing the mind from these defilements, in short, from the five aggregates (pañcakkhandha). The deathless element (amata-dhātu) which designates Nibbāna is often shown in the discourses as: Etaṁ santaṁ etaṁ paṇītaṁ yadidaṁ sabbasaṅkhārasamatho sabbūpadhipaṭinissaggo taṇhakkhayo virāgo nirodho nibbānaṁ. From this, one can understand that this peaceful and sublime state is not those thoughts we mentioned. True peace and sublimity is sabbasaṅkhārasamatho—the stilling of all Preparations/volitional activities (saṅkhāra), the relinquishment of all acquisitions (upadhi) grasped as ours. By showing this, we can see that thinking, "I have these things, I see divine worlds, I am striving well," is a delay. Those are subtle defilements. Next, thinking, "Unlike others who have these defilements, I have not received this yet," is a worry (kukkucca). What a meditator has to do is to engage in the work that belongs to them, not to increase expectations. As soon as expectations increase, it is no longer meditation; then, thinking "Why have I not received this yet?" becomes a cause for the decline of one's meditation. We can understand something from this question of Venerable Anuruddha.

Next, we find an equally important sutta discourse, the Upakkilesa Sutta. This is a very important and valuable sutta in the life of Anuruddha. Likewise, it is a very important sutta for meditators for many reasons. It begins like this. It is a certain poignant moment in the Dispensation. That is, as you may have heard, on one occasion, the monks in the city of Kosambi began to quarrel, splitting into two factions, and in the end, the Supreme Buddha went to the Pārileyyaka forest for seclusion. You have all heard that story. It is related to that incident. When the Supreme Buddha was residing at the Ghositārāma in Kosambi, and the monks were quarreling and disputing, the Supreme Buddha went there and tried to reconcile those monks, saying: "Monks, do not quarrel. Do not dispute. Be united." A talkative monk among them said: "Wait, Blessed Lord, do not trouble yourself about this. According to your own seclusion, dwell in the happy dwelling of absorption (jhāna) and meditation. We will resolve our own quarrel." When the Supreme Buddha told them to unite a second time, that monk said the same thing a second time. No one else tried to stop him either. When the Supreme Buddha spoke for the third time, that monk spoke in that talkative manner for the third time. It is mentioned that the Supreme Buddha, having gone for alms round that day, returned, put away his lodgings, took his bowl and robe, and while standing, uttered a series of verses. Some of those verses are in the Dhammapada. Having uttered those verses expressing the danger of hatred, the danger of quarrels and disputes, and the value of the happiness of seclusion, the Supreme Buddha, on his way to the Pārileyyaka forest, visited the place where Venerable Bhagu was living alone. There, He delivered a Dhamma talk to Venerable Bhagu.

Next, He journeyed to the Pacīnavaṁsa park, where that wonderful trio—Venerable Anuruddha, Venerable Nandiya, and Venerable Kimbila—were meditating. When the Supreme Buddha was about to enter the park, the park-keeper, not recognizing the Supreme Buddha from afar, said: "Monk, do not enter this park. There are three Venerable Ones meditating in this park, three sons of noble families. Do not disturb them. Do not enter." Hearing these words, Venerable Anuruddha looked and saw that the Supreme Buddha was coming. So he said to the park-keeper: "Park-keeper, do not say that. This is our Teacher." He quickly went and informed the Venerable Nandiya and Venerable Kimbila: "Venerables, come, come! Our Teacher has arrived." One Venerable Thero went and received the bowl and robe of the Supreme Buddha. One Venerable Thero prepared the seat. Another Venerable Thero brought water for washing the feet. After the Supreme Buddha washed His feet and sat on the seat, all three paid homage to Him. As was customary, the Supreme Buddha asked about their well-being, whether they were getting alms food, etc., and then asked an important question. There, the Supreme Buddha addressed Venerable Anuruddha, but in the plural. From this, we are to understand that Venerable Anuruddha was the leader of the three.

If we were to say it in modern terms, He asked: "Anuruddha, are you all living in harmony, without disputing, blending like milk and water, looking at each other with eyes of affection?" The Supreme Buddha pointed out the true characteristics of unity. Venerable Anuruddha answered beautifully: "Yes, Lord, we live in harmony, happily, without disputing, blending like milk and water, looking at each other with eyes of affection." Satisfied with this, the Supreme Buddha asked: "How is it, Anuruddha, that you three live in such harmony?" The description given by Venerable Anuruddha is very important and beautiful. Venerable Anuruddha said: "Sometimes I think, Lord: 'It is a great gain for me, a great blessing, to live with such co-residents.' I maintain acts of loving-kindness (mettā) by way of body toward these two Venerables, both openly and in private. I maintain acts of loving-kindness by way of speech, both openly and in private. I maintain acts of loving-kindness by way of mind (thoughts), both openly and in private. Furthermore, Lord, sometimes I think: 'Why don't I discard my own mind and live according to the minds of these Venerables?' I think like that too. Sometimes it occurs to me: 'Though we are three in body, indeed we are one in mind.'" Just as Venerable Anuruddha expressed this, Venerable Nandiya also expressed the same. Venerable Kimbila also expressed the same.

The Supreme Buddha said, "Sadhu! Sadhu!" in appreciation, and then asked further: "Anuruddha, do you spend your days diligently, striving with energy?" "Yes, Lord," said Venerable Anuruddha, and then he described the daily routine of the three of them. That too is a particularly valuable model for the lineage of the Sangha. Venerable Anuruddha explained it in this way: "Lord, all three of us enter the village for alms food. Whichever monk returns first from the alms round prepares the seats. Next, he sets out water for drinking and water for washing feet. He prepares the vessel for left-over food. Next, the monk who returns last from the village eats whatever is left in that vessel if he wishes to eat. Otherwise, he takes that vessel and discards the left-over food where there is no grass, or pours it into water where there are no living beings. Next, he washes the vessels and puts them away. He puts away the seats. He sweeps the refectory. Whichever of us notices that the vessel for drinking water is empty, he fills it. If it is too heavy for him to do alone, he signals a second monk with his hand, and both of them together bring the water vessel. We do not spend even a single word for that purpose." This is how they showed their unity. "Furthermore, once every five days, all three of us spend the entire night in Dhamma discussion, staying awake and discussing." The Supreme Buddha said, "Sadhu! Sadhu! Very good, Anuruddha." Next, He asked: "While you are living in harmony in this way, Anuruddha, have you attained any superhuman state (uttarimanussadhamma), a noble state through meditation?" At that moment, Venerable Anuruddha expressed a meditation problem common to all three of them.

"Lord, sometimes in our meditation, we perceive a light and see forms. But after a short while, they disappear. We cannot understand the cause of this. We do not know." Then, the Supreme Buddha beautifully presented His own experiences from His days as a Bodhisatta as advice to the Venerables. For those who ask the same question about meditation nowadays, this shows how much effort the Supreme Buddha exerted in meditation. "Anuruddha, such a situation occurred to me as well. Sometimes, a light appeared and visions were seen. Suddenly, they disappeared. Then I investigated the cause: 'Why did this happen?' While investigating, I saw that doubt (vicikicchā) arose in me. Because of that doubt, my concentration (samādhi) was lost, it slipped away. That is why that light and the vision of forms disappeared. Then, I resolved to meditate without it. As I proceeded, that light came and visions were seen. But again they disappeared. At that time, when I considered, I thought: 'I did not attend to that light properly. Due to a deficiency in attention, the concentration (samādhi) that had arisen slipped away and disappeared.'" In this way, He mentioned eleven things at that time, that eleven imperfections (upakkilesa) arose for the Bodhisatta. Sometimes, it is mentioned as sloth and torpor (thīna-middha); at other times, due to a startle, a fright—perhaps from the sound of an animal while meditating in solitude, or due to some fright caused by visions within meditation itself. At other times, due to an unnecessary elation, an excessive joy, a limitless excitement. At other times, due to looking at those visions of forms and having too much attachment to them, concentration slipped away. At other times, due to excessive energy or deficient energy, concentration was lost. At other times, due to physical fatigue (kāyadaraṭha), concentration slipped away. These imperfections (upakkilesa) are often subtle and unseen. Sometimes, when joy comes during meditation, everyone thinks it is good for meditation. But those are obstacles to meditation. We can understand it in this way. So, having given such instruction, the Supreme Buddha departed for the Pārileyyaka forest. Thus, from the Upakkilesa Sutta too, we can learn many things about the life of Venerable Anuruddha.

Next is an important sutta, from which we can gather many valuable points for our life: the Cūḷagosinga Sutta in the Majjhima Nikāya. The occasion is mentioned like this: The Supreme Buddha was residing at the brick house (Giñjakāvasatha) in the village of Nādika for some time. It was close by that Venerable Anuruddha, Venerable Nandiya, and Venerable Kimbila were meditating at that time. The Supreme Buddha, having risen from His meditation in the evening, was walking to the Gosinga Sāla forest. Here too, it is mentioned in this sutta, for some reason, just as in the Upakkilesa Sutta, the park-keeper did not recognize the Supreme Buddha from afar and told Him not to enter. Then, Venerable Anuruddha prevented him, and it is mentioned in that manner.

Next, you can imagine that after the Supreme Buddha inquired about their well-being as usual, asking "How do you live?", in this Gosinga Sāla forest too, these three Venerables described their daily routine and their unity. However, the moment the Supreme Buddha asked about their meditation, it was special. The Supreme Buddha asked Venerable Anuruddha: "Anuruddha, have you now attained any superhuman state (uttarimanussadhamma)?" At that moment, Venerable Anuruddha said: "Why not, Lord?" He did not say this out of disrespect. Having said so, he declared that they had attained Arahantship. What did he say first? Venerable Anuruddha spoke on behalf of all three of them: "Lord, quite secluded from sensual pleasures, we enter and dwell in the first absorption (jhāna) as we wish." The Supreme Buddha asked: "Having transcended that, have you obtained anything further?" Then he mentioned the second absorption. He did not declare their attainment of Arahantship all at once. Venerable Anuruddha went on mentioning one by one, higher and higher absorptions, and finally, having transcended the high formless state of neither-perception-nor-non-perception (nevasaññānāsaññā), they entered the cessation of perception and feeling (saññāvedayitanirodha), and having emerged from it, seeing with wisdom, their influxes (āsava) were destroyed. This means they had attained Arahantship. Then the Supreme Buddha said, "Very good, Sadhu! Sadhu!", and after delivering another Dhamma talk, He departed.

After He departed, a peculiar thing happened. Venerable Nandiya and Venerable Kimbila came and asked Venerable Anuruddha: "Friend, did we ever tell you that we have attained these states? You declared it up to Arahantship to the Supreme Buddha on behalf of all three of us." Then, Venerable Anuruddha said: "Venerables, you did not tell me. I saw with my mind that you had attained these. Likewise, deities also came and told me." There is something special here. That is, although these three lived in such harmony, sharing their food, they did not declare their superhuman qualities (uttarimanussadhamma) to each other. In the Dispensation, this is recognized as a very valuable quality: adhigama-appicchatā (contentment regarding one's spiritual attainments). It is a quality of having few wishes. One's attained state is not something to go around talking about, publishing in books, and publicizing. It is a deep, valuable thing. Its value is lost when one goes about talking about it. Leaving everything else aside, this is something to be guarded in the most excellent manner; even these three who lived together did not tell each other, "I have attained these levels of absorption and am an Arahant."

A being who understood this quality—not an ordinary human but a yakkha named Dīgha Parajana—then takes the story in a whole new direction. Having listened to this conversation, after the Supreme Buddha had departed, the yakkha Dīgha Parajana approached the Supreme Buddha and expressed a eulogy about these three Venerables. This yakkha Dīgha Parajana declared how extremely virtuous these individuals were. He said: "It is a great gain for the Vajji country, a huge gain for the inhabitants of the Vajji country, that the Tathāgata, the Fully Self-Enlightened One, resides in this country, and also that these three—Venerable Anuruddha, Venerable Nandiya, and Venerable Kimbila—reside here," and he made this proclamation of praise. As mentioned in that sutta, this proclamation of the yakkha Dīgha Parajana reverberated. You know, just as in the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta, the earth-dwelling deities (bhumma devas) reverberated it. Next, it is mentioned in that sutta that this fame reverberated from the Cātumahārājika, Tāvatiṁsa, etc., all the way up to the Akaniṭṭha realm. It is mentioned in that sutta that the Supreme Buddha also added to this, saying: "So it is, Dīgha, so it is, Dīgha. How valuable these three are..." This is what the Supreme Buddha declared: "If the family from which these three went forth and ordained should think of these three with a confident, joyful mind, it will lead to the welfare and happiness of that family for a long time."

"Likewise, if those of whatever village, town, or province from which these three went forth to ordain should think of these three, it would be of great meritorious benefit to them." Finally, He said: "If the world with its devas, maras, and brahmas, this generation with its devas and humans, samanas and brahmanas, should recollect these three with a confident, joyful mind, it will lead to their welfare and happiness for a long time." This was a great tribute declared by the Supreme Buddha regarding these three. From the Cūḷagosinga Sutta, we can see that Venerable Anuruddha had attained all those wholesome minds and become an Arahant.

We can see a great service rendered to the Dispensation by such a valuable character in the Mahāparinibbāna Sutta. You know the Mahāparinibbāna Sutta. Before the passing away (*pariNibbāna of the Supreme Buddha, the chief disciples had already passed away. At the time of the parinibbāna, Venerable Ānanda was nearby. Among the Venerables present, the most important and valuable Venerable Thero—who was like the organizer in this era—was Venerable Anuruddha Maha Thero. It is mentioned how, through his power of the divine eye, the opportunity was provided to carry out the great parinibbāna and the subsequent matters properly. The Mahāparinibbāna Sutta is a very long discourse. If we extract the necessary part: when the Supreme Buddha was on the bed of His passing away—at the time of His parinibbāna, you have heard of the pacchimā buddhavācā, the final words of the Buddha: "Handa dāni bhikkhave āmantayāmi vo, vayadhammā saṅkhārā appamādena sampādetha."

"Now, monks, I address you: all Preparations/volitional activities (saṅkhāra) are subject to decay. Strive with diligence for your salvation." Having declared this, preparing for His parinibbāna, the Supreme Buddha first entered the first absorption (jhāna), then the second absorption, the third absorption, and so on, up to the cessation of perception and feeling (saññāvedayitanirodha). When He entered the cessation of perception and feeling, Venerable Ānanda thought that He had passed away. Venerable Ānanda asked: "Venerable Anuruddha, has the Blessed One passed away?" Venerable Anuruddha said: "No, Ānanda, the Supreme Buddha has not passed away. He has only entered the cessation of perception and feeling." Thereafter, the Supreme Buddha entered the lower absorptions again, such as the sphere of neither-perception-nor-non-perception (nevasaññānāsaññāyatana) and so on, down to the first absorption. Then, He ascended again from the first absorption to the second, from the second to the third, and from the third to the fourth absorption, and having emerged from the fourth absorption, the Supreme Buddha passed away. At the moment of His passing away, as mentioned in that sutta, great earthquakes and other extraordinary phenomena occurred. It is mentioned that Sakka, the king of devas, and Great Brahma uttered verses. Here, the special significance of Venerable Anuruddha is that he expressed two extremely valuable verses describing how the mind of the Supreme Buddha attained parinibbāna:

> Nāhu assāsapassāso, ṭhitacittassa tādino;

> Anejo santimārabbha, yaṁ kālamakarī muni.

> Asallīnena cittena, vedanaṁ ajjhavāsayi;

> Pajjotasseva nibbānaṁ, vimokkho cetaso ahū.

"There was no longer inhalation or exhalation for the one of steadfast mind, the Tathāgata. Unshaken, aiming at peace, the Sage passed away." (Passing away is mentioned here with a special meaning).

"With unshrinking mind, He endured the feeling (vedanā). Like the extinguishing Nibbāna of a lamp, was the liberation of His mind." Venerable Anuruddha declared how the mind of the Supreme Buddha attained parinibbāna. That too is an important thing. Although we do not speak of them at length, we have explained these in other places.

It is mentioned that at the moment of His passing away, the monks who were not yet Arahants wept, rolling on the ground in grief: "Too soon has the Tathāgata passed away! Too soon has the eye of the world been extinguished!" While they were grieving in this way, Venerable Anuruddha comforted them, saying: "Monks, do not weep. Do not lament. Has not the Blessed One already declared that there must be parting and separation from all that is near and dear? How is it possible that what is conditioned (saṅkhata), produced by causes and conditions, should not decay, disappear, and dissolve? Furthermore, the deities are finding fault with this behavior of the monks." Then the monks asked: "Venerable Anuruddha, how do the deities behave? What are the deities saying at this moment?" Then he said: "The deities who are not yet Arahants are lamenting and weeping in the same way. But those deities who are Arahants comfort their minds, reflecting that all Preparations/volitional activities (saṅkhāra) are impermanent (anicca)."

Next, Venerable Anuruddha told Venerable Ānanda: "Go now and inform the Mallan princes of Kusinārā that the Blessed One has passed away." As soon as Venerable Ānanda informed them in that way, the Mallan princes also began to weep and lament in the same manner. They also said to take charge of what needed to be done next, to take charge of the cremation. So, those Mallan princes came, and eight of them, having bathed and dressed in clean clothes, tried to lift the sacred body of the Supreme Buddha to take it to the cremation ground, but they could not lift it. At that moment, they asked Venerable Anuruddha: "Venerable Sir, why is it that despite our best efforts, we cannot lift it?" Then he told the Mallan princes: "Your intention is different; the deities' expectation is different." Then they asked: "How do the deities expect it?" "You expect to carry the sacred body out through the southern gate of the city and cremate it outside the city. But the deities expect to carry it through the northern gate, and cremate it at the Makuṭabandhana shrine located to the east of the city." Once they said, "Let the wishes of the deities be fulfilled!", the body of the Buddha was taken in that way, placed on the pyre, and four Mallan princes, having purified themselves, prepared to light the pyre. Although they tried to light it, the fire would not catch. At that moment too, they asked Venerable Anuruddha: "Venerable Sir, why does the pyre not catch fire?" At that moment too, Venerable Anuruddha declared: "The deities' expectation is different; your expectation is different. The deities are thinking like this..." To state it in Venerable Anuruddha's own words: "Venerable Maha Kassapa Maha Thero, with five hundred monks, is currently traveling on the high road from the city of Pāvā to Kusinārā. The deities' intention is this: 'Let this pyre not catch fire until Venerable Maha Kassapa Maha Thero arrives and pays homage to the feet of the Supreme Buddha!'" When he said that there was such an expectation of the deities, they delayed lighting the pyre in accordance with that request. In due course, Venerable Maha Kassapa Maha Thero arrived with his retinue of five hundred, clasped his hands in reverence, circumambulated the pyre three times, opened the pyre at the feet of the Supreme Buddha, and paid homage. Those five hundred monks also paid homage. As soon as they paid homage, it is mentioned in that discourse that the pyre caught fire by itself.

So, now we can see: in modern times, during such festive occasions—we do not need to describe how they organize them with various equipment for the ear and eye. Yet, they do not have the power to connect with the divine world. It is difficult to think that such a power could arise in this era. Venerable Anuruddha accomplished that task without any of these. Nowadays, our interest in computers is like the past interest in absorptions (jhānas) and so on. Everyone made a special effort to develop the mind. That is not something done with external equipment and tools. It was in such an era that Venerable Anuruddha stood out in that manner, although they had no need to stand out. Since the other chief elders had passed away, Venerable Anuruddha very skillfully organized those activities during that supreme moment, in accordance with the situation, utilizing his powers of absorption (jhāna) and higher spiritual knowledges (abhiññā). Therefore, we should reflect that in this era, at the start of a year, the benefits as well as the disadvantages of those tools are manifest to the world. Likewise, this is a time when the mental powers of human beings, the special powers and qualities of Dhamma associated with our humanity, are in decline. At such a time, the character of Venerable Anuruddha we have declared, with those valuable qualities, can be called a supreme model of unity. These delicate princes—as mentioned in the Dhamma, who had palaces suited to the three seasons just like Prince Siddhartha, sometimes without even coming down to the ground floor during the rainy season—these Sakyan princes of delicate upbringing strove hard in the forest, meditated, and exerted special energy to attain those states, for no other reason than for liberation from saṁsāra. Not only that. Through the absorptions (jhānas) and higher spiritual knowledges (abhiññā) they attained, they rendered a great service to the world in that manner. Therefore, this is an opportunity for you to reflect, especially for meditators, on this life of Anuruddha. Through his shortcomings as well as the things expressed through his strength, one can understand those obstacles of the mind, the imperfections (upakkilesa) of the mind, and the word papañca (conceptual proliferation) we expressed, which often present themselves to meditators in a good guise, as seen in the discussions the Supreme Buddha and Venerable Sāriputta had with Venerable Anuruddha. Next, it is seen that they attained absorptions (jhānas), higher spiritual knowledges (abhiññā), and did a great service to the world through them.

Therefore, if we reflect on the aims of this Dispensation of the Buddha, they consist in developing inner spiritual strength, and there are three: virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). Developing concentration based on virtue, it is by using that as a support that wisdom can be attained. Nowadays, we hear various kinds of talk, claiming that one can attain the paths and fruits (magga-phala) merely by listening to a sermon. In some places in the sutta discourses, those who had developed these in past lives did indeed attain not only the fruit of stream-entry (sotāpatti-phala) but even the fruit of Arahantship with the help of a brief word of the Buddha. But if someone thinks that in this era, these can be obtained instantly like modern gadgets, that is a delusion. That is why we must reflect: these are the values of the Dispensation. It is true that we use these devices. But we must use them only as tools and not make them the ultimate goals of our lives. If we can get some help from them to develop our inner spiritual strength, that is what is necessary. Just as we use the four requisites in life to attain Arahantship. You are listening to the Dhamma in this mechanical age using such devices. You do many other things. But it is difficult to think that the Dispensation develops merely because the Dhamma is abundant. If, because of its abundance, one is led to think of these as worthless, trivial things, that is a great foolishness. We say that the appearance of a Buddha (buddhōtpāda) is rare. We say it is rare.

But this Dhamma is not rare. Nowadays, it is more than abundant. You can carry the Tipitaka in your pocket. There is no need to carry it in the mind or memorize it. Such is the era. Likewise, this is what meditators expect in this era: to obtain these paths and fruits (magga-phala) instantly. Even meditation centers are turning into fruit shops nowadays.

We must reflect that even such highly meritorious Venerable Ones like Anuruddha attained those states only by exerting great energy. Therefore, in the coming year of your lives, you must reflect on what our true aim in this Dispensation should be, compared to how ordinary people think. That is why even Venerable Anuruddha had a worry (kukkucca): "I see divine worlds. I have concentration. Why is my mind not yet liberated from the influxes (āsava)?" Indeed, Arahantship must be our target. If we take only the higher spiritual knowledges (abhiññā), even some worldly yogis had those powers. We have heard that even the Elder Devadatta attained these higher spiritual knowledges (abhiññā). Worldly higher spiritual knowledges (lokiya-abhiññā) alone are not enough. One must know how to use worldly higher spiritual knowledges correctly with insight-wisdom (vipassanā-ñāṇa). Otherwise, those mental powers become the path to one's own destruction, the wrong path. That is why, as Buddhists, we must remember that. Taking those yogic meditations and so on as major achievements, without forgetting the message of Nibbāna, which is the most valuable life of this Dispensation of the Buddha, we must keep this liberation from saṁsāra shown by the Supreme Buddha as our target in mind.

To help in that, you have undertaken a valuable virtue (sīla) today. It is by being established in virtue that one can develop this concentration. Established in that virtue, using mindfulness and clear comprehension (sati-sampajañña) to develop what is called concentration, not stopping there, if there is a concentration sign (samādhi-nimitta)—it is clear that a concentration sign was developed, as seen in the way the Supreme Buddha strived during His time as a Bodhisatta, when mentioning those imperfections (upakkilesa). The way Venerable Anuruddha energetically strived for meditation is also clearly shown. But some people think that those are unnecessary, that mindfulness alone is enough, clear comprehension alone is enough. That is not enough. If so, there would be no need to speak about concentration. But the Supreme Buddha has spoken about concentration next to mindfulness. Therefore, within clear comprehension, there is a power to attain concentration. Likewise, there is a higher purpose, a side that turns towards insight-wisdom (vipassanā). Having understood these, and having understood that our ultimate goal is Nibbāna, we must strive to develop concentration to the highest level according to our special paramis in saṁsāra, and realize that noble liberation. With the eye we use, if we cannot see properly with this eye, we use spectacles, we use other devices to look at things. But for those noble ones who have developed the divine eye like Venerable Anuruddha, who have well developed the powers of absorption (jhāna), when questions are asked, not only the deities in those divine worlds but even their thoughts and wishes are visible. How wonderful! It is a great encouragement to you pious meditators that in the past, those Venerable Ones came from royal, wealthy, and noble families, strived with energy, and attained such powers. In the next year too, without losing this rare opportunity of a human life by becoming enslaved to that technology, we must understand this rare opportunity and make a resolution to walk on the path of virtue, concentration, and wisdom (sīla-samādhi-paññā).

Today, having left your homes and having developed renunciation (nekkhamma) to some extent, you directed yourselves towards seclusion. Indeed, although everyone cannot ordain, it is bad to think: "We cannot attain these powers of absorption (jhāna) and so on." By training oneself to live in seclusion, starting with being established in virtue, if one constantly develops one's meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna), one can develop those powers. It is through that that one is said to have walked on the true path walked by the Supreme Buddha, with the true strength of humanity.

Through this undertaking of virtue, you must have engaged in the Dhamma and meditation you are accustomed to during this time. In this sermon, helping these pious meditators by using the exemplary characters of Venerable Anuruddha and other Theros, taking at least one percent of the energy they exerted, walking on this path of Dhamma, these characters of Arahants show us the maximum fruit that can be obtained from the rare human existence in this rare period of a Buddha's appearance (buddhōtpāda). One must strive to attain that goal in this very life. We have to say that nowadays, there are invitations from various places in this country saying, "Come with us, why are you in such a hurry? Let us go in the next bus." In the morning, at that time too, we said: "Do not accept those invitations. If you do, you will always be in the queue." Therefore, if you do not understand this rare opportunity, if you do not make use of it, you will have to regret. Leaving this human existence, one does not know where this mind of ours will be born. Therefore, you must make proper use of it. Hence, it is not about going to the end of technology. By developing the true inner strength, the spiritual strength, while bringing welfare to the world, to realize one's own liberation from saṁsāra, we ask you to make a resolution at this moment when one year is ending and a new year is about to begin. Likewise, we wish that this sermon may serve as a support (upanissaya), a conducive cause, for you to fulfill your future noble aspirations!

Likewise, from Avīci to Akaniṭṭha, if there are any beings who wish to rejoice in this merit of preaching the Dhamma and hearing the Dhamma, may they, through that rejoicing, quickly realize their aspired supreme goals! With this expectation, recite these verses and share the merit.

Theragāthā

Dear Listeners,

The Venerable Kumāra Kassapa Mahā Arahant was a disciple who received from the Blessed One the foremost position (etadagga) among those who are eloquent speakers (citta-kathika). The term citta-kathika signifies the ability to preach the Dhamma in a wondrous and diverse manner, presenting appropriate similes and illustrations according to the occasion. Today, we have selected as our theme two verses mentioned in the Theragāthā Pāḷi, which the Ven. Kumāra Kassapa Mahā Arahant uttered in praise of the virtues of the Triple Gem after attaining Arahantship. In these verses, the indeclinable particle 'aho' is used in the sense of expressing wonder. "Oh, how wondrous are the Buddhas! Oh, how wondrous is their Dhamma! Oh, how wondrous is the attainment of our Teacher! In what kind of teacher's achievement, within what kind of dispensation of holy life (brahmacariya), a disciple realizes such a Dhamma—how wondrous is that achievement of the Teacher!" In the next verse, it is said: "In incalculable aeons, existences of the existing group (sakkāya) have been received by me, have arisen for me. Of those, this is the last group of the five aggregates of grasping (pañcupādānakkhandha). This is the final existing group (sakkāya). This is the last body. The round of rebirths characterized by Birth and Death (jātimaraṇasaṁsāra) is ended; now there is no renewed becoming (bhava)." That is the meaning of those two verses.

Through these two verses, the Ven. Kumāra Kassapa Mahā Arahant has very beautifully praised the virtues of the Triple Gem, taking his own direct realization as an illustration. There are certain remarkable features in the life story of Kumāra Kassapa Mahā Arahant, just as in his eloquence. According to the Pāḷi records, like other great disciples who received foremost positions, Kumāra Kassapa Mahā Arahant had also fulfilled the perfections (pāramī) for a long period in the presence of past Buddhas, aspiring for this position. In the time of our Buddha, he was born in Rājagaha as the son of a treasurer's daughter. His birth is recorded as follows:

That treasurer's daughter had a great desire to ordain and asked her parents for permission to become a bhikkhunī, but they did not grant it. Instead, they gave her in marriage to someone. Not long after being married, having obtained permission from her husband, she ordained in the Bhikkhunī Order. However, she did not know at the time that she was pregnant. As the womb matured, the other bhikkhunīs suspected her and informed Elder Devadatta about this. Elder Devadatta said that this bhikkhunī should be disrobed. But that bhikkhunī—let us call her the mother of Kumāra Kassapa—when she had the matter referred to the Buddha, the Buddha assigned Elder Upāli, the foremost among the masters of discipline (vinayadhara), to resolve this issue. Elder Upāli summoned the residents of Sāvatthi and the great laywoman disciple Visākhā, and in the midst of an assembly including the King, had a screen put up. He had Visākhā examine the bhikkhunī and concluded that the pregnancy had occurred during her lay life, and thus she was innocent. In due course, while in the bhikkhunī monastery, she gave birth to this child. Later, King Pasenadi of Kosala, thinking that raising this child would be an impediment and a trouble for the bhikkhunīs, took over the responsibility of raising him. Because of this, it is said he received the name 'Kumāra Kassapa' (Kassapa the Prince). Furthermore, this prince entered the order at the young age of seven.

There is a highly important discourse associated with him in the Tipiṭaka literature, called the Vammika Sutta ('The Ant-hill Discourse') in the Majjhima Nikāya. In truth, that was not a sermon preached by him. At that time, the Ven. Kumāra Kassapa had not yet attained Arahantship. One day, while he was meditating in the Andhavana forest during the night, a deity appeared and presented fifteen deep, enigmatic questions using the simile of an ant-hill. No one else in this world-system could answer these questions; only the Buddha could answer them. So the deity told him to go and ask the Buddha. When the Ven. Kumāra Kassapa asked those questions, the explanation given by the Buddha is what is recorded in the Vammika Sutta. According to what is mentioned in the Apadāna Pāḷi, the Buddha's profound exposition helped the Ven. Kumāra Kassapa to attain Arahantship.

Although he received the foremost position as an eloquent speaker (citta-kathika), among the discourses available to us, the only sutta that reveals the eloquence of Ven. Kumāra Kassapa Mahā Arahant is the Pāyāsi Sutta in the Dīgha Nikāya. It is a very long discourse, containing numerous illustrative similes. Let us try to extract a few similes from it that are suitable for this occasion. The story is recorded as follows. According to the opinion of scholars, this Pāyāsi Sutta appears to have been preached after the Parinibbāna of the Buddha. At that time, Ven. Kumāra Kassapa Mahā Arahant was elderly and held a highly respected position. It is recorded as follows: On one occasion, while Ven. Kumāra Kassapa Mahā Arahant was wandering in the Kosala country with a large retinue of five hundred bhikkhus, he arrived at the city of Setavyā and resided in the Siṁsapā grove, an Aṭṭēriyā (Indian Rosewood) forest located to the north of the city. Next, the book describes the city of Setavyā as follows.

The ruler of the city of Setavyā was a local chieftain appointed by King Pasenadi of Kosala, named Pāyāsi Rājañña. He was not a king, but was known as 'Rājañña' (chieftain/prince). This ruler is specifically described as follows: He was a person who held a very grave wrong view (micchā-diṭṭhi). What was the view he clung to? 'There is no other world; there are no spontaneously born (opapātika) beings; there are no fruits or results of good and bad deeds.' This Pāyāsi Rājañña was someone who held such a terrible, sinful view. Then, it is recorded as follows: When the news spread that the Ven. Kumāra Kassapa Mahā Arahant had arrived—that a wise, learned, intelligent, eloquent, elderly Mahā Arahant was residing there—his reputation spread far and wide. While a group of residents from Setavyā was preparing to go to the Siṁsapā grove to see him, Pāyāsi Rājañña, who was resting during the day, saw the crowd going and asked his doorkeeper, "Where is this crowd going?" The doorkeeper replied: "They are going to see a monk named Kumāra Kassapa who has arrived." Then Pāyāsi Rājañña told his servants: "In that case, go and tell that crowd not to go until Pāyāsi comes. I will also go with you. Before that ascetic deceives foolish brahmins by spreading false rumors that there is another world, that there are spontaneously born beings, and that there are results of good and bad deeds, I must go there." Thus he went.

That chieftain went along with the crowd, exchanged pleasantries with Ven. Kumāra Kassapa, and then directly stated his view: "My view, Kassapa, is this: there is no other world, there are no spontaneously born beings, there are no fruits or results of good and bad deeds." Then Ven. Kumāra Kassapa remarked: "I have never heard of such a thing. This is indeed a very wrong view." First, he asked: "Are the sun and moon things belonging to this world or the other?" Pāyāsi admitted: "They do not belong to this world; they belong to the other world, the higher celestial world." Then the Elder asked: "Why then do you hold such a view?" From that point onwards, a very long discussion ensues. These are long narratives that reveal the patient endurance and the brilliant, creative intelligence of Ven. Kumāra Kassapa Mahā Arahant.

Some of the similes are very long. This is how it begins. The Elder asks, "Why did you adopt such a view, such a wrong opinion?" To this, Pāyāsi Rājañña explains the kind of experiments he performed. He says: "I have friends and relatives who commit the ten unwholesome deeds—killing, stealing, and so on. When these relatives and friends of mine fell ill and were close to death, I went to them and said: 'If you die and are born in hell, come and tell me that there is another world.' Although I told them so, no one has yet come and told me that there is another world." It is based on this that Pāyāsi Rājañña asserts there is no other world. The simile given by Ven. Kassapa to this is as follows: "Now, Rājañña, suppose you are a king's officer, and your servants capture a criminal who has committed an offense, and bring him to you to be punished. Then, as a punishment, you order: ‘Bind him with ropes, beat the execution drum, take him through the streets, and execute him by cutting off his head at the place of execution on the south side of the city.’ When the executioners have bound that man and taken him there, and he sits down to be beheaded, can that man say to the executioners: ‘Wait a moment until I go and take leave of my relatives and friends and return’?" Pāyāsi replies, "No, he cannot." Then the Elder says: "Rājañña, if that human thief cannot get permission from those human executioners, how could he, after going to hell, get permission from the wardens of hell to come and tell this chieftain about the matter?" Then Pāyāsi admitted it was impossible, but added: "Even so, Ven. Sir, I still cling to my view."

Again, he gives another reason for it. It proceeds in the same manner. This was regarding the ten unwholesome deeds. "Similarly, I went to my friends and relatives who abstain from the ten unwholesome deeds like killing and so on, when they were on their deathbeds, and said: ‘If you are born in a celestial world, come and tell me.’ Let the devotees think of this in the same way. ‘None of them have come so far to give me the message, even though I asked them to.’" Then the Ven. Thero says: "Just as a man who has fallen into a cesspit, after being pulled out, washed, and cleaned, would not want to go back into that cesspit again, so a person who has gone from this human world and is enjoying celestial pleasures in the heavenly world would not trouble himself to return to the human world to tell this to the Rājañña." Related to the same point, the chieftain says: "The ascetics and brahmins say that if one keeps the five precepts properly, one goes to the Tāvatiṁsa heaven. I also told such people who keep the five precepts properly: ‘If you are born in the Tāvatiṁsa heaven, come and tell me.’ But in that case too, no one came to tell me." Then Ven. Kassapa explains the life-span of the Tāvatiṁsa heaven. One hundred years in the human world is equivalent to a single day in that celestial world. Therefore, if a person born in that heaven thought of coming to fulfill the message after enjoying heavenly bliss for just two or three days, would you still be alive in this human world to receive it? Pāyāsi answers that question too.

Next, he describes another experiment he conducted. To put it briefly, dear devotees, think about this carefully: Pāyāsi was like a pioneer to modern physical scientists who use advanced machinery to study the workings of the mind. Understand this from what Pāyāsi says next. On this occasion, Pāyāsi Rājañña relates an experiment he performed and its results: "When a criminal like that is brought to me, I tell my men to put that man alive into a large jar, cover its mouth with a damp hide, seal it well with clay, place it on a furnace, and light a fire. When the man is about to die, I carefully open it to see if the vital principle (jīva) escapes from the jar. Although I did so, as a result of that experiment, I did not see any vital principle escaping." That was a very foolish experiment.

The answer given by Ven. Kassapa to this is worth contemplating. He asks: "Rājañña, do you remember when you go to sleep during the day—indeed, one has dreams even during the day—do you not see yourself in dreams going to beautiful, delightful ponds and gardens? Do you remember?" "Yes," he replies. "On such occasions, if you have attendants and maids watching over you, do they see your vital principle departing, or your mind departing?" "No," he says. From this, we can understand something. Ven. Kassapa says: "If they cannot see the movement of your mind while you are alive, how could one see the mind departing at the moment of death?" When this was said, what could he say? This Rājañña was someone who had conducted a fair number of experiments; in short, he can be called a pioneer among physical scientists who conduct experiments.

Then he says: "On some occasions, I weigh a condemned man on a scale before he is executed. Then I weigh him again after he is dead. When weighed after death, he is heavier than before. If the vital principle had departed, shouldn't he be lighter?" This was his logic. Then Ven. Kassapa asks: "Rājañña, then answer this question. When an iron ball is heated all day long, it is lighter when weighed, isn't it? When it is completely cooled, it is much heavier, isn't it?" Pāyāsi replies: "Yes, that is so. When the heat element (tejo-dhātu) and the wind element (vāyo-dhātu) are combined and active, the iron ball is lighter. When they subside, it is heavier."

"Just like that," Ven. Kassapa says, "as long as this body possesses life-span, warmth, and consciousness (āyu, usmā, viññāṇa), the body is lighter. After death, it becomes stiff and heavy." In this manner, he answers that question. Thus, there were various kinds of experiments.

Some other arguments are quite humorous. He says: "If virtuous people go to heavenly worlds and such places after death, why do they protect their lives? They could eat poison and die sooner, if they knew they would be born in a good place. I do not see anyone doing that." At that point, Ven. Kassapa gives a unique simile. This is how it is told. These are illustrative stories. Whether they are actual events or not, he says: "A certain brahmin had two wives. The child of one wife was ten or twelve years old. While the other wife was pregnant with a child, the brahmin passed away. That ten or twelve-year-old boy said to his stepmother: ‘Now, this wealth of my father belongs to me, not to you. Therefore, hand it over to me.’ Then this woman said: ‘Wait a little while until this child is born. If this child is a boy, he will also get a portion. If it is a girl, I will hand it over to you.’ Again and again, the boy harassed her. Later, this woman—since in those days there were no instruments to find out the state of a child in the womb as there are today, nor were there methods to hasten birth as many do today—what did she do? She took a knife, went into a room, and in order to quickly deliver the child, performed a certain surgical operation on herself, and consequently died." Giving this simile, Ven. Kassapa says: "Just like that, virtuous people do not destroy their lives prematurely when there is still time to live. Committing suicide in expectation of a happy destiny is like what that woman did in trying to force the birth before the child was due."

In this way, he goes on giving similes. But this person, the Rājañña, continues to state such points endlessly. After a certain point, when he was convinced to some extent, he says: "If I abandon this view of mine now, King Pasenadi of Kosala and many others, as well as people of neighboring countries, know that Pāyāsi Rājañña holds such a view. If I abandon this view, I might face various accusations from others. Otherwise, they will look down on me, saying that I behaved foolishly for so long." Even after understanding and being convinced, the Rājañña was reluctant to abandon his view due to pride (māna). At that point, the Ven. Kumāra Kassapa Arahant relates a great number of similes. If I were to relate all of them, it would be a very long description. I am mentioning only what is essential. On that occasion, Pāyāsi says: "It is not because I am not convinced that I do not abandon this, but out of shame for what I have held for so long." The simile then given by Ven. Kassapa is a good story worth remembering for all of us.

You may have heard this before. He says: "Rājañña, the people of a certain province abandoned that province. It became an empty, desolate province. Two friends from a neighboring province discussed: ‘Let us go to that desolate province to gather some wealth.’ So the two started their journey. In the first village they reached, they found a large quantity of discarded hemp-tow (hana-vähari). These two friends said: ‘Let us bind bundles of hemp,’ and they both bound two bundles of hemp. Carrying them, they proceeded further, and in the next village, they found hempen thread. One friend said: ‘Why are we carrying this hemp-tow? Thread is more valuable. Let us discard this hemp and take the thread.’ But what did the other friend say? ‘I have carried this bundle of hemp for a long distance. It is well bound. I cannot abandon it.’ Therefore, that friend carried the bundle of hemp as it was. The other friend bound a bundle of hempen thread and carried it. Going further, they found hempen cloth, which we call sacks. Discarding the hempen thread, the wise friend said: ‘Friend, carrying a valuable thing is useful to us.’ He discarded the thread and bound a bundle of hempen cloth. The other carried his bundle of hemp just as before. The story goes on like this. To make it short, in the next village they found cotton, then cotton thread, then cotton cloth. Think of it in this way. At every stage, the wise one abandoned the old bundle and took the new, more valuable thing."

Then, as they went further, there were discarded metals, scrap iron. Even scrap iron is valuable. Indeed, iron was also there. Then lead, copper, and so on, step by step, there was a list of valuable things. Next, silver. Silver was also discarded there. This is said as a simile. Then, one friend, the wise one, bound a bundle of silver, while the other still carried his old bundle of hemp. Finally, at the last place, gold was discarded. The wise friend gathered that gold. The other friend kept his bundle of hemp just as it was. Eventually, these two returned to their village. When they returned, the family of the one who had brought the bundle of gold was extremely happy. Relatives, parents, everyone was delighted. The family of the one who carried the old bundle of hemp was very disappointed. "Similarly, Rājañña, you too are carrying a bundle of hemp." When this was said, Pāyāsi Rājañña replied: "Venerable Sir, I was convinced even when I heard the first few similes. But in order to experience your brilliant and creative eloquence, I pretended to show opposition further." Thereupon, the Rājañña, just as it is said in other places, uttered "Abhikkantaṁ bhante" (Excellent, Venerable Sir! Excellent!), took refuge in the Triple Gem, and declared: "I take refuge as a lay disciple from this day forward, as long as life lasts."

Furthermore, he said to Ven. Kumāra Kassapa Mahā Arahant: "Venerable Sir, I wish to give a great alms-offering. I am a man who has never even thought of how to give alms before. I wish to give a great alms-offering; please advise me on this,"—he, a man who knew nothing of alms-giving. On this, Ven. Kumāra Kassapa Mahā Arahant preached something: "In any alms-giving or sacrifice where cattle, goats, sheep, etc., are slaughtered, and if those who accept the alms are individuals of wrong views, wrong thoughts, wrong concentration, etc., then that alms-giving does not yield great fruit or great benefit. It is just like a farmer who takes a plough and seed-paddy, goes into the forest, and sows the seeds in uncultivated, infertile, poorly protected soil, and does not get a good harvest; the benefits of such sacrifices are minimal. On the other hand, in a true sacrifice, there is no slaughter of animals. Furthermore, those who receive the alms are individuals of right view, right thought, right speech. Alms given to such people yield great fruit and great benefit." If we explain this with the simile of farming, it is like preparing the soil well, setting up the field, and sowing the right kind of seeds in the proper manner, which yields an abundant harvest.

Then, Pāyāsi Rājañña for the first time established a regular charity (dan-väṭa). A dan-väṭa means a great alms-distribution to ascetics, brahmins, the poor, travelers, and beggars. He started a daily almsgiving. There, it is mentioned as follows: In this almsgiving, what did this Rājañña give? Gruel-broth (kāḍi-hodda) and broken-rice bread (nivuḍu-salē bata). After some time, a young man named Uttara, a close associate of Pāyāsi Rājañña who was in charge of organizing, preparing, and distributing this alms, made various sarcastic remarks: "I may be with this Pāyāsi Rājañña in this world, but I do not wish to be associated with him in the next world." Pāyāsi summoned him and asked: "Why do you say so, young man?"—or let us say, ‘friend’ or ‘your majesty/sire’. "Sir, you give to others food that you would not even wish to touch with your foot. You give to others coarse garments that you would not even wish to touch with your foot." When this was said, Pāyāsi changed his mind and told the young man Uttara: "In that case, arrange to give them the same food that I eat, and good garments like the ones I wear." In this way, the alms-giving continued. It went on and on, and next is the side of results.

The Pāyāsi Sutta ends with extraordinary historical events. Some people might disbelieve them. But this is what is recorded. Ultimately, as a result of this almsgiving, Pāyāsi Rājañña, after his death, was born in an empty celestial mansion called Serīssaka, belonging to the realm of the Four Great Kings (Cātumahārājika). However, the young man Uttara was born in a celestial world with much greater wealth and splendor. What was the reason? There, something is mentioned regarding the manner of giving alms, which you may have read in other places as well. Regarding how an almsgiving should be properly conducted, it is described in four terms:

* Sakkaccaṁ dānaṁ deti: He gives alms carefully, properly, and in an orderly manner.

* Sāhatthā dānaṁ deti: He gives alms with his own hands.

* Cittīkatvā dānaṁ deti: He gives alms having pleased his mind with faith, compassion, etc.

* Anapaviddhaṁ dānaṁ deti: He gives alms respectfully, not as if discarding it.

This is what is called a good almsgiving: sakkaccaṁ, sāhatthā, cittīkatvā, anapaviddhaṁ. But Pāyāsi Rājañña gave alms in the wrong way. He gave alms carelessly (asakkaccaṁ), at least in the early stages, not properly. It was that gruel-broth and broken-rice. Furthermore, it was not done with his own hands, nor was it done with a pleased mind, but as if discarding it. Therefore, it is shown that the Rājañña received lesser results. He appeared in an empty mansion in the Cātumahārājika realm. But the young man Uttara was born in a place of great comfort in the Tāvatiṁsa heaven.

This story goes even further. You have heard about Yasa, the clansman's son. Among the fifty-five friends of Yasa the clansman's son, four prominent ones are mentioned: Vimala, Subāhu, Puṇṇaji, and Gavampati. The Elder named Gavampati was very elderly by that time; he was an Arahant. He had a habit of going to that empty Serīssaka mansion belonging to the Cātumahārājika realm for his daytime abiding (divā-vihāra). One day, when he went there, the Rājañña was there. He asked, "Who are you?"

"I am Pāyāsi."

"Why, did you not hold such a wrong view: ‘There is no other world, there are no spontaneously born beings, etc.’?"

"Yes, indeed I did. But the Ven. Kumāra Kassapa Mahā Arahant removed my wrong view. It is because of that I was born in the Cātumahārājika realm."

"Then where is the young man Uttara, who managed your almsgiving?"

"He gave alms better than I did, and has been born in the Tāvatiṁsa heaven."

In the Vimānavatthu Commentary, Pāyāsi Rājañña is referred to by the name Serīssaka. This is a long story. Pāyāsi Rājañña then makes a request to the Ven. Gavampati Mahā Arahant:

"Venerable Sir, please go to the human world and tell the humans, with this illustration, that Pāyāsi gave alms carelessly, did not give with his own hands, did not please his mind, and gave alms as if discarding them, and consequently was born in an empty mansion in the Cātumahārājika realm. But Pāyāsi Rājañña's organizer and pupil, the young man Uttara, did the opposite: he gave alms carefully, with his own hands, with a pleased mind, and not as if discarding them, but with great care and respect, and has gone to the Tāvatiṁsa heaven. Venerable Sir, preach to these humans in the human world to give alms carefully, to give with their own hands, to give with a pleased mind, and not to give alms as if discarding them." In this way, that discourse ends.

Thus, we can think that even someone who had committed such sins as to go to hell—we can imagine how terribly—every leader knows it, there is no need to elaborate. That is why they say being a ruler is like a gateway to hell. If, for some reason, without believing in karma and its fruits, he had remained drowned in such sinful karma, we cannot say where this man would have ended up; ultimately he would have fallen into hell. But due to the compassion and patience of the great Kumāra Kassapa Arahant, who turned the Rājañña around by giving so many similes, he went to a celestial world. The commentaries and other texts further state: someone might ask how this could happen when he had committed so many sinful deeds. Let us say, whether it was broken-rice bread or some other alms (later on, he gave alms well), if one gets the opportunity to offer alms to a Mahā Arahant like Kumāra Kassapa at the very moment he arises from the attainment of cessation (nirodha-samāpatti), through that very wholesome merit, one escapes hell in the next life. Someone might ask how a person who committed so many sins could go to the Cātumahārājika realm.

In this way, there is a very deep side to wholesome and unwholesome deeds (karma). That is why the arising of the Triple Gem brings such peace and blessing to the world. Contemplate on that. But even in this day and age, there are materialists. Think also of the lessons that can be drawn from this. It is not just about telling stories. When we think of the present era, we do not have the primitive instruments of those days, like conducting experiments by putting a man in a jar. Yet today, they do the very same thing in a more subtle manner. I forgot to mention one thing, a simile suited for this moment.

On the occasion when the Tāvatiṁsa heaven was mentioned, the Rājañña asks Ven. Kumāra Kassapa Mahā Arahant: "How do you say there is a Tāvatiṁsa heaven, and that there is such a life-span? How is it, have you seen it?" Then comes this simile: "If a man blind from birth says there is no sun, moon, or stars, can that be accepted?" "No." "Similarly, there are yogis dwelling in the forest who have developed the divine eye (dibba-cakkhu). It is with that divine eye, not with the physical eye, that this is said." This was mentioned by Ven. Kumāra Kassapa at one point during those similes. If we bring that up again here, this is what is being done even now.

We have said before that there are three eyes. When we speak of three eyes, there are various stories about them. But in the Dhamma, there are: the physical eye (māsa-cakkhu), the divine eye (dibba-cakkhu), and the wisdom eye (paññā-cakkhu). The physical eye is the eye of flesh. The divine eye is what yogis and sages of the past brought forth through meditative absorptions (jhāna). Next is the wisdom eye.

When speaking about the movement of the mind, you may have heard some of our discourses on dependent co-arising (paṭiccasamuppāda). One can never make a decision about the existence of the mind using the physical eye. Today, what goes by the name of physical science attempts to talk big about the mind by examining how the brain functions and doing other things. This is what they hold onto as 'psychology'. It is extremely limited, because they arrive at these conclusions using instruments connected only to the five physical senses. But next, there is the divine eye. That is higher than the physical eye. It is through that divine eye that the existence of another world is seen, rebirth is seen, and the results of karma are seen. Sages of the past saw that level. However, the entirety of the mind is not grasped by it. The divine eye is superior to the physical eye, and the wisdom eye is superior to the divine eye. The working of the mind grasped by that wisdom eye is what we have been showing so far through discourses on dependent co-arising (paṭiccasamuppāda).

What was not seen by any sage or yogi was seen by the Buddha. There is such a deep matter here. But people dilute these and speak of psychology and this and that. What they say may be correct to some extent. But that is why we said that this Rājañña was like the pioneer of physical science. One can see even today how far the wrong views (micchā-diṭṭhi) derived from this can go. Some people say: "I cannot see it; our scientists have not said that there is another world," and they cling to that opinion. It is for such people that a verse from the Subhāṣitaya—which is a certain matter expressed in very simple language by Alagiyavanna Mukaveṭi—applies. The older generation might know it:

Whether there is another world or not, O virtuous ones,

It is indeed good to abandon sinful deeds, keeping the mind pure.

If there is no other world, no harm is done thereby;

But if there is, ruin befalls the one who sinned, thinking there is none.

Therein lies that profound truth. If we state the deep meaning of the verse in the Subhāṣitaya in Dhamma terms, it can be called the 'Incontrovertible Path' (apaṇṇaka-paṭipadā). Let us proceed to that. To understand the term apaṇṇaka-paṭipadā, for many people, the very first Jātaka story among the Jātaka stories is the Apaṇṇaka Jātaka. Furthermore, in the Majjhima Nikāya, there is a special discourse called the Apaṇṇaka Sutta. To tell the Apaṇṇaka Jātaka story briefly here: while the Bodhisatta and Devadatta, as two merchants, were traveling through a desert, a demon, intending to prey on them, came forward with wet hair and holding lotus flowers, to show that there was plenty of water on the other side. When asked, he said there was water over there. The first merchant discarded all the water they carried in their carts, and consequently fell prey to the demon. The Bodhisatta, who came second, thought: "What he says might be true or might not be true. If we carry our water, it is only a slight trouble. We can discard it later." Thus, thinking wisely, he escaped that disaster. The general principle of the apaṇṇaka-paṭipadā can be stated like this: whether it is right or wrong, we are safe in the end.

In the Apaṇṇaka Sutta, the Buddha shows this. It is a very profound discourse. On one occasion, the Buddha said to the householders of Sāleyyaka: "If you do not have a teacher in whom you have placed a reasoned faith (ākāravatī saddhā) after making a deliberate decision, I tell you to adopt this principle regarding this matter, to understand what is good and bad, right and wrong. This is called the apaṇṇaka-paṭipadā (the safe or incontrovertible path)." Next, he illustrates it as follows: "Suppose a certain teacher comes and declares the ten-fold wrong view (dasa-vatthuka micchā-diṭṭhi). You know it, even if I do not describe each one. ‘There is no alms-giving, no offering, no sacrifice; there is no mother, no father; there is no this world, no other world; and finally, there are no spontaneously born beings.’ A person holding wrong views says this. Next, those who hold right view (sammā-diṭṭhi) say that these exist—that there are results of sacrifices, and so on. Then, a person who does not have a proper teacher falls into doubt as to which of the two is correct."

Then, the Buddha expounds the way to resolve this—the way a wise person should contemplate to resolve it: "Now, if I accept the view of the first person mentioned, what would be the result? What can be expected from a person who holds that nihilistic view? He spends his life committing various crimes without any understanding of wholesome and unwholesome deeds. Meanwhile, he is censured by the wise. When caught in crimes, it happens naturally. Meanwhile, if indeed there is no other world, there is nothing to fear. But he has already experienced the retribution in this very life. If there is another world, he will fall into a terrible place. Next, one should think about what was said by the second teacher who holds right view, according to the method of conclusion in the apaṇṇaka-paṭipadā. If what they say is true, those who hold this view avoid bad deeds and lead a good life even in this world. They are praised by the wise. If their view turns out to be wrong, there is no loss to them in this life. If it turns out to be correct, they will go to a heavenly world." By giving such illustrations, what the Buddha expounds is the apaṇṇaka-paṭipadā.

This is a problem for many people even today. "So-and-so says this, and so-and-so says that." This must be thought of according to the situation. Decisions must be made regarding the results, drawbacks, and benefits. Now, that Rājaññā clung to his experiments and carried that wrong view (micchā-diṭṭhi) for a long time. Similarly, today there are such people with big titles, be they philosophers or scientists, who say: "He said this, she said that. The result of this experiment is such, therefore there is no result of karma; heaven and such things are not visible yet." In such situations, if one cannot establish faith (saddhā) in the Buddha, one must think in that manner. For those who have faith (saddhā), this question does not arise. But for those who do not have faith (saddhā) but possess wisdom, the course of action to be taken is what is shown through the apaṇṇaka-paṭipadā. In such instances, one should think that there are benefits to the aforementioned right view (sammā-diṭṭhi) in this life, and also in the next life. That is why we said, whether it is right or wrong, we must think of shaping our lives accordingly, and not just keep talking about it. This story of Pāyāsi is an example for us in several ways. On one hand, Ven. Kumāra Kassapa Mahā Arahant, due to his abundance of compassion, and on the other hand, due to his eloquence (citta-kathikatā), gave various matching similes to every question asked by the Rājañña. He gave illustrative stories, subdued him, made him a donor, and even enabled him to go to a celestial world.

Next, we must contemplate what was said about almsgiving. Even when offering a spoonful of rice, we must bear those points in mind. In modern times, almsgiving is not a transactional business done as a physical process. Although the topic of almsgiving is not explained anew, it is very familiar to you. But almsgiving is not just about giving. You have heard various details about giving with a pleased mind throughout the three phases (before, during, and after). How profound a matter it is becomes clear from this story. The pupil, the young man Uttara, who gave alms carefully and with his own hands, surpassed the Rājañña who merely supplied the materials for the alms, and enjoyed the benefits thereof. Contemplate on those; contemplate on their depth. Giving is not just a visible physical act—though it appears so. It is not an ordinary worldly transaction. There is a deep meaning here, such as preparing the mind and giving with one's own hands. Thus, the concept of almsgiving also goes deep. You can learn something from that as well.

Next, the story of this world and the next. We must constantly contemplate the three eyes we mentioned. Our physical eye is not sufficient. What have they done for hundreds of years by inventing various instruments? They are still going in the same direction. The eye cannot see enough, so they used spectacles. Finding spectacles insufficient, they used telescopes and microscopes. It is the same with other senses. Finding that the ear cannot hear enough, they invented other things. There is no need to elaborate on these. In fact, a person in this era can say that if one has a sufficient amount of money, there is no need for supernormal knowledges (abhiññā). There is no need for abhiññā. The divine eye (dibba-cakkhu) is in that box at home. Next, the divine ear (dibba-sota) is there. They have not just one or two, but many of these instruments. They even walk on the roads listening with the divine ear. The divine ear is close by. Going through the air is also like that. Everything is like that. Looking at it that way, supernormal knowledges (abhiññā) are not needed in this era. But when looking deeply, there is no truth within them; it is only a departure from the truth. It is true that we cannot escape them due to the current trend. But we must contemplate that the truth lies in the Dhamma, which might seem outdated to people of this era. The minds of those who are subdued by those instruments and trends become dull. Ultimately, they become subservient to instruments. Knowing these drawbacks—and indeed, what we say now is also being recorded—perhaps you might think: "It doesn't matter if we sleep now; we can listen to this later." But the manner in which they listened to the Dhamma and took in the teachings in the past is extremely valuable to us.

In the past, even in the times we remember, when starting a Dhamma sermon, they would first state how one should listen to the Dhamma. Today, they do not even say that, because there are recording instruments. We frequently remind you: Atthīkatvā, manasikaritvā, sabbacetaso samannāharitvā, ohitasoto dhammaṁ suṇāti (paying attention, reflecting, with all his mind applied, lending an ear, he listens to the Dhamma). It is in such instances that the fruits of the path (magga-phala) arise, and concentration (samādhi) is established. This means thinking: "There is something beneficial for me in this," reflecting on word by word, applying the entire mind (sabbacetaso samannāharitvā), lending an ear (ohitasoto)—it is when listening in this way that concentration (samādhi) is established therein.

Especially when listening to the Buddha, or listening to those noble disciples, even if a snake bit them, they would not know. They were absorbed in such a wondrous concentration (samādhi). For such people, the fruits of the path are not far. Within that very state, the hindrances (nīvaraṇa) are removed, and concentration (samādhi) comes. That is why the Buddha expounds that when one listens to the Buddha's Dhamma, at that moment, a mind accompanied by lust (rāga) does not arise, a mind accompanied by hatred (dosa) does not arise, a mind accompanied by delusion (moha) does not arise; the hindrances (nīvaraṇa) are removed. Having been removed, concentration (samādhi) is prepared. That is what is called: kalla-cittaṁ, mudu-cittaṁ, vinīvaraṇa-cittaṁ (a prepared mind, a malleable mind, a mind free from hindrances). We have also spoken to you on some occasions about the Buddha's preaching style. How a person who has never heard the Dhamma before attains Stream-entry (sotāpanna) in a single sermon is a great mystery to some. But the Buddha's discourses are 'graduated discourses' (anupubbī-kathā). We have given more details about these on other occasions. Dāna-kathaṁ, sīla-kathaṁ, sagga-kathaṁ, kāmānaṁ ādīnavaṁ, okāraṁ saṅkilesaṁ, nekkhamme āniśaṁsaṁ (talk on giving, talk on virtue, talk on heaven, the danger, degradation, and corruption of sensual pleasures, and the benefit of renunciation)—these form the basic part of the graduated discourse. This means that through the talk on giving, even to beggars who have nothing to give, the thought of giving arises: "Ah, if only I had something to give, I would give it!" Even though they are not asked to observe the precepts, when the Buddha speaks of the benefits of virtue (sīla), they rejoice right then and there and adopt those training rules. Thus, both giving (dāna) and virtue (sīla) are established. Next, when speaking of the benefits of both, the talk on heaven (sagga-kathā), it is as if they have gone to the heavenly world. After that, when the Buddha preaches the dangers of sensual pleasures (kāmānaṁ ādīnavaṁ)—all the pleasures of the celestial and human worlds—their corrupt nature and their low nature, and speaks of the benefits of renunciation (nekkhamma), they turn to the other side.

A passage that is frequently mentioned describes how at that moment the Buddha looks at the mind of that disciple. That is why it is said: Yathā bhagavā aññāsi kalla-cittaṁ mudu-cittaṁ vinīvaraṇa-cittaṁ udagga-cittaṁ pasanna-cittaṁ (When the Blessed One knew that the mind of the hearer was prepared, malleable, free from hindrances, uplifted, and bright). Seeing that the disciple's mind is properly prepared, soft, free from hindrances, well-uplifted, and full of joy and confidence, only then does the Buddha expound the Four Noble Truths: dukkha, samudaya, nirodha, magga (Suffering, Origin, Cessation, Path). It is through such a preaching style, as well as the manner in which the Dhamma is heard, that the fruits of the path are attained.

Now, what do many people say? They say: "It is enough to just listen to the Dhamma to become a Stream-enterer." But they do not say how one should listen to the Dhamma. To tell the truth, if that were the case, it is this recording machine that should become a Stream-enterer, not the people who listen to it! Such is this era. We remind you of these according to the times, because this is a world bound to the physical eye, enslaved by the aforementioned machines. In such an era, they are like Pāyāsi. They too must have followers. It is the same in this era. Therefore, you must protect yourselves from these and walk on this path of virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā) declared by the Buddha. There are no short cuts like pressing buttons to attain the fruits of the path; one must go from the very beginning. Therefore, established in a certain virtue (sīla), and using that virtue as a support, as we often say, one must then make an effort towards a state of concentration (samādhi).

According to the talks going on now, something often said by those who come to us is that meditation is merely looking at the mind. They say that looking at the mind is all that is needed. It is a very easy task. There is no talk of concentration (samādhi), and then they even say that concentration is not needed. "We are wise people; we do not need concentration." Such are the stories going around. But we must keep in mind the Buddha's word: Natthi jhānaṁ apaññassa, paññā natthi ajhāyato, yamhi jhānañ ca paññā ca, sa ve nibbānassa santike (There is no meditative absorption for one who lacks wisdom, nor is there wisdom for one who lacks meditative absorption. He who has both meditative absorption and wisdom is indeed close to Nibbāna). Thus, the Buddha has declared that the one who has both is close to Nibbāna. Through this narrative, we must understand the supremacy of the Buddha's teaching, as well as the brilliant and creative intelligence of his disciples. In the past, that brilliant and creative intelligence and the wonderful style of preaching were directed towards Nibbāna—directed solely towards Nibbāna. By the time one finished listening to it, one was already inclined towards the path of Dhamma. But this is not something done for fame. The terms "wonderful sermon" and "eloquent preacher of Dhamma" are used very casually nowadays.

Perhaps to assist the wonderful preaching style of such great noble ones as Kumāra Kassapa Mahā Arahant, a deity came and asked fifteen very deep questions from the Elder. We did not go on to relate that. That is not a sermon of his. The Vammika Sutta is an extremely profound discourse. It contains fifteen very deep questions asked by a deity using the simile of an ant-hill. No one else could answer them, and he was told to go and ask the Buddha. But if we think about why this was said to Ven. Kumāra Kassapa, it must have been a subject of meditation (kammaṭṭhāna) for his Arahantship. It must have been a subject of meditation for his eloquence. We should think of it in that way.

Through these Dhamma talks, we must become more energetic. Whether as lay women or lay men disciples, it is good to recall the time of the Buddha. Now, things are going in the opposite direction. We must shatter the perception of "inability" prevalent in this era, arouse the perception of "ability", and strive. It is true. There are a thousand obstacles within the modernizing trend. But if someone thinks wisely, discards unnecessary things, keeps close what is valuable and necessary, and makes an effort during this short life-span without putting it off further, they will be able to achieve those supreme goals they hope for.

Therefore, today as well, you should observe a valuable virtue (sīla), without looking down on it, without thinking: "We do not need qualities like virtue; we can jump straight to the fruits of the path." Instead, turning away from the daily pattern of life, and inclining towards the practice of the Arahants at least for a single day, observe a valuable virtue (sīla), and spend this day directing your mind to your Dhamma study and meditation. It is in such a situation that, if one is to understand, one can understand properly. Therefore, understanding these words of ours, on one hand, if there are shortcomings in your views, correct them with right view (sammā-diṭṭhi). We must use the very words of the Rājaññā: "Having been in such a sinful view, it is due to Ven. Kumāra Kassapa Mahā Arahant that I, who was bound for hell, obtained such a celestial rebirth." Thinking in this way, we must understand the value of all three: giving (dāna), virtue (sīla), and meditation (bhāvanā), in the light of this Dhamma talk.

All of this is done during the short time we live. Because if this valuable opportunity is lost, many people indeed think with fear about the place where they will be born next. "We do not know where we will be born, if rebirth is a truth." The Buddha points out its danger. If one becomes a Stream-enterer at least, the greatness of the arising of the Dhamma-eye is that, once that Dhamma-eye has arisen, one loses the eligibility to go to hell, and one loses the eligibility to go to the animal world, through the eradication of the dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi). There lies the secret. Therefore, the Buddha has shown that even by the measure of the arising of that Dhamma-eye, one escapes a vast mass of suffering (dukkha-kkhandha) in saṁsāra. Understanding these, discarding the perception of "inability", and arousing the perception of "ability", may this sermon delivered today help you to proceed further and further on this path of Dhamma! Let us make that aspiration.

Aspiring thus, as we constantly say, from the Avīci hell up to the Akaniṭṭha heaven, if anyone wishes to rejoice in the merit of this Dhamma preaching and Dhamma listening, may they, through that rejoicing, realize the supreme goal through their aspired Bodhi! Recite these verses with that aspiration.

Parāyana Vagga, Sutta Nipāta

Dear Listeners,

The Supreme Buddha, the Teacher of the Three Worlds, introduces the world to us as a place enveloped in ignorance (avijjā). The entire Buddhist path of practice is a journey from ignorance (avijjā) to wisdom (vijjā)—a journey from darkness to light. It is a few verses revealing this fact that we have taken today as our theme. These verses are found in the Ajita Māṇava Pucchā (The Questions of the Youth Ajita) in the Pārāyana Vagga of the Sutta Nipāta. The introductory story of these verses is the account concerning the Brahmin Bāvarī. Briefly stated, Bāvarī was a Brahmin teacher who had mastered the Vedic texts. He left the Kosala country with his sixteen disciples and set out for the far regions of Southern India, known at that time as the Dakkhiṇāpatha (Southern Path). He departed in search of 'nothingness' (ākiñcaññāyatana), the sphere of nothingness. Having traveled a long distance, this group built a hermitage and resided on the banks of the River Godāvarī, in an area belonging to the King of Assaka. The number of disciples in that hermitage gradually increased, and the surrounding village also became prosperous. The king directed the revenue of that village to this hermitage. However, the Brahmin Bāvarī used those funds from time to time to conduct grand sacrifices.

On one occasion, after using that revenue to conduct a grand sacrifice, just as the Brahmin teacher Bāvarī returned to the hermitage, a certain visiting Brahmin arrived and demanded, "Give me five hundred coins (Kahāpaṇas)." Then the Brahmin Bāvarī said, "All my wealth for almsgiving has been exhausted. There is no way I can give you five hundred coins." Thereupon, this deceitful Brahmin said, "If you cannot give me what I ask, within seven days your head will split into seven pieces." Because of this curse, the Brahmin Bāvarī became terrified. Seeing him sitting in grief, unable to eat or practice absorption (jhāna), a benevolent deity approached Bāvarī to console him, saying, "That deceitful Brahmin does not know what the head is, nor does he know the splitting of the head. That Brahmin has no knowledge regarding this." Then the Brahmin Bāvarī asked the deity, "Do you know what the head is, and what the splitting of the head is?" The deity replied, "I too do not know. Knowledge regarding the head and the splitting of the head is unique only to the Buddhas. The Buddhas are the ones who possess that knowledge." Then Bāvarī said, "If there is anyone on this entire earth who knows this matter, tell me about them." It was then that the deity revealed the news: "Having departed from the city of Kapilavastu, the Lion of the Sakyas, the Savior of the World, has attained Supreme Enlightenment. He is residing in the Kosala country, preaching the Dhamma to the world, fully liberated. Go to that Supreme Buddha and ask this question." The moment he heard the name "Sambuddha" (Fully Enlightened One), the Brahmin's grief was appeased, and his heart leaped with joy. Then he asked, "In which village, province, or city does the Blessed One reside?" The deity replied, "In Savatthi, in the Kosala country."

Since the Brahmin Bāvarī was very advanced in age, he called his sixteen disciples and said, "A Buddha, a Fully Enlightened One, who rarely appears in the world, has now arisen. Go and meet the Supreme Buddha." When he said this, those disciples asked, "How are we to recognize that he is indeed a Buddha?" Then the Brahmin Bāvarī replied, "In our Vedic texts, there is mention of the thirty-two marks of a Great Man. If those marks are present on a person's body, there are only two paths open to him. If he remains a layman, he will become a Wheel-Turning Monarch (Cakkavatti). If he goes forth into homelessness, he will attain Supreme Enlightenment. When you go and meet the Buddha, ask him these questions in your mind: ask about my age, my clan, my learning, the marks on my body, and the number of my disciples. Ask these mentally. Furthermore, ask mentally about the head and the splitting of the head. Since the Buddha possesses unobstructed knowledge and vision (anāvaraṇa-ñāṇa-dassana), he will answer the questions asked mentally with spoken words."

That group of disciples set out on the long journey from the Dakkhiṇāpatha. There were sixteen disciples in this group: Ajita, Tissa Metteyya, Puṇṇaka, Mettagū, Dhotaka, Upasīva, Nanda, Hemaka, Todeyya, Kappa, Jatukaṇṇī, Bhadrāvudha, Udaya, Posāla, Mogharāja, and Piṅgiya. As this group completed their long journey, the Buddha was at the Pāsāṇaka Shrine in Magadha, preaching to the Sangha. Having climbed that hill, the youth Ajita asked in his mind the questions entrusted to him by the Brahmin Bāvarī. First, he asked about Bāvarī himself. The Buddha answered in words: "The Brahmin Bāvarī is one hundred and twenty years old. His clan name is Bāvarī. There are three of the thirty-two marks of a Great Man on his body. He is a master of the Vedas. He has five hundred disciples." He explained in this manner. The listening crowd was astonished at how the Buddha could declare these things without any verbal question being asked. After that, the chief disciple, Ajita, asked the specified question in his mind. The Brahmin Bāvarī asks: "What is the head, and what is the splitting of the head?" It was then that the Buddha declared this in a verse:

> Avijjā muddhā ti jānāhi, > vijjā muddhādhipātinī,

> Saddhā-sati-samādhīhi, > chanda-vīriyena saṁyutā.

That verse declares: "Know that ignorance (avijjā) is the head. The splitting of the head is wisdom (vijjā). That wisdom (vijjā) is accompanied by faith (saddhā), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), desire (chanda), and energy (vīriya)." The moment this verse was uttered, the sixteen disciples, headed by Ajita, prostrated with great devotion at the feet of the Buddha, declaring that Bāvarī and his disciples paid homage to the Blessed One. When they said this, the Buddha blessed them, wishing that Bāvarī as well as his disciples may be happy. He gave a special blessing to the youth Ajita: "May you too be happy! May you live long!" Then he invited them: "If Bāvarī or any of you have any questions, ask them. I will answer." It was at that moment that the chief disciple Ajita presented his questions through the verses we chose as our theme. In this Pārāyana Vagga, the questions of all sixteen disciples and the answers given to them by the Buddha are recorded in a very profound manner. The question asked by the youth Ajita is what we took as our theme.

> Kena-ssu nivuto loko,

> kena-ssu nappakāsati,

> Kissābhilepanaṁ brūsi, > kiṁsu tassa mahabbhayaṁ.

By what is the world enveloped?

Why does it not shine?

What is its sticky smear?

What is its great terror?

Now, the Buddha answers:

> Avijjāya nivuto loko, > vevichā pamādā nappakāsati,

> Jappābhilepanaṁ brūmi, > dukkhaṁ assa mahabbhayaṁ.

The world is enveloped by ignorance (avijjā).

Because of stinginess and negligence, it does not shine.

Craving (taṇhā) is its sticky smear, I declare.

Suffering (dukkha) is its great terror.

Then, the youth Ajita asks another question:

> Savanti sabbadhī sotā, > sotānaṁ kiṁ nivāraṇaṁ,

> Sotānaṁ saṁvaraṁ brūhi, > kena sotā pithiyyare.

Streams flow everywhere.

What is the dam for these streams?

Tell me the restraint for the streams.

By what are the streams shut off?

Now, the Buddha answers:

> Yāni sotāni lokasmiṁ,

> sati tesaṁ nivāraṇaṁ,

> Sotānaṁ saṁvaraṁ brūmi, > paññāy'ete pithiyyare.

Whatever streams of craving (taṇhā) there are in the world,

Mindfulness (sati) is their dam, their prevention.

I declare it to be the restraint of the streams.

But by wisdom (paññā) they are completely shut off.

Thus, the questions and the answers given by the Buddha have been declared. Now, we have to say something about this. You must have understood, devout friends, that these verses mainly speak about ignorance (avijjā) and craving (taṇhā), which we frequently encounter. Anyone who knows the Dhamma has read about these factors in various places. Particularly in the Anamatagga Saṁyutta, the statement made by the Buddha regarding ignorance (avijjā) and craving (taṇhā) is indeed wonderful.

"Bhikkhave, saṁsāro anamataggo, pubbā koṭi na paññāyati avijjānīvaraṇānaṁ sattānaṁ taṇhāsaṁyojanānaṁ sandhāvataṁ saṁsarataṁ..."

"Monks, this saṁsāra is without discoverable beginning. A first point is not discerned of beings hindered by ignorance (avijjā) and fettered by craving (taṇhā) faring on and running through saṁsāra." It is impossible to see a starting point for this running and wandering in saṁsāra, enveloped by ignorance (avijjā) and bound by craving (taṇhā). The Buddha also indicates in some places that a beginning limit of ignorance (avijjā) cannot be shown by saying, "Prior to this, ignorance (avijjā) did not exist, and it arose only thereafter." It is because of these two—ignorance (avijjā) and craving (taṇhā)—that beings wander for such a long time in saṁsāra. Next, it was mentioned here that the world is enveloped by ignorance (avijjā). What is this world? What is this world!! Let us try to understand what "the world" means according to the Dhamma and according to common usage. Today, many people talk about the world. But although they talk about it, those who do not even have an understanding of the world often express various opinions. The Buddha introduces the world to us. He points it out in various suttas. On one occasion, the Venerable Samiddhi asks the Buddha:

"Loko, loko'ti, bhante, vuccati. Kittāvatā nu kho, bhante, loko vā assa lokapaññatti vā'ti?"

"Venerable sir, it is said 'the world, the world.' To what extent, venerable sir, is there a world or a description of a world?" Then the Buddha says:

"Yattha kho, Samiddhi, atthi cakkhu, atthi rūpā, atthi cakkhuviññāṇaṁ, atthi cakkhuviññāṇatabbā dhammā, atthi tattha loko vā lokapaññatti vā."

"Where there is the eye, Samiddhi, where there are forms, where there is eye-consciousness (viññāṇa), where there are things to be cognized by eye-consciousness (viññāṇa), there is the world or the designation of the world." In this manner, the world is described based on the six sense bases: eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind. Similar analyses are found in many places. On one occasion, Venerable Ānanda addresses the monks and states: "Yena kho, āvuso, lokasmiṁ lokasaññī hoti lokamānī, ayaṁ vuccati ariyassa vinaye loko." "That by which one is a perceiver of the world and a conceiver of the world, friend, is called the world in the discipline of the Noble Ones." By what does one become a perceiver and a conceiver of the world? By the eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind. By these. We understand that the world is that which is contained within the sixfold sense base (saḷāyatana), where the sixfold sense base (saḷāyatana) begins.

Next, to gain a deeper understanding of this, let us present a valuable story. In the Aṅguttara Nikāya, in one place, a Brahmin named Verañja used a few derogatory words to insult the Buddha. The Buddha elevated every word to a new meaning, turned it toward the Dhamma, and cleansed the filth from that word. One word used by this Verañja Brahmin was: "Apagabbho samaṇo Gotamo" (The ascetic Gotama is devoid of embryonic growth/sterile). He meant a bad birth, born from a foul womb—something like an abusive term in modern times. Then the Buddha said, "Yes, that is true. I am indeed apagabbha. I will not undergo birth in a mother's womb again. Therefore, what you said is correct." But he did not stop there. He gave a novel simile: "Brahmin, suppose a hen has eight, ten, or twelve eggs and sits on them properly. If one of those chicks is the first to break through the eggshell with its claw or beak and come out safely, what would you call that chick, Brahmin—the youngest or the eldest?" The Brahmin replied, "Master Gotama, I would call it the eldest." "In the same way, Brahmin," the Buddha connected, "among those beings who are enveloped by ignorance (avijjā), imprisoned inside the eggshell of ignorance (avijjā), I am the very first to break through that eggshell and come out. Therefore, I am the eldest in the world."

Based on this, we can contemplate: what is the eggshell? What is the eggshell? The eggshell in which the entire world is trapped is the eggshell of the sixfold sense base (saḷāyatana) that we mentioned earlier. Everyone, including scientists, is trapped inside this. Then, what does it mean to break the eggshell and come out? It is to become world-transcending (lokuttara). Everyone talks about the experience limited to this eggshell. This is what scientists talk about, and what everyone knows. But the Buddha points out another side. Even when there is the cessation of the sixfold sense base (saḷāyatana-nirodha), there is a certain experience. That is indeed the coming out of the eggshell. Liberation is there. Nibbāna is there. Think about it from that perspective. We have provided a deeper meaning of ignorance (avijjā) and the world from that.

Next, let us speak about craving (taṇhā). Often, when speaking about craving (taṇhā), the word lepa (smear/glue) is used; sometimes it is called visattikā. Visattikā means a sticky substance. The quality of binding is also what is found in the fetters (saṁyojana). Thus, ignorance (avijjā) veils, and craving (taṇhā) adheres, or binds. Sometimes we refer to these two as the father and mother of saṁsāra. It is through these two that this entire suffering (dukkha) of saṁsāra is accumulated. When we look at Dependent Arising (paṭicca-samuppāda), we see that starting with 'dependent on ignorance' (avijjā-paccayā), craving (taṇhā) is found in the middle. Whichever way you look at it, these two are the main factors.

On one occasion, in the Satipaṭṭhāna Saṁyutta, the Buddha gives another valuable simile showing this sticky nature of craving (taṇhā). "Monks, there are level regions in the Himālaya mountains where both humans and monkeys roam. In such a region, a monkey-catcher sets a sticky trap of pitch to catch monkeys. Suppose the pitch is smeared on a piece of wood or a tree trunk. It must be a tasty pitch for monkeys. The Buddha states that those monkeys who are not greedy and have some understanding will see the pitch from afar and keep away. But a greedy and foolish monkey comes along, sees the pitch, and catches it with one hand. It gets stuck. He tries to free it with his second hand. That too gets stuck. He brings a foot close to free the hand. That too gets stuck. He brings his second foot. That too gets stuck. After that, he brings his mouth close to free his hands. That too gets stuck. Now, when he is stuck in five places, the monkey-catcher comes, shoots him, and carries the monkey away along with the piece of wood." What does this simile represent? The five cords of sensual pleasure. The five cords of sensual pleasure are just like that, the Buddha points out through this simile. That sticky nature is well illustrated by this simile. This entire suffering (dukkha) is prepared within these two. Jappābhilepanaṁ brūmi (Craving is the sticky smear in which the world is stuck).

Next, the greatest fear in the world is suffering (dukkha). The suttas on Dependent Arising (paṭicca-samuppāda) also show us how suffering (dukkha) is prepared—how this entire mass of suffering (dukkha) is prepared. Beginning with ignorance (avijjā), joined by craving (taṇhā), these two combine to finally prepare the entire five aggregates of grasping (pañcupādānakkhandha). That is what was shown in the main points of the first verse. Next, another nature of craving (taṇhā) is mentioned. The youth Ajita asks: Savanti sabbadhī sotā—"Streams flow everywhere. How are they to be dammed?" This is the question he asks. Those streams are sometimes described as being thirty-six in number: Yassa chattiṁsatī sotā, manāpasavana bhūsā (He whose thirty-six streams flow strongly towards pleasant things). This is explained as follows: the streams of craving (taṇhā) flow through the senses of eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind towards their respective objects. When these six are multiplied by the three types of craving—craving for sensual pleasures (kāma-taṇhā), craving for becoming (bhava-taṇhā), and craving for non-becoming (vibhava-taṇhā)—they become eighteen. When multiplied by the two aspects of internal and external, they become thirty-six. Some commentaries show that when multiplied by the three periods of time—past, future, and present—they become one hundred and eight. How are these one hundred and eight streams of craving (taṇhā) to be dammed? This is Ajita's question. The Buddha says: by mindfulness (sati). It is by mindfulness (sati). Sati nivāraṇaṁ (mindfulness is their dam). That is why you can understand, devout friends, why the Buddha has given such a prominent place to the four establishments of mindfulness (cattāro satipaṭṭhāna) as the direct path (ekāyana maggo). This mindfulness and wisdom (paññā) are indeed the most practically important things among these teachings. There are many other suttas revealing the importance of mindfulness (sati). We point each of these out so that you may ponder deeply upon them.

On one occasion, a Brahmin named Unṇābha came to the Buddha and asked: "These five faculties—eye, ear, nose, tongue, and body—have different domains and different pastures. That is, the eye is for seeing forms and cannot do what the ear does. The ear cannot see forms. In this way, their respective pastures—what is called the objective field—are different. The pasture of the eye is form; forms are the pasture of the eye. Sounds are the pasture of the ear, and so on. The pasture fields of these five are different. Then, Master Gotama, what is the resort (paṭisaraṇa) for these pastures brought in by the five sense faculties? Where do they go and gather?" The Buddha replied: "The mind (manas)." You can contemplate this, devout friends. What is brought from these five external sense bases gathers in the mind (manas). Then he asks another question: "What is the resort (paṭisaraṇa) of the mind?" The Buddha's answer to this is mindfulness (sati). The resort of the mind is mindfulness (sati). This goes even further. From an ordinary point of view, it seems as if there is no problem, but the entire Dhamma is contained within this. Next, he asks: "What is the resort of mindfulness?" The resort of mindfulness is liberation (vimutti). "What is the resort of liberation?" The resort of liberation is Nibbāna. There the discussion ends.

From this we see how important mindfulness (sati) is. Once what is brought by the body-senses comes to the mind, some control can be exercised over them through mindfulness (sati). That is why in so many suttas you have heard, especially when describing sense restraint, mindfulness (sati) is depicted as a gatekeeper (dvārapāla). It is said, "guarded as to the doors of the faculties" (indriyesu guttadvāratā). It is the job of a gatekeeper to let in suitable people and close the door when unsuitable people arrive. In other places, mindfulness is described as "the protecting charioteer" (sati-ārakkha-sārathī). There are occasions where this is shown through the simile of a chariot. The charioteer who drives the chariot, the one engaged in guarding, the gatekeeper—in this manner, the function of mindfulness (sati) is shown. It provides protection to the mind. That is why mindfulness is shown to be so important in this verse. But the last line can sometimes be a problem. Mindfulness (sati) only does the damming. It only temporarily blocks the flowing streams. This is completely, thoroughly shut off by wisdom (paññā). There lies the problem.

What is this wisdom (paññā)? How does this wisdom (paññā) shut off all these streams? From there, let us go a bit deeper. Now we declared the story of the head and the splitting of the head. That indeed is the basis of this entire sermon. Then, ignorance (avijjā) was said to be the head. The splitting of the head means the shattering of ignorance (avijjā). How is ignorance (avijjā) shattered? It is through the shattering of ignorance (avijjā) that wisdom (vijjā) emerges. When ignorance (avijjā) ceases, wisdom (vijjā) arises. Wisdom (vijjā) means realization. When speaking about realization, the topic of wisdom (paññā) arises. Wisdom (paññā) is shown as a light in some places. We mentioned being trapped inside an eggshell. It is only after breaking the eggshell and coming out that one sees things as they truly are. To the one trapped inside the eggshell, nothing beyond is visible. That is why wisdom (paññā) is described in a wonderful manner. In some places, wisdom (paññā) is shown as an eye. You may have heard of the fleshly eye, the divine eye, and the wisdom eye. Everyone has the fleshly eye (maṁsa-cakkhu). Next is the divine eye (dibba-cakkhu), which is attained by sages and those who have attained absorptions (jhāna). Even higher than that is the wisdom eye (paññā-cakkhu) introduced to the world by the Buddha. There is a certain passage describing wisdom (paññā) and how that wisdom eye is brought to light:

"Udayatthagāminī paññā ariyā nibbedhikā sammā dukkhakkhayagāminī."

"The noble, penetrative wisdom (paññā) that goes to the rise and fall (of phenomena), and leads to the complete destruction of suffering (dukkha)." The seed of this wisdom (paññā), or its beginning, starts in a manner suited to the realization of the yogi. It is the wisdom (paññā) that sees the arising and passing away of things. The world stands on the side of arising (samudaya). Generally, cessation (nirodha) is not within their domain. The worldling disregards cessation and constantly goes from arising to arising. That is what is called craving (taṇhā). It leads to renewed existence (ponobbhavikā), pulling and sticking from existence to existence. The primary function of wisdom (paññā) is to bring to light the veiled cessation (nirodha). Its primary aspect is that the yogi understands the arising and passing away of this world—its impermanence (aniccatā)—through these two words. We can call it samudaya-vaya (arising and passing away). We can call it udayatthagama (rise and fall). This is the nature of preparations (saṅkhāra).

> Aniccā vata saṅkhārā,

> uppādavayadhammino,

> Uppajjitvā nirujjhanti,

> tesaṁ vūpasamo sukho.

"Impermanent (anicca) indeed are preparations (saṅkhāra), subject to rise and fall. Having arisen, they cease; their calming is bliss." Everything is contained right there. It is not something that happens after death. "Impermanent indeed are preparations (saṅkhāra)"—every preparation (saṅkhāra) is impermanent (anicca). "Subject to rise and fall"—their nature is arising and passing away. "Having arisen, they cease"—they arise only to cease. "Their calming is bliss"—that is the very thing that leads to wisdom (paññā), the path leading to cessation (nirodha).

In some places, that wisdom (paññā) is shown as a light. These may sometimes be a problem for someone. They might think of these statements made by the Buddha in various places as mere similes. There are many similes for light. It is called ābhā (radiance); it is called pabhā (splendor). There is a sutta that some do not take very seriously, thinking of it merely as something beautifully said: "Catasso imā, bhikkhave, pabhā. Katamā catasso? Candappabhā, sūriyappabhā, aggippabhā, paññāpabhā. Etadaggaṁ, bhikkhave, imāsaṁ catunnaṁ pabhānaṁ yadidaṁ paññāpabhā." "There are these four splendors, monks. Which four? The splendor of the moon, the splendor of the sun, the splendor of fire, and the splendor of wisdom (paññā). Among these, the splendor of wisdom (paññā) is supreme." All other splendors are surpassed by this splendor of wisdom (paññā). One can understand that this is not a statement made lightly. We said that this is a journey from ignorance (avijjā) to wisdom (vijjā), a journey from darkness to light. That light is contained within the word paññā. It is called the lamp of wisdom (paññā-pajjoto). In many places describing the direct experience of the Arahants, the final mention is:

"Paññāya tassa disvā āsavānaṁ parikkhayaṁ gacchati."

"Having seen with wisdom (paññā), his influxes are completely destroyed." It is because of this that we said these flowing torrents of craving (taṇhā) cannot be completely shut off by mindfulness (sati) alone. It must be done by wisdom (paññā) itself. Because the word āsava (influx/canker) also contains the meaning of "flowing." As long as the influxes are not destroyed, liberation is not complete. It is only when those influxes are destroyed that everything is completed. This light, the light of wisdom (paññā), is an internal light. That light, as mentioned here, surpasses the splendor of the moon and the sun. There is a verse related to this, which scholars have discussed for a long time, at the end of the Bāhiya Sutta:

> Yattha āpo ca paṭhavī, > tejo vāyo na gādhati,

> Na tattha sukkā jotanti, > ādicco nappakāsati,

> Na tattha candimā bhāti, > tamo tattha na vijjati.

>

> Yadā ca attanāvedi,

> muni monena brāhmaṇo,

> Atha rūpā arūpā ca,

> sukhadukkhā pamuccatī'ti.

This stands as a great riddle-like verse. After the ascetic Bāhiya Dārucīriya attained Arahantship instantly and passed away (*pariNibbāna, the Buddha uttered this extremely profound verse as an inspired utterance (udāna). This matter is expressed subtly within it.

"Where water, earth, fire, and wind find no footing." In which consciousness (viññāṇa)? Everyone is established within these great elements (mahābhūta), but they do not reside, they find no footing, in that mind. In such a state: "There the stars do not shine." "The sun does not shed its light." "The moon does not beam." What is the reason? Within that splendor of wisdom (paññā), all those objects that give light to the world are rendered lusterless. The world sees things through a medium. To see, they need a medium. In the night, they need starlight, or they need moonlight, or they need sunlight. Otherwise, they need fire—which includes electricity, and so forth. It is through such light that we see. But when the light of wisdom (paññā) comes, those other lights are made lusterless. The moon, sun, and stars all lose their luster. That is what we have to say, because those things are not caught up in that state. That splendor of wisdom (paññā) at the moment of release from the sixfold sense base (saḷāyatana) is what is called the destruction of the influxes. "Having seen with wisdom (paññā)"—having seen through that wisdom, the influxes are destroyed. That is liberation.

The word wisdom (paññā) coming after mindfulness (sati) becomes extremely important. Some explain this in various ways. A good proof of this is mentioned in the Ajita Māṇava Pucchā itself. After receiving answers to those verses, the youth Ajita asks the Buddha: "Where does Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) cease completely?" (Nāmañca rūpañca, asesaṁ uparujjhati). At that point, the Buddha says: "With the cessation of consciousness (viññāṇa-nirodha), it ceases completely" (Viññāṇassa nirodhena, uparujjhati). Two words are mentioned there: cessation (nirodha) and complete cessation (uparodhana). Cessation of consciousness (viññāṇa-nirodha) means that the prepared consciousness (abhisaṅkhata-viññāṇa), the un-Arahant consciousness, exists depending on Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). When that prepared consciousness (saṅkhata-viññāṇa) which existed depending on Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) ceases, that state is called the unmanifestative consciousness (anidassana-viññāṇa). That consciousness (viññāṇa) does not show Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). That unmanifestative consciousness (anidassana-viññāṇa) is indeed the state of the liberated mind. There, the moon, sun, etc., find no place. At the conclusion of the sutta, something similar is said:

"Viññāṇaṁ anidassanaṁ, anantaṁ sabbato pabhaṁ..."

"Consciousness (viññāṇa) that is non-manifestative, infinite, radiant all-round; here water, earth, fire, and wind find no footing; here long and short, fine and coarse, pleasant and unpleasant (Name-and-Form cease completely)." In this manner, the verse goes on. That is, that unmanifestative consciousness (anidassana-viññāṇa), the consciousness (viññāṇa) that does not manifest Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa), is that liberated mind. It is infinite (anantaṁ); there are no limits such as long or short. "Radiant all-round" (sabbato pabhaṁ)—it is luminous in every way. That is the reason. Because it is luminous in every way, this is a state where everything the world regards as light-giving objects is rendered lusterless. That is why it was said that the moon, sun, etc., do not shine. What is obtained from this is not the meaning obtained from ordinary words. The light of wisdom (paññā) is not something external. It is something that comes from within. In the presence of that light of wisdom (paññā) that comes from within, the entire world of Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) ceases, or is completely stopped. That completely stopped state is what exists in the attainment of the fruit of Arahantship (arahattaphala-samāpatti). We have pointed out the relevant suttas on various occasions. If the sixfold sense base (saḷāyatana) is the world, then the cessation of the sixfold sense base (saḷāyatana-nirodha) is the world-transcending (lokuttara) state. It is the moment of breaking through the eggshell and coming out. It is not the vision thought of by the ordinary world. That vision is an entirely open vision; it exists within that open mind. What is put together is called the prepared (saṅkhata). Name-and-

Form (nāmarūpa) is a prepared thing. If we are to say a little more about how it is made, we have explained these to some extent in sermons on Dependent Arising (paṭicca-samuppāda).

The twelve factors of Dependent Arising (paṭicca-samuppāda), as we all know, begin indeed with ignorance (avijjā). But as we have pointed out, within that darkness of ignorance (avijjā), a certain preparation (saṅkhāra) is made. We can say that preparation is like groping in the dark. Through that groping in the dark, the worldling makes that preparation (saṅkhāra). Sometimes it is shown as follows. The most basic preparation (saṅkhāra) necessary for existence (bhava) is inhalation and exhalation. Inhalation and exhalation are what give the feeling of self and world. The breath taken in is something taken from the external world. Having taken it in, it is given back to the world. Right there, one is caught up in the world. Inhalation and exhalation are indeed described as "bodily preparation" (kāya-saṅkhāra), in the context of "dependent on ignorance, preparations arise" (avijjā-paccayā saṅkhārā). Next is "verbal preparation" (vacī-saṅkhāra); people in the world use words to live, to exchange ideas. But beneath that are initial and sustained mental application (vitakka-vicāra), which are described as preparations (saṅkhāra). Before uttering a word, if it is a question, one thinks for a long time before uttering the word. Think of it in such situations.

The Buddha did not refer to kamma there as saṅkhāra, but to the extremely subtle aspect of preparations (saṅkhāra). Inhalation and exhalation—these too belong to existence (bhava). Existence is right there. Taking a breath in, one tries to hold it. When it is gone, one quickly takes another breath. Craving (taṇhā) is right there. Ignorance (avijjā) is right there. In order to protect this internally grasped body, thoughts (vitakka-vicāra) are used, and words are uttered through them. Next, "mental preparation" (citta-saṅkhāra) is feeling and perception (saññā vedanā). It is because of perception (saññā) and feeling (vedanā) that intentions, etc., are prepared, and we are prompted to act. What is done by those preparations (saṅkhāra) against the background of ignorance (avijjā)? Through them, consciousness (viññāṇa) and Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) emerge as two. Consciousness (viññāṇa) means discrimination. One person's consciousness (viññāṇa) is different from another's consciousness (viññāṇa). Even if all else is equal, when looking at it in terms of consciousness (viññāṇa), it is an extremely personal thing. The world is reflected in consciousness (viññāṇa) as Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). We have pointed this out. It is recognized through the mental phenomena (nāma-dhamma) of feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), intention (cetanā), contact (phassa), and attention (manasikāra), along with the great elements of earth, water, fire, and wind. Consider that as humans, the experience we derive from those feelings, perceptions, and intentions is not shared by animals, or by birds, or by creatures in the water. They have a different world. Their world of the sixfold sense base (saḷāyatana) is different. That is why the Buddha always described the world in terms of the sixfold sense base (saḷāyatana).

The Buddha showed the world through the personal sixfold sense base (saḷāyatana) of each individual being, because the origin of the world and the cessation of the world are right there. When speaking about the cessation of the world, this is the kind of thing that is found there. The prepared (saṅkhata) is constructed between Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) and consciousness (viññāṇa).

Next, "dependent on Name-and-Form, the sixfold sense base arises" (nāmarūpa-paccayā saḷāyatanaṁ). We called that duality which arose between consciousness (viññāṇa) and Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) "the two." A split into two. That is also present within the sixfold sense base (saḷāyatana). The sixfold sense base (saḷāyatana), devout friends, means the six sense bases, which go in pairs: eye and form, ear and sound, and so forth. So much so that on one occasion the Buddha declared: "Monks, I will teach you the dyad. What is the dyad? The eye and forms, the ear and sounds, the nose and odors, the tongue and tastes, the body and tactile objects, the mind and mental phenomena." Then the Buddha makes a challenge: "Monks, if anyone should say there is another dyad in the world apart from this, it would be empty chatter." This shows that this is the dyad. It is through the conflict between these two that the aggregates are accumulated. The eye clings to forms, or conflicts with them. The ear clings to sounds, and so on. Next, through that, kamma is accumulated.

We spoke about Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa): feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), intention (cetanā), contact (phassa), and attention (manasikāra). Remember the simile of the five fingers we gave. We said feeling (vedanā) is the little finger, perception (saññā) is the middle finger, next is contact (phassa) which comes to dispute, the index finger, and finally the thumb is attention (manasikāra). We showed in various ways that the journey towards this wisdom (paññā) begins with radical attention (yoniso manasikāra). We illustrated this through various similes. Even if we look at it legally, using stories from the world, if there is no witness, a court case must be dismissed. This problem between consciousness (viññāṇa) and Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) was like a court case without a witness, which even the ancient sages of the deep past could not resolve. How to understand consciousness (viññāṇa)? It is through consciousness (viññāṇa) itself that everything is presented to us. How to understand it? It was there that the Buddha applied the middle path. He made one of the defendants a witness. Who is the biggest culprit? Attention (manasikāra). Having pardoned that inappropriate attention (ayonisomanasikāra) which, combining ignorance (avijjā) and craving (taṇhā), committed this crime, he turned it into radical attention (yoniso manasikāra), saying, "You tell us the internal story." In the Dhamma, radical attention (yoniso manasikāra) means doing things in the proper manner, and it is based on this that one travels on the path of wisdom (paññā).

The passing away, the cessation (nirodha), which is invisible to the ordinary world, is seen correctly as impermanence (aniccatā) by the noble disciple, the yogi. What the ordinary world calls "impermanent" is when something that existed decays, is discarded, and another is taken. The world does not know any impermanence (aniccatā) deeper than that. The Buddha showed that this is a wisdom (paññā) that penetrates. Why did he call it penetrating? Ariyāya nibbedhikāya (noble and penetrative)—the moment something arises, one sees that its nature is to be destroyed. There lies the penetration. The world's side is the side of arising (samudaya). Forgetting cessation (nirodha), they highlight only arising (samudaya). Within that, they stick things together, one to another, through craving (taṇhā). Instead of that, the yogi highlights cessation (nirodha), though with difficulty, through the two aspects of arising and passing away. Therein lies liberation. Because if everything that arises ceases, no permanent stance can be taken there. It cannot be taken as "me" or "mine." That penetration is what is called penetrative wisdom (nibbedhikā paññā). Gradually, through that impermanence (aniccatā), the mind arises, and cessation (nirodha) comes to the fore. Because if everything that has arisen ceases, that is what the mind must be applied to. Liberation is also there. Many scholars today distinguish this path leading to cessation (nirodha) by putting the prepared (saṅkhata) on one side and the Unprepared (asaṅkhata) on the other. But this is where it lies. That consciousness (viññāṇa) we spoke of is a prepared consciousness (abhisaṅkhata-viññāṇa), a consciousness (viññāṇa) that manifests Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). If on some occasion, having developed disillusionment towards Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) in that manner, the meditator contemplates the preparations of Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa-saṅkhāra)—the objects that come to the eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind are described as Name-and-Form preparations (nāmarūpa-saṅkhāra). Within the objects that come to them, there are indeed those feelings (vedanā), perceptions (saññā), intentions (cetanā), contact (phassa), and attention (manasikāra), and the great elements grasped by them are right there. In any object, whether form or sound, if on some occasion one sees their impermanent (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and unsubstantial (anattā) nature and frees the mind from them, then indeed arises "non-manifestative consciousness" (viññāṇaṁ anidassanaṁ), the consciousness (viññāṇa) that does not reflect Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). Therein lies that liberation. That indeed is the splendor described as "radiant all-round" (sabbato pabhaṁ).

A truly wonderful sermon. What the Buddha has shown here is the difference between the world and the world-transcending (lokuttara) state. Generally, most people explain the world-transcending (lokuttara) state—for example, when an Arahant passes away (*pariNibbāna—by saying that they go and are born in some place where there is no sun, moon, or stars. That is how it has been understood for a long time. But the depth lies here. That is the great wisdom (paññā) that comes from within. It is unmediated. The world generally sees through a medium, by moonlight, by starlight. This is not like that. It is a splendor that comes from within. What is shown through that splendor? The emptiness (suññatā) of the world. How to see the emptiness (suññatā) of the world? When light comes from all sides (sabbato pabhaṁ). Suppose there is something transparent like a piece of glass. If a great light shines on it, it reaches a state where it becomes invisible. In the same way, if one sees deeply the nature of this prepared (saṅkhata) world that the world has conjured up, on some occasion the mind becomes liberated. It is through that liberation that Nibbāna is spoken of. What is the result there? It is only as long as consciousness (viññāṇa) is bound that there is a future birth. The liberated mind is sometimes described as an island. It is often said that when Arahants are absorbed in the attainment of the fruit of Arahantship (arahattaphala-samāpatti), they do not hear even a thunderbolt. That is the state of release from the sixfold sense base (saḷāyatana). That is experiencing the bliss of Nibbāna in this very life.

Next, at their final moment, that direct experience we spoke of comes to the fore. What is the reason? Even during their lifetime, if they had gained an experience of the deathless (amata), if that person had attained the direct realization that there is no fear of death when craving (taṇhā) is destroyed, even when death approaches, what arises at that moment is the attainment of the fruit of Arahantship (arahattaphala-samāpatti) registered in that mind. It is said that Buddhas and Arahants finally pass away (*pariNibbāna through an absorption (jhāna). But the depth lies in this: from that absorption (jhāna), they then enter that attainment of the fruit (phala-samāpatti). Breaking through the absorption (jhāna), and having entered the attainment of the fruit (phala-samāpatti), Buddhas and Arahants let go of the body. That is why, as we described on previous occasions, Arahants like Dabba Mallaputta are recorded to have set fire to their own bodies and attained parinibbāna. That is not like lighting a fire in modern times. It is like letting go of a garment and setting fire to it; having put the body aside through their attainment of the fruit of Arahantship (arahattaphala-samāpatti), they burned it through the power of the fire-device (tejo-kasiṇa). That is a matter showing that liberation. That is why the Buddha even uttered a special inspired verse on that occasion:

> Abhedi kāyo, nirodhi saññā, > vedanā sītirahesuṁ sabbā.

> Saṅkhārā vūpasamiṁsu,

> viññāṇaṁ atthagamā.

When the Arahant Dabba Mallaputta set fire to himself and attained parinibbāna, there was neither soot nor ash remaining. That indeed was what the Buddha declared as a special inspired utterance. He showed the state of Nibbāna very clearly.

"The body broke up"—the physical body broke up. "Perception ceased"—perception (saññā) was extinguished. "All feelings became cold"—all feelings (vedanā) became cool. We might think that when Dabba Mallaputta set fire to himself, he must have felt the heat. No. All feelings (vedanā) became cool. "Preparations were stilled"—all preparations (saṅkhāra) were calmed. The mind did not go towards a future birth again. "Consciousness came to an end"—consciousness (viññāṇa) went to its end, it reached its termination. The entire problem lies within this termination of consciousness (viññāṇa-atthagama). For so long, consciousness (viññāṇa) goes through saṁsāra with the help of ignorance (avijjā) and craving (taṇhā), accumulating kamma. That is why it is said that the five aggregates of grasping (pañcupādānakkhandha) are accumulated. In some places in the Dhamma, it is mentioned that all these problems are resolved through the cessation of preparations (saṅkhāra-nirodha). The Buddha declared on one occasion:

"Kāye vā, bhikkhave, sati kāyasañcetanahetu uppajjati ajjhattaṁ sukhadukkhaṁ."

"Monks, when there is the body, internally pleasure and pain arise due to bodily intention." Similarly, when there is speech, pleasure and pain arise in connection with speech. When there is the mind, the same is declared. All these are said to have ignorance (avijjā) as their condition. But finally, it is shown:

"Avijjāyatveva asesa-virāga-nirodhā so kāyo na hoti yaṁ-paccayāssa taṁ uppajjati ajjhattaṁ sukhadukkhaṁ... sā vācā na hoti... so mano na hoti... khettaṁ taṁ na hoti, vatthuṁ taṁ na hoti, āyatanaṁ taṁ na hoti, adhikaraṇaṁ taṁ na hoti yaṁ-paccayāssa taṁ uppajjati ajjhattaṁ sukhadukkhaṁ."

"But with the remainderless fading away and cessation of ignorance (avijjā), that body does not exist conditioned by which that internal pleasure and pain arise; that speech does not exist... that mind does not exist... that field does not exist, that site does not exist, that base does not exist, that ground does not exist, conditioned by which that internal pleasure and pain arise." But through the cessation of ignorance (avijjā)—at the beginning we said that because of ignorance (avijjā), bodily preparations (kāya-saṅkhāra), verbal preparations (vacī-saṅkhāra), and mental preparations (citta-saṅkhāra) arise. This says that when ignorance (avijjā) is completely ceased, there is no body, no words, and no mind. Those are shown as the places where kamma was accumulated. Liberation, the state of parinibbāna, is shown as something mysterious. That is why there is a truly wonderful sermon of the Buddha. We have delivered separate sermons on these. It is a grand sermon that even foreigners are astonished by. For those who seek liberation elsewhere, this is a great answer:

"Imasmiṁ yeva byāmamatte kaḷevare sasaññimhi samanake lokañca paññāpemi lokasamudayañca lokanirodhañca lokanirodhagāminiñca paṭipadaṁ."

"In this very fathom-long carcass, endowed with perception (saññā) and mind (manas), I declare the world, the origin of the world, the cessation of the world, and the path leading to the cessation of the world." Within this carcass, which is endowed with perception (saññā) and mind (manas)—not a dead carcass, but within this physical frame endowed with perception (saññā) and mind (manas)—I declare the world, the origin of the world, the cessation of the world, and the path leading to the cessation of the world. It was because of this matter that the Buddha uttered this wonderful lion's roar. Therefore, this wisdom (paññā) we spoke of, "the wisdom (paññā) that goes to the rise and fall" (udayatthagāmiṇī paññā), is where a yogi has to begin. Through the cultivation of the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā), that impermanence (aniccatā) is seen in two aspects: arising and passing away. Along that, the mind goes deeper and deeper. It is there that attention (manasikāra)—the defendant we made into a witness—finally reveals the story through radical attention (yoniso manasikāra).

As one sees each of these extremely subtly through radical attention (yoniso manasikāra), impermanence (aniccatā) comes to the fore. Cessation (nirodha) comes to the fore. Then, just as existence (bhava) grows through that arising (samudaya), when cessation (nirodha) comes to the fore, right there is the cessation of existence (bhava-nirodha). That is what comes to the fore. That is why the Buddha declares almost everywhere: Bhava-nirodho nibbānaṁ, bhava-nirodho nibbānaṁ—"The cessation of existence (bhava) is Nibbāna." But when the cessation of existence (bhava) is mentioned, many people become afraid, because there is such a great craving for existence (bhava-taṇhā) within the world. But this cessation of existence (bhava-nirodha) is shown as a direct experience. The cessation of existence (bhava-nirodha) is a direct experience obtained in this very life. Within it lies the bliss of liberation. If there is suffering (dukkha) within existence (bhava), where the cessation of existence (bhava) is a direct experience, the bliss of liberation is found right there. That is what is meant by experiencing the bliss of liberation. Even a living Arahant experienced that bliss of liberation as a direct realization. That is why, when speaking about Nibbāna, it is said: sandiṭṭhiko dhammo... (Dhamma to be realized here and now). It is something that can be attained and seen. Now, do it! It is not something to be obtained after going to the next world. It is in this very life (diṭṭheva dhamme). That is indeed concerning Nibbāna. Then, extinguishing or cooling down means, finally, that mass of saṁsāric suffering (dukkha). That is it. In various sermons, we highlighted a series of words describing Nibbāna. In applying the mind to Nibbāna as the recollection of peace (upasamānussati), that can be used as an aid.

"Etaṁ santaṁ etaṁ paṇītaṁ, yadidaṁ sabbasaṅkhārasamatho sabbūpadhipaṭinissaggo taṇhākkhayo virāgo nirodho nibbānaṁ."

"This is peaceful, this is sublime, namely, the stilling of all preparations (sabbasaṅkhārasamatho), the relinquishing of all assets (sabbūpadhipaṭinissaggo), the destruction of craving (taṇhākkhayo), dispassion (virāgo), cessation (nirodho), extinguishment (Nibbānaṁ*)." Within those few words, everything we have said is contained. "The stilling of all preparations" (sabbasaṅkhārasamatho)—if all preparations (saṅkhāra) have been calmed. "The relinquishing of all assets" (sabbūpadhipaṭinissaggo)—assets (upadhi) refer to the five aggregates of grasping (pañcupādānakkhandha); those accumulated five aggregates of grasping are also relinquished. "The destruction of craving" (taṇhākkhayo)—craving (taṇhā) is destroyed. "Dispassion" (virāgo)—dispassion also refers to Nibbāna itself, that state of detachment. "Cessation" (nirodho)—extinguishing. "Extinguishment" (Nibbānaṁ*)—finally, cooling down.

If the world is in a state of burning, what the Buddha points out instead of that burning is cooling down. All this is contained within the word Nibbāna. Various meanings were added to this in later times. Indeed, each verse in this Pārāyana Vagga is truly wonderful. Those disciples had gone that far, practicing absorptions (jhāna), in search of "nothingness" (ākiñcañña)—the direct experience of "there is nothing." But having returned, they met the Buddha and obtained "nothingness" (ākiñcañña) in its highest sense. The sphere of nothingness is a state of absorption (jhāna). This is not like that. It is said: "Akiñcanaṁ anādānaṁ, etaṁ dīpaṁ anāparaṁ." "Possessing nothing, grasping nothing, this is the island, there is no other." The Buddha has shown that as an island. It shows the bliss of liberation that exists when all grasping (upādāna) is destroyed. It is said that many, including the youth Ajita, became Arahants on the spot upon hearing the answer given by the Buddha. It is truly wonderful. From this, we see how much deep meaning is contained in a single four-line verse. We tried to explain it at our own level. Do not think of these as things that merely pass over the surface. The Dhamma is a profound thing. It can be understood through various similes in a simple way. For one who is engaged in the Dhamma in the present, these are not deep. They are simple. That is what we must take into consideration.

Today too, you have had the opportunity to listen to a certain insight-oriented sermon that is helpful for your meditation. We hope that you will derive the full benefit of this program of virtue (sīla). If you spend your time wandering here and there, talking about other things, you will not be able to properly understand even this Dhamma that is being spoken. Therefore, this group must be more careful. If activities are conducted within a certain schedule of virtue (sīla), you must conform to it. Only then can you understand this kind of Dhamma. Otherwise, if you remain talking about useless things, you cannot understand a Dhamma of this nature. I wish that those of you who have undertaken a high standard of virtue (sīla) today, walking on the path of Dhamma and applying your minds to it, may gain the strength and power to realize these expected noble goals in this very life!

From the lowest hell Avīci to the highest heaven Akaniṭṭha, if there are any beings who wish to rejoice in this merit of listening to and preaching the Dhamma, may they, through their rejoicing, find peace in the noble, deathless, supreme Nibbāna through their aspired enlightenment! Recite these verses:

Verse 41 from the Cittavagga (Chapter on the Mind) of the Dhammapada

Dear Listeners,

The Great Compassionate Buddha clarified to the world the value of nursing the sick, not only through advice but also by example. The state of illness is a time when a person becomes helpless. Caring for them at such a time, with loving-kindness, compassion, and sympathy at the forefront, is a noble quality of a virtuous person. On the other hand, through illness, a person is able to properly understand the impermanent (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and not-self (anattā) nature of these five aggregates. What assists in this is timely Dhamma advice. A valuable story that demonstrates how the Buddha performed the nursing of the sick in both these ways is presented as the background story to the stanza we have chosen as our theme today.

A certain faithful young man in the city of Sāvatthī ordained in the Dispensation and received higher ordination. He was known as Venerable Tissa. In the course of time, Venerable Tissa developed a severe illness. Starting as small pimples on his body like eczema, they gradually became large boils, then developed into large abscesses, which burst and began to ooze blood and pus. Holes appeared here and there all over his body. Likewise, his robes and undergarments became sodden with blood and pus; they were completely wet. Finally, he reached a state where even his attending monks could not look after him, and this venerable monk lay there helpless, without anyone to nurse him.

At that moment, the Buddha, having entered the attainment of Great Compassion and looking at the world, beheld this monk. By that time, Venerable Tissa was known by the name 'Pūtigatta Tissa' (Tissa of the Putrid Body). Because his body was decaying, the nickname Pūtigatta Tissa was attached to him. So, Venerable Pūtigatta Tissa appeared to the Buddha's knowledge of the attainment of Great Compassion. He understood that this helpless Tissa had the supportive conditions (upanissaya-sampatti) to attain Arahantship. But as things stood now, it would be difficult. Understanding that 'if even I do not help him, that opportunity will slip away,' the Buddha went to that monastery. Having arrived, he did not go straight to that monk. He went to the fire-house, washed the vessel used for heating water for bathing, poured water into it, placed it on the hearth, and stayed in the fire-house until the water boiled. Then, after the water had boiled, the Buddha went to the bed where that monk was lying and lifted one end of the bed. Since the bed has two ends, the other monks also understood that the Buddha was now preparing to nurse this monk. Saying, 'Venerable Sir, we will do that,' the monks lifted the bed and carried it to the fire-house.

Next, the Buddha, with the assistance of those monks, first washed the monk's outer robe and set it to dry in the sun. Then, with the help of those monks, the Buddha poured water, and those monks washed him. In this manner, they bathed him. After bathing him, by that time, the outer robe had dried. Having put that on him, they washed his undergarment as well. Washing it with hot water in the same way, and after it had dried in the sun in a short while, they put the undergarment on him too. Now indeed, Venerable Tissa felt great comfort after a long time due to this bath; he felt a lightness in his body and a peace in his mind. Wearing that undergarment and wrapped in his outer robe, he lay comfortably on the bed. Standing at the head of the bed, near his head, it was at that very moment that the Buddha preached the stanza we took as our theme.

Aciraṁ vatayaṁ kāyo paṭhaviṁ adhisessati chuddho apeta-viññāṇo niratthaṁva kaliṅgaraṁ

"Before long indeed, this body, devoid of consciousness (viññāṇa), will lie upon the earth, cast aside like a useless log"—this is the meaning contained in that stanza. Hearing this stanza, Venerable Pūtigatta Tissa attained Arahantship together with the four analytical knowledges (paṭisambhidā). Many other monks also attained various paths and fruits. Then, immediately along with his attainment of Arahantship, Venerable Pūtigatta Tissa attained final extinguishment (*pariNibbāna. Such events do occur, where life ends simultaneously with the realization of the Dhamma. However, those monks knew nothing of this. The Buddha had the body of Venerable Pūtigatta Tissa—who appeared to have passed away or attained final extinguishment—cremated, and caused a stupa to be built enshrining his relics.

The monks asked, "Where has this Venerable Pūtigatta Tissa been born?" It was on that occasion that the Buddha declared, "Monks, this Pūtigatta Tissa has attained Arahantship and final extinguishment (*pariNibbāna." Then those monks asked: "Venerable Sir, if he had such supportive conditions to attain Arahantship, why did his body decay in this manner? Why did he fall into this state with boils oozing pus?" Furthermore, not only that, but Venerable Tissa's bones also broke. In his final days, his bones broke, and his body was decayed in a most terrible manner. "What is the reason for his bones breaking? What is the reason for his attaining Arahantship?" When the monks inquired about this, the Buddha, pointing out his past karma, declared: "All of this is the result of past karma done by Tissa." The story is given as follows:

In the time of Kassapa Buddha, this Venerable Pūtigatta Tissa was a bird hunter. His livelihood was catching birds and selling them to wealthy people. In order to keep the birds that remained unsold for the next day—with the thought that if he killed them, the meat would spoil and rot—he broke the wings and legs of those birds, plucking their feathers, and kept them alive to be sold the next day. He also killed and ate some of them. That indeed was his unwholesome karma. However, despite leading such a life, on one occasion, with great devotion, he offered food, offered alms-food (piṇḍapāta), to an Arahant who had come to his house for alms, and made a wish: "May I realize the same Dhamma that the Venerable Sir has realized." The Arahant also blessed him, saying, "May it be so." The Buddha explained that this wholesome merit was the supportive condition (upanissaya) for his attaining Arahantship.

So, that is the story. This story is exemplary to us in several ways. First, we should pay attention to the nursing of the sick performed by the Buddha. Now, here, Venerable Pūtigatta Tissa did not appear to the Buddha's knowledge of the attainment of Great Compassion merely because of his illness. A person is usually caught in that knowledge of the attainment of Great Compassion because they have the qualifications to be released from this suffering (dukkha) of saṁsāra. Here too, it was not solely due to his illness, but because he possessed the supportive conditions to attain Arahantship that he appeared in that manner. On such occasions, the Buddha often went to that place alone. Even here, the Buddha went there without taking even Venerable Ānanda with him, went first to the fire-house, and like a true attendant, washed the vessel, placed water on the hearth, boiled it, did all of that, and only then went to the patient's bedside. Furthermore, the very manner in which he performed that nursing is worthy of emulation even for us—the manner of nursing a patient. He first washed that monk's robe, let it dry, then bathed him, and finally washed his undergarment, performing the nursing in a very systematic, highly methodical manner. Lastly, the Buddha nursed that monk with the Dhamma. By nursing him with the Dhamma, He cured his entire disease of saṁsāra.

Indeed, that is a very valuable story. A somewhat similar incident of the Buddha nursing the sick is mentioned in the Vinaya Piṭaka. Let us include that story here too, due to several reasons. A certain monk had a severe abdominal ailment, fell to the ground wallowing in his own urine and excrement, and was utterly helpless. Not a single monk went to nurse that monk. At that helpless moment, while the Buddha was on a walking tour of the lodgings (senāsana cārikā) with Venerable Ānanda—a walking tour of the lodgings means the Buddha, from time to time, went from monastery to monastery to see how the monks were living—while walking in that manner, he went with Venerable Ānanda to the place where that monk was and said to Venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, go and bring water, bring water, let us bathe this monk." Then, Venerable Ānanda brought water. The Buddha poured water. Venerable Ānanda rubbed his body. After bathing him, the Buddha lifted him from the head side, and Venerable Ānanda lifted him from the feet side. They lifted him and laid him on the bed. He asked this monk, "Monk, why do others not nurse you?" This monk said, "Venerable Sir, since I do not nurse or help other monks, those monks do not look after me either."

Then, based on this, the Buddha gathered the monks and asked: "Monks, is there a sick monk in such-and-such a monastery?" "Yes, Venerable Sir." "Does that monk have an attendant?" "No, Venerable Sir." "Why is there no attendant?" When asked, they replied, "That monk does not nurse us either. He does not help us. Therefore, we do not help him either." At that moment, the Buddha declared to the monks: "Monks, you have no mother or father here to nurse you. If you do not nurse one another, who else is there to nurse you?" Next, the Buddha declared a statement of profound meaning, which is interpreted in various ways today. It is mentioned in the Pāli language as:

Yo bhikkhave maṁ upaṭṭheheyya so gilānaṁ upaṭṭheheyya

"Monks, he who would nurse me, should nurse the sick."

Some interpret that passage to mean that nursing a sick person is equivalent to nursing the Buddha. However, we have to say that if the Buddha had expressed such a thing, that sentence would have been expressed differently. In that case, it should have been said: "He who nurses the sick, nurses me." As a reason for this, we point to a well-known Dhamma advice mentioned in the teachings:

Yo dhammaṁ passati so maṁ passati

"He who sees the Dhamma, sees me."

Whoever sees the Dhamma is equivalent to having seen the Buddha. According to that sentence structure and logic, if we were to take the first meaning we mentioned, it should have been said on this occasion: "He who nurses the sick, nurses me." But here, the Buddha declares: "He who would nurse me, should nurse the sick." Now, some interpret this from another angle. They say it means that nursing the sick can never be made equal to nursing the Buddha. Nursing a lay or ordained sick person is not as fruitful in terms of merit as nursing the Buddha. On this occasion, what the Buddha declared and meant was: "If you would nurse me by way of accepting my advice, you should nurse the sick." It is also interpreted in that way. But that is interpreted by adding words unnecessarily.

If we reflect on this quietly, comparing this story with that of Venerable Pūtigatta Tissa, we will be able to bring out the true meaning of this Buddha-word. Now, in the story of Venerable Pūtigatta Tissa, we saw that because of his supportive conditions to attain Arahantship and because he appeared in the knowledge of the attainment of Great Compassion, the Buddha went there alone, not even with an attendant. He went alone and commenced the duties of nursing the sick. But here, the Buddha was on a walking tour of the lodgings (senāsana cārikā) with Venerable Ānanda. Pious devotees, this walking tour of the lodgings is something that a clever leader, a clever teacher, must do. It is a valuable custom. It means to observe things. Just as modern sudden raids or surprise inspections are carried out when reorganizing some departments, the Buddha also had a custom of quietly visiting monastery after monastery without prior notice. Then, when he saw the shortcomings of the monks in those places, he could advise them accordingly. Such an occasion is found here. So here, the Buddha went with Venerable Ānanda and nursed that monk with the assistance of Venerable Ānanda. Having done so, he came and gave advice in that manner.

If we reflect according to that, we have to take it in this way. From what the Buddha declared here, it is clear that since there are no parents in this Dispensation, the monks must nurse one another. Furthermore, in this Dispensation, there are two teacher-pupil dyads: preceptor and co-resident (upajjhāya-saddhivihārika), and teacher and pupil (ācariya-antevāsika). For the proper conduct among these monks, for this monastic institution to function correctly, the Buddha has laid down these two teacher-pupil levels or dyads: the pupil of the preceptor is the saddhivihārika, and the pupil of the teacher is the antevāsika. The mutual relationship between these two groups is described as a relationship between a father and a son. That is how the Buddha has laid it down. Not only that, the Buddha has frequently declared that companion monks (sabrahmacārī) should help and nurse one another with a sense of brotherhood. So, if in some way they do not fulfill that responsibility, what happens? All of these are the Buddha's children, the Sakyaputta ascetics. If these children do not behave in that manner, the Buddha himself will have to go from lodging to lodging, from monastery to monastery, with his own attendant, and nurse the sick. That is why the Buddha declared on this occasion: "He who would nurse me, should nurse the sick." When we think about it in this way, based on what is said here, nursing the sick is a part of nursing the Buddha itself. It is a part of the service done to the Buddha. Otherwise, one cannot take it to mean that nursing the Buddha and nursing a lay or ordained sick person with medicine and care are exactly identical.

Be that as it may, we can see through this the place the Buddha gave to nursing the sick. Furthermore, when the Buddha laid down various rules in the Vinaya Piṭaka, he provided various allowances for the sick, stating: "There is no offense for one who is sick" (gilānassa anāpatti). Thus, after laying down a certain rule, considering the sick, he exempts the sick monk by saying there is no offense. In many other ways too, the Buddha has described the nursing of the sick in the Vinaya Piṭaka. On one occasion, the Buddha points out five qualifications of a true sick-nurse. What is the first qualification of a true sick-nurse? He must be capable of preparing the medicine needed for that patient. Administering medicine is the first point. The second qualification is to understand what is suitable (sappāya) and unsuitable (asappāya) for that patient. The word sappāya is used to mean what is beneficial to someone—beneficial things, suitable things. So, one must understand what is suitable and unsuitable for the patient. Likewise, one must have the ability to remove unsuitable things and bring suitable, beneficial things close to the patient. Next, what is the third qualification mentioned? One must nurse with a mind of loving-kindness, without any expectation of gain from that patient—without even the expectation of taking the food received by the patient, or any expectation of gaining money or benefit from the patient. That is the next point. The fourth qualification is that one must be capable of removing the excrement, urine, saliva, phlegm, mucus, vomit, etc., of that patient. One must be able to handle those things without disgust. The fifth qualification is that one must be capable of delivering a timely Dhamma talk in a way that encourages the patient's mind—nursing them with the Dhamma. The Buddha demonstrated all of these through his own example as well. Thus, we should understand that the Buddha clarified the nursing of the sick to the world not only by advice but also by example.

Similarly, on the other hand, just as the qualities of a good sick-nurse were mentioned, the characteristics or habits of a good patient—that is, a patient who is easy to nurse—are also shown. If one is a good patient, regarding that patient, he should know what is beneficial to him. He must act in accordance with what is beneficial; this is called sappāya. He must be able to behave in a way that suits his illness; otherwise, the attendant will not be able to manage him. So, behaving in that manner, in a way suited to one's illness, is necessary. The second point is that he must know the proper quantity of suitable things, such as medicine given. If one consumes or accepts too much of something thinking, "This is a good, beneficial thing," then another illness will arise. That is also necessary. One must know the measure to be taken even of things that are suitable and beneficial to oneself. That is something belonging to the patient. The third point is that he must use the medicine given systematically and in the proper manner. He must use the medicine continuously without rejecting it. The fourth point is that he must declare the state of his illness accurately and truthfully to his attendant. Is the illness getting better now? Is it increasing? Is there relief now? He must clearly state all of that to the attendant. The fifth point is that even if there is severe pain (vedanā), he must have the strength to bear it without crying out. In this manner, the Buddha has laid down both the qualities of a true sick-nurse and the behavior that should exist in a patient who is easy to nurse.

Likewise, you have heard of occasions when the Buddha himself nursed with the Dhamma. You may have heard that to Venerable Moggallāna and Venerable Mahā Kassapa, on occasions when they were very gravely ill, the Buddha himself visited and recited the factors of awakening (bojjhaṅga). It is said that as soon as they heard it, their illnesses were cured. Similarly, another highly famous discourse is the Girimānanda Sutta. The Buddha preached the Girimānanda Sutta when Venerable Ānanda came and informed Him that Venerable Girimānanda was severely ill. On that occasion, the Buddha said: "It is alright even if I do not go. If you preach this discourse, the illness will be cured." Contained within that discourse are ten meditation themes called the ten perceptions (dasa saññā), which are about meditation. He preached an amazing discourse that develops the mind regarding the diseased conditions of the body. There too, it was nursing the sick. From that we can see that the Buddha does not endorse merely handing the patient over to doctors and nursing them only physically. You must set the mind right, make the mind healthy. If possible, one must be able to nurse them in such a way that the mind is led all the way to final Nibbāna, eradicating the disease of saṁsāra. This is the deepest aspect of nursing the sick. Thus, we can extract many points from these stories. Apart from that, let us now turn to another aspect.

Now, next, what is the lesson we have to learn from this Venerable Pūtigatta Tissa? He too passed away after teaching us a lesson. What is the lesson? His body rotted. Why did it rot? During the time of Kassapa Buddha, as a bird hunter, with the business intention of supplying un-decayed, fresh meat to his customers, he broke the limbs and plucked the wings of those helpless animals and kept them overnight. Why was this? Because of the fear that the meat would spoil. The result of that grave unwholesome karma indeed yielded its fruit to Venerable Pūtigatta Tissa. Now, on this occasion, in the Right Livelihood characterized by the eight-fold virtue (ājīva-aṭṭhamaka-sīla) that you have undertaken, there are livelihoods that a faithful layperson should not perform, which you may have heard of. Livelihoods such as the trade in meat, or breeding animals for slaughter—that was the very livelihood that Venerable Pūtigatta Tissa also carried out. So, the result of that karma yielded its fruit in his final life. Therefore, we too must reflect. If we, with the intention of making wealth, direct ourselves toward such things—if we inflict such cruel torture on animals with the intention of supplying fresh meat to customers—the clear result of harming living beings is having abundant ailments, abundant diseases. We must all reflect that many, or perhaps all, of the ailments we experience are the results of the harm and torture we inflicted in various ways during this long saṁsāra. Thus, we must learn lessons from these. Through this, we see the immense power of karmic results. No matter how much we try to run away from these, we will have to suffer them in some way or other. It was because of this that he fell into a helpless state, oozing blood and pus, and finally, even his bones broke, as it is said. Even in modern times, there are various diseases. We do not know their causes. But we can understand from this that the real cause is the cause of karma. Such a state exists in this saṁsāra.

Therefore, indeed, this saṁsāra is a dangerous place. Some people are tempted into such livelihoods because of the problem of their survival. What is survival, pious devotees? It is keeping this cage of a body going for a little longer. For another person, it is not just keeping it going, but nourishing it, making it strong—it is for this purpose that they engage in eating meat and so forth. You know where the proteins (muscle-building elements) are mostly contained. So, they direct themselves to those things with the intention of obtaining them. But those will have to be paid back someday. It is this condition, this story of the body, that the Buddha preached in that short stanza. That indeed is the stanza we took as our theme. That stanza alone was sufficient for Venerable Pūtigatta Tissa to realize Arahantship. Let us recollect that stanza once more:

Aciraṁ vatayaṁ kāyo paṭhaviṁ adhisessati chuddho apeta-viññāṇo niratthaṁva kaliṅgaraṁ

"Before long indeed, this body—devoid of consciousness (viññāṇa)—having abandoned this cage of a body, cast aside like something thrown away in the forest, will lie upon the earth like a useless log." Indeed, this became a very direct, experiential fact to Venerable Pūtigatta Tissa. It was at the moment when this body was in such a state, oozing blood and pus, with broken bones, just like a decayed, termite-eaten piece of wood in the forest, that the Buddha declared this stanza. Why did the Buddha express it in this way? We travel through this long saṁsāra because of our attachment to this body.

To beautify this body, to make it fat, to make it strong, we employ various devices—not according to the Dhamma, but often unrighteous devices. All of this we do for this cage of a body. But a certain moment comes when this consciousness (viññāṇa) departs. Even after consciousness (viññāṇa) departs, it does not end there. Next, it grabs hold of another cage of a body. The condition of that cage of a body is decided according to one's own past karma. For Venerable Pūtigatta Tissa, indeed, saṁsāra ended there. For an ordinary person, after exhausting that karmic force, they might go and be born in another similar place. Such a dangerous situation exists. Therefore, if we reflect according to the Dhamma, if our purpose is to maintain this cage of a body, why do we maintain it? We must maintain this body for the sole purpose of understanding the three characteristics (tilakkhaṇa)—namely, impermanence (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and not-self (anattā)—which are the truths about life and the universe declared by the Buddha. So, it is to understand the three characteristics and to gain that realization that we maintain this cage of a body.

Otherwise, when looking at a body thrown in a cemetery, you can imagine—in the past, unlike today, there was what was called an open cemetery. It was in open cemeteries that corpses were thrown. A corpse thrown in an open cemetery swells up thoroughly in a day or two; it swells to the highest possible level in two or three days. Next, it turns blue. Next, it putrefies, bursts, flows away, and finally, after several days, the skin also disappears, leaving only a heap of bones. Such indeed is the historical story of the body.

Unless ordinary people think about this with difficulty and take it to heart, they generally do not understand it. They are not even inclined to think about it. But why do we think about these things? Through these, the Buddha demonstrates that if we hope to escape from this saṁsāra, we must eliminate attachment to this cage of a body. We conventionally refer to this as a "cage of a body." If we think of it in another way, it is fine to take it even as a cage in which a parrot or a bird lives. As long as there is attachment to this cage of a body, even if the mind departs from this cage, it will go and enter another cage. Such a state exists in this saṁsāra. Therefore, the Buddha shows that systematically, either by developing the three characteristics of impermanence (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and not-self (anattā) through meditation—and in developing through meditation, what one must use as an aid is indeed one's own body. For Venerable Pūtigatta Tissa, indeed, this was easily understood because his body had also reached that very state. But for some people, even if they reach that state, understanding does not come. Without waiting until we reach that state, according to the Dhamma advice declared by the Buddha, we must practice the necessary meditations: meditation on the foul (asubha bhāvanā), especially the state of a body in a cemetery, and then the thirty-two putrid parts of the body. The Buddha has told us to contemplate these in order to abandon attachment to this body. The Buddha has declared that as long as attachment to these five aggregates is not removed, there is no release from this saṁsāra.

Now, the most visible thing to the eye is form (rūpa). The Buddha has shown the suffering (dukkha) nature, the pain-giving nature of this form (rūpa) in eleven ways: as impermanent (aniccato), as suffering (dukkhato), as a disease (rogato), as a boil (gaṇḍato), as a dart (sallato), as a calamity (aghato), as an affliction (ābādhato), as alien (parato), as disintegrating (palokato), as empty (suññato), as not-self (anattato). Why has the Buddha declared to look at this body in various ways—such as impermanent, as suffering, as a disease, as a boil (like a cancer), as a mass of great troubles, as an affliction, as something belonging to others, as an empty thing, as something not-self (anattā), as something that disintegrates? Because disenchantment (nibbidā) with saṁsāra supports final Nibbāna. So, it is not only regarding this. Even the aggregate of feeling (vedanā)—no matter how pleasant a feeling (vedanā) is, in a moment it turns the other way. Or sometimes, pleasant feeling (vedanā) itself emerges as suffering (dukkha). Union with the beloved, which was thought of as pleasant, next becomes suffering (dukkha) by way of separation from the beloved. Such is the situation. That is why the Buddha told us to first contemplate the impermanent nature, the suffering nature of this cage of a body, as a disease and an affliction. He asked us to contemplate in that way, to train ourselves to see in that way. It is through that, first through impermanence (aniccatā), and then through the suffering nature, the not-self nature (anattatā)—it is through understanding these that one can develop disenchantment towards the five aggregates, or in other words, towards the phenomena of Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). To the extent that one understands its true nature, to that extent disenchantment arises. To the extent that disenchantment arises, to the extent that disenchantment with saṁsāra arises, to that extent one draws closer to final Nibbāna. Thus, final Nibbāna is the release from these sufferings—namely, birth (jāti), decay (jarā), sickness (vyādhi), and death (maraṇa)—which belong to a person along with existence (bhava), or birth after birth in various places arising in accordance with karma over a long period. It is not some other strange heaven.

Therefore, we must reflect according to this Buddha-Dhamma. The Buddha declared that noble truth as suffering (dukkha). When ordinary people talk of the world being suffering (dukkha), they speak only of a very minor part of suffering. What the Buddha meant by telling us to fully comprehend suffering, to understand it properly, is to go towards the realization that this entire existence is one hundred percent suffering (dukkha). Indeed, that is not understood by the ordinary world. Just like a small child who cries for a moment and then laughs, no matter what suffering (dukkha) this world undergoes—whether separation from the beloved, illness, or any other suffering—as soon as they feel slightly better, they forget all of that. Again, through ignorance (avijjā), they drown in existence (bhava). Such is the state of saṁsāra. Therefore, this is something that must be brought out through effort. This meditative attention (manasikāra) shown by the Buddha must be brought out through effort, otherwise it gets suppressed by ignorance (avijjā). As it gets suppressed and suppressed, one has to travel in saṁsāra for a long time. That is why the Buddha has highlighted the necessary meditation signs (nimitta) and themes (kammaṭṭhāna). When this suffering (dukkha) is properly understood, along with it, the underlying craving (taṇhā) must also be understood. To whatever extent some suffering (dukkha) arises, underlying it, craving (taṇhā) is necessarily present together with it. If we lament over the death of someone, underlying it is the craving (taṇhā) and desire we have for that person. In that same way, we grieve over the loss of wealth because of the craving (taṇhā) we have for that wealth. This same principle applies to our body as well. As long as there is this strong attachment to our body, we do not wish to be separated from this body even by death. It is because of this very thing that we conjure up another cage in its place. Although we expect it, the cage is not conjured up as we wish. It is conjured up according to the karma one has performed. Such a state exists in this saṁsāra. That is why the Dhamma advice declared by the Buddha is the most valuable nursing of the sick here. The Dhamma advice given through that stanza is more important than the other external physical nursing the Buddha performed for Venerable Pūtigatta Tissa. It was through that indeed that he was able to end all suffering (dukkha) of saṁsāra.

Now, likewise, when we look at the animal world, the Buddha has declared that there are even more terrifying, suffering-laden states, various planes of existence (bhava) in saṁsāra. This mind within this human being, in this human state of existence, is a very valuable thing. How do we use this valuable mind? Especially in this era, we often direct this mind to things of the external world, to go towards other worlds, to fulfill targets presented by our craving (taṇhā). But the Buddha declares: we have traveled in this saṁsāra for an infinite time. If there is something to be done by a person, it is to stop this journey of saṁsāra. It is for that purpose that the Buddha has shown the Noble Eightfold Path. We must straighten our suffering properly. We must straighten our view (diṭṭhi) according to the Dhamma. What exists in the ordinary world is a view (diṭṭhi) that entirely cultivates existence (bhava). It is a view that entirely moves within this existence (bhava) and cultivates existence (bhava), following the luxurious world. This is often what exists even among Buddhists. But the Buddha reminds us that by constantly recollecting the three characteristics of impermanence (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and not-self (anattā), as well as those meditations on the foul (asubha bhāvanā) which support disenchantment with saṁsāra, one can draw close to final Nibbāna.

This Dhamma advice is indeed the highest nursing of the sick that can be given to someone. When someone close to us is sick, we must make them understand what the Buddha pointed out. It was that very thing that the Buddha did not hide in the Girimānanda Sutta. There, the Buddha presented a directory of diseases existing within this body. Some might doubt how a sick person can be cured by listening to a directory of diseases. But what was the Buddha's method of treatment? It was to help bring the mind to composure. By bringing the mind to that reality, the affliction arising from that suffering (dukkha) can be removed. For one who has the understanding that "this is the nature of this body"—let us think, now there is a directory of diseases in the Girimānanda Sutta. When listening to it, a person might think for a moment: "Out of this mass of diseases, how many do I actually have? I have comfort at least to that extent." But at that moment, one can reflect that the nature of the body is that it is a single cage of disease. Not only that, when we think of the last few diseases with which that list ends, it is proved that the entire body is a cage of disease. Finally, it is mentioned there:

sītaṁ uṇhaṁ jighacchā pipāsā uccāro passāvo

It points out at least six diseases that exist in this body: cold is felt, heat is felt, hunger is felt, thirst is felt, and because of hunger and thirst, one is inevitably forced to defecate and urinate. It is mentioned in the texts that even during times when there were long-lived humans with few ailments, these six diseases existed.

According to that, we must reflect that this body is not some wonderful, strange creation of a god. Most people in the world think that a healthy state belongs to this body and that disease is something that has arrived as a visitor—that disease is something that came from outside. But the Buddha points out that this is a cage of disease. Its very nature is to be sick. Being healthy is entirely a conceit (māna) one has developed. That is what the Buddha declared to a certain lay devotee named Nakulapitā the householder. The advice the Buddha gave during his illness was:

Ātura-kāyassa me sato, cittaṁ anāturaṁ bhavissati

"Though my body is sick, my mind will remain unafflicted." He asked him to think in that manner. The Buddha declares: if anyone, based on this cage of a body, harbors a conceit (māna) of being healthy even for a single moment, there is no greater foolishness than that. Thus, what we call health is merely a state where disease is hidden. Being healthy is what is foreign; disease belongs to us. We must understand it in that way. When we reflect in that manner, our attachment to this cage of a body decreases. As long as we do not eliminate attachment to this cage, we will remain in this very saṁsāra. That is why the Buddha declared so. Some think of this as a form of pessimism. It is no such thing. The Buddha shows this because it is something that must necessarily be done. He shows that as long as one does not understand the impermanent (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and not-self (anattā) nature of, or develop disenchantment towards, form (rūpa), feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), preparations (saṅkhāra), and consciousness (viññāṇa)—or the concept of a person that one imagines as oneself, which are the phenomena of Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa)—one cannot be released from this saṁsāra. Therefore, our effort must be to realize this. The target of our entire Buddhist practice, such as virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), wisdom (paññā), and giving (dāna), virtue (sīla), and meditation (bhāvanā), is release from this saṁsāra.

Even when a Buddha appeared, even those of other religions in the world had the target of escaping from this saṁsāra. In some way, the path they took, their view (diṭṭhi), was wrong. But they understood it to some extent because, especially at that time, there were ascetics who possessed direct knowledges (abhiññā). Pious devotees, those who possessed direct knowledges means that even before the Buddha appeared, there were various ascetics who, having developed absorption meditations (jhāna bhāvanā), had gone to the highest levels in the aspect of tranquility (samatha). This is mentioned regarding Āḷāra Kālāma, Uddakarāmaputta, and others. Through the power of direct knowledges, they saw their past births (jāti). They saw their past lives, livelihoods, and so forth. If they saw those, the suffering (dukkha) nature of this saṁsāra must also have been necessarily visible to them. That is why every one of them wished for release from saṁsāra. But though they wished for it, what of it? The most fundamental premise for it—namely, the perception of not-self (anattā-saññā), the concept of not-self (anattā) which was pointed out by the Buddha—did not arise in them. Therefore, they thought that escaping from this meant being born in some eternal existence (bhava), or a Brahma world, in such a place. That was what existed as their goal.

The Buddha alone showed that unless this disease of saṁsāra is completely, one hundred percent eradicated, if even a little bit of it is left over, it will go on and on. To what extent? On one occasion, the Buddha declared: "Monks, just as even a tiny amount of excrement stinks, I do not praise existence (bhava) even for a single moment." Just as even a very small amount of excrement stinks, this existence (bhava)—the entire existence (bhava) including the Brahma worlds—stinks, or in other words, stinks of suffering (dukkha). That is the Buddha-word. When one thinks of this, one feels fear, because the lust for existence (bhava-rāga) is so strong within beings. They want to end suffering (dukkha), but what they think of as ending it is merely taking on another pile of suffering. So, this is just like the condition of a hospital. Looking at it from that perspective, this entire existence can be taken as a hospital. In this existence of saṁsāra, having taken birth (jāti) in various species, one has to face decay (jarā), sickness (vyādhi), death (maraṇa), and so forth in all of them. It is because of this condition that the Buddha declared that as long as a person does not develop disenchantment with saṁsāra, they cannot escape from this saṁsāra.

So, that state arose for Venerable Pūtigatta Tissa in that manner, being completely decayed and covered in blood and pus. At such a time, sometimes it may not be possible to calm the mind. Now, the Buddha nursed Venerable Pūtigatta Tissa to that extent not with the intention of making him live for another day. It was visible to the Buddha-eye that "if I do not intervene at this moment, that opportunity to attain Arahantship will slip away." Therefore, he nursed him to that extent, not to make Venerable Pūtigatta Tissa live for a longer time, but to cure this disease of saṁsāra and to give him that true health through Arahantship. We must bring out such a contemplation from this Dhamma talk.

In an era like today when social values are highly degenerated, the nursing of the sick also quickly loses its value. This is revealed to us even through the relationships between parents and children at home. Not only that, even in hospitals, when human kindness, sympathy, and compassion disappear, when the understanding of the true nature of the cage of the body decreases, and when people direct themselves towards a certain superficial existence, it is forgotten that this nursing of the sick is something that people must do mutually. Then, the Buddha brought out valuable fundamental principles. Who is the true sick-nurse? It is the one who, as mentioned, without any expectation of gain, endowed with loving-kindness and compassion, with the sole intention of curing the patient's illness, with the sole intention of rendering good to the patient, and also comforting the mind with Dhamma advice, nurses with the absolute intention of giving health to the patient. On the other hand, the Buddha also declared how the patient should behave so as not to trouble the attendant. In this manner, in the Vinaya Piṭaka, the Buddha has, as a skilled physician, pointed out various instructions for one's ordinary life, and in short, for living healthily in order to travel on this path of Dhamma. What is the reason for that? The Buddha himself declares that to develop our mind, we must also use the body as an aid. Health is also necessary. That is why it is said: Ārogyā paramā lābhā (Health is the supreme gain).

"Ārogyā paramā lābhā, santuṭṭhi paramaṁ dhanaṁ"—you have heard such verses from the Dhammapada. Through those, we must reflect. No matter what gains there are, if one does not have health, since its loss is visible, the Buddha declared Ārogyā paramā. The highest of gains is health. It was with that same meaning indeed that He said paramaṁ dhanaṁ (supreme wealth). No matter what resources one has, even if one has millions, if there is no joy and peace within the mind, that person is utterly poor. Thus, one must reflect in that manner. Ārogyā paramā lābhā, santuṭṭhi paramaṁ dhanaṁ, vissāsā paramā ñātī—similarly, no matter how many relatives one has, if they are not trustworthy, they are like enemies. The trustworthy person is like one's relative. These are very deep Dhammas. So, having reflected on all of these, finally, the Buddha declared:

Nibbānaṁ paramaṁ sukhaṁ*

The supreme bliss, the highest happiness, is final Nibbāna. Why is it said that final Nibbāna is the supreme bliss? The Buddha points out that the entire existence of saṁsāra is suffering (dukkha); it is a complete equation. This is not only in this human world. As mentioned, even in the Brahma worlds, there exists a very subtle nature of suffering (dukkha). Because of our coarse nature of suffering (dukkha), we do not understand that subtle nature of suffering (dukkha). The Buddha has shown these three types of suffering (dukkha): dukkha-dukkhatā (suffering as pain), vipariṇāma-dukkhatā (suffering due to change), and saṅkhāra-dukkhatā (suffering due to preparations).

"Dukkha-dukkhatā" means the things we consider as raw suffering (dukkha)—sicknesses, afflictions, and various other losses and damages that we consider as suffering (dukkha) in our daily lives—that coarse, gross mass of suffering (dukkha). That is called dukkha-dukkhatā, pure suffering. Everyone understands that to some extent. Next, there is another type of suffering (dukkha), which is called "vipariṇāma-dukkhatā". When some people receive great wealth, they think of this as the greatest happiness they have received. As soon as that wealth is lost, destroyed, or consumed by fire, or when that child is lost due to some accident or illness, then they understand vipariṇāma-dukkhatā. "That state we had is lost, isn't it? It changed, didn't it? Aren't those impermanent (anicca)?" Through that, they fall into suffering (dukkha). That is vipariṇāma-dukkhatā. Thus, dukkha-dukkhatā is, in short, what exists in association with painful feeling (vedanā). Vipariṇāma-dukkhatā is pleasant feeling (vedanā); for a moment, it exists as pleasant feeling (vedanā), and then it turns into suffering (dukkha). Now, we have been turned to one side for a short while. If someone says, "Sit like this for an hour," one cannot stay without moving even on the most comfortable seat in the world for an hour. In that manner, we hide suffering (dukkha) by changing postures. Through changing postures, we hide that change (vipariṇāma). So, in short, vipariṇāma-dukkhatā is the second level.

There is an even more subtle level. It is one that is understood by the meditative mind, and that indeed is called "saṅkhāra-dukkhatā". The word saṅkhāra (preparations) is an extremely broad word. For practitioners, it might be familiar. To put it briefly, within the entire existence of life, there is a lot of preparing, a lot of getting ready. Physically, a lot of getting ready; verbally, a lot of getting ready. Now, for this Dhamma sermon, I too have to take a considerable amount of effort, occasionally when this sound goes down or when the sound amplification is lost. Even to use my own voice projection. This too is a great suffering (dukkha). So, in any case, these words are spoken to make you understand that suffering (dukkha). When we look at it in that way, just like these preparations (saṅkhāra), our thoughts—the thoughts that arise in the mind—every single one of them has been shown by the Buddha as suffering (dukkha). That indeed is saṅkhāra. This mass of thoughts within this mind, which we think of as pleasant. Let us think, now, a very wealthy person had a certain problem. If this problem is not solved by tomorrow morning, the entire business is destroyed. When such a problem arises, he thinks all night without sleeping. At that moment, the suffering (dukkha) nature of those thoughts, of those ideas, is understood. Thus, one can understand the suffering (dukkha) nature of preparations (saṅkhāra) to some extent.

It is according to this indeed that the Buddha refers to this final Nibbāna as "sabba-saṅkhāra-samatha" (the stilling of all preparations). This constant doing within this mind. This preparing also includes karma. Within those karmas, there are two called merit (puñña) and demerit (pāpa), as you know. The ordinary world says, "Do not do demerit, let us accumulate merit." Do not misunderstand this. Do not take these to extremes. But if we reflect deeply, considering this existence of saṁsāra, whether we accumulate merit or accumulate demerit, saṁsāra grows. This is shown in the books by way of a simile. Let us think, a cow is being taken to be slaughtered. On the path this cow is being taken, at one place she is given cold water. At another place, she is given hot water. Whether she drinks this hot water or cold water, that cow definitely goes towards her death. According to that simile, we have to take it. Whether we do merit or do demerit, we will have to abandon all of this and go. Even the divine state of existence (bhava) is just the same. No matter how many aeons one stays there, at the moment of passing away, one falls into suffering (dukkha). Such is the state. Whether dying or passing away, at the moment of flying away from there, one falls into suffering (dukkha). That is why the Buddha declared that our effort should be to eliminate this craving (taṇhā). It is craving (taṇhā) and ignorance (avijjā) together that prompt us to accumulate these preparations (saṅkhāra).

We cannot avoid accumulating some preparations (saṅkhāra). That is what is called the Middle Path. That is why we say that we should not extremely say, "Let us abandon merit too, let us abandon wholesomeness too, let us abandon meditation too." It is bad to take it in that way. But the Buddha has shown a systematic, gradual path (anupubba-paṭipadā). Having eliminated that sinful nature, that leaning towards demerit, we must lean the mind towards the wholesome side, the meritorious side. It was indeed through that leaning, perhaps due to the merit of having given alms, that Venerable Pūtigatta Tissa received nursing from the Buddha in his final moment. If he had not received even that nursing, Venerable Pūtigatta Tissa would have fallen back into saṁsāra due to the lack of supportive conditions from that meritorious act.

According to that, we must reflect. We must turn away from demerit and do merit. But we should not cling to merit. We must understand its practical meaning. What we do through this merit is raising our mind to a high state. What is called a high state? Unwholesome things are those that arise from greed (lobha), hatred (dosa), and delusion (moha). Wholesome things are from non-greed (alobha), non-hatred (adosa), and non-delusion (amoha). On every occasion we perform a wholesome act, we turn away, even slightly, from greed, from hatred, from delusion. That is what assists us. Why? Because our final Nibbāna is the state of being completely free from greed, from hatred, and from delusion. So, we walk the path of wholesomeness turned towards that direction—turned towards final Nibbāna. The path of unwholesomeness is walked turned towards the other direction—towards saṁsāra. Therefore, wholesomeness assists us. But that too is a force of preparations (saṅkhāra). At some stage, we must be strong enough to be released even from that. What assists in that is contemplating their impermanent nature, contemplating their suffering nature, contemplating their not-self nature, and deeply, gradually bringing our mind through meditation to a state where it is released from all of these—released from the five aggregates. In that manner, indeed, you were able to extract many Dhamma points leading all the way to final Nibbāna from this Dhamma talk. When looking at nursing the sick as a social duty in this society, there are things relevant to that too. But along with that, we must reflect: at the moment when our relative or well-wisher is sick, we must train ourselves to nurse them with the Dhamma too. Because this disease of saṁsāra is the most dangerous disease. Helping to escape from this is indeed the true nursing of the sick.

Reflecting in that manner, you have now listened to a Dhamma sermon for about an hour, established in the Right Livelihood characterized by the eight-fold virtue (ājīva-aṭṭhamaka-sīla) or an even higher virtue. As we frequently remind you, as the benefits of hearing the Dhamma, we consider the generation within this hour of thoughts and aspirations that help to develop and increase the spiritual faculties (indriya) and powers (bala)—namely, faith (saddhā), energy (viriya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā)—which assist in final Nibbāna. Through the power of that merit you have generated, may all of you be able to develop your own meditation as quickly as possible, and through the association with noble friends (kalyāṇa-mitta), through the penetration of the paths and fruits of Stream-entry (sotāpatti), Once-returning (sakadāgāmitā), Non-returning (anāgāmitā), and Arahantship, gain the strength and power to escape from this entire disease of saṁsāra through the supreme, deathless final Nibbāna!

Similarly, if there are beings from Avīci to Akaniṭha who are waiting to rejoice in this merit of hearing and preaching the Dhamma—including all our departed relatives—through rejoicing in this merit, may they as quickly as possible be released from all the suffering of saṁsāra, such as birth (jāti), decay (jarā), sickness (vyādhi), and death (maraṇa), and find peace in the supreme, deathless final Nibbāna! With that compassionate intention, let us share the merits by reciting the stanzas.

Ānanda Thera – Theragāthā

Dear Listeners,

The greatest spiritual friend (kalyāṇa-mitta) who has ever appeared in the world is that Blessed, Arhat, Fully Self-Awakened Buddha. To constantly associate with and serve that Blessed One is an immense blessing. In this Buddha-dispensation, that fortune belonged to Venerable Ānanda. For about twenty years, the Buddha did not have a permanent attendant. It is mentioned that monks such as Nāgasamāla, Sāgata, Meghiya, Upavāṇa, and Nāgita served the Buddha from time to time. It is also recorded that some of those monks were disobedient to the Buddha and acted according to their own whims.

On one occasion, while walking on a long journey with the Buddha, the monk named Nāgasamāla took the bowl and robes, arrived at a fork in the road, and said to the Buddha: "Venerable Sir, this is the path. Let us go by this path." The Buddha replied: "No, Nāgasamāla, this is the path. Let us go by this path." For a second time, the monk Nāgasamāla said: "No, no, Venerable Sir, this is the path." The Buddha rejected it. In this way, even though the Buddha pointed out the correct path three times, the monk Nāgasamāla kept pointing to the other path, and finally, putting down the bowl and robes right there, said: "Here, Venerable Sir, are the bowl and robes," and went along the path of his own preference. But he did not get far. Robbers assaulted him, broke his bowl, tore his robes, beat him, and in the end, he had to return to the Buddha.

Similarly, another incident is mentioned. When the monk named Meghiya was walking for alms with the Buddha, he saw a beautiful mango grove and wished to go there and meditate. Although the Buddha asked him, "Meghiya, wait until another attendant monk arrives," he disobediently went to that mango grove, saying, "The Blessed One has nothing new to meditate on, but I have meditation to do." However, unable to concentrate his mind, he had to return to the Buddha and explain the matter. Because of incidents like these, on one occasion when the Saṅgha was assembled, the Buddha declared: "Monks, I am now old. Some of the monks who come to serve me, even when told 'this is the path', go on whichever path they please, leaving the bowl and robes on the ground. Therefore, it is good to appoint a permanent attendant." When this idea was expressed, a great sense of spiritual urgency (dhamma-saṁvega) arose within the entire assembly of monks.

The Great Arhat Sāriputta arose and declared to the Buddha: "Venerable Sir, I shall serve the Blessed One." The Buddha declined. Likewise, the Great Arhat Moggallāna and the other great disciples stepped forward individually. The Buddha declined them all. Venerable Ānanda alone remained silent. The other monks said: "Why, Friend Ānanda, do you not request the opportunity to serve?" Venerable Ānanda replied: "What is the use of a position obtained by begging? If I am suitable, the Blessed One himself will say so." Then the Buddha declared: "Monks, Ānanda does not need to make any special effort. Ānanda will serve me, knowing it himself." At this moment, Venerable Ānanda stood up and addressed the Buddha: "Venerable Sir, if the Blessed One grants me these eight boons, I shall serve the Blessed One." What were those boons?

Although called eight boons, the first four were refusals. What were they? "If the Blessed One does not give me the excellent robes (cīvara) received by the Blessed One, I will serve. Likewise, the second: if the Blessed One does not give me the excellent almsfood (piṇḍapāta) received by the Blessed One, I will serve. If the Blessed One does not grant me the privilege of residing in the same scented chamber (gandhakuṭi) with Him, I will serve. And if the Blessed One does not take me along to the alms-invitations made to the Blessed One, I will serve." These were the four negative conditions (refusals).

What was the purpose of these? Someone today might say, "If such privileges are received, who wouldn't serve the Blessed One?" There was room for such blame. People might say, "Who cannot do it if one receives robes, requisites, and almsfood from the Blessed One?" That is why he said, "I will serve only if these are refused."

Next, he presented four other requests to the Blessed One as appeals: "If the Blessed One attends the invitations I accept on behalf of the Blessed One; second, if the Blessed One allows me to arrange meetings for those who come from afar seeking the Blessed One; third, if, whenever a doubt arises in me, the Blessed One permits me to approach Him and clear my doubt through Dhamma discussion; and fourth, if the Blessed One repeats to me every Dhamma discourse preached in my absence—then I am willing to serve."

Within these four appeals was the intention to acquire the Blessed One's Dhamma, thereby becoming a learned Treasurer of the Dhamma (Dhammabhaṇḍāgārika). It was also to avoid the blame of being unable to achieve anything despite associating so closely with the Buddha.

The Buddha agreed to all eight boons. Having agreed, from that day on, Venerable Ānanda began to serve the Buddha with an extraordinary sacrifice of life, dedication, and affection. Providing tooth-wood, water, massaging the feet and back, attending during illnesses, and serving the Buddha in the same manner throughout the day. It is mentioned that at night, he walked around the scented chamber (gandhakuṭi) nine times holding a torch, so that if the Blessed One suddenly called for any reason, he would be ready to respond.

In this manner, in various ways, he performed loving bodily action, verbal action, and mental action towards the Buddha in a wonderful and friendly way. Indeed, it is this very matter that was expressed in the opening verses. The three verses we placed as our theme are from the Thera Gāthās, which Venerable Ānanda expounded concerning his own life story. They express this very fact: "For twenty-five years I served the Blessed One with loving bodily action, like a shadow that departs not..." and likewise with verbal action and mental action. These three aspects are what are expressed in those verses.

Thus, while serving with wonderful dedication, by discussing the Dhamma with the Buddha on various occasions and under different circumstances, and by retaining well the Dhamma preached to other groups when it was repeated to him, Venerable Ānanda became a marvelous Treasurer of the Dhamma (Dhammabhaṇḍāgārika) of great learning (bahussuta).

Considering all these factors, on one occasion in the midst of the Saṅgha, the Buddha awarded Venerable Ānanda the foremost position (etadagga) in five aspects: "Among my disciples of great learning (bahussuta), Ānanda is chief. Likewise, among those of great memory (satimanta), Ānanda is chief. Next, among those of analytical grasp (gatimanta)—meaning the wonderful cognitive ability to connect, synthesize, and expound a Dhamma discourse from one single aspect of the Dhamma—he is chief. Then, among those of steadfast fortitude (ṭhitimanta)—which means the strength to stand firm in one's determination and successfully accomplish a task amidst any obstacles—he is chief. Finally, among those who are attendants (upaṭṭhāka), Ānanda is chief." Thus, he was declared foremost in five qualities.

Similarly, it is mentioned in the Mahāparinibbāna Sutta that when the Buddha was on his deathbed, Venerable Ānanda's affection and love for the Buddha was so great—since he had only attained the fruit of Stream-entry (Sotāpanna) at that time—that he went inside the monastery, clung to the doorpost, and wept, saying: "I am still only a trainee (Sekha). I have only reached the stage of a trainee. I still have much work to do to attain Arahantship. And my compassionate Teacher is about to attain Parinibbāna." While he was weeping in grief, the Buddha summoned Venerable Ānanda and consoled him, saying: "Ānanda, do not weep. Do not lament. Have I not told you before that whatever is born of causes, whatever has the nature of arising due to conditions, is subject to decay? It is subject to decay and dissolution. And have I not declared beforehand that there must be separation, alteration, and parting from all that is beloved and pleasing?"

Saying so, he then praised Venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, for a long time you have served the Tathāgata with boundless, sincere loving bodily action, wishing for His well-being. Likewise, with loving verbal action and loving mental action. You have accumulated much merit. Therefore, strive on. You will quickly become an Arahant." Thus, the Buddha consoled Venerable Ānanda.

Thus, having praised Venerable Ānanda, the Buddha further declared: "Ānanda, whatever Worthy and Fully Self-Awakened Buddhas existed in the past, they all had attendant monks just like Ānanda. And whatever Fully Self-Awakened Buddhas arise in the future, they too will have attendants just like Ānanda." Thus, he pointed it out as a natural law (dhammatā)—that serving the Buddha is a status to be achieved by fulfilling perfections (pāramī).

Furthermore, he declared: "Monks, Ānanda is wise. Ānanda knows: 'This is the proper time for monks to see the Tathāgata. This is the proper time for bhikkhunīs. This is the proper time for laymen (upāsaka) and laywomen (upāsikā). This is the proper time for kings, ministers, non-Buddhist ascetics (tīrthakas), and their disciples.' Ānanda possesses such deep understanding and wisdom."

Next, the Buddha declared that there are four wonderful and marvelous qualities in Ānanda. What are they? If a group of monks comes to see Ānanda, they are delighted by his very sight. Furthermore, if Ānanda expounds a portion of the Dhamma to that group of monks, they are highly pleased, and while they are still unsatisfied (desiring more), Ānanda falls silent. That is, he does not preach to the point of causing weariness; while they are still not fully satiated, Ānanda becomes silent. Likewise, the same is true for the group of bhikkhunīs, laymen, and laywomen—this is how the Buddha shows these four wonderful and marvelous qualities regarding the fourfold assembly.

He then compared this using a simile. "Similar to these four wonderful and marvelous qualities, there are four qualities in a Wheel-Turning Monarch (Cakkavatti). If a group of kṣatriyas (royalty) comes to see the Wheel-Turning King, they are delighted by his very sight. If the Wheel-Turning King addresses that group of kṣatriyas, they are delighted by his speech. Then, while they are still unsatisfied, the Wheel-Turning King falls silent. Just as with royalty, so too with the householders, and likewise with the ascetics; every group that comes is delighted by the very sight of the Wheel-Turning King. If he speaks, they are delighted by that too." In this way, comparing him to the wonderful and marvelous qualities of a Wheel-Turning King, the Buddha praised Venerable Ānanda.

Furthermore, on many occasions, the Buddha praised Venerable Ānanda's state of great learning (bahussuta), his wisdom, and his great intelligence.

He also provided opportunities for Venerable Ānanda to bring forth his own capabilities. One such instance—and such incidents are frequently recorded—is when the Buddha would give a brief discourse to the monks, state a riddle-like sentence, and then get up and retire to his temple. Then, the monks, wishing to understand that sermon in detail and obtain its explanation, would go to Venerable Ānanda and entreat him: "The Blessed One and other co-religionists have often praised the Venerable Ānanda for having the ability to explain such brief discourses in detail. Therefore, please explain this to us in detail." But Venerable Ānanda would humbly say, using a simile: "It is like a man seeking heartwood who, finding a tree with good heartwood, bypasses its roots and trunk and looks for heartwood among the branches; when the Blessed One, the Lord of Dhamma, is present to clarify, why do you ask me?" However, when the monks requested repeatedly, Venerable Ānanda would give an explanation of that Dhamma portion. Having done so, he would say: "This is how it appears to me. If you wish, go to the Blessed One, ask Him, and confirm it." Then, when those monks presented that Dhamma explanation to the Buddha, the Buddha would approve it, saying "Sādhu, sādhu!" and declare: "Monks, if you had asked me, I too would have explained it in the very same way." Thus, He validated and approved it.

In this manner, the Buddha employed various methods to highlight Venerable Ānanda's competence. Specifically, it is mentioned that on one occasion, the Sakyans of Kapilavatthu built a new assembly hall and invited the Buddha to use it first. The Buddha, together with the Saṅgha and Venerable Ānanda, went there, preached the Dhamma to the Sakyans for most of the night, and then said to Venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, expound the trainee's path (sekha-paṭipadā)—meaning how a Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna) should train hereafter—to these Sakyans. My back is aching. I will stretch my back." The Buddha then folded His double-outer-robe into four, laid it down right there in the hall, and lay down. He did not sleep; He merely reclined. Venerable Ānanda delivered a long Dhamma sermon on that subject. Hearing this, the Buddha expressed His approval, saying "Sādhu, sādhu!" and commended Venerable Ānanda's skill.

Similarly, praises received from Venerable Sāriputta are also recorded. On one occasion, Venerable Ānanda went to Venerable Sāriputta and asked: "Friend Sāriputta, in what way does a monk become one who has heard what he had not heard? And how does he not forget what he has heard? How does he repeatedly bring to mind what has briefly occurred to his mind? And how does he know what he did not know?" When these four questions were asked of Venerable Sāriputta, Venerable Sāriputta said: "The Venerable Ānanda is of great learning (bahussuta). May the answer occur to the Venerable Ānanda himself!" Then, after Venerable Ānanda explained it in detail to Venerable Sāriputta, Venerable Sāriputta declared: "This is wonderful, marvelous! The Venerable Ānanda has here declared six virtuous qualities present within himself through this exposition."

Venerable Sāriputta then said: "Venerable Ānanda thoroughly studies and learns the word of the Buddha, the Teacher's dispensation, which consists of nine factors: sutta (discourses), geyya (mixed prose and verse), veyyākaraṇa (expositions), gāthā (verses), udāna (inspired utterances), itivuttaka (as-it-was-said), jātaka (birth stories), abbhutadhamma (marvelous phenomena), and vedalla (catechisms). This is the first quality. He expounds that word of the Buddha in detail to others. This is the second. He teaches that word of the Buddha to others. This is the third. He recites those Dhamma portions in detail. This is the fourth. He repeatedly examines and ponders over those various Dhamma portions in his mind, keeping his mind anchored in them. This is the fifth. And Venerable Ānanda has a habit: in whatever monastery or dwelling where monks of great learning, keepers of the Dhamma, and keepers of the Vinaya reside, he goes there, spends the rainy season, and asks them about what he does not understand, saying: 'Venerable Sir, what is the meaning of this? What is that?' He asks and learns. In this way, Venerable Sāriputta explained the secret of Venerable Ānanda's great learning (bahussuta) and praised him in highly appreciative words."

From this, we can see that Venerable Ānanda, as the Treasurer of the Dhamma (Dhammabhaṇḍāgārika) in this Buddha-dispensation, made extraordinary use of his close association with the Buddha alongside his role as attendant. Although Venerable Ānanda declined to reside inside the Buddha's scented chamber (gandhakuṭi), we see that he made his own heart a scented chamber for the Buddha's virtues. Furthermore, he maintained a Treasury of the Dhamma in his mind for posterity—we must understand that this was for us. We can see that Venerable Ānanda made a tremendous effort to establish this Dhamma Treasury within his own mind.

Thus, three months after the Parinibbāna of the Buddha, when the Great Arhat Mahākassapa was preparing to hold a Dhamma Council (Saṅgāyana) with the aim of preserving the Buddha's word, five hundred Arhats were to participate. However, only four hundred and ninety-nine (499) Arhats were selected. Why was one seat left vacant? One seat was left because Venerable Ānanda had only attained Stream-entry (Sotāpanna) at that time and had not yet become an Arhat. A dilemma arose. Only Arhats must participate. Yet, it was impossible without Venerable Ānanda, and also impossible with him. It was impossible with him because he was not yet an Arhat. It was impossible without him because Venerable Ānanda held the entire word of the Buddha in his mind. At such a moment, a great challenge arose for Venerable Ānanda for the sake of the Dispensation. The Council was to be held the very next day. Therefore, he resolved, "I must attain this through intense energy." With this hope and determination, it is said that Venerable Ānanda spent most of the day in mindfulness of the body (kāyagatāsati), and finally, at night, as he was about to rest, after his feet had left the ground and before his head reached the pillow, in that brief interval—free from the four standard postures—he attained Arahantship. Thus, Venerable Ānanda, utilizing his powers of mindfulness (sati) and steadfastness (ṭhiti), attained Arahantship at that moment as a support to the Dispensation. Through this, we can see Venerable Ānanda's dedication to the Dispensation.

There are many lessons we can draw from his life. An attendant of the Buddha could easily enjoy the gains, favors, and offerings received by Him. Yet, what is shown by the boons requested by Venerable Ānanda? "I will serve the Blessed One only if He does not give me the robes, requisites, and almsfood received by Him."

Through this, he gave a highly valuable example to the world. The Buddha declared an extremely valuable passage to the monks: "Monks, be heirs of my Dhamma (dhamma-dāyāda), not heirs of material things (āmisa-dāyāda). This is what I expect from you out of compassion." The Buddha declared this in a certain discourse.

He then explained it in detail as follows: "Suppose I have finished eating my meal and a portion remains. At that point, I could either throw that almsfood onto the ground where there is no grass, or discard it in water where there are no living beings. At that time, suppose two monks who are suffering from hunger arrive. I speak to them thus: 'Monks, I have finished eating. Here is some leftover almsfood. If no one eats it, I will throw it away; eat if you wish.' Then, one monk thinks: 'Now, here is a portion of almsfood left over after the Blessed One has eaten. If I do not eat it, the Blessed One will discard it. But the Blessed One has declared this: "Monks, be heirs of my Dhamma, not heirs of material things." Recalling that word of the Buddha, that monk rejects the almsfood and resolves to spend the day in hunger. The other monk thinks: 'Here is some leftover almsfood... If I do not eat it, He will discard it. Therefore, let me eat this food, satisfy my hunger, and spend the day well.' Thinking thus, he eats the almsfood. Ultimately, the Buddha declared: 'Monks, between these two, although the second monk satisfied his hunger with the food I was going to discard, it is the first monk whom I regard as more venerable and praiseworthy. Why? Because that monk's rejection of the almsfood and spending the day in hunger will help him protect and develop noble spiritual qualities in the future, such as fewness of wishes (appicchatā), contentment (santuṭṭhitā), easy-supportability (subharatā), and the practice of effacement (sallekha)—the practice of cutting away defilements through ascetic practices (dhutaṅgas). That rejection assists him.'" We can understand that Venerable Ānanda, through his own life, provided a living example of the principle taught by the Buddha in this discourse known as the Dhammadāyāda Sutta. "I will serve the Blessed One only if He does not give me the robes, requisites, and almsfood received by Him... and if He does not grant me the opportunity to reside together with Him." Through this, we can take a great example. Venerable Ānanda's store of virtues, such as fewness of wishes (appicchatā), is mentioned in many places.

Venerable Ānanda received not only praise but occasionally also criticism and various accusations. On all such occasions, he very humbly accepted his mistakes and never showed anger or hatred. He never engaged in backbiting or carrying tales to the Buddha merely because of his close association. It is shown that he served the Buddha in a wonderfully obedient and humble manner. We must also consider that he had a long-standing familial relationship with the Buddha.

Looking at this life in terms of this world, Venerable Ānanda's background is recorded as being the son of Amitodana, the Sakyan who was the paternal uncle of the Buddha. He came and ordained along with other Sakyan princes such as Anuruddha, Bhaddiya, Bhagu, Kimbila, and Devadatta. Yet, the Jātaka stories reveal an even deeper, ancient connection with the Buddha. It was due to that attachment, that devotion, and that extraordinary affection that he served the Buddha at the highest level, wishing for His well-being without any duplicity, performing loving bodily, verbal, and mental actions. We should remember Venerable Ānanda's service as a shadow walking behind the Buddha's service to the world. On the other hand, we have his virtuous qualities—especially his quality of great learning (bahussuta). Although he had only attained Stream-entry (Sotāpanna) and was not yet an Arhat, the Buddha and other great elders like Sāriputta referred to Venerable Ānanda using the word "wise" (paṇḍita). It is mentioned that due to his great learning (bahussuta), he delivered long discourses on many occasions to other monks, non-Buddhist ascetics, laymen, and laywomen, while holding the Dhamma in his heart as the Treasurer of the Dhamma (Dhammabhaṇḍāgārika).

Based on these facts we have declared, we should think of honoring Venerable Ānanda. Today, devotees perform Buddha-pūjās. They perform stupa-worship, Buddha-image offerings, and flower offerings. When doing these, we should think: "What we are doing is a Buddha-service, modeled on the symbol of service that Venerable Ānanda rendered to the living Buddha."

This also helps in developing faith (saddhā). This is revealed even during the Buddha's time through the account of the Ānanda Bodhi tree in India. According to it, when the Buddha was away on tours, King Kosala, Anāthapiṇḍika, the devout Visākhā, and others had no way of paying their respects and making offerings to the Buddha, so they requested a worshipful object. As a result, it is said that Venerable Ānanda, with the Buddha's permission, obtained a seed from the Bodhi tree in Gayā and planted the Ānanda Bodhi tree. The very name "Ānanda Bodhi" shows that it was a tribute to Venerable Ānanda, continuing the service he rendered to the Buddha. Through this, we expect to inspire clarity (prasāda) in our minds. Just as he said "making my heart a scented chamber," the purpose of Buddhist devotees in performing these services should be to make their own hearts a scented chamber for the Buddha's virtues. Venerable Ānanda provides an example for this.

Furthermore, it is mentioned in the Mahāparinibbāna Sutta that it was under Venerable Ānanda's guidance, and in response to his questions, that the Buddha explained in detail the honors to be paid to the Tathāgata's body, the building of stupas, and so forth. Venerable Ānanda repeatedly asked: "Blessed Sir, after the Parinibbāna of the Tathāgata, how should we serve and honor the Tathāgata's body?" In response to this, the Buddha said that the body should be treated like that of a Wheel-Turning King, and explained the details of constructing stupas. It was according to these instructions that, after the Parinibbāna of the Buddha, the enshrining of relics and the building of stupas began. Therefore, whenever we perform Buddha-worship, we should recall the Buddha-service Venerable Ānanda rendered to the living Buddha and think, "We are doing the very same service, the same duties." Even when performing duties at the temple or the Bodhi tree, these are not things to be considered a hassle; rather, through them, we hope to keep the Buddha alive in our hearts. Therefore, even though nothing belongs to the Buddha now, what do we expect? Clarity (prasāda) is a quality that goes along with faith (saddhā). Faith (saddhā) and respect for the Teacher (satthu-garava) towards the Triple Gem are essential. Especially in these times, even our Buddhists run after various other teachers instead of the Buddha. We hear that some have even claimed that other Buddhas have appeared. In this way, there is a condition where faith (saddhā) is corrupted. Therefore, we must understand that observing duties and rituals sometimes helps us to generate genuine respect for the Teacher. To follow Venerable Ānanda's example and cultivate faith (saddhā) in the Buddha, we must perform activities like stupa-worship and daily duties meaningfully, with the ultimate goal of developing faith (saddhā) and clarity (prasāda) in our hearts.

In the Mahāparinibbāna Sutta, the Buddha declared that if anyone clarifies their mind through such actions as stupa-worship, that clarity of mind (cetaso pasāda) even helps them to attain birth in a heavenly world. This is regarding the next life. But if we consider this life, it is that very clarity (prasāda) accompanying faith (saddhā) that helps us to establish concentration (samādhi) in our minds. For one listening to a Dhamma discourse, the precursor to concentration (samādhi) is the clarity (prasāda) that arises in the mind, once the hindrances (nīvaraṇa) are removed through that clarity. There is an ancient simile of the water-clearing gem (udaka-pasādaka maṇi). In those days, when a certain gem was placed in muddy water, the mud would quickly settle to the bottom and the water would become clear. In the same way, faith (saddhā) is described as a water-clearing gem. It is to cultivate this that we perform these duties and rituals.

Just as the Buddha-service symbolizes Venerable Ānanda’s service, we must also recall his service to the Dispensation as the Treasurer of the Dhamma (Dhammabhaṇḍāgārika). In the pirith suttas and Dhamma portions we chant, we frequently see the words "Evaṁ me sutaṁ." This "Evaṁ me sutaṁ" means, "Thus have I heard." Who is this "I"? This "I" is Ānanda. This is because, at the Council, Venerable Ānanda placed himself in the position of the one who heard, saying "Thus have I heard," and declared those Dhamma portions. As a tribute to him, the compiling monks (saṅgītikāraka) included those words as well. That is why we begin suttas with "Evaṁ me sutaṁ." Some people do not even know the reason for this. Through this, tribute is paid once again to Venerable Ānanda and his role as the Treasurer of the Dhamma.

Why do we highlight the characters of these disciples? These disciples did not shape their characters in just one lifetime. If we accept this saṁsāric journey, we know we travel in this saṁsāra for a long time. When we speak of the Buddha, we do not think that He accumulated the store of virtues supporting His Buddhahood in just one lifetime, nor that He suddenly attained it by striving for six years or merely by sitting under a tree. A Buddha arises in the world after fulfilling perfections (pāramī) in this saṁsāra for a long time, for an unfathomable number of eons. In the same way, the Buddha declared as a natural law (dhammatā) that special positions, chief disciple positions, attendant positions, and so forth, are the results of perfections (pāramī) and resolve (praṇidhi) made while performing meritorious deeds over a long period. That is how great disciples are born into the world. Although they have attained Parinibbāna and are no longer alive today, we must keep their exemplary characters at the forefront and carry this Dispensation forward accordingly. Today, as a tribute of worship, we have brought forward the character of Venerable Ānanda. It is worthwhile to integrate his quality of service and the service he rendered to the Dispensation as the Treasurer of the Dhamma into our own lives to help preserve this Dispensation.

Furthermore, the Buddha has declared the value of faith (saddhā) through the five spiritual faculties (indriya) and five spiritual powers (bala): saddhā (faith/devotion), viriya (energy/effort), sati (mindfulness), samādhi (concentration), and paññā (wisdom). We must carefully consider their mutual relationship. Some people think of faith (saddhā) as foolishness. But in reality, before turning to any special task, one must have a deep conviction, a certain degree of faith (saddhā) in it. For without faith (saddhā), energy (viriya) does not arise. Now, of all the objects in the world towards which faith (saddhā) can be generated, the Tathāgata, the Fully Self-Awakened Buddha, is the most supreme. Thus, when we practice recollection of the Buddha (Buddhānussati), we recall the Buddha, and through that, we generate faith (saddhā). This came naturally to Venerable Ānanda. To what extent? He mentioned when recounting his life that, although he was only a Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna), defilements of sensual lust (kāma) did not arise in him, because he spent his time constantly dwelling on the virtues of the Buddha, thinking of the Buddha.

We can see that faith (saddhā) removes the hindrances (nīvaraṇa). Faith (saddhā) means clarity (prasāda). Furthermore, like an elephant's trunk, it is by using faith (saddhā) that one is able to fulfill these spiritual qualities of the Dispensation. Faith (saddhā) is described as the seed. It is with faith (saddhā) as the seed that other spiritual qualities grow. With faith (saddhā) established, one then cultivates energy (viriya). What is done by cultivating energy (viriya)? Cultivating energy (viriya) means applying fourfold effort to remove unwholesome qualities that flow into one's mind, and to cultivate wholesome qualities. In this way, one exerts energy (viriya). When that energy (viriya) leaves no room for unarisen unwholesome states, dispels arisen unwholesome states, generates unarisen wholesome states, and consolidates arisen wholesome states, it is through this that mindfulness (sati)—the power of memory—emerges. Thus we have saddhā, viriya, and sati. When that mindfulness (sati) can be maintained for a considerable time according to one's determination, that is called concentration (samādhi). Within this concentration (samādhi), there is a power to gather together the energies that are otherwise wasted in our daily lives through a scattered, distracted mind. This is concentration (samādhi). Finally, the concentrated mind helps us to gain a deep understanding of the true nature of the world, the true nature of the body, and the process of arising and ceasing in the world as it exists in the Dhamma of Dependent Co-arising (paṭiccasamuppāda). This is called wisdom (paññā).

These are shown as spiritual qualities (dhamma) because they must be developed through effort. We know that when a person is born, the five physical senses—eyes, ears, nose, etc.—emerge. They exist, but one cannot realize Nibbāna through them. One must elevate these five spiritual qualities—saddhā, viriya, sati, samādhi, and paññā—into the position of ruling faculties (indriya). "Indriya" means ruler. One turns faith (saddhā) into something that has the power to perform a special function. What is that special function? Through that faith (saddhā), one removes double-mindedness and doubt (vicikicchā). One cannot make this journey while holding onto doubt and double-mindedness. It is with pure faith (saddhā) in the Triple Gem that one is able to apply hundred-percent energy (viriya). With a hesitant, doubtful mind, one cannot exert energy (viriya) with genuine self-sacrifice. That is why faith (saddhā) in the Buddha is necessary. Thus, within faith (saddhā), there is what is called "resolve" (adhimokkha). Adhimokkha means releasing, launching. The Buddha states, "Let faith launch forth." If this power of faith (saddhā) has launched forth towards the Tathāgata, then one directs oneself to exert energy (viriya) without any hesitation. It is through that energy (viriya), in the manner described, that mindfulness (sati) and other spiritual qualities emerge.

Therefore, let us reflect that this character of Ānanda also helps us to cultivate these spiritual qualities beginning with faith (saddhā). By constantly following behind the Buddha like a shadow and serving Him, he not only secured time for the Buddha's daily activities, but at the same time, he himself made true use of his association with the Buddha, presenting his problems and questions on various occasions; and it is their answers that we see today as the sutta portions in the Tipiṭaka. Whenever a thought or reflection arose in Venerable Ānanda, he would go to the Buddha and ask, "How is this, Venerable Sir?" The answers given to those are this vast collection of Dhamma portions. It is this vast collection of Dhamma portions that we use today as sutta discourses. Through all of this, we must consider: what do we expect from these Dhamma discourses? It is crossing over from the suffering of saṁsāra (saṁsāra-dukkha). The Buddha has shown the path to cross over from saṁsāric suffering as: Right View (sammā-diṭṭhi), Right Intention (sammā-saṅkappa), Right Speech (sammā-vācā), Right Action (*sammā-

Within the Right View (sammā-diṭṭhi) of this Noble Eightfold Path, there is also a certain degree of faith (saddhā) in the word of the Buddha. Having generated that faith (saddhā), as the Buddha declared in the discourse on the elephant footprint simile, one generates a certain degree of faith (saddhā) in the Awakening (sambodhi) of the Buddha. Without that trust to a certain extent, one cannot walk this path of Dhamma. One would be unable to choose who one's Teacher is. Having established faith (saddhā) in the Buddha as one's foundation, if one develops the correct vision, the correct view, then from there on, the stream of thoughts that arises—the path-thoughts—constitutes Right Intention (sammā-saṅkappa). Through that, one's speech, action, and livelihood are aligned, and ultimately, by bringing forth concentration of mind, one is able to realize the true nature of the world. Essential for walking this path are the qualities shown by the Buddha: saddhā, viriya, sati, samādhi, and paññā. These are both spiritual faculties (indriya) and spiritual powers (bala). When opposing states arise, by recalling faith (saddhā), one can conquer doubt, hesitation, and uncertainty (vicikicchā). By putting forward energy (viriya), one can conquer the mind's shrinking nature and sluggishness. Developing mindfulness (sati) helps to eliminate distraction. Then comes concentration (samādhi), one-pointedness, and finally wisdom (paññā).

It is by completing these factors that one is able to achieve the highest results on this Dhamma path. Therefore, we must reflect on the spiritual qualities present in the characters of these disciples. While reflecting on them as a tribute of gratitude and worship, we must take the examples we can from them and cultivate these spiritual qualities of the Dispensation within ourselves. It is through this that we can achieve our own liberation and also set an example for others. Even though we might generally think of offerings and rituals as meaningless, within them lie activities related to this Buddha-service. Next, just as Venerable Ānanda did, by retaining these Dhamma portions and constantly using them in a way that assists our liberation, we must put them into practice. It is through these that even the state of great learning (bahussuta) helps the longevity of this Dispensation. Through great learning (bahussuta), many results are obtained. One gets the opportunity to hear the Dhamma. Especially in an era when there were no books, it is because the monks retained and maintained these as reciters (bhāṇakas) through generations that we have received this Dhamma today. Even if we restrict this Dhamma to books and merely print them in books because printing facilities are available, after some time, these will become things that are not understood. Therefore, we must retain this Dhamma in our minds, in our consciousness, in our hearts, repeatedly bring them to mind, examine their meaning (attha), and be enthusiastic to protect that Dhamma in our minds.

Along with that, one's life naturally shapes itself. If one is constantly engaged in something, all one's thoughts and aspirations remain aligned with it. A person whose mind is engaged in wrong thoughts and wrong views (micchā-diṭṭhi) will have all other behaviors aligned accordingly. But when one lives constantly bringing Dhamma portions to mind, reflecting on them, and directing the mind towards them, one is naturally inclined to develop the spiritual qualities present in those Dhamma portions within oneself. Recalling these facts, today these lay devotees—just as the Buddha declared—have received this heritage of the Dispensation, brought down to us by Venerable Ānanda not as an inheritance of material things (āmisa-dāyāda) but as an inheritance of the Dhamma (dhamma-dāyāda).

Just as Venerable Sāriputta is referred to as the General of the Dhamma (Dhammasenāpati), Venerable Ānanda is referred to as the Treasurer of the Dhamma (Dhammabhaṇḍāgārika). The Buddha awarded foremost positions to these various elders for the forward journey of this Dispensation. Thus, the Saṅgha knew: "These monks are special in these particular fields. Therefore, matters related to those can be obtained from those specific monks." In this way, through a certain skillful means, the Buddha provided opportunities for His disciples to demonstrate their special skills and talents to the world.

As mentioned in that Sekha Sutta, in the trainee's path, the Buddha actually might not have had such a severe backache as to require lying down. But He utilized that opportunity to have Venerable Ānanda deliver a long discourse. He rested, saying, "Ānanda, preach the Dhamma to these Sakyan princes." In that way, on various occasions, He preached the Dhamma briefly and retired from the temple to provide opportunities for His disciples to practice their skills. In this manner, every one of us must strive to retain the Buddha's Dhamma correctly—both its meaning (attha) and its phrasing (byañjana) as He said, "with meaning and phrasing"—and expound and teach them to others, anchor our minds in them, ask and learn about what we do not understand or what is unclear, and by depositing that Dhamma in our minds and living according to the Dhamma, we can protect this Dispensation. For various wrong views arise due to a lack of correct understanding of the Dhamma. But today, when the phrasing or the letters and order of words in any Dhamma portion declared by the Buddha are changed, their meaning also changes. If the Dhamma is distorted, pronouncing Dhamma passages incorrectly and retaining them incorrectly, their meaning also gradually becomes distorted. That is how the disappearance of the Dispensation occurs. Therefore, considering it as one's duty, for the longevity of the Dispensation and for the development of one's own spiritual qualities, one must correctly retain the Dhamma portions, teach them to others, and with genuine faith (saddhā), perform the duty of teaching others exactly as heard and exactly as learned (yathāsutaṁ yathāpariyattaṁ).

If we take the character of Ānanda as our example in all of this—the Buddha has declared that failing to worship and praise those who are worthy of worship and praise is a shortcoming. When we reflect in this manner, by constantly recalling the store of virtues of those Great Arhats, taking them as examples for our lives, and through those spiritual qualities, bringing an end to our saṁsāric journey—by bringing the power of those spiritual qualities such as saddhā, viriya, sati, samādhi, and paññā taught by the Buddha into our minds—may this Dhamma sermon we delivered today, and the meritorious benefits of hearing the Dhamma you have acquired, be a supportive condition to succeed in your own Dhamma-meditation as quickly as possible before the decline of this Dispensation, relying on the association with good spiritual friends (kalyāṇa-mitta)! Through that merit, may it quickly and definitely be a supportive condition for your release from all saṁsāric suffering—such as birth (jāti), aging (jarā), illness, and death (maraṇa)—and for finding solace in the supreme, noble, stilled mind (Nibbāna! Wishing that the virtue (sīla) kept today and the Dhamma heard definitely be a supportive condition for our supramundane progress, let us recite the verses in this manner:

"Ettāvatā ca amhehi....."

verse from the Aṅgulimālattheragāthā (Thag 121–122), which is found in the Theragāthā (Khuddaka Nikāya)

Dear Listeners,

The Tathāgata, the Fully Enlightened One, revealed to the world that because of not properly understanding Anicca (Impermanent) within existence, beings wander in saṃsāra for a long period of time. Due to the perverted view of regarding Anicca (Impermanent) things as permanent, bhava-taṇhā (craving for existence) is deposited within the mind in an extremely subtle manner. Today, we have chosen as our theme two advisory verses that help to eradicate this bhava-taṇhā. The Great Arahant Uttara, who uttered these two verses, attained Arahantship through the meditation on the contemplation of feeling (vedanānupassanā). At a time when he was sentenced to be impaled on a stake on a baseless accusation, sitting on that very stake, he conquered that painful feeling (vedanā) through the meditation on the contemplation of feeling (vedanānupassanā) and attained Arahantship. The story of Ven. Uttara Thera is told as follows:

To a child born to a certain wealthy Brahmin family in the kingdom of Magadha, the parents gave the name Uttara. As this virtuous child Uttara grew up, seeing him growing in virtue, wisdom, knowledge, and physical beauty, the chief minister of Magadha, Vassakāra, proposed to marry his young daughter to him. However, as his wisdom gathered over saṃsāra had already matured by this time, the young man Uttara rejected that marriage proposal and came into the association of Ven. Sāriputta. Serving the Great Arahant Sāriputta and listening to the Dhamma, he soon received ordination. Having received ordination, he served him as a close attendant.

On one occasion, when the Great Arahant Sāriputta fell ill, the novice monk (sāmaṇera) Uttara set out early in the morning to seek medicinal alms food. Having placed his bowl near a pond, he went down to the pond, washed his face and mouth, and while returning, a thief who had broken into a house through a tunnel the previous night and plundered goods was fleeing through the main gate of the city with the king's men in hot pursuit. Arriving near the pond, the thief dropped the bag of gems into the novice's bowl and ran away, escaping. When the king's men arrived and checked, seeing the bag of gems in the bowl, they arrested the novice monk, accusing him of being the thief. Whom did they take him to show? To none other than Minister Vassakāra. Vassakāra, the chief minister who was acting as the judge at the time, harboured ill-will and hatred because his proposal had been rejected. Out of pure hatred because Uttara had rejected his proposal and ordained among the ascetics, without even holding a trial, he ordered him to be impaled on a stake. When the executioners took him and were impaling the novice monk Uttara, the Buddha saw this and arrived at the spot. After he was impaled, the Buddha placed his hand on his head and declared, "Uttara, this is the ripening of your past kamma (karma). Therefore, endure and bear that feeling (vedanā) through the power of reflection." The Buddha gave a fitting instruction and Dhamma advice to him. Having heard this, the novice monk Uttara suppressed the feeling (vedanā), and through that very meditation, attained Arahantship with higher knowledges (abhiññā), and as mentioned there, rose into the sky from the stake and even performed miracles.

The monks asked, "Venerable, how did you derive benefit from insight meditation (vipassanā) while experiencing such intense feeling (vedanā)?" Then the Arahant Uttara said, "For a long time, I had seen the danger in Bhava (Becoming). I had understood the nature of saṅkhāras (preparations). Therefore, I was able to attain Arahantship through the contemplation of feeling (vedanānupassanā)." Expressing this thought, it is said that he uttered these two verses:

"There is no Bhava (Becoming) that is permanent. There are no saṅkhāras (preparations) that are eternal or everlasting. They arise as this or that. They pass away in various ways, again and again—not just arising, but changing and passing away. Having seen this danger regarding this bhava, this existence, I have come to the firm stance that I have no further use for this bhava. Having emerged from all sensual pleasures, the destruction of the influxes, Arahantship, has been attained by me." It is said that Venerable Uttara answered the monks in this manner.

This story is deeply miraculous. Such miraculous things are mentioned in the Dhamma. Sometimes, even more miraculous things are recorded. In the past, even though highly meritorious individuals encountered such disasters due to certain forces of kamma, it is recorded in various Dhamma stories that they were able to realize the Four Noble Truths and the truth of Dukkha (Suffering) taught by the Buddha through those very disasters.

If we direct our thoughts to the specific matters spoken of here, what is this permanent existence? Now, those of you who have some understanding of the Dhamma of Dependent Arising (paṭiccasamuppāda) would know that it is stated: "upādāna-paccayā bhavo" (dependent on grasping/holding is existence). Where there is grasping/holding (upādāna), there is existence (bhava). This existence is something that goes hand in hand with grasping/holding (upādāna).

As Buddhists, we all know that what the Buddha pointed out as a "person" is not a soul or self (attā). What is here is a heap of form, a heap of feeling (vedanā), a heap of perception (saññā), a heap of preparations (saṅkhāra), and a heap of consciousness (viññāṇa). These are grasped in the manner of grasping/holding (upādāna). It is through grasping, by holding on, that this idea of existence (bhava) arises. And due to that very grasping, it becomes a conditioned/prepared (saṅkhata) thing. Now, the word Saṅkhāra (Preparations) was mentioned.

As Buddhists, we have all heard the word saṅkhāra. However, it must be said that this is a difficult word to understand. If we think about it at an ordinary level, its basic meaning is "preparing" or "constructing." That saṅkhāra means "preparing" is also mentioned in the Dhamma. When defining each of these aggregates (khandha), the Buddha asks: "And what, monks, do you call saṅkhāras? They prepare/construct what is prepared/conditioned (saṅkhataṃ abhisaṅkharonti), therefore they are called saṅkhāras." They prepare the conditioned into a state of being prepared. This is done by saṅkhāras. Next, what is spoken of as the conditioned/prepared thing (saṅkhata)?

"Rūpaṃ rūpattāya saṅkhataṃ abhisaṅkharonti"—it is these saṅkhāras (preparations) that prepare form to be form as a conditioned/prepared entity. Through a collection of thoughts arising in the mind due to ignorance (avijjā), there is a taking of it as "this is mine." Through that, one grasps form as "my form." Thereupon, a limit or boundary is established. A prepared thing, a saṅkhata. It is the same with feeling (vedanā). Where one grasps it as "my feeling," through that very grasping/holding, they become conditioned/prepared things. Perception (saññā) is the same. Finally, preparations (saṅkhāra) themselves are prepared into the state of preparations (saṅkhāra) by preparations (saṅkhāra). It is very difficult to understand that. It is hard to comprehend by thinking logically: how do preparations prepare preparations? Why is it said so? When a person takes something as "my preparations (saṅkhāra)," that too is a conditioned/prepared thing (saṅkhata). That too is through grasping (upādāna). It is the same with consciousness (viññāṇa). Consciousness too is made into a conditioned/prepared (saṅkhata) entity by preparations (saṅkhāra). That is why it is said: "dependent on ignorance are preparations (avijjā-paccayā saṅkhārā), dependent on preparations is consciousness (saṅkhāra-paccayā viññāṇaṃ)." The story of the five aggregates of grasping/holding (pañcupādānakkhandha), of holding on, lies right there.

There is another instance where this is beautifully revealed, which the Venerable (Ananda) expresses to his fellow monks: "Friends, when we were newly ordained, the Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta often admonished us with Dhamma instructions." Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta is the one who held the foremost (etadagga) position among Dhamma preachers during the Buddha's time. He was someone who delivered very deep Dhamma discourses to his fellow monks on many occasions. So, Venerable Ānanda recalls a memorable sermon delivered to him when he was newly ordained. What was it? "Puṇṇa Mantāniputta told me this: 'Friend Ānanda, it is through grasping/holding (upādāna) that the conceit "I am" (asmi) arises, not without grasping/holding (upādāya asmi'ti hoti, no anupādāya).' It is through grasping that the thought 'I am' comes to a person, not without grasping." A very deep point is expressed there. It is only where there is grasping that one can say 'I am'. Then, he also gives a simile for this.

Often, we can understand something with the help of a simile. Even if the sentence regarding that Dhamma point is not understood immediately, Venerable Ānanda relates to the other monks a beautiful simile that Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta had declared to him. Venerable Puṇṇa Mantāniputta said to Venerable Ānanda: "Friend, just as a young woman or man fond of ornaments, looking at the reflection of her or his own face in a mirror, or in a bowl of clean water, does so by grasping/depending on something, by relying on something." In modern terms, we would say "relative to something."

If we take the story told here in light of the simile, a person is reminded of their own form when looking into a mirror. That is when they can say "this is me." Why? Because a mirror has a reflective quality. To reflect means to show back, as if manifesting or conjuring. This reflective quality exists in this consciousness (viññāṇa). Within the human mind, within consciousness (viññāṇa), there is this reflection (paccavekkhaṇa). When looking back, something is caught; something is caught by the mind. It is that which is caught that one grasps as "this is my form." One looks into the mirror to adjust, to prepare and construct one's form, thinking "this is my form." Thus, through that simile, it is shown that existence (bhava) arises within that very grasping/holding (upādāna).

On another occasion, as a teaching of the Buddha, it is stated that a person sees form as self (attā). They regard form as self. That very regarding is a preparation/formation (saṅkhāra). Here we get a clue to the word saṅkhāra as well. To declare "this is my form" is itself a preparation/formation (saṅkhāra). A preparation/formation (saṅkhāra) means a prepared/constructed thing. In prepared things, there is an artificial nature, an untrue nature. There is something like a departure from the natural state within the word saṅkhāra. Thus, one grasps it as "this is my form." This shows that taking form, feeling (vedanā), etc., as "I" and "mine" is itself a preparation/formation (saṅkhāra).

It is in this manner, upon preparations (saṅkhāra), that this conditioned/prepared (saṅkhata) state is built. Next, there is a valuable discourse taught by the Buddha regarding this conditioned/prepared state: "Monks, there are three characteristics of the conditioned/prepared (saṅkhata). If something has been prepared/constructed, in every such constructed thing, these three characteristics are found. What are the three? Uppādo paññāyati (arising is discerned), vayo paññāyati (passing away is discerned), ṭhitassa aññathattaṃ paññāyati (alteration of that which stands is discerned)." In any constructed thing, an arising can be shown. Vayo means a wearing away or passing away can be shown. Ṭhitassa aññathattaṃ means that which is between the arising and the passing away, which we call "existence" or "persisting." Within that existence—here "standing" refers to its state of persisting—ṭhitassa aññathattaṃ (alteration of that which stands) is found. That is the special thing. An alteration or change is seen there. This is what the Buddha had to remind the world of.

Now, think about yourselves. When you think about your own lives, one end is birth (jāti). The other end is the disaster called death (maraṇa). During the period between these two, who thinks about death? How many of us do? Who thinks about this impermanence (aniccatā)? Based on the conceit of "I" and "mine," believing that this exists permanently—if aging (jarā) begins to show, that too is covered up; some dye or paint is applied to cover it up. You know how with vehicles, they keep the same license plate, but from time to time they patch it up with new-looking parts and keep it running. They are unwilling to accept the truth. So, it persists until then; that is the way.

The Buddha points out ṭhitassa aññathattaṃ—this grasped/held portion is not permanent. What is within it is alteration (aññathābhāva). Since there is this alteration, due to various social requirements, we sometimes even have to prove our identity—proving an identity that is not there, during various administrative tasks.

Yet, the nature of the world is indeed alteration (aññathābhāva). It is change itself. There is nothing identical in this; there is no self-identity. This is precisely what is to be understood as impermanence (aniccatā). However, seeing impermanence (aniccatā) in the present moment is extremely difficult.

It is easy to think that past things are over. It is also easy to think that in the future, this will cease to be. But seeing impermanence (aniccatā) right there in the present, moment by moment, is extremely difficult. That is precisely how the impermanence of preparations (saṅkhāras) is contemplated in deep insight (vipassanā). What is mentioned as the knowledge of arising and passing away (udayabbaya-ñāṇa) in insight (vipassanā) is that the arising and passing away start to appear in a rapid manner when one's attention (manasikāra) is directed there. Let us bring in another simile for this. It is close to the mirror simile, but not something found in books. It is a simile we use to explain certain Dhamma points; we cannot claim it is entirely our own. Now, you have surely heard how a dog, while crossing a footbridge carrying a piece of meat, thought there was another piece of meat in the water, jumped in to grab it, and committed a foolish act.

Thinking further along those lines, suppose a dog is crossing a footbridge. While crossing, it sees its own shadow or reflection. It might think it is a friendly dog and wag its tail. Or think it is an enemy and growl. Or look with curiosity, wondering where this dog came from. What is the reason for all this? It is because the dog forgets that water has a reflective quality. If there is reflection (paccavekkhaṇa)—real reflection means reflecting within the mind, gaining an understanding—when looking while thinking "this is something in a mirror," its artificial nature has already struck our mind. Now, that dog looks at the water forgetting the reflective nature of water. That is why it is deceived by it. But to dispel that delusion, that is precisely what the Buddha pointed out as radical attention/wise attention (yoniso manasikāra). Thus, through unwise/improper attention (ayoniso manasikāra), through incorrect reflection, the dog is deceived and might stay there even for hours. But when radical attention (yoniso manasikāra) is awakened, it understands, "Because of the reflective nature of this water, it is my own shadow that is seen." In that manner, as one progresses in insight (vipassanā), what helps is radical attention (yoniso manasikāra).

Where radical attention (yoniso manasikāra) is awakened, one sees that in what the world takes to be "a thing, a thing," there is a Dhamma term for it: Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). We are going through this systematically so that it helps meditating devotees to learn something from this, rather than just listening to a sermon and leaving. "Name-and-Form" (nāmarūpa) means that the practitioner of insight (vipassanā) sees the object appearing to them as an instance where some mental phenomena (name) and some material phenomena (form) are mutually supporting each other. Speaking of mental phenomena (name/mental factors), what is the first thing our attention is drawn to? Think about it. Even right now, suppose there is some slight feeling (vedanā), even if it is not a major painful feeling (vedanā) like being pierced by a thorn. The very first thing felt is feeling (vedanā), isn't it? Is it not within feeling (vedanā) that we are prompted into action? So much so that on one occasion, the Buddha asked Venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, if there were no feeling (vedanā) anywhere, could there arise the perception (saññā) of a self (attā)?" "No, Lord," he replied. From this very fact, it is clear that it is through feeling (vedanā) that the notion of a self is awakened. Even if it exists as an underlying tendency (anusaya), at the moment of feeling (vedanā), behold, it is awakened. Thus, that feeling...

...perception (saññā) tries to identify. Suppose some creature bit you, say, a centipede, while you were suddenly sitting here. Thus, perception (saññā) is there. Next, based on that perception (saññā), shouldn't one find a way to escape from it, to get free? Intention (cetanā) is applied. When intention is applied, contact occurs. For contact, the Pali word phassa is used there. Wherever it may be, the mind is directed to that point of contact (phassa). And what lies at the end of this? Attention (manasikāra), reflection. These are the mental phenomena pointed out as "Name" (nāma): feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), contact (phassa), and attention (manasikāra). It is through these that we initially recognize something; we might not know what bit us, but what helped us identify it was that feeling (vedanā), the perception (saññā) that followed, the intention (cetanā) applied accordingly, the contact (phassa) there, and the attention (manasikāra) that aided it. Thus, those are mental phenomena (nāma-dhamma).

Next, what are shown as material phenomena (rūpa-dhamma)? As form (rūpa), the Buddha has pointed out the four great elements (cattāro mahābhūtā): earth (pathavī), water (āpo), fire (tejo), and air (vāyo). We recognize them through their properties: hardness, fluidity, heat, coldness, etc. You have heard of these characteristics of the four great elements. We identify them through those very mental phenomena (nāma-dhamma). This is why it is said that there is a constant mutual relationship between Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa).

Somehow, it is through these phenomena of Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa), by recognizing Name-and-Form, that we recognize the reflective nature of that consciousness (viññāṇa). It is Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) that directs our attention toward consciousness (viññāṇa). Dependent on Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa), consciousness (viññāṇa) exists. It is on this basis that we must proceed. Thus, the Buddha points out that if the world, which is trapped within the phenomena of Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa), at some point understands their impermanence (aniccatā)—what has been taken so far as the dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi) are these heaps. The heap of form, the heap of feeling (vedanā). All this is taking them as "I" and "mine." What is caught in that taking is the heap (khandha). The Buddha also shows what is meant by "heap." Khandha means heap. This heap of form is described in eleven ways: past, future, present... Now, when you think about your own form, "this is my form," if we take the past childhood, or youth—it could be a photograph—yet "this is my form." Thus, past, future, then gross or subtle, internal or external—meaning it can be one's own form, or an external form of another. Or it can be gross, or subtle; inferior or superior; far or near. All these are heaps of form. All of of these are taken as "I" and "mine." It is the same regarding feeling (vedanā). When a feeling (vedanā) is slightly felt, behold, it is already awakened within. Next, one conjures it up in the mind.

If truth be told, contemplation of feeling (vedanānupassanā) is like a very short path to Nibbāna. Even though short, it is like a difficult path. It is so powerful that it is hard for everyone to face it. That is why it is called a miracle. How does one do this meditation while sitting on a stake? We go searching for a nice, comfortable seat to meditate. Yet, because Venerable Uttara had that understanding of existence (bhava), because he had that understanding of preparations (saṅkhāras), he used that very feeling (vedanā) as an aid. He turned it into a blessing in disguise. He realized suffering (dukkha)—the suffering (dukkha) concerning existence (bhava) taught by the Buddha.

Let us, in our own way, consider what issues arise during meditation for all these devout meditating devotees. First of all, if a teacher has given a certain meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna), it is difficult to raise the mind to that meditation subject.

Why? Because the mind runs to familiar thoughts. Those are called the hindrances (nīvaraṇa-dhamma). Various thoughts about the past, the future, and useless things come crashing into the mind. At that point, there is a battle with thoughts (vitakka). When battling with thoughts (vitakka), one is not here. Perhaps at home, or somewhere else. Therefore, one does not even know that this body is here. Even feelings (vedanās) are not felt because the mind is wandering around. But suppose that at some point, they are suppressed. One tries to raise the mind to the meditation subject. That is called the victory over thoughts (vitakka-vijaya).

There are various stages of meditation. Regarding progress, the initial stage is the victory over thoughts (vitakka-vijaya). Thoughts (vitakka) are the first to present themselves as Māra. When the Māra of thoughts is somewhat subdued, to some extent, it can be regarded as vitakka-vijaya. Next comes feeling (vedanā). One must remain in one posture to settle and concentrate the mind. But that is not permitted. Why? Because the Buddha pointed out that the nature of the body is purely a heap of suffering (dukkha). It is a heap of suffering, a heap of diseases. In short, one may well consider existence (bhava) as entirely a stake. In the Buddha's words, not only form but all five—feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), preparations (saṅkhāra), and consciousness (viññāṇa)—should be looked at with an insight eye. The Buddha has shown them in various ways. You may have heard: to look at them as Anicca (Impermanent), as Dukkha (Suffering), as a disease, as a boil, as a wound, as a stake, as a calamity, as an affliction, as Anattā (Not-self), as not belonging to oneself, as empty. This was not an exaggeration by the Buddha; it is its actual nature. Therefore, just as was said of form, feeling (vedanā) too is purely a stake. Whether it is pleasant feeling, painful feeling, or neither-painful-nor-pleasant feeling, within all of these, the Buddha points out that very impermanence (aniccatā). In another discourse, the Buddha points out: see pleasant feeling as suffering (dukkha), painful feeling as a stake, and neither-painful-nor-pleasant feeling as peaceful but impermanent (anicca). It is through such understanding of feeling (vedanā) that one becomes an Arahant, if viewed from that angle.

This attaining of Arahantship is the realizing of Nibbāna. One can approach it from several angles. In meditation on the contemplation of feeling (vedanānupassanā), there is disillusionment towards feeling (vedanā)—complete disillusionment. That very feeling (vedanā) helps in that disillusionment. What is done in vedanānupassanā is not looking at it as "my thing," but looking at feeling (vedanā) simply as feeling (vedanā). When one practices looking at feeling as feeling—now, as we said, after achieving the victory over thoughts, next there is a feeling (vedanā) somewhere in the body in the sitting posture. In most cases, by changing posture, we cover up that feeling, the suffering nature of the body. The body reminds us: "this is a heap of suffering." How do we cover it up? By changing postures. But if, at some point, without changing postures, one tries to identify the feeling insightfully, that is a very difficult thing. It is hard to do all at once. But if there is strong determination (adhiṭṭhāna), thinking "even if it breaks, let it be," then the practitioner of insight directs the mind right there. They do not look at it as "my feeling." They see it as impermanent (anicca). Feeling (vedanā) is something that comes from this impermanent (anicca) body. It is due to respective contact (phassa) that respective feelings (vedanā) arise. There is also a passage shown in the Dhamma regarding arising from respective conditions, which helps in meditation:

> Tajjaṃ tajjaṃ paccayaṃ paṭicca tajjā tajjā vedanā uppajjanti;

Dependent on respective conditions, respective feelings (vedanās) arise. Due to the absence of those respective conditions, those respective feelings (vedanās) cease. Then, without taking them as "I" and "mine," there is reflection according to cause and condition. Within that, feeling (vedanā) too can be recognized as impermanent (anicca). That is the meditation of vedanānupassanā (contemplation of feeling).

So at that moment, what the meditator (yogāvacara) does, if they cannot keep the mind on the meditation subject, is to direct the mind to the place where feeling (vedanā) occurs, in the manner of vedanānupassanā. Through that, many things can be learned. Sometimes, to conquer that feeling (vedanā), one can even extend the sitting period, the duration of the posture. That helps tranquility (samatha). Why? Because within that lies the power of determination. Now, we are all afraid of feeling (vedanā). We are afraid of it as soon as it approaches. We are afraid when a pin or a needle is brought close. Similarly, we are afraid as soon as a feeling (vedanā) is slightly felt. Yet, there is a level at which it can be endured. When the meditator faces the feeling (vedanā) at that moment, they realize they can go beyond it. Through that, the tranquility (samatha) aspect develops. Next, looking directly at the feeling (vedanā) and making it a meditation subject, behold, the nature of preparations (saṅkhāras) is understood. All of these are a heap of ripples, a heap of preparations (saṅkhāras). Feeling (vedanā) is not a single thing.

That is why the Buddha pointed out, as you have often heard, "vedanā bubbuḷūpamā" (feeling is like a water bubble). Water bubbles are indeed directly experienced—just as form was said to be like a lump of foam, feeling (vedanā) is like raindrops falling during a rainy season. They do not last long. When water falls from the roof, water bubbles arise and pass away, arise and pass away. It is through that understanding that impermanence (aniccatā) is realized in the contemplation of feeling (vedanānupassanā). When it is directly realized that "all this is impermanent (anicca)," it is then that the lineage of insight knowledges (vipassanā-ñāṇa) properly emerges within the mind. For we usually consider only arising and passing away. Between the two ends of arising and passing away, there is that alteration (aññathābhāva) we mentioned. A change. That change is then caught next, like ripples in various ways. That is one thing. How is it caught? Behold, in the form of Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). Attention (manasikāra) is directed; to that attention is caught the minute feelings (vedanās), perceptions (saññā), intentions (cetanā), contact (phassa), and attention (manasikāra). These phenomena of Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) keep arising and passing away. The realization that "there is no 'I'" arises through that. That is how contemplation of feeling (vedanānupassanā) progresses in insight (vipassanā).

We cannot even imagine how Venerable Uttara did this, sitting on a stake in that manner, but the path of contemplation of feeling (vedanānupassanā) is to be practiced in this way. Indeed, we do not need to invite or bring feelings (vedanās) into our lives. These feelings (vedanās) that naturally come are quite sufficient for our meditation on suffering (dukkha). In our daily lives, we have to experience various feelings (vedanās). Yet, we do not know their meditative value.

That is why on one occasion the Buddha delivered a valuable discourse: "Monks, the uninstructed worldling (assutavā puthujjana) experiences pleasant feelings (vedanā), painful feelings, and neither-painful-nor-pleasant feelings. The instructed noble disciple (sutavā ariyasāvaka) also experiences pleasant feelings, painful feelings, and neither-painful-nor-pleasant feelings. What, monks, is the difference between the two?" This was a question asked of the monks. The monks replied: "Venerable Sir, Blessed One," on such occasions they say a special phrase, "Blessed One, our teachings are rooted in the Blessed One, guided by the Blessed One. Please, Blessed One, clarify the matter for us. Having heard it from the Blessed One, we, the monks, will retain it." In short, they did not give an answer. They expected the answer from the Buddha himself. This was probably because it was a deep question. Then, behold, the Buddha himself declares, "This is the reason." The Buddha presents that when a painful feeling (vedanā) arises in that uninstructed worldling, the ordinary person who does not know the Dhamma...

...they weep, wail, beat their breast, become bewildered, and grieve. Through this, the uninstructed worldling generates another feeling (vedanā). The Buddha gives a simile for this: "Suppose a person is struck by an arrow. After being struck by that arrow, another arrow comes and strikes them." In the same way, this uninstructed worldling adds mental suffering to physical suffering. Thus, they experience two arrow strikes. That uninstructed worldling, because of that painful feeling (vedanā), reacts in that manner—in reaction to it.

Similarly, another weakness shown regarding the uninstructed worldling is that when a painful feeling (vedanā) arises, they develop aversion (paṭigha), a friction, or hatred, either towards a person or towards the feeling (vedanā). Let's say, they get angry even with their own body, thinking, "Where is this body letting me meditate?" Here, we can understand that because the Buddha's words reminded the novice monk Uttara, "Uttara, this is the force of a past kamma. Endure it, reflect on it, and tolerate (adhivāsetu) it," it must have helped him. Otherwise, suppose we were in that position at that moment. When impaled on a baseless charge, one would first of all develop a great aversion (paṭigha) towards the Brahmin Vassakāra, thinking, "Why was such a punishment given to innocent me?" At that moment, because the Buddha connected it to kamma, saying, "This is something that must be endured, a past kamma," that too must have helped Venerable Uttara to direct his mind to the contemplation of feeling (vedanānupassanā). But in an ordinary person, it generates aversion (paṭigha). They do not think of it as coming from a force of kamma. Instead, they develop aversion (paṭigha). That is the other aspect.

Next, there is more. When a painful feeling (vedanā) arises, the uninstructed worldling wishes for a pleasant feeling (vedanā). What is the reason for this? To the uninstructed worldling, the only way to escape from painful feeling (vedanā) appears to be pleasant feeling (vedanā). No other path of liberation is seen. When an ordinary person experiences a painful feeling (vedanā), as a remedy, they run after pleasant feelings (vedanās). That is why we say that the ordinary worldling is engaged in a seesaw ride between suffering (dukkha) and pleasure (sukha). As much as suffering (dukkha) comes, they hope for pleasure. But this is not a solution. Thus, one weakness shown by the Buddha regarding that worldling is adding another arrow to the first arrow—through weeping, wailing, beating the breast, and grieving over that feeling (vedanā), in addition to the physical pain. The second point is that an aversion (paṭigha) arises within this person towards the feeling (vedanā). As a result of this, the Buddha points out, the underlying tendency of aversion (paṭighānusaya) is deposited in the mind. Aversion, hatred. That too is a bad thing. Next, in place of that, by running after pleasant feelings (vedanās) as a way of escaping painful feeling (vedanā), the underlying tendency to lust/attachment (rāgānusaya) is acquired. Thus, the Buddha first points out these shortcomings in the uninstructed person.

Next, he shows how the instructed noble disciple who has heard the Dhamma acts. When a feeling (vedanā) arises, the disciple who has gained Dhamma knowledge does not weep, wail, or beat their breast in that manner. They do not add mental pain to physical pain. Next, the noble disciple does not develop aversion (paṭigha) towards it. There is no conflict with the feeling (vedanā). Feeling (vedanā) is something natural. Regarding this, the Great Arahant Sāriputta expresses an amazing statement about patience (khanti). Venerable Sāriputta is a monk who gave a highly remarkable example of this. He is also a monk who delivered valuable discourses regarding the meditation subjects of the elements: earth (pathavī), water (āpo), fire (tejo), and air (vāyo).

On one occasion, he says: "Now, suppose someone strikes your body, say, with a stick." In that case, the Great Arahant Sāriputta does not look at the person who struck with the stick. He looks at his own body. Why? Because the body is made in such a way that if struck with a stick, it hurts. If struck with a stick, it hurts. Someone might laugh, thinking this is humorous. But let us think for a moment: what if this body were made of iron? Then that stick would bounce back and strike that very person, wouldn't it? But this body is at fault. Let us think for a moment: we have a wound. We put a bandage on it and go to a meeting. We collide and clash with everyone we bump into—but it is our wound!

The Buddha declared that this body is entirely a wound, a boil, a disease, an affliction. Therefore, one should not clash either with the stick or with the person who swung the stick. It is the nature of this body. Such was the attitude of the Great Arahant Sāriputta—to us, hearing this sounds like a joke. But the practitioner of insight (vipassanā) has to think in that very way. We should not clash with that feeling (vedanā). Sometimes, it might be an unseen force of past kamma. We might be harassed innocently. We might be arrested and subjected to harassment by some severe enemy. Yet, there may be some force of kamma underneath it. If we react to it without understanding this, we pile up more kamma. But the practitioner of insight makes it an opportunity; they make this feeling (vedanā) a meditation subject. They make both a meditation subject. A short path to Nibbāna. A difficult path, but a short path.

Because the perception of self (attā-saññā) is bound up with feeling (vedanā). It is also there that it must be broken. This drive to take things as "I am," as "me." Now, "I am" is indeed what is found in the dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi), the conceit "I am" (asmimāna) which is rooted in "I am"—the proposition "I am." Usually, the fundamental proposition of existence (bhava) is "I am." But one has to elaborate "I am" a bit further: "I exist" or "this I am." Now, taking one by one from form, feeling (vedanā), etc., one says "this I am." Thus, on whatever occasion existence is brought up or shown, one directly has to say "this I am." But in the beginning, it is in dependence on that very feeling (vedanā) that the sense of "I" and "mine" arises. Why? Because here, feeling (vedanā) is something arisen from causes and conditions in that manner.

Venerable Sāriputta was struck with a stick. The body is something that swells or hurts when struck by a stick. That is all there is to the story. If the body were an iron thing, none of that would happen. That is how one must think if looking from that perspective. The noble disciple does not go into aversion (paṭigha) in that way. When a painful feeling (vedanā) arises, the noble disciple does not chase after pleasant feelings (vedanās) as a solution. Why? Because that disciple knows there is another path of release from painful feeling (vedanā), a path to Nibbāna. By making that small painful feeling (vedanā) the object, sometimes the entire suffering of saṃsāra can be brought to an end. This is done through the understanding of these feelings (vedanās). To help with this, the Buddha has shown these feelings (vedanās) in manifold ways: as arising, as passing away, their satisfaction (assāda), their danger (ādīnava), and the escape (nissaraṇa) from them—by regarding it as an opportunity to gain the correct understanding of all these, making it a meditation subject. Behold, that is how the Buddha shows the difference between the uninstructed worldling and the instructed noble disciple on the question of feeling (vedanā).

Thus, it is mentioned in many ways in the Dhamma. According to the Buddha's words, we must reflect on pleasant feeling (vedanā)—now, pleasant feeling is indeed what everyone wishes for. The Buddha has pointed out to see that too as suffering (dukkha). Why is that? It is mentioned in the Dhamma that these feelings of pleasure, pain, and neither-painful-nor-pleasant are classified in this way. Regarding pleasant feeling (vedanā), it is said: "sukhā ṭhitibhāve, vipariṇāmadukkhā"—pleasant feeling is pleasant while it persists, but painful when it changes. Painful when it changes.

Therefore, when we invite this pleasant feeling (vedanā), we must at the same time be prepared to accept the suffering (dukkha) that comes from its change. That is why, in properly considering feeling (vedanā), the Buddha tells the noble disciple to see it in this way: "yo sukhaṃ dukkhato addakkhi"—he who has seen pleasant feeling as suffering (dukkha). Since it brings suffering (dukkha), even though we invite pleasant feeling (vedanā), what comes with it is the emptiness and suffering (dukkha) when it ends. We know how a small child blows soap bubbles and runs after them because they look beautiful. How far can they run? In the end, they disappear without a trace. Such is the way with pleasant feeling (vedanā). That is why it is seen as suffering (dukkha).

Next, painful feeling (vedanā) is directly said to be seen as a stake. Painful feeling (vedanā) is indeed a stake. So, a stake must be understood as a stake. Next, neither-painful-nor-pleasant, neutral feeling (vedanā). It is peaceful. It is peaceful, yet it too is impermanent (anicca). Why? Because between the seesaw of pleasure and pain lies this neither-painful-nor-pleasant feeling (vedanā). It too is not permanent. Defilements (kilesa) are present there as well. That is why the Buddha rejected even the levels of absorption (jhāna) attained with the help of neither-painful-nor-pleasant feeling (vedanā), and went beyond them. It is the state of completely stepping off the seesaw regarding this feeling (vedanā). This seesaw ride is entirely based on the conceit "I am" (asmimāna). Then, feeling (vedanā) is seen simply as feeling (vedanā). That is what is called contemplation of feeling (vedanānupassanā).

The Buddha showed how to approach the knowledge of things as they are (yathābhūta-ñāṇa). Breaking the coarse level of the grip of "I" and "mine" at the stage of abandoning the dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi), and then gradually—that is what is found in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta. "Kāye kāyānupassī"—contemplating body as body. "Vedanāsu vedanānupassī"—contemplating feeling (vedanā) as feeling (vedanā). Why is it said to look at them in that way? What is "contemplation" (anupassanā)? Contemplation (anupassanā) means understanding their true nature, removing the notion of "I" and "mine" as "this is mine, this is another's." Whether it is one's own feeling (vedanā) or another's, feeling (vedanā) is just feeling (vedanā). It is to see it in this manner that we are trained in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta. You have heard the term "bahiddhā" (externally). The Buddha could have said "one's own" and "another's." But there is no "one's own" and "another's" here. There is only "internally" (ajjhatta) and "externally" (bahiddhā). The story of internal and external. What is internal is called "mine." What is external is called "another's." But in both, there is the same nature of Dhamma. It is found in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta concerning the body, the mind, feeling (vedanā), and mind-objects (dhamma). It is in reliance on these very things that we must progress in insight (vipassanā). The main thing is mindfulness and clear comprehension (sati-sampajañña). Next is radical attention (yoniso manasikāra). That is the most important thing. The seed of wisdom is within all of us. It only needs to be awakened. That is what radical attention (yoniso manasikāra) is. The Buddha brought to light that way of looking at the world. That is what is mentioned as vipallāsa (distortions/perversions). We said that the world has a perverted view; the Buddha points out not just one, but four perverted views/distortions (vipallāsa):

- Regarding the impermanent (anicca) as permanent.

- Regarding that which is suffering (dukkha) as pleasant.

- Regarding that which is not-self (anattā) as self.

- Regarding the foul as beautiful.

These four perceptions (saññā) are indeed shown as the distortions (vipallāsa-dhamma). The Buddha declared that this perversity exists in three levels within us: distortion of perception (saññā-vipallāsa), distortion of mind/thought (citta-vipallāsa), and distortion of view (diṭṭhi-vipallāsa). There is a distortion of perception (saññā-vipallāsa) that takes the impermanent (anicca) as permanent. Saññā means recognition/perception. One forms a perception (saññā) that it is permanent. Based on that perception (saññā), a stream of thoughts arises, hopes and wishes are formed. That is the distortion of mind/thought (citta-vipallāsa). Thus, starting from a distorted perception (saññā), it leads to distorted thoughts. Once those thoughts are firmly established, they become a view/dogma. An unshakeable view. That is what is called the distortion of view (diṭṭhi-vipallāsa).

Thus, the Buddha taught that these distorted phenomena (vipallāsa-dhamma) affect the world in three ways: saññā-vipallāsa, citta-vipallāsa, and diṭṭhi-vipallāsa. It is the same regarding those four: "anicce nicca-saññino"—whether it is regarding the impermanent (anicca) as permanent, regarding what is suffering (dukkha) as pleasant, regarding what is not-self (anattā) as self, or regarding the foul as beautiful. They arise at the level of perception (saññā), become established as intricate and fancy thoughts, and finally arise as a view (diṭṭhi). It is within this perverted state that the world exists.

But why did the Buddha bring this to light for the world? To make a beginning. Through unwise attention (ayoniso manasikāra) and radical attention (yoniso manasikāra), the Buddha has placed us on the path of Dhamma realization. From that point on, the work is ours. The journey from there on is insight (vipassanā). Developing some level of concentration through tranquility (samatha) meditation, and gaining the capacity to practice mindfulness and clear comprehension (satisampajañña) in a more advanced manner, gradually—it is nothing strange. It is within this very five aggregates of grasping/holding (pañcupādānakkhandha) that we see—we must recall that noble word of the Buddha once again: "Imasmiññeva byāmamatte kaḷevare sasaññimhi samanake lokañca paññāpemi, lokasamudayañca lokanirodhañca lokanirodhagāminiñca paṭipadaṃ." That is the great word of the Buddha. If we think about it as a summary, that is what we have to take. What is the Buddha declaring there? "Monks, I declare that within this fathom-long carcass (kaḷevara)"—"carcass" usually means a dead body, a corpse. But here, the word "carcass" (kaḷevara) is used as "with perception (sasaññimhi) and mind (samanake)" within this carcass. It cannot be called a dead carcass because perception (saññā) and mind are present there. Yet, "carcass" is used to make us think. If there were no perception (saññā) and mind, this would indeed be like a corpse. Like a tree or a plant. But the Buddha says: "Within this very fathom-long carcass, endowed with perception (saññā) and mind, I declare the world, the origin of the world, the cessation of the world, and the path leading to the cessation of the world."

These two words, perception (saññā) and mind (manas), can be made even more meaningful through the analysis we have done so far. Why did the Buddha bring perception (saññā) and mind into this? They help us. Even though we blamed perception (saññā) on one hand as distorted perception, as distorted phenomena (vipallāsa-dhamma), that is the very thing we utilize for insight (vipassanā). The perception of permanent (nicca-saññā) is not good; in its place, the perception of impermanent (anicca-saññā). Those of you who have read discourses like the Girimānanda Sutta know that the Buddha has introduced a series of perceptions (saññā) to be developed by the noble disciples: anicca-saññā (perception of impermanence), asubha-saññā (perception of foulness), anatta-saññā (perception of non-self), ādīnava-saññā (perception of danger), pahāna-saññā (perception of abandoning), virāga-saññā (perception of dispassion), nirodha-saññā (perception of cessation)—all of these are perceptions (saññā). Behold, the perceptions (saññā) to be developed. Thus, in place of the perceptions (saññā) that exist in the world, that proliferate saṃsāra, in place of distorted perceptions (saññā), undistorted perceptions (saññā) are practiced according to the Buddha's Dhamma. That indeed is the path.

Now, it was said here that it is found within this fathom-long body. There, "world" meant nothing but this story of suffering (dukkha). Just as suffering, its origin, its cessation (nirodha), and the path to its cessation are spoken of, so were the world and the origin of the world. At times, the world itself was meant as suffering (dukkha). "Dukkhe loko patiṭṭhito..." (The world is established on suffering...) The world and suffering are mentioned as one, like two halves of a folding lid. What is said of this world is exactly what is said of suffering (dukkha). According to the Buddha's words, within this fathom-long body, there is suffering (dukkha), the origin of suffering (dukkha-samudaya), the cessation of suffering (dukkha-nirodha), and the path leading to the cessation of suffering (dukkha-nirodha-gāminī paṭipadā). When we say "path," it is this insight (vipassanā) path we are discussing now. To that path belongs this story of perceptions (saññā)—the perceptions (saññā) of anicca, asubha, ādīnava, etc., are merely a mirage. Yet, it is through a certain level of perception (saññā), a Dhamma-conforming level of perception (saññā), that we proceed toward realization to escape that mirage.

Next, mind (manas) is mentioned. Attention (manasikāra). Unwise attention (ayoniso-manasikāra). So far in saṃsāra, we have been led by Māra through unwise attention (ayoniso-manasikāra). Through incorrect reflection, the reflection of the dog on the footbridge is what we have carried for so long in saṃsāra. The Buddha has shown that through proper reflection, radical attention (yoniso-manasikāra), which helps to realize things as they are, is awakened. Unwise attention (ayoniso-manasikāra) means forgetting the place where something arose and running after it, like a deer running after a mirage. Radical attention (yoniso-manasikāra) means targeting the place where something arises and turning back towards that side. It is like a journey of returning back home. Thus, just as the deer runs and runs after the mirage until it dies of exhaustion without ever reaching it, the world runs for a long time seeking the end of suffering in saṃsāra. Yet, only suffering (dukkha) is encountered. Behold, the Buddha presented radical attention (yoniso manasikāra) to come to the place where these arise. Feeling (vedanā)—it starts from contact (phassa). Identify those phenomena—the phenomena of Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). That is where radical attention (yoniso) begins. Dependent on consciousness (viññāṇa), Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) exists. Dependent on Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa), consciousness (viññāṇa) exists. That is where we finally arrive. If, at some point, consciousness (viññāṇa) is understood, Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) becomes understood. If, in some way, Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) is understood, consciousness (viññāṇa) becomes understood. Right there is liberation from saṃsāra. This indeed is the Buddha's word.

On this valuable Uposatha day, having undertaken a valuable virtue (sīla), I hope that by doing so at this moment, you have gathered those Dhamma portions that assist your meditation, that help your insight (vipassanā), and particularly relate to the contemplation of feeling (vedanānupassanā).

If this merit of listening to the Dhamma, as well as this way of thinking relevant to one's own meditation, has helped you draw closer to Nibbāna, then relying on that power of merit, may this power of merit be a supportive condition to achieve peace by attaining the paths and fruits of Stream-entry (sotāpatti), Once-returning (sakadāgāmi), Non-returning (anāgāmi), and Arahantship as quickly as possible within this very life, escaping from the suffering (dukkha) of saṃsāra such as birth (jāti), decay and death (jarāmaraṇa), sickness, and pain, and attaining the supreme deathless Nibbāna. Reflect in this manner.

Likewise, if any beings from the lowest Avīci hell to the highest Akaniṭṭha heaven wish to rejoice in the merits gained from this Dhamma sermon and Dhamma listening, may that rejoicing be a supportive condition for them to attain peace by reaching the supreme deathless Nibbāna through whichever Bodhi they aspire to. Make this aspiration.

From:

Ratana Sutta (Sn 2.1) from the Sutta Nipāta

Dear Listeners,

Taking refuge in the Triple Gem is a search for the shelter of the highly powerful Triple Gem. The boundless qualities of this Triple Gem—the Buddha, Dhamma, and Saṅgha—are so potent that they can form the very foundation of an Act of Truth (Saccakiriya). This is made beautifully clear in the Ratana Sutta, which you all frequently recite. The verse we have selected as our theme today comes from the latter part of this Ratana Sutta, a discourse that faithful Buddhists often utilize as a protective chant (paritta) and refuge in times of adversity.

According to the commentaries, the origin story of the Ratana Sutta lies in the city of Vesālī, which was struck by a threefold fear: the fear of famine, the fear of non-human spirits, and the fear of pestilence. To dispel these fears and bring peace and blessing, the Teacher of the Three Worlds, the Buddha, delivered this discourse. It is recorded in the scriptures that during the time of the Buddha, Vesālī was an exceptionally prosperous kingdom in Jambudīpa, governed very righteously and systematically as a republic. However, at one point, a severe drought occurred, leading to famine.

First, the poor and destitute began to die. The citizens threw the corpses outside the city walls. As they rotted, non-human spirits gradually entered the city, drawn by the stench. Consequently, even more people began to die. Along with this, the texts mention ahivātaka-roga—which, in modern terms, was an epidemic akin to the plague.

When this threefold fear of famine, non-human spirits, and pestilence gripped the city, the citizens of Vesālī approached their kings to complain. While the rulers gathered in the assembly hall (santhāgāra) to discuss what should be done, they realized that a highly powerful, spiritually potent fully enlightened Buddha, the Tathāgata, had appeared in the world. Concluding that He could be their refuge, the Licchavi kings sent two envoys with gifts to King Bimbisāra in the city of Rājagaha, for at that time, the Buddha was residing at the Veḷuvana monastery. As the story goes, King Bimbisāra remained equanimous about the matter and told them to invite the Buddha themselves. So the envoys went and made their appeal to the Blessed One. Out of great compassion, the Buddha accepted their invitation. There is a detailed account of this journey in the scriptures, but if we dwell on those details, we will not have time to discuss more important matters. In any case, the Buddha arrived in Vesālī. It is said that as soon as He reached the borders of Vesālī, a great rainstorm arose, washing all the rotting corpses into the river. Standing at the city gate, the Buddha then taught the Ratana Sutta and instructed the Venerable Ānanda: "Chant this protective discourse throughout the city, within its walls, accompanied by the Licchavi princes." Accordingly, Venerable Ānanda walked through the city, using this sutta as a protective chant, and thereby dispelled the threefold fear. This, in brief, is the origin story of the Ratana Sutta.

Now, all of you use this Ratana Sutta as a protective chant (paritta). When we analyze the Ratana Sutta, we can understand that it consists of a series of verses in the form of an Act of Truth, based on the profound qualities of the Buddha, Dhamma, and Saṅgha. If it is an Act of Truth, one must understand what the truth is. An Act of Truth performed without properly understanding its true meaning does not yield its full benefits. Therefore, in the explanation we intend to give today, we hope to focus more on the flavor of the meaning (attha rasa) rather than the flavor of the sound (sadda rasa). Many of you may already know these through translations, but to make it as comprehensible as possible to everyone, let us first analyze the meaning of the verses of the Ratana Sutta in sequence, according to the time available, before we delve into our main theme verse.

You all know the first verse:

> Yānīdha bhūtāni samāgatāni,

> bhummāni vā yāni va antalikkhe,

> sabbeva bhūtā sumanā bhavantu,

> atho pi sakkacca suṇantu bhāsitaṃ.

This is an invitation to the spirits: "Whatever spirits are gathered here, whether terrestrial (dwelling on the earth) or celestial (dwelling in the sky), may all those spirits be happy-minded (joyful), and let them listen attentively to what is spoken."

> Tasmā hi bhūtā nisāmetha sabbe, > mettaṃ karotha mānusiyā pajāya, > divā ca ratto ca haranti ye baliṃ, > tasmā hi ne rakkhatha appamattā.

"Therefore, O spirits, listen all of you! Show loving-kindness (mettā) to the human generation who bring you offerings day and night. Therefore, protect them diligently, without negligence." From this point on, the actual Act of Truth begins.

> Yaṃ kiñci vittaṃ idha vā huraṃ vā, > saggesu vā yaṃ ratanaṃ paṇītaṃ,

> na no samaṃ atthi tathāgatena,

> idamapi buddhe ratanaṃ paṇītaṃ,

> etena saccena suvatthi hotu.

"Whatever treasure there is in this world or in other worlds, or whatever exquisite jewel there is in the heavens, there is none equal to the Tathāgata. In the Buddha is this precious jewel; by this truth, may there be well-being." This is the Act of Truth concerning the qualities of the Buddha.

> Khayaṃ virāgaṃ amataṃ paṇītaṃ, > sakyamunī samāhito nadhigā,

> na tena dhammena samatthi kiñci,

> idamapi dhamme ratanaṃ paṇītaṃ,

> etena saccena suvatthi hotu.

Khayaṃ, virāgaṃ, amataṃ, paṇītaṃ—all these are terms applied to Nibbāna. As you may have heard, Nibbāna is described as the destruction of craving (taṇhakkhaya), dispassion (virāga), cessation (nirodha), and Nibbāna. Khaya refers to the nature of destroying craving (taṇhā), virāga is another name for Nibbāna, and amataṃ paṇītaṃ refers to the exquisite Deathless state. What the Sakyan Sage, concentrated in mind, attained—there is nothing equal to that Dhamma. This is the precious jewel in the Dhamma; by this truth, may there be well-being!

> Yaṃ buddhaseṭṭho parivaṇṇayī suciṃ, > samādhina-ānantarikaññamāhu,

> samādhina tena samo na vijjati,

> idamapi dhamme ratanaṃ paṇītaṃ,

> etena saccena suvatthi hotu.

"That pure concentration which the supreme Buddha praised, which the wise call 'immediate' (ānantarika)—there is no concentration equal to that concentration.

This too is the precious jewel in the Dhamma; by this truth, may there be well-being!"

Now, this point requires some explanation. Here, the text is referring to the Concentration of the Path (magga-samādhi). The pure concentration praised by the Buddha, which the Buddhas and Arahants call the ānantarika concentration (immediate concentration), is such that no other concentration can equal it. This refers to the supramundane (lokuttara) level. Regarding the supramundane Concentration of the Path, as you know, in the Noble Eightfold Path, all eight path factors arise in a highly powerful manner in a single mind-moment. That is the supramundane Path. Immediately after that Path, one falls into the Fruition (phala). That is why it is called 'immediate' (ānantarika) concentration. The Path is immediately followed by its Fruition without any interval. This concentration is unequal to any mundane concentration. That is the meaning of "there is no concentration equal to that"—it refers to this Concentration of the Path. This describes the aspect of the Path.

> Ye puggalā aṭṭha sataṃ pasatthā, > cattāri etāni yugāni honti,

> te dakkhiṇeyyā sugatassa sāvakā,

> etesu dinnāni mahapphalāni,

> idamapi saṅghe ratanaṃ paṇītaṃ,

> etena saccena suvatthi hotu.

"The eight individuals praised by the virtuous, they constitute four pairs. They are the disciples of the Sugata, worthy of offerings; gifts given to them yield great fruit. This too is the precious jewel in the Saṅgha; by this truth, may there be well-being!" These eight individuals form four pairs. They are the true disciples of the Sugata who are worthy of gifts and offerings. Giving to this Saṅgha yields great fruits. This is the precious jewel in the Saṅgha.

> Ye suppayuttā manasā daḷhena, > nikkāmino gotama-sāsanamhi,

> te pattipattā amataṃ vigayha,

> laddhā mudhā nibbutiṃ bhuñjamānā,

> idamapi saṅghe ratanaṃ paṇītaṃ,

> etena saccena suvatthi hotu.

This describes those members of the Saṅgha: "Those who, with a firm mind and strong determination, are well-applied in the dispensation of Gotama, free from sensory desire, having attained their goal, have merged into the Deathless, and enjoy the extinguishment (Nibbāna) obtained for free. This too is the precious jewel in the Saṅgha; by this truth, may there be well-being!"

This refers to those who are engaged in this dispensation with firm effort. They have attained Arahantship and enjoy "the extinguishment obtained for free" (laddhā mudhā nibbutiṃ). Mudhā means without any expense, completely free. In the world, all other coolings of desires, such as craving, require one to spend money to acquire things before they can be appeased. But this extinguishment is obtained by letting go of everything. It is a cooling that comes naturally; hence it is called "free" (mudhā). Having obtained this extinguishment for free, they experience and enjoy it through the attainment of the Fruition of Arahantship (arahatta-phala-samāpatti). This is presented as a quality of the Saṅgha.

> Yathindakhīlo paṭhaviṃ sito siyā, > catubbhi vātehi asampakampiyo,

> tathūpamaṃ sappurisaṃ vadāmi,

> yo ariyasaccāni avecca passati,

> idamapi saṅghe ratanaṃ paṇītaṃ,

> etena saccena suvatthi hotu.

"Just as a city-pillar (indakhīla)—which in ancient times was a firm stone post erected at the city gates—firmly planted in the earth, is unshaken by the winds blowing from the four quarters, so do I call that virtuous person—the Noble disciple who has attained Stream-entry—who sees the Noble Truths with wisdom. This too is the precious jewel in the Saṅgha; by this truth, may there be well-being!" This compares the Noble disciple to the indakhīla.

> Ye ariyasaccāni vibhāvayanti, > gambhīrapaññena sudesitāni,

> kiñcāpi te honti bhusappamattā,

> na te bhavaṃ aṭṭhamaṃ ādiyanti,

> idamapi saṅghe ratanaṃ paṇītaṃ,

> etena saccena suvatthi hotu.

"Those who clearly comprehend the Noble Truths, well-taught by the One of deep wisdom—even if they are highly negligent, they do not take an eighth becoming (bhava). This too is the precious jewel in the Saṅgha; by this truth, may there be well-being!" This refers to the Stream-enterer (sotāpanna), those who have comprehended the Four Noble Truths for the first time, or who have seen Nibbāna from afar, having directly understood the Four Noble Truths taught by the Buddha.

There is something to be explained here. Even if they fall into great negligence, they will not undergo an eighth becoming (bhava). There is an analysis regarding the Stream-enterer. Some who become Stream-enterers do not advance further within that lifetime. As you know, individuals like Visākhā are called pamāda-sekha (negligent disciples on the path of training). They became Stream-enterers but did not progress to the stages of Once-returner, etc., in that very life.

When such individuals pass away, they fall into three categories. Let us say they are divided into three groups. The ultimate limit for a Stream-enterer is a maximum of seven lifetimes. That is what is stated here: they will not go to an eighth becoming. A pamāda-sekha who did not attain higher paths and fruits in this life, upon death, is classified by the Buddha into three groups: ekabīji (single-seeded), kolaṅkola (passing from family to family), and sattakkhattuparama (seven times at most). Ekabīji refers to a Stream-enterer who takes only one more birth; these are likely those who have highly developed spiritual faculties such as faith (saddhā). A kolaṅkola Stream-enterer takes two or three more births before ending the suffering of saṃsāra and becoming an Arahant. The sattakkhattuparama is the most negligent among them, taking at most seven more births. It is according to this Dhamma-nature that it is said: na te bhavaṃ aṭṭhamaṃ ādiyanti—they do not take an eighth becoming. This is an absolute truth, and because it is a truth, it forms a powerful Act of Truth.

"Simultaneously with his acquisition of the vision of Stream-entry, three things are abandoned: the dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi), doubt, and whatever clinging to rules and vows (sīlabbata-parāmāsa) there may be. He is also completely freed from the four states of misery (apāya), and is incapable of committing the six heinous crimes..."

You have heard that a Stream-enterer eradicates these three fetters (saṃyojana). This is what is meant here. Furthermore, that person is freed from the four states of misery and is incapable of committing the six abhīṭhāna (heinous crimes). What are these six? Matricide, patricide, murdering an Arahant, maliciously shedding the blood of a Buddha, causing a schism in the Saṅgha, and taking another teacher (proclaiming someone other than the Buddha as one's teacher). A Stream-enterer is incapable of committing these six acts; the Buddha has declared this impossibility. This too is a truth. This is the precious jewel in the Saṅgha; by this truth, may there be well-being!

"Even if he should commit some evil deed by body, speech, or mind, he is incapable of concealing it. This incapability of one who has seen Nibbāna has been declared by the Buddha." This too is the precious jewel in the Saṅgha; by this truth, may there be well-being!

> idamapi buddhe ratanaṃ paṇītaṃ,

> etena saccena suvatthi hotu.

Here, the Buddha gives a beautiful simile: "Just as a forest grove with blossoming tops in the first month of the summer season, such is the sublime Dhamma he taught, leading to Nibbāna, for the supreme benefit of all." The Buddha used this simile to describe the Dhamma of scripture (pariyatti-dhamma) that He taught. This too is the precious jewel in the Buddha; by this truth, may there be well-being!

> Varo varaññū varado varāharo, > anuttaro dhammavaraṃ adesayī,

> idamapi buddhe ratanaṃ paṇītaṃ,

> etena saccena suvatthi hotu.

Varo means excellent, used here as an epithet for the Buddha. "The excellent One, the knower of the excellent (Nibbāna), the giver of the excellent, the bringer of the excellent, the peerless One taught the excellent Dhamma. This too is the precious jewel in the Buddha; by this truth, may there be well-being!"

Now we come to the verse we selected as our theme:

> Khīṇaṃ purāṇaṃ navaṃ natthi sambhavaṃ,

> Virattacittā āyatike bhavasmiṃ,

> Te khīṇabījā avirūḷhichandā,

> Nibbanti dhīrā yathāyaṃ padīpo,

> Idamapi saṅghe ratanaṃ paṇītaṃ,

> Etena saccena suvatthi hotu.

"Whatever old there was is destroyed; there is no new arising. Their minds are detached from future becoming." This is said of the Arahants. Their minds are free from desire for future becoming (āyatike bhavasmiṃ). "They, with seeds destroyed..."—we will explain these seeds later—"and desires not growing, those wise ones are extinguished just like this lamp. This too is the precious jewel in the Saṅgha; by this truth, may there be well-being!"

The three verses that follow are generally verses of homage. According to the commentaries, after this recital, Sakka, the king of devas, along with the gathered spirits, chanted these three verses to pay homage to the Triple Gem:

> Yānīdha bhūtāni samāgatāni,

> bhummāni vā yāni va antalikkhe,

> tathāgataṃ devamanussapūjitaṃ,

> buddhaṃ namassāma suvatthi hotu.

"Whatever spirits are gathered here, whether terrestrial or celestial, let us pay homage to the Tathāgata, the Buddha, who is honored by gods and humans. May there be well-being!"

> Yānīdha bhūtāni samāgatāni,

> bhummāni vā yāni va antalikkhe,

> tathāgataṃ devamanussapūjitaṃ,

> dhammaṃ namassāma suvatthi hotu.

"Whatever spirits are gathered here, whether terrestrial or celestial, let us pay homage to the Tathāgata's Dhamma, which is honored by gods and humans. May there be well-being!"

And the third:

> Yānīdha bhūtāni samāgatāni,

> bhummāni vā yāni va antalikkhe,

> tathāgataṃ devamanussapūjitaṃ,

> saṅghaṃ namassāma suvatthi hotu.

"Whatever spirits are gathered here, whether terrestrial or celestial, let us pay homage to the Tathāgata's Saṅgha, which is honored by gods and humans. May there be well-being!"

What we have just discussed is the Ratana Sutta. As mentioned before, this is a protective chant based on an Act of Truth. Since some people question whether there is room for such practices within this dispensation, we must address this. The Buddha, on many occasions, has declared the supreme power of the qualities of the Triple Gem, as in discourses like the Aggappasāda Sutta. He states that among all living beings—whether footless, two-footed, four-footed, many-footed, with form or formless, conscious, unconscious, or neither-conscious-nor-unconscious—the Tathāgata, the Fully Enlightened Buddha, is supreme. If anyone places faith and confidence in the Tathāgata, they place confidence in the supreme.

"For those who have confidence in the supreme, the result is supreme." If one places confidence in the Buddha, the supreme Tathāgata, the result of that confidence is also supreme. Similarly, He states:

"Bhikkhus, among all prepared/conditioned (saṅkhata) things, the Noble Eightfold Path is declared supreme." If anyone places confidence in the Noble Eightfold Path, they place confidence in the supreme, and its fruits and results are likewise supreme.

Furthermore, He states that among all things, whether prepared or unprepared/unconditioned (saṅkhata or asaṅkhata), the Unprepared (asaṅkhata)—which is dispassion (virāga), Nibbāna—is supreme. If one places confidence in Nibbāna, the supreme, its benefits are also supreme.

Then He states that among all groups, assemblies, or communities in the world, the Saṅgha of the Tathāgata is supreme. If one places confidence in this supreme Saṅgha, the result is supreme. Thus, placing faith and confidence in the Triple Gem, as well as in the truth of the Path and the truth of Nibbāna, is declared to be immensely beneficial.

You might also be familiar with the Dhajagga Paritta from your chant books. The Buddha did not teach this protective discourse for things like winning lawsuits. He taught it for the Saṅgha who, in their efforts to attain Nibbāna, dwell in forests, under trees, or in empty huts (araññagato vā, rukkhamūlagato vā, suññāgāragato vā). If, during their meditation, they experience fear, trepidation, or hair-standing-on-end (bhayaṃ vā chambhitattaṃ vā lomahaṃso vā), the Buddha instructed them: "At that moment, recollect Me" (mameva tasmiṃ samaye anussareyyātha). How should they recollect Him? You know the formula: Itipi so bhagavā arahaṃ sammāsambuddho... Thus, if any danger, fear, or trepidation arises for the meditating monks in the forest, at the root of a tree, or in an empty hut, the Buddha has permitted them to recollect Him. By doing so, their fear, trepidation, and hair-standing-on-end will be dispelled.

The Buddha further states: "If you cannot recollect Me, then recollect the Dhamma." This refers to the Dhamma endowed with six qualities (such as svākkhāto...). Through that recollection, the fear, trepidation, and hair-standing-on-end will disappear. "If you cannot recollect the Dhamma, then recollect My Saṅgha, the Saṅgha of the Tathāgata" (such as supaṭipanno...). Then, too, your fear will be dispelled. From this, we can see that the Dhajagga Paritta is indeed something that can be recollected for protection.

Although you use the word paritta (pirit), you might not know its etymology. Paritrāṇa is made of pari, meaning "around" or "from all sides", and trāṇa, meaning "protection". Thus, it means protection from all sides. It provided protection all around the city of Vesālī. "From all sides" can refer to various seen and unseen forces, since Vesālī was afflicted by diseases as well as non-human spirits. Similarly, meditating monks can encounter such unusual disturbances. The Buddha approved this protective chanting to provide comprehensive protection from all sides.

Furthermore, it is our duty to preserve this paritta that the Buddha taught for our protection. Why do we say this? Because these discourses were preserved with great difficulty over centuries by the lineage of reciters (bhāṇaka) through memorization. Today, due to various modern influences, they are sometimes caught up in musical trends, and the protective chants are being diluted. The flavor of the sound (sadda rasa) is emphasized at the expense of the flavor of the meaning (attha rasa). Such a thing is happening in society, and many of you are drawn to it. There is a slight excuse for being drawn to music under the guise of listening to paritta, but what actually happens is that the meaning is entirely lost and forgotten. The flavor of meaning is destroyed. The Saṅgha preserved these chants with great difficulty, staying awake at night, through famines and droughts, carefully maintaining the distinction between aspirated and unaspirated sounds. Now, in an era where we have all kinds of recording devices, if we corrupt this heritage, how can we justify it?

This is why, dear devotees, the Ratana Sutta is specifically an Act of Truth. To recollect the qualities of the Buddha, one must first possess faith in those qualities. These are not mere magic spells. In some other religions, like Hinduism, as you may know, they have mantras in the Atharvaveda and so forth. When you look at them, they have no meaning; they are just a string of sounds. Yet they believe there is some occult power in them. The Buddha generally rejected such things. Instead, He presented something meaningful. We have previously explained to you the rich meaning behind the Metta Sutta.

We have also explained how the Mahā-maṅgala Sutta was made meaningful. By discarding the superstitious views of that era—such as things seen as auspicious (diṭṭha-maṅgala), heard as auspicious (suta-maṅgala), or felt as auspicious (muta-maṅgala)—the Buddha presented a set of meaningful auspicious actions showing how one can cultivate one's own well-being and establish self-protection. In this Ratana Sutta, even unseen forces are subdued by the power and boundless qualities of the Triple Gem. Specifically, what is highlighted here is the power of truth. This Act of Truth is a force that exists in the universe not only during the time of a Buddha's appearance. As we learn from the Jātaka stories, the Act of Truth is a cosmic force that operates even during eras when no Buddha is present. Truth is a force; there can be no action without energy. If you perform an Act of Truth without even knowing what the truth is, then there is no real Act of Truth. That is why we have taken so much trouble to bring out the meaning of these verses, which many of you recite so fluently from memory.

Because of modern trends, the musical sound is overemphasized. Sometimes, the chants are recited in a way that the meaning of the words is completely erased. We do not say this to attack anyone in the dispensation, but out of a deep desire to preserve this dispensation.

If you, too, encourage such trends, the flavor of meaning and the profound depth of these teachings will be suppressed. You can now appreciate what a vast ocean of deep meaning lies within this Ratana Sutta. These additional explanations were meant to clarify this.

Now, to elaborate further on the verse we selected as our theme: Khīṇaṃ purāṇaṃ navaṃ natthi sambhavaṃ—"The old is destroyed, there is no new arising." When we speak of "the old" as past kamma, some might ask: if past kamma is destroyed, how do the Buddha and the Arahants experience the results of kamma? Some even claim that the Buddha and Arahants do not experience the results of kamma at all. However, there is a very deep point here. The Buddha Himself, on one occasion, delivered a discourse to the Saṅgha regarding "New and Old Kamma" (Nava Purāṇa Kamma).

He said: "Bhikkhus, I will teach you new and old kamma." But in His explanation, He first presents old kamma. "What, bhikkhus, is old kamma? The eye is old kamma, prepared (preparations - abhisaṅkhataṃ), willed (volitional activity - abhisañcetayitaṃ), to be felt (sensation/feeling - vedanīyaṃ daṭṭhabbaṃ)." The eye, bhikkhus, is old kamma. It is prepared through kamma, willed through the energy we generated in the past, and it is something to be felt.

Now, think about this. You may have heard of the Venerable Cakkhupāla. At the very moment he attained Arahantship, he lost his eyesight. He became blind due to a past kamma. An even clearer example, which everyone knows, is the Venerable Mahā Moggallāna, who was supreme in psychic power in this Buddha's dispensation. In the very distant past—so distant that it can hardly be measured—he had beaten his own parents to death. Because of that evil kamma, five hundred bandits came and crushed his body to pieces. Just as the Buddha explained regarding the eye, He declared the same for the other sense faculties. As we mentioned: "The eye is old kamma, prepared, willed, to be felt." It is given to us to be felt. You must understand that all six sense faculties—the eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind—have been received by us, as well as by the Buddha and the Arahants, due to the power of past kamma (abhisaṅkhataṃ abhisañcetayitaṃ). And they are "to be felt" (vedanīyaṃ daṭṭhabbaṃ)—we must experience them. This experiencing is the same for both the Buddha and the Arahants. When does this experiencing come to an end? It ends only at the moment of the Arahant's anupādisesa-nibbāna-dhātu (the extinguishment without residue). That is the meaning here.

Some Arahants pass away at the very moment they attain Arahantship; they are called samasīsī (those who attain ending of defilements and life simultaneously). Others must continue to live. Even though the Buddha was requested to live for an aeon, He could not do so. Because of past kamma, He had to undergo severe physical pain in this body. Even if the specific details are not fully recorded in the books, it was due to some past kamma. This is because the eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind are given to us with the mandate: "Go and experience them!" Out of craving (taṇhā) and ignorance, we begged Māra for them, and Māra gave them to us, saying: "Go and experience them!" So we must experience them. The same applies even to the pleasant side. Even the fact that we have to wear spectacles now is due to this. It was given to us to be felt. I mentioned this so that you might understand it. This is how we should understand khīṇaṃ purāṇaṃ—at that final moment, all past kamma is completely exhausted.

Navaṃ natthi sambhavaṃ—"There is no new arising." This means that there is no more kamma to cause a future becoming (bhava) for the Arahants. Having destroyed ignorance, they have seen the stilled nature of preparations (saṅkhāra). By destroying craving (taṇhā)—that is, sensual craving (kāma-taṇhā), craving for becoming (bhava-taṇhā), and craving for non-becoming (vibhava-taṇhā)—they have also destroyed the craving for becoming. Therefore, they do not delight in becoming (bhave na rajjati); they do not wish for a future becoming. That is why there is no new arising. Virattacittā āyatike bhavasmiṃ—they have no desire for a future becoming; their minds are detached from it.

Now, some people do not like our way of explaining the Dhamma because they think: "Then the Arahant is annihilated, there is nothing left." But if there is no craving (taṇhā), why should we force another life upon the Arahant? Why try to feed someone who is not hungry? Why try to give water to someone who is not thirsty? Why try to plant the Arahant, who is free from craving, back into becoming, and invent some kind of 'everlasting Nibbāna' for them? Virattacittā āyatike bhavasmiṃ—there is no attachment in the detached mind for another becoming.

Te khīṇabījā—here, another profound point is made. What is meant by "those with seeds destroyed" (khīṇabījā)? In one of His discourses, the Buddha defines what the seed is: "Kamma is the field, consciousness (viññāṇa) is the seed, and craving (taṇhā) is the moisture." When discussing rebirth, this is a key point that many scholars might not even know. Kammaṃ khettaṃ—kamma is the field. Viññāṇaṃ bījaṃ—consciousness is the seed. Taṇhā sineho—craving is the moisture. For a seed to grow, it needs moisture, and it also needs a field. The Arahants have destroyed even that field.

To add to this from the same discourse, we mentioned "old kamma". The discourse also speaks of "new kamma"—the kamma created in this life through body, speech, and mind. One might ask: "Do the Arahants just sit idle? Do they not perform various actions like offering to the Buddha?" Those actions do not accumulate kamma. They do not accumulate the kamma necessary to bring about a future becoming. In this field of kamma, the consciousness of an ordinary person sprouts because the moisture of craving is present.

Now, here is the deep point. Why is it said that their seeds are destroyed (khīṇabījā)? The seed of consciousness of the Arahants does not sprout because its core has been removed. The core of that seed has been pulled out. What is that core? It is Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). This exact simile is not found in this sutta discourse, but I am explaining it so that you can understand. In the light of the Dhamma, the consciousness of such Arahants is called anidassana-viññāṇa (non-manifestative consciousness). This anidassana-viññāṇa is a major point of contention for many scholars today. Anidassana-viññāṇa means a consciousness that does not project or establish itself in Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). This is because the Arahants have attained the wisdom that penetrates Name-and-Form. They do not cling to, merge with, or get entangled in Name-and-Form.

Therefore, that consciousness, in truth, is a ceased consciousness—it is quenched. The Arahants experience this cessation of consciousness (viññāṇa-nirodha) during the attainment of the Fruition of Arahantship (arahatta-phala-samāpatti). It is this very mind of Fruition-attainment that presents itself at the final moment of the Arahant's life. That is why they do not go to a future becoming. Te khīṇabījā avirūḷhichandā—hence, that desire (chanda) is, we may say, the very sprout of craving. When a plant sprouts, a shoot emerges. Similarly, the unseen aspect of craving is called chanda (desire/will). It is not the desire of modern terms. Everything begins once a liking or desire for something arises. Chanda contains a very subtle state of desire; it arises in a highly subtle manner. It means this desire does not spring up again. Kamma is destroyed, and when Name-and-Form is fully understood, one is liberated from Name-and-Form. Te khīṇabījā—it is then, at the final passing away (parinibbāna) of the Arahants, that the process is completed, like a lamp going out. The oil of the lamp is exhausted, the wick is burnt out—that is what is called Nibbāna, that extinguishment.

Why is this Nibbāna called the Deathless (amata)? Because even a person who has merely glimpsed Nibbāna, like a Stream-enterer, becomes free from the fear of death. This is because, for a moment, through the power of insight-knowledge (vipassanāñāṇa), the five aggregates are let go of. In that letting go, they experience a unique, extraordinary supramundane peace and tranquility that the world cannot even fathom. It is this very peace that becomes fully manifest. It is experienced at the highest level by the Arahant who has eradicated all fetters.

They consume and experience that Deathless state in the attainment of the Fruition of Arahantship. Because of that experiencing, what exists there is the bliss of the absence of death. Everyone has the fear of death. That bliss of the Deathless is natural. If one has realized this by letting go of grasping (upādāna) in the mind, even without discarding the physical body, then this Dhamma is realized in this very life (sandiṭṭhiko dhammo). When the time comes to discard the physical body, it is this state that presents itself.

That is why: Te khīṇabījā avirūḷhichandā, nibbanti dhīrā yathāyaṃ padīpo—no more oil is poured into that lamp, no more wicks are added. It is just like a lamp going out.

We have tried, to the best of our ability, to bring out the flavor of the meaning of the Ratana Sutta for you. There are singers with voices far sweeter and more melodious than mine. Even if we record these, people might not be very interested in listening to them. Be that as it may, we decided to present this theme because this valuable Ratana Sutta is on the verge of fading away. Therefore, wise devotees should take the flavor of its meaning into consideration and recite it as a true Act of Truth. Due to a lapse in mindfulness, the flavor of the meaning can easily be forgotten. You must make an effort. Even when chanting, do it as a genuine Act of Truth, reflecting on the qualities of the Buddha, Dhamma, and Saṅgha. Otherwise, it is very easy to use a machine to chant it a hundred thousand times. You do not have to tire yourself out to do it a hundred thousand times; you can just use a device. But then, it does not become an Act of Truth.

We say this because many people today are drawn to such things. Through this, both the laity and the clergy fall into decline. Moreover, what is even more dangerous is that for future generations, nothing will remain of these valuable discourses—which have been preserved for centuries—except the sound. Only a hollow sound will remain. Therefore, today, we have tried to present this sutta—which you all love, listen to, and recollect, and which was recollected even this morning—in a meaningful way. Benefit from this. While using this as a comprehensive protection and refuge in your daily life and meditation, may you draw closer and closer to the qualities of the Triple Gem. May this sermon help all of us to achieve the paths and fruits of Stream-entry, Once-returning, Non-returning, and Arahantship, which are attainable through the supreme Triple Gem—the Buddha, Dhamma, and Saṅgha—as mentioned in this Ratana Sutta! This is our wish.

May all beings, from the Avīci hell to the highest heaven of Akaniṭṭha, who wish to rejoice in the merits generated by this Dhamma sermon and Dhamma listening, rejoice in these merits and attain the supreme, peaceful, great Nibbāna through the path of awakening of their choice! Please recite these verses to share the merits.

Verses 334-337 from the Taṇhāvagga (Chapter on Craving) together with Verse 315 from the Nirayavagga (Chapter on Hell) of the Dhammapada

Dear Listeners,

The Buddha, the Teacher of the Three Worlds, pointed out that it is because of Taṇhā (Craving) that we journey through this round of rebirths (saṃsāra), being born and dying. Precisely because it is the primary cause of renewed existence (punarbhava), taṇhā is designated by the term ponobhavikā (leading to renewed existence). Until taṇhā is uprooted, one runs panting through this saṃsāra. What is shown by this series of verses chosen as our theme today is the nature of taṇhā—its disadvantageous side.

According to what is explained in the Commentary regarding the background story related to the Māluṅkyaputta Thera Gāthā in the Theragāthā Pāli, these verses were preached by the Great Arahant Māluṅkyaputta. The account concerning him is as follows: This Venerable Māluṅkyaputta was born into a high-class family in Sāvatthi.

He was known as Māluṅkyaputta, derived from his mother's name, Māluṅkyā. Having lived in the household life for some time, he became disillusioned with it, went forth from the home life, and received ordination among the wanderers (paribbājakas). Having stayed among the wanderers for some time, on a certain occasion he met the Buddha, heard the Dhamma, went forth under him, developed insight (vipassanā), and attained Arahantship. After attaining Arahantship, out of compassion for his relatives, he visited his birthplace or former home. His relatives served him with delicious food and drinks and offered alms. At the same time, hoping to entice the Venerable Thera back to the household life, they gathered and piled up their family wealth before him and invited him, saying: "All of this belongs to the Venerable Sir. May you return to the household life, become a layman, and support a wife and children with this wealth." At that moment, according to the Commentary, he rose into the air and declared the disadvantageous side of taṇhā through these verses. In fact, some of these verses are also recorded in the Dhammapada as the Buddha's own words. The meaning of these few verses is extremely deep. Let us try to understand them generally.

"Manujassa pamattacārino, taṇhā vaḍḍhati māluvā viya" — For a person who behaves negligently, Taṇhā (Craving) grows like a māluvā creeper.

"So plavati hurā huraṃ, phalamicchaṃva vanasmiṃ vānaro" — He leaps from life to life in saṃsāra, like a monkey seeking fruit in a forest jumping from tree to tree.

"Yaṃ esā sahatī jammī, taṇhā loke visattikā" — Whomever this wretched, sticky taṇhā in the world—known as visattikā (clinging / spreading)—overcomes, "sokā tassa pavaḍḍhanti, abhivaṭṭhaṃva bīraṇaṃ" — his sorrows multiply like bīraṇa grass after a downpour of rain.

"Yo cetaṃ sahatī jammiṃ, taṇhaṃ loke duraccayaṃ" — But whoever overcomes this wretched taṇhā, so difficult to escape in the world,

"sokā tamhā papatanti, udabindūva pokkharā" — his sorrows fall away from him, like drops of water from a lotus leaf.

"Taṃ vo vadāmi bhaddan vo, yāvantettha samāgatā" — Therefore I say to you, blessings to all of you who have assembled here!

"mūlaṃ khaṇatha usīratthova bīraṇaṃ" — Dig up the root of taṇhā, just as one digs up the root of the bīraṇa grass seeking its fragrant root (usīra).

"mā vo naḷaṃva sotova, māro bhañji punappunaṃ" — Do not let Māra break you again and again, like a torrent breaking reeds. Do not allow yourselves to be swept away by that torrent of taṇhā, nor let Māra destroy you repeatedly through repeated birth and death.

Having declared so, he next says: "Karotha buddhavacanaṃ, khaṇo vo mā upaccagā, khaṇātītā hi socanti, nirayamhi samappitā" — Act according to the word of the Buddha. Let not the supreme moment pass you by, for those who miss the moment sorrow when they are consigned to hell.

"Pamādo rajo, pamādanupatito rajo" — Raja means dust. Negligence generates and increases the dust of defilements. Therefore, through diligence (appamāda) and vijjā (wisdom / understanding / clear vision), uproot that dart of taṇhā from oneself: "abbahe sallamattano'ti".

This is the meaning of those verses. What I have stated is their general meaning. Even the similes contained in these verses are extremely valuable.

That māluvā creeper is a parasitic plant that grows on trees. One often sees a māluvā creeper on trees. It starts small and eventually covers and destroys the tree. That is the simile used here. The taṇhā of a negligent person grows in the same way.

Next, "So plavati hurā huraṃ, phalamicchaṃva vanasmiṃ vānaro" means that just like a monkey wishing to eat fruit leaps from tree to tree in the forest, it carries that person from existence to existence, from bhava to Bhava (Becoming).

The next simile: "Yaṃ esā sahatī jammī taṇhā loke visattikā"—whomever is overcome by this wretched, sticky taṇhā in the world, that person's sorrows grow like a bīraṇa grass bush on which rain has fallen. On the other hand, if someone subdues that taṇhā, his sorrows roll off him like water drops on a lotus leaf. Thus, it is explained through various similes.

Next, as an invitation to eliminate that taṇhā, it says: "Taṃ vo vadāmi bhaddan vo, yāvantettha samāgatā, taṇhāya mūlaṃ khaṇatha bīraṇaṃ". The tuber of this bīraṇa plant is called usīra. Some identify it as vetiver, and in some regions, it is called sēra (lemongrass). Just like digging up this plant for its usīra root, dig up the root of taṇhā. That is what is said through various similes. We can discuss more details related to these Dhamma matters in due course.

Before that, there are many accounts concerning the Great Arahant Māluṅkyaputta in the Sutta discourses. Let us mention some. Regarding him, the following is mentioned in the Saṃyutta Nikāya: On one occasion, the Venerable Māluṅkyaputta approached the Blessed One and made this request: "Venerable Sir, please teach me the Dhamma in brief. With the help of that teaching, I shall go into seclusion, dwell alone, put forth effort, and realize Arahantship." When he said this, the Blessed One remarked: "Māluṅkyaputta, what am I to say to the young, newly ordained monks when you, who are old and advanced in years, come and ask for a brief teaching?" The Buddha said this as a form of mild admonishment. Then the Venerable Māluṅkyaputta said: "Venerable Sir, please preach to me a brief discourse. In that way, I shall become an heir of the Blessed One's teaching."

Next, before giving that brief sermon, as if to test his suitability, the Buddha asked Ven. Māluṅkyaputta: "What do you think, Māluṅkyaputta? Do you have any desire, lust, or affection for forms cognizable by the eye that you have not seen before?" Similarly, one can think of the others: forms, sounds, smells, tastes, tangibles, and thoughts—the objects met at the six sense-doors. "Do you have any passion, affection, or desire to experience them?" He replied in the negative to all of these. It was then that the Buddha delivered that brief sermon.

To express this in English: "Then, Māluṅkyaputta, regarding things seen, heard, sensed, and cognized—that is, diṭṭha, suta, muta, viññāta—in the seen there will be only the seen, in the heard there will be only the heard, in the sensed there will be only the sensed, in the cognized there will be only the cognized. Then, Māluṅkyaputta, you will not be 'by' that. When, Māluṅkyaputta, you are not 'by' that, then, Māluṅkyaputta, you will not be 'in' that. When, Māluṅkyaputta, you are not 'in' that, then you are neither here, nor there, nor in between the two. This itself is the end of Dukkha (Suffering)." He delivered this riddle-like discourse. Those devotees who have listened to our previous sermons would know that this is the very same brief sermon the Buddha preached to the ascetic Bāhiya Dārucīriya, which he also preached here to the Thera.

Now, if we consider the meaning of this brief sermon: those four terms—seen, heard, sensed, and cognized—are in Pali diṭṭha, suta, muta, viññāta. What is caught within these four are our six sense bases. That is, the very objects that are the domain of the eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind. Usually, we are accustomed to taking things as "the thing seen," "the thing heard," and so on. Here, the Buddha states that everything coming through these sense bases, that entire mass of objects, is encompassed by these four words: seen, heard, sensed, and cognized. The "sensed" refers to what is experienced through the tongue, body, and nose. So, one can understand "seen" as the objects coming to the eye, and "heard" as the objects coming to the ear. "Sensed" refers to the sensing through the nose, tongue, and body. Lastly, "cognized" refers to the sensing or cognition that comes to the mind.

So, concerning these, what is preached here is a wondrously brief discourse. Its meaning is that in the seen, it stops at just the seen; in the heard, it stops in that way. What ultimately happens through such stopping is extremely deep. What happens then? According to the Buddha, then "you are not 'by' that." This means you do not make assumptions, conceptualizations, or proliferate regarding them in terms of the seen, heard, sensed, and cognized. To explain this in an understandable way: normally, when something strikes our eye, we take it as "a thing seen." But in reality, there is only a seeing, only a hearing, only a sensing, only a cognizing. Yet we do not understand this. Extremely rapidly, the mind acts, and what was taken as "that seen thing" becomes established through taṇhā (craving), māna (conceit), and diṭṭhi (views). Through taṇhā, we take it as "this is mine"; through māna, we take it as "this am I"; through diṭṭhi, we take it as a self. It is through this grasping, through getting established, that—now you can understand—one exists "by" that. Once you make that seen thing into your own, then by taking it "from" that, you exist "in" it.

You enter into it. We have analyzed this in detail previously so that you can get some idea of it.

What the Buddha is pointing out is that instead of taking the objects met by our six sense bases—the eye, ear, nose, etc.—exactly as they are, we become established there through the defilements of taṇhā, māna, and diṭṭhi. It is by thus getting established that it is said "you are 'in' it." Once you go inside it, then a "here" is created. When a "here" is created, along with that "here," a "there" also arises. This is what we call duality. So, when something is taken as "here," opposed to it, a "there" is also created. The moment those two are created, there is also an "in-between." Here, the Buddha shows that liberation—complete liberation from saṃsāra—lies within these few words. Accordingly, if we do not get established in terms of taṇhā, māna, and diṭṭhi in the seen, heard, sensed, and cognized, and if we do not grasp them as "I" and "mine," then we have no "here." When there is no "here," there is no "there." When those two are absent, there is also no "in-between." Indeed, it is through the story of "here," "there," and the "in-between" that this saṃsāra goes on and on. That is precisely why it was said that this itself is the end of dukkha.

It is recorded that upon hearing this advice, Ven. Māluṅkyaputta went into seclusion and very quickly realized Arahantship. Thus, we began this discourse concerning the Great Arahant Māluṅkyaputta with the event that took place after he became an Arahant. However, next, because of matters directly related to taṇhā, we also mentioned this passage which was supportive of his Arahantship. But the explanation does not end here. This too is a matter mentioned in the Sutta itself. After the Buddha presented this brief discourse, Ven. Māluṅkyaputta said: "Venerable Sir, I understand the detailed meaning of this brief discourse preached by you in this manner." Here, the Great Arahant presents an explanation like a brief commentary. How does he explain it? He shows it through a series of verses related to the six senses. When we discuss one sense, you can apply it to the others and understand.

Here, Ven. Māluṅkyaputta says: "Having seen a form with the eye, by grasping an agreeable sign, one's mindfulness (sati) is bewildered, and then one engenders lustful thoughts. One experiences feeling (vedanā). Through experiencing that feeling, strong greed arises. Then, the mind is defiled by distress and so on. Through that, dukkha is next accumulated—that is, the five groups of grasping (pañcupādānakkhandhā) are accumulated. This means that through grasping them, they go and accumulate. By such accumulation, one is far from Nibbāna—ārā nibbānā, far from Nibbāna."

Through that verse, the Venerable Thera shows that side of clinging. Just as it was said about the eye and the objects coming to the eye, you can briefly apply this to the objects coming to the ear, nose, tongue, body, and finally, the deepest one, the objects coming to the mind. By taking them as agreeable in that way and by grasping (upādāna) them, the groups of grasping (upādānakkhandha) that expand saṃsāra are accumulated.

Next, he states the other side: "But if someone establishes mindfulness (sati) regarding the objects coming to the eye, and does not develop clinging or lust towards them, that person is liberated from those aforementioned sufferings. Sometimes, that leads to the reduction of the groups of grasping, to their wearing away." What was first mentioned was "accumulation"—through defilements, the groups of grasping are accumulated. Next, through developing dispassion (virāga) toward them, they are eliminated, they decrease. In Pali, the terms used are ācinati (he accumulates) and apacinati (he decumulates/reduces). Words like upacaya (building up) and apacaya (wearing down) are also used. The groups of grasping are accumulated because of one's grasping of them and clinging to the feeling (vedanā) experienced through the senses. By seeing them right there, and letting in the seen be only the seen, in the heard only the heard, what happens is their wearing away. It is recorded that after these things were said, the Buddha approved what Ven. Māluṅkyaputta had said, saying "Sādhu, Sādhu!" After that, the Thera went and meditated accordingly and quickly attained Arahantship.

Now, in connection with this, we spoke of the ponobhavikā (renewed existence) nature of taṇhā, like a monkey leaping from tree to tree. There are many important points in that. If we are to speak of it, the nature of taṇhā is to connect one thing to another. There is a very good Sutta to illustrate this. On one occasion, when the Buddha was staying in the Deer Park at Isipatana in Benares, after their alms-round, the Theras assembled in the circular pavilion and discussed the meaning of a verse preached by the Buddha in the Metteyya Sutta of the Pārāyana Vagga, holding a discussion on it. Here is that verse:

> "Yo ubhante viditvāna,

> majjhe mantā na lippati;

> taṃ brūmi mahāpurisoti,

> so’dha sibbanimaccagā."

This is a deep verse preached by the Buddha, currently found in the Pārāyana Vagga. It is like a riddle. "He who, having known both ends, does not cling to the middle with wisdom—him I call a great man; he has escaped the seamstress here." 'Seamstress' (sibbanī) is a name for taṇhā. It means he has bypassed the seamstress called taṇhā.

Now, as to the meaning of that verse, six bhikkhus offered six different explanations. I am not going to mention all six here. On this occasion, only the very first explanation is relevant. Actually, when all six explanations were presented to the Buddha, saying, "During our discussion, six different opinions arose like this," the Buddha said that all six were correct. However, he declared that what he himself intended by that verse was the first explanation presented. That is the explanation we are presenting at this moment. During the discussion among the Theras, the question arose: What are the two ends mentioned by the Buddha in this verse? What is the middle? Who is the seamstress called sibbanī? That is why those six opinions were presented.

Only the first opinion is relevant to us here. That first Thera declared: "As I understand it, these two ends are phassa (contact) and the origin of phassa (phassa-samudaya)." There is nothing special to define about phassa. The origin of phassa means the arising of contact. Phassa is one end, and the arising of phassa is the other end. The middle is the cessation of contact (phassa-nirodha). Looking at this, too, it is like a riddle. Phassa is one end, the origin of phassa is the second end, and the middle is phassa-nirodha, the cessation of contact.

Next, sibbanī, that is, the seamstress, is taṇhā. This is worth reflecting upon. It is a complete subject of meditation (kammaṭṭhāna) in itself. Although the Buddha said the other explanations were also correct, since he intended the first explanation, we should pay closer attention to it.

Thus, it shows a certain characteristic of taṇhā. Along with this contact and the arising of contact, there is also its cessation taking place extremely rapidly. But we do not see it. Cessation lies in the middle. There is a tendency in this saṃsāric being to forget that cessation. That is why it is generally said that saṃsāric beings dwell on the side of arising (samudaya). On one occasion, the Buddha declared that those living in the fine-material worlds (rūpa-loka) and those in the immaterial worlds (arūpa-loka)—indeed, all these beings—keep returning to saṃsāra and Bhava (Becoming) because they do not understand cessation (nirodha). This shows that we do not see this cessation, which is the breaking up and vanishing of things. Instead, we connect one thing to another through taṇhā. Through taṇhā, we only see each contact and the arising of contact. We do not see the cessation of contact. That cessation is the middle. In fact, the essence of this entire Saddhamma is Nibbāna. Nibbāna is called cessation—nirodho nibbānaṃ. So, what is unseen by ordinary worldlings is this cessation. Thus, contact and the arising of contact are stitched together. When there is a seamstress, she joins two pieces of cloth and sews them. Likewise, contact and the next arising of contact are joined together while forgetting the cessation of contact, ignoring the nirodha. It is through this that one falls under the power of taṇhā.

Now, from the advice given to the Arahant here, as well as from the advice previously given to Bāhiya Dārucīriya, we see that it stops at "in the seen, only the seen." It does not allow it to go beyond. It stops at the mere seeing. Next, it does not allow contact to proliferate into Vedanā (Feeling), taṇhā, and so forth. Indeed, that is why taṇhā was called ponobhavikā (leading to renewed existence). Within taṇhā itself, there is a force that creates another existence (bhava).

On another occasion, there is a highly debated Sutta passage. Let us recall it. Once, the wanderer Vacchagotta, illustrating with a simile regarding the story of rebirth, asked about how a flame thrown and spread by the wind has what as its grasping (upādāna) when a person dies. When someone dies, this life ends here; we do not see anything going. Indeed, that is the very question of the whole world: what goes from here? There, the Buddha declares that the flame, thrown and propelled by the wind, clings to another tree. Similarly, within this taṇhā there is a nature of upādāna (grasping / fuel). Therefore, the Buddha states that when one discards one body and goes to another body, it is taṇhā itself that assists. "Taṇhā itself stands as the upādāna (grasping / fuel)," he said. Thus, we see that as long as there is taṇhā, there is also upādāna. Through taṇhā, something to grasp is created.

We can think of it like this. Just as when we talk about a mirage, the vision seen by a deer appears as something helpful for drinking, taṇhā connects things again and again. That is one aspect of it—creating another existence (bhava) repeatedly. That is precisely why it is also described as tatratatrābhinandinī—finding delight here and there—like jumping around from place to place. Because of this, at the moment of death, due to not being satisfied, and because taṇhā is present, one wishes for another bhava. One wishes for a bhava in a subtle manner. How subtle this is, is shown in a statement by the Buddha in a Dhammapada verse:

> "Yathāpi mūle anupaddave daḷhe,

> chinno'pi rukkho punareva rūhati;

> evam'pi taṇhānusaye anūhate,

> nibbattatī dukkham'idaṃ punappunaṃ."

Just as when the root of a tree remains undamaged and firm, the tree grows again even if its branches are cut down, so long as the underlying tendency of craving (taṇhā-anusaya) is not destroyed, this dukkha (suffering / unsatisfactoriness) arises again and again in saṃsāra. It has been shown in that way.

Thus, a dangerous side of taṇhā is shown. We are analyzing the very words mentioned in the verses. Furthermore, more similes are mentioned in the Dhamma. Visattikā refers to the sticky, clinging nature of taṇhā. It is also called lepa (plaster/glue). In Sinhala, too, we use the word lēpa as in "applying" (ālēpa karanavā). Lepa means the sticky nature. The Buddha once gave a wonderful simile for this, like telling an ancient story, to the Bhikkhus. This was particularly addressed to the Bhikkhus, though the world too can learn something from it. In the Himalayan forests, there are level regions where both humans and monkeys roam. In such areas, a hunter seeking to catch monkeys hangs some sticky pitch/gum (lēpa) on a tree along the path where monkeys travel as a trap. So, a foolish monkey, being greedy by nature, goes and touches that sticky pitch with one hand. When he touches it, it sticks. Next, trying to free it with his other hand, that hand also gets stuck. The Buddha describes it in this way. Next, to free his two hands, he presses one foot against it. That foot also gets stuck in the pitch. Then, to free his hands and foot, he presses his other foot against it. That also gets stuck. Now, both hands and both feet are stuck in this pile of pitch. This is a method of catching monkeys, a kind of trap. Then, the monkey presses his snout/mouth against it to free them. That too gets stuck. In the end, the monkey, stuck in five places, is shot/captured by the hunter and taken away.

That simile was given to show the lepa (sticky) nature of taṇhā arising from the five strands of sensual pleasure—eye, ear, nose, tongue, and body. In that way, on various occasions, the Buddha described that sticky nature of taṇhā, the world's clinging nature, as lepa. Having taught the disadvantageous side in that manner, and on various other occasions, the Buddha showed how taṇhā repeatedly creates another bhava. This is because there is a nature in taṇhā that is never satisfied, like the ocean that is never filled. Since there is no limit to taṇhā, it is repeatedly clinging to the next bhava. It is also called nati (leaning/inclination). If a mountain range leans towards one side, it will fall to that side. Within taṇhā there is a nature that carries the world repeatedly to another bhava.

Next, the root of taṇhā has also been declared—to dig up the root of taṇhā like digging up the bīraṇa bush. What is the root of taṇhā? The root of taṇhā is shown to be avijjā (ignorance) itself. That is why it is said to uproot this root with the help of vijjā (wisdom/clear vision). This avijjā, which is the root of taṇhā, is sometimes shown as the non-seeing of the anicca (impermanent) nature of this eye, the incoming objects, and every phenomenon arising in connection with them. Thus, sometimes it is shown how the world lives within these sense bases. To show this, the Buddha points out the reality as follows: "Bhikkhus, the eye is anicca (impermanent), unstable, subject to change. Forms are anicca, unstable, subject to change. Calaṃ—it is moving, unstable. There is a nature in the eye of becoming otherwise. Forms are the same."

Next, because of not understanding that anicca nature, dependent on those two, viññāṇa (consciousness) arises. But the Buddha says viññāṇa is also anicca. So, the eye is anicca, forms are anicca. By taking what is anicca as permanent, and through the coming together of those two, the illusion called cakkhu-viññāṇa (eye-consciousness) arises. That is why viññāṇa is called an illusion. Trees and plants do not have it. So, this being with defilements like avijjā and taṇhā took the eye to be permanent. He took a stand there. Next, without thinking of forms as a mirage, he took a stand there too. Those two came together and arose. But the Buddha says that viññāṇa is also anicca. Yet, due to not understanding that either, bringing all three together, one constructed something called phassa (contact). There comes that story of phassa—cakkhu-samphassa (eye-contact). But the Buddha says that cakkhu-samphassa is also anicca. The world does not see it. By taking that too as permanent, one creates a sensation—one creates it in terms of Vedanā (Feeling). Those too are anicca. It is this non-seeing of aniccatā (impermanence) that is the cause of our falling under the power of taṇhā. Indeed, if one understands the twelve links of paṭiccasamuppāda (dependent arising), we see that there are many links prior to taṇhā. At the root is avijjā. This shows that the world falls under taṇhā because they do not know the Four Noble Truths—that is, due to avijjā. Without knowing that a mass of dukkha is arising, we consider them as permanent. Thus, it shows us that knowing the true nature lies within the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā).

If one constantly remembers that the eye is anicca, forms are anicca, the resulting viññāṇa is anicca, the contact (phassa) from the coming together of those three is anicca, and the feeling (vedanā) arising from it is anicca—when one develops the perception of impermanence, such taṇhā and so forth cannot accumulate. That is the meaning.

The Buddha on one occasion declared: "Bhikkhus, when the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā) is developed and cultivated..." If the perception of impermanence is well developed, it destroys all sensual lust (kāma-rāga), lust for existence (bhava-rāga), and lust for form (rūpa-rāga). Now next, there is a certain Sutta discourse related to this avijjā, taṇhā, and the story of the "dart" (salla) mentioned in the final verse.

If we take the portion relevant to us from a discourse preached by the Buddha to a Licchavi youth on one occasion; a wonderful simile is given there too. The Buddha says: A man was struck by a poisoned arrow. When this happened, his relatives summoned a physician. Here, he is described as bhisakko sallakatto. Sallakatta means the surgeon. Bhisakka means the poison-doctor or physician. So, both are connected. They summon a doctor who knows both general medicine and surgery. The doctor, using an instrument used by surgeons, opens the wound where the arrow struck, and then, if any part of the arrow remains in the body, to locate it—a Pali word is used there, esanī, which is a probe used by surgeons to extract a dart—he pulls out the dart with that instrument. Having extracted it, he applies medicine to heal it.

Next, comparing the simile with the meaning, the Buddha states: that man struck by the poisoned arrow is this worldling, pierced by the dart of craving (taṇhā-salla). What is the poison in this dart of taṇhā? It is avijjā (ignorance). It is called the poison of avijjā. Thus, the word taṇhā-salla (the dart of craving) is mentioned in many places. The Buddha is called the destroyer of the dart of craving (taṇhā-sallassa hantā). This became a poisoned arrow precisely due to that toxic defect of avijjā.

Next, the instrument used to open the wound is called "Noble Wisdom" (ariya-paññā). Next, the probe called esanī used to locate the dart is mindfulness (sati). That is why it is said that everything is contained within satipaṭṭhāna (establishments of mindfulness). So, opening the wound through Noble Wisdom, and using the probe of mindfulness (sati), one locates and extracts that dart.

Next, who is this surgeon, this physician? It is the Tathāgata. Thus, based on this simile given by the Buddha, one should treat oneself. That is how that verse concluded: abbahe—one pulled out one's own dart. That was extracted through the instruments shown according to the surgical and medical principles given by the Buddha. From this, one can understand that the dart of taṇhā is pierced within. It is a poisoned arrow. That poison is avijjā. So, to extract it, one uses the weapon of Noble Wisdom. Opening the wound and through mindfulness (sati), one extracts that arrow from where it was pierced. That is where the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā) is helpful.

So, that wisdom is on one side. The Buddha has given the world the fundamental understanding to pull out that dart. In fact, the Buddha highlighted the nature of arising and passing away—udayabbaya—present in everything in the world. That is "perception of impermanence" (anicca-saññā). In two words, it is udayabbaya—through arising and passing away. So, that is the basic lesson of insight (vipassanā). First, within this perception of impermanence, one sees the arising and passing away of everything. Even realizing this is difficult for the ordinary worldling, because, due to the work of the aforementioned seamstress, they forget the passing away side. The world likes this forgetting very much.

To tell you an incident from daily life: in this world of fashion, there are clothes and other things you use. Once you buy a more valuable, modern design from the shops for some money and bring it home, the old one goes somewhere and ends up in the rubbish heap. Thus, forgetting the passing away side, they renew it. Worldlings are constantly renewing. Taṇhā assists in this. The seamstress taṇhā ties knots. What is that knot? Forgetting cessation (nirodha). Forgetting that this breaks up. Then, what does the practitioner of insight (vipassanā) do? With the help of that fundamental principle given by the Buddha, he sees that everything has a nature of arising and passing away momentarily and very rapidly. To show this, it was said that "this eye exists." From the very beginning of this sermon, "this eye of mine exists." Likewise, "forms exist." "You, devotees, are in front of me." We do not say that they do not exist. But the Buddha says that the eye is also anicca, changing moment by moment, calaṃ—it is moving. In that way, many words are used there, like aññathābhāvī (becoming otherwise). Words like aniccaṃ, calaṃ, vayaṃ, vipariṇāmī, aññathābhāvī, etc., are applied to impress this upon the mind. Although none of this is visible to the physical eye known to the ordinary world, this eye also changes extremely rapidly. Next, the thing we took to be "form" also changes in the same way. But we do not realize it. The aforementioned taṇhā stitches it together. Even when it is said that viññāṇa (consciousness) is also anicca, we do not realize that either. That is indeed the deepest point.

Generally, we said that if we take all four—seen, heard, sensed, cognized—turning back to what was explained earlier, these are the six bases themselves taken as seen, heard, sensed, cognized. Among them, the "seen" is highly gross (oḷārika) and coarse. Because even if we look at something and then look away, it seems to still be there, doesn't it? It is still there. How can we say it is not? Although the Buddha says it is not, it remains visible to our physical eye, and we say it exists in that very manner. Even if we are told, when we look once and look away, it remains just as it was. So, how can we say it changes? Thus, looked at in that way, the "seen" is still coarse and gross.

Next, how about the "heard"? Now, as long as there is an echo of the words I speak, you will hear them. Sometimes we have heard that in vast deserts where no echo can occur, when someone speaks, the words vanish right where they are spoken. Now, you know very well the echo coming from the surrounding hills, don't you? It is like two people speaking. Likewise, in this environment, the sound we make reverberates and returns as an echo. That further assists our hearing. Though it is not as gross as the "seen," the "heard" is also somewhat gross.

Next, what is more personal and even subtler is found in the "sensed" (muta). The "sensed" refers to what is felt by the tongue, nose, and body. Now, just like what Andare did, if someone says "this is delicious," to show that taste to another, he must feed it to him. Otherwise, it is impossible. It is highly personal. It is extremely subtle there. What is sensed by the nose, tongue, and body is extremely subtle. So, searching for their impermanence is harder than the others.

Next, the "cognized" (viññāta) is even harder and subtler. The cognized mind—the story about that mind is said to be a bizarre illusion (māyā). There, what are the objects coming to the mind? Not Dhamma in the sense of the teachings. If we speak of them as objects, just as forms are to the eye, sounds to the ear, smells to the nose, tastes to the tongue, and touch to the body, so dhamma is applied to the mind. If we translate dhamma, it means "things that come to the mind." We think the mind is one thing, and the things coming to the mind are another. Those two must collide. We are caught right there. That is what the Buddha preached: "Manopubbaṅgamā dhammā, manoseṭṭhā manomayā". There, dhammā means thoughts/objects coming to the mind. But the world thinks that the things coming to the mind exist separately. However, the Buddha says the mind is the forerunner. These are mind-made. Things constructed by the mind. Right there is the work of the magician—the illusion (māyā). Yet, the world does not realize it. Taking the thought coming to the mind as separate, making it our own, we get caught in clinging, entanglement, confusion, and papañca (conceptual proliferation / prolific conceptualization). That is the extremely subtle point. It is there that the practitioner of insight gradually extracts the impermanence of the seen, starting from that, and next contemplates the impermanence of the heard. Going even deeper, there is what is personally felt, what is felt by the tongue. That is why it is said that one can realize Nibbāna based on any one of these six sense bases. From that perspective, one can say Nibbāna is at the tip of the tongue.

That is why in the past, some Bhikkhus are said to have attained Arahantship while taking their meals, by contemplating that contact (phassa) felt on the tongue. Likewise, contemplating the contact felt by the eye, even upon seeing the form of a dancing girl, they are said to have attained Arahantship by generating the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā) at that moment. Similarly, one can realize Nibbāna through what is heard by the ear, and through the smell felt by the nose. But the world does not turn in that direction. For one who constantly contemplates those two—arising and passing away—given by the Buddha, as one goes deeper into the understanding of arising and passing away, the breaking-up side (bhaṅga) becomes clearer to the practitioner of insight than before. The side of breaking up, which was unseen hitherto. Because as that desire called taṇhā fades away, the true nature emerges. The Buddha's word on arising and passing away becomes clear. When, between the two of arising and passing away, the breaking-up side is seen more clearly, that is where knowledge of dissolution—bhaṅga-ñāṇa—is shown in insight meditation. To that person, everything is seen as breaking up. Even thoughts are seen to dissolve. Then, it is from those breakups that disadvantages and so forth arise. There lies mano-samphassa (mind-contact). Understanding that the thought coming to the mind strikes the mind is also extremely subtle. Yet, at some point, a space is seen: the mind and the thought strike each other. When one understands that they strike in this way, it is called "in the cognized, only the cognized" (viññāte viññātamattaṃ). It is said that the ascetic Bāhiya Dārucīriya attained Arahantship the moment this was said, extremely rapidly.

This Arahant Māluṅkyaputta also attained Arahantship quickly by depending on this brief advice. From this, we see that beyond stopping at "in the seen, only the seen," next is "in the heard, only the heard," "in the sensed, only the sensed," and finally "in the cognized, only the cognized." This is something so wonderful that it is hard for us to even conceive. The practitioner of insight, at some stage in meditation, understands according to the Buddha's word that both the mind and the thought are anicca, subject to change. Instead of saying "heart," let us say "mind" (manas) is anicca, and the mental object (dhamma) coming to the mind is also subject to change. It is when such changing things come together that it is called mind-consciousness (mano-viññāṇa). That is what the Buddha means. The beings of this world, even those in the aforementioned fine-material and immaterial worlds, create another bhava repeatedly because they do not know cessation (nirodha). If they saw cessation, just as in the story of the seamstress: "yo ubhante viditvāna"—having known these two ends. One understood contact (phassa). One understood the origin of contact. Next, when the mind is established in that cessation of contact—phassa-nirodha—that is when one is liberated. One is liberated from the world, freed from the world. This is what is meant by "the end of dukkha." We previously mentioned the story of the flame. So, this taṇhā—as long as there is unsatisfied desire, incomplete desire, the mind constantly radiates outward. It radiates outward from this body. It grasps whatever is presented by kamma. Be it a mother's womb, an animal's womb, or in hell, the sign presented according to kamma is grasped through taṇhā at the moment of death. As long as the underlying tendency of craving (taṇhā-anusaya) is present, there is no need to explain further about being reborn. There is no need for a strange life-force to go and plant itself there, as the world thinks. Taṇhā is sufficient. That is why it was said that just as a flame is thrown and spread by the wind, as long as taṇhā exists, beings of the world construct another bhava. This is what we called ponobhavikā. Now, one understands here that it is taṇhā that creates renewed existence (punarbhava). To understand its operation, one must eliminate the aforementioned avijjā and bring forth Noble Wisdom (ariya-paññā).

Now, we have presented the meaning of those brief discourses in the verses in various ways. It is possible to explain even further. But if you would at least apply your minds to the similes given by the Buddha, you can understand many things. We wish that this discourse will assist you in walking on this path of insight (vipassanā-magga) at your own level in daily life. It is because you understand the fearsomeness of saṃsāra that you observe the precepts and practice meditation on an occasion like this. Indeed, this is a time when the fearsome nature of this saṃsāra becomes self-evident to oneself, according to the teachings of the Buddha.

Therefore, as long as we do not eliminate that aforementioned taṇhā, no matter how much we say "I will not be born again," that birth belongs to us because of that aforementioned inclination (nati). For that reason, one must strive again and again, with the help of the virtue (sīla) one guards, through meditations like tranquility (samatha) and insight (vipassanā), to realize the Noble Wisdom shown by the Buddha, through the penetration of the paths and fruits of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti), Once-returning (Sakadāgāmitā), Non-returning (Anāgāmitā), and Arahantship—and by using satipaṭṭhāna and mindfulness (sati), may you aspire that this discourse will help you realize in this very life the supreme state you hope for. Then, may all beings from Avīci to Akaniṭṭha, whoever wish to rejoice in this sharing of the merit of preaching and hearing the Dhamma, by so rejoicing, realize the supreme, deathless, great Nibbāna through the Bodhi of their aspiration. Say in this manner.

Dear Listeners,

The Supreme Buddha, the Teacher of the Three Worlds, has declared that this Dhamma, which leads to the great, deathless Nibbāna, is for one who has aroused energy (āraddha-vīriya), and not for the lazy or indolent. It is shown in this Dhamma-Vinaya that only the energetic person lives happily, and that living even a single day with aroused energy is far more noble than living a hundred years in laziness and indolence. That is why on this Vap Full Moon Poya day, we hope to present some verses and a story that are meaningful and inspiring specifically to the energetic person.

In the city of Campā, which belonged to the kingdom of King Bimbisāra, a meritorious child was born to the millionaire family of Kolivisa. His parents named the child Soṇa. The body of this millionaire's son, Soṇa Kolivisa, was extremely delicate and tender. So delicate was he that hair grew even on the soles of his feet. This was a wondrous thing. King Bimbisāra heard this news, and on one occasion, when summoning eighty thousand village chiefs for state affairs, he sent a messenger with a message saying, "I wish to see Soṇa. It would be good if Soṇa comes here. Please arrange for him to come." So, Soṇa's parents told the millionaire's son: "Son, the King wishes to see the soles of your feet. When you go there, do not stretch out your feet towards the King. Sit cross-legged—that is, fold your legs—and then the King will see the soles of your feet."

So, when the people of Campā went to see King Bimbisāra, the millionaire's son Soṇa Kolivisa was carried in a palanquin. Having been brought before the King, the millionaire's son Soṇa paid homage to the King and sat down in the manner described. The King saw the soles of his feet. He witnessed the wondrous phenomenon of hair growing on the soles of his feet. Next, the King gave instructions on state matters to the eighty thousand village chiefs and said: "Now I have shown you how to achieve well-being in this world. To secure well-being in the next world, go and meet the Blessed One."

At that time, the Blessed One was residing on the Vulture's Peak mountain (Gijjhakaṭa). So, this crowd of eighty thousand went to pay respects to the Buddha. At that time, the Buddha's personal attendant was Venerable Sāgata, a monk who had practiced kasina meditation and possessed great meditative absorptive powers. Venerable Sāgata conveyed the invitation to the Buddha on behalf of the eighty thousand people in a miraculous manner. Disappearing from where he stood, as if diving into the earth, he presented the invitation to the Buddha.

Having witnessed this psychic miracle, the eighty thousand people focused their attention on Venerable Sāgata even more than on the Buddha. Understanding this, the Buddha told Venerable Sāgata: "Sāgata, display more psychic marvels." So, the Venerable monk rose into the air, and performed various miracles related to the fire-kasina (tejo-kasiṇa), such as sitting in the sky, walking up and down, and emitting flames, and finally descended to the ground, worshipped the Buddha's feet, and declared: "The Blessed One is my Teacher, I am the disciple."

Hearing this, the crowd thought, "If the disciple can do such wondrous things, how great must the Teacher be!" At that moment when confidence (saddhā) arose in them, the Buddha delivered a Dhamma sermon consisting of the gradual instruction (anupubbikathā). It is mentioned that upon hearing that Dhamma sermon, the entire crowd attained the fruit of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala) on their very seats. Having attained the fruit of Stream-entry, they became lay devotees who had taken refuge in the Triple Gem.

Then, the millionaire's son, Soṇa Kolivisa, who was in this crowd, was deeply moved by this Dhamma sermon and thought: "It is not easy to live the pure holy life (brahmacariya) according to the Dhamma preached by the Blessed One while remaining in lay life. I must ordain." With this resolve, he approached the Buddha and requested ordination. The Buddha granted him ordination and higher ordination (upasampadā).

Not long after his higher ordination, Venerable Soṇa went to the forest dwelling known as Sītavana (Cool Grove) and began practicing intense energy. He put in such great energy that, by spending too much time on the walking path (caṅkamana), the soles of his feet, which had hair on them, cracked. They cracked and began to bleed. It bled so much that the walking path was covered in blood, looking like a slaughterhouse where cattle had been killed. When, despite practicing such intense energy, he did not attain Arahantship, Venerable Soṇa, during a moment of rest, thought: "Among those disciples of the Blessed One who have aroused energy (āraddha-vīriya), I am indeed one. Yet, despite putting in such energy, I have not achieved Arahantship. There are abundant riches and wealth in our family. Therefore, I should enjoy those riches and perform meritorious deeds." Thus, he thought of returning to the lay life.

The Buddha, who was staying on the Vulture's Peak, perceived this thought of Venerable Soṇa Kolivisa. Right at that moment, as quickly as a strong man might stretch out his bent arm or bend his outstretched arm, the Buddha vanished from Vulture's Peak and appeared in Sītavana. Then, the Buddha went on a tour of the lodgings with the other monks residing in Sītavana, as if to inspect lodgings from dwelling to dwelling, hut to hut. While walking, He came to the walking path of Venerable Soṇa Kolivisa and asked the monks: "Whose walking path is this? This path covered in blood, looking like a slaughterhouse?" The monks replied: "Venerable Sir, this is the walking path of the Venerable Soṇa. Venerable Soṇa, having exerted extreme and excessive energy, walked up and down until his path was covered in blood in this manner."

Then, the Buddha went to Venerable Soṇa's hut. Sitting on the prepared seat, He asked Venerable Soṇa: "Soṇa, did a thought like this occur to you during a moment of rest: 'Now, despite exerting so much energy, I have not become an Arahant. Therefore, I should return to lay life'?" "Yes, Venerable Sir," he replied. Then the Buddha asked: "Soṇa, when you were a layman, were you not skilled in playing the lute?" "Yes, Venerable Sir," he replied. "How was it, Soṇa? When the strings of your lute were pulled too tight, extremely tight, was the lute in a playable condition?" "No, Venerable Sir." "And when the strings of your lute were too loose, was it in a good condition? Could the lute be played?" "No, not even then, Venerable Sir." "But, Soṇa, when the strings of your lute were neither too tight nor too loose, but tuned to an even pitch, was it then playable and melodious?" "Yes, Venerable Sir," he replied.

Thus, using the simile of the lute, He gave advice to Venerable Soṇa. Having given this advice, He returned to Vulture's Peak through the air. Venerable Soṇa, acting according to this advice, practiced energy once more and understood the principle of the balancing of energy (vīriya-samatā)—the fact that there must be a certain middle or balanced state regarding energy.

There is something called "balancing of the faculties" (indriya-samatā) in this Dhamma. What are called "faculties" (indriya) here are not the external physical faculties of eye, ear, nose, tongue, and body. The spiritual faculties (indriya) are conviction (saddhā), energy (vīriya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā), which are wholesome qualities that assist in reaching the noble state. Understanding the need for a certain balance among these, and the importance of developing them to a middle, balanced level, Venerable Soṇa very quickly realized Arahantship.

Having become an Arahant, he then thought: "I must declare my Arahantship to the Blessed One." He approached the Buddha and, without explicitly saying he had attained Arahantship, presented the state of an Arahant's mind by explaining a range of Dhamma principles. The Buddha too, praised this, declaring to the community of monks: "This is indeed how noble clansmen declare their Arahantship; without explicitly asserting, 'I have attained Arahantship,' they reveal their attainment through Dhamma principles. That is the correct method. In doing so, their fewness of wishes is a valuable quality. It is a valuable quality of those noble ones who have achieved the higher realization." Thus, the Buddha praised it.

Then the Buddha said: "Soṇa, your body is extremely delicate. Therefore, I allow you to wear single-layered footwear." Then, Venerable Soṇa replied: "Venerable Sir, I renounced eighty cartloads of gold coins and various other luxuries, left the household life, and ordained. Having ordained, if I start using a pair of single-layered footwear as a special privilege, people might start rumors. They might blame me. They would say: 'This monk Soṇa Kolivisa, having renounced wealth as vast as eighty cartloads, has now developed an attachment to a single-layered pair of sandals; he has become attached to it.' Therefore, if the Blessed One allows the wearing of footwear for the Sangha in general, I too will use them. If the Blessed One does not grant permission to the Sangha in general, then I too will not use them." It was on that occasion that the Buddha, for the first time, declared to the monks: "I allow single-layered footwear."

From this, you lay devotees can understand many things. When the Buddha on various occasions awarded the chief (etadagga) titles to monks who excelled in outstanding qualities, He also paid special honor to Venerable Soṇa by declaring him the foremost among those of His disciples who have aroused energy (āraddha-vīriya).

Thus, presenting all these facts, Venerable Soṇa expressed his past course of practice in verses, and two of those verses mentioned in the Theragāthā are what we have placed today as our theme.

> Accāraddhamhi vīriyamhi, > samatho me anuttaro;

> Vīṇūpamaṃ pi me dhammaṃ, > desesi cakkhumā.

"Regarding the matter of over-exerted energy, the Unsurpassed Teacher in the world, the One with Vision, preached the Dhamma to me using the simile of the lute."

> Tassāhaṃ vacanaṃ sutvā, > vihāsiṃ sāsane rato;

"Having heard His word, I dwelt delighting in the Dispensation."

"For the attainment of the supreme goal—noble Nibbāna—I achieved the balancing of the faculties (indriya-samatā)."

> Tisso vijjā anuppattā, > kataṃ buddhassa sāsanaṃ.

"The Three Knowledges—namely, the recollection of past lives (pubbe-nivāsānussati), the divine eye (dibba-cakkhu), and the destruction of the taints (āsavakkhaya)—have been attained. The instruction of the Buddha has been fulfilled." These are the two verses from the Theragāthā that we have placed as our theme.

Through this story, many noble qualities in the character of Venerable Soṇa Kolivisa are revealed to us. Let us look particularly at his development of energy. If someone with such delicate soles had been full of pride like an ordinary person, he might have thought: "Even King Bimbisāra summoned me just to see this feature of mine. I cannot perform walking meditation." He did not think so. Energetically, he engaged in walking meditation. Ultimately, he put in such intense energy that his feet cracked and bled.

Then, wisely understanding the simile of the lute presented by the Buddha, he brought himself to a balanced state of energy—a middle state—and thereby attained Arahantship. Furthermore, after attaining Arahantship, his declaration before the Buddha was highly exemplary; without explicitly saying "I have attained Arahantship," he presented it through Dhamma principles by describing the nature of an Arahant's mind as he understood it. Also, how content with little (appiccha) he was! He did not expect any special privileges. When the Buddha allowed him footwear, he stated that he would use them only if permission was granted to the Sangha in general. All of these are a collection of valuable qualities that we should take as examples.

Next, when considering the Dhamma aspects, the key points are the balancing of energy (vīriya-samatā) and the balancing of the faculties (indriya-samatā). What is this balancing of the faculties (indriya-samatā)? Merit-seeking friends, it is not the external faculties of eye, ear, nose, tongue, and body that assist in seeing Nibbāna. Indeed, what assists in realizing Nibbāna are the five spiritual faculties (indriya) of the Dispensation: conviction (saddhā), energy (vīriya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). Why are these presented as "faculties" (indriya)? It is because when they are developed and strengthened in one's mind, one understands the Dhamma of Nibbāna through that power and strength. There is also a certain systematic order among these five. We can understand it in this way.

It is in one who has conviction (saddhā) that energy (vīriya) arises. Through conviction, energy is brought forth. Conviction is necessary to bring forth energy. Relying on energy, mindfulness (sati) is established. One develops mindfulness in the form of the foundations of mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna). By developing mindfulness, one achieves concentration (samādhi)—one-pointedness of mind. It is with a concentrated mind that one understands reality as it is through insight (vipassanā), understanding the impermanent (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and not-self (anattā) nature of the world, and thereby brings forth insight-wisdom (vipassanā-paññā). In this way, there is a connection of one to another among the five: conviction, energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom.

However, when discussing their balance (samatā), we have to analyze it in a different way. The two factors, conviction and wisdom, are shown as a pair, a twin quality. Conviction is said to be related to the heart. Conviction means placing the heart (devotion). It is the emotional/affective aspect. The quality of conviction belongs to the feeling aspect of a person. Wisdom belongs to the understanding aspect. It is the intellectual/cognitive aspect. There must be a balance between these two. Teachers of old described a person who is low in conviction but high only in intellect as cunning or deceitful. One who has only conviction but lacks intellect becomes a foolish person; he develops blind faith even in improper things. To balance these, one enters the practice to develop wisdom through conviction. That is why it is necessary. Thus it is with those two.

Similarly, another pair is energy and concentration. Energy tends toward restlessness (uddhacca). If one exerts excessive energy, the mind is bound to become restless. That is what happened to Venerable Soṇa. Concentration brings stillness to the mind. It is something that leads to sluggishness (līnatā) or absolute stillness. Restlessness comes through energy; the goal of concentration is stillness. At a glance, these seem contradictory. However, these must be developed systematically and evenly. One cannot develop concentration without energy. It is necessary to reach a certain level of concentration; it does not come by just doing nothing. Mindfulness (sati), which stands in the middle of these, balances conviction, wisdom, energy, and concentration, just like the needle of a weighing scale. There is such a relationship among these five Dhamma factors.

The balancing of the faculties (indriya-samatā) is an important matter in this Dispensation. Through the balancing of the faculties, we can see the Middle Path taught by the Buddha. In the middle way, nothing is extremist. Here, every factor assists another, at a balanced, middle level. Bringing it to this balanced level might sometimes exceed limits for certain individuals, depending on their personal disposition. Just like Venerable Soṇa, who practiced excessive energy until his feet cracked and bled. As you all know, the Buddha Himself was caught up in the two extremes. Everyone has heard of the two extremes mentioned in the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta. He experienced self-indulgence (kāmasukhallikānuyoga) in the royal palace, and He was also caught in the extreme of self-mortification (attakilamathānuyoga). It was after abandoning both those extremes that He arrived at the balanced level.

Not only that, on one occasion, the Buddha explained very intimately to the three monks Anuruddha, Nandiya, and Kimbila how He Himself had realized this balancing of energy during His days as a Bodhisatta. "On one occasion, I exerted intense energy." He gave a simile for this: "If a person trying to catch a quail holds it too tightly in his grasp, the quail might die. On the other hand, if he holds it too loosely, the bird will fly away. In the same way, I understood from that simile that energy must be balanced." He explained this based on His own experience through various similes.

Teachers of old also illustrated this point regarding the balancing of energy with various similes on different occasions. One simile found in the texts is that of the surgeon. In ancient times, surgeons trained their students—especially in surgeries like eye surgery—by having them draw lines with a scalpel on a blue water-lily petal floating on water. If someone is overly agitated, they will either submerge the lily petal in water or slice it completely through. The unskilled person, who has no dexterity, is too afraid even to touch the lily petal with the blade. The truly skilled person, who can apply balanced energy, is the one who carefully draws lines on the lily petal with the blade and passes the exercise.

There is another simile: the simile of filling oil into a narrow tube. If one tries to pour oil in a hurry, the oil will spill. On the other hand, some might be unable to pour oil into a narrow-mouthed tube because they are too afraid of spilling it. But if one applies extremely balanced energy, carefully and with mindfulness (sati), one can fill the oil successfully.

To take a simile suited to the modern mind, though not found in the texts: think of long-distance races in stadiums—let's say a ten-lap race around the track. What do some unskilled runners do? Eager for the cheers of the spectators, they run the first two or three laps as fast as they can. In the end, they are exhausted and have to drop out of the race. But what does the truly skilled runner do? He runs at a steady, moderate pace for the first few laps. It is in the final stretch, as if possessing the fourfold energy (caturanga-samannāgata-vīriya), that he applies his conserved strength when the right moment arrives, runs very fast, and wins the race.

The fourfold energy (caturanga-samannāgata-vīriya) is mentioned in the life of the Buddha. You devotees must have heard of this. Once the right time comes, once the balancing of energy is perfectly achieved, the energy applied is one of life-sacrifice. "Let only skin, sinews, and bones remain; let flesh and blood dry up. Whatever goal can be achieved by manly energy, by manly strength, by manly effort, will not be abandoned until it is reached." The Buddha Himself exerted this supreme effort, known as the fourfold energy (caturanga-samannāgata-vīriya). He also exhorted His disciples to apply such energy.

However, this energy becomes successful only when, as mentioned before, the balancing of the faculties (indriya-samatā) emerges. Only after arriving at the balanced middle. Indeed, it was only after arriving at the Middle Path that the Buddha realized Buddhahood through that fourfold energy. What happened to Venerable Soṇa initially was that he exerted extreme energy on the walking path for long periods in a way his body could not withstand. It was because of this that he even became discouraged in the first place.

The Buddha has illustrated the balancing of energy in the Dhamma through various similes. On one occasion, the Buddha related to the monks an account concerning a past Buddha. The Buddha Sikhī once visited a certain Brahma-world along with His chief disciple, the monk Abhibhū. Having gone there, He assigned that disciple, Venerable Abhibhū, to preach the Dhamma to the Brahmas. On that occasion, the psychically powerful Venerable Abhibhū proclaimed two verses in a voice that resounded throughout a thousand world systems. These are very famous among energetic practitioners as the Aruṇavatī Sutta. One of those verses is as follows:

> Ārabhatha nikkhamatha, > yuñjatha buddhasāsane;

> Dhunātha maccuno senaṃ,

> naḷāgāraṃva kuñjaro.

Even upon hearing it, it is phrased in a way that arouses energy. "Arouse energy, go forth, exert yourself in the Buddha's Dispensation; destroy the army of Death, like an elephant crushing a reed-hut." Such teachings on energy are found in the Dhamma.

Similarly, the Buddha Himself has pointed out three types of potential energies within our mental continuum as qualities that help overcome sleepiness and laziness:

* Ārambha-dhātu: the element of instigating effort (the power to begin something).

* Nikkhama-dhātu: the element of launching out (the power to carry forward what has been started).

* Parakkama-dhātu: the element of exerting progress (the power to advance by overcoming obstacles encountered along the way). These energies exist within us.

This is precisely what is indicated in that verse:

* Ārabhatha - "Arouse energy" (corresponds to ārambha-dhātu).

* Nikkhamatha - "Go forth" (corresponds to nikkhama-dhātu).

* Yuñjatha - "Exert yourself" (corresponds to parakkama-dhātu, overcoming obstacles and moving forward).

That showed the value of developing energy.

Likewise, on one occasion, the Buddha showed the eight grounds for laziness (kusīta-vatthu) and the eight grounds for arousing energy (ārambha-vatthu). What are called the "grounds for laziness" (kusīta-vatthu) are the eight occasions a lazy person uses to justify his lazy behavior. What are they? This is illustrated using a lazy monk. But it is not only for a monk; even a practicing layperson can take an example from this teaching. A lazy monk thinks in this way:

1. The lazy monk has some special work to do. Let us say a task connected with monastic life, such as dyeing robes. Then that monk thinks: "Now, I have such-and-such work to do. When doing this work, my body will get very tired. Therefore, I must sleep now." Saying this, he sleeps.

2. Next, let us say he has finished the work. Once the work is done, that monk thinks: "Now, I have done some heavy work. I am tired. Therefore, I must sleep now." He sleeps. Thus, he slept before doing it, and he slept after finishing it as well.

3. Next, let us say the lazy monk has to go on a journey. Before embarking on the journey, he thinks: "Now, when I go on the journey, my body will get tired. Therefore, I must rest now." He sleeps.

4. Next, he returns from the journey. Then he thinks: "Now, because I went on the journey, I am very tired." He sleeps. He slept again.

5. Next, the lazy monk goes on alms-round (piṇḍapāta). That day, he does not receive a stomach-full of food on his alms-round. Then he thinks: "Now my body is very weak. Today I did not receive proper food. Therefore, I must sleep." He sleeps.

6. Alternatively, let us say he received plenty of food on his alms-round. Having eaten his fill, after finishing the meal, he thinks: "Today my body is very heavy, as if stuffed with beans. Today, therefore, I cannot meditate." He sleeps.

7. Next, when the lazy monk has a slight illness, how does he think? "Now, I have fallen ill. How can a sick person meditate?" So he sleeps.

8. Next, after he recovers from that illness, he thinks: "I have only just recovered from this illness. My body does not yet have full strength." Therefore, he sleeps.

He is asleep all the time, the lazy monk, in this manner.

The Buddha shows in this wonderful manner how the energetic monk uses these very same situations to arouse his energy:

1. The energetic monk has some special work to do. Then what does he think? "I have such-and-such work to do. While doing that work, I will not be able to easily maintain my meditative wise attention (yoniso manasikāra) according to the Buddha's instruction. Therefore, I must practice energy right now. I must meditate, so as to quickly realize Nibbāna." Thus, he meditates with great enthusiasm.

2. Next, having finished that work, how does the energetic monk think? "While doing that work, I was unable to maintain my meditative wise attention (yoniso manasikāra) according to the Buddha's instruction. Now at least I must do so." Thus, he meditates with enthusiasm.

3. The energetic monk has to go on a journey. So, that monk thinks: "Now, I have to go on such-and-such a journey. While traveling, I will not be able to meditate properly according to the Buddha's instruction. Therefore, I must meditate right now, before the journey."

4. After returning from the journey, that monk thinks: "While on the journey, I was unable to meditate properly. Now at least I must do so." Thus, he meditates.

5. When the energetic monk goes on alms-round and on a certain day does not receive a stomach-full of food, how does he think? "Today my body is very light. Today my body is highly active and workable. Today I must meditate. That is the best thing to do." Thinking thus when receiving little food, he meditates.

6. On another day, returning from alms-round after receiving a stomach-full of food, how does he think? "Today my body has good strength. I must meditate well." Thus, he meditates.

7. Next, when the monk with aroused energy (āraddha-vīriya) gets a slight illness, how does he think? "Now, a slight illness has arisen in me. If it increases, I might even die. Therefore, I must meditate right now." Thus, he meditates.

8. As soon as he recovers from the illness, when he has just risen from his sickbed, what does he think? "Because of this illness, I was unable to practice properly. Perhaps the illness might return. Therefore, before that happens, I must meditate well to see Nibbāna." Thinking thus, he meditates.

Through this, we can see that between laziness, indolence, and energy, there is actually only a difference in attitude. This correct attitude, which is praised by the Buddha, is indeed the attitude of the energetic person. The energetic person utilizes every arising opportunity in a way that assists in reaching Nibbāna. The lazy person uses every single one of them in a way that assists saṃsāra. As there is a saying, "The lazy man has divine eyes..." Just like that, the lazy person has excuses for everything. The Buddha has always given the foremost place to the energetic person.

Furthermore, the Buddha introduces Himself as a teacher of action (kamma-vāda), a teacher of efficacy of action (kiriya-vāda), and a teacher of energy (vīriya-vāda). If we consider His doctrine (vāda), the Buddha is to be identified by these three terms.

* Kamma-vāda: that is, stating that one must act with faith in the power of action (kamma).

* Kiriya-vāda: that a person possesses the potential/power for action.

* Vīriya-vāda: that by exerting energy, one can bring forth that potential for action.

The Buddha explains the importance of these.

But there is also something in the world called the doctrine of non-action (akiriya-vāda). During the time of the Buddha, there were sharp proponents of non-action. The doctrine of non-action (akiriya-vāda) claims that there is no such thing as kamma, no power of action, and no such thing as energy; and that doing nothing should be one's ultimate goal. A teacher during the Buddha's time who promoted this philosophy was Makkhali Gosāla. So, on one occasion, the Buddha spoke to the monks about this philosophy of Gosāla in this manner: "Monks, of all the garments woven from threads, the most wretched, the most disgusting garment is the hair-blanket (kesa-kambala)." This was a garment woven from human hair used by certain ascetics of that time who claimed to practice fewness of wishes. That is indeed the most disgusting garment. "In the same way, of all the doctrines of ascetics, of all the views held among ascetics, the doctrine of non-action (akiriya-vāda) is the most disgusting, the most wretched doctrine."

Furthermore, He declared: "Whatever Fully Self-Enlightened Buddhas existed in the past, they were all teachers of action (kamma-vādī), teachers of the efficacy of action (kiriya-vādī), and teachers of energy (vīriya-vādī). Whatever Fully Self-Enlightened Buddhas arise in the future, they will all be teachers of action, teachers of the efficacy of action, and teachers of energy. I, who am now the Fully Self-Enlightened Buddha in the present, am also a teacher of action, a teacher of the efficacy of action, and a teacher of energy. This foolish man (mogha-purisa) Makkhali strikes at the teaching of the past Buddhas, strikes at the teaching of the future Buddhas, as well as my teaching in the present." He also gave another simile: "Monks, just as someone might cast a fishnet at the mouth of a river for the harm, suffering, and destruction of a vast number of fish, even so, this foolish man Makkhali has cast the net of this doctrine of non-action (akiriya-vāda) for the ruin, harm, and suffering of a vast number of human beings." The Buddha criticized and condemned Makkhali Gosāla’s doctrine to that extent.

Yet, merit-seeking friends, you may have also heard that nowadays, it is this very doctrine of non-action (akiriya-vāda) that is gaining more ground. Presenting various arguments such as "there is no such thing as kamma, no such thing as merit or demerit, one should not have conviction in their operation; exerting a person's power of action or energy is spiritually useless, it only reinforces the sense of 'I' (egotism)," they completely reject energy, without any understanding of the Dhamma principles shown by the Buddha, such as the balancing of energy (vīriya-samatā).

This is the philosophy of Makkhali. At first glance, this path seems easy. When a net is cast at the mouth of a river, it is sometimes cast with bait. Just as a large number of fish gather to eat that bait, only to meet their destruction, within the philosophy of non-action (akiriya-vāda), giving (dāna), virtue (sīla), and meditation (bhāvanā) are deemed useless. "There is no need to tire oneself with giving. No need to spend money and undergo trouble." "Observing virtue is also a useless thing." "Meditation is also a foolish thing." "It is a waste of time." Such wrong views appear easy. Swallowing that bait, people then get lost in saṃsāra. They meet with terrible destruction. That is why the Buddha specifically condemned that doctrine of Makkhali. It kills the power of action and the power of energy within a person. Through that, one can never achieve liberation. It is an extremely dangerous kind of philosophy.

Yet, in these times, many people are drawn to such views, like fish drawn into a net. A large number of people are drawn in because it seems easy, because they can just do nothing. A special reason for this is modern life—the luxurious lifestyle. If one can get electric light just by pressing a button, why can't one obtain the light of wisdom (paññā) just as easily? If, just by pressing a button, one can turn on a fan at home and enjoy a nice cool breeze, can one not obtain the peace of the coolness of Nibbāna while doing nothing? Either by doing nothing, or with very little energy. That is how someone argues. But what lies within this is none other than that doctrine of non-action (akiriya-vāda) of Makkhali Gosāla.

Another example of aroused energy (āraddha-vīriya) that can be taken from the Buddha's time is Venerable Ānanda's attainment of Arahantship. Three months after the parinibbāna of the Buddha, a Dhamma council was held. Although seats were prepared for five hundred Arahant monks to assemble, one monk was missing. A highly essential Venerable monk was missing. Venerable Ānanda, who had retained all the Buddha's discourses in memory and served as the Buddha's personal attendant for many years, had not yet attained Arahantship. That was the deficiency. The council was to begin the following day.

The night before, Venerable Ānanda put in all the effort he could, meditating intensely while resolving in all four postures. Still, he did not attain Arahantship. While meditating intensely in this way, late at night when it was time to rest, he washed his feet, went to his bed, and bent his body to lie down on the couch. At that moment, he was neither in the sitting posture nor yet in the lying posture. It was right in between those two postures that Venerable Ānanda's mind was liberated from all taints (āsava), and he attained Arahantship. This is a unique occurrence in this entire Dispensation, making Venerable Ānanda the only monk to have attained Arahantship apart from the four standard postures, right in between them. Yet, some people argue even about this event, saying: "Even Venerable Ānanda attained Arahantship only after making so much effort and then giving it up, didn't he?" Most people do not understand the underlying principle (dhammatā) in this.

Venerable Ānanda was indeed a wondrous monk who received the chief (etadagga) status from the Buddha in several categories. Etadagga means the Buddha declaring: "Foremost among my disciples." You all know that the Buddha declared Venerable Ānanda foremost among personal attendants. He is also declared: Satimantānaṃ, gatimantānaṃ, dhitimantānaṃ... etadaggaṃ.

* Satimantānaṃ: Foremost among disciples of great mindfulness (sati).

* Gatimantānaṃ: Foremost among those of great comprehension/behavioral course (gati).

* Dhitimantānaṃ: Foremost among those of resoluteness (dhiti)—those who stand firm in the task they have undertaken, acting with intense energy and power of determination.

Furthermore, Venerable Ānanda once declared about himself: "My best noble friend (kalyāṇa-mitta) is mindfulness directed to the body (kāyagatā-sati)." With this background, keeping Venerable Ānanda in mind, let us analyze the energy he exerted on that day in this manner.

The Venerable monk made effort with intense determination, thinking: "I cannot join this Sasana activity tomorrow without becoming an Arahant. This Sasana task is an absolute necessity. Somehow, for the sake of the Sasana, I must practice energy, become fit for this task, and then enter it." You devotees can understand that within this, a certain restlessness (uddhacca) naturally arises. That is called over-exerted energy (accāraddha-vīriya). In this verse, it is mentioned as accāraddhamhi. Aroused energy (āraddha-vīriya) is good. Initiating energy is good. But over-exerted energy (accāraddha-vīriya) is bad. Ati-āraddha-vīriya—excessive energy—is bad. For Venerable Ānanda, at the moment of that exertion, his mind had actually slipped unconsciously into a state of restlessness (uddhacca).

So, while acting with mindfulness in every posture, practicing mindfulness directed to the body (kāyagatā-sati), during the transition from the sitting posture to the lying-down posture, we can think of an analogy: even a skilled driver driving a high-speed vehicle has to carefully reduce the speed slightly before making a turn. Something similar must have occurred with Venerable Ānanda. In every posture, he had established mindfulness with intense energy. At that transition between postures, he arrived at the balancing of energy. That is the concentration of bodily postures (iriyāpatha-samādhi).

Indeed, merit-seeking friends, the Buddha compares these four postures to the rolling of a wheel. Postures change just like a rolling wheel. From the sitting posture, one stands up. Having stood up, one remains standing. Then, one takes steps. One walks, sits, lies down. In this way, it goes around. Like a cycle. Between these four postures, there are transitions (joints). Most people are not even aware of these transitions. One who works in a constant hurry has no understanding of these postures. As soon as he hears some urgent news in a rush, he does not even realize that he has stood up. The person who was sitting is suddenly running.

On the other hand, a mindful person, while sitting, contemplates that very posture of sitting. Contemplating the sitting posture, he stands up. The physical vehicle that was sitting has now stood up; contemplating the standing posture, he puts it into action. He begins walking. That is how one walks if one is mindful. But the one who lacks mindfulness, as soon as that news is heard, there he goes running. Ordinary worldlings do not have any understanding of even these postures of the body (iriyāpatha). Yet, Venerable Ānanda—the mindful one, who had long practiced mindfulness directed to the body (kāyagatā-sati) as his friend—even though he had exerted excessive energy (accāraddha-vīriya) due to a certain weakness in his eagerness for that Sasana purpose, nevertheless, by some underlying principle, arrived at the balancing of energy at the transition of postures. That is why he attained Arahantship at that moment. It was not because he abandoned energy. Some people think it was because he abandoned energy. That was not what happened. He attained Arahantship by realizing the balancing of energy (vīriya-samatā).

Indeed, the balancing of energy is understood only by the person who enters into the work. You cannot swim while staying on dry land. Whether in swimming or driving vehicles, in all these, the skill emerges only when one is engaged in it and understands the balancing of energy. For within that energy, there are two extremes. In intense energy, there is rigidity. Rigidity is not good. In low energy, there is laxity. That is also not good.

If even the Bodhisatta, who had fulfilled the perfections (pāramīs) to such an extent, and Venerable Ānanda made mistakes, there is no fault in our making mistakes. But one must enter into the work. Only the person who has entered into the work understands this. The ordinary worldling has no issue regarding this at all. It is only from the moment one starts driving a vehicle that one understands how to control the vehicle. Should the steering wheel be turned too much, or turned too little? All of this is understood only when one actually drives the vehicle. Like the person who gets into the water to swim, there too, one must be able to stay afloat without sinking. For that, a special skill must be brought forth. Similarly, only the person who has entered into the work can gradually move away from the two extremes and arrive at the middle. That is how one begins playing the lute as well. The beginner does not know whether the strings are too tight or too loose. Whichever way you look at them, these similes are highly practical.

It is the habit of many to take only the literal meaning (vācyārtha) of these similes and illustrations in the Dhamma, looking only at the external aspect of the event, and thereby arrive at various wrong conclusions. But the Buddha has firmly declared: "If you are to take any doctrine as mine, it is to be stated as kamma-vāda, kiriya-vāda, and vīriya-vāda."

Some might misunderstand kamma-vāda, thinking: "Everything happens because of the past. Therefore, there is nothing for us to do. Let things go as they will." It is not so; there is a deep meaning to this concept of kamma. All of this is a power arising through our intention (cetanā) in the present moment. Just as it is said, "Intention, monks, is what I call action (cetanāhaṃ bhikkhave kammaṃ vadāmi)," we possess a power in the present moment through this power of intention. To change these forces, we must apply energy at a certain point, just like in the race mentioned earlier. Steadying ourselves as described, and in the final moment, developing that fourfold energy (caturanga-samannāgata-vīriya) with life-sacrifice, making the effort...

Even those who speak against exerting energy in spiritual life apply energy to worldly affairs, such as earning wealth. Why, then, do they say that no energy is needed for Sasana activities, meditation, and so forth? There lies a wrong view regarding the dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi). Nowadays, we hear various distorted explanations such as "developing energy increases the dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi)." As mentioned, nets have been cast everywhere at the mouth of the river. There are nets of wrong views (micchā-diṭṭhi) on all sides. Without falling into them, without being caught by them, one must understand this Dhamma of the Buddha in the way it should be understood. One must understand not only the literal meaning (vācyārtha) of these stories but also their deep meaning—the Dhamma-conforming meaning—and enter into the Middle Path to practice. Within this Dhamma, there is a Middle Path (majjhimā paṭipadā). A simile often used is that to cross a fast-flowing, torrential river, we must apply balanced energy. One cannot simply rush blindly into it. Yielding to the water while maintaining mindfulness and wisdom, slowly, step-by-step, one must reach the other shore. There too, lies a middle way, a balanced level.

This is the very principle (dhammatā) we can bring forth from this story. If you devotees deeply absorb these facts into your minds, performing your deeds of giving (dāna), virtue (sīla), and meditation (bhāvanā) with greater conviction (saddhā)—for it is from conviction that energy (vīriya) arises—you can then bring forth mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). The balancing of faculties can be brought forth in that manner at some point; but to say it has truly arisen—it is the person who has attained the path and fruit, the Stream-entrant (Sotāpanna), who possesses true conviction (saddhā). Generally, no matter how much conviction we claim to have, true conviction belongs only to the person who has seen Nibbāna for the first time. It is truly established only at the moment of attaining the path and fruit.

A balance in this does not occur automatically. That is what needs to be understood. Just as Venerable Soṇa understood it. Just as Venerable Ānanda understood it. Let alone others, even the Buddha, despite having fulfilled the perfections (pāramīs) to such an extent, did not find his intense, extreme energy fruitful until He first brought forth this Middle Path. Therefore, we must indeed reflect that if liberation from saṃsāra is our ultimate goal, it is not obtained effortlessly. It requires an effort more intense than in any other pursuit, yet in a highly systematic and orderly manner—neither struggling restlessly, nor doing nothing, nor over-exerting, but at a balanced middle level can we succeed in this ultimate goal.

On this valuable Poya day, you devotees listened to this precious Dhamma for about an hour. You also undertook a noble virtue (sīla) and developed those qualities of wisdom (paññā), energy (vīriya), mindfulness (sati), and concentration (samādhi). As we mentioned, these truly emerge in their proper form only at the stage of the path and fruit. Yet, as a preliminary phase, if these principles sink into your minds, you too will be able to achieve that state. Thus, having gained an understanding of the balancing of energy, and having guarded your virtue (sīla) to some extent through today's practice... That virtue is what assists concentration (samādhi). That concentration is what, to some level, assists wisdom (paññā). Understanding this systematic sequence, make an aspiration: "May the merits of listening to this Dhamma lead me to quickly escape all suffering (dukkha) of saṃsāra, such as birth (jāti), decay and death (jarāmaraṇa), and sickness, and to realize the supreme, deathless Nibbāna!"

Likewise, make this aspiration: "May all those throughout this universe, from the Avīci hell to the Akaniṭṭha heaven, including our deceased relatives, who wish to rejoice in the merits of this Dhamma sermon and Dhamma listening—by rejoicing in this merit, may they attain peace in the noble, deathless Nibbāna through the Bodhi of their aspiration!" Having made this aspiration, recite the verses in this manner:

“Ettāvatā ca amhehi.....”

Dear Listeners,

The Teacher of the Three Worlds, the Supreme Buddha, points out to us that the entire journey of saṃsāra, which is a struggle between life and death, is indeed a state of heedlessness, and that the path to the Deathless Nibbāna is heedfulness. One traverses this journey of saṃsāra by regarding Suffering (Dukkha) as happiness. How one falls prey to this perverted perception, which arises due to ignorance and Craving (Taṇhā), will become clear through today's thematic verse and its corresponding origin story.

In the Kuṇḍasāla forest of the Koliya country, the Buddha preached this verse in connection with the female lay disciple named Suppavāsā. She, known as Suppavāsā Koliyadhītā, was the mother of the Great Arahant Sīvalī. The Great Arahant Sīvalī, who attained the foremost position among those of great gains, obtained the gift of life amidst a mountain of great Suffering (Dukkha). For Ven. Sīvalī spent seven years and seven days in his mother's womb. During those last seven days, that mother experienced extremely bitter labor pains due to an obstructed pregnancy. Even at that moment, having faith in the Triple Gem, she endured that bitter pain through three Dhamma-accordant reflections, through three thoughts. It is recorded there in this manner:

“Sammāsambuddho vata so bhagavā yo imassa evarūpassa dukkhassa pahānāya dhammaṃ deseti”

The Blessed One is indeed the Fully Self-Awakened One, who teaches the Dhamma for the abandoning of such Suffering (Dukkha).

“Supaṭipanno vata so bhagavato sāvakasaṅgho yo imassa evarūpassa dukkhassa pahānāya paṭipanno”

Of good conduct indeed is the Sangha of disciples of that Blessed One, who have entered the path for the abandoning of such Suffering (Dukkha).

“Susukhaṃ vata taṃ nibbānaṃ yatthidaṃ evarūpaṃ dukkhaṃ na vijjati”

Extremely peaceful indeed is that Nibbāna wherein such Suffering (Dukkha) is not found.

Through these kinds of reflections, through these three Dhamma-accordant thoughts, she endured that bitter pain. Then, she spoke to her husband and told him: “Go and inquire about the health of the Blessed One, and then inform Him in this manner: ‘Suppavāsā, the Koliya daughter, having carried a child in her womb for seven years, is now experiencing the bitter pain of a difficult pregnancy for these seven days. Yet, she endures that pain through these three kinds of reflections.’” Suppavāsā's husband met the Buddha and conveyed that message exactly as requested. As soon as it was spoken, the Buddha uttered just one sentence as a blessing: “Sukhini hotu suppavāsā koliyadhītā, arogā arogaṃ puttaṃ vijāyatu” — “May Suppavāsā, the Koliya daughter, be happy. Being healthy, may she give birth to a healthy son.” At that very moment, Suppavāsā became well and gave birth to a son.

Now, when the husband returned home and witnessed this miracle, he was greatly delighted, thinking: “This is a great wonder, a marvelous thing! Such relief was received just by the word of blessing spoken through the power of the Blessed One.” Next, Suppavāsā says to her husband: “Now, go and make this invitation to the Blessed One: ‘Suppavāsā, the Koliya daughter, has given birth to a healthy child. Suppavāsā invites the Sangha of monks headed by the Buddha to accept alms for seven days.’” So, the husband went back, reported this matter to the Buddha, and made the alms invitation on behalf of Suppavāsā.

By that time, the Sangha of monks headed by the Buddha had already received another invitation from a certain lay disciple, who was an attendant of the Great Arahant Mahā Moggallāna. The Buddha did something special here; He called Venerable Mahā Moggallāna and said: “Moggallāna, tell that lay disciple: ‘Suppavāsā, the Koliya daughter, having carried a pregnancy for seven years and seven days, has now safely delivered. She makes this invitation for seven days. Let those next seven days be given to her, and postpone your alms-giving to a later date.’” The Great Arahant Moggallāna went and made this request to that lay disciple.

Perhaps because that lay disciple was wise, he made the following statement to the Great Arahant Moggallāna: “Venerable sir, if you can guarantee three things for me, I will yield my turn of alms-giving to Suppavāsā.” What were those three things? “You must assure me that my wealth and possessions will not be destroyed within these seven days. Similarly, you must guarantee that my life will not end; that is the second point. And you must guarantee that my faith (saddhā) will not waver or decline." He asked the Great Arahant Moggallāna to guarantee these three things.

The Great Arahant Moggallāna says: "Lay disciple, I can guarantee two of those things for you. But the third thing you must guarantee for yourself." You, meritorious friends, know that the Great Arahant Moggallāna possessed great psychic powers; he was the foremost among those with psychic power. He must have seen clearly regarding those two matters. He says: "I can guarantee that your wealth will not perish during these seven days, and that your life will not perish. But faith is something that belongs to you alone; you yourself must be responsible for it."

Then, that lay disciple wisely replied: "Very well, Venerable Sir, if you assure me of those two, I agree. Let Suppavāsā offer this alms-food. I will undertake to offer my alms-giving later." After the Great Arahant Moggallāna went and reported this matter to the Buddha, Suppavāsā prepared the alms-food magnificently on the following day and personally offered it with her own hands to the Sangha of monks headed by the Buddha.

Indeed, this is a miraculous event. Perhaps some might even doubt it. It is mentioned that even that young child was made to pay homage to the Sangha headed by the Buddha. Not only that, the Great Arahant Sāriputta addressed this child and asked: "Child, I hope you are comfortable, with no pain or trouble?" This was like inquiring about the well-being of an ordinary person. Then this little child answered: "Venerable Sir, what happiness could there be for me? What happiness could there be for one who lived for seven years and seven days inside a jar of blood?" Hearing this conversation, Suppavāsā, the Koliya daughter, was exceedingly delighted. She was overjoyed thinking, "What a meritorious child this is, to converse with the Great Arahant Sāriputta in this manner!" Seeing her joy, the Buddha asked Suppavāsā: "Well, Suppavāsā, would you like to have more children like this?" Then Suppavāsā replied, just like many mothers say nowadays: "Not just one child, I would be delighted to have even seven children like this!" It was then that the Buddha uttered the verse we mentioned earlier.

> Asātaṃ sātarūpena,

> piyarūpena appiyaṃ,

> dukkhaṃ sukhassa rūpena,

> pamattaṃ ativattati.

This is declared as an Udāna verse. When we say 'Udāna' (inspired utterance), we usually think of a joyful exclamation. But one should not think that the Buddha was merely approving Suppavāsā's words. Looking at the mind in accordance with the Dhamma, this verse contains an instructive, advisory statement.

Asātaṃ sātarūpena — what is unpleasant in the guise of the pleasant;

Piyarūpena appiyaṃ — what is unlovely in the guise of the lovely;

Dukkhaṃ sukhassa rūpena — Suffering (Dukkha) in the guise of happiness;

Pamattaṃ ativattati — overwhelms the heedless person.

Now, you, meritorious friends, can think about this. In addition to this, we must say that you have probably heard much about the Great Arahant Sīvalī. As the foremost Great Arahant in terms of great gains, many meritorious people even hang pictures of the Great Arahant Sīvalī in their homes. But they do not think much about the other side—about the mountain of Suffering (Dukkha) he endured. They do not think of the immense mountain of Suffering (Dukkha) amidst which he obtained his limited gains. Well, the Buddha, on a certain occasion in the Jātaka Pāli, explains under the name 'Asātarūpa Jātaka' that there was a kamma underlying this as well. It appears that when the monks had gathered, they discussed: “Ah, what Suffering (Dukkha) this mother and son have endured, especially Ven. Sīvalī in his childhood!” The Buddha, having entered the Dhamma hall, revealed the past story in this manner:

In the past, when the Bodhisatta was born as the son of King Brahmadatta of Bārāṇasī and was ruling, the King of Kosala, being more powerful, came and seized the kingdom, killed the king, made the queen his chief consort, and began ruling Bārāṇasī. At that time, the son escaped through a waterway, hid, gathered an army, and came to fight to reclaim his kingdom. He sent a message to the King of Kosala: “Hand over the kingdom or fight!” As the king prepared for war, the chief consort, who was the prince's mother, sent a secret message: “There is no need to fight; just besiege the city. Once the city is besieged, you can capture it by leaving the people with nothing to eat or drink, starving them.” This was the advice given by the mother. Following this, the son blockaded the city for seven days. With the people left helpless, they finally killed the King of Kosala and brought his head to the prince. In that manner, the problem was solved. However, it is the unwholesome kamma that is pointed out here. The Buddha declared that because of the advice given—the advice to blockade and starve them in that manner to capture the kingdom—and the kamma committed by the son who followed that advice, the kamma ripened in this exact manner.

Now, a certain aspect of the ripening of kamma is revealed through this. Next, let us try to uncover an important aspect of this story. We see that there is something to be grasped even from the conversation between that lay disciple and the Great Arahant Moggallāna. The lay gentleman was not ready to yield his turn of alms-giving merely because the Buddha said so. A doubt arose in the lay disciple: “Even though I promised to give alms, if by any chance my wealth to give alms is lost during these seven days, or if my life is not preserved, or even if all these are present, if my faith (saddhā) is lost, how will I give alms?” Thinking in this way, he made that request to guarantee these things.

And the Great Arahant Moggallāna, too, acted in accordance with the Dhamma; there too, we have a lesson to learn. Even though he was so highly advanced in psychic power and possessed great majesty, he could not guarantee another person's faith (saddhā). This is an important point in the Dhamma.

The faith (saddhā) found in the Dhamma of the Buddha is not blind devotion. It is not something done by becoming enslaved or subservient to anyone. It is something belonging to oneself. One must be responsible for it oneself. Regarding that matter, the word of the Great Arahant Moggallāna is indeed in agreement with the Buddha's word. Related points are mentioned in various places in the Dhamma. Especially, there is a discourse called the Vīmaṃsaka Sutta. There, the Buddha tells the monks that even a monk who does not possess the power to read others' minds should investigate even the Tathāgata Himself through things cognizable by the eye and ear, and only then develop faith (saddhā). Thus, the living Buddha invited even His own Sangha of monks to investigate whether He has any shortcomings, and then, having investigated, to establish their faith (saddhā) that He is indeed the Fully Self-Awakened One.

Similarly, on another occasion, in the discourse called the Upāli Sutta, mention is made of Upāli the householder, who was a very prominent disciple of Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta. When, on a certain occasion, through a Dhamma discussion, he developed faith (saddhā) in the Buddha and took refuge in the Triple Gem, the Buddha declared: "Householder Upāli, it is not good for well-known people like you in the country to make such hasty decisions. Anuviccākāro—investigate, think it over, and think further before taking refuge in the Triple Gem. Do not be so hasty." Then, the householder Upāli was actually much more delighted. What is shown by this is that the Buddhist attitude leads to investigation. That faith (saddhā) is not blind devotion. It is something belonging to each individual. This, meritorious friends, you too should understand well.

That wealth belongs to oneself. Among the types of wealth such as the wealth of faith, the wealth of virtue, and the wealth of moral shame and fear, this is the foremost wealth; it cannot be shaken by anyone in that manner. Whether it is shaken or not is something belonging to oneself. Wrong views can indeed shake it. But one must strive to make it unshakable faith. What is called unshakable faith is the stage where one has, to some extent, directly realized the Dhamma. We pointed out this fact as an additional point, yet it is contained within this discourse.

Next, let us return to the main narrative mentioned in this story. Look now at the mother of the Great Arahant Sīvalī, Suppavāsā. Having suffered such pain—pain that no other mother had ever experienced—and due to the joy arising from maternal affection, when the Buddha asked her, she said she would be pleased to have even seven more such children. That is exactly what is expressed in that verse. That is the nature of the world. Even if one suffers a massive mountain of Suffering (Dukkha), one forgets it. That is why it was said: Asātaṃ sātarūpena—what is unpleasant appears as pleasant, and what is unlovely appears as lovely. Thinking in this way, one falls into heedlessness. No matter how much faith (saddhā) she possessed, because Suppavāsā fell into heedlessness at that moment, the Buddha uttered this verse as an admonition. This is a hidden aspect of the life of the Great Arahant Sīvalī during his childhood.

We rarely hear of people who have the power to recall the past. However, in most cases, a child has no memory whatsoever of the time spent in the mother's womb. Even if there is no memory, the child comes out crying, as if to express that Suffering (Dukkha) in brief. We must understand this. Yet, it is mentioned that the Great Arahant Sīvalī possessed a certain power. It is clear from his answer that he had a recollection of it. If he was able to say, “What happiness could there be for me who lived for so long inside a jar of blood?” then that child indeed had that power. Regarding this, it is recorded in the texts in this manner: Ven. Sīvalī did not need to be given a separate meditation subject. Simply by reflecting on that Suffering (Dukkha), on that Suffering of Birth (jāti-dukkha)...

Many of our Buddhist friends do not even like to accept the Suffering of Birth (jāti-dukkha). When a child is born in a home, it is a cause for great joy—obtaining the 'treasure of a child.' But the disaster within it is not understood by many. That disaster is also quickly forgotten. That birth was a disastrous, perilous occasion for both the mother and the child. They forget it, make merry over it, and commemorate it year after year by holding birthday parties. There lies the Suffering of Birth (jāti-dukkha). Thus, it is mentioned in the Dhamma that by recollecting the Suffering of Birth (jāti-dukkha), the Great Arahant Sīvalī attained his Arahantship, making that his subject of meditation.

Furthermore, if we go deeper into this, and compile the Dhamma categories mentioned here like 'pleasant form' and 'agreeable form,' the Buddha points out that the defilement or purification of beings occurs through causes and conditions. The most valuable part of this Dhamma—as you, meritorious friends, also accept—is the teaching of Dependent Arising (paṭicca-samuppāda), which is the teaching that everything occurs according to causes and conditions, a teaching not found in any other doctrine. An occasion that highlights this is mentioned. Once, a Licchavi chief named Mahāli said to the Buddha: “Venerable Sir, the teacher named Pūraṇa Kassapa expresses this view: ‘Beings are defiled without cause, without condition. Beings are purified without any cause. The purification and defilement of beings are without cause and without condition.’ Pūraṇa Kassapa holds such a view. What does the Blessed One say about this?” he asked the Blessed One.

Then, the Buddha declared: “I say that it is with cause and condition that one becomes defiled. Likewise, it is with cause and condition that one obtains purity, obtains purification of mind.” When asked, “How do I understand this?” the Buddha explained it by means of these five: form, Sensation (vedanā), perception, Preparations (saṅkhāra), and Consciousness (viññāṇa).

The Buddha analyzes it in this way: “If this form, or the part we call the body, were exclusively painful, if nothing called happiness could ever be associated with it, if this body were purely filled with Suffering (Dukkha), beings would not become attached to it. This body is not purely Suffering (Dukkha); there is a pleasant aspect to it, and one can form a perception of pleasure in it. It is because of this that they get attached to it. Due to that attachment, a bond is formed. Due to that bond, defilement occurs.” There, the natural law was shown. It is the same with the others. In Sensation (vedanā), too, there is a similar nature. Sensation (vedanā) is not purely Suffering (Dukkha). There is also a pleasant aspect. It is the same with perception and so on. Up to Consciousness (viññāṇa), every single one cannot be said to be purely Suffering (Dukkha); there is also a pleasant aspect. If we look at things as they really are, that is why there is attachment. Due to that attachment, a bond is formed. Due to the bond, there is defilement. Due to that defilement, one goes on and on in saṃsāra.

Next, He states the other side. What was described just now was how one becomes defiled. Next, He explains how one becomes purified: “If this aggregate of form was purely pleasant, if there were no Suffering (Dukkha) in this form, then one would never become disenchanted with it. One becomes disenchanted with it because there is a certain nature of Suffering (Dukkha) in it.” That too is a natural law. The Buddha accepts that too as a truth. It is because of that nature of Suffering (Dukkha) that beings become disenchanted with it. Through that disenchantment, dispassion arises. Through that dispassion, purification, liberation arises. This is the natural law shown there by the Buddha. It is not something done by the Buddha, nor is it something done by anyone else. It is demonstrated here that this occurs in accordance with causes and conditions.

Now, next we present a Dhamma category that is extremely valuable for practitioners and meditators. You, meritorious friends, might have heard that the Buddha preached deep, valuable discourses like the Mahāsatipaṭṭhāna Sutta and the Mahānidāna Sutta to the people of the Kuru country. Even in the commentaries to those origin stories, it is mentioned that the Kuru country was a prosperous land and its people were wise. The Buddha preached those valuable discourses on His own initiative, even without any specific question being asked.

On one occasion, the Buddha addressed the Sangha of monks and asked this question: “Monks, do you practice the exploration called antara-sammasana (internal scrutiny)?” Antara-sammasana means scrutinizing from within. Scrutiny actually means exploring or investigating. Otherwise, the general idea is "investigation from within." This can be analyzed further in due course. When He asked the monks in general whether they perform such an internal investigation, a certain monk declared: “Venerable Sir, I do practice such a thing.” Next, this is all that is mentioned in the Dhamma: when that monk was asked, “How do you practice that internal exploration called antara-sammasana?” the answer given by that monk is not recorded. It is recorded in this way: the Blessed One was not satisfied with the answer he gave, deeming it insufficient. At that moment, Ven. Ānanda stepped forward and said: “Blessed One, this is the time, this is the proper time! Let the Blessed One explain to the Sangha of monks what this antara-sammasana (internal scrutiny) is, what this investigation from within means.”

From there, the Buddha explains: “A certain monk investigates the facts from within, as they really are, in this manner. He thinks: ‘What is this Aging and Death (jarāmaraṇa)?’ If there are various kinds of Aging and Death (jarāmaraṇa) and diverse forms of Suffering (Dukkha) in the world in connection with this life, what is the cause of these sufferings? From what does this Suffering (Dukkha) arise? What is its root? What is its cause?’ Investigating thus, he realizes: ‘Whatever Aging and Death (jarāmaraṇa) and Suffering (Dukkha) exist, they all arise due to assets (upadhi).’”

The word 'upadhi' (assets) is used in the Dhamma to refer to the five aggregates of Grasping (upādāna)—form, Sensation (vedanā), perception, Preparations (saṅkhāra), and Consciousness (viññāṇa), which one holds on to thinking ‘this is mine.’ These things grabbed through Grasping (upādāna) are what become assets (upadhi). To put it briefly, the wealth we earn and acquire becomes deposits, our assets, when deposited in a bank. In the same way, the greatest asset we carry through saṃsāra is the five aggregates of Grasping (upādāna). These five heaps of 'my form, my Sensation (vedanā),' which are held by the mind—that is what is called assets (upadhi). When that monk investigates within, he understands that this problem of Aging and Death (jarāmaraṇa) arises precisely because of these five. He investigates further into it from within: ‘Why do assets (upadhi) arise? Due to what cause? By what condition? What is its root?’ When seeking the cause in this way, he understands that Craving (Taṇhā) is its root. For it is due to that Craving (Taṇhā) that one grabs things through Grasping (upādāna). It is those grabbed things that one deposits as 'I' and 'mine.' Therefore, Craving (Taṇhā) is the root. This is how one penetrates deeper. May you, meritorious friends, direct your minds accordingly.

Next, that monk contemplates: ‘Where does this Craving (Taṇhā) arise? Where does it establish itself?’ Then he realizes that this Craving (Taṇhā) arises—the words ‘piya-rūpa’ (lovely form) are mentioned there—wherever there is something of a lovely nature, an agreeable nature in the world; it is there that Craving (Taṇhā) arises. It is there that Craving (Taṇhā) settles down, or establishes itself. Wherever the world perceives or thinks there is a lovely nature, an agreeable nature, right there Craving (Taṇhā) settles down. There Craving (Taṇhā) is born. There Craving (Taṇhā) establishes itself.

Next, it is asked: ‘What is it in the world that is regarded generally as lovely form and pleasant form, as a lovely nature and an agreeable nature?’ It is these six sense-bases—the eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind—that are regarded in the world as lovely and pleasant things. It is in dependence on them that one experiences that pleasure in the world. The Buddha further declares regarding this: “In the past, whatever recluses and brahmins regarded these things considered as lovely and pleasant form—these six sense-bases, either one or all of them—as pleasure, as permanent, as a refuge, as health, as safety, those recluses and brahmins, because of that, fell into those attachments. Consequently, because of that attitude, they nurtured what they had regarded as lovely and pleasant form. Since Craving (Taṇhā) grows through that attitude, assets (upadhi) grew as a result. What was grabbed by Grasping (upādāna) due to Craving (Taṇhā) deposited in the mind and grew as assets (upadhi). If any recluse or brahmin nurtured assets (upadhi), they nurtured Suffering (Dukkha)."

So, what we have here is that, due to that attitude, because of regarding those lovely and pleasant things as permanent, as pleasure, as health, as safe, as a refuge, they grew. Due to Craving (Taṇhā), assets (upadhi) grew. Due to assets (upadhi), Suffering (Dukkha) grew. Because Suffering (Dukkha) grew, they never escaped from saṃsāra. They did not escape from Birth (jāti), Aging and Death (jarāmaraṇa), sorrow, lamentation, and despair. Just as in the past, so too in the future, whichever recluses and brahmins adopt that attitude regarding these lovely and pleasant things, regarding them as permanent, as pleasure, as health, as safe, they will nurture Craving (Taṇhā). By nurturing Craving (Taṇhā), assets (upadhi) grow. From assets (upadhi), Suffering (Dukkha) grows. Through the growth of Suffering (Dukkha), they remain imprisoned in saṃsāra, enduring that kind of mountain of Suffering (Dukkha).

Next, He gives an illustration and a simile for this: "Monks, suppose there is a cup of beverage that is very fragrant, colorful, and delicious, but it is mixed with poison. A man arrives there, thirsty and exhausted in the scorching heat of summer. When he arrives, the people there say to him: 'Here is a beverage that is beautiful, fragrant, and tasty. But there is a small drawback: it is mixed with poison. If you wish, you may drink it. While drinking, it is very delicious and fragrant, a beautiful drink. But once drunk, you will either die or undergo suffering equivalent to death.' Yet that man, without thinking further, being thirsty and exhausted, drinks it. Having drunk it, he either meets death or undergoes suffering equivalent to death." This is the simile the Buddha presents regarding that first attitude.

Next, the Buddha shows the other side regarding those lovely and pleasant things. "In the past, if any recluses and brahmins changed their attitude towards them, regarding them as Impermanent (anicca) (whereas previously they regarded them as permanent), as Suffering (dukkha), as Not-self (anattā), as a disease, as a danger, they thereby abandoned Craving (Taṇhā)." This is the second attitude towards those lovely things. What is it? They regarded them as Impermanent (anicca), as Suffering (dukkha), as Not-self (anattā), as a disease or illness, as a danger. "Such recluses and brahmins destroyed Craving (Taṇhā). When Craving (Taṇhā) was destroyed, assets (upadhi) were destroyed. When assets (upadhi) were destroyed, Suffering (Dukkha) was destroyed. They were liberated from those sufferings such as Birth (jāti), Aging and Death (jarāmaraṇa)." Hearing this, you, meritorious friends, can now understand those terms like lovely form and pleasant form.

Here is the simile given for that: “Just as before, there is a cup of poison. Just as before, a thirsty and exhausted man arrives. People say to him: ‘This is a colorful, fragrant, and delicious beverage. However, once drunk, such-and-such a thing will happen.’ That person, contemplating wisely, thinks: ‘I can quench my thirst with some water, or buttermilk, or some other beverage. I can satisfy my thirst with that. If I drink this, it will bring about my ruin.’ Thus thinking, he rejects it.” This is what is said about that attitude. Recluses and brahmins of that kind, through that attitude, reject those lovely things. Through that, they are liberated from Suffering (Dukkha).

This is an extremely deep discourse. Now, if we investigate this word sammasana (scrutiny) a little further: for an insight (vipassanā) practitioner, meditation means practicing the scrutiny of Preparations (saṅkhāra-sammasana). We have occasionally compared this word sammasana (scrutiny) with the word parāmāsa (grasping). The word parāmāsa is mostly used in connection with views. Followers of other sects often look at things superficially, adopt a certain view, and asserting “idaṃ eva saccaṃ mogham-aññaṃ” — ‘this alone is the truth, everything else is false’ — they hold on to it through Grasping (upādāna), become trapped within it, and end up unable to progress. But what is found in the Dhamma is not parāmāsa (dogmatic grasping) but sammasana (wise scrutiny). If we go further by means of a simile, we can explain the simile the Buddha gave for those Preparations (saṅkhāra) when discussing parāmāsa.

You, meritorious friends, have heard that the aggregate of Preparations (saṅkhārakkhandha) is compared to a banana tree trunk. The Buddha on one occasion explained why this aggregate of Preparations (saṅkhārakkhandha) is compared to a banana tree trunk. It is like this: when a man enters a forest and sees these banana trees, what does he think? Thinking there is some essence or heartwood in it, he cuts it at the root, shoulders it, brings it home, and when he examines it, he finds no heartwood at all. He realizes there is no essence in it. But let us think for a moment: without going to the trouble of carrying the banana trunk home, what if he gently peeled it and inspected it right there? As he removes one layer of the banana trunk, there is another layer. As he removes that, there is yet another layer. It is just a pile of layers. There is no heartwood or essence whatsoever. The method that leads to this understanding is what is called sammasana (wise scrutiny). It is like carefully touching and examining. On the other hand, tightly gripping it, grasping it, and carrying it on one's shoulder is what is called parāmāsa. Sammasana means gently handling, inspecting, and examining.

Therefore, this is why the Buddha spoke of antara-sammasana (internal scrutiny) here. One approaches those lovely and pleasant forms gently through that understanding: ‘From where does this mass of Suffering (Dukkha) arise? From where does this Aging and Death (jarāmaraṇa), this Suffering (Dukkha) arise?’ When thinking about it, here are the assets (upadhi). Beneath them is Craving (Taṇhā). Going step-by-step in this manner, one comprehends those lovely and pleasant forms. The Buddha has left it to the practitioner himself to realize this directly through scrutiny. Yet, there is a vast difference in attitude. That is why various perceptions (saññā) are shown in the Dhamma: the perception of Impermanence (anicca), the perception of Suffering (dukkha), the perception of danger, and so forth. To develop the strength to reject the invitation made by the world regarding those lovely forms, one must develop these special Dhamma-accordant perceptions.

What exists in the world is a heap of perverted perceptions arising due to ignorance, Craving (Taṇhā), and thirst, much like a deer chasing a mirage. These are what you, meritorious friends, have often heard of as perversions. There are four perversions: the perception of permanence in the Impermanent (anicca); the perception of pleasure in what is painful/Stress (dukkha) (now, Suppavāsā experienced Suffering (Dukkha), but in the end, she formed a perception of pleasure); next, forming a perception of beauty in what is unbeautiful; and regarding what is Not-self (anattā) as self, as belonging to oneself. These perverted perceptions are called perversions.

Therefore, we can understand from this that we must strive diligently (even though the world makes its invitations) to contemplate wisely in accordance with the hint given by the Buddha. We must constantly strive to develop those Dhamma-accordant perceptions. This is further explained as the 'modes of scrutiny' (sammasana-vidhi). Especially in the Dhamma related to meditation, eleven modes of scrutiny are mentioned: aniccatō (as Impermanent), dukkhatō (as Suffering), rōgatō (as a disease), gaṇḍatō (as a boil), sallatō (as a dart), aghatō (as a calamity), ābādhatō (as an affliction), paratō (as alien/other), palōkatō (as disintegrating), suññatō (as empty), and anattatō (as Not-self) — thus, eleven are shown.

In the Pāli language, this suffix -tō means looking at something in a certain manner. When looking at it superficially, it seems permanent, but one looks at it as Impermanent (aniccatō), because in reality, it is Impermanent (anicca). It is not as it appears on the outside. That is why it was called antara-sammasana (internal scrutiny). One penetrates and looks within. It is not in the way the world accepts, but in the way the Buddha brought to light. One sees it as Impermanent (aniccatō). Next, one sees it as Suffering (dukkhatō). One sees it as a disease (rōgatō). One sees it as a boil (gaṇḍatō). One sees it as a dart (sallatō). One sees it as a calamity (aghatō). One sees it as an affliction (ābādhatō). One sees it as alien/other (paratō), as belonging to someone else. One sees it as disintegrating (palōkatō). One sees it as empty (suññatō). One sees it as Not-self (anattatō). These are the modes of scrutiny described in the Dhamma.

These are shown in this manner according to a certain practical value. Many logicians argue that happiness can be obtained through impermanence. They say: “Why, it is because of impermanence that an illness or a painful Sensation (vedanā) which existed has now disappeared!” A sophist could even take up this very story of Suppavāsā and say: “Even though she suffered so much for seven years and seven days, Suppavāsā was so happy in the end!” If one views Suppavāsā from a logical standpoint, that is exactly what one would have to say. But the Buddha showed that despite suffering such pain, she forgot it through ignorance and, through maternal affection, fell back into heedlessness. That is how we must understand it. Nowadays, many people, when a painful Sensation (vedanā) disappears, claim it is happiness, and ask: “How can impermanence be called Suffering (Dukkha)?” In this way, wrong, perverted views taken up through logical speculation prevail in the world.

At that point, we must consider: ‘What is my ultimate goal? Is it bondage to saṃsāra, or liberation? Is it defilement, or purification?’ That choice belongs to oneself. If one has clarified one's ultimate goal, then we must adopt what the Buddha points out in relation to it. The Buddha shows Himself to be a true physician. He points out the causes of the disease, and also the method of curing it. You, meritorious friends, know that for a true physician, it is essential to understand the disease, the origin of the disease, the causes of its occurrence, and also its cure. The Buddha pointed out that this is a disease, and showed Dhamma-accordantly how it arises. Otherwise, He could have just said, on someone else's word, that this is entirely Suffering (Dukkha). See how objectively the Buddha presented it. In the section mentioned at the beginning, He declared that if this were entirely characterized by Suffering (Dukkha), the world would not get attached to it; there is a pleasant aspect to it. Yet, the Buddha preaches the reality: sensual pleasures are of little gratification and of much Suffering (Dukkha). The gratification aspect is very little, and the Suffering aspect is far greater.

It was through the research conducted over a long period in saṃsāra that the Buddha understood this. On one occasion, the Buddha declared: “Monks, for a long time in this saṃsāra, I conducted research into gratification. Whatever results there are from that research into gratification, I possess them. Next, I researched the danger of it. The results of that research are also with me. Next, I sought the escape. I arrived at that escape.” It is in this manner, like a physician, that the Buddha speaks with a clear understanding of every state of affairs. You, meritorious friends, might be working in various institutions. But more than any of those institutions, it is these six sense-bases that are dear to everyone, that are pleasant. It is in association with these six sense-bases that anyone who experiences pleasure in this world does so. Yet, the Buddha points out that although they are indeed lovely and pleasant—having a lovely nature, a pleasant nature—it is right here that Suffering (Dukkha) also lies.

On one occasion, the Buddha preached: “This pleasant Sensation (vedanā) is pleasant as long as it lasts; when it changes, it is Suffering (Dukkha). A painful Sensation (vedanā) is painful as long as it lasts; when it changes, it is pleasant.” As for the neutral Sensation (vedanā), neither-painful-nor-pleasant, as long as it lasts, some do not even recognize it—therein lies ignorance. Furthermore, though it is peaceful, it is Impermanent (anicca). The ordinary worldly person has no understanding of this neither-painful-nor-pleasant Sensation (vedanā). It is the practitioner who gradually uncovers that aspect. This worldly person merely plays a game of seesaw between pleasure and pain.

That is precisely why, when explaining the five aggregates, the Buddha mentions: “What is the gratification of this form? Whatever pleasure and joy arise in dependence on this form, that is the gratification of form.” Next, He points out the danger: “What is the danger of form? The fact that this form is subject to change, alteration, turning into something else, the inability to keep it as one wishes—that is the danger of form.” Next, what is the escape from it? It is not suicide. It is the abandoning of desire-and-lust, the attachment towards this form. It is because of the attachment towards this form that those other attitudes exist. Therefore, the stage where that attachment is abandoned is called Nibbāna. The abandoning of desire-and-lust—that is the escape. The practitioner who targets that indeed moves towards realization with the help of those modes of scrutiny (sammasana) mentioned before. The world constantly invites us in the opposite direction. “Yes, this beverage is colorful. It is delicious. It is fragrant. But it contains poison. There is only a small drawback: it is poisoned.” That is what has happened.

At any rate, you, meritorious friends, might have heard of a discourse where the Buddha preached this very point to the monks in a way that evokes deep urgency. It is truly wonderful. When stating it, it is just like shouting to neighbors when a house is on fire. The Buddha declares: “Monks, the eye is burning. Forms are burning. Eye-Consciousness (viññāṇa) is burning. Contact (phassa) associated with the eye is burning. The Sensation (vedanā) arising from that Contact (phassa) is burning.” It is like an alarm calling the fire brigade. Some discourses are like that. Even though they seek Nibbāna, the ordinary worldly person does not realize that these are on fire. It is within these very things that they seek Nibbāna. For one who looks forward to extinguishment, the Buddha gives a method of scrutiny—not tightly grasping and carrying it on one's shoulder as the world does. One examines with wisdom. Examining, comparing, and weighing the aspects of gratification and danger, if the gratification is little and the danger is great, and if it leads to the defilement of the mind, one rejects it. If it leads to the purification of the mind, that is where the natural law is shown: through that attachment, a bond is formed, and through the bond, defilement occurs.

Next, He points out the other side. There, He uses an important word: nibbidā. The meaning of the Pāli word nibbidā is disenchantment. For the world, 'disenchantment' is an unpleasant, disagreeable word. But why does the Buddha highlight it? It is because through disenchantment with saṃsāra that dispassion (no-attachment) comes. Nibbidā, virāga—from disenchantment with saṃsāra comes dispassion. From dispassion comes purification. Therefore, if we expect purification, we must definitely develop an attitude that leads to dispassion. To develop an attitude that leads to dispassion, we must constantly apply those mentioned modes of scrutiny. Because the nature of the mind is such that if it is constantly inclined towards something, it gets drawn in that direction. Just as dripping water on a stone or tree eventually leaves a mark even on a rock over time, by inclining the stream of thoughts towards that direction over time, one inclines towards liberation. We know nothing of the lives we spent in our past saṃsāra. Yet, the meritorious friends participating in these activities must reflect, must encourage their minds: “Out of these millions and billions of people, we have been fortunate enough to incline towards such a lineage of thought because we must have developed those mentioned perceptions to some extent in our past saṃsāra.” One must understand that this strength lies within oneself. Although the mind may wander at other times, this is something to be done with effort. For, as mentioned, the side of the world’s temptation is extremely powerful. Especially in this era, which is inclined towards materialism, the invitations from that side to drink this poison are very frequent.

One must contemplate wisely, Dhamma-accordantly, with the help of those mentioned modes of scrutiny. When discussing Nibbāna, although we constantly use the word 'extinguishment,' many do not contemplate the true, deep meaning associated with that word. In discussing Nibbāna, the Buddha illustrated with the simile of fire, showing the entire journey of saṃsāra as a sheer fire. As we demonstrated on a previous occasion, an old Sinhala poet described this entire body in this way:

Dara-ræsa gini æviluṇa kala nibaňdē

Gini-misa dara-yayi yana nama e-ma-lesē

Ek-koṭa vadahāḷa muniňdē

Duka-misa kaye-kayi yana nama e-ma-lesē

Once a heap of wood is on fire, inside those flames one cannot find a single piece of firewood. One cannot say, “There is a bundle of firewood.” It cannot be called 'firewood'; it is only called 'fire.' “Likewise, the Sage declared collectively, there is only Suffering (Dukkha), and the name 'body' no longer applies.” According to the vision of the Buddha, what we call this body is purely Suffering (Dukkha). We all talk about this mass of Suffering (Dukkha). Some even say: “I understood the First Noble Truth. I also understood the second one a little. I learned the third one from books. It is only the fourth one that I don’t understand.” There are people who say such things. Actually, they have not understood the first one at all. If one had understood the first, one would pass up to the fourth. Why? Because they separate it into departments: “Only where we two live is happiness, the rest is Suffering (Dukkha).” “As long as our children and our bank deposits are safe, there is happiness. It is only when something happens to them that there is Suffering (Dukkha).” But the Buddha sees, at the deepest level, the mass of Suffering (Dukkha) generated within the mind itself. That is why the Buddha preaches saṅkhārarūpā paramā dukkhā—Preparations (saṅkhāra) are the ultimate Suffering (dukkha). Preparations (saṅkhāra) themselves are a heap of Suffering (Dukkha). If we understand Preparations (saṅkhāra) deeply, they include all volitional forces, desires, and expectations arising in the mind. Now, let us take the example of a multi-millionaire possessing great wealth. Is he living in happiness? With what great fear does he spend the night? “What will happen to those deposits? What will happen to those banks? What will tomorrow be like? What will happen to me through economic inflation and such crises?” He lives amidst such a mountain of Suffering (Dukkha). Yet he does not understand it. That is why the Buddha declared saṅkhārā paramā dukkhā—Preparations (saṅkhāra) are the ultimate Suffering (dukkha). That entire mass of thoughts is a heap of Suffering (Dukkha).

And it is upon those Preparations (saṅkhāra) that this Consciousness (viññāṇa) depends. We think of this Consciousness (viññāṇa) as a solid, singular entity. But on one occasion, this very question was raised with Ven. Ānanda. A monk named Ven. Udayī asked Ven. Ānanda: “Friend, I understand the statement that this body is Not-self (anattā). But how are we to understand that Consciousness (viññāṇa) is Not-self (anattā)? Please explain this to me.” Then, Ven. Ānanda declared: “This Consciousness (viññāṇa), too, is of six kinds. We must understand that it is not a single, independent thing. Eye-Consciousness (viññāṇa) arises because of the eye and forms. Ear-Consciousness (viññāṇa) arises because of the ear and sounds. Just because there is an ear, Consciousness (viññāṇa) does not exist there. Just because there is a form there, Consciousness (viññāṇa) does not exist there. That is what is called Dependent Arising (paṭicca-samuppāda).” The Buddha points out that only when the eye and forms meet, and attention (manasikāra) and attachment towards it combine, does eye-Consciousness (viññāṇa) arise. But thinking otherwise is like the foolish idea that fire exists inside a matchbox. It is true that the matchbox is there. But the fire is neither in the matchstick nor on the side of the matchbox. It is when they are struck together that fire arises. Likewise, Consciousness (viññāṇa) arises where the eye and form meet. Similarly, ear-Consciousness (viññāṇa) arises where the ear and sound meet. Yet, one thinks, 'Consciousness (viññāṇa) is mine.' Because it revolves so rapidly—revolving at a speed beyond comprehension, at a speed for which no simile can even be given—the world thinks that Consciousness (viññāṇa) is my self.

One can understand that form is not self. One can also understand that Sensation (vedanā) passes away. But in the end, it is Consciousness (viññāṇa) that is grabbed. Even those who attained absorptions went and got stuck right there. The Buddha points out that, let alone others, even mind-Consciousness (viññāṇa) arises only when the mind and the object of the mind—whatever that object may be—come together. Yet, it happens with such speed that one feels: 'This Consciousness (viññāṇa) of mine does not change.'

That is what the Buddha calls a stream. Like a river flowing down over a long time in saṃsāra, holding on to one thing after another—just as a river flows, rolling boulders, drawing under rocks, from here and there—in the same way, driven by the speed of ignorance and Craving (Taṇhā), based on this wrong perception of permanence, that Consciousness (viññāṇa) also flows extremely fast, grabbing various objects. The Buddha gives another simile for this grabbing. A monkey jumping rapidly from tree to tree in a forest does not consciously think, 'I am grabbing this branch.' Yet, because of its rapid habit, it does not fall to the ground; it goes on grabbing branch after branch. In the same way, Consciousness (viññāṇa) also goes on grabbing objects with great speed. This is the secret that the practitioner has to uncover. This is what is to be directly realized.

To realize this directly, one has to systematically practice reflection, which is called manasikāra. As Ven. Ānanda states, in the end, there is no self-nature in Consciousness (viññāṇa) either. Because Consciousness (viññāṇa) too depends on Preparations (saṅkhāra). It is something put together by combining the eye, forms, and so on. When a person directly realizes that stage, Consciousness (viññāṇa) ceases right through that. Thus, if a putting-together occurs due to ignorance, because of that putting-together, there is something we took to be Consciousness (viññāṇa). If, at any stage, Preparations (saṅkhāra) are stilled, at that very moment Consciousness (viññāṇa) also ceases. If Consciousness (viññāṇa) is also a running state, the direct realization of complete extinguishment is the stage where Consciousness (viññāṇa) also is extinguished. Right there is the cessation of Becoming (bhava-nirodha) as well. It is said, "bhava-nirodho nibbānaṃ" — the cessation of Becoming (bhava) is Nibbāna. Usually, one who has the Craving for Becoming (bhava) cannot even get close to this Dhamma. But if one looks at this with an open mind as shown by the Buddha, if what one wishes for is liberation from saṃsāra, the end of Suffering (Dukkha), the extinguishing of this fire of Suffering (Dukkha), we have to adopt that very attitude. This is exactly what the Buddha demonstrates through the Dhamma of Dependent Arising (paṭicca-samuppāda). When that practitioner goes deeper into that understanding, at some stage he understands that this Consciousness (viññāṇa), too, depends on causes and conditions. Together with that understanding, this Consciousness (viññāṇa) ceases. That itself is shown as the supreme peace.

Thus, all of you, meritorious friends, having undertaken a valuable virtue today—for this path in the Sāsana begins with virtue—and established in that valuable virtue, engaged in your accustomed meditation. Today's Dhamma sermon, too, was particularly oriented towards insight (vipassanā). Therefore, with its help, if you can bring your journey in saṃsāra to an end right here, you must strive to that extent. May all these meritorious deeds—such as the undertaking of virtue, offering alms to the virtuous, and other supplementary merits, as well as the strength of concentration gained through Dhamma discussion and meditation, and whatever strength of insight (vipassanā) absorbed through this Dhamma sermon—serve as a supportive condition to quickly attain peace through the Deathless Nibbāna, through the realization of the stages of the path and fruit: Stream-entry, Once-returning, Non-returning, and Arahantship, before the decline of the Sāsana!

May all beings from the Avīci hell up to the Akaniṭṭha heaven, who wish to rejoice in the merit of this Dhamma preaching and Dhamma hearing, by so rejoicing, attain peace through the supreme Deathless Nibbāna by means of their aspired-for Bodhi—along with all one's relatives, friends, and everyone else. Pray in this manner, and having so prayed, recite these verses to share the merits.

Dhammapada 204 (Sukhavagga)

Dear Listeners,

The realization of the Four Noble Truths is equivalent to the arising of the Dhamma-eye. The arising of that Dhamma-eye is like one born blind receiving sight. Whenever a person born blind begins to see, a great mental revolution takes place within that person at that moment. The Buddha, the Teacher of the Three Worlds, declared to the world that a similar mental revolution occurs with the arising of the Dhamma-eye.

The verse of inspired utterance (udāna) declared by the Buddha while explaining this matter to the wanderer (paribbājaka) Māgandhiya is what we have set as our topic today. On one occasion, the Buddha was staying in the fire-hall of the Brahmin Bhāradvājagotta in the market town of Kammāsadhamma in the Kuru country, using a grass mat as a bed. That Brahmin Bhāradvājagotta was someone who had some devotion towards the Buddha. One day, the Buddha went to Kammāsadhamma market town for alms in the morning, partook of His alms-food, and entered a forest grove. He went to the foot of a tree for His day-abiding (divāvihāra), staying in meditative seclusion during the day. In the meantime, the wanderer named Māgandhiya, while walking about for exercise, arrived at the fire-hall of the Brahmin Bhāradvājagotta. Seeing that grass mat in the fire-hall, he said to the Brahmin Bhāradvājagotta: “Master Bhāradvāja, for whom is this grass mat prepared? This looks like a grass mat prepared for an ascetic (samaṇa).” When he said this, the Brahmin Bhāradvājagotta replied: “Master Māgandhiya, there is the ascetic Master Gotama, who went forth from the Sakyan clan. A glorious report regarding Him has spread, highlighting His nine virtues, starting with: ‘He is indeed the Blessed One, the Worthy One, the Fully Self-Awakened One…’”

“It is for Him that this grass mat has been prepared as a bed.” Then Māgandhiya said: “Master Bhāradvāja, it is indeed an ill sight that we have seen. To see a bed prepared for that Bhūnahu (destroyer of growth/life) ascetic Gotama.” The word Bhūnahu was used as a term of abuse. These wanderers used that name for the Buddha to mean someone who destroys Bhava (Becoming), who thwarts growth and development. The Brahmin Bhāradvājagotta said: “Māgandhiya, watch your words, watch your words! A vast number of wise Brahmins, wise householders, and wise ascetics and kṣatriyas who are highly pleased with Master Gotama have been tamed by Him. Therefore, do not say such things.” But Māgandhiya replied: “Even if I meet the ascetic Gotama face to face, I will say this very thing: that the ascetic Gotama is a Bhūnahu.” Then the Brahmin said: “Very well, if you do not mind, I shall tell the ascetic Gotama that you said this.” Māgandhiya replied: “Yes, by all means, tell Him.”

The Buddha, while dwelling in seclusion, heard this conversation with His divine ear (dibba-sota). Then, that evening, He arose from His meditation, went back to the fire-hall of the Brahmin Bhāradvājagotta where the grass mat was, and sat down. When the Brahmin Bhāradvājagotta came there to converse, the Buddha asked him: “Bhāradvāja, was there some conversation between you and the wanderer regarding this grass mat?” As soon as He asked this, the Brahmin Bhāradvāja’s body shuddered and his hair stood on end. He thought: “I was intending to tell this to Master Gotama. Now indeed, there is no need to tell it anew.”

Just about then, the wanderer Māgandhiya also came there on his evening walk. Having arrived, he sat down near the Buddha, and while they were engaging in conversation, the Buddha asked him: “Māgandhiya, the eye delights in forms, is enchanted by forms. In the Tathāgata, this eye is tamed, guarded, and restrained; He teaches the Dhamma for the restraint of the eye. Dwell with the eye restrained, and with a mind stilled within. Is it on account of this that you say ‘Bhūnahu’?” The wanderer Māgandhiya replied: “Yes, it is because of that. For in our teaching, it is stated that such restraint is something that destroys growth and development. That is why we say so.” Then the Buddha asked: “Māgandhiya, if someone dwells with the eye restrained and with a mind stilled within, having attained internal peace, is there anything to be said against that?” Māgandhiya replied: “I have nothing to say against that.” (The Buddha likewise spoke about the ear—how the ear delights in sounds and how He teaches the Dhamma for its restraint. In the same way, He spoke about the mind; how the mind delights in thoughts and mind-objects (dhammā), and how He teaches the Dhamma for taming and restraining them as well.)

Even though Māgandhiya had previously said it was stated in their teaching, at that moment he had to admit that if one dwells with the eye restrained and with a mind stilled within, and likewise with the other senses, there is nothing negative to be said about it. It was then that the Buddha declared His own past household life: “Māgandhiya, in my lay life, I too lived a life of gratification, pampered by pleasing, agreeable forms, sounds, tastes, and touches. I had three palaces: one for the rainy season, one for the winter season, and another for the summer season. For the four months of the rainy season, entertained solely by female musicians, I did not even descend to the lower floor, enjoying such happiness and luxury. At a later time, having correctly understood the five aspects of these pleasures—namely their origin (samudaya), their passing away (atthaṅgama), their gratification (assāda), their danger (ādīnava), and the escape (nissaraṇa) from them—I abandoned the longing and Taṇhā (Craving) for forms, tastes, and touches, and now I dwell with a mind stilled within."

Having stated this, the Buddha asked: "Suppose there is a very wealthy householder, fully enjoying the five strands of sensual pleasure. On a later occasion, having fulfilled wholesome qualities and practiced good conduct, he is reborn in the Nandana Grove of Tāvatiṃsa, enjoying celestial pleasures in the company of celestial nymphs. After receiving such pleasures, would that person ever long for the pleasures enjoyed by ordinary householders in the human world?" Then Māgandhiya replied: "No, because celestial pleasures are far superior to human pleasures." At that, the Buddha declared: "Just so, Māgandhiya, having abandoned the desires for the five strands of sensual pleasure and stilled the mind within, I experience a happiness that is aloof from those sensual pleasures and unwholesome states, which is far superior even to celestial happiness. Therefore, seeing those who enjoy the five strands of sensual pleasure, I do not envy them, nor do I develop a longing for those pleasures."

Next, the Buddha gave a simile: "Māgandhiya, suppose there is a leper whose entire body is covered in sores and boils, which are festering and being eaten by worms. This man, sitting near a pit of fire, a pit of glowing embers, cauterizes and scratches the scabs of his wounds. His relatives and friends summon a surgeon to treat this leper. After the treatment, he is cured and becomes healthy."

"Once cured, if this man sees another leper scratching his wounds near a pit of embers in the same manner, would this cured man feel any longing or envy towards that leper or his treatment?" the Buddha asked the wanderer. Māgandhiya replied: "No, Master Gotama. It is only when there is a disease that medicine is of use. For this healthy person, medicine or those treatments have no meaning." Just so, the Buddha declared: "When I have abandoned the longing for those five strands of sensual pleasure, I do not feel any envy or longing when seeing someone enjoying them. Just as the cured leper, upon looking at another leper, feels no desire for the treatments, medicines, or cauterizations that the other is undergoing."

This simile given by the Buddha is profound. It is given to convey a deep meaning. Next, the Buddha presented another simile concerning that very leper: "Suppose someone who was cured of leprosy in that manner is grabbed by his arms by two strong men and dragged towards a pit of glowing embers. What do you think, Māgandhiya? Would that man twist his body this way and that to escape from being dragged towards the pit of embers? Why would he do so?" Māgandhiya replied:

“Because the fire in that pit of embers is painful to touch; fire is something that causes burning and torment. That is why he would twist his body.”

Then the Buddha asked: “Is it only now that the fire causes burning and torment, or was it so previously as well?” Māgandhiya replied: “Both now and previously, fire is indeed something that causes burning and torment. However, the leper, because of his leprosy and the distorted condition of his body, had developed a distorted perception (viparīta-saññā) of pleasure regarding that fire.” Thereupon, the Buddha declared: “These five strands of sensual pleasure are themselves a mass of burning and torment. Those with bodies distorted by them and fraught with painful contacts regard those sensual pleasures as happiness.” This is where the similes of the pit of embers and the leper apply. The five strands of sensual pleasure are things that cause great burning and torment. Yet, ordinary worldlings, due to their distorted perception, do not understand that they cause burning and torment, just as the pit of embers was appealing to the leper. But once cured, the burning and tormenting nature of these things becomes apparent.

Through these similes, the Buddha reveals that the five strands of sensual pleasure, which the ordinary world regards as supreme, are actually a distorted state, and that freedom from them is the true state of health. Next, the Buddha further expanded on the simile of the leper, saying that if a leper scratches and cauterizes the open sores of his body near a fire-pit or a pit of embers, the more he scratches and cauterizes, the more infected, foul-smelling, and festering those sores become. Yet, he derives a mere measure of gratification from that cauterization. In the same way, the five strands of sensual pleasure are entirely a mass of burning and torment. But due to the world’s ignorance, they derive a mere measure of gratification in accordance with those sensual pleasures.

Then the Buddha asked: “Have you ever seen or heard of any king or royal minister who, while enjoying the fivefold sensual pleasures, dwelt with a stilled mind having attained internal peace—either in the past, now in the present, or in the future?” Māgandhiya replied that he had never seen such a person. “Very well, I too have never seen such a person. But if any ascetics and Brahmins have liberated their minds from the five strands of sensual pleasure and attained internal peace, it is because they understood their feverish burnings (pariḷāha), fully comprehended the arising and passing away of sensual pleasures, their gratification (assāda), their danger (ādīnava), and their escape (nissaraṇa), and thereby detached themselves from them,” declared the Buddha. It was at that moment that the Buddha uttered that inspired verse (udāna):

> Ārogya paramā lābhā

> Nibbānaṃ paramaṃ sukhaṃ*

> Aṭṭhaṅgiko ca maggānaṃ

> Khemaṃ amatagāminaṃ

Among gains, the highest gain is health, the state of being free from disease. Among pleasures, the supreme pleasure is Nibbāna. Among paths leading to the Deathless, the eight-factored Noble Eightfold Path is secure (khemaṃ) and safe.

As soon as this verse was uttered, the wanderer Māgandhiya, thinking of the first two lines: “Health is the supreme gain, Nibbāna is the supreme bliss,” said: “Master Gotama, this is a well-spoken statement you have made. We too have heard our former teachers of the wanderers uttering these first two lines. This agrees perfectly with the Dhamma of the Blessed One. In our teaching, our teachers have also stated these first two lines.” The Buddha then asked: “What is the health and Nibbāna that is meant according to the view of your teachers?” When asked this, the wanderer Māgandhiya began to stroke his own limbs and said: “Master Gotama, this is health, this is Nibbāna. I have no illness whatsoever. I am in perfect health. I have no affliction at all.”

Then the Buddha declared: “Māgandhiya, because you do not possess the Noble Eye, you see this which is diseased as healthy.” Here, five terms are mentioned that convey the idea of this body being purely a disease, purely a boil, purely a dart, purely a calamity, and purely an affliction: rogabhūta (consisting of disease), gaṇḍabhūta (consisting of boils/tumors), sallabhūta (consisting of darts), aghabhūta (consisting of calamity), and ābādhabhūta (consisting of affliction). “It is because you lack the Noble Eye that you speak of health and freedom from disease regarding this body, which is purely a disease and an affliction.”

Here, we realize that the Buddha is pointing to a concept far superior to what ordinary worldlings consider to be health. The entire body is a disease. This is frequently mentioned throughout the Dhamma, in terms such as rogatiddaṃ pabhaṅguraṃ (a nest of disease, fragile). This body is purely a cage of disease. Yet, we hold on tightly to our concept of health and wellness. The concept of health that the Buddha intends here is far more excellent. What that wanderer spoke of is the ordinary mundane concept of health. That is why the Buddha said to him: “This is not the real health, this is not the real Nibbāna.” It was to explain this matter that the Buddha presented the simile of the person born blind.

“Now, Māgandhiya, suppose there is a man blind from birth. That blind man cannot distinguish black and white, nor can he see colors like blue, yellow, or red. He cannot see even and uneven places, nor can he see the sun, moon, and stars. He is completely blind. That man hears a sighted person saying: ‘A white cloth is spotless, clean, and extremely beautiful.’ This man then goes about searching for a white cloth. Then, a deceitful man brings an extremely dirty, greasy, and soiled cloth, and deceives him:

‘Here is a beautiful, spotless white cloth.’ That blind man wraps himself in it and makes a joyful exclamation: ‘Ah, now I am wearing a beautiful, clean, white cloth!’ Then the Buddha asked Māgandhiya: ‘Does that man say that the cloth is white and clean out of his own knowing and seeing, or is it because he heard what the sighted person said?' Māgandhiya replied: 'He says so only having heard what another said, but that is not a clean, genuine cloth.' 'Just so, Māgandhiya, these wanderers have no eyes. It is merely their statement that you are expressing. This body is purely a boil and a disease, yet you speak of health within it.' Here, the Buddha presented the simile of the blind man.

The Buddha further declared: "If, on a later occasion, his relatives summon an eye physician who treats him, and this man is cured of his blindness and his eyes begin to see, he might even feel angry towards the person who had previously deceived him with the dirty cloth, thinking: 'For so long indeed, this person has been deceiving me with a soiled cloth!' In the same way," the Buddha declared, "if the Noble Eye arises, on some occasion you will realize that these five—namely form, Vedanā (Feeling), perception, Saṅkhāra (Preparations), and Viññāṇa (Consciousness)—are purely a boil, a disease, a dart, and an affliction. It is because you lack the Noble Eye that you have formed a concept of health regarding them." Thus did the Buddha explain to Māgandhiya.

Then Māgandhiya said: "In that case, O Blessed One, now a great devotion has arisen in me towards the Blessed One. Please preach the Dhamma to me so that I may be freed from this blindness. I can see that you are capable of freeing me from this blindness." At that, the Buddha declared: "Suppose there is a man born blind, and a doctor comes and administers medical treatment. Yet, the man's eyes do not clear up. That would only be a weariness and trouble for the doctor. In the same way, if I tell you what the Noble Eye is and what Nibbāna is according to the Noble concept, and you do not understand it, that would only be a weariness and trouble for Me."

Then Māgandhiya pleaded again: "I feel that the ascetic Master Gotama is indeed capable of explaining to me how to be freed from this blindness." It was then that the Buddha declared: "When you develop that eye, you will experience revulsion towards these five aggregates of grasping (upādāna)—namely form, Vedanā (Feeling), perception, Saṅkhāra (Preparations), and Viññāṇa (Consciousness). Just as the cured man felt resentment toward the person who had deceived him for so long, you will realize: 'For a long time indeed, have I been deceived and cheated by this mind (iminā cittena)!' Here, the mind is revealed as the culprit. Just as the dirty cloth was seen as a clean cloth, this mind has presented these things as beautiful (subha), healthy, good, and attractive. It is in order to bring about that realization that the Buddha preaches the Dhamma."

There, the Buddha further declared: "If you are to develop this eye, you must associate with superior persons (sappurisa). When associating with superior persons, you will get to hear the True Dhamma (saddhamma). Having heard the True Dhamma, you must then engage in the practice of the Dhamma in accordance with the Dhamma (dhammānudhamma-paṭipatti). When practicing the Dhamma in accordance with the Dhamma, on some occasion, you will be able to develop this Noble Eye." When this was declared, the wanderer requested going forth (pabbajjā) and higher ordination (upasampadā) from the Buddha. The Buddha said: “In this dispensation, if a member of another sect wishes to go forth and receive higher ordination, he must undergo a probationary period (parivāsa) of four months. After that probationary period, only if the Saṅgha is pleased, they will grant the going forth and higher ordination. However, I have room to make exceptions for certain individuals.” The wanderer said: “Master Gotama, if there is such a rule in your dispensation, I will undergo probation not just for four months, but for four years.” In any case, the Buddha granted the going forth and higher ordination to the wanderer Māgandhiya. It is said that not long after his higher ordination, practicing meditation with firm energy, the monk Māgandhiya attained Arahatship.

The essence that we can extract from this detailed narrative is what the Buddha points out here. We have often heard the phrase ārogya paramā. However, there is a much deeper concept there. In sayings such as: “Health is the supreme gain, contentment is the supreme wealth (santuṭṭhi paramaṃ dhanaṃ),” what is spoken of is the ordinary worldly concept of health, identifying the greatest gain in terms of wealth. But here, the greatest gain and the greatest bliss is shown to be Nibbāna. That means the state of being liberated. True health is the liberation from what is a disease, what is a boil. It is in this sense that Nibbāna becomes both a gain and a bliss.

Thus, the Buddha has presented a meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna) for insight (vipassanā) known as comprehension (sammasana), instructing us to contemplate the five aggregates of grasping in eleven ways:

1. Aniccato – as Impermanent / Inconstant

2. Dukkhato – as Suffering / Unsatisfactoriness / Stress

3. Rogato – as a disease

4. Gaṇḍato – as a boil

5. Sallato – as a dart

6. Aghato – as a calamity

7. Ābādhato – as an affliction

8. Parato – as alien (not belonging to oneself)

9. Palokato – as disintegrating

10. Suññato – as empty

11. Anattato – as Not-self / Non-self / Unsubstantial

Let us consider this through a simile. Although it is not mentioned in the Dhamma in this way, let us reflect for a moment in light of the Māgandhiya Sutta, just as we spoke of the leper. Suppose a thorn or a dart has pierced someone’s hand or foot, but they are unaware that it has pierced them. However, it begins to swell. Sometimes, this person might think: “This is starting to heal.” They might even consider the swelling as a sign of health. But when they go to a physician, upon examination, the physician understands: “This is happening because a thorn has pierced here.” Then, the thorn must be pulled out. Only then is it cured.

Let us contemplate a little based on that simile. Now, when the Buddha asks us to look at each aggregate (khandha) in this way—as Anicca and so on—we can easily understand why. Aniccato – this is impermanent. Then, this bodily cage arose for us as a swelling, just as we mentioned in the simile of the thorn. The swelling that occurs in the body does not affect only the body; it also goes to the head. That is what is called the intoxication of health (ārogya-mada). It means: “Others may be sick, but I am healthy.” This is an intoxication. Thus, that swelling is not confined to the body. Now, many people take pains to enlarge their bodies using various kinds of nourishing foods, trying to make the body look robust in different ways. Having made it robust, they then develop the intoxication of health. But the Buddha says that this growth is actually the swelling of a pierced thorn. What is the thorn? The dart of Taṇhā (Craving). The dart of Taṇhā.

The Buddha Himself uses terms like the supreme and incomparable physician and surgeon to refer to Himself. This is because, just as surgeons use special instruments to locate a pierced thorn and pull it out, the Buddha, with the aid of mindfulness (sati) and wisdom, pulled out the dart of Taṇhā (Craving) that had pierced the heart. Therefore, we must understand this body as a wound caused by that dart of Taṇhā which has pierced the heart. Thus, the Physician says: “This is Anicca.” That swelling is not something that belongs to you. It has arisen due to a certain cause of disease. Now, let us try to understand those eleven ways of contemplation according to our own capacity:

* Aniccato – This is impermanent. The Physician has said that this is impermanent; it is merely a swelling caused by the piercing of that dart of Taṇhā.

* Dukkhato – As this festers and purulates, it is a mass of suffering (Dukkha).

* Rogato – He asks us to look at this purely as a disease, an illness.

* Gaṇḍato – This is a boil, a festering wound.

* Sallato – Beneath this lies a dart or a thorn.

* Aghato – This is a great calamity, a trouble.

* Ābādhato – This is an affliction.

* Parato – This is not something that belongs to you; it is something that arose due to the thorn.

* Palokato – This is a swelling that disintegrates. This festering wound will burst open at any moment. This can be clearly seen in the charnel ground during the stage of discoloration (vinīlaka). The time when this body becomes most swollen and bloated is a few days after one takes their last breath; only then can one see its bloated form clearly. It turns blue and bursts open. That is palokato – a thing that disintegrates.

* Suññato – This is an empty thing. In the end, nothing remains.

* Anattato – There is nothing to be taken as a self, as “I” or “mine” (Anattā). The bones lie scattered here and there. That burst body becomes food for other animals, dissolves and merges with the earth, returning to the four great elements. That is the whole story.

If we connect this to that simile, it is stated in the Dhamma that it is due to ignorance (avijjā) and craving (taṇhā) that we wander in saṃsāra. Within the darkness of ignorance, through lack of knowing and the absence of the Noble Eye, one longs for a body out of craving (taṇhā). As long as craving is not abandoned, a body is brought into existence somewhere through those karmic energies. That is the story of the body. It is the same with other things. Therefore, the Buddha points out that elevenfold comprehension (sammasana) regarding the five aggregates of grasping (upādāna). To this, we can add the two main similes presented by the Buddha in the Māgandhiya Sutta. The first is the simile of the leper. A patient does not represent a normal state; rather, it is a distorted state. It is because that person’s body was distorted that he developed a distorted perception (viparīta-saññā) regarding the painful glowing embers, perceiving them as pleasant. Similarly, the Buddha shows that it is by clinging to this bodily cage that the world runs after the five strands of sensual pleasure. Those sensual pleasures are always of a burning nature. But this is not realized, just like the distorted perception of the leper.

Next, we also see from that story how the deceitful man brought a cloth stained with oil and dirt, claiming: “This is a beautiful, clean white cloth.” That blind man wrapped it around himself and walked along the streets. That is exactly how we have been carrying this burden throughout saṃsāra. That is why the Buddha declared:

> Bhārā have pañcakhandhā

> Bhārahāro ca puggalo

> Bhārādānaṃ dukkhaṃ loke

> Bhāranikkhepanaṃ sukhaṃ

“The five aggregates are indeed burdens, and the person is the bearer of the burden. Taking up the burden is suffering in the world, and laying down the burden is happiness.”

“The five aggregates are indeed burdens” – these five aggregates of grasping are five heaps of burdens. “The person is the bearer of the burden” – the person is the one who carries this burden. Some regard the person as a self (attā); that is incorrect. “Person” is merely the one with such-and-such a name. A conventional name is given to this heap of five aggregates. There is no need to give further examples to you, devout devotees. A certain name is given. These five aggregates of grasping are identified as that “person”. The person is indeed these five heaps. “The person is the bearer of the burden” – the person is the one carrying and lifting these five heaps.

Next, the Buddha declared: Bhārādānaṃ dukkhaṃ loke – carrying these five burdens and holding onto them is suffering (Dukkha). Bhāranikkhepanaṃ sukhaṃ – letting go of those five heaps of burdens is happiness (sukha). Therefore, the health that the Buddha refers to there is not about curing this body with medicines to make it healthy. There is something much deeper here. If the five aggregates of grasping are themselves a disease, a boil, a dart, and a calamity, then the moment of letting them go is the real health, the real happiness. That moment of letting go is when the Arahants liberate their minds in the attainment of fruition (phala-samāpatti)—liberating the mind from them and experiencing the bliss of pacification that we call Nibbāna, described as ajjhattaṃ vūpasantacitto (with a mind stilled within). That is indeed the moment of laying down the five heaps of burdens: Bhāranikkhepanaṃ sukhaṃ – “laying down the burden is happiness.”

Thus, at the moment of attaining the Path and Fruit, it is to some like laying down a heavy burden on the ground. Even in ancient Dhamma stories, Arahants are described as ohitabhāro (one who has laid down the burden), anuppattasadattho (who has attained his own goal), and parikkhīṇabhavasaṃyojano (whose fetters of Bhava (Becoming) are destroyed). The burden has been laid down on the ground. Similarly, the hooks of becoming that bind one to existence are unhooked. Having destroyed the fetters of becoming, they have arrived at the destination.

Nibbāna is described as a happiness, specifically as avedayita (unexperienced/non-sensory bliss), because it is the state where the mind is liberated from these five aggregates of grasping. That is the very state where craving is extinguished. As long as the thirst of Taṇhā (Craving) exists, one wanders in this saṃsāra, creating a physical form—whether subtle or gross—from Bhava to Bhava (Becoming), while experiencing the five strands of sensual pleasure.

The wanderer Māgandhiya abused the Buddha using terms that certain Brahmins of that time used, such as ucchedavādī (annihilationist) and bhūnahu (destroyer of growth). They used the word bhūnahu to mean “one who destroys Bhava (Becoming),” because they highly valued the continuation of existence, holding the view that one should live boundlessly chasing after forms, sounds, and so forth. They considered any form of control or restraint over these to be an error. However, on this occasion, the Buddha showed Māgandhiya that it is only when one restrains oneself regarding forms, smells, tastes, and mind-objects (dhammā)—the objects of these senses—and liberates the mind from them, that true pacification is found.

When speaking of Nibbāna, just as the laying down of the five heaps of burdens is shown as Nibbāna, on some occasions it is also referred to as saḷāyatana-nirodha (the cessation of the six sense-bases). These six sense-bases function through an interaction between two aspects: the eye and forms, the ear and sounds, the nose and smells, the tongue and tastes, the body and touch (phassa), and the mind and mind-objects (dhammā). It is through this interaction between the sense organs and their objects that Taṇhā (Craving) and desires are nurtured. Thus, the Buddha pointed out their impermanence. When one comprehends them in those eleven ways through the three characteristics of Anicca (Impermanent), Dukkha (Suffering), and Anattā (Not-self)—which means reflecting on them with wisdom—one develops revulsion (nibbidā) towards the five aggregates of grasping (upādāna).

That is why the Buddha said that when your eyes open, you will feel resentment toward that deceitful person who cheated you with the dirty cloth. You might even feel like killing him. Who is the deceitful one here? It is the mind itself – citta. Through this, the understanding arises: “Has not this mind deceived me for so long?”

What is this mind? This mind is a highly diverse, variegated thing. The Buddha declared that there is nothing as diverse as this mind. There are many colorful, beautiful things in the world, but none is as diverse as the mind. It is by this diverse mind that we have been deceived. To the world, these things appear as good and beautiful (subha), which is a distorted perception (viparīta-saññā). This diverse mind presents what is Anicca (Impermanent) as permanent, and what is Dukkha (Suffering) as pleasant. It presents what is foul as beautiful, and what is not one's own as one's own. Within these distorted perceptions, worldlings go on multiplying saṃsāra. When, in accordance with the three characteristics, one understands the impermanence and unsubstantiality (Anattā) of form, Vedanā (Feeling), perception, Saṅkhāra (Preparations), and Viññāṇa (Consciousness), and likewise correctly understands the impermanent nature and lack of essence in the sense organs—the eye, ear, nose, tongue, and body—and their objects—forms, sounds, smells, tastes, and touches—the state of liberating the mind from them is shown in various places as Nibbāna. That is what is called supramundane (lokuttara)—the state of having gone beyond the world. If that state is liberation, and if the ultimate goal of this dispensation is freedom, then the Buddha is not pointing to some kind of eternal existence here.

The Buddha declares that Bhava (Becoming) is definitely a mere mass of suffering. Dukkhe loko patiṭṭhito – the world is established on suffering. It is like two panels of a door that fit together perfectly. When you finish talking about suffering, you have finished talking about the world; when you finish talking about the world, you have finished talking about suffering. They are like two door panels. The world is established on suffering, and suffering is established on the world. This is the reality. But worldlings do not understand this. It is like their attitude towards existence. There are concepts everywhere in the world that boundlessly encourage this. Philosophies that cultivate becoming and reinforce the view of becoming (bhava-diṭṭhi) are found everywhere. Amidst these philosophies, the Buddha presented the concept of the cessation of becoming (bhava-nirodha). Bhava-nirodha is Nibbāna. Thus, the cessation of this becoming, this existence, is what the Buddha showed here as Nibbāna. This is sandiṭṭhiko dhammo – a Dhamma that can be realized directly here-and-now. Through that direct realization, one can attain that internal peace in this very life. It is not an eternal existence or a separate realm of Nibbāna.

Thus, we can make use of the two similes shown in the Māgandhiya Sutta to understand these matters. The simile of the leper is not something pleasing to the mind. Yet, the Buddha presented it here to deeply impress this upon the world. According to the Buddha's concept, if even a person who is considered "healthy" is drawn towards the five strands of sensual pleasure, they must be regarded as a leper. If one has understood this through the power of comprehension—understanding their impermanence (Anicca) and unsubstantiality (Anattā)—then liberating the mind from them is the true state of health. That is the genuine gain, the real health, the supreme gain. Thus: Ārogya paramā lābhā Nibbānaṃ paramaṃ sukhaṃ.

Next, the Buddha pointed out the path to it: "and of paths, the Eightfold…" Various teachers point out different paths, claiming: "By this path, one goes to the Deathless." Since ancient times, even before the Buddha's era, everyone spoke of a "Deathless" (amata). They conceptualized and imagined the Deathless as a place where there is no dying, as an eternal existence. The Buddha pointed out that this Deathless is not some special drink, nor is it a drink that grants eternal existence. Why? Because existence is everywhere. If there is existence (Bhava), there is Jāti (Birth), there is Jarā (decay/aging), there is sickness, and there is Maraṇa (death). Nowhere is there an existence free from Jāti, Jarā, sickness, and Maraṇa. It does not exist anywhere in the universe. Therefore, the Buddha declared that existence itself is purely suffering (Dukkha). Thus, the cessation of becoming (bhava-nirodha), the extinguishment of existence, is what the Buddha showed here as Nibbāna.

He also described this Bhava (Becoming) as a fire. This journey of saṃsāra is a journey that goes on creating a mass of fires of suffering through Upādāna (Grasping) and the thirst of Taṇhā (Craving). The Buddha has presented the liberation from this as a peaceful, sublime extinguishment (Nibbāna that can be directly realized in this very life, by elevating those five aggregates of grasping to the level of meditation. Having deeply impressed upon the mind their impermanence (Anicca) and unsubstantiality (Anattā), when the three characteristics are fully developed, one experiences revulsion (nibbidā) towards them. Just as the cured leper, upon seeing another leper, develops no longing for that condition, nor any desire for those medicines, the Buddha points to Nibbāna as the ultimate reality, and the continuation of saṃsāra as a distorted state. That is why the Buddha constantly speaks about ending the suffering of saṃsāra. Yet, this view, this vision, is disagreeable to many.

The Buddha states that the majority of people are "world-multipliers" (lokavaḍḍhanā). Their talk is about developing the world. But the Buddha declares that multiplying the world is merely multiplying the cemeteries (kaṭasivaḍḍhanā). For such a long time, as the Buddha reveals in suttas like the Anamatagga Sutta using marvelous similes that are beyond imagination—which you must have heard many times—such as the grief of a single being over the death of their mother. It is said that the tears shed by a single being throughout saṃsāra over the death of their mother are greater than the waters in the oceans. For such a long time, we have been wandering, being born and dying in saṃsāra. What operates within this long existence is ignorance (avijjā) and craving (taṇhā). Therefore, if what the world expects is the cessation of suffering, the Buddha declares:

It is only when one is liberated from Bhava (Becoming), when one has directly realized the cessation of becoming (bhava-nirodha), that the true bliss of pacification is obtained. That is why it is described as an unexperienced/non-sensory bliss (avedayita-sukha). However, the worldlings, those “world-multipliers,” only think about multiplying this world. That is why the Buddha declares: Na siyā lokavaḍḍhano – “do not be a world-multiplier.” Think about liberating yourself from this becoming. You cannot be free from suffering while remaining in this becoming. If you are freed from suffering, along with it, becoming also ends. You cannot have both.

The Buddha reveals that it is the mind that presented these five aggregates of grasping as beautiful (subha) and pleasant. The very moment the eye of understanding arises, one experiences revulsion towards the mind: “Was it not this mind that has been deceiving me for so long?” That understanding arises through wisdom. Therefore, the Noble Eightfold Path is the path that leads to that wisdom. That is why, as you devotees know, it begins with the first factor, Right View (sammā-diṭṭhi). Through Right View, right thoughts and intentions arise, and one acts accordingly. What is shown here is a complete transformation of personality. When Right View is fulfilled to some extent, it turns into right thoughts and intentions. Consequently, there is the utterance of right speech, followed by acting in accordance with it, which is Right Livelihood (sammā-ājīva) and Right Action (sammā-kammanta). The effort and mindfulness applied to this are Right Effort (sammā-vāyāma) and Right Mindfulness (sammā-sati). Finally, Right Concentration (sammā-samādhi) is presented as the one-pointedness of that person.

It is such a complete transformation that is presented as the Noble Eightfold Path. The Buddha has shown here a path that is more marvelous than any other pathways accepted by the world. This path is something that must be developed within one's own mental continuum (citta-santāna). If you develop that Noble Eightfold Path to some extent in your daily life, one day, at the moment of attaining the Path and Fruit, all eight factors will arise in a single mind-moment. It is through that Noble Path-energy, that supramundane Path-energy, that one is cast out of this world. That is what is called the supramundane (lokuttara) state. Ultimately, what is the driving force needed for this? It is revulsion (nibbidā) towards saṃsāra. The Buddha's words actually point us ultimately towards: ekanta-nibbidāya virāgāya nirodhāya – “for utter revulsion, dispassion, and cessation.” The Buddha's Dhamma is preached solely for the sake of developing revulsion towards saṃsāra, to end the attachment to saṃsāra. Yet, the world looks in the opposite direction – towards the development of the world. That was how Māgandhiya also looked at it. If any control or restraint was practiced regarding these, they used the word bhūnahu. But here, the Buddha reveals to us something that no other philosopher has ever shown. The cause of the fear within worldlings is their wrong view of self (atta-diṭṭhi). The vision of "I" and "mine" is completely wrong. Here, there are only five heaps. "I" and "mine" is something super-imposed upon these five heaps. That is why, when the Noble Eye arises, the Buddha declares that you will realize:

"...was it not merely a heap of form that I was grasping as 'I' and 'mine'? Was it not merely a heap of Vedanā (Feeling) that I was grasping as 'I' and 'mine'? Was it not merely a heap of perception that I was grasping as 'I' and 'mine'? Was it not merely a heap of Saṅkhāra (Preparations) that I was grasping as 'I' and 'mine'? Was it not merely a heap of Viññāṇa (Consciousness) that I was grasping as 'I' and 'mine'?" That is the understanding that comes. Just as the blind man, after receiving sight, thinks: "For so long indeed, have I been holding onto a dirty, oil-stained cloth!" when the Noble Eye arises, one sees that there is nothing here to be taken as "I" or "mine". It is merely a heap of form constantly arising and passing away.

Devout devotees, you have often heard the beautiful similes—let us call them beautiful, though they might be unappealing to some—given by the Buddha summarizing the entire Dhamma:

> Pheṇapiṇḍūpamaṃ rūpaṃ

> Vedanā bubbuḷūpamā

> Marīcikūpamā saññā

> Saṅkhārā kadalūpamā

> Māyūpamañca viññāṇaṃ

> Desitādiccabandhunā

"Form is like a lump of foam, feeling is like a water bubble, perception is like a mirage, Preparations are like a plantain trunk, and consciousness is like an illusion—so has the Kinsman of the Sun declared."

It is said in that simile that the Buddha, who is the Kinsman of the Sun (ādiccabandhu), declared this in the following way:

Pheṇapiṇḍūpamaṃ rūpaṃ – this form, this bodily cage that we puff up so greatly and beautifully, using it to compete and display our wellness and health, is shown by the Buddha to be purely like a lump of foam. When you go near a bridge during the rainy season, you can see a heap of debris collecting near a log as the dirty water flows. From a distance, that pile of rubbish looks like a beautiful, white, solid rock. It appears as something strong. But it is just a heap of foam! A heap of foam! Similarly, this bodily cage is built up from the food we consume – the foam of rice, the foam of gruel, all gathering together. Thus, we can see that form is like a lump of foam. It is constantly arising and passing away, changing even more subtly than what is described in the cellular theories of modern scientists. That is how the heap of form is.

Vedanā (Feeling) is also like that. To show that Vedanā is constantly changing, the Buddha illustrated it with the simile of raindrops falling on water during a heavy rain. Vedanā bubbuḷūpamā... If you watch for a moment, you can see the raindrops falling from the roof forming bubbles and bursting right there. That is vedanā bubbuḷūpamā – the bubble-simile that we see in our daily lives.

Next, marīcikūpamā saññā – this perception is what we grasp through the eye, ear, nose, and so on. Just as a deer, seeing a mirage, runs after it—a mirage being something that deceives the deer, which is a characteristic of the dry season—the Buddha compares the entirety of perception to a mirage.

Saṅkhārā kadalūpamā – Saṅkhāra (Preparations) refer to our volitional energies, our desires, hopes, and intentions. Highlighting every one of them as “I” and “mine”, we cultivate expectations and make various plans. The Buddha compares that entire mass of expectations to a plantain trunk (banana stem). Just as a plantain trunk has no core or heartwood, being merely a collection of layers or sheaths, there is no essence to be found even at its center. In the same way, there is nothing here that can be grasped as a self. This is merely a heap of Saṅkhāra.

Next, the Buddha points out something even deeper: māyūpamañca viññāṇaṃ – and Viññāṇa (Consciousness) is like an illusion. Other religionists and teachers ultimately grasped onto Viññāṇa, the invisible mind. The Buddha points out that this mind is purely illusory. The Buddha reveals Viññāṇa to be like a magician's trick, which conjures up and displays something non-existent as if it exists. Thus, although there is no actual self (attā), it presents a non-existent thing as if it is real: “This is my Viññāṇa. I think, therefore I am.” In this manner, one falls into wrong view. But the Buddha reveals that Viññāṇa is purely an illusion. Even the Viññāṇa that others grasp onto is shown by the Buddha to be like an illusion. It is when this is understood that complete liberation is attained.

Therefore, devout devotees, you should reflect on this. Do not think that the long sutta we took as our topic is too heavy or profound. Even if the sutta itself seems so, the similes within it can be brought close to our daily lives. Take the leper: we too get skin diseases, and we have seen lepers; they are among us. We have also seen many blind people. If we apply their way of thinking and their experiences to ourselves and reflect, we can understand this matter. When the Buddha looked through the Buddha-eye, we appeared to Him as lepers, and as blind people too. That is why He declared this. Reflecting in this way, without developing any displeasure toward the Buddha's word, if we expect ultimate liberation, ultimate bliss, and ultimate health, realize that it lies within this Dhamma. Try to walk on this Path of Dhamma with an eye of understanding.

As you devotees know, although this valuable Noble Eightfold Path has eight factors, it is comprised of the threefold training of virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). Among them, virtue is foremost. It is by establishing oneself in virtue that everything else can be accomplished. Thus, today, you have observed virtue according to your respective levels, and then, as occasion permitted, you developed concentration by practicing meditation and so forth. This Dhamma sermon, as mentioned, also helps you to journey on this Path of Dhamma. Four factors of a superior person (sappurisa) are shown: sappurisa-saṃsevo (association with superior persons), saddhamma-savanaṃ (hearing the True Dhamma), yoniso manasikāro (radical attention / wise attention), and dhammānudhamma-paṭipatti (practice of the Dhamma in accordance with the Dhamma). One must associate with superior persons, associate with noble friends (kalyāṇa-mitta), listen to the Dhamma, practice Yoniso manasikāra (Wise attention)—which means developing correct reflection—and then engage in the practice of the Dhamma in accordance with the Dhamma. Only then does the Dhamma-eye arise.

May the wholesome energy gathered by you devotees today, and gained through this Dhamma sermon, serve as a supportive condition for the arising of that Dhamma-eye! We aspire that by sharing the merits of this great store of wholesome deeds gathered through preaching the Dhamma and listening to the Dhamma, any merit-desiring beings from Avīci to Akaniṭṭha may rejoice in it, transcend the suffering of saṃsāra, and find peace in the supreme Deathless Nibbāna!

Aṅguttara Nikāya (AN 2.3.9 / Aṅguttara Nikāya Duka Nipāta)

Dear Listeners,

This Poson Full Moon Poya Day, which is regarded as the day on which the Buddha Sasana was established in our island, is an excellent day to recollect our practice. Especially in this year, which commemorates the passing of 2600 years since the Enlightenment, we hear many discussing "aligning ourselves in practice." It was with this "aligning ourselves in practice" in mind that we decided to present to you today a sutta discourse that was immensely popular during the times when the Buddha Sasana established in Lanka by Ven. Mahinda Maha Arahant shone brilliantly. In the past, this discourse was known as the Maha Ariyavamsa. The two verses recited at the end of that sutta are what we have presented as our theme.

On one occasion, while the Teacher of the Three Worlds, the Fully Self-Awakened One, was residing at Jetavana monastery in Savatthi, he addressed a large congregation of monks and delivered this Ariyavamsa Sutta. Today, this is found in the Book of Fours (Catukka Nipata) of the Aṅguttara Nikāya. It was not prompted by any particular external event; rather, we must understand that an intention arose in the Buddha himself to highlight the dispensational practices in a way that would deeply touch the hearts of the Sangha.

Therefore, he commenced this marvelous discourse in this manner: "Monks, there are these four noble lineages (ariyavaṃsā) which are recognized as foremost (aggaññā), long-standing (vaṃsaññā), ancient (porāṇā), unadulterated (asambhinnā); which are not doubted, which were not doubted in the past, nor will be doubted in the future, and which are not rejected by wise ascetics and brahmins." Having commenced thus, he explains them one by one to the Saṅgha as follows:

"Herein, monks, a monk is content with any kind of robe whatsoever (itari-itara cīvara santosa)." We need to explain the meaning of the words itari-itara cīvara santosa so that you can understand. In Pali, itara refers to "one of two." Thus, if we say itari-itara cīvara santosa, what are the two alternatives? It could be a coarse robe or a refined robe; it could be a new robe or an old robe. Thus, it means "either of the two." To be content with itari-itara robes generally means that whatever kind of robe is received, one is fully satisfied with it. The first point is that a monk in this Sasana is endowed with contentment with any kind of robe whatsoever. The second point is that he praises the virtue of such contentment with robes. He speaks of its value to other members of the Sangha. The third point is that, in his search for robes, he does not resort to improper or unsuitable means. If he fails to obtain a robe, he does not become dejected, troubled in mind, or distressed. If he does obtain a robe, he does not become greedy (giddha), bound, or attached to it with craving / thirst (taṇhā). Instead, seeing its danger (ādīnava), he uses it with the wisdom of deliverance (nissaraṇa-paññā). Furthermore, it is said that he does not exalt himself or disparage others on account of his virtue of contentment with robes. Finally, it is stated that the monk is skilled and energetic in this contentment, not lazy, and is possessed of mindfulness and clear comprehension (sati-sampajañña). The Buddha declares that such a monk is said to be established in the ancient, foremost noble lineage. This is the first quality: contentment with any robe whatsoever—the virtue of being satisfied with whatever robe is received.

Next, the Buddha declares: "Herein, monks, a monk is content with any kind of alms-food whatsoever (itari-itara piṇḍapāta santosa)." This means that when he goes on alms-round, whether the food is coarse or sweet, little or much, he possesses the virtue of being content with whichever of the two he receives. He is content with any alms-food whatsoever. Secondly, he praises the virtue of such contentment with alms-food. He tells others that this is a valuable practice. Thirdly, in his search for alms-food, he does not resort to improper means. Fourthly, if he does not receive alms-food, he does not become dejected or mentally distressed. When he does receive alms-food, he does not become greedy, attached, or enslaved by it through craving / thirst (taṇhā). Instead, seeing its danger, he consumes the alms-food with the wisdom of deliverance (nissaraṇa-paññā), keeping Nibbāna as his goal. Furthermore, he does not exalt himself or disparage others because of his virtue of being content with any alms-food whatsoever. Finally, he is skilled and energetic regarding this contentment with alms-food, not lazy, and is possessed of mindfulness and clear comprehension (sati-sampajañña). Concerning such a monk, the Buddha declares that he is said to be established in the ancient, foremost noble lineage.

Next, the Buddha speaks concerning lodging: "Herein, monks, a monk is content with any kind of lodging whatsoever (itari-itara senāsana santosa)." This refers to the quality of being content with whatever lodging is received. He is endowed with contentment with any lodging whatsoever. He praises the virtue of such contentment with lodging to others. Furthermore, he does not resort to improper means to acquire lodging. If he does not obtain lodging, he does not become mentally distressed. To state it briefly: when he does obtain a lodging, instead of using it with greed, clinging, and possessiveness, he uses that lodging while contemplating its danger, with the wisdom of deliverance (nissaraṇa-paññā), and with Nibbāna in mind. He does not exalt himself or disparage others on account of his virtue of being content with any lodging whatsoever. He is skilled, energetic, and possessed of mindfulness and clear comprehension (sati-sampajañña) regarding this contentment with lodging. The Buddha declared this as the third quality of a monk established in the foremost noble lineage.

The fourth noble lineage is presented in a unique way: bhāvanārāmo hoti bhāvanārato, pahānārāmo hoti pahānārato—both of these spiritual qualities are mentioned there. He is one who delights in meditation, one who rejoices in meditation; one who delights in abandoning, one who rejoices in abandoning. By "delighting in abandoning," we should understand the abandoning of defilements. This fourth factor concerns the monk who possesses both qualities: meditation and abandoning. He is devoted to meditation and delights in it. Likewise, he is devoted to the abandoning of defilements; he desires it and engages in it. Secondly, such a monk does not exalt himself or disparage others on account of these two noble qualities of delighting in meditation and delighting in abandoning. Thirdly, he is skilled and energetic in delighting in meditation and abandoning, not lazy, and possesses mindfulness and clear comprehension (sati-sampajañña) regarding them. Such a monk is described as one established in the fourth noble lineage.

Summarizing these, the Buddha then declares: "Monks, these four noble lineages are foremost (aggaññā), long-standing (vaṃsaññā), ancient (porāṇā), unadulterated (asambhinnā), not doubted in the past, nor will they be doubted in the future, and not rejected by wise ascetics and brahmins." With these words, the Buddha describes them as qualities accepted since ancient times as foremost, enduring over a long period, belonging to the noble lineage, and highly valued qualities that are neither doubted nor rejected by wise ascetics and brahmins.

Having shown these four noble lineages, the Buddha further states: "A monk who is endowed with, possessed of, and established in these four noble lineages, even if he dwells in the eastern quarter, he overcomes discontent (arati) and is not overcome by discontent." Discontent (arati), dear merits-seekers, refers to a lack of delight in the wholesome practices of the Sasana, such as meditation. At the same time, we must also understand its counterpart. The words arati (discontent) and rati (delight) appear together in this sutta and are frequently encountered. Rati means delight in the five cords of sensual pleasure. Arati is also unwholesome, though in a different way. It is not a lack of delight in sensual pleasures, but rather a lack of delight in the spiritual virtues of the Sasana. To put it simply, discontent (arati) is like the thought of reverting to lay life.

Here, the Buddha concludes by stating that even if a monk endowed with these four noble lineages dwells in the eastern quarter, he overcomes discontent. This means he can conquer any dissatisfaction with the monk's life. Discontent does not overcome him; he does not submit to discontent. Furthermore, the Buddha declares that even if such a monk dwells in the western quarter, the northern quarter, or the southern quarter—indeed, in whichever quarter he may dwell—he overcomes discontent and is not overcome by discontent.

Next, the Buddha asks: "Why is that, monks? Why do I say so? Arati-rati-saho hi dhīro—because that wise one, endowed with courage and fortitude, conquers both discontent and delight." Having declared this, he summarized the matter in the two verses we mentioned earlier. Discontent does not conquer the wise one; it does not crush or overwhelm him. Why? Nārati dhīraṃ sahati—discontent has no strength to overcome the wise one; nārati dhīrasahāti—discontent possesses no power to subjugate the wise one.

Next, it says: dhīro ca aratiṃ sahati, dhīro hi aratīsaho—only the wise monk conquers discontent; indeed, only the wise one is capable of overcoming discontent. The Buddha has declared this multiple times to emphasize this single point. Then he says: sabbakammavihāyinaṃ—one who has cast off all kamma (volitional actions); paṇuṇṇaṃ—one who has dispelled all defilements. "Who can obstruct such a monk?" (paṇuṇṇaṃ ko nivāraye). This means there is no one capable of obstructing him.

"Ko taṃ jambonadassevā, nekkhaṃ ninditumarahati" — Jambonada refers to gold obtained from the Jambu River, which is considered far more valuable than other kinds of gold. Who would dare to blame a monk who is as pure as a gold coin made of Jambonada gold? The meaning is that no one is capable of blaming him.

Then, further praising him, the verse says: devāpi taṃ pasaṃsanti, brahmunāpi pasaṃsito—even the devas praise that monk, and he is praised by Brahma as well. With these verses, the Buddha presents a statement that further elevates and reinforces the points made.

In explaining these verses, since ancient times, commentators have generally drawn upon the thirteen rigorous ascetic practices known as the dhutangas of the Sangha. It is in light of these thirteen rigorous practices that contentment with robes, contentment with alms-food, contentment with lodging, and delight in meditation are explained. In explaining them, as we have heard from the past, someone might think—it might appear that there is something missing here. You have surely heard of the four requisites (sivpasa): robes (cīvara), alms-food (piṇḍapāta), lodging (senāsana), and medicinal requisites for the sick (gilānapaccaya). You might see the omission of medicinal requisites as a shortcoming. However, medicine is generally considered to be subsumed under alms-food. In ancient times, medicines and such were also obtained by going on alms-round. Therefore, it is shown as belonging to that category. The fourth factor presented here is meditation and abandoning. When discussing these, various commentaries point to the rigorous ascetic practices (dhutanga). You may have heard that the Buddha placed the Maha Arahant Kassapa in the foremost position (etadagga) among those who practice these dhutangas. Ven. Maha Kassapa received such great respect from the Buddha precisely because he maintained these rigorous ascetic practices.

We need to gradually familiarize ourselves with these dhutangas. Among them, two of the thirteen practices concern robes, corresponding to contentment with robes. There are two dhutangas related to being content with whatever robes are received. The first is paṃsukūlika (the refuse-rag-robe-wearer's practice). Though the term "paṃsukūla" has different meanings today, paṃsu, dear merits-seekers, means dust or a heap of dust. Rag-robes are pieces gathered and picked up from dust heaps. Today, no one would even like to think about such things. Yet, we have heard that even the Buddha made his rag-robes this way. Where did they find the cloth required for these rag-robes? It was either while going on alms-round, from rubbish heaps, or from shrouds discarded in cemeteries. It is recorded in the texts that the Buddha took the shroud thrown over the slave girl Punna in the cemetery to make his own rag-robe. In any case, such a robe is of few wishes (alpecca). A monk who undertakes the paṃsukūlika ascetic practice rejects robes offered directly by laypeople. He upholds the rigorous practice of using only robes stitched from pieces of cloth gathered from roadsides or cemeteries.

When someone is ordained, especially at the time of higher ordination (upasampadā), the Buddha reminds the monk of the minimum things he should expect. These are known as the four supports (nissaya). "This monkhood has refuse-rag robes (paṃsukūlacīvaraṃ nissāya) as its support." One must be content with rag-robes. Household offerings are extra gains; therefore, one should not ordain with the expectation of extra gains. It is said that, at the very least, if one receives a refuse-rag robe, one should be satisfied. Thus, this dhutanga of using refuse-rag robes is shown as the first aspect of contentment with any robe whatsoever.

The second dhutanga related to robes is tecīvarika (the triple-robe-wearer's practice). Members of the Sangha sometimes resolve: "I will be content with only three robes." The three robes are the outer patch-robe (saṅghāṭi), the upper robe (uttarāsaṅga), and the inner robe (antaravāsaka). To be content with these three robes is the practice. Here, a monk resolves for a certain period, or for his entire life: "I will not use a fourth robe; I will be content with only these three robes." This contentment with robes is what is called the tecīvarika ascetic practice. This too is a form of contentment. When people come from the lay world, they often bring along ideas of clothing fashion. If they continue to pursue such fashions even after wearing robes, what monkhood is left there? Therefore, to introduce the fundamental purpose and value of monkhood, the Buddha demonstrated this through his own example.

In particular, the Maha Arahant Kassapa strictly observed this tecīvarika practice. He never took more than three robes. These two dhutangas concerning contentment with robes are detailed in the texts.

Next is contentment with alms-food. This is represented by five dhutangas. The first is one you can easily understand: if a monk resolves to undertake the piṇḍapātika (alms-food-eater's) practice, he survives solely on food received through alms-round. If observed rigorously, he does not accept invitations to meals or food brought to the monastery by laypeople.

This is why, when explaining the supports (nissaya) to a newly ordained monk, the Buddha states that this is the minimum he should expect: "This monkhood has alms-food (piṇḍapātabhojanaṃ nissāya) as its support." He says that one ordains for alms-food. This is because it is a practice of few wishes, and living on alms-food is a way of showing favor to the world. Furthermore, it is described in the texts as being like a bee that takes pollen from a flower without harming its fragrance or color. In this way, without causing trouble to anyone, he goes from house to house and is content with whatever is received. Through this, he also abandons his pride. He does not say, "I live on my own wealth." Instead, he reflects: "My life is dependent on others" (para-paṭibaddhā me jīvikā). Understanding that "I survive on food given by faithful devotees" helps in maintaining the virtues of a monk. Therefore, a monk who resolves to practice this even more rigorously depends solely on alms-food.

Next, a monk who practices this even more strictly undertakes sapadānacārika (the uninterrupted alms-round practice). This too is designated as an ascetic practice. Sapadāna, dear merits-seekers, means going on alms-round from house to house in uninterrupted order. Even during the Buddha's time, there were some monks who frequently visited the houses of wealthy, faithful devotees, sometimes even entering inside to eat. Without selecting houses in that manner—whether it be a wealthy mansion or a poor hut—he walks for alms in consecutive order (sapadāna). This is considered a valuable practice. There were those who kept such rigorous ascetic practices. Ven. Maha Kassapa Maha Thero must have observed these. He walked for alms from house to house. Through this, he was like the moon (candūpama); he never became attached to any household. He was seen, but he did not cling. He maintained no intimacy or close association. The benefits of this are great: the monk avoids unnecessary involvements with laypeople, and it also guards against the craving for taste (rasa-taṇhā). Sometimes, monks frequent certain houses because they receive delicious food there. Free from such greed and craving for taste, and providing an opportunity for everyone to gain merit, a monk resolves and practices this sapadānacārika ascetic practice.

Next is the special practice called ekāsanika (the one-session-eater's practice). Certain monks who are devoted to meditation resolve to eat only once a day. Indeed, even the Buddha observed this. It is quite amazing to hear of this today. At one time, in the early days of the Sangha, some monks used to eat even at night. When the Buddha opposed this and laid down rules, some monks rebelled. Yet, when the Buddha spoke of the benefits of ekāsanika—eating only once a day—it was truly wonderful. He declared many benefits of eating only once a day: appābādhatañca, lahuṭṭhānañca, balañca, phāsuvihārañca—fewness of illnesses, lightness, physical strength, and a comfortable dwelling. Taking light food in this way supports a meditative life. Some resolve to observe this practice of eating only one meal a day as a dhutanga for their entire life, and some for a specific period. This is what is called the ekāsanika practice.

Another such difficult ascetic practice is pattapiṇḍika (the bowl-eater's practice). Some monks resolve to consume only food that is placed directly into their alms-bowl. They do not eat from other plates or vessels. This brings them great tranquility. Today, laypeople bring food in various types of vessels, which can sometimes distract the mind. But that monk takes whatever is received in his bowl, goes under a tree, and eats. While being content with whatever is received, this practice also prevents the mind from being distracted by the craving for taste and unnecessary vessels, thereby aiding concentration. Therefore, monks adopt this as an ascetic practice. Thus we have piṇḍapātika, sapadānacārika, and ekāsanika.

Next is khalupacchābhattika (the practice of refusing later food). You may not have even heard of this. It means that while some members of the Sangha might eat more if something else is brought after they have finished their meal, a monk undertaking this practice firmly resolves: "Once I have finished eating and indicated that I am done, I will not take any extra food." It reduces the craving for taste and helps maintain a light, unburdened existence. Just like craving for clothing, craving / thirst (taṇhā) for food is a powerful force in this cycle of existence; we can see how even animals fight and kill each other for food. These are tendencies we have carried in our minds through saṃsāra. A verse in the Theragatha states: "One who is greedy and bound by the craving for taste (rasataṇhāya gadhito) does not awaken his heart to Nibbāna." Monks conquer this in various ways and correct their own shortcomings. This is not a mere vow to show off to anyone, nor is it to exalt oneself or disparage others. The practice is observed solely to crush one's own defilements. This is called the practice of effacement (sallēkha-paṭipadā). Indeed, to summarize these virtues for you, they consist of contentment (santuṭṭhitā) and fewness of wishes (alpeccatā). First comes alpeccatā, which means having few desires. Santuṭṭhitā means being content with what is received. Subharatā means being easy to support. And there is the special word sallēkha, which means the cutting away of defilements—examining one's own shortcomings and practicing accordingly to overcome defilements as the occasion demands. Finally, there is vīriyārambhatā (arousing of energy). If one eats too much food, drowsiness increases. What is spoken of here is a light diet suitable for meditation. The five dhutangas related to contentment with alms-food are traditionally explained in this manner.

Although we are trying to explain this Ariyavamsa sermon in an hour, it is truly wonderful, dear merits-seekers. If we briefly mention its history—it is a significant part of our history. We mention this so you can understand its value. The Mahavamsa records that King Vohārika Tissa was a monarch who performed an extraordinary and grand service for the Sasana in ancient times. The Mahavamsa states that he established alms-funds and arranged for the preaching of the Ariyavamsa Sutta throughout the land. Many other Dhamma stories mention that Theros like Dīghabhāṇaka Abhaya preached the Ariyavamsa throughout all three watches of the night. Even if we cannot do so for all three watches, we are attempting to explain it briefly within this hour. It is recorded that during the times when the Buddha Sasana flourished, when the Ariyavamsa was preached in the city of Magama, people from the entire region flocked to hear it. It is also mentioned that even kings listened to the Ariyavamsa preaching throughout all three watches of the night. It was treated with such great importance because Ariya refers to the Buddhas, Paccekabuddhas, Arahants, and noble disciples of the Tathāgata. Since this was a discourse that highlighted the lineage of their own noble family, it was treated with immense respect. Not only the Sangha, but even laypeople listened to this Ariyavamsa sermon.

We have spoken about robes and alms-food; now we must speak about lodgings. Regarding lodgings, five dhutangas are mentioned. First is āraññika (the forest-dweller's practice). A monk resolves: "I will dwell in the forest for this period." Or sometimes, so that others do not know, he might come to the village during the day and return to the forest at night. To put it briefly, he dwells in the wild forest. Dhamma stories record that even some novice monks undertook this practice secretly, because it is not something to be advertised. Since it is conducive to their meditation and they require seclusion, they resolve to spend the entire period in the forest, letting go of the expectation of life, arousing spiritual urgency (saṃvega), and using the seclusion of the forest to develop their meditation.

Next is rukkhamūlika (the tree-root-dweller's practice), which refers to dwelling at the root of a tree. We can hardly even imagine this. Yet, you will recall that Buddhas almost always attain enlightenment under a tree. This is because that secluded environment is highly suitable for meditation. Some resolved to practice this rukkhamūlika ascetic practice. It was so highly valued that the Buddha, when presenting the four supports (nissaya) to a newly ordained monk, advised him to be content with these minimum things. He reminds him that monkhood is for the sake of lodging. He tells him to be prepared to live even under a tree. That is what is meant by contentment with lodging. A monk who has undertaken this dhutanga does not go under any roofed shelter; he lives solely under a tree. This is a highly rigorous practice, hard to imagine.

Next is abbhokāsika (the open-air-dweller's practice). This is an even more powerful practice. Abbhokāsika means dwelling in the open air, under the open sky. Spending a night in the open air in peaceful meditation gives great strength to the mind. Monkhood itself is said to be like the open air, completely open like space. This can be experienced at times. Resolving to undertake this practice, one goes to the open air where there are absolutely no distractions to pull the mind away. In complete seclusion and silence, one's meditation succeeds, and concentration (samādhi) is near. Some monks undertake the abbhokāsika practice and engage in their meditation in this manner. Ultimately, these are all for the sake of delighting in meditation and delighting in abandoning (bhāvanārāmatā and pahānārāmatā), not to inflict pain on the body. This is what must be understood. We have mentioned āraññika and abbhokāsika.

The next dhutanga is sosānika (the cemetery-dweller's practice). This might sound a bit frightening. It means dwelling in a cemetery, a charnel ground. In ancient times, monks who meditated rigorously—especially those cultivating the meditation on foulness (asubha-bhāvanā)—spent their nights in cemeteries to conquer their defilements. Obtaining permission from the cemetery keepers, they practiced in this rigorous manner. Look at what great commitment they showed for the sake of Nibbāna, for the sake of ending the suffering / unsatisfactoriness / stress (dukkha) of saṃsāra. In those days, when bodies were left exposed, people were afraid to go near a cemetery due to the belief in spirits. In those raw cemeteries, there were freshly discarded corpses, old corpses, and decaying ones. By contemplating them, they meditated. Today, we practice foulness meditation by looking at foul pictures or attractive pictures, and we do not really perceive the foulness. Looking at the other side, even if it is lacking, it is still something. In the past, when corpses decayed—it is hard to even imagine. In those cemeteries where non-humans were said to dwell, monks developed fear of saṃsāra rather than fear of non-humans, meditated, and very quickly achieved the goal they sought. Therefore, these practices should not be ridiculed. That is the sosānika practice, where one's shelter is the cemetery itself.

The next is yathāsanthatika (the practice of accepting whatever seat is offered). This may be difficult to remember. It means accepting whatever lodging is assigned without choosing. We can understand this from the past. Even if he did not observe it strictly as a dhutanga, you remember what Ven. Rahula did when a large congregation of five hundred monks arrived. As senior monks arrived, Ven. Rahula had to move, and where did he spend the night? In the Buddha's washroom. There was no special complaint; he did not go around saying, "My father is the Buddha." Accepting whatever lodging is offered is what is called the yathāsanthatika practice. This is shown as the fifth factor. Regarding contentment with lodging, this is the fifth. Thus, within the four requisites, we clearly see contentment with robes, contentment with alms-food, and contentment with lodging.

The fourth factor presented is extremely important, extremely important. That is precisely why the Buddha presents it fourth: bhāvanārāmo hoti bhāvanārato, pahānārāmo hoti pahānārato—"He delights in meditation, rejoices in meditation; he delights in abandoning, rejoices in abandoning." Why is all of this done? It is to arouse delight in meditation, to engage in it with delight, to arouse delight in the abandoning of defilements, and to engage in that abandoning. Keep this in mind. Then one might ask, "What is the dhutanga associated with this fourth factor of delighting in meditation and abandoning?"

We have already mentioned twelve dhutangas. The remaining one is nesajjika (the sitting-practice). Nesajjika means sitting—never lying down, never letting one's back touch a bed. It is recorded in the ancient texts as a highly rigorous practice. It is truly amazing to hear of it. Conquering drowsiness, conquering sloth and torpor (thīna-middha), a monk spends the entire day and night sitting, and if sleep comes, it is only while sitting; he never lies down on a bed. There are countless such stories. Some monks, when resolving to observe this throughout the entire rainy season (vassa), would turn their beds upside down at the very start, lest they should feel tempted to lie down. That is what is called the nesajjika practice. Nisajjā means sitting. You may have heard how Ven. Cakkhupāla Thero's physical eyes became blind, but along with the loss of his physical sight, his eye of wisdom arose. Having resolved to maintain the nesajjika practice throughout the three months of the rainy season, he eventually attained Arahantship. Do not think that everyone who practices nesajjika will go blind. Rather, reflecting on the fact that throughout this long saṃsāra one has mostly spent time sleeping, he rouses energy and abandons defilements. Defilements do not enter an awake mind. It is within sloth and torpor that other defilements gain strength. By conquering sloth and torpor through the delight in meditation, both abandoning and meditation occur naturally through the nesajjika practice. This is expressed as energy; it is said that one cultivates nesajjika to rouse energy.

The dispensational values declared by the Buddha thus far are aimed directly at Nibbāna. These are not mere vows or rituals; it is wrong to treat them as such, and it is wrong to form mistaken views about them. When monks are ordained, even today when tying the robe-belt, they recite: sabba-dukkha-nissaraṇa-nibbāna-sacchikaraṇatthāya—"For the sake of release from all suffering / unsatisfactoriness / stress and the realization of Nibbāna." It is with this intention of release that everything is performed. In the Ariyavamsa Sutta, when speaking of contentment with robes, alms-food, and lodging, the Buddha declared—to give an example—that when a robe is received, one should use it without greed, without being bound by craving / thirst (taṇhā), and without being overcome by it. Instead, seeing the danger, one uses it with the wisdom of deliverance (nissaraṇa-paññā). Understanding the meaning of "nissaraṇa" means understanding the danger of developing attachment to clothing, reflecting wisely (paccavekkhaṇā) on why this robe is used: merely to cover nakedness and to protect oneself from flies, mosquitoes, and so forth. You are somewhat familiar with the wise reflection on food, which laypeople who observe the precepts also practice. Similarly, the Sangha has these wise reflections regarding the four requisites.

What is contained within this wise reflection? The Niganthas (Jains) take no food and wear no clothes. That is one extreme. In contrast, the Buddha showed how to use these four requisites in a way that does not allow one to fall prey to Mara. Generally, Mara lies hidden within these requisites. Today, this must be very clearly evident to you. Mara hides within robes as well; when one pursues highly valuable and fancy robes, there is Mara. Mara hides within alms-food too; the moment one becomes greedy for delicious food, there is Mara. It is the same with lodgings. It is to understand their danger and to use them as an aid for deliverance that the Sangha is given these wise reflections on the four requisites.

One part of the reflection is considering the purpose for which we receive these. If we speak of food, we first declare what it is not for: n'eva davāya, na madāya, na maṇḍanāya, na vibhūsanāya—not for amusement, not for intoxication, not for physical fattening, not for beautification, unlike in the ordinary world. This is stated first. Instead, it is used solely—and the word "solely" is important here—to appease the painful feeling / sensation of hunger, and the Buddha has preached to wisely reflect on this before consuming food. What is the purpose of taking this? Unlike during lay life, it is taken because one cannot survive without it, to appease the painful feeling / sensation of hunger and to maintain this body. To where is this body to be maintained? Up to Nibbāna—this is what is meant by the wisdom of deliverance (nissaraṇa-paññā).

Furthermore, to turn this wise reflection on the four requisites into a deeper meditation, it is shown that this food is composed of the elements of earth, water, fire, and air (pathavī, āpo, tejo, vāyo). This body is also composed of these four elements. Thus, reflecting that this clean, fragrant food enters this impure body and becomes filthy fulfills both element-attention (dhātu-manasikāra) and foulness-attention (asubha-manasikāra).

The Buddha demonstrates how to conquer Mara at the very place where one is vulnerable to him. If one reflects rightly on these four requisites, contemplating their danger—the danger of overeating, of being enslaved by the craving for taste—and instead practices with the wisdom of deliverance (nissaraṇa-paññā) solely to maintain the body for the practice of the Dhamma, then that is for the sake of release. Indeed, the Buddha has declared so deeply: āhāraṃ nissāya āhāraṃ pajahatha—"Support yourself on food to abandon food." When we look at this, it seems paradoxical, as if the two parts do not agree. "Support yourself on food to abandon food" is a very profound statement. The Buddha has declared that there are four kinds of nutriment: physical food (kabaḷīkārāhāra), Contact (phassa), mental volition (manosañcetanā), and Consciousness (viññāṇa). To eliminate all of these, he says we must support ourselves on this physical food: āhāraṃ nissāya āhāraṃ pajahatha. That is the profound aspect. Thus, the Buddha shows that through wise reflection, a monk who acts in this manner is not overcome by Mara.

These four requisites are things given by faithful laypeople with great devotion. Yet, in certain places, the Buddha has described this—please do not be offended by this word—as a "bait" (āmisa). Āmisa means bait. Without saying "laypeople," let us say "Mara." Mara casts a hook with bait to catch fish. When the bait is cast, some fish, not knowing any better, swallow it and fall into trouble. Therefore, the Buddha calls this lokāmisa—the bait of the world. If one does not know how to swallow this bait correctly, if one swallows it wrongly, dangerous consequences will follow. If one does not know how to swallow it rightly, it is better not to swallow it at all. Otherwise, one gets caught by Mara.

Next, the Buddha describes in the Ariya Pariyesana Sutta (The Noble Search)—which you might not have heard of much—his own search for release from saṃsāra, which he calls the wondrous "Noble Search." In the beginning, the ascetic Siddhattha went astray because the world pointed to self-mortification as the sole path to liberation. Like the Niganthas, he subjected his body to extreme pain. But once he realized its futility, he took the Middle Path (majjhimā paṭipadā). Having taken the Middle Path, he accepted a sufficient amount of food to maintain the body. At the end of the Ariya Pariyesana Sutta, the Buddha gives a wonderful simile. Because of this simile, the sutta is also known by another name: Pāsarāsi (The Mass of Snares). Pāsa means a snare or a noose.

A snare is used to catch an animal. The simile describes a deer hunter who sets snares to catch deer. Some deer get caught in those snares, and when the hunter comes, they are helpless and get captured. But the Buddha points out that some wise deer do not get caught in the snares; instead, they lie down right on top of the snare, and when the hunter approaches, they leap away. This is the wonderful simile given by the Buddha near the end of the Ariya Pariyesana Sutta.

The Buddha showed that the path he traveled in the past is not a path of completely abandoning food and clothing. That is not how one escapes from saṃsāra. Instead, if one reflects wisely, maintains restraint over the senses, and understands the purpose of these requisites, then when Mara—the deer hunter—approaches, this monk can leap away like the wise deer, uncaught. This is what we must extract from this Ariyavamsa sermon. Through contentment with robes, satisfaction with what is received, fewness of wishes, and ease of support, one aligns with what was said regarding robes. Regarding fewness of wishes, the Buddha often compared the lifestyle of the Sangha to a bird: sakuṇo sehi pattehi bārena yen'eva yati—just as a bird flying in the sky flies freely, carrying only its wings. Sapatto bhārova ḍeti—carrying only his bowl and robes like wings, without accumulating many belongings, the monk lives with few wishes. This refers to the triple-robe-wearer (tecīvarika) monk. A monk content with only three robes can travel easily from place to place, just like a bird. These virtues of fewness of wishes and contentment are described because they support meditation and abandoning. Therefore, we must understand these four noble lineages declared by the Buddha. Since the very ancient past, wise ascetics and brahmins—not those of ordinary intellect—have walked in this noble lineage. The Buddha mentions that ancient Buddhas and their noble disciples valued these noble lineages, both regarding the four requisites and their ultimate purpose: meditation and the abandoning of defilements.

When we speak of meditation, you can understand that true meditation is cultivated through the factors of awakening (bojjhaṅga): mindfulness (sati), investigation of states (dhamma-vicaya), energy (vīriya), joy (pīti), tranquility (passaddhi), concentration (samādhi), and equanimity (upekkhā). That is the genuine meditation. Abandoning refers to the abandoning of defilements. You are familiar with the four right efforts (sammappadhāna), which are described as four types of energy. They are explained as follows: to prevent the arising of unarisen unwholesome states, chandaṃ janeti vāyamati vīriyaṃ ārabhati cittaṃ paggaṇhāti padahati—he arouses desire, makes an effort, rouses energy, exerts his mind, and strives. As we have explained before, one must arouse desire, make an effort, start to rouse energy, and firmly establish the mind. One must exert supreme energy in four ways. First, to prevent the arising of unarisen unwholesome states. These dhutangas and the contentment with robes assist in preventing unarisen unwholesome states from arising. If one uses these requisites without such reflection, without understanding the value of fewness of wishes, one unknowingly becomes enslaved by the bait of the world, swallows the bait, and eventually is forced to return to lay life. That is why these have been declared.

First is to prevent the arising of unarisen unwholesome states. Second is to abandon arisen unwholesome states. When a monk reflects: "These are the shortcomings in my character; I have a strong craving / thirst (taṇhā) and greed for food carried over from my lay life," he then resolves to undertake the relevant ascetic practice (dhutanga). If he has an excessive attachment to clothing, he resolves to undertake the corresponding dhutanga. That is the cutting away of defilements. This is called sallēkha-paṭipadā (the practice of effacement). The Buddha has indeed permitted certain comforts, but the monk abandons them—not to tell anyone else, but to cut away his own defilements, to prevent unarisen unwholesome states, and to abandon arisen unwholesome states. Then comes the other side: to arouse unarisen wholesome states. That is the side of meditation. And finally, to maintain and develop arisen wholesome states. Thus, the four right efforts—restraint, abandoning, developing, and maintaining—help us understand this Ariyavamsa Sutta discourse.

As we mentioned earlier, in ancient Sri Lanka, not only the Sangha but even lay devotees listened to this Ariyavamsa Sutta discourse with immense devotion throughout all three watches of the night. Listening to the sermon with the same courageous energy with which it was preached, some might think it is an exaggeration, but it is recorded that even if a devotee or a monk was bitten by a snake or stung by a scorpion while listening, they would not even look at it but continued to listen to the Dhamma. Such occurrences are recorded.

Not only for the Sangha, but even for laypeople, the capacity to experience this contentment and the sacrifice required for Nibbāna were well understood by everyone in the past through this Maha Ariyavamsa Sutta discourse. In ancient times, this discourse was also known as the Catu-paccaya-santosa-bhāvanārāma-ariyavaṃsa Sutta. A discourse that highlights contentment with the four requisites and delight in meditation. Such sublime and noble discourses are rarely heard today. People have no desire to hear them. Even if preached, it has reached a state where it is deemed of no use, as you well know.

However, for some reason, this year we see the slogan "Let us line up in practice, let us line up in practice" everywhere. Therefore, we too felt the need to say something relevant to that. Whether it is accepted or not, we felt like preaching this marginalized Ariyavamsa Sutta today. Today, on this Poson Poya day, which is significant to our Sri Lankan history, just as mentioned in the Mahavamsa and the commentaries, vast crowds gathered to listen to the Ariyavamsa Sutta discourse.

Whether lay or ordained, we must reflect on the value of the Sasana. The values of the Sasana are entirely different from the values of the lay world. What is the value of a refuse-rag robe? It is something pulled from a rubbish heap, taken from a cemetery. Yet, even the Buddha dyed such cloth and wore it. You may be familiar with the Dasa-dhamma Sutta, where a monk must constantly reflect: vevaṇṇiyaṃ bhāvaṃ upagato'smi—"I have entered upon a state of classlessness / disfigurement." The nature of laypeople is to seek colorfulness (vevaṇṇiya). The nature of a monk is disfigurement (vivaṇṇiya). This is explained as the disfigurement of the body (kāya-vevaṇṇiyaṃ) and the disfigurement of requisites (parikkhāra-vevaṇṇiyaṃ). The disfigurement of the body is removing the hair and beard, which laypeople tend to beautify. The disfigurement of requisites is discarding fine clothing and instead wearing a dull-colored refuse-rag robe. A robe stitched from pieces of cloth gathered here and there, and using a black alms-bowl. These things serve to remind him: "I am no longer a layperson, but a monk." We must reflect according to these monastic values. That is the significance of the Dasa-dhamma Sutta declared by the Buddha. All of these are directly related to the matters discussed in the Ariyavamsa Sutta. Therefore, we must not think of these as outdated or obsolete. If these were things that could become obsolete, the Buddha would not have used those terms:

Aggaññā, vaṃsaññā, porāṇā, asambhinnā, asambhinnapubbā... viññūhi samaṇabrāhmaṇehi. Wise ascetics and brahmins regard this as foremost. Over a long period, wise ascetics and brahmins have neither doubted nor rejected it. Such is the nature of this practice.

Therefore, on a day like today, you must make a firm determination. If we wish to preserve this dispensational practice, whether we are lay or ordained, we must at least recognize these values. If lay devotees do not recognize these values, it directly affects the lives of the Sangha. If these practices are ridiculed or mocked, it becomes difficult for the Sangha to maintain these dhutanga practices. A much better environment is created when lay devotees also understand these dispensational values. That is why we speak these words.

You must bear in mind what we often say—that the lamp of the Sasana is about to go out. We are compelled to say that it is about to go out. In such an era, if anyone wishes to bring an end to the suffering / unsatisfactoriness / stress (dukkha) of saṃsāra, let them recollect the dispensational values spoken of today. The beginning of that is the valuable precepts you have undertaken today, dedicating yourselves to keeping them, meditating, and listening to the Dhamma. At this moment, you have also listened to this Dhamma discourse. May whatever is of value to be taken from this be taken by you to develop the virtues of virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). May this discourse be a supportive condition for everyone to realize the noble, deathless Nibbāna through the realization of the path and fruit, starting from stream-entry (sotāpatti).

May all beings from the lowest hell (Avīci) to the highest heaven (Akaniṭṭha) rejoice in the merit of listening to this Dhamma, and through that appreciation of merit, may they find solace in the noble, deathless Nibbāna through whichever Bodhi they aspire to. Likewise, may this merit of delivering the Dhamma be a supportive condition for you to preserve these dispensational virtues. Let us chant these verses to share the merit.

Dhammapada 276 (Maggavagga)

Dear Listeners,

Today is this Poson Full Moon Poya day. This is a day on which the attention of pious Buddhists is directed toward both the past and the future of the Buddha Sāsana (Dispensation) in this country. We all accept that on that day, a Dhamma mission of seven members, led by the Great Arahant Mahinda, arrived from Jambudīpa to Mihintale precisely to establish the Buddha Sāsana. Since this mission included five ordained Arahant Theros—Mahinda, Ittiya, Uttiya, Sambala, and Bhaddasāla—along with the Sāmaṇera Sumana and the lay disciple (upāsaka) Bhanduka, we can understand that the relationship between the clergy and the laity in the Sambuddha Sāsana was represented therein.

We all have heard that Arahant Mahinda introduced his group to King Devānampiyatissa with the stanza:

> Samaṇā mayaṃ mahārāja, > dhammarājassa sāvakā;

> Taveva anukampāya, > jambudīpā idhāgatā.

"O Great King, we are recluses, disciples of the King of Dhamma. Out of compassion for you, we have come here from Jambudīpa." Thus they introduced themselves.

Furthermore, history records that King Devānampiyatissa, with great faith and confidence in the group led by Arahant Mahinda, acted to establish the Sambuddha Sāsana in this island of Lankā. From then until now, amidst various temporal crises and vicissitudes, the Sambuddha Sāsana has been preserved in this country to a certain extent up to the present day. For the pious who reflect and ponder upon the future of the Buddha Sāsana, we chose as our theme today a valuable Dhammapada stanza that specially reminds us of the practice (paṭipadā) of this Buddha Sāsana.

"Tumhehi kiccaṃ ātappaṃ, akkhātāro tathāgatā"—The duty, the exertion that must be made, must be striven for by yourselves. The Tathāgatas are merely teachers who point out the Dhamma.

"Paṭipannā pamokkhanti jhāyino"—Those who enter the path and cultivate absorption (meditation) are freed from the bonds of Māra.

Through this stanza, the practicality as well as the fruitfulness of the Blessed One's practice is expressed. Indeed, when speaking of this, a valuable discourse (sūtra) that reveals the special characteristics within the practice of this Buddha Sāsana is the Gaṇaka-Moggallāna Sutta of the Majjhima Nikāya. Even in the opening narrative (nidāna-kathā) of that Sutta, an important principle regarding practicality emerges. At a time when the Blessed One was residing in Sāvatthī, at the Eastern Monastery (Pubbārāma) known as the palace of Migāra's mother (Migāramātupāsāda), which was built and offered by the great lay disciple Visākhā, a Brahmin named Gaṇaka-Moggallāna came to see Him. (Devotees, in modern terms, the Brahmin Moggallāna was an accountant.) Having arrived, he addressed the Buddha as follows: "Just as, Master Gotama, in this palace of Migāra's mother, there is a gradual training, a gradual performance, a gradual practice, visible even down to the last step of this staircase"—the three specific terms mentioned there are anupubba-sikkhā (gradual training), anupubba-kiriyā (gradual performance), and anupubba-paṭipadā (gradual practice)—"and just as among us Brahmins, in our education, a gradual training, a gradual performance, a gradual practice is seen; and also in the art of archery, and also among us who make a living through this accounting, there is a similar training. When we get a new apprentice, a pupil, we train him to count systematically in this way: one-one, two-twos, three-threes, four-fours, five-fives, six-sixes, seven-sevens, eight-eights, nine-nines, ten-tens, and so on, even up to a hundred. In the same way, Master Gotama, is it possible to show such a gradual training, gradual performance, and gradual practice in your Dispensation?" Thus he asked the Blessed One.

The Blessed One replied: "Brahmin, in my Dispensation too, it can be shown in that way. Just as a horse-trainer, upon receiving a thoroughbred horse that can be trained, first applies the bit and systematically performs the tasks relevant to that training; even so, the Tathāgata, on receiving a person fit to be disciplined, tells that monk: 'Come, monk, be virtuous. Dwell restrained by the restraint of the Pātimokkha. Be perfect in conduct and resort. Seeing danger in the slightest faults, train yourself by undertaking the training rules.' Thus, He gives that very first training. If at any stage that monk has become virtuous in that manner, then the Tathāgata gives him the second step:

'Come, monk, dwell with the doors of your senses guarded. On seeing a form with the eye, do not grasp its signs or secondary characteristics. Lest evil, unwholesome states such as covetousness and grief flow in on account of not guarding it, establish restraint over the eye.' In that manner, He instructs him to practice sense-restraint over the eye, as well as over the ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind—all six senses.

When that monk has reached the state of being devoted to guarding the doors of his senses (indriyesu guttadvāratā), at that point, the Tathāgata trains this monk further.

'Come, monk, be moderate in eating. Consume food reflecting and considering wisely: "Neither for amusement, nor for intoxication," and so on. "Not for beautification, nor for adornment, but merely for the maintenance and survival of this body, for ending the discomfort of hunger, and for assisting the holy life." In this way, He establishes him in that training, instructing him to take food after reflecting in a certain reflective manner, solely to appease the feeling of hunger, to avoid the discomfort that arises from overeating, and for living in comfort.'

When that monk practices that training of knowing moderation in food (bhojane mattaññutā), at that stage, the Tathāgata disciplines him thus: 'Come, monk, dwell devoted to wakefulness (jāgariyānuyoga).' Dwell accustomed to the practice of wakefulness relevant to effort, and then He gives him the schedule: 'Dwell during the entire day walking back and forth and sitting, purifying your mind of obstructive states. Dwell during the first watch of the night walking back and forth and sitting, freeing your mind of obstructive states. During the middle watch of the night, lie down on your right side in the lion's posture (sīha-seyyā). Having awakened in the last watch of the night, dwell walking back and forth and sitting, freed from obstructive states, devoted to the practice of wakefulness.'

At whatever stage he dwells devoted to that practice of wakefulness, at that stage the Tathāgata disciplines him further still: 'Come, monk, dwell possessed of mindfulness and clear comprehension (sati-sampajañña).' When going forward and returning, one acts with clear comprehension (sampajānākārī hoti). That is, he acts with awareness. It means being possessed of established mindfulness. Next, in looking ahead, looking aside, bending, extending (samiñjite pasārite), in wearing the outer robe, inner robe, and carrying the bowl, in eating and drinking, in passing stool and urine, and furthermore, in walking, standing, sitting, sleeping, waking, speaking, and keeping silent—in every action, He trains him in mindfulness and clear comprehension, saying 'be one who acts with clear comprehension.'

When mindfulness and clear comprehension are complete, the Tathāgata admonishes that monk: 'Monk, resort to a secluded dwelling. Get accustomed to resorting to secluded places such as a forest, the root of a tree, a mountain, a glen, a charnel ground, a jungle thicket, the open air, or a heap of straw.' When that monk has reached that state, having returned from his alms-round, he sits down quietly, cross-legged, keeping his body erect, and frees his mind from the hindrances (nīvaraṇa). He frees his mind from the hindrances of covetousness, ill-will, dullness and drowsiness, restlessness and worry, and doubt, as well as from excessive hatred, sleepiness, laziness, unsettled anxiety, and indecisiveness. Then, as an illustration of that systematic path, the Buddha explained to that Brahmin how he gradually attains the first absorption (jhāna), second absorption, third absorption, fourth absorption, and so forth. Next, the Buddha declares: 'If there are monks who are learners (sekha)—who are not yet Arahants but have attained the paths and fruits—this is the Tathāgata's instruction to them as well. And to the Great Arahants whose taints are destroyed (khīṇāsava), this training helps in their daily comfortable dwelling (diṭṭhadhammasukhavihāra) and for mindfulness and clear comprehension.'

Then this Brahmin Gaṇaka-Moggallāna asks: 'Master Gotama, when the Saṅgha is thus advised and instructed, do all of them attain Nibbāna, which is the ultimate goal in your Dispensation, or are there some who fail to attain Nibbāna?' Then the Buddha declares: 'Even though I advise and instruct them in this way, some attain that state, while others fail to attain it.' Then the Brahmin asks: 'What is the cause for that, Master Gotama? When Nibbāna exists, and the path to Nibbāna exists, and a teacher like you who shows the path to Nibbāna is present, why is it that some attain it, while others do not attain it?' Then the Buddha replies:

'In that case, Brahmin, I will ask you a question. Do you know the road that leads to the city of Rājagaha?' 'Yes, I know it very well.' 'Suppose someone asks you for the road to Rājagaha. You say: "Go by this road. As you go, you will find a village. Beyond that, there is a market town. Going along in this way, you can reach Rājagaha." Even though you say so, that person, having received that instruction, takes a different road. Turning the opposite way, he goes in another direction. Consequently, instead of Rājagaha, he arrives in a different region. Then another person comes, asking for the road to Rājagaha. You give him the same instructions, and he follows them correctly and arrives at Rājagaha.' Then the Buddha asks: 'While Rājagaha exists, and the road to Rājagaha exists, and you are there to show the way, what is the reason why one person goes the wrong way like that, while another goes the right way?'

Then this Brahmin says: 'What can I do about that, Master Gotama? I am merely the one who points out the way—maggakkhāyī. I only point out the way. There is nothing I can do. They go as they choose.' Then the Buddha says: 'Just so, Brahmin, even though Nibbāna exists, and the path to Nibbāna exists, and I stand as the instructor who explains Nibbāna, some attain it, while others do not attain it.' Thereupon, the Brahmin, having conceived a certain confidence, said: 'Those who ordained in this Dispensation without faith, merely for a livelihood—they are deceitful, undisciplined in that practice, unrestrained regarding food, regarding mindfulness and clear comprehension, and regarding virtues like morality. Such people do not dwell with Master Gotama. But those who ordained out of faith and practice this path honestly—they are the ones who walk with Master Gotama.' Thus Gaṇaka-Moggallāna...

...then expresses his appreciation with two similes: "Just as among root-fragrances, black agarwood fragrance is considered supreme; and among heartwood-fragrances, red sandalwood fragrance is supreme; and among flower-fragrances, jasmine fragrance is supreme; even so, among the teachings visible today, the vision of Master Gotama is indeed supreme!" Having thus exulted, he became a lay disciple. Thus we see from this...

...that these three terms—anupubba-sikkhā, anupubba-kiriyā, and anupubba-paṭipadā—are extremely valuable, helping all of us to generate effort and courage. It is a systematic path of practice.

Another valuable discourse relevant to this—even if we do not discuss it in full—is the Pahārāda Sutta. To mention it briefly, the Asura lord Pahārāda on one occasion told the Buddha that there are eight wonderful and marvelous qualities of the great ocean that delight the Asuras. One of them is—and three terms are mentioned there: "anupubba-ninno, anupubba-poṇo, anupubba-pabbhāro, na āyatakenēva papāto"—that the great ocean has a gradual slope, a gradual inclination, a gradual shelf, with no abrupt precipice. He gives this simile as the first wonderful and marvelous quality. The Buddha says: "In my Dhamma-Vinaya too, there are eight wonderful and marvelous qualities."

As the first quality, He declares: "In this Dispensation, too, there is a gradual training, a gradual performance, a gradual practice—anupubba-sikkhā, anupubba-kiriyā, anupubba-paṭipadā, na āyatakenēva aññā-paṭivedho—there is no abrupt penetration of final knowledge (Arahantship)." This word "gradual" (anupubba) is indeed a valuable thing in this Dispensation to bring courage to everyone. It is not something achieved in a single day. If one walks correctly on this path, it shows a gradual, systematic effectiveness. Someone might think, "If so, why is it that many people say, 'We have no perfections (pāramī). We have no perfections. We have not obtained a triple-rooted (trihetuka) rebirth'?" I have heard that recently, many preachers are discouraging people with words that destroy this Dispensation. I declare at this moment that this talk of triple-rooted rebirth is like a parasite on the Dispensation. The Buddha did not do that; He did not reject anyone based on "triple-rootedness." We will next present a good illustration of this from a Dhamma story.

In Rājagaha, the Buddha was preaching the Dhamma to a large gathering. We have mentioned these before, so we will tell it briefly. While the Buddha was preaching the Dhamma in the midst of this large crowd, there came a leper named Suppabuddha. His skin was discolored all over. He was extremely poor; a beggar. In short, a miserable beggar arrived. Seeing the crowd from afar, he thought, "Perhaps they are distributing food and drink here (as he was starving). If I go there, I might get some food." So he approached. As he drew near, he realized, "No, no, this is not a place where food is being distributed; this is the Ascetic Gotama preaching the Dhamma. No matter, I must at least listen to the Dhamma." So he sat down at the edge of the crowd. When he sat down, the Buddha scanned the entire crowd with His Buddha-cognition, His Buddha-eye: "Who among those present here is capable of understanding the Dhamma?" There might have been kings, treasurers, university graduates, great scholars—all of them were bypassed. The Buddha spotted that beggar. "He is capable of understanding my Dhamma." What followed next was the discourse the Buddha delivered, which was extraordinary. Nowadays, one does not even get to hear such discourses.

Everyone knows the specialty of the Buddha's style of preaching. It is called "ānupubbī-kathā" (gradual discourse). There too, the word "gradual" (anupubba) is present. This is to show that even within a single discourse, this gradual order exists. Some people leave it to time and remain inactive, thinking, "Nowadays, no matter what we do, the paths and fruits (magga-phala) are far, far away."

The Buddha delivered that sermon according to the gradual method of discourse. In the Dhamma, it is recorded thus: "dāna-kathaṃ, sīla-kathaṃ, sagga-kathaṃ, kāmānaṃ ādīnavaṃ, okāraṃ, saṅkilesaṃ, nekkhamme ca ānisaṃsaṃ pakāseti." This is the sequence of the gradual discourse: talk on giving (dāna-kathā), talk on virtue (sīla-kathā), talk on heaven (sagga-kathā)—how by giving and keeping virtue, one can go to heaven, saying something about heavenly fortune. Then, He turns it the other way: regarding sensual pleasures, whether in the human world or heavenly world, He declares the danger (kāmānaṃ ādīnavaṃ), the vileness (okāraṃ), and the defiling nature (saṅkilesaṃ). Next, He explains the benefit of renunciation (nekkhamme ca ānisaṃsaṃ). Thus, He goes down the other side of the mountain. He turns it around, showing that all of this is useless. Now, when speaking of the benefits of renunciation, someone might ask: "What did this beggar have to give? What virtue did he undertake?" The Buddha does not administer precepts the way we do as soon as we arrive! But if there is something to let go of in the mind, first of all, he let go of food. He had come searching for food. It was after letting go of that desire that he sat down there. That too is a great letting go—a giving up. Next, when virtue was spoken of, he must have thought, "Oh, if only I could keep these!" Don't we see that? Then, imagine how he understood its benefits.

At one point, the Buddha Himself saw how the mind of the leper Suppabuddha was becoming prepared. It is described in these words:

"Yathā bhagavā aññāsi"—concerning that mind: "kalla-cittaṃ, mudu-cittaṃ, vinīvaraṇa-cittaṃ, udagga-cittaṃ, pasanna-cittaṃ." The mind of the leper Suppabuddha became prepared, soft, free from hindrances, uplifted, and brightened. It reached a state of overflowing confidence. It was at that moment that the Buddha preached: "yāsaṃ buddhānaṃ sāmukkaṃsikā dhamma-desanā"—the truth-discourse that Buddhas themselves introduce to the world: "dukkhaṃ, samudayaṃ, nirodhaṃ, maggaṃ" (suffering, origin, cessation, and path).

Then someone might say: "Look, devotees, they have driven away that miserable wretch!" But look at what happened in the end to that leper Suppabuddha. It is recorded thus: Just as a clean cloth takes dye perfectly, the Buddha's discourse on the Four Noble Truths penetrated his mind completely. As a result, the dust-free, stainless Dhamma-eye arose: "virajaṃ vītimalaṃ dhammacakkhuṃ udapādi." Briefly, it is stated as: "yaṃ kiñci samudayadhammaṃ sabbaṃ taṃ nirodhadhammaṃ." To many who tell stories about stream-entry (sotāpatti), we say: here lies the secret—yaṃ kiñci samudayadhammaṃ sabbaṃ taṃ nirodhadhammaṃ. He realized stream-entry in the briefest manner: the Dhamma-eye arose, seeing that "whatever is of a nature to arise, all that is of a nature to cease." That is to say, in short, he saw the Dhamma of Dependent Co-arising (paṭicca-samuppāda). We have spoken of these before, so we will not explain them in detail at this moment.

In the end, the crowd dispersed. None of them knew that this leper who had come had attained, from his previous state, the highest state—which, in the words of the Buddha, is greater than the sovereignty of a wheel-turning monarch (cakkavatti). None of that crowd knew that he had attained such a state. There are some special terms mentioned regarding this state. That is why I say this person possesses as many as eight degrees! For a stream-enterer, even if he is uneducated, the following is stated in the Suttas about him: "diṭṭhadhammo, pattadhammo, viditadhammo, pariyogāḷhadhammo, tiṇṇavicikiccho, vigatakathaṅkatho, vesārajjappatto, aparappaccayo satthusāsane." There are eight degrees there.

Diṭṭhadhammo: he saw Nibbāna, at least for a moment. Pattadhammo: he reached Nibbāna, even for a split second. Viditadhammo: he understood Nibbāna. Pariyogāḷhadhammo: he dived into Nibbāna. On some occasions, we have illustrated this with similes such as the iron club of the giant Nīla—seeing Nibbāna for a moment. He saw the cessation of Preparations (saṅkhāra-nirodha). Tiṇṇavicikiccho: he crossed over doubt and hesitation regarding past lives, future lives, asking "was there such a thing in the past?" and so forth. Vigatakathaṅkatho: he does not need to go around asking others "how, how?". He attained certainty. Vesārajjappatto: thus, that beggar became independent, bold. How did that happen? Through that sermon, he became bold in the Dhamma.

"Aparappaccayo satthusāsane"—this is a profound statement. It means reaching a state where one no longer needs the support of anyone else in the Teacher's Dispensation. What does that mean? As you all have heard, a stream-enterer cannot be stopped by anyone. It is said "sattakkhattu-paramo"—he is bound to become an Arahant within seven births (jātis) at most. His suffering (dukkha) will definitely be brought to an end. That is how it is if he is negligent. Otherwise, if he exerts himself in this very life, he can reach those higher states. That is why it says "aparappaccayo satthusāsane"—he does not need another's support in the Teacher's Dispensation. If support is received, the work is quickened, which is true, but what was necessary has been obtained. He has obtained the principle that leads to Nibbāna. Like a log thrown into a river that eventually reaches the ocean, such is the state of stream-entry. That is the kind of state he attained.

Look, on one hand, at the Buddha's style of preaching. It was not something that happened by accident. Through the gradual discourse (ānupubbī-kathā), everything was accomplished. And it also happened in an instant. Through this, I am presenting the practical nature of the Dhamma. Some people, as I mentioned, say: "We have no perfections (pāramī). Our monks say we do not have triple-rooted rebirth, and so forth"—a bundle of confusions. You must not think of any of this. If this Dispensation is preserved through practice, we said these few words to tell you to engage in these tasks without fear. In some places, as we say briefly in the Bāhiya Sutta and others, when it was said "in the seen, let there be only the seen" and so on, he was already an Arahant. Even if we cannot see it, the Buddha, through His "knowledge of the inclinations and underlying tendencies of beings" (āsayānusaya-ñāṇa), sees the inner potential within every individual in a wonderful way. It is according to this that the Buddha preaches. Although He did so for the leper Suppabuddha, in some places we see it happening instantly. Even if we do not speak of the reasons at length, we can mention them briefly as follows.

There are four main terms mentioned regarding the realization of the Dhamma in this Dispensation. Four types of individuals are mentioned: ugghaṭitaññū, vipañcitaññū, neyya, padaparama. Ugghaṭitaññū refers to one who, just like a door opening the moment the latch is turned, realizes the Dhamma through a very brief discourse. People like Bāhiya Dārucīriya are highly developed; they need only a slight hint. Then they attain everything. Vipañcitaññū is the next category. They require a somewhat longer Dhamma discourse. It is only when a detailed Dhamma discourse is delivered that they understand the Dhamma.

"Neyya" means those who need to be led by the hand, as it were, to be shown Nibbāna, through teacher's guidance, association with noble friends (kalyāṇa-mitta), listening to the Dhamma, and so on. Only when these come together does the neyya person realize the Dhamma at some point. The category called padaparama cannot, for some reason, attain the paths and fruits in this life. But they do not need to sit around looking at their horoscopes! Even if such a person has learned something—padaparama means one for whom what has been learned will at some point in the future assist in the penetration of the paths and fruits. From this, it is clear that not a single person is cast aside by the Buddha.

"Ugghaṭitaññū, vipañcitaññū, neyya, padaparama"—all of this is said to give you courage, not to criticize anyone else. Such is the situation in the Dispensation. There is no end to the various Sutta discourses that show how fruitful the practice of the Dispensation is.

If we bring out another valuable Sutta discourse at this moment, the Bhūmija Sutta of the Majjhima Nikāya is one such. As shown in the Bhūmija Sutta, Ven. Bhūmija went to the house of Prince Jayasena in Rājagaha. Prince Jayasena did not have much faith. After exchanging pleasantries and arranging a seat, Prince Jayasena engaged in conversation and said: "Some ascetics and brahmins make this kind of claim: 'Even if one leads the holy life (brahmacariya)—which means the practice of the Dispensation—with a desire (for results), it is fruitless, not productive. Likewise, even if one engages in it without a desire, it is also fruitless. Even if one engages in the holy life on that path with and without a desire, it is fruitless. Next, even if one engages in it neither with nor without a desire, it is still fruitless.' What does Ven. Bhūmija say about this?" Then Ven. Bhūmija said: "Prince, this is not a statement I received directly from the mouth of the Blessed One. I do not know how the Blessed One explains this. But I think that if the Blessed One were asked, He would say something like this." According to his own understanding, Ven. Bhūmija told Prince Jayasena: "According to my view, this is how our Teacher would put it. If someone leads the holy life in an improper manner, on an improper path, even if he does so with a desire, it is fruitless. Even if he does so without a desire, it is fruitless. If he engages in the holy life in an improper manner with and without a desire, it is fruitless. If he leads the holy life in an improper manner neither with nor without a desire, it is still fruitless."

Then he states the other side: "But if someone engages in the holy life in the proper manner, with a desire, there is a fruit. Even if he leads the holy life without a desire, he can still obtain a fruit. Even if he does so with and without a desire, he can still obtain a fruit. Even if he does so neither with nor without a desire, if the proper path is correct, the fruit (will come)." When this was said, Prince Jayasena was pleased and said: "If it is stated in this way, this Teacher of yours deserves to be placed on the heads of all teachers living today!" Expressing his appreciation, the prince offered the tray of rice brought for him to Ven. Bhūmija. Having partaken of the alms, Ven. Bhūmija went to the Buddha in the evening and related this description: "In the morning, I went to the house of Prince Jayasena. The prince said such and such a thing. I gave such a reply. I hope that in saying so, I did not fall into the error of stating what the Blessed One did not say." He said very humbly, "I believe I presented the Blessed One's view. Do you think I made any mistake?" He asked with great faith. The Blessed One said: "Ah, Bhūmija! No mistake was made. What you stated is exactly what I approve of." To make it even more striking, the Buddha then gave several similes to demonstrate this principle. This is how He explained it in more detail:

In whatever dispensation—you devotees know the Noble Eightfold Path—think of its opposite: wrong view (micchā-diṭṭhi), wrong intention (micchā-saṅkappa), wrong speech (micchā-vācā), wrong action (micchā-kammanta), wrong livelihood (micchā-ājīva), wrong effort (micchā-vāyāma), wrong mindfulness (micchā-sati), and wrong concentration (micchā-samādhi). In a dispensation that has a practice leading from wrong view to wrong concentration, even if a disciple leads the holy life with a desire, there is no fruit. Even if he leads the holy life without a desire, there is no fruit. Even if he leads it with and without a desire, there is no fruit. It is fruitless. Even if he leads the holy life neither with nor without a desire, there is no fruit. What is the cause? The word ayoniso (unwisely / improperly) is mentioned there. This word is somewhat difficult to translate into Sinhala. Briefly, ayoniso means in an improper manner, in a wrong way. This will become clearer from the similes. As we proceed, what is this improper manner? Because it is a practice starting from wrong view and ending in wrong concentration, whether there is desire or not, there is no fruit.

Then He gives some similes: "Just as, Bhūmija, if someone wanting sesame oil piles sand in a trough, sprinkles it with water, churns it with water, and squeezes it, no matter how much he squeezes it with a desire, or squeezes it without a desire, or squeezes it both with and without a desire, or squeezes it neither with nor without a desire—he cannot get oil by squeezing sand. What is the cause? He did it ayoniso—in an improper manner, by a wrong method. Therefore, no matter how much he squeezes the sand, no oil comes." Then the second simile: "Just as, Bhūmija, if someone wanting milk pulls a young cow by the horn to milk her, even if he pulls the cow's horn with a desire, or does so without a desire, or does so both with and without, or does so neither with nor without—no milk comes by pulling the horn. Such is the effort of those people." Since that effort starting from wrong view is improper, there is no fruit.

He gives a third simile as well: "Just as, Bhūmija, if someone wanting butter pours water into a jar and churns it with a churning-stick for however long, whether he does so with a desire, or without a desire, or both with and without, or neither with nor without, he cannot obtain butter from the water poured into that jar. Such is the effort of those people." The fourth simile: "If someone wanting fire"—you know how they obtained fire in those days—"rubs two pieces of wood together, placing a wet, green piece of wood on top and rubbing it and rubbing it, whether he does so with a desire, or without a desire, or both with and without, or neither with nor without, no fire is produced." These four similes demonstrate the fruitlessness and failure of the practice of those ascetics and brahmins who hold wrong view, and so forth. Next, He shows: "In whatever dispensation right view (sammā-diṭṭhi), right intention (sammā-saṅkappa), right speech (sammā-vācā), right action (sammā-kammanta), right livelihood (sammā-ājīva), right effort (sammā-vāyāma), right mindfulness (sammā-sati), and right concentration (sammā-samādhi) are found, in that dispensation, if one leads the holy life, whether he does so with a desire, or without a desire, or both with and without, or neither with nor without, that fruit is definitely obtained."

Then the other similes: "If someone wanting oil places sesame flour in an oil-trough, mixes it with water, and rubs and squeezes it with a desire, or does so without a desire, or both with and without, or neither with nor without, oil emerges from that sesame flour; he can obtain oil." Next, He states the second simile in reverse: "If someone wanting milk pulls a cow that has a young calf at the place where milk can be obtained—you know where that is, the udder, the teat. He pulls precisely from the teat. If he pulls from the teat, whether he does so with a desire, or without a desire, or both with and without, or neither with nor without, milk definitely comes." The third simile—you devotees can infer the rest of it. In brief, these are the similes. The simile the Buddha gives about butter: "If someone pours curd into a jar and churns it with a churning-stick, he can produce butter from it." The fourth simile: "If someone wanting fire rubs a dry stick with another dry stick, he can produce fire from it." Having given these similes, the Buddha says to Ven. Bhūmija: "Bhūmija, if you had told this much to Prince Jayasena, the prince would have expressed great appreciation and, according to that appreciation, would have practiced under you." When this was said, Ven. Bhūmija very humbly said: "How could such similes occur to me, Blessed One, as they occur to the Blessed One?" This is that Sutta.

Pious devotees, all of this was said because on a day like today, we must remind ourselves of this Noble Eightfold Path in this Dispensation, which goes from right view to right concentration. What is the cause? What is the cause? In the Sambuddha Sāsana, that side is declining, that side is declining. "It is not possible; in this era, it is not possible to realize Nibbāna." In that way, various forces have arisen that discourage those who are enthusiastic. Not from outside, not from other religions, but from within ourselves, from our own people, these things emerge. That is why I am saying these few words. Those who have been discouraged in that manner come and tell us too that such and such was said in various sermons. That is why I am saying this. Such is the Dispensation that lies before us. It is of no use to go on boasting about the past, saying: "Those times were not like today; one cannot even dry a mat of paddy now because Arahants are flying through the sky." Going on repeating such stories with exaggerations will not do. Where we can act, starting from this very step, we must exert ourselves to make the journey. What is relevant to that is what we have stated in this Dispensation. This Dhamma is preached to lay devotees. Lay devotees must by no means think: "We cannot get close to these things." What we must recall is the lay disciple Bhanduka we mentioned earlier, who was an Anāgāmī (Non-returner) and a possessor of higher knowledges (abhiññā). During the Buddha's time, there were lay Anāgāmīs like Citta the Householder, Hatthaka of Āḷavī, and others. There were those who walked the path of absorption (jhāna) and paths and fruits, such as Nandamātā of Veḷukaṇḍaka, Nakulamātā, Kāpilānī, and others.

Furthermore, consider how this lay practice is structured. In the past, the lifestyle of those Buddhist devotees was not complex like this. They were people who lived a simple lifestyle of farming, and so forth. Our books record that especially in the evening of life, there were those who observed virtue (sīla) on all four Poya days. So, there is the lay five precepts and the Poya eight precepts. Lay five precepts and Poya eight precepts. What is this Poya eight precepts? This is not a performance where a group of people dress up nicely in white, walk in a procession, and act until a photograph is taken. What is the depth in this? What is recorded in the ancient books is that the lay devotee makes a great sacrifice on the day they undertake the Poya eight precepts. Even when there was great hardship and work, even in those times, that lay devotee would incline toward the practice of an Arahant. That is why it is written in those books: "Today, this night and this day, I shall live in accordance with the practice of the Arahants." The Poya eight precepts contain precisely this effort to live in accordance with their practice, even to a small extent. Many do not even know that. While keeping the Poya eight precepts, the lay devotee gradually—either at the end of life, when freed from children, or when viewing it as another trouble—stops using money, and so on, and observes the ten precepts of a householder (gahaṭṭha-dasa-sīla). In the past, the term anagārika (homeless one) was also applied to the Saṅgha. One can live as an anagārika. By undertaking the ten precepts and proceeding further in this way, we once gave a simile to show that it is from within the lay devotee that the monk emerges. It is from the lay caterpillar that the ascetic butterfly will one day fly into the sky. Pious devotees, do not feel bad when I say "lay caterpillar." Why do I say lay caterpillar? That caterpillar's movement is slow. Its appearance is also not so beautiful. But at some point, there is a great wonder in this world. Watching how a butterfly emerges from a caterpillar is wondrous. Similarly, when the form of a monk emerges from a murderer, a beggar, or a person like that leper, it does not happen just casually. It is not because robes are available in shops. It is as an internal transformation—yes, it is through an internal transformation that one becomes a butterfly. Butterfly wings do not emerge from a caterpillar for no reason.

Nowadays, there are various confusions in this country, such as the practice of temporary ordination for a week as a business. We have said that through this, the pure idea regarding renunciation (nekkhamma) is increasingly lost. With various business ideas, they ordain people for a week or two. The tempering, the value of this is lost. They destroy its value. That is why I say this, not to blame anyone who does so. If necessary, there is the ten precepts of a householder (gahaṭṭha-dasa-sīla). If at some point one can break all those ties, abandon those connections, and ordain, that indeed is renunciation (nekkhamma). That is the moment—sometimes we use this as a simile: cattle that have been penned in a stall for a long night are waiting to see when the door will be opened; the moment the door is opened, they break out and run. Such is the person who has the intention of renunciation (nekkhamma-cetanā). At whatever point those basic requirements are fulfilled, they break out of the lay pen and ordain. That is why it is called "pabbajjā". The word pabbajjā is there. 'Vaja' (pen/stall) is a word that designates a stall. 'Pra' is a word indicating movement. Pabbajjā means breaking out of the pen. It is not an act of indiscipline. Breaking out of the lay pen, one goes to ordination, which is like the open air. That is why it is called "two wings." Taking only the bowl and robe—especially in those days, the monks who observed the ascetic practices (dhutaṅga) did not have many things. Even that saying demonstrated the beauty of that practice; it has been shown in those similes. We told the story of the butterfly to show that. Nowadays, the word "butterfly" is used in the opposite sense! Be that as it may, we showed those similes to display the greatness of this practice.

If necessary, lay disciple Bhanduka could have been ordained in India before being brought here. But why was he brought as a lay disciple? To show, to show this relationship. It is from the laity that the monk is born. It is from them that Arahants are born. They do not just fall from the sky. Many people have forgotten that. This is said not to diminish respect for the Saṅgha, but to make you think of the practical aspect. We think: "Well, we are lay people, we cannot do it. Let us keep doing the work that belongs to lay people." If we remain like that, we will be in saṃsāra forever. Constantly. In every sermon, we say: bring out the perception of "I can" (haki-saññā). The perception of "I can." But what we hear most in the country is the perception of "I cannot" (bāri-saññā). "We cannot do it, and you cannot do it either. If we cannot do it, how can you do it?" That is the kind of talk going around the country. If I do not say this on a day like today, there seems to be no one else to say it. That is why I speak thus. This is the kind of Dispensation we have before us. At least this group of devotees must try to walk on this path of Dhamma.

There is another point to be made. The factors of stream-entry (sotāpattiyaṅga)—four factors that help in becoming a stream-enterer are mentioned in the Dhamma: "sappurisa-saṃsevo, saddhamma-savanaṃ, yoniso-manasikāro, dhammānudhamma-paṭipatti." These help in stream-entry: association with superior persons (sappurisa), listening to the True Dhamma (saddhamma-savanaṃ), wise attention (yoniso-manasikāra), and practice in accordance with the Dhamma (dhammānudhamma-paṭipatti). Association with superior persons: the Buddha is the greatest superior person, the noble friend (kalyāṇa-mitta). Next, listening to the True Dhamma: at least one has to hear a four-line stanza. Without the association of a Buddha, a disciple cannot become an Arahant. Next is Yoniso manasikāra (Wise attention). According to that, one must apply proper reflection. Next is dhammānudhamma-paṭipatti—leading one's life in accordance with the Dhamma. In this way, we see the greatness of associating with superior persons. Noble friendship: when Ven. Ānanda estimated this as half of the holy life, how did the Buddha correct that undervaluation? He said: "The entire holy life is association with noble friends." The noble friend is indeed that very same superior person (sappurisa).

To impress this further on your minds, we have given various similes in some sermons. One is the simile of the target board. Those who listened to the sermons in those days might remember. There are six rare occurrences that monks recite at the conclusion of protective chants (paritta): "dullabho buddhupādo lokasmiṃ, dullabho manussatta-paṭilābho, dullabhā khaṇa-sampatti, dullabhā pabbajjā, dullabhaṃ saddhamma-savanaṃ, dullabho sappurisa-saṃsevo." We painted a small picture of these six occurrences to keep them in mind. Think of a target board. In those days, we used to practice shooting at a target. Nowadays, a marksman shoots. Target boards can have various colors, striking to the mind, with one colored circle inside another. The final aim is directed at the center.

If we show these six points in that way, indeed we all accept that the arising of a Buddha is rare. It is extremely rare. It is rare beyond imagination: "dullabho buddhupādo lokasmiṃ." But even rarer than that is obtaining a human birth (manussatta-paṭilābho). We must understand that a human existence obtained during the time of a Buddha's arising is that next circle on the board. Obtaining a human existence during the time of a Buddha's arising is extremely rare. Next, even if one obtains a human existence, obtaining the opportunity of the moment (khaṇa-sampatti)—being born in a region where one can understand the Dhamma without being blind, mute, deaf, or having other such disabilities, and obtaining a wise human existence—which is explained as the eight wrong times (akkhaṇa), obtaining the true opportunity of the moment free from those eight wrong times is the next point: "dullabhā khaṇa-sampatti." Within that opportunity of the moment, obtaining ordination (pabbajjā)—amidst a thousand difficulties, with great effort, obtaining that ordination we spoke of. Even if one obtains ordination, listening to the True Dhamma (saddhamma-savanaṃ) that helps toward Nibbāna is also just as rare. Next, where does that Dhamma come from? That association with superior persons (sappurisa-saṃseva) is ultimately the most wonderful, extremely rare thing mentioned in the Dhamma—that association with noble friends that helps one to hear the Dhamma. It is when that is obtained that one can gather all other practices. That is why "sappurisa-saṃsevo" is placed at the beginning.

Therefore, you devotees must contemplate walking on this path of Dhamma, relying on this association with noble friends. They say that in this Dispensation, they are elevating it more and more. The Dispensation can be preserved through external things and external activities. That is true, it seems to rise. But indeed, this is something that must happen from within. At the very beginning, we declared that entire stanza spoken by the Buddha:

> Tumhehi kiccaṃ ātappaṃ, > akkhātāro tathāgatā;

> Paṭipannā pamokkhanti, > jhāyino mārabandhanā.

You yourselves must do what must be done. The Buddha preached the Dhamma. Arahant Mahinda brought the Dhamma preached by the Buddha and preached it to us. Other Theros preached the Dhamma preached by Arahant Mahinda. That Dhamma goes along, passed from hand to hand like a basket. But if we do not put it into practice...?

That is the deep meaning of this stanza: "Tumhehi kiccaṃ"—you yourselves must do what must be done. "Akkhātāro tathāgatā"—not only the Tathāgatas, but other preachers too only point it out. Next, "paṭipannā pamokkhanti"—only those who walk in this practice attain Nibbāna. Not by merely committing it to memory. If lay devotees walk in that practice at some level, as we mentioned, and if that is the target, then when keeping the daily five precepts and the Poya eight precepts, a shadow of the practice of an Arahant emerges. In that way, gradually, next comes the householder's ten precepts. Next is ordination. This is a journey that goes step by step. The Buddha has often declared, in discourses like the Anamatagga Saṃyutta, that bringing an end to this suffering (dukkha) of saṃsāra through that path is an extremely rare thing. Why did sixty monks become Arahants upon hearing a single discourse? Because the Buddha described the danger and length of this saṃsāra with unimaginable similes.

When the length of an eon (kalpa) is described, it is astonishing. It is terrifying. You devotees must have heard: if there is a solid stone mountain, one league (yojana) in length, width, and height, and a person comes once every hundred years and wipes it with a piece of silk cloth, the mountain would be worn away by that wiping, but the eon would not yet have ended. How amazing! Such a long time. That is why the Buddha says: because of ignorance and craving (taṇhā), you and I have been traveling for an extremely long time. If the arising of a Buddha is rare, if the human existence obtained through that arising is rare, if that human existence is complete with the opportunity of the moment, if ordination has been obtained, and if the Dhamma is heard—then what must be done next is what we must contemplate. Accordingly, when we speak of the Buddha on a valuable day like today, since He said in His own words that the offering of practice (paṭipatti-pūjā) is more valuable than material offering (āmisa-pūjā), even today we must think not in terms of this material side. We must offer to Arahant Mahinda precisely through practice.

If, through these few words, you devotees have gained some courage and determination to carry this Dispensation into the future, I consider that as the fruit of this sermon. Today, this pious gathering spent the day observing a valuable virtue and engaging in Dhamma-meditation. You have heard from us a sermon that helps in all activities, including tranquility (samatha) and insight (vipassanā). Relying on this sermon, without being discouraged, walking on this path of Dhamma, may all of you receive the strength and power to quickly approach the noble and supreme deathless Nibbāna through the penetration of the paths and fruits of Stream-entry (sotāpatti), Once-returning (sakadāgāmi), Non-returning (anāgāmi), and Arahantship. While praying thus, if there are any beings from Avīci to Akaniṭṭha who wish to rejoice in this merit of listening to the Dhamma, through that rejoicing, may they attain peace in the supreme deathless Nibbāna through the Bodhi of their aspiration. Let us share these merits by reciting these stanzas:

“Ettāvatā ca amhehi.....”

Dear Listeners,

For beings wandering in saṃsāra for an infinite time, the extremely rare opportunity to bring an end to the suffering (dukkha) of saṃsāra arises only when a Fully Self-Awakened One, the Teacher of the Three Worlds, appears in the world. Everyone who properly understands the value of this rare opportunity strives and makes an effort to reap the maximum benefit from the rare human existence they have obtained during the era of a Buddha's arising. To whatever extent one feels spiritual urgency (saṃvega) regarding the suffering (dukkha) of saṃsāra, to that same extent, one diligently goes in search of the supreme bliss of Nibbāna. Furthermore, if there is any sacrifice to be made for that purpose, they strive to make it completely. Such people seek the shortest possible path to fulfill their aspiration—their diligent aspiration for Nibbāna. It is for such individuals that the Blessed Buddha, on certain occasions, enabled the realization of Nibbāna through a brief sermon. The verse we have chosen as our theme today is one such verse. The introductory story behind it is as follows.

There was a certain treasurer (seṭṭhi) living in the city of Sāvatthī. He went to his close, associated monk and asked, "I need to escape from this suffering (dukkha) of saṃsāra; please tell me a good method for this." This monk, perhaps thinking at the level of the treasurer, gave him advice: "Then give alms. Offer robes to the Sangha. Serve them with the four requisites. Also, divide your income into three parts: use one part for your business and industries, use another part to support your wife and children, and dedicate the third part to the Sāsana." He gave advice in this manner. The treasurer acted accordingly and asked the monk again, "Is there anything more than this that would help me cross over this saṃsāra?" Then the monk declared, "Guard well the five precepts together with the three refuges." Excellent; having completed that as well, the treasurer asked again, "Is there anything higher than that?" "Then observe the ten precepts," the monk said. When he went back and asked, "Is there anything even higher to do?", he was told, "Then renounce the household life and go forth into monkhood."

In this manner, the treasurer went forth into the Sāsana. But despite having ordained, the teacher (ācariya) this newly ordained monk received was an Abhidhammika monk who had reached the further shore of the Abhidhamma. His preceptor (upajjhāya) was a Vinayadhara monk who had reached the further shore of the Vinaya. Both of these senior monks continuously taught Abhidhamma and Vinaya to this newly ordained monk at every opportunity. Now, learning is indeed necessary for a newly ordained monk. However, to this monk, who had ordained with the hope of diligently bringing an end to suffering (dukkha), this felt like a burden. He felt that his teacher and preceptor were endlessly talking about Abhidhamma and Vinaya all the time, without giving much help for his meditation. Due to the weariness that arose from this, this monk thought, "I renounced the household life and ordained with the intention of ending suffering (dukkha), but now there isn't even room to stretch out my hands." What he meant was that there was no room for things like meditation. Having fallen into this state, he became disillusioned and then thought, "It is better for me to return to the household life and try to realize Nibbāna as best as I can." Disillusioned with the monastic life, he did not tell anyone about it. Losing his previous enthusiasm for his duties and vows, he just stared blankly wherever he looked, and stood still wherever he stood. His body also grew weak because of his dejected mind. Seeing this, the novice monks (sāmaṇeras) asked him, "What is the reason for this change?" After this monk explained the reason, they informed the teacher and preceptor as well. These teachers and preceptors then took the monk to the Blessed Buddha. When the Blessed Buddha asked about the matter, this monk declared, "Venerable Sir, I ordained with the intention of bringing an end to the suffering (dukkha) of saṃsāra. My teacher and preceptor constantly teach me Abhidhamma and Vinaya. I felt that I have no room even to stretch my hands. Therefore, I want to return to the lay life."

Then the Blessed Buddha asked this monk, "Very well, monk, there is no need for many things. Can you guard just one thing?" When asked what that was, the Blessed Buddha declared, "Monk, if you guard only this mind, everything else will automatically be guarded." Having stated this, He uttered the Dhamma verse we chose as our theme earlier:

> Sududdasaṃ sunipuṇaṃ, > yatthakāmanipātinaṃ;

> Cittaṃ rakkhetha medhāvī, > cittaṃ guttaṃ sukhāvahaṃ.

The meaning of this verse is: medhāvī means the wise person. This wise person guards the mind which is sududdasaṃ—extremely difficult to see, and sunipuṇaṃ—extremely subtle; cittaṃ rakkhetha—guards the mind. Why? Cittaṃ guttaṃ sukhāvahaṃ—because a guarded mind brings happiness. At first glance, the verse seems very simple. Yet, it is said that upon hearing this very verse, that monk attained stream-entry (sotāpatti). Therefore, this must have occurred because there is a certain depth in this verse. Let us now first reflect on this story, and then direct our attention to the meaning contained in this verse. From the story itself, we can see that this monk, due to his enthusiasm to diligently realize Nibbāna, felt a sense of weariness and distress regarding the teachings of his teacher and preceptor. Perhaps those venerable monks showed more concern for books and mere academic knowledge than for meditation.

The Blessed One has declared in a certain discourse: "Monks, all those who are newly ordained in this Sāsana, who have newly entered this Dhamma-Vinaya, should be established in the four foundations of mindfulness (cattāro satipaṭṭhānā). They must practice the four foundations of mindfulness." From this, we can see that the foundation of going forth is the four foundations of mindfulness. If one engages in other activities without paying much attention to the four foundations of mindfulness, it becomes an obstacle for someone who has ordained with great diligence and enthusiasm to realize Nibbāna. That is why the Blessed Buddha, as a relief to that monk, asked, "Can you do just one thing?" Thus, from this story, we can see that the Blessed Buddha, with great skill in means (upāya-kosalla) and compassion, through a certain masterly device, must have directed this monk's mind towards meditative reflection by means of this verse. For, what is expected from all those things taught as Abhidhamma is to demonstrate the extreme subtlety of this mind.

The mind is something difficult to see. Its nature is extremely subtle. What books and other teachings attempt to show, a meritorious meditator (yogāvacara)—someone who has turned towards meditation—realizes through their own direct experience. Through meditative reflection, through Yoniso manasikāra (Wise attention)—which means wise reflection—a meditator understands the extremely subtle nature of this mind and that it is difficult to see, grasping the very essence of the entire Abhidhamma. Furthermore, yatthakāmanipātinaṃ means that the mind alights on whatever object it pleases. That is the nature of the mind; it falls upon whatever object it desires. Kāmanipātinaṃ—it is precisely to prevent this falling onto whatever object it pleases that various Vinaya rules and regulations have been laid down.

Various disciplinary rules are prescribed for the restraint of body and speech. Thus, the Blessed Buddha declared that it is this very mind—which has the nature of alighting on whatever object it pleases, denoted as yatthakāmanipātinaṃ, which is the essence of the Vinaya—that must be guarded. It must have been because he contemplated the meaning of that verse deeply that the monk was able to attain even the realization of the paths and fruits (magga-phala).

Although ordinary worldly people exert themselves regarding the body, they do not direct their attention to the importance of the mind. Yet, this entire bondage of saṃsāra rests upon the mind. What is done through meditation is the training of this mind, the guarding of this mind. The factor necessary for guarding that mind is mindfulness and clear comprehension (sati-sampajañña)—which means mindfulness and proper wisdom, or mindfulness and awareness. When the mind that runs to the past and the future, and similarly runs towards greed and hatred, is brought to the present and strengthened with equanimity and concentration, it is only then that one can understand the true nature of this life and the world through insight knowledge (vipassanā-ñāṇa). To guard the mind, the Blessed Buddha has first of all pointed out mindfulness and clear comprehension (sati-sampajañña). For, it is said, "mindfulness is the guardian" (sati ārakkhikā). Just like a driver who is there to protect a chariot, mindfulness is the guardian of the mind. It is called mindfulness and clear comprehension (sati-sampajañña): mindfulness and wisdom, mindfulness and awareness. To the extent that one develops this mindfulness and clear comprehension, one can eliminate the scattered nature of the mind and attain concentration (samādhi).

As taught in the Dhamma, by developing mindfulness and awareness in daily life, one first establishes concentration. Next, one realizes the three characteristics: anicca (impermanent), dukkha (suffering), and anattā (not-self). To realize this, one uses these very things that are closest to oneself: the body, feeling (vedanā), the mind, and the objects of the mind—by maintaining the mind upon them. Because of the instigation of defilements, the mind always looks to the past and the future. Keeping the mind that runs to the past and future anchored in the present, making it concentrated, one then observes how everything arises, exists, and vanishes. If we look more closely at what we call "impermanence" (anicca) in the world, we see everything arising; there is a certain phase we regard as its existence, and then it fades away. There are only these three phases. Not a single thing is permanent. This one who dwells with mindfulness and clear comprehension (sati-sampajañña) regarding the body, feeling (vedanā), the mind, and mental objects, understands the subtlety of this mind. That is why the Blessed Buddha declared that what is done through mindfulness and clear comprehension, even in ordinary postures, is: when walking, he knows "I am walking"; when standing, he knows "I am standing"; when sitting, he knows "I am sitting"; when lying down, he knows "I am lying down"—thus becoming aware of daily postures in a very simple manner. It is being aware with mindfulness and proper wisdom. Furthermore, in whatever way his body is positioned, he understands it as such. By always observing how one's body is positioned and how it moves, the impermanent (anicca) nature of this body, of feelings (vedanā), of the mind, and of mental objects, and their nature of arising and passing away, automatically begins to be seen. For this, reflection (manasikāra) is particularly helpful. Reflection coupled with mindfulness and clear comprehension is necessary.

Here lies an important point. Generally, when there is mindfulness and clear comprehension, one is able to see feelings (vedanā) and so forth arising, persisting, and ceasing. Similarly, one sees perceptions (saññā)—which we regard as recognition—arising, persisting, and passing away. Even thoughts are seen arising, persisting, and passing away. However, it is difficult for a person to gain this understanding all at once. Why? Because of the deceitful nature of the mind. In many instances, we know how the mind operates; some people feel, "Now I am thinking." Yet, it is as if thoughts occur without one even realizing it. Even when one thinks "I am thinking," thoughts just happen. One is carried away by the mind.

This mind is just like a wild bull. Led by defilements—according to greed, hatred, or delusion—this mind runs very far along some object without us even knowing it. Therefore, one can practice reflection only by being established in a certain level of concentration (samādhi). Now, a running wild bull cannot be caught and stopped all at once. A certain momentum is required. For that, there is a general method through the "Four Protective Meditations" (caturārakkhā bhāvanā): the recollection of the Buddha (buddhānussati), loving-kindness (mettā), foulness (asubha), and the mindfulness of death (maraṇassati), by practicing and training in a certain simple meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna). For this, a short word is used as an aid. If it is the recollection of the Buddha, one of the virtues of the Buddha is recalled. By bringing this to mind at all times, the scattered nature of the mind is stopped and the mind is calmed. Some wholesome object is used for this purpose. One strives to concentrate the mind on a wholesome object. When one repeatedly exerts effort to stop the running mind or calm the scattered mind using a short word, one gradually realizes that this can be done more and more quickly. Then, through the recollection of the Buddha, faith (saddhā) increases in a person. Through loving-kindness, one gains the strength to suppress the thoughts of hatred that constantly arise. Through the meditation on foulness, one gains the ability to subdue thoughts of lust. Through the mindfulness of death, spiritual urgency (saṃvega) is aroused, urging one to practice diligently. These are the special qualities present in the Four Protective Meditations. By using a short word as an aid for each of them—for instance, for loving-kindness: "May all beings be well and happy!" When these are practiced in daily life, whenever the mind runs to unnecessary things, one unifies the mind with the thought: "May they be well and happy!"

In that way, the person who has established that concentration is then able to reflect wisely by using that level of concentration. Yoniso manasikāra (Wise attention) is generally explained as wise reflection. Otherwise, it is reflecting on things according to the actual origin from which various things arise in the world. In the ordinary world, the Blessed Buddha has compared these perceptions (saññā) to a mirage; there is a tendency in our minds to run after these perceptions. Why? Because we take that distant mirage to be something real. But the true understanding regarding it is that from where we are looking, it is merely something that appears. It has a deceptive nature. This is revealed by understanding that this is a certain delusion connected to one's own mind, or rather, to one's own eye. In the same way, through Yoniso manasikāra (Wise attention), through wise reflection, one is able to escape from the delusion called ignorance (avijjā) and from this tight bondage called craving (taṇhā). The method used for this wise reflection is mindfulness of breathing (ānāpānassati).

The Blessed Buddha has taught, has declared, mindfulness of breathing (ānāpānassati) for the purpose of cutting off distracting thoughts (vitakka)—for cutting off thoughts. One’s in-breath and out-breath are something that is always with oneself. Applying mindfulness to that, mindfulness of breathing means the mindfulness directed towards the in-breath and out-breath. One establishes that mindfulness at the point where the breath touches. While constantly bringing the mind back to that spot, one gradually subdues the scattered things, the scattered mind. Most often, the mind scatters along the objects that come to the five senses: the eye, ear, nose, tongue, and body. Those objects generally try to pull the mind away, according to greed, hatred, or delusion. What, then, is the device to stop that running? Generally, regarding what is seen, without taking their signs (nimitta) and going far, the meditator (yogāvacara) briefly reflects twice: "a form, a form," "a sound, a sound," thereby cutting off the running mind right there, or breaking it, and bringing it back to the meditation subject, to mindfulness of breathing. In that manner, through reflection, the mind that runs after perceptions (saññā) can be kept within the meditation subject itself. Distracting thoughts (vitakka) grow in accordance with those perceptions, and thoughts grow. It is through those thoughts that defilements are dragged in.

The Blessed Buddha has declared five hindrances (nīvaraṇa) that obstruct the concentration of the mind and obstruct realization. They are: sensual desire (kāmacchanda), which refers to sensual thoughts; ill-will (byāpāda), which refers to thoughts of hatred; sloth and torpor (thīna-middha), which refers to laziness of mind and sleepiness; restlessness and worry (uddhacca-kukkucca), which refers to the scattered nature of the mind and regret; and doubt (vicikicchā), which refers to indecisiveness. It is through these that one becomes subject to them. It is precisely these hindrances that drag in those distracting thoughts. Therefore, it is only when these hindrances are absent that the mind becomes properly concentrated. A wholesome meditation object (kusala-ārammaṇa) is helpful for this. Thus, a person who has developed some concentration by practicing the Four Protective Meditations is able, while practicing mindfulness of breathing, to gradually stop the running mind and understand the internal state of this mind, the subtlety of the mind.

The reason why the mind was described here as subtle and difficult to see is that there is a certain quality in this mind. The Blessed Buddha has shown consciousness (viññāṇa) to be like an illusion (māyā). This is an extremely deep matter. An illusion means showing something that does not exist as if it exists. An illusionist or a magician shows something non-existent as existing by conjuring it up. There is such a power in our minds. It shows a non-existent thing as if it were an existing thing. It is because of this illusion that the mind is difficult to see. How is this revealed? Only a Buddha points out the way to this. When that understanding regarding the nature of this world and life matures through insight knowledges (vipassanā-ñāṇa), one must realize: what is actually here that we have taken as "I" and "mine"? It is only a collection of mental phenomena (name-factors) and physical phenomena (form-factors)—only Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). The mental phenomena (name-factors) are mentioned as: feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), intention (cetanā), contact (phassa), and attention (manasikāra). Chiefly, there are these five. "Name" (nāma) refers to certain powers within the mind itself that help us identify something. Feeling (vedanā), as everyone knows, is experiencing. Next, perception (saññā) means recognition; if there is a certain experiencing, there is a corresponding recognition. Next, there is also a volitional power (cetanā) in our minds regarding what should be done with them. Contact (phassa) is the awareness of their impingement or collision. Next is attention (manasikāra), which is reflection. If we can present these five factors as an analogy, they are just like the five fingers of the hand. Feeling (vedanā) is like the little finger. Perception (saññā) is like the ring finger. Intention (cetanā) is like the middle finger. Contact (phassa) is like the index finger. Attention (manasikāra) is like the thumb.

So, among the five mental phenomena (nāma-dhamma) present here, we already mentioned attention (manasikāra). Attention is helpful and applicable for understanding the true reality of this world, or rather, of life. If we take an analogy for this, we know that in some murder or criminal cases, one of the accused arrested as defendants has to be granted a pardon if there is no other evidence. If no one else comes forward to give evidence, because the case would otherwise be dismissed, one of the defendants is pardoned in court itself—like a state pardon—and the facts are obtained from him. When the testifying is finally over, it is revealed that he himself was also involved in the crime. However, somehow the case is proven and the truth is uncovered. It is in this very way that we have to understand Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). Yet, what helps us untangle this is that very factor called attention (manasikāra). We compared it to the thumb. According to this analogy, when we think about the functioning of the fingers of our hand, we can see that the thumb maintains a relationship with the little finger, the ring finger, the middle finger, and the index finger—with every one of them. The thumb is the one that can bear witness to them. In the same way, there is a power in this factor of attention (manasikāra). Attention directs itself to feeling (vedanā), to intention, and to contact (phassa), and by directing itself to these, it can understand their true reality. This is precisely what the Blessed Buddha highlighted. Thus, we understand what are called Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) not by bringing in an external witness, but through this very factor of attention (manasikāra). However, the difference here is that ordinary worldly people reflect in the wrong way. In the Dhamma, this is called ayoneso manasikāra (unwise attention)—wrong reflection. Now, if we consider what we said earlier, a deer thinks of the mirage, regards its appearance, as water in the distance. Thinking it is water, the deer runs. But a wise person considers, "This is merely an appearance due to a defect in my eyesight and due to atmospheric and climatic causes." Thus he does not run, but stops right there. Having stopped, he investigates the matter.

In the same way, reflecting on the very place where this arises is what is taken as Yoniso manasikāra (Wise attention). This itself is called wise reflection—proper reflection. In that manner, even though we utilize the mental phenomenon (nāma-dhamma) of attention (manasikāra) here, it is not used in an ayoniso (unwise) way, but in a yoniso (wise) way. This is just like after a defendant is pardoned in order to give evidence in a case: that person is now a witness for the state. He is not like before when he gave false evidence; now he speaks the absolute truth. It is under obligation that he receives such a pardon, to declare the complete truth. It is having promised, and having been made to promise, that such a pardon is granted to someone. In the same way, here too, attention is applied with Yoniso manasikāra (Wise attention) for the sake of realizing the truth. It is precisely through attention utilized in this way that we strive to arouse insight knowledges (vipassanā-ñāṇa). When we reflect on the manner in which these arise and pass away, we see that there is nothing here to be grasped. What is here is only a collection of mental phenomena (nāma-dhamma), and what is called physical phenomenon (rūpa-dhamma)—which is a conjuring up by the elements of earth (pathavī), water (āpo), fire (tejo), and air (vāyo). This is all that is present here: a collection of mental phenomena (nāma-dhamma) and a few physical phenomena (rūpa-dhamma) (Name-and-Form).

As this realization matures, the dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi)—the tightly held view of 'I' and 'mine'—is gradually relinquished; as the Blessed Buddha declared, this must be realized by oneself, individually. As long as this is not realized, this bondage of saṃsāra, this bondage of kamma, persists. So terrifying is the nature of this saṃsāra that there are accumulated in our minds the seeds of kamma gathered over an infinite, long period in this saṃsāra. So powerful are those kamma-seeds that they repeatedly bring about rounds of retribution. Those kammas committed in the past arise through our mental continuum in various ways, and they keep flowing. The vast amount of kamma accumulated in relation to the eye arises according to the occasion, subjecting the eye to it, and accumulates still more kamma. Thus, what is happening here is also the operation of ignorance and craving (taṇhā). Unknowingly, we do not know that these are kammas. We do not know that this is happening due to kamma. Often, when things come to us according to kamma, because we lack realization, we do not understand them, and we accumulate kamma over and over again through them.

When we reflect on the entirety of saṃsāra, we can say that it consists of a lot of struggling and writhing. We have struggled for an infinite time in this saṃsāra. This is done by accumulating kamma, based on the notion of 'I' and 'mine'. As long as one takes these five aggregates—form, feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), Preparations (saṅkhāra), and consciousness (viññāṇa)—associated with this body or other things, as 'I' and 'mine', one accumulates various kammas in terms of intentions, by way of liking, disliking, and delusion regarding them. Having accumulated those kammas, when we subsequently experience their retributions, we do not know that these are retributions. Sometimes we develop hatred towards those who are instrumental in bringing them about; we conflict with them. In that manner, due to the arising of those defilements, from that mass of struggling, another mass of struggling is created. When the rounds of retribution come, one accumulates more kamma through them due to ignorance, because of the lack of true understanding. Instead, when one's understanding of Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) develops, one realizes: "Here, there is only a process occurring due to causes and conditions—merely a series of activities." By establishing that realization within the mind, kamma is no longer accumulated. This is what helps one towards liberation.

If one is to escape from this bondage of saṃsāra, one must gain a correct understanding of the process occurring here. This is what is meant by the understanding of mental phenomena (nāma-dhamma). The realization that there is no 'I' or 'mine' to be taken here must come through direct experience—not merely because someone else said so, nor because it is written in a book. It is only by being established in a certain level of concentration and realizing, through insight reflection by way of Yoniso manasikāra (Wise attention), the true nature of these things—that they all arise, persist, and pass away—that one can obtain liberation, escape from saṃsāra.

Therefore, this very realization is what we must consider as the ultimate goal of our life. As long as this realization is absent, we will have to wander in this saṃsāra for an infinite, long period, repeatedly accumulating kamma, and consequently facing the mass of saṃsāric suffering (dukkha) known as birth (jāti), decay, sickness, and death (jarāmaraṇa). To attain this realization, we must make a certain effort in our daily life; we must make a certain sacrifice. Now, that treasurer renounced all his vast wealth and ordained. This was due to such a powerful desire, a powerful aspiration (chanda). In the same way, we must reflect that in this human existence obtained during the era of a Buddha's arising, there may be various other things, various other goals, and things that can be done. However, if one considers this as the most rare opportunity to escape from saṃsāra, what one has to do is to develop one's mind through meditation and gain this very realization.

First of all, while establishing concentration in daily life through some meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna) such as loving-kindness, recollection of the Buddha, foulness, or mindfulness of death, one must understand their impermanent (anicca) nature by performing activities such as maintaining postures with mindfulness and proper wisdom, with mindfulness (sati), in accordance with the four foundations of mindfulness. The three characteristics of anicca (impermanent), dukkha (suffering), and anattā (not-self) are matters that must be realized by each person individually. What helps in this is attention, which is called Yoniso manasikāra (Wise attention). Thus, to realize this group of Dhammas, by initiating them in daily life and then generating the effort called right endeavors (sammappadhāna) in one's mental continuum, and by developing the other factors called the bases of spiritual power (iddhipāda), one is gradually able to arouse insight knowledges (vipassanā-ñāṇa). Generally, some individuals are able to arouse these much sooner than they expected. The meditative capacities accumulated in past saṃsāra are stored within our mental continuum. For that, we must make an effort. Without such an effort, they will not arise on their own. When the deep understanding of this impermanence (aniccatā), which we regard as insight knowledge, matures as insight knowledges (vipassanā-ñāṇa), one sees that what is here is only arising and passing away (udayabbaya). In this world, we see the sun rise and the sun set. In the same way, in everything of ours—regarding both our body and thoughts—in every single one of them, there is an arising and a passing away. Because we lack the understanding of this arising and passing away, we regard everything as permanent.

Indeed, the Blessed Buddha has declared that in this world, there is only emptiness. If told this, a person cannot easily conceptualize it. The Blessed Buddha has used an analogy for these six sense-spheres we call the eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind—the word āyatana is used in the Dhamma for these six senses—that all six of these sense-spheres are empty. So much so, that they are to be seen as an empty village. An empty village is what is called when the people of that village have fled; there is no one in that village. In the same way, in not a single one of these—the eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind—is there anything that can be taken as 'I' or 'mine'. In that sense, it is void; the Blessed Buddha declared it is empty. So, it is through that very attention (manasikāra) that one can see these as an empty village. There is no essence to be grasped in the forms met by the eye. Moreover, there is nothing there other than a mere natural phenomenon. But what happens here? Because of the lack of that realization, grasping (upādāna)—which means holding on—occurs. One grasps them as 'I' and 'mine'. As long as one grasps them as 'I' and 'mine', it is precisely because of that grasping (upādāna) that those kammas are accumulated. That is why one wanders in saṃsāra for a long time. In accordance with the dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi) conjured up by the mind as 'I', one is born in saṃsāra over and over again.

To give an analogy, when twisting a rope made of several strands, if the two people at either end try, even by mistake, to twist the rope in the exact same direction, it will never twist into a knot. But if someone comes and holds it in the middle, then a rope-like thing is twisted there. This happens because it was grasped in the middle. In the same way, everything in the world is spinning. The mind is also spinning. All other things in the world can be thought of as spinning things. They go in circles to that extent. Otherwise, they have a nature of arising and passing away. There is a certain cycle between arising and passing away. It is because of that grasping (upādāna) that we perceive something substantial out of that spinning, or rather, out of that struggling. If it were allowed to twist in only one direction, there would be no knot there. Why? If it is not held in the middle, it will not twist either. But because of that grasping (upādāna), it appears there as a thing. When this is let go, its complete emptiness (suññatā) is understood. That is exactly the kind of thing that happens.

In many instances, it is mentioned in the Dhamma that some individuals with developed insight wisdom (vipassanā-paññā), when the Blessed Buddha uttered a single line of a verse, realized the path-knowledge of stream-entry (sotāpatti) and so forth. Why is that? What was the reason for this? That grasping (upādāna) present in the mind, the force of holding on, suddenly slipped away. At some point, if a realization arises that is powerful enough to let go of these five aggregates (pañcakkhandha)—namely form, feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), Preparations (saṅkhāra), and consciousness (viññāṇa), which are the five heaps we hold on to with this mind—then, at that moment, just like the rope unraveling, like how the thing that appeared as a rope unraveled, the true reality of this is understood.

That is precisely why the Blessed Buddha declared: "What is regarded as truth by the world is untruth to the Buddhas and Noble Ones (ariyas). What appears as truth to the Noble Ones is untruth to the world." When we look at this, it is a very amazing statement. It seems contradictory. Why? The reason for this is that the world lives within a delusion—within ignorance (avijjā). We do not want to accept that. Society always looks to bring that ignorance to the forefront. It is like a process of cultivating and consuming. However, Buddhas arise in the world to point out the way to free our minds from this very delusion. Some individuals with developed wisdom destroyed this delusion extremely rapidly. They realized that emptiness (suññatā), that these are empty villages. The eye is an empty village, the ear is an empty village, the nose is an empty village. Why are they called empty villages? If we reflect generally, the forms we saw in our childhood, the sounds we heard—none of them exist now. Yet, they are present in our minds. We think, "I saw these, I heard these." Because of that notion of 'I', these are held onto by way of grasping (upādāna). Because of that very grasping, being bound to that bondage of kamma, one wanders in saṃsāra over and over again.

A very amazing thing is present here. That is why consciousness (viññāṇa) was said to be an illusion (māyā). It is showing something non-existent. Yet, to the one who watches, it is real. Everyone goes to a magic show to see something. Indeed, it is shown as such, but despite being shown, there is no essence there—no substance.

That is precisely why the Blessed Buddha declared that this consciousness (viññāṇa) is an illusion. In every other religion, consciousness (viññāṇa) is regarded as the essence, the core, the self (attā). Even if they say all other things are not-self, every other teacher in the world takes consciousness (viññāṇa) to be the self. But the Blessed Buddha alone declared that consciousness (viññāṇa) is an illusion. For, what is here is a great deception, and what aids this deception is that very ignorance (avijjā). Ignorance is entirely a veil. It is called a hindrance (nīvaraṇa); it is covered by that veil. When performing a magic trick, a black cloth is put up and some false projection is made through it. Similarly, the black cloth of ignorance (avijjā) produces delusion.

Next, that bondage called craving (taṇhā) is experienced as an attachment. By means of that craving—called by various names such as craving (taṇhā), lust (rāga), or greed (lobha)—that thing is shown as if it exists. It is in accordance with that craving (taṇhā) itself that grasping (upādāna) exists. In daily life, one can experience these directly for oneself, to whatever level one is at. When we reflect on the instances that caused our emotional outbursts, we see how we conjured up an existing thing out of something non-existent. Especially, if one reflects on the past as an example—on one's own childhood, or for elderly people, on their youth—where are those things that they held onto as grasping (upādāna)? None of them exist. Yet, regarding them, there is a certain notion of 'I' and 'mine' created by the mind. Once 'I' is taken, the feeling that "there is also something that is mine" arises. Between these two, there lies a very amazing delusion. In realizing this, in daily life, one can properly practice the four foundations of mindfulness, using mindfulness of breathing (ānāpānassati) as an insight practice. Although we regard our in-breath and out-breath as a single thing, what is present here is a certain process. Through that process, we see its impermanence (aniccatā). That is a good illustration. Similarly, when the nature of arising, persisting, and ceasing of all things is understood, that perception of permanence (nicca-saññā) is gradually removed.

The Blessed Buddha has declared that there are four perversions (vipallāsa) in the world. Perversions mean four wrong understandings: the perception of permanence in the impermanent (anicca), the perception of pleasure in the painful (dukkha), the perception of beauty in the foul (asubha), and the perception of self in the not-self (anattā). There is a notion in the world taking the impermanent (anicca) to be permanent. There is a tendency to regard what is painful (dukkha) as pleasant. There is a tendency to regard what is foul as beautiful. There is a tendency to regard what is not-self (anattā) as self. The mind must escape from this distorted state called perversions (vipallāsa). What helps in that escape is the knowledge and vision of things as they really are (yathābhūta-ñāṇadassana)—the understanding of true reality. That is not something that can be shown to another. Within our own mind, as said before, it is comprised of mental phenomena (nāma-dhamma). All of them are defendants. Yet, at least one must be pardoned to get the work done. By turning this attention into Yoniso manasikāra (Wise attention), we must make an effort in our daily life itself, established in a certain virtue (sīla), to wisely understand the nature of that subtle mind—the nature of the subtle mind which is difficult to see.

What is done through virtue (sīla) is subduing this body and speech, and providing the necessary opportunity for mental seclusion (citta-viveka). It is freeing the mind from regrets and allowing room for mental seclusion. To establish concentration, there must be mental seclusion within that person. It is through the stages described as physical seclusion (kāya-viveka), mental seclusion (citta-viveka), and seclusion from acquisitions (upadhi-viveka) that the realization of Nibbāna can be achieved. Thus, after establishing that concentration, by relying on concentration and reflecting properly, one sees the mirage-like nature of everything. Why is it stopped right there as "a form, a form," "a sound, a sound"? If one wishes, one can analyze in detail. But that does not help Nibbāna. It may help in daily activities—analyzing what kind of form it is, whose it is, how beautiful, bad, or ugly it is. But through those, saṃsāra only grows further, delusion grows, ignorance grows, and it does not help in realizing the Four Noble Truths declared by the Blessed Buddha. Therefore, everything we do is either good or bad in accordance with our ultimate goal. Thus, the meditator (yogāvacara), the meritorious person who hopes to realize Nibbāna, no matter how the world thinks—even if they consider it madness—must direct his attention (manasikāra) according to his goal, according to the target he aspires to.

The nature of this running mind is like flowing water, or like being dragged by a wild bull. First of all, this scattered mind must be calmed. Having calmed it, concentration must be established. Next, this running mind must be gradually subdued and stopped. The mind is stopped, indeed, through weariness (nibbidā) regarding this; when true reality is understood, weariness grows. When the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā) grows, realizing "there is nothing here to be taken as 'I' and 'mine', everything is impermanent (anicca)," the previous momentum regarding these is lost. Grasping (upādāna)—which means holding on—gradually thins out. Having become so, at some point when the exact realization arises, at that moment, it is not that one let go of it on purpose, but it is let go of on its own. To the extent it is let go of, weariness (nibbidā) arises. That is what is called weariness with saṃsāra. Disillusionment (nibbidā) means weariness with saṃsāra. It is that weariness regarding everything that helps towards ultimate liberation, which is called dispassion (virāga).

When looked at as words, to most people in the ordinary world, these are unpleasant words. Why? Because this world always looks to expand the world. The Blessed Buddha has declared, na siyā loka-vaḍḍhano—one should not be a world-expander. Expanding the world is not what is to be done. That expanding of the world is Māra's work. Māra always tries to keep us in delusion. The Buddhas and the Noble Ones strive to free the world. To free them from the grip of Māra, what helps is realization. Realization cannot be created for another. Even the Blessed Buddha cannot do that. According to each individual's saṃsāric potential, sometimes through a line of a verse, sometimes through a verse, sometimes through a longer discourse, and through various other devices, the Blessed Buddha directed their matured saṃsāric wisdom towards Nibbāna and granted them the realization of Nibbāna.

Therefore, everyone must reflect that, without any distinction between young and old, the capacity to realize Nibbāna can be present within us. Why did even seven-year-olds become Arahants? Because their saṃsāric wisdom had matured within them. At the very beginning here, we mentioned a teacher who taught Abhidhamma, and a Vinayadhara monk who taught Vinaya. No matter how much one learns from books, if that which helps towards Nibbāna is absent, one remains in the grip of Māra forever.

Generally, whether we think about ordaining or other things, we regard only this erudition as the valuable thing in the world. But that is merely wisdom based on learning (sutamaya-paññā)—wisdom gathered from books. One cannot obtain even an understanding of the state of Nibbāna through that wisdom. Generally, by looking at a map, we cannot obtain the actual experience of traveling. It cannot be obtained by looking at a map; one must actually make the journey. In the same way, if one experiences this directly for oneself, at that moment, one’s doubts are dispelled; doubts are removed. No matter how much is obtained from books and so forth, doubts still remain. What helps in this is insight reflection (vipassanā-manasikāra).

These should not be regarded as things to be done only by the Sangha, only after ordaining. Even during the Buddha’s time, and even recently, lay devotees—both men and women—aroused their saṃsāric potential, developed these insight knowledges (vipassanā-ñāṇa), and attained the realization of the paths and fruits (magga-phala). Therefore, by practicing some meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna) in daily life, establishing concentration, and gradually associating with those capable of giving instructions on them, one must make an effort to arouse those insight knowledges. The opportunity to bring an end to this saṃsāric suffering (dukkha) is obtained, as we mentioned earlier, only during the era of a Buddha's arising.

The era of a Buddha's arising is an extremely rare opportunity. That is why the Blessed Buddha, as daily advice from the Sugata, pointed out those rare things:

> Dullabho buddhupādo lokasmiṃ, dullabho manussatta-paṭilābho, dullabhā khaṇasampatti, dullabhā pabbajjā, dullabhaṃ saddhammasavanaṃ, dullabho sappurisasaṃsevo.

Thus, six things are pointed out as rare. The era of a Buddha's arising is extremely rare. Next, the human existence obtained during the era of a Buddha's arising can be said to be even rarer. If one had obtained other forms of existence—if one were born as an animal or a hungry ghost (peta)—one would not be able to realize Nibbāna; that is why human existence during the era of a Buddha's arising is regarded as something extremely precious. Even being an ordinary human is not enough. Just having a human form is not enough; a wise human existence with intact sense faculties and the intellectual capacity to understand the Dhamma is what can be regarded as the "opportune moment" (khaṇa-sampatti). Even if that opportune moment is obtained, next is going forth (pabbajjā). Going forth is described as renunciation (nekkhamma). The strength to renounce, that going forth, is even rarer. Even if one goes forth, though one might get to hear the Dhamma, hearing the Dhamma that actually helps towards Nibbāna is extremely rare. Even if one hears such Dhamma, to practice according to that Dhamma, the association with a person of integrity (sappurisa) who can guide one—which is called association with a noble friend (kalyāṇa-mitta)—is extremely rare. Looking at it in this way, like the bullseye in the center of a target, the association with a noble, spiritual friend (kalyāṇa-mitta), as well as the era of a Buddha's arising, can be regarded as the final phase of this Gautama Buddha's Sāsana. If someone hopes to realize Nibbāna, it is at this very moment that it is possible.

When we reflect on the changes occurring in today's society, looking at it from all sides, in a few generations, even the word "Nibbāna" might be forgotten by the world. Instead, other things—other things that overflow—may arise. Due to physical forces and various other forces of defilements, as time goes on, it will fade. That is why when a Buddha arises in the world, some people develop an amazing kind of faith (saddhā) just upon hearing the word "Buddha". Until then, even the word "Buddha" is buried. The word "Nibbāna" is buried. Since such an era is coming in the future, every meritorious person at this moment must reflect: we must not dedicate our lives to those mundane pleasures and wealth. It must be dedicated for the sake of the rare human existence we have obtained.

We must make some effort to guard our mind—this mind whose true nature is difficult to see, extremely subtle, and which grows upon whatever object it pleases. If that effort is completed, as the Blessed Buddha declared, "cittaṃ guttaṃ sukhāvahaṃ"—if this mind is properly guarded, if the purity of the mind is established, if liberation is attained—then that person gains the capacity to be pacified by the supreme, deathless Nibbāna, escaping from all suffering (dukkha) of Preparations (saṅkhāra) such as birth (jāti), decay, sickness, and death (jarāmaraṇa). We should not regard these as things that are far away. We must regard them as things that are extremely close to us. The Blessed Buddha has declared: "Santike na vijānanti, magā dhammā..."—"Alas, they do not understand the Dhamma that is close at hand; they are like beasts, foolish people." "Beasts" (magā) here refers to fools—alas, what foolishness, they do not see the Nibbāna that is right here! From this, we can see that Nibbāna is not something far away like the sun or the moon. It is something that exists within ourselves.

There is an extremely valuable discourse of the Blessed Buddha: "Monks, within this fathom-long body itself, I declare the world, the arising of the world, the cessation of the world, and the path leading to the cessation of the world." "The world" here refers precisely to the Four Noble Truths. The Blessed Buddha declared that suffering (dukkha), the cause of suffering, Nibbāna attained by ending suffering, and the path to it, are all within this fathom-long body itself. It is within this living body endowed with perception (saññā) and mind—not within a dead corpse.

Nowadays, it is only when someone dies, keeping that dead body in front, that we say, "May they attain the bliss of Nibbāna!" This is not what is being said here. The capacity to obtain Nibbāna is within this living human being endowed with perception (saññā) and mind. If that is not brought out, then, as the Blessed Buddha declared: "Santike na vijānanti, magā dhammā..."—we would have to say, "Alas, fools do not understand the Nibbāna that is close at hand!" Therefore, we must reflect wisely, bring close to our lives the sublime Dhamma pointed out by the supreme Buddhas within this precious human existence we have obtained, arouse our saṃsāric potentials, arouse that wisdom, and reflect: "May this hearing of the Dhamma also help us to be pacified by the supreme, deathless Nibbāna!"

So, on this Poya day, having undertaken the precious virtue of ājīva-aṭṭhamaka-sīla (morality with livelihood as the eighth factor), and subduing body and speech, you have listened to the Dhamma with mindfulness (sati) and wisdom during this short time. We regard the realization of Nibbāna as the benefit of this hearing of the Dhamma. If we look at it deeply, it is not something that happens automatically, nor is it a magical event. Within our mental continuum, during this listening to the Dhamma, a certain series of Dhammas is deposited. These, known as faith (saddhā), energy (viriya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā), are mentioned as the five spiritual faculties (pañcindriya) and five spiritual powers (pañcabala) among the thirty-seven factors of enlightenment (bodhipakkhiya-dhamma) that help towards Nibbāna. They are presented as five faculties and five powers: faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom. During this short time, faith (saddhā) in the Triple Gem arose in the mental continuum of you meritorious people. Likewise, generating a certain energy (viriya), you sat for about an hour listening to this attentively. Through that, next, mindfulness (sati) developed; awareness developed. Next, concentration (samādhi) arose; when mindfulness is maintained for a long time, concentration is established. Through this, certain understandings arise in the concentrated mind; those are what is called wisdom (paññā).

In that way, a wholesome mental succession arose within your own mental continuum at this moment, which helps to establish faith (saddhā), energy (viriya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā) as spiritual faculties and powers. Utilizing them, you must aspire: "May we gain the strength and power to realize the supreme deathless Nibbāna as quickly as possible, in this very life, through the penetration of the paths and fruits (magga-phala)—namely Stream-entry (sotāpatti), Once-returning (sakadāgāmitā), Non-returning (anāgāmitā), and Arahanthood!" Likewise, may all deities and Brahmas—including the guardians of the Sāsana, the right-viewed deities and Brahmas, and the deities presiding over this place—rejoice in this heap of merit we have accumulated through this preaching and hearing of the Dhamma! Having rejoiced, may they realize the supreme, deathless Nibbāna through whatever state of awakening (bodhi) they aspire to, and may they protect the Sāsana! Furthermore, may all our departed relatives, and all beings from the Avīci hell up to the Akaniṭṭha heaven who desire merit and Nibbāna, rejoice in this merit of our preaching and hearing of Dhamma, and through their aspired state of awakening (bodhi), may they realize the supreme, deathless Nibbāna and escape from all saṃsāric suffering (dukkha)! Aspiring thus, share the merit by reciting the verses.

Dhammapada 110 (Sahassavagga)

Dear Listeners,

Adversity is an occasion that highlights and brings out the virtue or vice within a person. The noble-minded, virtuous person (satpuruṣa) and the base, unvirtuous person (asatpuruṣa) act in two entirely different ways in times of adversity. The virtuous person, according to the situation, would even sacrifice his own life for others, whereas the unvirtuous person, in order to save his own life, would even sacrifice the very person who helped him.

This very point becomes clear through the events in the background story (nidāna kathā) related to the verse we have chosen as our theme today. In Sāvatthī, a noble lady from a wealthy family passed away due to a sudden illness during her pregnancy. When her body was brought to the cemetery and cremated, the rest of her body burned, but the womb remained unburned. The undertakers, using the iron hooks they employ during cremation, pulled that womb away from the funeral pyre, threw it onto a heap of embers, covered it with another heap of embers, and returned home. When they came back to look in the morning, there was a child lying on top of the extinguished heap of embers. The womb had burned away, but nothing had happened to the child.

The reason given for this is a certain natural law (dhammatā) that a person who possesses the spiritual merit (puñña) to attain Arahanthood in that very life will not pass away without attaining Arahanthood. Those who are called pacchimabhavika (one in their final birth) are those who have the merit to attain Arahanthood in that very lifetime. There are several stories of this nature mentioned in the texts. This is one such case. Therefore, on one hand, this was a child of immense merit. Be that as it may, those people, being greatly astonished that the body was cremated with such a massive pile of firewood yet this child survived, took the child to the fortune-tellers as a great wonder. They asked them if there was anything special about this child. They said, "If he remains a layman, seven generations of his family will become impoverished"—making him appear extremely unfortunate from a worldly point of view—"but if he ordains, he will live an excellent life surrounded by a large retinue of five hundred." Furthermore, when the womb was being pulled away with those iron hooks and dragged here and there, the hook struck the corner of the child's eye, causing an injury. Those hooks are called saṅku. Associated with that word, this child was named Saṅkicca, because of that mark left on his eye, due to the injury.

The relatives thought that once the child grew up, he should be ordained. Meanwhile, the child also overheard other children playing with him say: "When you were in your mother's womb, she passed away in this manner, and you remained unburned during the cremation." The child felt a great sense of urgency and spiritual anxiety (saṁvega) over this. He thought, "If I was saved from such a dread of death, why should I remain in lay life?" and at the age of seven, he asked for permission to ordain. His relatives took him and handed him over to Venerable Sāriputta. Venerable Sāriputta, on that very day, gave him the meditation subject of the "pentad of skin" (taca-pañcaka) namely kesā (hair of the head), lomā (hair of the body), nakhā (nails), dantā (teeth), taco (skin), which is given during ordination, shaved his head, and ordained him. Even while his head was being shaved, he attained Arahanthood together with the four analytical knowledges (paṭisambhidā). At that time, Venerable Saṅkicca was only seven years old.

Around this time, thirty bhikkhus from Sāvatthī—who had ordained in their old age—received meditation instructions leading all the way to Arahanthood from the Buddha, and asked the Buddha for permission to go and reside in a forest hermitage in a remote area. The Buddha asked, "To which area are you going?" and it appeared to his Buddha-insight that they would face an obstacle and danger in that region due to a poor man. Realizing that Venerable Saṅkicca would be the one capable of helping them on that occasion, the Buddha told those bhikkhus, "Very well, you may go. But first, meet our elder, your elder brother in the Sāsana, Sāriputta, before you leave."

Those bhikkhus then went to Venerable Sāriputta and told him, "The Buddha asked us to meet you before we go." Venerable Sāriputta also reflected on this. Discerning the Buddha's underlying intention, he asked these bhikkhus, "Do you have a novice (sāmaṇera) to take with you?" They replied, "Why do we need a novice, friend, while we are living in the forest? If we take a novice, he will only be an impediment and a trouble to us." Venerable Sāriputta then declared, "No, friends, the one you are taking is this Saṅkicca of mine. If you take Venerable Saṅkicca, no harm or impediment will come to you because of him. Indeed, if there is to be any danger, it will be to this novice Saṅkicca because of your group." However, he did not explain the specific reason.

So, those bhikkhus agreed and set off on their journey along with the young novice Saṅkicca. These thirty-one monks arrived at a village in a remote area. In accordance with the custom of bhikkhus looking for a place to spend the rainy season retreat (vassa), when the faithful devotees came and asked, "Venerable sirs, where are you going?" and they replied, "We are searching for a suitable place," the devotees understood from those words that they were seeking a place to spend the rains retreat. Those faithful laypeople invited them, saying, "If you, venerable sirs, out of compassion, spend the rains retreat here with us, we too will be able to observe the Uposatha and the eight precepts in this area." They prepared the necessary huts (kuṭi) in a section of the forest, cleared walking paths (caṅkamana), and made arrangements for the bhikkhus to spend the rains retreat in that forest hermitage. The bhikkhus went into the village for almsfood.

Moreover, at the very beginning of the rains retreat, they made an agreement among themselves: "We have come having received meditation instructions from the living Buddha himself. Let none of us live in negligence. Except for the time of going for morning almsfood and attending to the elder bhikkhu in the evening, let us meditate individually at all other times. If anyone falls suddenly ill, strike the wooden gong (gaṇḍi). Then we will all assemble and assist that monk." Having established this agreement, they meditated diligently.

One day, while returning from the almsround, they bathed near a river and were preparing to partake of their meal on the sandy bank. At that time, a certain poor man of that region, who lived with the help of his only daughter, decided to go to another daughter because of a food shortage in that area. While traveling, he saw the monks preparing to partake of their almsfood and approached them. As he stood there watching, the bhikkhus inquired about his whereabouts. When he explained his situation, they noticed he looked very hungry and told him, "Bring a leaf so we can give you some food." The thirty bhikkhus each took a lump of rice from their own almsfood and placed it on the leaf, giving it to the man to eat.

After eating this, the man thought: "I am so poor. Even when I work hard, I never get such delicious food." He asked the monks, "Venerable sirs, was there a special invitation today?" They replied, "No, we had no special invitation. This is how people offer us alms every day." The man then thought, "In that case, I do not need to go here and there. I should remain here to serve them as an attendant (kappiyakāra)." He requested permission from the bhikkhus, saying, "I will stay and perform the daily duties and services." The bhikkhus granted him permission. This man remained there, performing his duties in a way that pleased the monks. After two months had passed, he again thought of visiting his daughter. Then he thought, "If I ask permission from the bhikkhus now, they might not let me go." So, he departed without telling anyone.

While traveling, he encountered a band of five hundred thieves in the forest. It is mentioned that in those days, thieves often lived in bands in the forests. Those thieves had made a vow to the deity of the forest, promising to offer a human sacrifice. That day was the seventh day of their vow. On that day, the chief of the thieves climbed a tree to see if anyone was entering the forest, and he saw this man coming. He then signaled the other thieves, who surrounded and captured the man. Having caught him, they bound him tightly. Then they lit a large fire and began preparing their weapons. This man asked, "I do not see any wild boars or deer here. What are you preparing to do? Why are you lighting a bonfire?" The thieves replied, "We have made a vow to offer a human sacrifice to the deity. Therefore, we intend to kill you and offer the sacrifice with your flesh and blood." Terrified, the man used his cunning and thought of a scheme. He said, "I am an extremely wretched man who lives on leftover rice. In such-and-such a place, there are noble monks ordained from clans like the Sakya clan. Go and bring one of those monks and offer him as a sacrifice. The deity will be far more pleased with that."

The thieves considered this and agreed that it made sense. Guided by that very man, they went to the forest hermitage. Upon arriving, they saw no one. When they asked why, the man, knowing their agreement, said, "Strike this wooden gong, and the monks will assemble." Then the chief of the thieves struck the gong. All thirty bhikkhus came and sat on the stone seats. The chief elder asked, "Who struck the gong?" The chief of the thieves replied, "It was I, venerable sir." When asked, "Why?" he said, "We have vowed to make a human sacrifice. We have come to take one of you monks." Then the chief elder declared, "When a responsibility is given to a group of brothers, it is the leader, the eldest, who must fulfill it. Therefore, venerable sirs, continue your meditation with diligence. I will sacrifice my life for you, venerable sirs, and go with this band of thieves to fulfill this purpose."

When the chief elder gave his pledge to sacrifice his life, the second monk said, "A problem that arises for an elder brother should be resolved by the younger brother. Therefore, let you, venerable sir, and the other venerable ones continue to practice meditation well. I shall go to offer my life." In this manner, all thirty monks, in order of seniority, prepared to sacrifice their lives and go. Finally, the young novice Venerable Saṅkicca said, "Venerable sirs, let all of you remain. I will go and sacrifice my life for you." Then the chief elder and the other monks said, "Even if we all have to die, we cannot send you, young venerable one." When asked, "Why?" they replied, "You are the pupil of Venerable Sāriputta. It would be a great disgrace and blame upon us to have it said that we took a young novice and handed him over to the thieves. Therefore, we can never let you go." Thereupon, Venerable Saṅkicca said, "The Buddha sent you to my preceptor (upajjhāya), and my preceptor sent me here with you for this very reason. Therefore, please let me go." Having obtained their permission and asking for forgiveness, saying, "If any wrong has been done by me, please forgive me," he departed.

Then, those bhikkhus felt a deep sense of saṁvega—in short, a sorrow so profound that tears welled in their eyes—seeing this young novice step forward to sacrifice his life for them. As Venerable Saṅkicca was preparing to depart, the chief elder made a special request to the thieves: "Please, this young novice might get frightened when you kindle those bonfires and prepare your weapons. Therefore, seat him to one side and carry out your task." The chief of the thieves, in accordance with what was said, had Venerable Saṅkicca seated to one side. Having kindled a great bonfire and sharpened their weapons, the chief of the thieves took his sword, approached Venerable Saṅkicca, swung it around his head, and struck a blow at Venerable Saṅkicca's body. As he struck, the sword bent in two, its sharp edge folding back onto itself. The chief of the thieves thought there must have been some mistake in his swing, so he straightened it out and struck again. This time, the sword curled up like a dry palmyra leaf, twisting and curling from the tip all the way to the hilt.

The chief of the thieves was utterly astonished. "Nothing like this has ever happened before. I have used this sword for so long. What is this? Even an inanimate sword knows the virtues of this young novice. It is only I who did not know." Saying this, he prostrated himself at the novice's feet and begged for forgiveness. He asked, "Venerable sir, all this time, whenever people entering this forest see us, they tremble with fear. Why is it that you remain so calm, with such a pleasant countenance?" At that moment, Venerable Saṅkicca arose from his absorption—for the young novice had not simply sat there, but had entered into absorption (jhāna). It was through psychic power (iddhi) that this miracle had occurred. Then he uttered several verses as a Dhamma teaching.

This is the meaning of those verses. He did not address him as the chief of thieves, but in common address, called him "village headman" (gāma-jeṭṭha). "Headman, for one who has no Taṇhā (Craving) or expectation, there is no mental Dukkha (Suffering) regarding death. For an Arahant (one whose taints are destroyed, khīṇāsava) who has removed taṇhā, death is like laying down a heavy burden from one's head; it is a matter of joy, not something that causes fear." Thus he preached the Dhamma. Having heard this and being inspired, the chief of the thieves asked the others, "Now, what shall we do?" They asked, "What do you intend to do?" The chief of the thieves replied, "After witnessing such a miracle, there is no use in lay life for me. I shall ordain under this venerable sir." All the other four hundred and ninety-nine agreed, and they all requested ordination from Venerable Saṅkicca, the young novice.

Adapting to the situation, the young novice dyed their existing garments with copper-colored clay, shaved their heads with those very swords, and ordained all five hundred of them. While thinking of setting off to see the Buddha, he thought: "From the moment I left, those bhikkhus must have been in great grief. They might not be able to concentrate their minds. I must go and see them before I leave." So, accompanied by the five hundred, the young novice returned to the forest hermitage where the thirty monks resided. When they arrived, the bhikkhus were astonished. He explained the situation: "When this chief of thieves tried to harm me, it failed. Out of faith, they have all ordained. Now, venerable sirs, continue to practice your meditation diligently." Having said this, Venerable Saṅkicca, along with the newly ordained band of thieves, went to Venerable Sāriputta.

Venerable Sāriputta, seeing him, expressed his joy, saying, "Why is it, Saṅkicca, that you return with such a large retinue of pupils?" After Venerable Saṅkicca explained the matter, Venerable Sāriputta sent the group to see the Buddha, saying, "Go and pay respects to the Buddha as well." When they went to the Buddha, he too expressed his joy in the same manner, and the admonitory message he declared regarding the chief of the thieves is what is expressed in today's verse:

> Yo ca vassasataṁ jīve, dussīlo asamāhito,

> Ekāhaṁ jīvitaṁ seyyo, sīlavantassa jhāyino.

Though one should live a hundred years, immoral and unconcentrated, yet better is a single day's life of one who is virtuous and meditative.

Through this, we can see the exemplary life of the young novice, who lived virtuously and endowed with the power of jhāna. On the other hand, we see the immoral life led by those thieves. Accordingly, the Buddha delivered an admonitory sermon. It is said in the Dhamma texts that upon hearing this, all five hundred of them attained Arahanthood. In any case, it served as a support for Nibbāna.

This is what is mentioned in the scriptures as the background story and the occasion for the teaching of this verse. The account of Venerable Saṅkicca is a highly valuable event in the Dispensation. So, let us try to bring out the points that we, by way of commentary, should extract from this.

First of all, let us consider the birth of Venerable Saṅkicca. The Buddha has declared that jāti—that is, birth or arising—is Dukkha (Suffering). However, lay devotees generally do not like to accept that birth is dukkha. This reality is obscured by the concept of the "blessing of children." Yet, we see here that when a child cannot be born naturally, various surgeries are performed, causing great pain to the mother in order to bring the child into the world. This birth was even more miraculous. Here, indeed, birth took place in the midst of a funeral pyre. If someone's birth occurs in the middle of a fire, there can be nothing more terrifying and filled with saṁvega. Yet, he survived the fire, and thus his birth occurred. We can only conceive of it as a highly miraculous birth. Along with the power of merit from Venerable Saṅkicca's past, there must have also been some great unwholesome karma (akusala). That is why it was said that if he remained a layman, seven generations of his family would be impoverished. Be that as it may, it is shown here as a natural law (dhammatā) that a pacchimabhavika (one in their final birth) cannot be killed under any circumstances. If someone has attained their final existence, they will not die without attaining Arahanthood. It was because of such a dhammatā that this took place.

The next important point is this young child's attainment of Arahanthood through the taca-pañcaka meditation subject. Often, the attainment of Arahanthood by highly meritorious individuals is reported at a very tender age—seven years of age being a very young, childhood stage where one is just beginning to understand things. On that occasion, such a simple meditation subject—hair of the head, hair of the body, nails, teeth, skin—parts of the body which ordinary worldly people beautify and consider as additions to their physical attractiveness. Yet, as you virtuous people know, the Buddha placed these at the very beginning of the thirty-two impure parts of the body. Contemplating this meditation subject of hair of the head, hair of the body, nails, teeth, and skin, even as the hair of his head was being shaved, insight-knowledges (vipassanā-ñāṇa) arose through a deep disenchantment with saṁsāra, allowing him to attain Arahanthood. This is what we see from this story. It is a Dhamma miracle.

We mentioned that both the Buddha and the great Arahant Sāriputta foresaw this series of future events. Venerable Saṅkicca was sent with a special purpose because some danger was to befall those thirty monks due to that poor man. But why did the Buddha let them go there, rather than telling them to go elsewhere, despite knowing of such a danger? It is because there was a certain dhammatā (natural lawfulness) inherent in this. This poignant sequence of events—that is, the saṁvega felt by those thirty monks when the band of thieves came and tried to take one of them, as well as the sacrifice of their lives that they offered—must have actually aided those thirty in attaining Nibbāna. That, too, was visible to the Buddha's eye. Moreover, the Dhamma-power of Venerable Saṅkicca, as well as the fact that the band of thieves would ordain, must have been perceived by the Buddha's eye, which is why he permitted those thirty monks to go to that region.

Next, a proof for the point we made at the very beginning was spontaneously illustrated in this story. That is, it is only in times of adversity and disaster that one can recognize whether someone is a virtuous person (satpuruṣa) or an unvirtuous person (asatpuruṣa), by the way they behave. Now, that poor man, like biting the hand that feeds him, was ready to sacrifice one of the very monks who had helped him, in order to save his own life. On one hand, this demonstrates the behavior of a wicked person. On the other hand, we see how those thirty monks acted. When such a situation arises, what we usually expect regarding the sacrifice of life is that senior, high-ranking elders, holding onto their titles and leadership, would save their own lives by sacrificing others. That is what is commonly seen in the ordinary, worldling (puthujjana) world. But these noble monks—indeed, they had not even attained Arahanthood yet. It is mentioned here that these thirty were not even children of the same mother, nor were they Arahants. Yet, they were thirty monks of such sublime virtue. The chief elder took that death upon himself. Then, the other junior monks did the same. The second monk thought of it as a service to the Saṅgha, a service to the elder, and said, "I must perform the duty that belongs to him." In the same way, the monks junior to him took it upon themselves. This is an extremely exemplary event. That is the quality of a virtuous person. It is clearly illustrated in this story how virtuous people sacrifice their own lives for others in times of adversity. This is extremely valuable. It provides a Dhamma-based model of how we should act in our own lives in such situations.

Furthermore, if we look deeper, the most profound Dhamma point within this is what was declared by the young Venerable Saṅkicca. An Arahant has no fear of death. Why, indeed, is there no fear of death? It is because death has been conquered. That victory over death was not achieved merely by bending the sword as he did. The bonds, the hooks that tie us to this saṁsāra, have been bent back in the opposite direction. These are what are called fetters (saṁyojana). It is by these ten kinds of bonds called fetters that ordinary worldly people are bound to saṁsāra. It is by reversing them that Arahanthood is attained—meaning they have been destroyed, eradicated. That is why there is no fear of death. In short, Nibbāna is neither a drink obtained from some other world nor a strange, eternal existence. It is the cessation of the fear of death that goes hand-in-hand with the notion of "I" and "mine" which is created within this very person, within this being, due to Taṇhā (Craving) and ignorance (avijjā). When taṇhā and expectations are eliminated, the fear of death is also eliminated. This is the deepest point in this Dhamma. This, too, is revealed through the words of Venerable Saṅkicca.

In all of our sermons, we direct the final portion towards Dhamma analysis. We mentioned that the willingness to step forward and sacrifice their lives must have helped those thirty monks in their attainment of Arahanthood. What is called sacrifice of life is the letting go of the desire for life. The relinquishment of the desire for life served as a rehearsal for those thirty monks to let go of the entire heap of acquisitions (upadhi). It was according to that very same natural law (dhammatā) that the young Venerable Saṅkicca, even as his hair was being shaved, severed all bonds tying him to saṁsāra and realized the Deathless, Great Nibbāna. Thereby, he eradicated the fear of death. That is why he showed no fear whatsoever when the chief of the thieves brought the sword. When we contemplate Nibbāna, we see that the Buddha has shown the true liberation in a way that no other teacher has ever declared. Venerable Saṅkicca further told the chief of the thieves that for an Arahant, death is like letting go of a heavy burden carried on the head. Why? Because an Arahant is described as "one who has laid down the burden" (ohitabhāra).

What is this burden? It is the five aggregates (pañcakkhandha). You virtuous people may have generally heard of rūpa (form), Vedanā (Feeling), saññā (perception), Saṅkhāra (Preparations), and viññāṇa (consciousness). However, these are not just single things, they are heaps; khandha means a heap or a pile. We show a photograph to others and say, "This is my form (rūpa)." But according to the Dhamma, what is shown here is a heap of forms. Similarly, it is a heap of Vedanā (Feeling), a heap of saññā (perceptions). Saṅkhāra—that is, our intentions and volitions, the series of active thoughts we generate—that, too, is a heap. Next, viññāṇa (consciousness), which we call "my thoughts"—that, too, is a heap. In this way, they are presented in the Dhamma as heaps. How are these five heaps formed? Let us consider that for a moment. Since each of us can understand things according to our own level of comprehension, there is a certain nature—the Buddha points out that the ordinary person, the person lacking Dhamma-knowledge, spends this saṁsāra merely piling things up.

How do we pile them up? Every one of us possesses six sense-bases (āyatana). When we say āyatana (bases), various everyday institutions might come to mind. Looking at it through the term itself, it is somewhat similar. The Buddha points out that we have six sense-bases: eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind. What is the work done within these six sense-bases? What is the process? Through these, due to ignorance (avijjā) and Taṇhā (Craving), in order to gratify and maintain this physical cage, we pile up a vast number of thoughts along various kinds of objects. Based on forms seen with the eye, because of the Vedanā (Feeling) arising from them, according to the saññā (perceptions) given by those feelings, we generate various expectations and thoughts (vitakka). A stream of thoughts runs along, separating "them" as one thing and "I" as another, based on each of these sense-bases. Just as we spoke of the eye, think also of the other sense-bases. Hearing a sound through the ear, if it is a pleasant sound, like a beautiful song, one develops an attachment based on it. According to those vedanā, various thoughts and reflections (vitakka) are generated. Then one thinks, "On such-and-such a day, I listened to so-and-so's song. I am the one who listened to that song; others did not get the chance to hear it." In this way, it gets stored in the mind.

The Buddha explains how this piling up occurs, the way the worldlings who spend their time in this saṁsāra continuously accumulate these five heaps. This can also be shown in a subtle way. To summarize and express this briefly, we can say it as follows. The Pali phrase is applied in this manner:

> "Etaṁ mama, esohamasmi, eso me attā"

> (This is mine, this I am, this is my self.)

The Buddha points out that we think about these things in three ways. These three ways are identified as Taṇhā (Craving), conceit (māna), and view (diṭṭhi). By way of taṇhā, we think: "This is mine" (etaṁ mama). Next, by way of conceit, we regard it as: "This I am" (eso hamasmi)—"this is indeed me." Next: "This is my self" (eso me attā). Now, we spoke of a photograph. If that photograph is beautiful, everyone thinks they themselves are beautiful: "This is mine." They do not even like to give the photograph away; they try to preserve it. "Etaṁ mama." Next, "eso hamasmi"—"This is me, not anyone else. Me, me, me." "Eso me attā"—"So this indeed is my self." This is what we submit even for an identity card. We do not need to speak of other things. To recall the precious moments of life, we say: "There, in that photograph, at that spot, stands me. Me. And next to me is so-and-so." I have used this small analogy so that it can be understood in an everyday manner.

Gathering this vast number of experiences received through the eye, we say: "etaṁ mama, eso hamasmi, eso me attā." We collect them, bundle them up, and finally, it is just like putting a seal on them. We collect and bundle them up through taṇhā. We stack them neatly through conceit (māna). Then we place the seal: "eso me attā"—"This is my self." In this way, when our experiences are seized and grasped in three ways, by way of taṇhā and upādāna (grasping / fuel / holding), they are filtered, and the form (rūpa) aspect of that experience goes and joins our pile called "form." The feeling (vedanā) aspect goes and joins there as "my heap of feelings." The perception (saññā) aspect goes and joins as "my heap of perceptions." You virtuous people can understand this in relation to some important occasion on a certain day in your life. Let us say, if it was an important event like a wedding, you regard that photograph taken with great pride as something highly significant. Inside that photograph taken on my most important occasion, all of this is contained. The vedanā, saññā, and intentions (cetanā) generated on that occasion are all a part of that person. When one reflects upon one's life, what is called "I" and "mine" is precisely this little bundle.

But the Buddha points out that not a single one of these can be taken as a solid, singular thing. Although they are grasped as a single unit through the perception of compactness (ghana-saññā), they are actually a heap of processes that arise and cease. They are Saṅkhāra (Preparations). The precise Dhamma term for it is simply "a heap of saṅkhāra." All of these are regarded as saṅkhāra. They are merely a heap of preparations. Even this which we consider as our body is a heap of preparations that changes moment by moment. We carry this along, nourishing it with food and drink. If we contemplate deeply, what we call "life" is actually a continuous effort to avoid dying. It is an effort to avoid dying. Even the inhalation we take, though we take it as "my breath," is a heap of breath-ripples. The exhalation, too, is a heap of breath-ripples. Even if we look at the food and drink we take, the Buddha shows every single one of them as a heap of arisings and ceasings (anicca). Right there lies Anicca (Impermanent). But ordinary worldly people do not understand this. They collect, pile up, and bind these things as mentioned before, and go on and on in saṁsāra. They expand saṁsāra; they expand Bhava (Becoming). This is the nature of the world, until a Buddha appears in the world and explains it.

What is the other side of this? How do we untie this? How do we reduce these heaps? The Buddha shows that as well. If we are to present it as a meditation subject, we can state it in this way. Previously, we said: "etaṁ mama, eso hamasmi, eso me attā" The Buddha points out, in a perfectly corresponding manner:

> "Na etaṁ mama, na eso hamasmi, na eso me attā"

>

> (This is not mine, this I am not, this is not my self.)

Here, the word "na" (not) is placed in front. Scholars and learned people try to debate and analyze this logically. This was not given for logical debate. This is a passage presented by the Buddha for a practical purpose, for practical vipassanā (insight). Thus, what we have to extract from this is: "na etaṁ mama"—"this is not mine," or rather, it implies that saying "this is mine" is incorrect. "Na eso hamasmi"—"this I am not," meaning it is incorrect to say "this is me." "Na eso me attā"—"this is not my self," indicating that the wrong view held so far, the view that "this is my self," is incorrect.

The Buddha points out that if someone adjusts their vision insightfully in this manner, their piling up is reduced. Those heaps get unraveled right then and there. They get unraveled by seeing them as Saṅkhāra (Preparations). As long as one does not see them as saṅkhāra, that feeling of "I" and "mine" is gathered, bundled, stacked, and sealed in that manner, saying, "This is me, this is me." That is what is called sakkāya-diṭṭhi (dogma of self-illusion). We can understand it in this way.

This is a somewhat deep matter. But we simplify it and present it using analogies. It was by hearing about this very deep philosophy, right at the moment of ordination of that seven-year-old child, regarding the five things—hair of the head, hair of the body, nails, teeth, skin—which everyone beautifies, shows off, and tries to assert to the world, and considers beautiful—that the young novice attained Arahanthood. How did that happen? Let us look at that in some detail. All of you virtuous people know the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta. Indeed, what was declared here are the first five of the thirty-two impure parts of the body mentioned under mindfulness of the body (kāyagatāsati) in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta: hair of the head, hair of the body, nails, teeth, skin. This is, in fact, the first meditation subject given even today to a newly ordained young novice as a tradition of the Dispensation. Even so, if we look at the state of the Dispensation today, for some people, this is both the first and the last meditation subject they ever receive in their monastic life. To such a state has the Dispensation fallen today. These are open secrets of ours. Nevertheless, what we have to say is that in the past, through this very first meditation subject, some individuals realized the fruit of Arahanthood. There were such highly meritorious individuals who were deeply devoted to the Dispensation.

Be that as it may, let us contemplate the depth contained within these five: hair of the head, hair of the body, nails, teeth, skin. For those who have practiced asubha-bhāvanā (meditation on foulness) for a long time in saṁsāra, even these parts which we beautify and display to the world—hair, body hair, nails, teeth, skin—are very quickly understood as repulsive. When the young child's head was being shaved, he must have thought: "Previously, I was with hair; now, I am without hair." Within this, even the change in one's own appearance helps one to understand anicca (impermanence / inconstancy) and the Dhamma of anattā (not-self / non-self). Next, there is a simile given by the Buddha for this. You virtuous people might have heard of it. That simile is stated in the Pali words as follows. Where the thirty-two parts of the body are mentioned, the Buddha gives a wonderful simile. Just as if there were a bag with an opening at both ends, and a man with good sight were to open it and examine its contents, saying: "This is hill-paddy, this is wheat, this is mung-beans, this is kidney-beans, this is husked rice," even so, one should reflect upon the impure parts of this body: hair of the head, hair of the body, nails, teeth, skin, and so on. This is what is found in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta.

Focus your attention on this simile for a moment. Now, what is spoken of here is a bag with two openings. Think about it: a bag with two openings is a bag open at both ends. Is a bag open at both ends really a bag? Is a bag open at both ends a bag? When you think about it deeply, it is not a bag. Yet, ordinary worldly people generally regard it as a bag. To the person who has taken it as a single unit through sakkāya-diṭṭhi (dogma of self-illusion) and through the perception of compactness (ghana-saññā), it is not apparent that this is not a bag. Why? Because the two processes of arising and ceasing are not seen here.

To see the two processes of arising and ceasing, which occur extremely rapidly moment by moment within this body, is what is called vipassanā (insight). It is to see it in an extremely subtle manner. As long as one does not see it properly, one grasps it through the perception of compactness (ghana-saññā). "This is my form, this is my breath, this is my food." In this way, one takes it as "mine, mine." Yet, every single one of these is wonderfully subject to the law of Anicca (Impermanent). They are merely a collection of arisings and ceasings. It was to make us understand this fact of arising and ceasing that the Buddha compared it to a bag open at both ends, or a bag with two openings. Some might think that the Buddha gave this simile only in relation to the food and drink we consume. Because one can at least think about that to some extent. That food and drink takes a bit of a detour before exiting; it does not leave the moment it is put in. That is why we think: "The 'I' who goes to the dining hall or restaurant and the 'I' who goes to the toilet are both one and the same." There is a vast difference between those two. The "I" who goes to the restaurant and eats delicious food might not be the same "I" who goes to the toilet by the time one returns. But one is not inclined to contemplate this.

Within this, there is a massive, circular process, like a labyrinth, that deceives us. There is a process. Even inhalation and exhalation are like this. In modern terms, they might say that the air we inhale is oxygen, and what we exhale is carbon dioxide. What is this? If we contemplate this according to the Dhamma, this body is constantly like a funeral pyre. The breath we take in is exhaled carrying away the heap of charcoal from this burning body. That is why it is called carbon dioxide (or "charcoal-acid"). This etymology might not be scientifically precise, but we say it to highlight a Dhamma point. Even when we inhale the sweet fragrance of a flower, it is subsequently exhaled carrying the toxic gases from within the body. Such a transformation takes place. Yet we say, "I am breathing in, I am breathing out." That is how ordinary worldly people think. This is true not only of our food and drink, but also when we examine inhalation and exhalation.

Let us go even further. Now, let us examine hair of the head, hair of the body, nails, teeth. Is the hair we have now the very same hair we had at birth? There is no need to speak specifically about beards; all of you virtuous people know. It grows, falls out, sheds, and is shaved. Such is the process. In this manner, every single part of the body changes moment by moment. Or rather, day by day, some transformation or change occurs in them. Through ignorance (avijjā), we forget this. We bundle this up and stand firmly in the view that says, "This is me." That is sakkāya-diṭṭhi. Sakkāya-diṭṭhi means going to the extreme of saying "form is mine, feeling is mine." The Buddha points out that these are merely a heap of Saṅkhāra (Preparations); when examined ultimately, there is no "thing" here. There is only a heap of preparations, becomings, and endeavors here. We have explained on many occasions that when we look back at our entire life in the end, there is nothing done, nothing remains. There is only a heap of highly sorrowful endeavors.

Saying we are hungry, we consume some food. For how many hours does it last? Then we drink some water. For how short a time does the breath we took support us? Therefore, living is actually a series of massive efforts made just to avoid dying. Generally, we think of it as meaningless (niratthaka) only at the moment we realize we are dying. But even before that, it is meaningless. It is this meaninglessness that the Buddha points out as emptiness (suññatā). There is no "self" essence here. Here, there is only the internal play of the four great elements (cattāro mahābhūtā): earth (pathavī), water (āpo), fire (tejo), and air (vāyo). We have prepared ourselves to take responsibility for it. That is what is called "clung-to" (upādinna). We do not care as much about the things in the external world as we do about these four elements in the body. That is why doctors search for imbalances in these gases, or in the wind, bile, and phlegm. We do not care so much about external things; if they go bad, we discard them and acquire new ones.

Even if we keep fixing pieces onto this body—blood from someone else, a set of teeth from somewhere else, a kidney from another person, and if needed, perhaps even a heart from someone else—it is still "I." The one who leaves that hospital is the very same "I" who entered. That is how it is held in the mind. In that manner, we go on fixing these pieces. The vehicle number is the same, but what is running are parts taken from here and there. The body is such a thing. Why? Because due to Taṇhā (Craving) and ignorance (avijjā), there is a powerful upādāna (grasping / fuel) regarding this body. This cannot be broken by logic. What is required is to see it through vipassanā (insight).

Here, we must deeply contemplate the bag open at both ends. That is the true result of reciting and practicing mindfulness of the body (kāyagatāsati). It has two aspects. By reflecting on hair of the head, hair of the body, nails, teeth, and so on, one develops concentration (samādhi). The mind becomes unified. It is mentioned in the past that some monks developed concentration on each of these individual parts. Monks with such wondrous powers of concentration are mentioned in the texts. After establishing such concentration, as the Buddha points out in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, one must look at every single one of them through vipassanā (insight). There is a division between their internal and external aspects. Similarly, there is a division between their arising and ceasing. These are two things that come and go: arising and ceasing. At times, we live looking only at the arising side. Lay devotees who practice the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta might know about this. The Buddha points out that these thirty-two impure parts exist within oneself, and they also exist within other persons whom one loves. It is so internally; it is so externally. This is the very nature of every human body. Next, they arise and cease. Just as we spoke of various bodily organs and food and drink, they arise and cease. But when one arrives at intense vipassanā, these begin to be understood instantly. Both arising and ceasing are seen instantly. As vipassanā becomes sharper and sharper, there comes a point when their dissolution (bhaṅga)—their breaking nature, the speed of their breaking, which is even faster than their arising—is understood. It is at such a moment, indeed, that a deep disenchantment with saṁsāra arises through the insight-knowledge (vipassanā-ñāṇa), and the mind is liberated.

It is with the mind that we carry these five heaps. We must realize that what is spoken of here is not the weight measured on a weighing scale. It is the mind that bears the burden of the five aggregates (pañcakkhandha). It is this mind, defiled with taints, that carries it because it takes them as a single entity. To use an analogy: when a heavy vehicle like a truck is running at high speed, where does the entire weight of that truck reside? Can you pinpoint where it rests? It is only at that point where the rotating wheel touches the ground. The mind is just like that. This mind moves extremely rapidly, with immense speed. Ordinary worldly people cannot grasp where this moving mind rests. For that, deep concentration (samādhi) is required—a strong concentration. Similarly, wise attention (yoniso manasikāra) and insight-contemplation (vipassanā-manasikāra) are necessary. It is through contemplation with insight-attention that, in the end, one realizes: "It is right here that this exists," and with the meditative mind (jhāna-citta), one gathers these scattered five aggregates.

Next, by way of vipassanā (insight), one sees this as Anicca (Impermanent), dukkha (unsatisfactory / suffering), and Anattā (Not-self). Seeing it thus, the mind finally becomes liberated (vimutta). The mind frees itself from those five aggregates. That experience is just like dying while still alive. Now, when we normally say "dying while still alive," we mean the feeling of barely surviving a serious accident. That is not what is meant here. What does "dying while still alive" mean? It means that when death arrives, one has already let go. One has already surrendered everything. When Māra (Death) comes, everything has already been given up. Māra comes to snatch things away, but by then, everything has already been surrendered. These five aggregates have already been abandoned by the mind. Regarding some Arahants endowed with the power of jhāna and higher knowledges (abhiññā), like Venerable Dabba Mallaputta, it is mentioned in the texts how they attained final extinguishment (*pariNibbāna. Having obtained permission from the Buddha, they rose into the air and set fire to their own bodies. A person with worldly consciousness would not set fire to their own body, would they? Why is this? It is said that their entire body burned while they were in mid-air. Why was this possible? Because they had completely detached their mind from this body. Such is the wondrous liberation called the liberation of the fruit of Arahanthood (arahatta-phala-vimutti). At that moment, they placed their mind in the concentration of the fruit of Arahanthood (phala-samāpatti) which they had attained while alive. That is the secret.

To attain the Deathless in this very life, to attain it in the present life (diṭṭhadhamme), is precisely that wondrous cessation—let us call it cessation (virāma) or liberation (vimutti)—declared by the Buddha. This is the detaching of the mind. This can only be achieved through a highly powerful cognitive series of insight-knowledges (vipassanā-ñāṇa-vīthi), by seeing this arising and ceasing, and then seeing how it breaks apart. Next, by developing an apprehension and disenchantment towards it, and through the desire to be liberated from it, one deeply cultivates the three characteristics (tilakkhaṇa): Anicca (Impermanent), Dukkha (Suffering), and Anattā (Not-self). That is how this mind is freed from the five aggregates. It is mentioned in this Dhamma that this occurs in four stages or four phases: Sotāpanna (Stream-enterer), Sakadāgāmi (Once-returner), Anāgāmi (Non-returner), and Arahant. That is what we mean by "seeing Nibbāna" (seeing the stilled mind / extinction)—witnessing the cooling down. Previously, we mentioned carbon dioxide. Although that is not scientifically accurate, I used it as an analogy. If this body is completely like a burning funeral pyre, a heap of fire? All of you virtuous people know that this is not a lie. By what is the food we eat digested? By fire, indeed. It is by the fire within that this life is sustained, through the heat within. Looking at it in this way, it is exactly like a funeral pyre. In the end, what the Buddha shows here is extinguishment (Nibbāna. This heap of Dukkha (Suffering) that we accumulate through this burning, the Buddha turns into extinguishment. This is concerning the mind.

If someone has experienced that cessation (virāma) within the mind—if they have experienced those wondrous mental states of Sotāpanna, Sakadāgāmi, Anāgāmi, and Arahant in this very life—then at the moment of death, that very state presents itself. Why? If one can attain such deep states of concentration (samādhi) while the body is still here, like dying while still alive, to the extent that one is detached from the world, then at the moment of actually freeing oneself from the body, that very state naturally presents itself. This is a natural law (dhammatā). That is why, for Arahants, at their final moment, that very attainment of the fruit (phala-samāpatti) emerges almost spontaneously. This is what the Buddha declared as liberation (vimutti).

Because there are various types of analyses regarding this Nibbāna, I have tried to provide some analysis in this brief sermon. However, all of these are not things to be attained through logical reasoning. These belong to the path of direct realization. Even if one cannot do much, if one can properly contemplate each of the thirty-two parts of the body by way of tranquility (samatha), repeatedly reflecting on them to generate some power of concentration and unify the mind, then, as stated in that very Sutta, by deeply grasping the understanding that "these are things that arise and cease, these are not to be taken as 'I' or 'mine'," and by developing vipassanā (insight), one can indeed attain Arahanthood even through the first five of the thirty-two parts of the body, just as was said of Venerable Saṅkicca. It is possible even through a single part, such as hair of the head.

In this way, there is a highly wondrous dhammatā, a Dhamma here. We must consider that this path of liberation shown by the Buddha is something we can traverse according to our own capacity. In the past, those highly energetic monks and lay devotees attained that supramundane state (lokuttara) by walking on that very path, and not by merely debating about it. Thus, one must properly understand: What is its target? What is its ultimate goal? What is expected from this? It is liberation from Bhava (Becoming), the cessation of bhava (bhava-nirodha). As long as one remains in this bhava, as long as expectations remain, death is a fear. The moment of death is an occasion when everyone becomes greatly afraid. But why did Venerable Saṅkicca face death fearlessly? Because he had already conquered death. Although he used his power of concentration, perhaps out of compassion, to prevent any physical harm from the weapons through a miracle—lest the chief of the thieves lose his chance to attain Arahanthood if any harm befell him—Venerable Saṅkicca had in reality already attained the Deathless. That is how you virtuous people should understand this. You have heard many such stories. In using these stories, we try as much as possible not to merely provide the pleasure of a narrative, to intoxicate you, or to treat them like short stories. It is to challenge you virtuous people to enter the practice (paṭipadā) of this Dhamma path. It is so that even the characters in these stories help in shaping our own lives.

You virtuous people must reflect: today, based on a Dhammapada verse and its corresponding background story, we have gained some understanding of the path of liberation preached by the Buddha. We must also contemplate the virtues such as faith (saddhā) and virtue (sīla) which support us in entering upon it, as well as concentration (samādhi) as mentioned here.

Next, the things that support the attainment of Nibbāna are mentioned. These are saddhā (faith), viriya (energy / effort), sati (mindfulness), samādhi (concentration), and paññā (wisdom), which are known as spiritual faculties (indriya) and powers (bala). We must contemplate these as well. Even by listening to a Dhamma sermon such as this, some people can generate these qualities. It is these that support the attainment of Nibbāna. Faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom. That is why the Buddha declared them as spiritual powers. One must strive to develop these. Indeed, this is an era when the Buddha's Dispensation is heading towards decline, like its final stage. Yet, if wise and virtuous people properly understand their value and walk on that practice (paṭipadā), while associating with noble friends (kalyāṇa-mitta), it is still possible to escape from this extremely terrifying saṁsāra. One can still obtain the true essence, the core of this human existence. Thinking in this manner, there are those among us here who observe the ājīva-aṭṭhamaka-sīla (virtue with livelihood as the eighth) or even more valuable precepts. Having observed some level of virtue according to your capacity, restraining body and speech, and if you have focused your mind on this Dhamma sermon on this occasion, then through that, those very qualities of saddhā, viriya, sati, samādhi, and paññā must have been developed to some extent. Let us make an aspiration: using this very support, and making it a strong decisive support (upanissaya), developing them further and further, striving as much as possible through your own meditation, may this wholesome deed of listening to the Dhamma be a cause and a decisive support for realizing the supreme, noble, Great Deathless Nibbāna through the penetration (paṭivedha) of the paths and fruits (magga-phala) of Sotāpanna, Sakadāgāmi, Anāgāmi, and Arahant in this very life!

Likewise, may all beings, including the deities, from the lowest hell (Avīci) to the highest heaven (Akaniṭṭha), rejoice in this merit of listening to and preaching the Dhamma. Through their rejoicing, may they all realize the supreme, noble, Great Deathless Nibbāna through their own aspired Bodhi (awakening)! Having made this aspiration, recite these verses and share the merit.

From:

Dhammapada 318–319 (Nirayavagga)

Dear Listeners,

A life turns towards the right path precisely when a correct vision dawns upon it. Today, on this Poson Full Moon Poya Day, we commemorate the day when a correct vision arose in the lives of the people of this country. The light of Dhamma that the Great Arahant Mahinda Thera spread on that day from the summit of Mihintale Mountain brought about a massive transformation in the lives of the people of this land. They abandoned wrong view (micchā-diṭṭhi), which leads to states of misery, and embraced right view (sammā-diṭṭhi), which points the way to happy states and to Nibbāna. The two verses we have taken as our theme today were also preached by the Greatly Compassionate Buddha on an occasion when a transformation of life occurred in a group of children who held wrong views.

The followers of other religious teachers living in Savatthi saw their children playing in groups with the children of lay devotees (Upāsakas) who were disciples of the Buddha. When those children returned home, their parents made them promise not to bow down to the Sangha and not to enter Buddhist monasteries. One day, both groups of children were playing near the gate of the Jetavana Monastery. When they became thirsty, those children of wrong view said to a child of a right-view lay devotee, "Go to the monastery, drink some water, and bring some water for us too." That child entered the monastery, drank water, paid respects to the Buddha, and when he explained the reason for his coming, the Buddha said, "Child, drink your water, and then go and tell the others to come here. Do not carry water back."

Accordingly, the other children also came and drank water. As they were about to leave after drinking water, the Buddha called them close and preached the Dhamma to them. He preached to such an extent that he made their confidence (saddhā) unshakeable, established them in the refuges and precepts (saraṇa-sīla), and sent them on their way.

When these children returned home and told their parents about what had occurred, those parents began to weep and lament, saying, "Alas! Our children have fallen into a wrong view!" After wise neighbors gathered and explained things to those parents, establishing some faith in them, those parents, together with their relatives, took the children and said, "Let us hand over these children to the Ascetic Gotama himself," and went and handed them over to the Buddha. On that occasion, the Buddha preached the Dhamma to the group of parents as well, in accordance with the occasion, and inspired faith in them too. He turned them into lay devotees who had taken refuge in the Triple Gem. Coming back from time to time to listen to the Dhamma, in the end, all of them attained the stage of Stream-entry (Sotāpanna). The two verses included in the sermon delivered to those parents at that time are the very ones we have placed as our theme.

> Avajje vajjamatino, vajje ca abajjadassino,

> Micchādiṭṭhisamādānā, sattā gacchanti duggatiṃ.

The meaning is that those who have the perception of fault in the faultless, and who see the faultless in the faulty, having embraced wrong view (micchā-diṭṭhi), go to a state of misery. Next is the other verse:

> Vajjañca vajjato ñatvā, avajjañca avajjato,

> Sammādiṭṭhisamādānā, sattā gacchanti suggatiṃ.

Those who, seeing the faulty as faulty and the faultless as faultless, have established right view (sammā-diṭṭhi), go to a happy state after death.

In this short story about the little children, a valuable lesson is contained. Along with the Great Compassion of the Buddha, there is also His wisdom of skillful means (upāya-kosalla-ñāṇa). It was through a certain harmless, strategic skillful means employed in accordance with that wisdom of skillful means that the group of children of wrong view became established in right view, and their parents also became lay devotees who had taken refuge in the Triple Gem. We can understand that the Buddha, instead of just letting them drink ordinary water, made them drink the nectar of the Deathless (amā-pæn). He made them drink the nectar of the Deathless. It was not by giving them other things that He brought the confidence of these children to an unshakeable state, but by giving them the pure Dhamma, by giving them the realization of the Dhamma. On a day like today, that harmless and exemplary method employed by the Buddha is highly beneficial for this era as well.

If we consider the meaning of the verse, the Buddha has shown here the difference between wrong view and right view. This verse shows both the characteristic and the result of wrong view. What is its characteristic? The feeling that the correct thing is wrong, and seeing the wrong thing as correct. That is the characteristic of wrong view. Its result is a state of misery, a realm of downfall, hell. The characteristic of right view is seeing the wrong as wrong and the correct as correct. Its result is arriving at a happy state. Indeed, the Buddha has spoken about this wrong view with grave concern on many occasions. To what extent? On one occasion, addressing the Sangha, He declared: "Monks, I do not see any other single thing so highly detrimental in the world as wrong view. Among great wrongs, the greatest wrong is wrong view." What is the reason for this? If a person's view goes wrong, their entire conduct goes completely upside down. He shows this matter with a simile in a discourse.

On one occasion, the Buddha said to the monks: "Monks, whatever bodily action, verbal action, or mental action a person of wrong view performs—that is to say, whatever work they do through body, speech, and mind—and whatever intentions, aspirations, goals they set, if there are any preparations / Preparations / volitional activities (saṅkhāra), all of them lead to that person's harm, suffering, and detriment." Having said so, He gave a simile: "Monks, just as when a seed of nimba (neem), a seed of bitter-melon, or a seed of bitter-gourd is planted in moist soil, whatever soil nutrients and moisture that seed absorbs definitely turn bitter." In the same way, He connects it to that simile: "In this manner, if someone's view is wrong, everything else accordingly turns bitter, harsh, and harmful."

He also shows the opposite side: "For a person of right view (sammā-diṭṭhi), all bodily actions, verbal actions, and mental actions are shaped according to that view. Furthermore, that person's intentions, aspirations, goals, processes, activities, and preparations / Preparations (saṅkhāra)—every single one of them—conduce to that person's welfare, goodness, and happiness." What is the simile? "Just as when a sugarcane seed, a sugarcane cutting, a seed of hill-rice, or a grape seed is planted in moist soil, whatever soil nutrients and moisture it absorbs result only in sweet fruit." In that way, one can understand the difference between wrong view and right view. Moreover, this description is shown in a way that provides an opportunity for a person to actually examine whether their own view is correct or wrong.

Furthermore, the sutta discourses of the Tipitaka begin with the sutta called Brahmajāla. For a Buddhist who begins to read the sutta discourses, the Brahmajāla Sutta is the first great discourse they encounter. A "Brahma-net." In that discourse, the Buddha has included every wrong view that has arisen and could possibly arise in the world, pointing out, "These are they." You, merit-seekers, can observe this well; it can be shown like a supreme standard, enabling one to compare one's own view with it and see whether it is correct or wrong—just as every single fish is caught in a finely woven net. That is why it is called the Brahmajāla (The Supreme Net). As a net of views (diṭṭhi-jāla), the Buddha has compiled and shown all existing views in the world, sixty-two of them in that manner. In that discourse, the views of the wrong-view teachers of that time are shown as being "this, this, and this." In this way, because of the extreme danger of wrong view, the Buddha showed them in this manner so that we must safeguard ourselves from them. Not only those sixty-two views, but the views of the six contemporary teachers of the Buddha's time have also been subjected to criticism with reasoned arguments, because we must protect ourselves from them. A wrong view has an enticing nature; it drags one along if it is not clearly pointed out. It has a tendency to lead one astray.

It is said that there were six such teachers, teachers of the past: Pūraṇa Kassapa, Makkhali Gosāla, Ajita Kesakambalī, Pakudha Kaccāyana, Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta, and Sañjaya Belaṭṭhiputta. In this way, there were six teachers. Most of them—about four of them, such as Pūraṇa Kassapa and Makkhali Gosāla—were proponents of non-action (akiriyavāda), who rejected the doctrine of kamma. They presented a multitude of wrong views, claiming that one escapes saṃsāra without any effort, having no faith in things like merit and demerit, and saying that giving and making merit are unnecessary. They also had large groups of disciples. On many occasions, the Buddha critically refuted them by presenting reasoned arguments and debates. In particular, the teacher named Makkhali Gosāla is called a determinist (niyativādī), who claimed that everything happens spontaneously. He asserted that just as a ball of string, when thrown, rolls along until it is completely unwound, so too both the wise and the foolish run through saṃsāra for a certain period and will one day spontaneously bring an end to suffering / unsatisfactoriness / stress (dukkha) in saṃsāra. He stated that there is no need for a person to exert effort or strive, nor do they even have the capacity to do so; this happens deterministically. In this manner, it is shown. Similarly, many teachers held a view of "non-cause and non-condition" (ahētu-appaccaya), stating that a being is defiled or purified without any cause or condition, and that there is no such thing as merit or demerit. On many occasions, the Buddha, speaking specifically of the teacher Makkhali Gosāla, said: "Monks, I do not see any other single person who has arisen for the detriment of so many people as Makkhali Gosāla. Just as someone casts a net at the mouth of a river for the destruction of fish, so Makkhali Gosāla has cast a net for the destruction of human beings."

Such nets can be cast not only in those times but even in the present day. Those kinds of wrong views reject a person's capacity for action—called akiriyavāda—and have no belief in kamma and its result, claiming that these things happen spontaneously or deterministically. Likewise, on certain occasions, the Buddha also subjected the philosophy of the teacher Nigaṇṭha Nātaputta to criticism. That teacher did not reject kamma in that manner. Rather, his view was that everything happens because of past causes, because of past kamma. That too is a going to one extreme; it is an overreaching. Because that teacher's opinion was: "It is solely because of past kamma that a person experiences pleasure and pain. Therefore, this is all there is to do: by tormenting the body and undergoing self-mortification as an ascetic, one must wear out that past kamma. One must refrain from accumulating new kamma. By thus refraining from accumulation, one day kamma will be worn out." Such was the opinion held by the teacher Niganṭha Nātaputta. The Buddha Himself has described how He met his disciples, asked them if they held such an opinion, and refuted that opinion. "I ask them: 'Now, you are trying to wear out suffering by tormenting this body. Well, can you say that you have actually committed such and such evil deeds in the past? Do you have any idea about them?' 'No, we do not know.' 'Do you know how much of these sins have been worn out through this effort of tormenting the body?' 'No, not that either.' 'Do you know how much more is left to be worn out?' 'We do not know that either.' 'In that case, this effort of yours is fruitless.'" In this way, the Buddha rejected those opinions that claim everything happens solely due to past kamma.

The wrong view held by many is that there is no this world and no next world, and that everything, such as pleasure and pain, happens spontaneously. Or, as shown in another instance, they say that these things happen because of a god or a Brahma. On another occasion, the Buddha points out: "There are three doctrines. When a wise person examines these three doctrines through question and answer, they ultimately turn into a doctrine of non-action (akiriyavāda), which refutes and rejects the capacity for action." The Buddha demonstrates this in the following way: "There are some who say, 'All this happens due to past causes.' I go to them and ask, 'If so, if what you say is true, then when someone becomes a killer of living beings, a thief, one who engages in sexual misconduct, or a liar—does all of that happen because of the past? Can that be so?' But that is devoid of truth. If one says it happens solely due to past kamma, there is no place for anyone's effort or energy. Then one must simply let things happen on their own." The Buddha declares that the aforementioned Niganṭha view ultimately falls into non-action (akiriyavāda). Because of that doctrine, the unique power within a human being called desire-to-act (chanda), endeavor (vāyāma), and energy (viriya) is rejected.

The Buddha further states: "On certain occasions, since the view existed among those brahmins that Brahma created everything and that Brahma is the cause of all this pleasure and pain, I also go to them and ask: 'According to what you say, when someone becomes a killer of living beings, a thief, one who engages in sexual misconduct, a liar, or a drunkard—is all that because of the god's creation? Do you accept that?'" They have no answer to that. It is a rejection of the power of intention, effort, and desire-to-act within a person that can turn one's life towards the right path. Just as was said about Makkhali Gosāla, the idea that a being is purified or defiled without cause and condition, without any reason at all, is a completely wrong view. Yet, even during the Buddha's time, those teachers who held such views had a large number of followers. They accepted the doctrines of the six teachers who propounded non-action (akiriyavāda), the doctrine of non-cause and non-condition (ahētu-appaccaya-vāda), and so forth. Even today, there is no reason why such people cannot exist. But we must reflect that the Buddha raised these matters in the sutta discourses so that we might safeguard ourselves. If we have arrived at any conclusion regarding the Dhamma, we must compare it with these to see how far it agrees with the Buddha's view and whether it is in accordance with the Dhamma.

We can point to an example of an occasion when the Buddha, through the power of His wisdom, dispelled wrong opinions. Once, when the Buddha was residing in the Koliyan country, a certain Punna who practiced the ox-duty (gova-vatta)... By "ox-duty" it is meant that certain people in those days behaved like animals. What was the idea? Self-mortification. There was a wrong opinion that by tormenting the body, one could wear out suffering, achieve liberation, attain a happy state, or become a god or a Brahma. That too was an overreaching, or a going to an extreme—an extremist view. Punna, who practiced the ox-duty, and Seniya, who practiced the dog-duty (kukkura-vatta), came to meet the Buddha. Both of them arrived and paid respects to the Buddha, and Seniya, who practiced the dog-duty, sat down curled up just like a dog. After both had sat down, Punna spoke, "Venerable Sir," and introduced the other person like this—a custom that still exists today: "This Seniya who practices the dog-duty is an acela—that is to say, a naked ascetic—and for a long time, Seniya has been practicing this kind of difficult vow. After Seniya dies and passes away, where will he go?" he asked the Buddha. So the Buddha said, "Punna, let that question be. Do not ask that question." Then he asked a second time, and a third time. Because he asked, the Buddha said, "Well, Punna, I was not going to answer. But since you harass me, I will answer. I will tell you now." He said, "This Seniya has for a long time practiced the dog-duty, cultivated the dog-precepts, developed the dog-attitude, and cultivated a dog-mind. Therefore, due to cultivating that for a long time, after death he will be reborn among dogs." Next, He tells what happens if he does not get that: "If someone holds the view that by practicing this kind of vow one becomes a god or a Brahma, I say there are only two destinations for that person after death: hell or the animal realm. Thus, if this vow succeeds, he becomes a dog. If it fails, he goes to hell." When this was said, Seniya began to shed tears. He began to cry. Then the Buddha said to Punna, "See, Punna, that is why I did not answer. Since you harassed me, I gave this answer." Then Seniya said, "No, Blessed One, I am not crying because of that, but because I practiced this vow for such a long time."

Next, Seniya speaks: "Master Gotama, this Punna has practiced the ox-duty for a very long time. Just like an ox, he performed a very difficult practice. Where will he be reborn?" There too, the Buddha says, "Let that question be. Do not ask that." But there is no escape. Seniya asks three times. After he asked, the Buddha says, "I will tell you. Because he has practiced the ox-duty for a long time, practiced the ox-precepts, developed the ox-attitude, and generated an ox-mind, after death he will be reborn among oxen. If not, because of that wrong view, he will go to hell. Either to hell or to the animal realm." When this was said, then Punna began to cry. Then the Buddha says, "That is why, Punna, I did not answer. You are crying because I told you." Then Punna says, "No, Blessed One, it is not because the Blessed One told me. I am crying because I practiced this for such a long time. So, Blessed One, please preach the Dhamma to us in a way that we may abandon this wrong vow we have undertaken," he invited. On that occasion, the Buddha delivered a special discourse on kamma.

"Yaṃ karoti tena upapajjati"—one is reborn according to what one does. Finally, He demonstrates as a principle that the reborn person has to experience various results of kamma.

"Kammassakā sattā" / "Kammādāyādā sattā" (Beings are owners of their kamma, beings are heirs to their kamma).

When He declared in this manner that beings are heirs to their kamma, in the end, Punna became a lay devotee (Upāsaka), having gone for refuge in the Triple Gem, and Seniya, who practiced the dog-vow, was ordained in the Dispensation and finally became an Arahant. In this way, according to the discourses, there are endless instances where the Buddha, in accordance with His method of disciplining individuals, removed them from wrong views and established them in right view (sammā-diṭṭhi).

Drawing from these, we can reflect on our own view. The Buddha has declared that no matter how well one observes wrong view, if one possesses that wrong view, wrong thoughts, and incorrect ideas, and even if one perfectly observes a certain religious philosophy with corresponding speech and actions, the final result is completely in vain. To illustrate this, the Buddha has given four similes, such as someone putting sand in a boat, soaking it with water, and trying to extract oil from it—shortly put, like an effort to squeeze oil out of sand. Another one shown is like trying to milk a cow by pulling its horn; such are the fruitless efforts made by those of wrong view. It has been shown in various similes like this, such as trying to produce fire by rubbing two wet pieces of wood together. Through such similes, the Buddha explained the fruitlessness of that view.

So far, we have spoken about wrong view (micchā-diṭṭhi). Now, let us talk about right view (sammā-diṭṭhi). This right view has been analyzed in several ways in different places according to the respective themes. On one occasion, the Venerable Sāriputta asks the monks: "'Right view, right view' (sammā-diṭṭhi, sammā-diṭṭhi), so it is said. What, friends, is right view?" He asks just as a teacher would ask his students. The monks reply, "We have come from afar indeed to learn this Dhamma from the Venerable Sāriputta himself. May the answer to this occur to the Venerable Sāriputta himself." In response to that invitation, the Venerable Sāriputta delivers a long discourse, explaining what right view is. The first introduction he gives is a very simple introduction; since it is useful to everyone, let us present it at this time.

If a noble disciple knows the unwholesome and knows the root of the unwholesome, by that much alone is a person one of right view (sammā-diṭṭhi). Next, he preaches: "What is the unwholesome?" The unwholesome means killing living beings (pāṇātipāta), taking what is not given (adinnādāna), sexual misconduct (kāmesumicchācāra)—these are unwholesome actions done by body. Malicious speech (pisuṇāvācā), harsh speech (pharushāvācā), and gossip/idle chatter (samphappalāpa) are unwholesome actions done by speech. Everyone knows these; there is no need to explain them in detail. Next, there are three terms: covetousness (abhijjhā), ill-will (vyāpāda), and wrong view (micchā-diṭṭhi). These are shown as wrongs committed by mind. Abhijjhā means intense greed / covetousness. Ignorance (avijjā) means not knowing, but that is not what is meant by abhijjhā here. It is intense greed / covetousness—the intense greed of thinking about someone else's property, "Oh, if only this were mine!" Greed is bad in any case, but intense greed / covetousness is even worse. This is a wrong attitude generated within the mind itself.

Next, vyāpāda means hatred / ill-will. Next, wrong view (micchā-diṭṭhi). Wrong view is an unwholesome act committed by the mind. Thus, these are the unwholesome acts committed by body, speech, and mind. Next, he declares what the roots of these unwholesome acts are: greed (lobha), hatred (dosa), and delusion (moha). These are the unwholesome roots. Now, if you have understood that much, that is one side. Next, he declares what the wholesome is. The wholesome (kusala) means abstaining from killing living beings, abstaining from taking what is not given, abstaining from sexual misconduct, abstaining from false speech, and so on. Abstinence, which is called veramaṇī. Thus, abstinence itself is taken as the wholesome here. The unwholesome is committing wrongs, which everyone in the world easily does. The wholesome is refraining from them. This might be a problem for some because, according to current usage, many people commonly use "wholesome" (kusala) and "merit" (puñña) as synonyms. To some extent that is correct, but due to certain reasons, there are shortcomings in that as well.

Venerable Sāriputta introduces two aspects: the wholesome (kusala) and the roots of the wholesome (kusala-mūla). What are the roots of the wholesome? Non-greed (alobha), non-hatred (adosa), and non-delusion (amoha). Non-greed means detachment from greed. It does not mean it is completely gone. Bringing the mind to a state of detachment from greed, even temporarily, is a wholesome act, a skill. It is towards greed that the world is drawn. It is greed that they face. If one turns one's back on greed and performs some work, such as a meritorious act of giving, that mental strength is wholesome (kusala). It is a skill. Next, non-hatred (adosa): getting angry is the general habit. But if one can prevent it, if one can remove ill-will, that is a skill. It is easy to be swept away by that wave of wrong view (micchā); stopping it with difficulty is non-delusion (amoha)—the departure from delusion.

As we said before, because this might be a problem for some, even without elaborate details, it must be said briefly: we often use the words merit (puñña), demerit (pāpa), wholesome (kusala), and unwholesome (akusala) synonymously. However, in certain places, we have to associate this word kusala with skillfulness regarding the mind. That is the primary idea. When we say "merit and demerit" (puñña-pāpa), it is their results, their vipāka—pleasant results and painful results—that mostly come to mind. In kusala, there is a deeper meaning than that, which is described as skillfulness. To what extent? Here, Venerable Sāriputta speaks of "roots of the wholesome" (kusala-mūla) and "roots of the unwholesome" (akusala-mūla), but there is never any usage such as "roots of merit" (puñña-mūla) or "roots of demerit" (pāpa-mūla). No one can point to any usage of "roots of merit" or "roots of demerit" in these books. But "roots of the wholesome" and "roots of the unwholesome" are indeed mentioned. From this fact, one can reflect on something. Wholesomeness (kusala) is a deep concept. It is the turning around of our mental energy, which otherwise runs in the wrong direction in saṃsāra. That is why we always say to repeat the word veramaṇī with some strength when undertaking the precepts. Veramaṇī is abstinence, detachment. That is indeed the difficult part.

Well, having begun to analyze the wholesome and unwholesome in this simple manner, Venerable Sāriputta finally shows at a deep level what this right view (sammā-diṭṭhi) is. Indeed, as we all know, the ultimate goal of this Buddha-Dispensation is liberation from this perilous saṃsāra. That is no easy task. The right view (sammā-diṭṭhi) that only a Buddha reveals to the world is the natural truth of the Four Noble Truths, namely Dukkha (Suffering), samudaya (origin), nirodha (cessation), and magga (path). These entire five aggregates of grasping (pañcupādānakkhandha)—form, feeling / sensation (vedanā), perception, preparations / Preparations (saṅkhāra), and consciousness (viññāṇa), which we call "I" and "mine"—are purely suffering / unsatisfactoriness / stress (dukkha). Generally, omitting that part, we often say that birth is suffering, aging is suffering, sickness is suffering. We think of stopping just by saying that much. But the Buddha does not end there. After saying those things, He says in brief that the entire five aggregates of grasping are suffering / unsatisfactoriness / stress (dukkha). Because this is generally understood only partially, the Buddha declared concerning the truth of suffering (dukkha-sacca) that it is "to be fully understood" (pariññeyya), meaning it must be completely comprehended. An ordinary person has only a partial understanding of suffering. But the Buddha says "pariññeyya"—one fully comprehends it, knows it thoroughly. When one understands that, the entire five aggregates are completely included. That is the truth of suffering (dukkha-sacca).

Next, as its cause, the origin of suffering (dukkha-samudaya) means the cause. As the cause of suffering, the Buddha points to craving / thirst (taṇhā). Underlying the suffering of anything and everything is craving / thirst (taṇhā). Next is the eradication of that craving / thirst. The stilled mind, the quenching of that thirst obtained by its eradication, is shown as Nibbāna. That is the peace attainable in this very life. Next, the path to it is shown as the Noble Eightfold Path.

What is meant by this "correctness"? Everyone has a view regarding life. There is what is called a philosophy of life. The drunkard’s philosophy is about alcohol. The fisherman’s philosophy is about fish. In various ways, each has their own philosophy of life. Correct vision according to the Dhamma is shown in two ways: kammassakatā sammā-diṭṭhi (right view of ownership of kamma) and magga sammā-diṭṭhi (right view of the Path). Kammassakatā means that kamma is one's own. The Buddha declares: if a being in saṃsāra takes these aforementioned five aggregates of grasping and performs any action, there are results (vipāka) of that action. One cannot escape those results. Some clever scholars ask, "If this is not-self / non-self / unsubstantial (anattā), how can we talk about a result?" But that is not the truth. The Buddha declares that here we have a deep natural law of the mind. Truly speaking, the natural law of dependent co-arising (paṭicca-samuppāda) is present here as a heap of preparations / Preparations (saṅkhāra) arising due to ignorance (avijjā). Taking the five aggregates of grasping, one is driven to a course of action. The results of that activity must inevitably be experienced, whether as pleasure or as pain. That is what we call kamma and its result (vipāka).

What the Buddha shows as the ten-fold view (dasavatthuka-diṭṭhi) is His assertion of "there is, there is" against the nihilistic view (nātthika-diṭṭhi) of Makkhali Gosāla and others who say "there is not, there is not." There is this world, there is the next world; there is mother, there is father; there are results of wholesome and unwholesome deeds; there are ascetics and brahmins who have a correct understanding of this world; there are results of treating parents well, and so forth. Why does the Buddha show these? Because from that standpoint, a person can go to a happy state. If they take the other standpoint, they go to a state of misery. That is what is there. Yet, even that is still within saṃsāra.

What helps one to escape from saṃsāra is the realization of the truth. That is called the right view of the Path (magga sammā-diṭṭhi). This is the realization that these five aggregates of grasping are suffering / unsatisfactoriness / stress (dukkha); the cause of this is craving / thirst (taṇhā); and the quenching of that craving / thirst is happiness. One must actually experience that attainment. It is at the stage of Stream-entry (Sotāpanna) that this becomes directly realized by a person. Next, the path, the practice that helps one to achieve this, is the Noble Eightfold Path.

Now, many have heard that indulgence in sensual pleasures (kāmasukhallikānuyoga) is one extreme. Tormenting the body is the other extreme. Everyone has heard that between these two lies the Middle Way (majjhimā paṭipadā), which is the Noble Eightfold Path. That is exactly what is said here. The Buddha has declared a wonderful Dhamma that goes right down the middle, transcending all those views. To that right view (sammā-diṭṭhi), both of those aspects belong. One does not go to the extreme of annihilationism (uccheda); one does not go to the extreme of saying "it ends here, so there are no results for killing animals, theft, and so on." If one has assumed responsibility in saṃsāra, in performing wholesome and unwholesome deeds, one has to accept that there are results according to that responsibility. On the other hand, it goes further: in reality, here there is only a collection of causes and conditions. This must be understood through wisdom. It is when this is seen through wisdom that liberation is obtained. This is called the Path right view (magga sammā-diṭṭhi). It is those who confuse these two who sometimes present distorted ideas about this Dhamma. Thus, if a complete right view (sammā-diṭṭhi) of both sides has arisen in someone, thoughts and intentions arise in accordance with it.

Right view, right thoughts, right speech, right action, right livelihood, right effort, right mindfulness, and right concentration—this is how those Pali terms have been translated into Sinhala. They are sammā-diṭṭhi, sammā-saṅkappa, sammā-vācā, sammā-kammanta, sammā-ājīva, sammā-vāyāma, sammā-sati, and sammā-samādhi. When you, merit-seekers, reflect on this, you will see how systematic it is. A person's life is completely transformed. View is what is important there. If the view goes wrong, it ends up in wrong concentration (micchā-samādhi). If it is correct, one achieves right concentration (sammā-samādhi) and, through that, can attain one's liberation. Thus, what Venerable Sāriputta finally gave concerning right view (sammā-diṭṭhi) was the right view concerning the truth.

Now, we are gradually moving towards the side of Nibbāna. On one occasion, the Buddha declared: "Monks, right view (sammā-diṭṭhi) is twofold." For beings bound to saṃsāra who are unable to bring an end to suffering in this life, He introduced the ten-fold right view of ownership of kamma (kammassakatā sammā-diṭṭhi), which helps them to turn away from the path to misery and go to happy states. That is "accompanied by taints, siding with merit, ripening on the side of acquisition" (sāsavā puññabhāgiyā upadhivepakkā). It is accompanied by taints (āsava). Taints mean the taint of sensual desire (kāmāsava), the taint of existence (bhavāsava), and the taint of ignorance (avijjāsava), which you, merit-seekers, might have heard of—these saṃsāric habits we have formed. Being drawn to sensual pleasures, being drawn to existence / becoming (bhava), being drawn to views—in this way, caught in certain currents, we travel on this saṃsāric journey. This right view is accompanied by taints. However, puññabhāgiyā means it sides with merit. The aforementioned view of Makkhali Gosāla and others is apuññabhāgiyā, or rather, it goes to the side of sin / demerit; it drags one down to states of misery. But from this right view, a person can obtain a small opening to a happy state. In this perilous saṃsāra, if one obtains at least a human state, a divine state, or even a Brahma state, instead of going to hell, there is some degree of peace. It does not mean one is completely freed. But if one goes to states of misery—to the ghost realm or to hell—one cannot rise again for aeons. There too, the Buddha points to the Middle Way. Thus, there is no prohibition for a saṃsāric being to establish themselves on that standpoint and perform meritorious deeds according to the aforementioned right view of ownership of kamma. It does not end there. Through that, one can obtain happy states in this becoming / existence (bhava) and realize Nibbāna. Therefore...

The term upadhi (acquisitions / assets / fuel) also needs to be explained. Upadhi means the worldly assets, possessions, and resources that support a person as accessories once they are born. These are things that help sustain a life. Because they lack these, there are people who spend their entire lives begging in misery, solely to keep body and soul together. For them, there is no opportunity even to think of religious or spiritual progress. Even if we preach the Dhamma, it does not penetrate. What is meant (by upadhivepakkā) is that it brings about these assets and resources (upadhi). Now, what happens to many people is that they confuse these two.

Next, when speaking of escaping saṃsāra at a deep level, that second right view (sammā-diṭṭhi) is introduced thus: "Atthi, bhikkhave, sammā-diṭṭhi ariyā anāsavā lokuttarā maggāṅgā"—the right view that is noble, taintless, supramundane, and a factor of the Path. That is the truth; in it, there is no talk of a self. There is no talk of "I" and "mine." It is purely a mass of suffering / unsatisfactoriness / stress (dukkha). Purely a mass of suffering. When some people take to intellectual debates, they speak of the Four Noble Truths. Yet, in their day-to-day lives, they remain at that lower level. It is when these two are confused that many people even reject merit and demerit. These are called intellectual overreachings; they are overreachings. The Buddha clearly shows that here too, there is a middle path. We have reminded you, merit-seekers, on many occasions: a person crossing a swift current must cross the stream at a middle pace, neither struggling excessively nor stopping. It is something like that. In this saṃsāra, the swift currents of sensual desire (kāmogha) and the current of existence / becoming (bhavogha) are flowing. A person trying to cross this cannot simply leap from this side to the other, even if they wish to do so. Allowing some leeway to the wave, one must cross to the other side carefully, neither struggling excessively nor stopping.

According to that vision, the Buddha shows that beings living in the world must obtain some opening through meritorious deeds. We must remember that whatever wholesome kamma, whatever merit, has granted us at least this human state of existence is gradually wearing away. We have made plans on how to spend the income we earn once a month on payday. This is visible in the budgets of these times. However, we do not see that the merit which granted us this human state, this comfort, is running out. We squander it by dancing, singing, and playing music. Meanwhile, without our even knowing, the moment the merit runs out, if we are in the sky, we will fall straight onto the road along with that luxury vehicle. If we are on a ship, we will sink to the bottom of the sea. Coinciding with the exhaustion of wholesome kamma, the unwholesome kamma surfaces. Some evil deed done in the distant past will surface and yield its result (vipāka). It is because of this perilous situation that the Buddha urged us to be diligent (appamāda) in performing meritorious deeds. Thus, it was the very Buddha who preached that profound Dhamma who also spoke about merit and demerit. It was no one else. That word of the Buddha is in accordance with the aforementioned Middle Way (majjhimā paṭipadā). No matter how much we say, intellectuals think that just because they have studied books, they stand upon this truth. Yet, unless they possess the Dhamma-eye (dhamma-cakkhu), they have not realized the Four Noble Truths. We often mention only half of suffering / unsatisfactoriness / stress (dukkha), compartmentalizing suffering. Only this much is suffering, and the other part is pleasure, so we think.

But the Buddha says that there is nothing here to be taken up. The five aggregates of grasping (pañcupādānakkhandha) are solely (kevala) a mass of suffering / unsatisfactoriness / stress (dukkha). This realization must be reached through meditation, not merely by reading books. It is reached by looking at this body through the Four Establishments of Mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna), by looking at feelings / sensations (vedanā), by looking at the mind, and by looking at the mental qualities (dhamma) that arise in the mind—by watching their coming and going. That is where impermanence (anicca) reveals itself. Every single one of these is impermanent / inconstant (anicca). You, merit-seekers, have heard that what the Buddha said about this entire existence / becoming (bhava) is summarized in three words: "aniccaṃ dukkhaṃ anattā." "Yadaniccaṃ taṃ dukkhaṃ, yaṃ dukkhaṃ tadanattā"—in that way, they are connected. Whatever is impermanent / inconstant is suffering / unsatisfactoriness / stress (dukkha); because of its shaking, changing nature, it is suffering. Whatever is suffering, no one wishes to claim as "I" or "mine." It cannot be kept under one's control.

Now, although that truth exists in mere words, one must realize it directly for oneself through the establishments of mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna). It is at that moment that the Four Noble Truths are understood. That is why it is "noble" (ariya); that is what is meant by attaining the noble state. It is "taintless" (anāsava); at that moment, one is freed from the power of those taints (āsava), even if for a single moment. What is called directly realizing Nibbāna is, in truth, if the mind has been liberated even for a moment through the power of Path-knowledge (magga-ñāṇa), one has seen this not-self / non-self / unsubstantial (anattā) nature, this void nature, the emptiness of the world, right through those taints. At that moment, one has directly realized it for a split second. It cannot be shown to anyone else. It is something to be realized by oneself. "Supramundane, noble, taintless" (lokuttarā ariyā anāsavā). Crossing over the world—crossing over the world is not like going from this country to a foreign country. Supramundane (lokuttara) means a state that has transcended this worldliness. The worldly are swept away, submerged under those aforementioned currents.

A person who has practiced insight meditation (vipassanā-bhāvanā) for a long time might, perhaps even while listening to a discourse delivered by the Buddha according to His meditation instructions, in a single moment, attain this very realization within the mind through that insight meditation. If it is understood at any such moment, that is "supramundane" (lokuttara)—it is a supramundane state. It is a Path factor (maggāṅga)—it is the Path, the Eightfold Path. Indeed, we have practiced the Noble Eightfold Path in retail fashion, so to speak, in our day-to-day lives. The moment when it aligns perfectly in depth, from right view (sammā-diṭṭhi) up to right concentration (sammā-samādhi), is that very moment of realizing the Path and Fruit (magga-phala). That is called the Path-consciousness (magga-citta). That is why the Buddha called it maggāṅga (Path factor). The moment of profound realization of the Four Noble Truths occurs precisely as a Path factor. It is not something that can be understood through logic. That is the deep-level right view (sammā-diṭṭhi). That is why the Buddha declared right view to be twofold.

The Middle Way (majjhimā paṭipadā) declared by the Buddha is a highly wondrous teaching because there is a vast depth within it. Generally, we think that we have freed ourselves from indulgence in sensual pleasures (kāmasukhallikānuyoga) and from self-mortification (attakilamathānuyoga), and that this alone constitutes the Middle Way. Yet, the Buddha has shown it even more deeply in various places. To the brahmin named Kaccāyana, the Buddha declares: "'Everything exists'—this, Kaccāyana, is one extreme. 'Everything does not exist'—this is the second extreme. Without falling into either of these extremes, without approaching them, the Tathāgata preaches the Dhamma by the middle." Next, He shows that Middle Way as dependent co-arising (paṭicca-samuppāda)—that profound teaching that there is an arising based on causes and conditions, and that by removing those causes and conditions, there is a cessation. Arising and ceasing; origin and cessation (samudaya-nirodha); rise and fall (udaya-vaya). In this way, regarding this world—regarding everything physical, bodily, and mental in the world—there is only a series of arisings and ceasings. Impermanence / Inconstancy (aniccatā) is understood as an arising and a ceasing. That is why in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, the Buddha invites one to experience this directly.

Let us take mindfulness of breathing (ānāpānasati), which everyone knows. What is mindfulness of breathing? It is establishing mindfulness on our in-breaths and out-breaths. By establishing mindfulness, as it goes deeper and deeper, one understands: "There is no 'I' here who breathes. There is only a filling and an emptying. An emptying and a filling." When the emptying is finished, there is a desire to fill. Next, having filled, it cannot be maintained; it has to be expelled next. So, existence is found between these two. This is true not only of in-breaths and out-breaths, but of everything else as well. No matter how delicious the food we eat, even when we go to banquets and five-star hotels, where does even that food, where does everything end up? The delicious drinks we consume... we must contemplate all of these.

That is what the Buddha told us to make our objects of contemplation in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta. This is not something strange. This is not something to be seen by going to a laboratory. Consciousness (viññāṇa) is not something that can be understood through physical experiments. Its magical/illusionary nature must be realized by oneself through the establishments of mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna). No one can display consciousness (viññāṇa) with any kind of instrument. That is why the Buddha declared: "I do not see any other single thing that changes so quickly as this mind." One can measure the speed of the body's arising and ceasing, but the arising and ceasing nature of the mind cannot be seen by an ordinary person. Some present various similes, like seeing a circle of fire when a whirling brand is spun. Similarly, this mind spins extremely rapidly. That is the greatest myth. The view, the illusion, grasps it as "I." The world dwells within that. It is experienced in that very way—the two aspects of arising and ceasing. Seeing these two aspects of arising and ceasing, as one gradually understands its impermanent / inconstant (anicca) nature, a disillusionment (nibbidā) arises towards it. That cannot be prevented. As that disillusionment grows, the realization also becomes purified, because it is out of attachment that one grasps this. As disillusionment grows, realization arises and becomes pure. Realization is defiled by craving / thirst (taṇhā), desire, and so forth. Therefore, when these are removed, the mind comes to equanimity (upekkhā). Without bringing the mind to equanimity, we cannot understand the truth.

That is why this virtue (sīla) is needed. That is why concentration (samādhi) is needed—to calm the mind. To the extent that one removes what are called unwholesome deeds and wrongs and purifies the mind, wisdom (paññā) finally dawns. According to the Dhamma of the Buddha, that wisdom means understanding the principle that whatever has the nature to arise, all that has the nature to cease. When any poor person, any destitute person, attains the path of Stream-entry (sotāpanna-magga), that person is described as an expert—an expert in the Dhamma. As the principle of that expert knowledge they have attained, "yaṃ kiñci samudayadhammaṃ sabbaṃ taṃ nirodhadhammaṃ"—whatever is of the nature to arise, all that is of the nature to cease—that person has already directly realized. Because they saw for a moment that this form, feeling / sensation (vedanā), perception, preparations / Preparations (saṅkhāra), and this mind called consciousness (viññāṇa), which they are grasping and holding as "mine," have all ceased for a moment. They ceased precisely because that aforementioned grasping was removed. It is due to grasping that we see this not as a collection, but as solid things, owing to the perception of solidity (ghana-saññā). But when, through wisdom, a person realizes at some point that the moment grasping is abandoned, there is nothing left here—then they deeply understand: "Here it is impermanent / inconstant (anicca), suffering / unsatisfactoriness / stress (dukkha), and not-self / non-self / unsubstantial (anattā)." There lies liberation. There is the supramundane state. This cannot be understood through machines or by logic. That is why it is called a Dhamma that is beyond logical reasoning (atakkāvacara).

The Buddha shows a quality of the Dhamma, "paccattaṃ veditabbo viññūhī"—to be personally realized by the wise. Even the Buddha cannot simply hand the knowledge of the Stream-entry path to someone. He can only show the way, and by looking at that person's past kamma, past character, inclinations and underlying tendencies (āsaya-anusaya), and character traits, He can hasten that realization by delivering a suitable discourse. But the Buddha cannot give that realization like giving an object to someone. It must be generated within oneself. If one has sufficient past practice, it takes only a short time. Otherwise, one must strive for it. One must be prepared to work hard for it. One should not think that this can be obtained in a day, a week, from books, or merely by listening to a sermon. It is only when one thinks of this as a difficult thing that one can actually achieve it. On one hand, we must develop the perception that "it is possible." But we must not make this out to be too easy. We must exert that effort; in reality, only when one realizes it is something that can be done with effort does the endeavor apply. Otherwise, if one thinks: "I have obtained so many degrees, I am a world-renowned wise person, a scholar, this is a very minor thing for me; if I want, I can obtain this in a short time after I retire"—then that is wrong. What one must think is that one has to dedicate one's entire life to this. Because for all this time, we have traveled in this saṃsāra due to the lack of this realization, this supramundane right view (sammā-diṭṭhi). Therefore, without having too much pride in oneself, one must humbly enter this path of practice, starting from virtues like precepts, just as you, merit-seekers, have done today.

The Buddha Himself has declared that this saṃsāra is like a swamp. One must think of constructing a small platform to sit on for meditation in this swamp. Planting five pillars represents the Five Precepts; planting eight pillars represents the Eight Precepts; planting ten pillars represents the Ten Precepts. Having constructed a small platform in this manner, reflecting on that virtue, generating a concentrated mind, and relying on the meditation subject to concentrate the mind—then, as shown by the Buddha, regarding the Three Characteristics of impermanent / inconstant (anicca), suffering / unsatisfactoriness / stress (dukkha), and not-self / non-self / unsubstantial (anattā): insight meditation (vipassanā) is not merely repeating these words. We have reminded you on many occasions that insight is not saying, but seeing. For that seeing, we must engage in Satipaṭṭhāna as a meditation. Contemplate according to this body. Through contemplating according to the body, when looking with mindfulness and clear comprehension (sati-sampajañña), the reality of the body is seen. Next, feelings / sensations (vedanā), the mind...

...and the mental qualities (dhamma) that arise in the mind. To put it briefly, the Four Establishments of Mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna), the factors of awakening (bojjhaṅga), and the thirty-seven factors of awakening (bodhipakkhiya-dhamma) declared by the Buddha are not things confined to books. These are things to be generated within ourselves. Only to the extent that we develop them will we be able to attain direct realization within ourselves. Everyone keeps precepts, develops concentration, and meditates in order to escape from this highly perilous saṃsāric suffering of birth / arising (jāti), decay / aging, sickness, and death (jarāmaraṇa).

Today is the valuable Poson Full Moon Poya Day. We speak a lot about protecting the Buddha-Dispensation; the sound of it is heard everywhere. But this is a Dispensation that must be protected from within. Without practicing these principles, protecting anything else is useless. The Buddha-Dispensation will not endure. Therefore, by walking on this path of Dhamma, if one directly realizes it for oneself to the extent of being able to help others as well, only then can the Buddha-Dispensation truly be preserved.

Therefore, with such a deep intention, this merit-seeking group, having engaged in undertaking the precepts today, practicing meditation to the best of your ability with the association of noble friends (kalyāṇa-mitta), and listening to this Dhamma—may this accumulated store of wholesomeness strengthen your aspirations! Relying further on this very wholesome power, may this merit of listening to the Dhamma be a supportive condition for directly realizing the supreme, deathless Nibbāna through the penetration of the Paths and Fruits of Stream-entry (Sotāpanna), Once-returning (Sakadāgāmi), Non-returning (Anāgāmi), and Arahatship! I make this aspiration.

From Avīci hell up to the Akaniṭṭha heaven, if there be any being who wishes to rejoice in this merit of Dhamma-preaching and Dhamma-listening, may they all, by so rejoicing, realize the supreme, deathless Nibbāna through their aspired state of Awakening (Bodhi)! Likewise, may all your relatives and friends, and all beings of the world, realize that nectar-like, supreme, deathless Nibbāna! With this aspiration, recite these verses:

Apaṇṇaka Jātaka (Jātaka No. 1)

Dear Listeners,

The Buddha points out to us that the difference between the wise person and the foolish person can be understood according to the course of action they take when faced with a problem. The wise person looks at a problem and arrives at conclusions in a manner entirely different from how the foolish person looks at a problem and the conclusions they draw. Because of this very reason, where the foolish person meets ruin, the wise person secures their own progress. In this Dhamma, it is the practice of those wise ones that is known as the apaṇṇaka practice (the safe or non-erring path).

The verse from the Apaṇṇaka Jātaka which mentions that wise practice is what we have chosen as our theme. In the Jātaka book, the Apaṇṇaka Jātaka is presented first, like the letter 'A' of the alphabet. This could be due to its foundational theoretical value. Everyone knows the story of the Apaṇṇaka Jātaka. Its background story (nidāna) exists as a narrative. The occasion on which this Jātaka story was preached is mentioned in the Apaṇṇaka Jātaka as follows. At a time when the Buddha, the Teacher of the Three Worlds, was residing in Sāvatthi, the householder Anāthapiṇḍika came to see the Buddha along with five hundred of his friends who were followers of other sects (tīrthaka). Having arrived and heard the Dhamma from the Buddha, all five hundred of those followers of other sects abandoned their sectarian refuge and took refuge in the Triple Gem. After that, they frequently came to Jetavana monastery with the householder Anāthapiṇḍika. They listened to the Dhamma, gave alms, and observed the precepts. After some time, the Buddha journeyed from Sāvatthi to Rājagaha.

After He had departed, all five hundred who were previously sectarian followers abandoned their refuge in the Triple Gem and once again took refuge in their sectarian teachers. Having done so, when the Buddha returned to Sāvatthi seven or eight months later, the householder Anāthapiṇḍika came to meet the Buddha with these five hundred people and revealed this matter, in a way that made those sectarian followers feel somewhat ashamed. On that occasion, the Buddha, having declared the value of taking refuge in the Triple Gem in various ways, explained that in the past too, certain people, by taking that which is not a refuge as a refuge, fell prey to demons (yakshas) in a wilderness infested by non-humans and were destroyed.

When this was declared, the householder Anāthapiṇḍika requested the Buddha to relate that story of the past. The story of the past is as follows. You all know how Jātaka stories begin. In the past, when King Brahmadatta was ruling in the city of Benares in the kingdom of Kāsi, the Bodhisatta was born into a merchant family. Having reached young adulthood, he earned his living as a merchant traveling through deserts with five hundred carts. In ancient books, he is called a caravan leader (sātthu-nāyaka), which in modern terms means a cart caravan leader. He was engaged in trade as a caravan leader. In that same city of Benares, there was another merchant who was rather foolish. He too was someone who traveled through deserts with five hundred carts. On one occasion, the Bodhisatta loaded his carts with valuable goods from Benares and prepared to cross the desert to a distant city. At that very moment, the foolish merchant also prepared to go at the same time with his five hundred carts. Then the Bodhisatta thought: "If both of our groups go together, the road will not be sufficient for a thousand carts. The men will not get enough water, and the oxen will not get enough grass. Either I must go first, or this merchant must go first." Thinking thus, he went to the foolish merchant and asked, "Will you go first, or shall I?" The foolish merchant calculated the benefits of going first in this way: "I can lead my carts on a road that is not yet muddy. There will be plenty of grass for the oxen. The men will also be able to get edible leaves. Going first, we can obtain clean, unmuddy water. Furthermore, I can fix the price of the goods as I wish." Seeing five such benefits, he declared, "I will go first."

The Bodhisatta saw the advantages of going afterwards. He reasoned: "Once these merchants have gone and prepared the path, making the uneven places even, my journey will be easy. Also, when their oxen have eaten the mature grass, my oxen will get the tender young grass. Similarly, my men will get sweet edible leaves. Furthermore, as for water, since they would have gone ahead and dug wells in waterless places, we too can obtain water from them. Additionally, haggling over prices is a taxing task, like a slaughter; therefore, it is easier for me to sell my goods at the prices already established by them." Seeing five advantages in that direction, he agreed, saying, "Very well, I shall go afterwards." So, the foolish merchant, having filled his carts with water, set off. Deserts without water are called waterless deserts (nirudaka) in the books. Udaka means water. There are waterless deserts as well as deserts infested by non-humans. This was a desert that was both waterless and infested by non-humans. When these foolish merchants had reached the middle of the desert, the demon (yaksha) infesting that desert thought of making this caravan discard their water to weaken them, so that he could devour them along with their oxen. He assumed the guise of a great lord and, accompanied by a group of about ten or twelve, came in a carriage. This group wore lotus flowers, chewed lotus stalks, with their hair and garments dripping wet, and had mud on their bodies, looking exactly as if they were coming from a region plentiful in water. Coming forward, he engaged in friendly conversation with the foolish merchant. The merchant asked, "Is there water in the direction you are coming from?" "Oh, it is raining heavily there, there are lakes and ponds," praised the demon. When asked, "What is in those carts at the back?" the merchant replied, "Water." "Why are you carrying that water? There is plenty of water in that direction. You do not need to pull that load in these carts," said the demon.

Listening to the demon's words, these foolish merchants broke their water pots, threw away the water in the carts, and went forward. But contrary to their expectations, there was no water. Both men and oxen stopped the carts at night and lay down exhausted. During the night, the demons came from the demon city and devoured everyone, including the oxen, leaving only their bones. That was the fate of the foolish merchant. Next, about a month and a half after the foolish merchants had left, the Bodhisatta also set out with his five hundred carts. When he reached the middle of the desert, the same demon came in the same manner to deceive the Bodhisatta, saying, "There is plenty of water in this area, throw away your water and go." The Bodhisatta immediately recognized that this was a demon, thinking, "Because of the redness of his eyes and the absence of a shadow, this must be a demon." The Bodhisatta said, "I will not throw away the water I have without seeing other water." Standing firm on that principle, he said, "It does not matter if the load is a bit heavy for us. We will carry it." Thus, the demon's plan did not succeed.

As the Bodhisatta proceeded along that road, a discussion arose among the people: "Why are we carrying such a heavy load? That person said there is water ahead, didn't he?" The Bodhisatta stopped all the carts, gathered his men, and asked, "Have you ever heard of lakes or ponds in this desert?" "No," they replied. "And if it is raining, how far away do you feel the rain-wind and cold?" "About a league (yojana)," they said. "Do you feel them now? Do you hear thunder? Do you hear it rumbling? Do you see lightning?" When he asked this, the men had no answers. He said, "Understand that it was a demon who came. Therefore, let us continue our journey forward." Having persuaded them, they went forward. When they went, in the middle of the desert they saw those five hundred carts standing intact, and piles of bones everywhere. They realized the truth of the Bodhisatta's words—that the demons had devoured them. That night, having organized strong security arrangements, and having advised his men, saying, "Do not throw away the water, use it sparingly," they took the better carts in place of their own broken ones. They reached their destination safely, sold their goods, made a profit, and returned. That is what is related in that Jātaka story.

Next, the Buddha, by way of presenting the underlying principle of the story, declared the short verse which we have taken as our theme. We have to understand it by adding a few more words.

Apaṇṇakaṃ ṭhānameke, dutiyaṃ āhu takkikā;

Etadaññāya medhāvī, taṃ gaṇhe yadapaṇṇakaṃ.

What it says is: some wise people adopt that matter, that practice, which is called 'apaṇṇaka'—let us keep the word as it is. "Dutiyaṃ āhu takkikā"—those who are slaves to logic (takkikā) accept the second position. Now, the word apaṇṇaka is often understood as the non-erring, safe path. Accordingly, wise people adopt the non-erring practice, while those mentioned second adopt the erring path. The wise person (medhāvī), having correctly understood this matter—that is, the difference between these two practices, the difference between good and bad, right and wrong—follows the advice: "taṃ gaṇhe yadapaṇṇakaṃ", meaning he acts in accordance with that apaṇṇaka practice. This is the instruction contained in this verse.

At the conclusion of that story, the Buddha identified the characters, stating that the foolish merchant was Devadatta and the wise merchant was Himself. When we reflect upon this story, we can understand that between the practices of those two, the foolish merchant believed the words of the demon exactly as they were spoken. If we look at it from the perspective of logic, there were signs of someone coming from a place where it was raining. "Therefore, let us throw away the water and go"—that was all he thought. He acted without foresight. But the Bodhisatta not only recognized the demon as a demon; he also did not believe his words outright. Furthermore, he thought: "Why should we throw away the water we have carried without seeing other water? Even though it is somewhat heavy and troublesome, whether it turns out to be right or wrong, let us keep it." It is this very principle of "whether it turns out to be right or wrong" that is contained in this apaṇṇaka practice. Some foolish people, just because someone says so, would say, "Alright then, let us throw away the water and go." Our elders may have heard the saying: "Seeing fleeing deer, do not throw away the harvested leaves." A saying that fits this apaṇṇaka practice has been absorbed into our literature too: do not throw away the edible leaves you have already gathered just because you see deer running past. In the same way, one should not throw away the water in one's possession merely because someone says there is water ahead.

Moreover, this Bodhisatta merchant saw the benefits of going second in a way different from the foolish merchant. Also, when explaining things to his followers, he thought deeply and wisely considered whether it was really raining or not before making a decision. That is the apaṇṇaka practice. Therefore, even though it was troublesome, they carried the water. But in truth, he did not err. It might have seemed like an error initially. These are the valuable points contained within the apaṇṇaka practice. From this point on, we must add a few more details to this. We said earlier that the Apaṇṇaka Jātaka is placed at the very beginning of the collection due to some theoretical value. We can say, by way of a simile at this point, that just as the Bodhisatta, standing firm on the apaṇṇaka practice as a Bodhisatta, led his followers safely through the waterless desert infested by non-humans, the Buddha, the Teacher of the Three Worlds, after His Enlightenment, presented a non-erring practice in the Dhamma under the name apaṇṇaka that leads all the way to Nibbāna. It is that portion we are going to discuss next.

There is a valuable discourse that reveals this. Today, there is a discourse in the Majjhima Nikāya called the Apaṇṇaka Sutta which is highly worth studying for rationalists. This discourse is somewhat deep, and it is something very valuable for intellectuals to investigate. The background story in it is as follows. On one occasion, while wandering on tour with a large community of monks, the Buddha arrived at a Brahmin village called Sālā. The Brahmins of Sālā had heard the widespread report of the Buddha's fame, such as "Itipi so bhagavā...", and thinking that it is wonderful to see an Arahant like the Buddha, this group of Brahmins came to see Him. When they arrived, the Buddha asked, "Householders, is there any agreeable teacher in whom you have placed your faith after investigating the facts?" This group replied, "No, we do not have such a teacher in whom we have established faith." The Buddha declared: "Householders, here the term ākāravatī saddhā (reasoned faith) is mentioned. Reasoned faith is the faith that is developed after investigating the facts. If you do not have a teacher in whom you have established reasoned faith, you should adopt and practice the apaṇṇaka practice. Standing firm on and practicing the apaṇṇaka practice will lead to your welfare and happiness for a long time. And what, householders, is this apaṇṇaka practice?"

Now, what follows relates to the apaṇṇaka practice. "Householders, there are some ascetics and Brahmins who put forward this view, this opinion: 'There is nothing given, nothing offered... there are no spontaneously arisen beings; there are no ascetics and Brahmins in the world who have correctly understood and declared both this world and the world beyond.' That which was said to exist is denied there, and what is described is what is known in the Dhamma as the 'right view of ownership of action' (kammassakatā sammādiṭṭhi). You may have heard of the ten-point right view. Next, the Buddha states: 'Householders, these two groups express mutually contradictory views.' He analyzes and explains each of these as follows. Regarding those ascetics and Brahmins who previously presented the nihilistic view (nātthika diṭṭhi), because they do not accept good and bad, we can expect this kind of conduct from them: they abandon bodily, verbal, and mental good conduct, and engage in bodily, verbal, and mental misconduct. They do not know the danger in misconduct or the benefit in good conduct, nor do they know how the mind is defiled or purified by them. Therefore, they remain in that position and conduct their lives according to that practice. The Buddha continues further, by way of showing the danger of this: if there is indeed a world beyond—whereas their view is that there is not—then their view turns out to be a wrong view. Their thoughts and intentions become wrong thoughts (micchā saṅkappa). Furthermore, in their conduct, they say things opposed to the words of the Noble Ones (Ariyas). Moreover, by trying to propagate their view to others, they propagate the false Dhamma. In this way, the side of danger is shown. There are these various dangers in holding such a wrong view. Also, those who hold that wrong view tend to praise themselves and disparage others. Showing five such dangers, the Buddha summarizes them. Now, those who held that nihilistic view, from the very beginning, rejected the virtue of good conduct (susīla) and embraced bad conduct (dussīla), showing that they possess wrong view, wrong thoughts, wrong speech, and so on.

Next, how a wise person looks at this matter is shown. This wise person looks at their practice and view and thinks: "If the view of these people is correct, if indeed there is no such thing as sacrifice or offering, and there is no world beyond, then after death, they will not face any trouble. However, if by any chance the opinion they hold is wrong, they will arise in a state of deprivation, in hell. Not only that; even if their view were correct, in this very life wise people censure them, saying: 'These people are of bad conduct, they hold wrong views.' This is called 'ubhayatha kaliggaho'—losing on both sides. They have failed both in this world and in the world beyond." That is how the wise person reflects.

Regarding those who hold the affirmationist view (atthika-vāda), the Buddha explains as follows. If they have presented an opinion in the second manner, which is the right view of ownership of action (kammassakatā sammādiṭṭhi), we can expect the following from them. Since they believed in kamma and its results, they would avoid wrong bodily, verbal, and mental actions and behave in good, wholesome bodily, verbal, and mental actions. Why? Because they know the danger in misconduct which defiles beings, and the beneficial side of good conduct which purifies the mind. This is the positive side of those who adopt the second opinion. The Buddha declares that if the matter is true, they possess right view (sammādiṭṭhi), their thoughts are right thoughts (sammāsaṅkappa), and the words they use are right speech (sammāvācā). If there is an opinion held by the Noble Ones (Ariyas), their view is in agreement with it. Their position is not opposed to the Noble Ones, it is in agreement. If they teach the Dhamma to someone, it is the True Dhamma (saddhamma). Through "saddhamma-saññatti" (persuasion in the True Dhamma), the True Dhamma is sharpened and refined. Furthermore, because they stand firm in that Dhamma, they do not engage in self-exaltation or disparaging of others.

Having thus declared the side of benefit, the Buddha summarizes it: those who held that second view, from the very beginning, removed bad conduct and established themselves in good conduct, possessing good practices such as right view. Therefore, the wise, looking at that group with reason, see that even if by some chance it were true that there is no world beyond, they still receive the praise of the wise in this life, and they lead a good life. And if that matter is indeed true, they will go to a happy destination after death. While the others go to a miserable destination, these go to a happy destination. In that way, on both sides, those who hold this second view win on both sides. While for the first view it was said, "it failed on both sides," here it is "it succeeded on both sides." That is the apaṇṇaka practice. We can understand that those who hold wrong view meet with destruction both in this world and in the next. That can be considered bad. For those who adopt right view, whether they turn out to be right or wrong, their practice is a fruitful, non-erring practice.

That discourse does not end there. Taking each of the wrong views such as the nihilist view (nātthika-vāda), the doctrine of non-causality (ahétu-appaccaya-vāda), the annihilationist view (ucchēda-vāda), and the doctrine of non-action (akiriya-vāda) taught by Pūraṇa Kassapa and others, it presents, describes, analyzes, and dissects these principles. It demonstrates the side of danger and the side of benefit, showing how the wise should look at them. Although this discourse continues much further, let us analyze this portion. In our literature, there is a book called Subhāṣitaya written by Alagiyavanna Mukaveti. There is a stanza in it that illustrates the apaṇṇaka practice:

Whether there is a world beyond or not, O great virtuous ones,

It is best to abandon sinful deeds without keeping them in mind.

Even if there is no world beyond, no harm comes from doing so,

But if there is, disaster awaits those who sinned thinking there is none.

I spoke at length about the apaṇṇaka practice to show that there is something here for rationalists to ponder. From that point onwards in the discourse, the path leading to Nibbāna is presented. So, as summarized, the Buddha rejects the primary wrong views. He does not merely reject them, but by showing reasons and evidence, He demonstrates to the wise how to look at them in accordance with the apaṇṇaka practice. Next, the discourse goes into a deeper aspect: "Householders, there are certain ascetics and Brahmins who say that there is absolutely no such thing as formless Bhava (Becoming)."

You are all aware of the three realms of Bhava (Becoming), namely: the sensual (kāma), fine-material (rūpa), and immaterial/formless (arūpa) realms. Fine-material Bhava (Becoming) refers to the planes from the first absorption (jhāna) to the fourth absorption. Immaterial Bhava (Becoming) refers to those existing above them, such as the sphere of infinite space (ākāsānañcāyatana), and so on. "Householders, some ascetics and Brahmins say there is no immaterial Bhava (Becoming). Some other ascetics and Brahmins say there is immaterial Bhava (Becoming). Now, householders, are the assertions of these two groups mutually contradictory?" "Yes," they reply. "If they are contradictory, a wise person looks at this and thinks in this way: 'Whether immaterial Bhava (Becoming) does not exist or does exist is something I do not know. If so, if I were to grasp one side as "this is the only truth, all else is false," that would be a view. That is wrong, and that is not suitable for me.'" This is how the Buddha shows a wise person should think. However, the wise person reflects on these two views present before him—that immaterial Bhava (Becoming) exists and that it does not. "If the words of those who say there is no immaterial Bhava (Becoming) are true, then by acting accordingly, I can be born in the fine-material worlds consisting of mind-made form. If the view of the second group is true, I can obtain birth in the immaterial worlds." Then this wise person reflects: "It is because of form (rūpa) that all of this—taking up rods, taking up weapons, quarrels, disputes, false speech, etc.—occurs; none of these exist in the immaterial realm." Therefore, even though he does not know for certain which one of the two is correct, his preference leans towards the immaterial. Why? Because the benefit is greater. "Therefore, I can free myself from form and obtain birth in the immaterial plane." Thinking thus, he chooses the second of the two options.

Next, another scenario is presented. "Householders, there are certain ascetics and Brahmins who say there is absolutely no cessation of Bhava (Becoming). Other ascetics and Brahmins say that the cessation of Bhava (Becoming) can be achieved in every way." The Buddha shows how the wise should reflect on this: "If the words of those who say that Bhava (Becoming) can in no way be ceased are true, then if I follow the path they show, I can obtain birth in the immaterial worlds. The previous one was mind-made immaterial, while this one is perception-made immaterial (saññāmaya). This second one is subtle. Like Āḷāra Kālāma and Uddaka Rāmaputta, by attaining states of absorption (jhāna), I can obtain a corresponding birth through that first option. Secondly, he thinks, if indeed Bhava (Becoming) can be ceased in the manner stated in the second view, then I can achieve parinibbāna 'diṭṭheva dhamme'—in this very life, right here. I will be able to attain extinction/extinguishment in this very life."

Now we come to a profound point. Out of these two, the wise person chooses the second one. If one can attain extinction/extinguishment in this very life, then both the fine-material worlds and the immaterial worlds are completely transcended. That is what this wise person chooses. This demonstrates that apaṇṇaka practice. Just as the Bodhisatta, during his life as a Bodhisatta, stood firm on the 'apaṇṇaka practice' and crossed the desert safely with his caravan despite the various temptations used by the demons to lure them in the waterless, non-human infested desert, the Buddha has shown, through this Apaṇṇaka Sutta, the path leading to Nibbāna by saving His followers from various kinds of wrong-viewed demons.

That is why we started with the Apaṇṇaka Jātaka and descended to the Apaṇṇaka Sutta. This is a profound matter. On previous occasions, we mentioned how nowadays, many people explain Nibbāna as a state of Bhava (Becoming) attained after death. We even treated that view with irony. Here, it is clearly seen that Nibbāna, this so-called parinibbāna, is something that can be realized in this very life. Everyone knows the ultimate conclusion of that Buddha-word that "saṃsāra is Dukkha (Suffering)," which was realized when He was a Bodhisatta. As a Buddha, what is contained in the Four Noble Truths that put an end to this saṃsāric journey? The entirety of the five aggregates of grasping (pañcupādānakkhandha)—when we say the five aggregates of grasping, fine-material and immaterial are all included—the five aggregates of grasping themselves are Dukkha (Suffering). They exist because of Taṇhā (Craving); by eradicating Taṇhā (Craving), one is liberated from those five aggregates of grasping. This is shown as a state experienced in this very life. It is a bliss of Nibbāna enjoyed in this very life, not something to be experienced in the next world. This is also clear from this sutta passage: 'diṭṭheva dhamme parinibbāyati'—one attains parinibbāna in this very life. That does not mean one dies. 'Parinibbuta'—parinibbāna—means calming in every way, relinquishing these assets (upadhi), exhausting Taṇhā (Craving), and reaching dispassion (virāga); that is, experiencing the state of Nibbāna in this very life within the attainment of the fruit of Arahantship (arahatta-phala-samāpatti). What is realized through that is the cessation of Bhava (Becoming). It is because of Upādāna (Grasping) that there is Bhava (Becoming). This is the deepest point of the Dhamma. Although we think that a world exists even without us, the deepest matter in the Dhamma is upādāna-paccayā bhavo: as long as there is Upādāna (Grasping), there is Bhava (Becoming). Where there is no Upādāna (Grasping), Bhava (Becoming) is ceased. That cessation is what is called parinibbāna. Therefore, if the five aggregates of grasping present through Upādāna (Grasping) are a fire, on the other hand, there is the cooling, the extinguishment.

As Buddhists who have trust and faith in the Buddha, we must consider that this discourse provides clear evidence. If we return to those views, at the very beginning of the discourse it was shown that those who adopt wrong view, the nihilistic view, go to a miserable destination. Those who adopt the right view of ownership of action perform meritorious deeds and go to a happy destination. If one is to remain in saṃsāra, a happy destination is better than a miserable one. Beyond that, if saṃsāra is Dukkha (Suffering), then liberation from saṃsāra is necessary. In the past, those hermits (risis) who had attained supernormal knowledges (abhiññā) and realized that saṃsāra is Dukkha (Suffering), tried to elevate their minds to the fine-material plane to escape the sensual world. They realized it. Going even further in this life, there is what is called "immaterial perception-made," such as the sphere of neither-perception-nor-non-perception (nevasaññānāsaññāyatana). They were the teachers of the Bodhisatta. He was not satisfied with that, was He? Because that too is Bhava (Becoming). Even though Āḷāra Kālāma and Uddaka Rāmaputta handed over their followers and offered Him an equal status, the Bodhisatta left them, saying, "This is not the path to Nibbāna." Nibbāna cannot be that kind of thing. Whether taken by way of sense bases (āyatana) such as what is seen by the eye and heard by the ear, or by way of aggregates (khandha), Bhava (Becoming) arises because all of these are taken by way of Upādāna (Grasping). Upādāna-paccayā bhavo—each individual goes on creating their own Bhava (Becoming). Sensual Bhava (Becoming) is what is mostly found in the world. This is not something you can touch with your hand; one dwells inside sensual Bhava (Becoming). It is only very rarely that someone experiences fine-material Bhava (Becoming) or immaterial Bhava (Becoming).

But all of those are defeated by the state of parinibbāna shown by the Buddha. It is something no other teacher was able to demonstrate. So, to understand that, we must understand the value of truth. Although we express truth in words, for convenience we now say: Jāti (Birth) is Dukkha (Suffering), jarā (decay/aging) is Dukkha (Suffering), sickness is Dukkha (Suffering). We go on reciting this very easily. Finally, it is said that, in short, the five aggregates of grasping (pañcupādānakkhandha)—these five heaps grasped through Upādāna (Grasping), namely form (rūpa), Vedanā (Feeling), perception (saññā), Saṅkhāra (Preparations), and viññāṇa (consciousness)—were declared by the Buddha to be Dukkha (Suffering).

If this Dukkha (Suffering) exists because of Upādāna (Grasping), what is the cause of this Upādāna (Grasping)? It is Taṇhā (Craving), indeed. Now, we often say that teachers in Dhamma schools teach what the Truth of Dukkha (Suffering) is. Next, they say the second truth is Taṇhā (Craving). However, they do not properly know the connection between these. If the five aggregates of grasping—the five heaps held onto—are Dukkha (Suffering), then Taṇhā (Craving) which causes that holding is the cause; that is the second truth, the Truth of Arising (samudaya sacca). It is only by eradicating that cause that one can be liberated from this Dukkha (Suffering). That is why in certain places Nibbāna is described as: "taṇhakkhayo hi rādha nibbānaṃ"—"Indeed, Rādha, the destruction of Taṇhā (Craving) is Nibbāna." But this is not enough for many people. They want to destroy Taṇhā (Craving), but they also want to keep something else remaining. That is precisely where they go wrong.

But the Buddha points out that as long as this Taṇhā (Craving) exists, this burning remains. Liberation (vimutti) is a state of cooling, of extinguishment. In truth, it is often the simple things that people fail to understand, and that is the point being emphasized here. This discourse concludes with 'diṭṭheva dhamme parinibbāyati'—one attains parinibbāna in this very life.

Therefore, one must wisely reflect upon this apaṇṇaka practice. Apaṇṇaka means non-erring or safe. In truth, there are differences of opinion regarding the etymology of this word. Some say it comes from 'apraśnaka', meaning unquestionable or without any issue. Be that as it may, we can find an explanation from the discourses themselves which is helpful even to etymologists. In a certain discourse in the Aṅguttara Nikāya, the Buddha provides a simile of the "apaṇṇako maṇi"—the apaṇṇaka gem. He says there is a gem called apaṇṇaka, which, when thrown up into the air, always lands squarely on whichever side it falls. The Commentary explains this as a four-sided or cubic object. Just as a perfectly cubic piece of wood, when dropped, always lands flat on one of its six faces—having six sides representing up, down, and the four directions—the gem is described as landing upright no matter which way it is thrown. That is why it was said earlier, "whether it turns out to be right or wrong."

Through the simile of the apaṇṇaka gem, we can understand that even if the word apaṇṇaka is not fully analyzed, when the Buddha wanted to declare that this apaṇṇaka practice is absolutely correct, He said that it happens in an apaṇṇaka (unfailing) manner. The Buddha states that if someone engages in misconduct through bodily and verbal actions, just as that apaṇṇaka gem always lands securely on some side, it is certain that the person will go to hell. They go there definitely, without fail. Sometimes people say about bad deeds, "it is as if they were placed in hell." The positive side is also applied in the same simile: if someone engages in good conduct through bodily and verbal actions, then, just as the apaṇṇaka gem thrown up lands securely, they will go to a happy destination.

The apaṇṇaka practice means reflecting on matters wisely, not merely accepting things because someone said so, but making a decision after thoroughly investigating the dangers and benefits. What is found here is not the adopting of an dogmatic view. It is not like saying, "idameva saccaṃ moghamañña" ("this alone is truth, all else is foolish/false"). The wise person should not think: "I do not know for sure if this is correct. Nor do I know if the second one is correct. Why should I, not knowing, declare 'this alone is truth, all else is false'?" Instead, he investigates the path: "If I proceed according to this path, this is the benefit I will receive. If I act according to the second path, this is the benefit I will receive." He weighs both options, weighing the dangers and the benefits. Thereafter, he gives his preference to the beneficial side. That is the secret of the apaṇṇaka simile.

Nowadays, no matter how much we explain to many of those who claim to be intellectuals, it is difficult for them to establish faith (saddhā) in the Buddha. They question everything, putting logic forward, just like the foolish merchant. If the words sound logical, they would accept them even if spoken by a demon. That is not the approach to which the Buddha gives prominence.

Here, in accordance with this principle, we point out to you a discourse that has been heard of for a long time and is discussed among scholars, namely the Kālāma Sutta. At this moment, we will not analyze it extensively. We will mention it briefly: a similar situation arose for the Buddha regarding the Kālāmas of Kesaputta. They said to the Buddha: "Some ascetics and Brahmins who come to us speak in one way, while another group censures them and states a different opinion. We have doubts in choosing between these." Recognizing this, the Buddha declared: "It is natural that you have doubts. When such a double-horned dilemma is presented, doubt is reasonable." Having accepted this, He then presented ten criteria.

To consider them briefly: do not go by oral tradition, do not go by lineage of teaching, do not go by hearsay, do not go by mere logical reasoning, do not go by inference, do not go by superficial evaluation, or because this teacher is respected by us—in this way, He points out ten criteria. He advises not to arrive at a conclusion based on those. Yet, just because this was said, some people use it to reject certain points of the Dhamma. Sometimes we have to say that some of our intellectuals have "eaten up and thrown away the Kālāma Sutta" (a play on words: kālāmā dālā). They have not understood its value. The Kālāma Sutta must be analyzed while standing firm on that very apaṇṇaka practice. The Buddha declared directly to them:

"Kālāmas, do not hold firmly to any of those ten criteria. Each one of them can err." That demon was, at first glance, someone who looked clean as if he had bathed well. So how could one doubt him? Thus, there are things like that on all sides. Do not accept any of those. Instead, what should be done? "Relate it to your own lives." Most people leave out that part. The Buddha points out on many occasions that this Dhamma is about the eradication of greed, hatred, and delusion. Then, one can directly see whether greed is a good thing or a bad thing. Greed is bad, hatred is bad, delusion is bad. This is directly experienced.

When speaking of this matter, the qualities of the True Dhamma: "sandiṭṭhiko, akāliko, ehipassiko, opanayiko, paccattaṃ veditabbo viññūhi" also apply here. Within this well-expounded (svākkhāta) Dhamma, there are things that can be directly experienced by oneself. The Buddha says to the Kālāmas regarding whether greed, hatred, and delusion are good or bad, and whether eradicating them and developing non-greed, non-hatred, and non-delusion is bad or good: "Kālāmas, when you investigate within yourselves whether something is wrong, and whether it is good or bad, and realize 'by practicing these dhammas, I will have these benefits'—that is how a matter should be investigated." The Buddha is saying there that you should examine and accept these things by relating them to your own lives, not through any of those ten criteria. It does not mean throwing everything away, nor does it mean accepting everything. It means testing it in one’s own life; and testing does not mean through books, but by connecting it to life to see whether it is right or wrong. That is not being done in the way mentioned. Most often, the logic of books is put forward. "If these teachings are brought close to life, we will face ruin; otherwise, because of these teachings, our lives will flourish"—the Buddha is declaring to the Kālāmas to draw conclusions in this manner through investigation and direct experience.

If there is any logic in this Dhamma, it exists to draw conclusions based on direct experience. The journey that is based on that direct experience leads straight to Nibbāna; this Dhamma is well-expounded (svākkhāta) and leading out of suffering (niyyānika). The apaṇṇaka practice is a practice that leads out of suffering. What is the reason for this? Because this Dhamma is well-expounded, it is directly visible (sandiṭṭhika); because it is directly visible, it is timeless (akālika). The timeless Dhamma can be pointed to as "come and see" (ehipassiko). Accordingly, within the Dhamma itself, there is the quality of one step elevating you to the next step. That is how the Dhamma is structured. It is structured as right view, right thought, and so on. One step prepares for and supports the next step. Next is "paccattaṃ veditabbo viññūhi"—it is to be experienced individually by the wise. It is not about proving it through mere intellectual reasoning or mere belief. It is about bringing it close to one's own life and drawing a conclusion as to whether it is right or wrong. It is this very apaṇṇaka practice that the Buddha declared.

What was presented to you today is a somewhat complex sermon. However, take what is to be taken. Try to bring it close to your own lives. By observing these virtues of moral conduct, what you are hoping for is to escape from this saṃsāric Dukkha (Suffering) of Jāti (Birth), Jarāmaraṇa (Decay and Death), sickness, and so on. Fine-material Bhava (Becoming) and immaterial Bhava (Becoming) lose their significance once a Buddha has appeared.

In today's sermon, the apaṇṇaka practice was introduced. I wish that by taking this apaṇṇaka practice forward, this sermon may support everyone in escaping from the saṃsāric Dukkha (Suffering) of Jāti (Birth), Jarāmaraṇa (Decay and Death), sickness, and so on, and realizing the noble, supreme, deathless Nibbāna! May whoever wishes to share in the merit of this Dhamma preaching and Dhamma listening, from the Avīci hell up to the Akaniṭṭha heaven, rejoice in it and realize the supreme, deathless Nibbāna through their aspired state of Enlightenment! Wishing thus, recite these verses and share the merit.

Pali Stanza:

Bahū devā manussā ca, maṅgalāni acintayuṃ;

ākaṅkhamānā sotthānaṃ,

brūhi maṅgalamuttamam.

From:

from Sutta Nipāta, Mahāmaṅgala Sutta

Dear Listeners,

The word 'Maṅgala' has been used since the distant past to designate various signs or occurrences that bring well-being and prosperity to human beings. It is mentioned that during the time of the Buddha, when the Blessed One appeared, there were various disagreements in Jambudīpa as to what should actually be considered a blessing (maṅgala). The very first stanza of the Mahāmaṅgala Sutta, which we took as our theme today, reveals that this question of what constitutes a blessing was discussed not only among human beings but even among the deities.

According to the commentaries, while people gathered in the assembly halls of ancient Jambudīpa to discuss various matters, discussions also took place as to what should be designated as a blessing. No consensus could be reached on this. Some declared that the auspiciousness or inauspiciousness of the day is determined by the first thing seen in the morning. Some declared that seeing certain things considered auspicious is a stroke of fortune. They are called diṭṭha-maṅgalika—those who consider what is seen as a blessing. According to their view, seeing things such as a full pitcher, a pregnant mother, a lime branch, a bull, a cow, or a horse-drawn chariot first thing in the morning was thought of as auspicious, as a blessing. Another group said that it is not what is seen, but what is heard that should be considered a blessing. According to their opinion, hearing words like "today is a good day," "a good asterism," "a good moment," "growth of goodness," or "glorious prosperity" first thing in the morning was declared by them to be a blessing. Yet another group said that it is neither what is seen nor what is heard that should be considered a blessing, but what is sensed by the nose, the tongue, and the body. According to their opinion, smelling the fragrance of flowers, touching the earth, touching fresh cow dung, touching fruits, wearing a new turban, or touching a new garment—things that come into contact with the body in the morning—were considered blessings. Thus, these disagreements spread further and further, and according to the commentary, a "blessing uproar" (maṅgala-kolāhala) arose. An "uproar" does not mean fighting and stabbing as in modern times. It means it became a topic discussed by everyone. The commentaries mention that this "blessing uproar" started among humans and went up to the terrestrial deities (bhumma-deva), and then among the deities of Cātumahārājika, Tāvatiṃsa, and so on. So in the end, on behalf of those deities, a certain deity came forward and presented this question to the Blessed One through the stanza we mentioned earlier; this is what is stated in this sutta.

You, meritorious listeners, know how such suttas begin. It is said that when the Blessed One was residing at Jetavana monastery in Sāvatthī, after much of the night had passed, a deity of radiant beauty, illuminating the entire Jetavana with his light, approached the Blessed One, paid homage to him, stood to one side, and uttered this very stanza we have themed:

"Bahū devā manussā ca, maṅgalāni acintayuṃ; Ākaṅkhamānā sotthānaṃ, brūhi maṅgalamuttamaṃ."

"Many deities and humans, desiring well-being, have thought about blessings. Tell us the supreme blessing." This is the general meaning. So, in response to this statement or request made to the Blessed One, the Blessed One expounded, in eleven stanzas, thirty-eight blessing factors—though in counting them, there might be slight discrepancies—which are known today as the Mahāmaṅgala Sutta. So, before analyzing each one, let us try to bring out the general meaning of these stanzas of the Mahāmaṅgala Sutta, which is a sutta used by everyone and frequently heard by all. In reply to that stanza, the Blessed One began like this:

"Asevanā ca bālānaṃ, paṇḍitānañca sevanā; Pūjā ca pūjanīyānaṃ, etaṃ maṅgalamuttamaṃ."

Not associating with fools, associating with the wise, and honoring those worthy of honor—this is the supreme blessing.

"Patirūpadesavāso ca, pubbe ca katapuññatā; Attasammāpaṇidhi ca, etaṃ maṅgalamuttamaṃ."

Living in a suitable locality, having made merit in the past, and setting one's mind rightly—this is the supreme blessing.

"Bāhusaccañca sippañca, vinayo ca susikkhito; Subhāsitā ca yā vācā, etaṃ maṅgalamuttamaṃ."

Great learning, craftsmanship, being well-trained in discipline, and speech that is well-spoken—this is the supreme blessing.

"Mātāpitu-upaṭṭhānaṃ, puttadārassa saṅgaho; Anākulā ca kammantā, etaṃ maṅgalamuttamaṃ."

Supporting one's parents, cherishing one's wife and children, and peaceful (unconfused) occupations—this is the supreme blessing.

"Dānañca dhammacariyā ca, ñātakānañca saṅgaho; Anavajjāni kammāni, etaṃ maṅgalamuttamaṃ."

Generosity, righteous conduct, helping one's relatives, and blameless actions—this is the supreme blessing.

"Āratī viratī pāpā, majjapānā ca saññamo; Appamādo ca dhammesu, etaṃ maṅgalamuttamaṃ."

Avoiding and abstaining from evil, refraining from intoxicants, and diligence in the Dhamma—this is the supreme blessing.

"Gāravo ca nivāto ca, santuṭṭhī ca kataññutā; Kālena dhammasavanaṃ, etaṃ maṅgalamuttamaṃ."

Reverence, humility, contentment, gratitude, and hearing the Dhamma at the proper time—this is the supreme blessing.

"Khantī ca sovacassatā, samaṇānañca dassanaṃ; Kālena dhammasākacchā, etaṃ maṅgalamuttamaṃ."

Patience, obedience, seeing ascetics, and Dhamma discussions at the proper time—this is the supreme blessing.

"Tapo ca brahmacariyañca, ariyasaccāna dassanaṃ; Nibbānasacchikiriyā ca, etaṃ maṅgalamuttamaṃ."

Ardent effort (tapo), the holy life (brahmacariya), seeing the Noble Truths, and the realization of Extinguishment / the Mind Stilled (Nibbāna)—this is the supreme blessing.

"Phuṭṭhassa lokadhammehi, cittaṃ yassa na kampati; Asokaṃ virajaṃ khemaṃ, etaṃ maṅgalamuttamaṃ."

Although touched by the worldly conditions, the mind of one who is unshaken, sorrowless, stainless, secure—this is the supreme blessing.

"Etādisāni katvāna, sabbatthamaparājitā; Sabbattha sotthiṃ gacchanti, taṃ tesaṃ maṅgalamuttamaṃ."

Having done these things, undefeated everywhere, they go in safety everywhere. This is their supreme blessing. This is the general meaning of the Maṅgala Sutta.

Now let us analyze this meaning further. There are not so many deep things that require analyzing every single word. Most of you know the meaning. There are some words that need to be analyzed in detail. So, the word of the Buddha in the Maṅgala Sutta begins with the letter "A":

"Asevanā ca bālānaṃ, paṇḍitānañca sevanā; Pūjā ca pūjanīyānaṃ, etaṃ maṅgalamuttamaṃ."

Let us focus our minds on the three things mentioned here. First, it is presented as a pair: Asevanā ca bālānaṃ—not associating with fools, and paṇḍitānañca sevanā—associating with the wise.

Here, something needs to be mentioned. In our modern Sinhala usage, we use the word bāla to refer to those young in age. We say bāla-mahalu (young and old). However, in the Pali language, the word bāla is never used in the sense of being young in age. In the Pali language, the concept of "young and old" is expressed as dahara-vuddha. Bāla is used precisely in the sense of a fool, whereas paṇḍita means the wise.

This too can be understood by you through this analysis. Being a paṇḍita (wise person) is not something obtained through an academic degree. Indeed, we must discuss these matters in detail because in modern times, certain debaters question this, claiming that the Blessed One said something contradictory here. Why? Because he says not to associate with fools (bāla), and to associate with the wise (paṇḍita). Then how can there be a connection between these two groups? How can the fools associate with the wise? Can they avoid it?

There are people who formulate such questions. An answer to this will also be found as we proceed. First, let us look at the statements made by the Blessed One regarding fools (bāla) or ignorant people, taking them from various places in the texts.

On one occasion, the Blessed One states: "Monks, whatever fears, dangers, and calamities arise, they all arise from the fool (bāla), not from the wise (paṇḍita)." The fool is shown to be that dangerous there. Dangers and calamities do not arise from the wise. An analogy is also given for this. "Just as, monks, when a reed-house or a thatched house catches fire, even a nearby luxurious house that is well-plastered inside and out can be destroyed. Those other houses catch fire easily. Then, because they have caught fire, even large palaces and mansions nearby are burnt down." That is a simile given by the Blessed One to show the danger that comes from the fool. In another place, the Blessed One states: "Kammalakkhaṇo, bhikkhave, bālo; kammalakkhaṇo paṇḍito" ("Monks, a fool is characterized by his actions; a wise person is characterized by his actions"). The character of the fool is recognized through his conduct. The wise person is also recognized through his conduct. What is the conduct of the fool? A person with bodily misconduct, verbal misconduct, and mental misconduct is a fool. A person with bodily good conduct, verbal good conduct, and mental good conduct is a wise person. According to this, we do not know how many "wise men" in this country would fall into this list!

In any case, the Blessed One further declares the signs and characteristics for identifying the fool and the wise person. Regarding the fool, his nature is shown: duccintitacintī, dubbhāsitabhāsī, dukkatakammakārī (one who thinks bad thoughts, speaks bad words, and does bad deeds). His thoughts are bad, his words are bad, and his actions are bad. The wise person is sucintitacintī, subhāsitabhāsī, sukkatakammakārī (one who thinks good thoughts, speaks good words, and does good deeds). The train of thoughts of the wise person is good, his words are good, and his course of action is good. How does one identify someone as a fool or a wise person? That is why the Blessed One introduced certain signs, so that these two groups could be identified through these signs.

Next, the Blessed One speaks of this in the Dhammapada; you may have heard of the places in the Dhammapada where the fool is mentioned. This fool is compared to a pit of filth. The danger that could happen to a wise person is shown in this way. The simile given is that if rotten fish is wrapped in kusa grass, although kusa grass normally has a pleasant scent, when rotten fish is wrapped in it, the kusa grass also stinks. It is just the same with associating with a fool.

So when this is said, we must consider: is it completely impossible for these two groups to come together? That is exactly what we are clarifying as an answer to those debaters mentioned earlier. Fools should associate with the wise just as—to use an analogy—patients associate with doctors. Or, to use a modern analogy, like drug addicts associating with a rehabilitation counselor nowadays. They do not associate to share a bottle! It is with a certain respect. They seek help from a counselor to overcome the wrong addictions they have acquired through habitual patterns of Saṃsāra. It is the same with the teacher-pupil relationship. That is why the Blessed One highlighted its gravity beforehand. Even a doctor has to treat patients, but he does so while maintaining his own safety. Likewise, one must associate with the wise while knowing the fool. One must identify both the fool and the wise and then associate. That, meritorious listeners, is what is meant by "Pūjā ca pūjanīyānaṃ"—honoring those worthy of honor. If a fool approaches a wise person with an attitude of honoring those worthy of honor, the extent to which the fool can progress is such that, in the end, the fool becomes a wise person, if he properly receives the association of noble friends (kalyāṇa-mitta), if he receives the association of the wise well. That is why the Therī Kisāgothamī declares in her Therīgāthā: "Kalyāṇamittatā muninā, lokaṃ ādissa vaṇṇitā; Kalyāṇamitte bhajamāno, api bālo paṇḍito assa." The Blessed One pointed his finger to the world and proclaimed the value of noble friendship; he praised it. By associating with noble friends, even a fool becomes a wise person. From that, we must understand that with that attitude of honoring those worthy of honor, fools can benefit from the wise. Likewise, the wise person must—according to the simile we mentioned earlier, where the counselor trying to save the drug addict does not go to share bottles—act knowing his own limits. So, regarding that stanza, considering the time, I think this is sufficient.

Now, consider the depth within this. Meritorious listeners, why did the Blessed One say these things first among the thirty-eight blessings? Why did he mention this matter at the very beginning? Because the most fundamental requirement, the most primary factor for laying the foundation of life, is association, companionship. Therefore, one must be careful about that association. Especially, after a person is born into the world, if they happen to associate with such fools in their childhood—even though we now use bāla to mean young, that young child eventually becomes a fool (bāla) indeed. Therefore, the Blessed One highlighted the matter of association in life through this. Next: "Patirūpadesavāso ca, pubbe ca katapuññatā; Attasammāpaṇidhi ca, etaṃ maṅgalamuttamaṃ." "Living in a suitable locality," "having made merit in the past," and "setting one's mind rightly." There too, there are some matters that need to be analyzed a bit.

"Living in a suitable locality"—in modern times, according to environmental engineering, this might mean suburban proximity, tap water, and perhaps electricity, when thinking about environment. But if we think in terms of the Dhamma, the commentaries specifically point to having the opportunity to associate with the fourfold assembly: monks (bhikkhu), nuns (bhikkhunī), laymen (upāsaka), and laywomen (upāsikā). Otherwise, living in an environment suitable for turning towards a life in accordance with the Dhamma is what is called patirūpadesavāso ca. Why? Because we previously spoke about association. Next, if we speak using a similar word, this is nissaya (dependence/support). First is association, next is environment. In simpler words, in the first one we said association, now we say environment. That is, the locality where one resides.

Next, there is a special factor: "pubbe ca katapuññatā"—having made merit in the past. As they say, "Even if one gets a hundred sons of little merit, it is futile"—that is what is meant. This is seen clearly only by the Buddha-eye. Let us call it the innate fortune or the inborn potential of each individual. Now we have spoken about association. We have spoken about environment. Next, we can call this upanissaya (strong support/decisive support). There is an ancient term: upanissaya-sampatti (the fortune of decisive support). The karmic force and the meritorious force brought from the past become apparent in early childhood. That too is a foundation for this life. In modern times, those who follow Western psychologists ridicule these things. We have heard and seen such instances. They discard what comes from the past and confine everything to childhood. That is the end of it for them. But the Blessed One points out that we have a vast past in our Saṃsāra. Thus, there are both good and bad in it. Depending on those, let us call it past fortune: "pubbe ca katapuññatā". Now next, it says it is not enough to just leave it to that. There is also something for oneself to do.

"Attasammāpaṇidhi ca"—setting one's mind rightly—this becomes extremely important. Behold, that is where the beginning of personality development lies. One's own agency begins from here. "Attasammāpaṇidhi ca"—setting one's mind rightly. To put it briefly, there is a stanza in the Dhammapada regarding this, which you, meritorious listeners, may know: "Na taṃ mātā pitā kayirā, aññe vāpi ca ñātakā; Sammāpaṇihitaṃ cittaṃ, seyyaso naṃ tato kare." Neither mother, nor father, nor any other relatives can do for one such good as a rightly directed mind can do. At one time, this was put into a Sinhala poem: "What parents and relatives cannot do, my own mind, when well-directed, accomplishes for my well-being."

There, the Blessed One has given a beautiful simile about this directing of the mind. Actually, within the word paṇidhi is a directing. The proper directing of the mind. The simile given by the Blessed One for this might not be understood by some. A grain of paddy—everyone who does farming knows—has a small sharp point at its tip. The ancient word for it is vī-naṇḍuva (the awn/tip of the paddy grain). People of this area do not even have a name for it. A nameless, easily forgotten small dot. The Blessed One has used such a small thing for a simile. In that simile, the Blessed One states that although that pricking part at the tip of the grain is a tiny thing, if that tip of paddy is placed rightly, it can pierce a hand or a foot. Similarly, if the mind is rightly directed, it can destroy the darkness of ignorance (avijjā). That is how the Blessed One states it. From that we can see that, whatever the power of past fortune may be, one's own part begins from there by directing the mind to the right side. "Attasammāpaṇidhi"—this too is a factor of blessing. Next:

"Bāhusaccañca sippañca, vinayo ca susikkhito; Subhāsitā ca yā vācā, etaṃ maṅgalamuttamaṃ."

Everyone knows what bāhusacca (great learning) is. Having heard and remembered much, erudition. Next, sippañca—craftsmanship. This factor also must be considered in accordance with the Dhamma. Even if one learns various worthless things unrelated to the Dhamma, if one lacks the skill to use them properly, we see in the world that one gets destroyed by that very learning. In any case, this learning, this craft, and in modern terms, the basically required training—bāhusaccañca sippañca, vinayo ca susikkhito—being well-disciplined, being disciplined. This refers to the discipline necessary for life. Subhāsitā ca yā vācā—that too is a part of discipline: well-spoken speech. Here, what is called "well-spoken" is truth in accordance with the Dhamma. Moreover, the Blessed One has shown a beautiful passage in various places to define the word "well-spoken":

"Yā sā vācā nelā kaṇṇasukhā pemanīyā hadayaṅgamā porī bahujanakantā bahujanamanāpā"

"Whatever speech is flawless (nelā), pleasing to the ear (kaṇṇasukhā), lovely (pemanīyā), reaching the heart (hadayaṅgamā), polite (porī), appealing to many, and pleasing to many"—words like that are well-spoken. Likewise, those truthful, timely words are well-spoken words. Next:

"Mātāpitu-upaṭṭhānaṃ, puttadārassa saṅgaho; Anākulā ca kammantā, etaṃ maṅgalamuttamaṃ."

Mātāpitu-upaṭṭhānaṃ—some take this as two: supporting the mother, and supporting the father. Whatever the count, if we take these points according to the Buddha's word, supporting one's parents—which you, meritorious listeners, have heard so often—is also a factor of blessing. Why is it a factor of blessing? Because the blessing of those parents can be obtained even during their lifetime by supporting them. In this dispensation of the Buddha, let alone other things, even after they have passed away, a form of service is shown. What is the place given to parents by the Blessed One? They are declared to be like Brahma (brahmāti mātāpitaro). "Āpādakā posakā, imassa lokassa dassetāro"—they brought up, nourished, and showed this world to them. That is why they are called first teachers, pubbācariyo. Likewise, you, meritorious listeners, may have heard that in suttas like these, the Blessed One represented the eastern direction as supporting parents. That too is indeed a blessing, which brings the parents' blessing. Next, saṅgaho—the proper cherishing of one's children and wife. These too are duties in this society. Fulfilling those duties directly in a way that shapes a life. Anākulā ca kammantā—occupations that are peaceful, not illegal, and free from improper things, is a factor of blessing. Next:

"Dānañca dhammacariyā ca, ñātakānañca saṅgaho; Anavajjāni kammāni, etaṃ maṅgalamuttamaṃ."

Generosity, righteous conduct, dānañca dhammacariyā ca, and ñātakānañca saṅgaho—helping one's relatives, and anavaj̣jāni kammāni—blameless actions: these are the supreme blessing. Behold, next turning towards society, dāna—giving. Not only to the Saṅgha, but also to the poor, travelers, and beggars—that giving is altruistic conduct. Having first fulfilled one's duty to one's home, then comes generosity, righteous conduct (dhammacariyā), a life in accordance with the Dhamma, and cherishing and helping relatives as the occasion arises. Anavajjāni kammāni—blameless action; it is perfectly fine to think of this as abandoning wrong livelihood (micchā-ājīva) and living by right livelihood (sammā-ājīva).

"Āratī viratī pāpā, majjapānā ca saññamo; Appamādo ca dhammesu, etaṃ maṅgalamuttamaṃ."

Āratī viratī pāpā is explained by showing that āratī means avoiding evil through the mind, removing oneself from it mentally. Viratī is explained as abstaining from them through precepts and such. Developing self-control regarding that. That too is a blessing. But nowadays, in both weddings and funerals, one cannot do without alcohol! Behold what has become of the Mahāmaṅgala Sutta now. The Mahāmaṅgala Sutta too is probably recited at those auspicious events. Amidst all this, the true blessing factor is this word of the Buddha. Appamādo ca dhammesu—diligence in the Dhamma; then, step by step, one turns towards the spiritual side.

"Gāravo ca nivāto ca, santuṭṭhī ca kataññutā; Kālena dhammasavanaṃ, etaṃ maṅgalamuttamaṃ."

Gāravo ca—showing respect, paying reverence to those worthy of virtue. Nivāto ca—humility. Santuṭṭhi—contentment with what is obtained. Kataññutā—gratitude. There is no need to explain these, is there? You, meritorious listeners, know them. Kālena dhammasavanaṃ—hearing the Dhamma at the proper time; etaṃ maṅgalamuttamaṃ—these are factors of blessing.

"Khantī ca sovacassatā, samaṇānañca dassanaṃ; Kālena dhammasākacchā, etaṃ maṅgalamuttamaṃ."

Khantī—patience; sovacassatā—gentleness, obedience; samaṇānañca dassanaṃ—seeing ascetics. Behold, step by step, it turns towards the spiritual life. Kālena dhammasākacchā—previously one listened to the Dhamma, next is discussing the Dhamma. Discussing one's own problems by associating with the venerable monks. "At the proper time" means when the opportunity for Dhamma discussions arises. Also, when the mind is overcome by the hindrances (nīvaraṇa), or if there are matters unclear to oneself, discussing them: kālena dhammasākacchā etaṃ maṅgalamuttamaṃ.

"Tapo ca brahmacariyañca, ariyasaccāna dassanaṃ; Nibbānasacchikiriyā ca, etaṃ maṅgalamuttamaṃ."

Here, tapo (ardent effort) is not interpreted in the sense of the ascetic practices of the past, but as the burning away of defilements, sensory restraint, and so forth. Coming to this point, we can think of lay disciples like those present here, who, having spent their lay lives, ponder in their old age. One does not have to be extremely old to walk this path of the Sasana. But some in this Sasana, as you, meritorious listeners, have heard, have become Arahants even at seven years of age. If one argues dogmatically based on this Maṅgala Sutta, one might think that one should incline towards the spiritual life only after growing old like that. One needs to think so only if one failed to do so in one's early years. The primary purpose here is to analyze the meaning of the word "blessing". There, the Blessed One shows tapo—that is, undertaking virtue (sīla), leaving homes, and doing things by way of burning away defilements, by way of meditation; these are taken as ascetic practice (tapas). Celibacy (brahmacariya) is possible. What is understood by that, generally understood, is abstaining from sexual relations and the pure conduct associated with it. Some, as we have heard, those laymen and laywomen who led householders' lives, after coming to a life in accordance with the Dhamma, consult each other and establish themselves in this very practice. Not only that, now if on some occasion one can separate from lay life and implement the aforementioned tapo and brahmacariya at the highest level by ordaining—then that too belongs to this. Through tapo ca brahmacariyañca comes ariyasaccāna dassanaṃ—the seeing of the Four Noble Truths: the truths of Suffering (dukkha), Origin, Cessation, and the Path. At that stage, through one's own life experiences, in accordance with the Buddha's word, if one has understood to some extent that rebirth / arising (jāti), aging and death / decay and death (jarāmaraṇa), sickness, and death are Suffering (dukkha), and if one is engaged in meditation, going even deeper, if one gets the realization that this entire five aggregates of grasping (pañcupādānakkhandha) is Suffering (dukkha), that indeed is the understanding of Suffering (dukkha).

Next, when reflecting on the cause of this Suffering (dukkha), if one understands that it becomes Suffering (dukkha) because of the Grasping (upādāna) towards the five aggregates of grasping—clinging to them—then, at that point, Craving (taṇhā) too is understood. That is, the Craving (taṇhā) that lies underneath that Grasping (upādāna). Next, that Craving (taṇhā), at some point... seeing these Four Noble Truths is indeed the direct realization of the Four Noble Truths. As the final result of some insight-consciousness-process (vipassanā-citta-vīthi), having seen the impermanence (anicca) of all these things, having seen their nature of arising and passing away, having seen their breaking-up nature by way of udayabbaya (arising and passing away), bhaṅga (dissolution), etc., and having developed fear towards these preparations (saṅkhāra), and next, having understood their disadvantageous side (ādīnava), and next, having developed that weariness with Saṃsāra called nibbidā, and having generated the thought "I must somehow escape from this", if one constantly develops the three characteristics of Impermanent (anicca), Suffering (dukkha), and Not-self (anattā) in daily life, whether as a monk or a layperson—it is through that development that at some point, when they have matured, using those three characteristics, one drops to the other shore. How does one drop? Through that very weariness. When one drops to the other side at some point due to disgust—that is to say, for a moment, the grip of this holding is let go. In that letting go is what is called extinguishment; therein, for the first time, one experiences a peaceful sensation (vedanā). As that experience, it is something completely different from what the people of the world think. That is why it is called world-transcending (lokuttara). The peace, the extinguishment obtained through that letting go—one experiences it, even for a short moment. That indeed is: "by the destruction of Craving (taṇhā), the Mind Stilled / Extinguishment (Nibbāna) was seen."

For that to happen, indeed, within one's mental continuum, not only the Noble Eightfold Path shown by the Blessed One but also the thirty-seven requisites of enlightenment (bodhipakkhiya-dhamma) must have been developed to some degree. It is when they have matured through the meditation one does, that the seeing of the Noble Truths (ariyasaccāna dassanaṃ) occurs; within this is nibbānañca—that is, extinguishment / the Mind Stilled, and sacchikiriyā ca—which means direct realization. To realize Extinguishment / the Mind Stilled (Nibbāna) means the Dhamma is to be realized in this very life. The Blessed One has shown that there is indeed such a thing as this extinguishment / stilled mind. A state of the mind becomes directly realized by oneself. Nibbānasacchikiriyā ca etaṃ maṅgalamuttamaṃ*—this is the supreme blessing. Behold, next, the state of the mind as the result of attaining that Extinguishment / the Mind Stilled (Nibbāna) is expressed in the next stanza:

"Phuṭṭhassa lokadhammehi, cittaṃ yassa na kampati; Asokaṃ virajaṃ khemaṃ, etaṃ maṅgalamuttamaṃ."

"Worldly conditions" mean the eight worldly conditions (attha-lokadhamma). You, meritorious listeners, may have heard: "Lābho alābho ayaso yaso ca, nindā pasaṃsā ca sukhaṃ ca dukkhaṃ." Gain, loss, disrepute, fame, blame, praise, pleasure, and Suffering (dukkha). The Blessed One has expressed these eight worldly conditions in a series of stanzas on one occasion.

These eight worldly conditions revolve around the world, and the world revolves around the eight worldly conditions. If you think a bit deeply, you will understand. The eight worldly conditions revolve around the world. Actually, this is exactly how this whole discussion of blessings arose. The signs that bring goodness and well-being to humans. People went after these blessings with the idea that, through some hidden signs, the suffering caused by these eight worldly conditions could be avoided.

Thus, the Blessed One, having rightly realized Extinguishment / the Mind Stilled (Nibbāna) spiritually, then declares the state of that person: phuṭṭhassa lokadhammehi—whose mind is not shaken when touched by the eight worldly conditions; next, that unshakable state is described. Asokaṃ virajaṃ khemaṃ—sorrowless, dustless (free from the dust of defilements), secure (which is called the ground of safety). That state indeed is the supreme blessing: asokaṃ virajaṃ khemaṃ etaṃ maṅgalamuttamaṃ.

If we are to say something more related to that—now indeed we have arrived at the deep side of the Dhamma. We have told you on various occasions not to let this become just a mundane lay sermon. Therefore, at this point, we must recall those things stated by the Blessed One, especially regarding Extinguishment / the Mind Stilled (Nibbāna). Not only the Blessed One, but the Venerable Sariputta Mahathera also on one occasion states with a beautiful simile, the state of that liberated mind. These are experienced in the state called the attainment of the fruit of Arahantship (arahattaphala-samādhi). Venerable Sariputta Mahathera describes how the mind remains in that state: "No matter how many visual objects cognizable by the eye may come, the mind of that Arahant does not get mixed up with them. That mind remains in a firm, unshakable state." Just as it was said about visual objects cognizable by the eye, so too with sounds cognizable by the ear, and so on—you can imagine, not only things coming from the five physical senses. Finally, it points to thoughts/mind-objects (dhamma) coming to the mind; that indeed is the deepest part. No matter how many of these come, the mind remains unshaken, in that aforementioned stable state; this is what Venerable Sariputta Mahathera states on one occasion. Next, to show that unshakable state, he gives a simile: just as a stone pillar of about sixteen cubits, with eight cubits buried in the ground and standing firmly established, is not shaken no matter from which direction strong storms blow. Venerable Sariputta Mahathera gives this simile regarding the aforementioned unshaken mind. Then, asokaṃ virajaṃ—that is, that sorrowless state.

Thus, illustrations of these have been shown on various occasions. When Devadatta once rolled down a rock at the Blessed One—karma affects anyone—a splinter from that rock struck the sole of the Blessed One's foot, causing a deep wound and severe sensation (vedanā) of pain. Even though the Blessed One experienced severe sensation (vedanā) of pain, he directed his mind to the power of the fruit (phala-samādhi), and is said to have endured that severe pain. At that time, even the deities exclaimed that he was enduring such severe sensation (vedanā). That mind capable of enduring is what is shown as "refuge, security, place, shelter, and resort" in Extinguishment / the Mind Stilled (Nibbāna). An Arahant can bring the mind to that state by bringing back that aforementioned direct realization; and that will definitely emerge at the final moment of an Arahant. Because of that emergence, because the mind is liberated (vimutta), they do not come back to another Becoming / Existence (bhava).

Regarding the Blessed One, it is told that on one occasion, when it was raining heavily, with water flooding, and thunderbolts striking and cracking, four oxen and two men were killed by the lightning. At that time, near a threshing-shed (bhūsāgāra) or barn, perhaps because the Blessed One was absorbed in this very concentration (samādhi), when the Blessed One came out and asked why these people had gathered, they replied: "Why, did the Blessed One not see that such a thing has happened?" He said "No." He said he did not even hear it. "Then, were you asleep, Venerable Sir?" "No, I was conscious." That is a very deep matter that most people cannot understand. If he had been completely without perception (saññā), it could have been understood. But what we have here is that the Blessed One had perception (saññā) at that time, and was also awake. "Saññī samāno jāgaro"—even while awake and conscious, none of those things were heard by the Blessed One. Why? Because at that time, he had attained a wakefulness far greater than what the people of the world call wakefulness.

Think about it a bit. The world being "awake" refers to the state where objects come to the six sense-bases (saḷāyatana). The Blessed One being "awake" refers to the supramundane state that transcends them. That is why the Blessed One said "saññī samāno jāgaro". Jāgara means staying awake, being awake. What does being awake mean? This perception (saññā), samāno jāgaro means he was awake. It is perception (saññā) that we highlight in most of our sermons. The passage describing Extinguishment / the Mind Stilled (Nibbāna) is: "Etaṃ santaṃ etaṃ paṇītaṃ, yadidaṃ sabbasaṅkhārasamatho sabbūpadhipaṭinissaggo taṇhakkhayo virāgo nirodho nibbānaṃ." ("This is peaceful, this is sublime, namely, the stilling of all preparations (saṅkhāra), the relinquishment of all assets, the destruction of Craving (taṇhā), fading away, cessation, Extinguishment / the Mind Stilled (Nibbāna)"). That is what is shown as upasamānussati (recollection of peace). The mind was directed there. Therefore, when the Blessed One remained with his mind directed to that state of Arahantship-fruit which he had ultimately attained as his path-and-fruit realization, that indeed is what is meant by "going to Extinguishment / the Mind Stilled (Nibbāna)". That is why so many words are used for Extinguishment / the Mind Stilled (Nibbāna), such as "place, shelter, refuge, resort, seclusion (viveka)." That is why those words are used. Thus, that state is the state of being liberated from the six sense-bases (saḷāyatana). People think: "Ah! How awake the Blessed One was, having been liberated from the six sense-bases, it is a great wonder!" Having become world-transcending (lokuttara)—that is what we have shown on certain occasions, based on a simile given by the Blessed One.

The Blessed One declared to the Brahmin Verañja: "In this generation, I am indeed the first chick to have broken the eggshell of ignorance (avijjā) and come out." A simile worth reflecting upon, meritorious listeners. "The first chick to have broken the eggshell of ignorance and come out"—from that, what we have to understand is that all of us are inside that eggshell. The eggshell means the six sense-bases (āyatana). It is within those six sense-bases that everyone is active, including scientists. That is Saṃsāra. That is Becoming / Existence (bhava). All three worlds—the sensual (kāma), fine-material (rūpa), and immaterial (arūpa)—exist inside that eggshell. Thus, the Blessed One experienced that very world-transcending state. He broke the eggshell and went out. The state of remaining with the mind directed to that direct realization is the attainment of the fruit of Arahantship (arahattaphala-samādhi). Therefore, in the end it says:

"Sabbatthamaparājitā"—undefeated everywhere. Nowadays, we often hear about the defeated. Some have won in worldly terms but are defeated in world-transcending terms. Some have won in this world but are defeated in the next world. Here, it says they won in this world, they won in the next world, and they won Extinguishment / the Mind Stilled (Nibbāna). That is why it says "sabbatthamaparājitā". "Sabbattha sotthiṃ"—whether in this world, or in the next world, or next, regarding Extinguishment / the Mind Stilled (Nibbāna) on the world-transcending side, they arrive at safety and well-being from every side.

Regarding the time, this is all there is to say. I think a sufficient amount has been spoken. For centuries, the Mahāmaṅgala Sutta has been on everyone's lips. Hearing the Dhamma is valuable. But implementing these thirty-eight is the true blessing. Therefore, without stopping at the level of seen blessings (diṭṭha-maṅgala), heard blessings (suta-maṅgala), or sensed blessings (muta-maṅgala), we should hope to realize the true truth of blessings by implementing them. Then, this meritorious gathering—there may be people of various age groups here—for the elderly people mentioned, this Mahāmaṅgala Sutta is a great strength. What is past is past. Yes, you spent a lay life. But with this opportunity received, as was said in tapo ca brahmacariyañca, having inclined towards the Dhamma and the Sasana, you must resolve to escape as quickly as possible from the Suffering (dukkha) of Saṃsāra, such as rebirth / arising (jāti), aging and death / decay and death (jarāmaraṇa), sickness, and death, and attain the supreme Extinguishment / the Mind Stilled (Nibbāna) which is complete liberation.

So, as a step towards that today too, you observed the precepts and meditated to the extent of your minds. We wish that today, this Mahāmaṅgala Sutta may also assist in that. May all beings, from Avīci to Akaniṭṭha, whoever wish to share in these merits, rejoice in this merit of expounding the Dhamma and this merit of hearing the Dhamma! Through that rejoicing, may they realize the supreme, deathless, great Extinguishment / the Mind Stilled (Nibbāna) through whichever state of enlightenment they aspire to! May you, meritorious listeners, also have the strength and power to realize the supreme blessing in the Mahāmaṅgala Sutta as quickly as possible, before the decline of the Sasana, through the penetration of the paths and fruits of Stream-entry, Once-returning, Non-returning, and Arahantship!

Dhammapada 102–103 (Sahassavagga)

Dear Listeners,

The Buddha, the Lord of Peace and Teacher of the Three Worlds, presented to the world a path of practice leading to peace and solace. However, in order to suit the mind of combative mankind, on certain occasions the Buddha used words such as "fight," "battle," and "warfare" even to describe the energy and effort exerted towards Nibbāna. On certain occasions, the Buddha pointed this out as a sublime, heroic battle against Māra (the Evil One), a war against Māra fought for the sake of peace, leading all the way to Nibbāna. The verses describing the value of this battle are indeed what we have chosen as our topic today. The background story (nidāna) of these verses concerns the account of Therī Kuṇḍalakesā. That account is found in various places in Dhamma literature with certain minor variations. If we summarize those details, we can present them for this occasion as follows.

In the city of Rājagaha, there lived the sixteen-year-old daughter of a certain merchant (seṭṭhi). Since she was a very beautiful maiden, her parents, for her protection, had her live on the top floor of the mansion, guarded under the watchful eyes of attendants. One day, a certain thief in Rājagaha was caught with stolen goods, sentenced to death by royal decree, and was being taken to the place of execution, being whipped at the four-way crossroads. Hearing the shouts of the crowd, this merchant's daughter looked through the window and, upon seeing this young man—perhaps due to some past association in Saṃsāra—conceived a strong affection and attachment towards him. Having fallen in love, she lay face down on her bed, refused food, and went on a hunger strike. When her mother came and asked, she said, "If I get that young man as my husband, I will live; otherwise, my life will end." They tried to change her mind by pleading in various ways, but failed. Afterwards, the merchant was also informed. Having discussed it together, what did they do in the end? They sent a bribe of a thousand Kahāpaṇas to the chief executioner to release the thief and send him to them. That officer released the thief, executed someone else in his place, and sent word to the king that the thief had been executed. The merchant then gave that thief in marriage to his daughter. Then, wishing to win her husband's heart even more, she attended to him day in and day out with food, drink, and personal care, herself always beautifully adorned with ornaments.

This thief, perhaps due to the habit of his thievish nature brought from birth, began to plot: "How can I kill this woman and take these ornaments?" Having thought of a ruse, one day he refused food and lay on the bed, whereupon the merchant's daughter came and asked: "Why, my lord, is it an illness?" "No," he replied. "Are you displeased with my parents?" "No," he said. When she asked, "Then what is it?" he said, "On the day I was being taken to be executed, I made a vow to make an offering to the deity residing at the mountain called 'Thieves' Cliff' (Chorapapāta), where thieves are thrown down to their death." "It is as a result of that vow that I was released and obtained you." When she asked, "What is required for that offering?" he replied, "Prepare waterless milk-rice (milk-rice prepared without adding water) and roasted paddy with five-fold flowers, etc." Thinking that it was no major task, she prepared those items. But the thief said, "Now, do not go with relatives or attendants. Let the two of us go there together. Also, come well-adorned with your ornaments. We can also make it a pleasure trip." In this manner, they set out. Having arrived, and climbing to the top, he said, "Now, stop the carriage and the attendants here. Let just the two of us go up."

Handing the vessel of offerings to the merchant's daughter to carry on her head, they climbed up the mountain. One side of that mountain could be climbed, while the other side was a sheer precipice. Beyond that was where thieves were thrown off to their death. That is why it was called Chorapapāta Pabbata (Thieves' Cliff Mountain) in those days, as a place of punishment. After they ascended, when she said, "Now let us perform the offering ritual," the thief replied, "I did not come for that. I came with a different intention: to take your ornaments and kill you." She said, "Whose are these ornaments? Whose am I? Why do you do this?" He replied, "I do not understand all that. I am not accustomed to stealing without killing." When he said, "Remove your ornaments and get ready now," she realized: "Now an extremely dangerous situation has come upon me."

"Wisdom is not something cooked and eaten. It is at times like this that wisdom is needed." Realizing this, through her presence of mind, she thought of a strategy. Thinking it over, she said, "This is my last sight of you. Therefore, grant me a single boon: let me circumambulate you, pay my respects, and embrace you while still wearing these ornaments." The thief agreed to this. She also said, "I need to see you clearly." So the thief climbed to the very edge of the cliff and stood there on top of the mountain. Under the guise of circumambulating him three times, she got behind him, grabbed his body firmly, and pushed him down from the mountain; the thief fell and was completely crushed to death. It is further said that the deity residing on that mountain, having witnessed the actions of these two, praised her presence of mind and uttered a certain verse:

> Na so sabbesu ṭhānesu, puriso hoti paṇḍito;

> Paṇḍitā hoti nārīpi, tattha tattha vicakkhaṇā.

"Man is not wise in all situations. Even a woman can be wise in various matters when she possesses discerning intellect."

After things happened in this way, this young woman thought: "If I go home, my parents will scold me. Even if I say my husband tried to kill me for my ornaments, they might not believe it. What shall I do now?" Wandering far away along a forest path, she reached an ascetic hermitage (paribbājakārāma) belonging to the Niganṭhas (Jains). Going to this hermitage where white-robed (Svetāmbara) Niganṭha female ascetics lived, she asked to be ordained. When asked what the monastic practice belonging to that hermitage was, she was told that one of them was plucking out the hair with pincers; she gave her consent to that too. Her hair was plucked out. It is said that because the hair that grew back afterwards was curly, she was called "Kuṇḍalakesā" (Curly-hair). Her previous name was Bhaddā. The name "Bhaddā Kuṇḍalakesā" is what is mentioned in the Sutta discourses. When she asked the ascetics, "What do you teach?" they informed her: "We teach absorptions (jhāna), etc., and on the other hand, we teach a thousand systems of debate, in which proficiency can be attained." So she learned the arts of debate and went around the villages, market towns, and cities of India in those days, debating with those accepted as scholars in those areas. That is what she did after learning debate. It is said she was also known as Jambū Paribbājikā (Rose-apple Wanderer).

When going to those villages and market towns, she customarily used a rose-apple branch as a challenge. Before going for almsround (piṇḍapāta) in a city or market town, she would make a mound of sand at the city gate, plant the rose-apple branch on it, and tell the nearby children: "If there is anyone who wishes to debate with me, let them throw down this rose-apple branch." She would leave it like that for seven days. No one wished to accept that challenge. This was because by then, she had won debates everywhere. In this way, several years must have passed. According to the story, on one occasion she arrived at the city of Sāvatthī, set up a sand mound and planted the rose-apple branch near the city gate in that manner, and went for alms. Meanwhile, Venerable Sāriputta, returning after his almsround, saw this rose-apple branch. Seeing children gathered around it, he asked what it was, and the children explained the situation. Venerable Sāriputta said, "In that case, kick down that rose-apple branch." When they said, "We are afraid to do that," he replied, "No, no, I am telling you to do it. I will take care of it." When he said something like that, the children kicked down the rose-apple branch. When the wanderer returned, she blamed the children, saying, "I have no debate with you!"

So, after being told of the event, she went looking for Venerable Sāriputta. Prior to that, making a great clamor in the city, proclaiming loudly, "Behold, I am going to debate with the ascetics of the Sakyan clan!" she went to the place where Venerable Sāriputta was residing. As mentioned here, he was seated under a tree in the evening. Having gone there to begin the debate, when she asked whose turn it was to question, the female wanderer took the opportunity and asked all one thousand questions of debate. Venerable Sāriputta answered every single question correctly. Next, when it was Venerable Sāriputta's turn, saying "I too shall ask a question," he asked just one question.

"Ekaṃ nāma kiṃ?"—"What is one?" he asked. That question is mentioned in Dhamma literature as one of the ten questions asked by the Buddha to ordain Venerable Sopāka, who attained Arahantship at the age of seven. The standard answer for "Ekaṃ nāma kiṃ" is "Sabbe sattā āhāraṭṭhitikā"—"All beings subsist on nutriment." But Kuṇḍalakesā knew nothing of this. She was bewildered by it; she did not understand it. Confessing, "I do not understand what that is," she admitted defeat and asked him to explain it to her. Venerable Sāriputta said, "This is what is called a Buddha-question." "To explain a Buddha-question, one must receive ordination," he said. She agreed to this. Venerable Sāriputta sent her to a nunnery (bhikkhuṇī-upassaya) and had her ordained as a Bhikkhuṇī (nun). Next, this nun, Kuṇḍalakesā Bhikkhuṇī, listened to the Dhamma from the Buddha. As it is mentioned, immediately upon hearing the discourse, she attained the stage of Stream-entry (Sotāpanna). Furthermore, while pouring water to wash her feet, observing the water flowing away, she very quickly realized the fruit of Arahantship. She attained Arahantship.

On the basis of this event, it is mentioned that a discussion arose among the Sangha about how this Bhikkhuṇī Kuṇḍalakesā, recalling her past history, understood the Dhamma so quickly. They expressed wonder at this: "While as a layperson, she fought such a great battle with a thief and won it!" In this way, they were speaking about her. Having heard this news, the Buddha uttered the two verses we mentioned earlier:

> Yo ce gāthāsataṃ bhāse, anatthapadasaṃhitā,

> Ekaṃ dhammapadaṃ seyyo, yaṃ sutvā upasammati.

"Monks, though one should recite a hundred verses comprising meaningless words, far better is a single word of the Dhamma (teaching/discourse) that brings about peace and stilling. That is the first verse." Next is the second verse:

> Yo sahassaṃ sahassena, saṅgāme mānuse jine;

"Though one should conquer a million men in battle—even if a single individual conquers a million men—far nobler is he who conquers himself. He indeed is the supreme warrior," the Buddha declared. If we consider the facts based on these two verses, it is first of all mentioned in Dhamma literature that this Kuṇḍalakesā attained the foremost position among the Bhikkhuṇīs of this Buddha-sāsana who possess swift intuition (khippābhiññā—understanding the Dhamma instantly). From this, it is evident that it was precisely due to the incident of her quick attainment of Arahantship that she received this foremost position.

It is also said that from a very distant past, starting from the dispensation of Buddha Padumuttara, Therī Bhaddā Kuṇḍalakesā had received definite predictions to obtain the foremost position among the nuns who possess swift intuition (khippābhiññā) in this dispensation of the Buddha. Just as the ascetic Bāhiya Dārucīriya received the chief position on that side—for swift comprehension of the Dhamma. From the events of her lay life as well, we can understand that she was a person of great comprehension and presence of mind. Furthermore, having learned a thousand debates, she went around Jambudvīpa winning in various places. It was the highly wise Venerable Sāriputta who was finally able to tame her. Therefore, we can understand that, in accordance with some past meritorious power, she had attained the capacity for swift comprehension of the Dhamma.

When we reflect on this matter, we see that swift comprehension is indeed a marvelous thing, worthy of special mention. However, in these times, some people think that just by hearing a single word of Dhamma, anyone can realize the Dhamma in this manner. As for the reason for this, we can think of it in this way: nowadays, with the advancement of science and technology, many people try to impose the stimulated concept of "instantaneity" onto spiritual life as well. This is not such an easy thing. Only if a person's faculty of wisdom has been developed through the long-term perfection of Pāramīs can they comprehend the supramundane Dhamma instantly in that manner. Otherwise, it is impossible to measure this matter of wisdom with mundane criteria. To put it briefly, there are certain deep Sutta discourses nowadays, like the Bāhiya Sutta and other special Suttas, which are extremely short. Scholars must have read them twenty or thirty times. But they have still not realized the Dhamma. From that itself, it is evident that thinking of oneself as belonging to the category of khippābhiññā (possessing swift intuition) is a form of delusion. Furthermore, because of this matter, we can bring out some important Dhamma points for this venerable audience to consider.

The Buddha has generally shown four modes of practice (paṭipadā). Depending on the character and abilities of each individual, they can be divided into four modes of practice: painful progress with slow intuition (dukkhā paṭipadā dandhābhiññā), painful progress with swift intuition (dukkhā paṭipadā khippābhiññā), pleasant progress with slow intuition (sukhā paṭipadā dandhābhiññā), and pleasant progress with swift intuition (sukhā paṭipadā khippābhiññā). Thus, they are made into four divisions.

To consider it briefly, the analysis of painful progress and pleasant progress is done in this way. For those whose progress is painful, it is shown that in the Dhamma, when establishing the mind on Nibbāna, or for the penetration of the Path and Fruits, they have to undergo considerable training. Meditation topics of this nature: asubhānupassī kāyasmiṃ viharati—one must dwell contemplating the foulness of the body; likewise, āhāre paṭikūlasaññā—one must develop the perception of repulsiveness in food; sabbaloke anabhiratasaññā—one must dwell with the feeling of non-delight, of disillusionment, towards the entire world; sabbe saṅkhāresu aniccasaññā—in accordance with this, one must develop the perception of impermanence / inconstancy (Anicca) in all preparations / Preparations / volitional activity (Saṅkhāra); next, maraṇasaññā—in this manner, mindfulness of death must constantly be established. Training in this way, so that the nature of suffering / unsatisfactoriness / stress (Dukkha) in this world penetrates the mind deeply, is what is called painful progress (dukkhā paṭipadā). Its opposite is called pleasant progress (sukhā paṭipadā). It is shown that if a person has attained the first, second, third, and fourth absorptions (jhāna), it is very easy for them. From the very attainment of those absorptions, it is clear that defilements such as the hindrances (nīvaraṇa) are suppressed. This indicates that for certain individuals who have well-developed those absorptions, this progress is pleasant.

Next, regarding comprehension, the matter of "slow intuition" (dandhābhiññā) is pointed out. There it is shown that what helps for that comprehension of the Dhamma is what we always mention at the end of Dhamma sermons: faith (saddhā), energy (viriya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā)—these five are what assist in this comprehension of the Dhamma. What is the cause of that slow intuition? It is when those five spiritual faculties (indriya)—faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom—are in a soft, undeveloped, or immature state. "Khippābhiññā" (swift intuition) occurs when those five faculties (pañcindriya) have fully matured. Then, those who have pleasant progress and swift intuition (sukhā paṭipadā khippābhiññā) are skilled in both aspects. They have strong power of absorption (jhāna). Also, regarding comprehension, their five faculties—faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom—are highly developed. It is in this sense that the progress is divided into four.

The Buddha has shown that when we consider individuals, they too can be classified into four types: ugghaṭitaññū, vipañcitaññū, neyya, and padaparama.

Ugghaṭitaññū means those who comprehend the Dhamma the moment it is briefly indicated, even by a small hint. We can think of Bāhiya Dārucīriya, and also Bhaddā Kuṇḍalakesā in this regard. Such individuals can understand the Dhamma very easily. For them, even an extremely short discourse by the Buddha is sufficient. Next, vipañcitaññū refers to those who realize the Dhamma after a detailed discourse. The neyya person is of a lesser category of individual than that. The neyya person has to be led as if by the hand; the Dhamma must be explained to them constantly. They need to ask questions. Furthermore, they must associate with noble friends (kalyāṇa-mitta). They must engage in wise attention / radical attention (Yoniso manasikāra). Only after doing many such activities can that person attain comprehension of the Dhamma. Concerning the padaparama (one for whom the word is the maximum) person, it is stated in the Dhamma as follows: even if that person memorizes the Dhamma, due to some lack of supportive past conditions, they cannot realize the Paths and Fruits in this life. No matter how much they learn, or how well they memorize the Dhamma, they cannot realize the Paths and Fruits in this life. Yet, a padaparama person should not give up, because the effort made in this life will serve as a support for the next life. Thus, the four types of individuals are presented.

Looking at this, those who think of themselves as ugghaṭitaññū (possessing instant realization) do not want to start from the alphabet level. But in reality, do they belong to that category? Indeed, those who dwell in such conceit can never understand this Dhamma. They must humbly return to the very beginning. Because they must come to the threefold training (tividha-sikkhā) of virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). Precisely due to their learning, some think: "Faith and virtue are teachings meant for foolish lay-devotees." "These are of no use to us. We are highly intellectual people. What we need is that when a single word is said, we understand everything." Rejecting that basic, gradual path of practice, they carry wisdom on their shoulders and expect liberation through that alone. As we said before, this is an overrunning of the concept of "instant gratification" found in science and technology.

We all know that in this era of the decline of the Sāsana, and even when we consider the environment, this is not an era favorable to spiritual life. Likewise, we must accept that if those who could understand quickly were rare even in the Buddha's time, they must indeed be extremely rare in this day and age. Therefore, we should not take these matters too lightly. If we take them casually, we will never obtain results. We must humbly return to the very beginning and do what needs to be done first, first. The Buddha too has stated that if someone abandons what should be done first and leaps into other things, they will have to regret it someday. That is a point we can consider in this regard. We stated this based on the meaning of the first verse: rather than a hundred verses of no benefit or purpose, a single word of the Dhamma leading to the comprehension of Dhamma, stilling (vūpasama), and calming, is superior.

Indeed, there are certain short discourses in the Dhamma through which some disciples realized the Dhamma very quickly. But for others, those must be explained in detail, and they must undergo a certain training in respect of them.

Next, let us look at the idea in the second verse. Even if a certain giant or warrior conquers a million men all by himself, the one who conquers himself is said to be far nobler. What is this "conquering of oneself"? This concept presented by the Buddha is unique. Because to a world weary of bloodshed and war, the Buddha introduced the concept of conquering oneself. This can be called "self-conquest" (ātma-vijaya). In the world, there is the conquest of directions and countries. That conquest is achieved by killing human beings. Many hope to toast and celebrate such a victory. But the Buddha did not consider that a noble victory. Why? Not only do those individuals have to pay for the unwholesome karma (akusala) arising from that victory, but they also cannot obtain true liberation, solace, or peace through it. Both the victor and the defeated are helpless in the face of death. But this "conquering of oneself" pointed out by the Buddha is, in truth, the conquering of death. It is in that sense that, as we mentioned earlier, the Buddha brought words like "fight" and "battle" close to this path of practice.

We all know that terms like "battle with Māra" (Māra-saṅgrāma) and "fight with Māra" are mentioned everywhere the path of practice is discussed. Through this, the combative nature inherent in human beings is directed towards a wholesome path. The highest, noblest victory is conquering oneself. No matter how much else one conquers, as long as one is subjected to defilements (kilesa), there is no real victory or solace for oneself. Not only that, due to those sinful actions, one is caught even more in those very bonds of Saṃsāra. What worldly battles do is not release one from bonds (bandhana), but rather multiply them. This battle pointed out by the Buddha, the battle with Māra, is one that goes towards the goal of release from bonds and conquering death. That is why there is a verse, like a battle cry, which the Buddha frequently used and approved for the daily practice of meditating monks (yogāvacara Sangha):

> Ārabhatha nikkhamatha,

> Yuñjatha buddhasāsane;

> Dhunātha maccuno senaṃ,

> Naḷāgāraṃva kuñjaro.

"Exert! Venture forth! Engage in the Buddha's dispensation! Shatter the army of Death (Maccu), as an elephant crushes a reed-hut." There, an army of Māra (Death) is spoken of. That does not mean killing human beings; it refers to the defilements (kilesa-dhamma). In the accounts of the Buddha's Enlightenment, the army of Māra is described as: sensual pleasures, craving / thirst (Taṇhā), then discontent with the practice, hunger and thirst, doubt and skepticism (vicikicchā)—all such things that arise from within the mind. These defiling states (kilesa-dhamma) that hold one back from progressing are what are deeply shown as the army of Māra. Reflecting in this way, the defeat of Māra means conquering the host of defilements within oneself. Appropriate words for this are frequently found in the Dhamma:

> Mā nivattatha abhikkama

"Do not turn back, press forward!" Not only that, in matters concerning the Sangha, ordination is described as donning armor—like receiving armor for the battle with Māra. It is as armor for this battle against defilements that the Sangha wear the robes—not for anything else, not for any other battle. Such a concept is seen in this Dhamma.

The value of this self-conquest must also be contemplated. Since the desire for victory has existed in everyone since ancient times, they either conquer countries in all directions through world conquest (dig-vijaya), or reaching the limits of the ocean, they then conquer countries beyond the ocean. Then, when even that is not enough, they seek to conquer the stars and planets in the sky. No matter how they achieve victory, they are all subject to death. Even if one goes to the moon and returns—we all know about the heroes who went to the moon and came back. But we have not yet heard that they became immortal.

Thus, looking at it in that way, it was this conquest of oneself that the Buddha presented to the world as the supreme concept. Conquering oneself is, in truth, conquering death. By overcoming ignorance (avijjā) and craving / thirst (Taṇhā), and thereby conquering this host of defilements, one can stand unshaken in the face of death. Having no further rebirth, and because of abandoning craving / thirst (Taṇhā) and grasping / holding / fuel (Upādāna), that person obtains true solace. That is why the Buddha pointed to this as the highest victory. Now, for that victory, just as for a battle, an army organization is necessary. If we turn our attention to that required army organization—speaking in the military terminology fitting for these times—the Buddha has presented a valuable system of Dhamma groups regarding army organization.

We can identify this army organization as the "Thirty-Seven Requisites of Enlightenment" (sattis-bodhipakkhiya-dhamma). They are so important that, as mentioned in the Mahāparinibbāna Sutta, at the time of passing away, the Buddha summarized everything he had taught up to then—not as a pile of books to be kept in libraries, not in the way we describe Dhamma nowadays, but in a practical sense. He declared: "Monks, those Dhammas which have been directly known and taught by me, namely..." and he mentioned these: the Four Foundations of Mindfulness (cattāro satipaṭṭhānā), the Four Right Efforts (cattāro sammappadhānā), the Four Bases of Power (cattāro iddhipādā), the Five Faculties (pañcindriyā), the Five Powers (pañca balā), the Seven Factors of Enlightenment (satta bojjhaṅgā), and the Noble Eightfold Path (ariyo aṭṭhaṅgiko maggo). According to this, it is these seven groups of Dhamma that we can think of as the Buddha's army. It is these that we must develop within our minds. There is a training here that begins with the Four Foundations of Mindfulness and culminates in the Noble Eightfold Path.

If we analyze it in the same way, now you all know the Four Foundations of Mindfulness very well. Contemplation of the body (kāyānupassanā), contemplation of feeling / sensation (Vedanā) (vedanānupassanā), contemplation of the mind (cittānupassanā), and contemplation of mind-objects (dhammānupassanā)—this basic training is the primary military training received by the warrior of the meditating monk (yogāvacara). It is on the ground of the Four Foundations of Mindfulness that the first training is received, the military training is obtained. Through that exercise, the meditating warrior brings forth the fourfold energy called the Four Right Efforts (cattāro sammappadhānā). If we mention that fourfold energy in brief, it is as follows: to prevent the arising of unarisen unwholesome states, to abandon arisen unwholesome states, to arouse unarisen wholesome states, and to maintain and consolidate arisen wholesome states. This fourfold energy is what the meditator develops through training on the ground of the Four Foundations of Mindfulness. Next, through that very energy, the meditator is able to realize what the strategies are to win this battle.

Let us say there are four strategies to win this battle. What are those four? They are the Bases of Power (iddhipāda). Venerable ones, "iddhi" does not mean merely flying through the air. It refers to the power to fulfill a certain hope, the idea of achieving success. So, iddhipāda means the paths to success. The Buddha has presented four paths leading to successful achievement. These can be understood to a certain extent even in relation to mundane matters, not only supramundane ones. What are they? Desire (chanda), energy (viriya), mind/consciousness (citta), and investigation (vīmaṃsā). Chanda means a strong aspiration or willingness. If one has a strong willingness for something, by putting that willingness forward and placing it in the forefront, one can fulfill one's hopes and overcome a problem. Likewise, viriya means energy. There are certain energetic temperaments who can endure anything without fear, disregarding body and life. The viriya-iddhipāda (base of power of energy) suits those of energetic temperament. There are some who can realize Nibbāna and perform meditation activities, etc., by making energy primary. Citta means the power of determination/mind. There are some who give foremost place to determination: "If I have made up my mind, I will not give up; I will not stop somehow or other." We can call that too a battle strategy. Finally, vīmaṃsā: investigative wisdom. There, the meaning is wisdom. Wisdom. Those who have the power of wisdom bring forward investigative wisdom. It is stated in the Dhamma that even if one has just one of these four kinds of iddhipāda, it is sufficient to win on the battlefield. Even if one does not have all four, depending on the temperament of each individual, some make chanda (desire) primary. Venerable Raṭṭhapāla, for instance, went in accordance with faith, making chanda primary to achieve his goal of Nibbāna. Similarly, some make energy primary, and so on.

Next are the Five Faculties and Five Powers (pañcindriya, pañca balā). Going further, we can understand that according to this analogy, what is spoken of here are not the mundane "five powers." One must arouse and produce five faculties (indriya). Those five faculties are what we mentioned earlier: faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom—the five faculties/powers that assist in achieving the task of Nibbāna and seeing Nibbāna. These are developed as faculties (indriya) and, likewise, with their help, in the sense of conquering opposing states, those same five are shown as "powers" (bala-dhamma). Under both faculties and powers, those five—faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom—are mentioned. Next, once they are all well developed and sharpened, on the basis of that strength, seven factors that aid Enlightenment are lined up. Those are the seven: mindfulness (sati), investigation of states (dhamma-vicaya), energy (viriya), joy (pīti), tranquility (passaddhi), concentration (samādhi), and equanimity (upekkhā). Those seven factors of enlightenment (bojjhaṅga) are very close to Nibbāna. When those seven factors of enlightenment are developed, it is as if one is close to Nibbāna. Having completed their development, the "final operation"—to use modern terminology—is indeed the Eightfold Path.

The final operation employed for this victory over Māra is indeed the Noble Eightfold Path. That is why we always speak of the Noble Eightfold Path. Sometimes other things are forgotten. That is why even scholars forget that one must begin with the Four Foundations of Mindfulness. We frequently use the term "Noble Eightfold Path." But to reach that level, one must come from that very beginning. One must obtain training on that battlefield. That is what we are specifically reminding you of. What is this Noble Eightfold Path? It is a path of completely integrated, wonderfully great power. Now, in other places, these are introduced individually and separately. From the way those Pāli words are used—such as cattāro satipaṭṭhānā, cattāro sammappadhānā, etc.—we see that they are introduced as if separated. But concerning the Noble Eightfold Path, it is expressed as ariyo aṭṭhaṅgiko maggo. This is shown as a single unit. These eight are fully integrated and linked to one another. This is the final operation. Indeed, it is a completely interconnected, immensely powerful process that is shown under the name of the Noble Eightfold Path.

Now, if we look, in the Noble Eightfold Path there is also Right Mindfulness (sammā-sati). In that case, can someone who has not developed the Four Foundations of Mindfulness have Right Mindfulness? No, indeed. That is why we say everyone must understand that the Four Foundations of Mindfulness is the place where the basic training on the battlefield is received. That is exactly what the Buddha told Venerable Sāriputta: "Establish every newly ordained monk in the Four Foundations of Mindfulness." In modern times, perhaps, they are established in it only at the very end. But the Buddha told Venerable Sāriputta: "Sāriputta, establish everyone who is newly ordained in this dispensation in the Four Foundations of Mindfulness." The final operation of that basic training—the power gained from it—is: the four right efforts emerged as sammappadhāna; those four strategies emerged as iddhipāda; then, having developed the faculties, powers, and factors of enlightenment, the special alignment necessary for comprehension. After developing those teachings, the very energy that has been filtered and seasoned through them is what helps one towards Nibbāna as the Noble Eightfold Path.

You all know about the Noble Eightfold Path. The ordinary world has a superficial understanding of it, thinking of Right View (sammā-diṭṭhi), Right Intention (sammā-saṅkappa), and so on, in a mundane way. If taken deeply, "Right View" is to be understood as the comprehension of the Truth. Among those, the ten-fold mundane Right View is the Right View relevant to ordinary Saṃsāra. But what helps for release from Saṃsāra is the correct vision regarding the Four Noble Truths. Making that correct vision primary, it goes all the way to correct thoughts and intentions; in accordance with those thoughts and intentions, as we frequently mention, correct speech and action; in accordance with those, correct livelihood; through that livelihood, correct effort; through correct effort, correct mindfulness—sati, good mindfulness—and finally, Right Concentration (sammā-samādhi), which is the unification of the mind.

That supramundane path-concentration (magga-samādhi) is indeed the most powerful concentration in the world. It is through that path-concentration that instantly... we can describe the Noble Eightfold Path as a high-speed path. It is direct. Precisely because it is direct, the Buddha has declared that this is a straight path.

"On the straight path to the Unprepared / Unconditioned / Uncompounded (Asaṅkhata), go, do not turn back!" The Buddha has declared: "gacchatha"—go on, or march forward, on the straight path. "mā nivattatha"—do not turn back. Do not retreat. Why? Because it is a path that can be traversed with such fearlessness. But since some devotees come and ask us about this Noble Eightfold Path as an additional question, we shall try to clarify that too on this occasion.

Now, the word "magga" (path) is also applied to the Four Foundations of Mindfulness. You may have heard that the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta discourse begins with:

> Ekāyano ayaṃ, bhikkhave, maggo sattānaṃ visuddhiyā, sokaparidevānaṃ samatikkamāya, dukkhadomanassānaṃ atthaṅgamāya, ñāyassa adhigamāya, nibbānassa sacchikiriyāya.

That is how it begins. So, what is this "ekāyana" path? This is interpreted in various ways. Is this the "sole" path? If this is the sole path, why did the Buddha state elsewhere regarding the Noble Eightfold Path:

> Eso'va maggo natth'añño, dassanassa visuddhiyā.

"This is the path, there is no other, for the purification of vision." Thus, the Buddha declares this regarding the Noble Eightfold Path itself.

In that case, what is meant here by "ekāyana maggo"? That word must be understood in the correct manner. "Ekāyana" means, venerable ones, a path that has no branchings in between, which can be traversed with absolute certainty. If there were branchings in between, upon reaching them, one would have to ask, "Where do we go from here?" "Ekāyana" means this path goes and merges straight into the Eightfold Path. The path that begins with the Four Foundations of Mindfulness merges straight into the Noble Eightfold Path. It does not wander here and there. It is in that sense, venerable ones, that this is called the "ekāyana" path. That is exactly what is said there: Ekāyano ayaṃ, bhikkhave, maggo sattānaṃ visuddhiyā—for the purification of beings, sokaparidevānaṃ samatikkamāya—for the overcoming of sorrow and lamentation, for the ending of suffering / unsatisfactoriness / stress (Dukkha) and grief, ñāyassa adhigamāya—for attaining the Method (Ñāya). "Ñāya" refers to that very Noble Eightfold Path. It is a name for the Noble Eightfold Path. It is the supramundane Noble Eightfold Path itself that is called "Ñāya." Thus, it is a path that leads surely to obtaining the Noble Eightfold Path. Finally, nibbānassa sacchikiriyāya—for the realization of Nibbāna.

It is by confusing these two that some people have created problems. "Are these two different paths?" Merely because "ekāyana" is said there, it does not mean "only path" in that sense. That is what must be kept in mind. This is a certain path. This is a path that does not turn off into side-roads. It goes and merges straight into the Noble Eightfold Path. That merging occurs only if one develops it in that manner. It is not something that proceeds through books. Practically, it is something that happens within the heart. It is an internal development of the path. That is precisely why we said it is like military training. Having received that military training in the Four Foundations of Mindfulness, in the end, a good army division is formed, and finally, the final operation is the Noble Eightfold Path—the supramundane Noble Eightfold Path.

That is how the battle must be won. That too, in four stages. In the stages of Sotāpanna, Sakadāgāmi, Anāgāmi, and Arahant, the path-mind (magga-citta) becomes progressively powerful. The path-mind in the first stage (Sotāpanna) is surpassed in strength in the second stage; in the third stage of Anāgāmi, it is even more powerful. It is in the fourth stage (Arahant) that, having destroyed all defilements and shattered that mass of darkness, one breaks through ignorance (avijjā), which the Buddha described as an impenetrable mass of darkness. If we speak merely by way of metaphor, we say "entering the City of Nibbāna." We say "City of Nibbāna" only as an analogy. We ourselves do not endorse treating it as a literal city. But in terms of the metaphor used, in terms of this analogy, the final operation of that army organization goes and breaks down the gate—like breaking down the gate of Vijitapura—breaks through, and behold! Finally enters the City of Nibbāna, or rather, realizes Nibbāna.

We are speaking by putting this concept of battle in the forefront, because the concept of battle is appealing to the human mind. Also, we know that if a small child is fond of something, to draw them away from it, we must give them something similar. Similarly, we know that throughout history, human beings have made efforts, enduring pain and hardships, to attain world domination and empires, in order to cultivate the pride of victory. In that respect, even history recognizes Emperor Dharmāsoka as the greatest hero of all history. Although he achieved victory by killing hundreds of thousands of people, he abandoned that after discovering this conquest of Dhamma (dhamma-vijaya), or rather, this self-conquest (ātma-vijaya), once he turned to the side of the Dhamma. From that too, it is understood that conquering oneself is supreme.

Accordingly, we must reflect, we must adjust our thinking if there are shortcomings, and we too must give foremost place to the Buddha's word. We must give the Buddha's Dhamma a place superior to all other mundane concepts. That is how we must think. One can make that "conquering of oneself" meaningful in that manner. Indeed, it is when a battle comes that one's own strength is brought out. That is exactly what is presented by that concept of Māra. Sometimes, when a defilement arises, even the Buddha would declare... because when one just says "it is a defilement," it does not strike the mind. But the moment he says, "Look, monk, there is Māra! Māra is right there!" that monk becomes vigilant. As said, there is an ascription of personality there. That helps to prepare our mind. Since saying we are fighting with lifeless mental states does not strike the heart, we personify them and call them "Māra." Utilizing even that support, in whatever way, this is all there is to do: to escape from this Saṃsāra. To conquer death. That is what is called self-conquest—conquering oneself. That is the concept we must develop.

So, through this, we can bring out many valuable points, many valuable things. As we mentioned, some scholars in these times have created another problem: "Now, the Noble Eightfold Path begins with Right View." It is analyzed in this way: "Right View and Right Intention belong to the wisdom group (paññā-kkhandha); Right Effort, Right Mindfulness, and Right Concentration belong to the concentration group (samādhi-kkhandha)." Looking at it in that way, first comes wisdom, then virtue, and then concentration. Taking that logically, some try to give foremost place to this wisdom. But that is a completely wrong understanding.

It is mentioned in the Dhamma itself. On one occasion, Bhikkhuṇī Dhammadinnā, in response to a question by her former lay husband, Visākha Upāsaka, says the following (mentioning it briefly due to time constraints): what is the question? Visākha Upāsaka asks: "Noble Lady, is the threefold training of virtue, concentration, and wisdom included in the Noble Eightfold Path, or is the Noble Eightfold Path included in the threefold training of virtue, concentration, and wisdom?" He asked this because even in the past, there were questions just like the ones we have today. What is the answer to that? The threefold training of virtue, concentration, and wisdom was not arranged by the Noble Eightfold Path; rather, the Noble Eightfold Path was arranged under the three groups of virtue, concentration, and wisdom. Through this, we must understand that the division into virtue, concentration, and wisdom is more primary than the Noble Eightfold Path. It is to that division that foremost place must be given. Just as we give foremost place to it, we must also give it place at the end.

That is why, in the poignant account showing how the Buddha, even with such a severe illness, journeyed from village to village, we find a passage where he preached the entirety of the Dhamma in brief:

> Iti sīlaṃ, iti samādhi, iti paññā. Sīlaparibhāvito samādhi mahapphalo hoti mahānisaṃso. Samādhiparibhāvitā paññā mahapphalā hoti mahānisaṃsā. Paññāparibhāvitaṃ cittaṃ sammadeva āsavehi vimuccati.

In a single passage, he summarized and showed the entire Dhamma: "Such is virtue, such is concentration, such is wisdom." Concentration fully developed through virtue is of great fruit and great benefit. Wisdom fully developed through concentration is of great fruit and great benefit. Next, paññāparibhāvitaṃ cittaṃ—the mind developed through wisdom, the mind grown in accordance with wisdom, sammadeva āsavehi vimuccati—is fully liberated from the taints (āsava). That is a passage summarizing the entire Dhamma. Based on that, we can surely understand that the three—virtue, concentration, and wisdom—are primary. The Noble Eightfold Path is something built on that, arising through it.

Likewise, we must understand that when we speak of a "path," Right View (sammā-diṭṭhi) must naturally come to the beginning. Even if we think of a gradual transformation of personal character, that too must begin with Right View. It is in accordance with one's view (diṭṭhi) that one's thoughts and intentions arise. In accordance with thoughts and intentions, words are spoken. In accordance with words, actions are performed. It is because of this systematic, gradual path of practice, which is connected in a wonderfully interconnected manner, integrated and organically blended, that it is called ariyo aṭṭhaṅgiko maggo (the Noble Eightfold Path). It is shown as a single unit, whereas the others are shown separately. Although the four foundations of mindfulness, the four bases of power, and so on are listed separately, in the end, the Noble Eightfold Path is a single unit. When the supramundane path arises, it happens so instantly that all those eight factors arise in a single mind-moment. That instant moment where all eight factors arise simultaneously in a single mind is the powerful concentration: the path-concentration. It is through that concentration that one can realize the Unconditioned.

It is precisely because you all ask questions in various ways regarding this path of Dhamma that we summarized and presented many facts in accordance with this topic. You must reflect on this, not letting these matters remain limited to books, but practically drawing them close to your daily life, and proceeding on your path of virtue, concentration, and wisdom. Depending on your respective abilities—if not ugghaṭitaññū, then vipañcitaññū; if not that, then neyya—in whatever way, aligning with your capacity and putting forth maximum energy in these final times of the Buddha's dispensation, dedicating a place greater than for anything else to this task, may this Dhamma sermon surely serve as a supportive condition for you to escape from this extremely dangerous Saṃsāra, to practice this listening, meditation, virtue, concentration, and wisdom, and to bring an end to this suffering / unsatisfactoriness / stress (Dukkha) of Saṃsāra. Wish and aspire in this manner.

If, through this, you have developed the spiritual faculties and powers of faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom, may that surely serve as a strong support (upanissaya) for you to realize the Paths and Fruits in this very life, with the help of the association with noble friends. Not only that: if any wholesome store of merit has been gathered through this Dhamma sermon in this seen and unseen world, may all beings, from Avīci to Akaniṭṭha, including the deceased relatives in whose names we do so, who wish to rejoice in this merit of listening to and delivering the Dhamma, rejoice in it likewise; and, with the help of that store of merit, may they as quickly as possible escape from all the suffering / unsatisfactoriness / stress (Dukkha) of Saṃsāra—such as birth / arising (Jāti), decay, aging, and death (Decay and Death / Aging and Death / Jarāmaraṇa), sickness, and so forth—and find solace in the supreme, deathless Nibbāna! Reciting these verses, let us share the merits.

Dhammapada 118 (Pupphavagga)

Dear Listeners,

Through faith in kamma and the fruit of kamma (kamma-phala), an opportunity is provided for a person to steer their life in the right direction. He who does not have a correct understanding of merit (puñña), demerit (pāpa), wholesome (kusala), and unwholesome (akusala) actions gets lost in this samsāra and falls into Suffering / Unsatisfactoriness / Stress (dukkha). Therefore, the Buddha almost constantly reminds us of the value of a life inclined and oriented towards merit (puñña). The verse taken as our theme also illustrates such an occasion. The background story (nidāna-kathā) related to this verse also presents a fine example of the value of merit.

The Great Arahant Mahā Kassapa, having entered into meditative absorption (samāpatti) in the Pipphalī Cave in the city of Rājagaha, emerged from that absorption after seven days and scanned with his divine eye (dibba-cakkhu) to find a suitable place to wander for alms-food (piṇḍapāta). He saw a farm-woman parching corn near a paddy field. At the same time, he reflected whether this woman possessed enough faith (saddhā) to perform an act of merit by offering alms (dāna). He realized that she was a very faithful woman. Thinking, "If I go there, she will be able to accumulate a vast store of merit," and out of great compassion, the Great Arahant Mahā Kassapa journeyed to that paddy field. That farm-woman, seeing the Venerable Thera, was filled with five-fold joy, and with great happiness, took those puffed rice (lājā) and offered them into the bowl of the Venerable Thera, and prostrated herself, worshipping him with the five-fold touch. Having worshipped, she made an aspiration (patthanā): "Venerable Sir, whatever truth (Dhamma) you have realized, may this merit be a supportive condition for me to attain that same Dhamma!" The Venerable Thera also expressed his appreciation and blessed her: "May it be so!"

While this farm-woman was returning with a very joyful mind, a highly venomous serpent—it must have been a cobra—lying on the ridge of the field bit her calf. She fell dead right there.

However, instantly, as if waking up from a dream, this woman was reborn in a golden mansion in the Tāvatiṁsa heaven. The unique feature of that mansion was that garlands of puffed rice were hanging all over, from side to side. This woman reflected: "How did I receive such a grand fortune?" It became clear to her: "I received this from that small act of merit." Then she thought, "If I could obtain such a fortune from such a small act of merit, then I should not fall into negligence (pramāda). Being diligent (appamatta), I must further secure this fortune of mine by doing more merit." Thinking thus, at the break of dawn, she went to the hut where the Great Arahant Mahā Kassapa was residing and began to perform duties (vatta-paṭivatta), sweeping the courtyard of his dwelling with a golden broom and a basket as described there, and filling the water pots. When the Great Arahant Mahā Kassapa looked, all these chores had been done. He thought that some novice monk must have come and performed these duties. This happened on the second day too, and he thought in the same way. On the third day, hearing the sound of sweeping at the dawn-hour, the Great Arahant Mahā Kassapa looked in that direction and saw a certain light shining through the keyhole of the door—the light of that deity (devatā). Seeing it, he opened the door and asked, "Who is sweeping here?" This goddess is known as 'Lājā Devadhītā'—the Puffed-Rice Deity. 'Lājā' means puffed rice; she is known by that name. When asked, "Who is it?" she replied:

"I am your attendant, Lājā Devadhītā."

"I do not know of any attendant of mine. Who are you?"

"The other day, after offering you puffed rice, as I was walking away, I was bitten by a snake and died. Immediately, I obtained this state. Now I thought that I must secure this celestial fortune, and must diligently perform meritorious deeds."

You have heard that the Great Arahant Mahā Kassapa was one of extreme ascetic practices, a Thera observing austere dhutaṅga practices. Even though he had kindly provided her the opportunity to make that alms offering out of compassion, when he looked at this situation in relation to his strict ascetic path, he spoke somewhat sternly: "Who performed these duties yesterday and the day before?" When she replied, "It was I," he said, "What you have done is quite enough. Do not come to this area hereafter." Then she began to weep. "O Venerable Sir, please permit me to further increase and secure my merit and enhance my fortune." But the Great Arahant Mahā Kassapa said, "If you continue to do this, in the future, Dhamma preachers during their sermons will say that even the Great Kassapa received personal services and duties from a goddess. Do not leave room for such talk. Therefore, do not even come near this area," and he sent her away. Then she rose into the sky, weeping, and repeatedly saying, "O Venerable Sir, please permit me." As she refused to leave, the Great Kassapa snapped his fingers, saying, "This woman does not know her limits. Go away from here!" Only after that finger-snap, under the power of his spiritual majesty, was the goddess unable to remain there any longer. Flying into the sky, she lamented her grief. While she was lamenting, the Buddha, who was residing in the Fragrant Chamber (Gandhakuṭi) of Jetavana Monastery in Sāvatthi, heard the sound of her weeping. He reflected upon it and, out of compassion for her, projected a ray of light, appearing as if he were standing right in front of her, and delivered the very Dhamma verse we took as our theme.

What is expressed by that verse, in short, is a sort of balanced, middle-way statement delivered by the Buddha to comfort the deity: "It is my son Kassapa's right to protect his restraint. Likewise, it is also valuable for those who perform merit to be enthusiastic about the merit that belongs to them." Making such a balanced statement, he uttered this verse of our theme. Let us recall it once again:

Puññañ ce puriso kayirā, kayirāthetaṁ punappunaṁ, tamhi chandaṁ kayirātha, sukho puññassa uccayo.

"If a person should perform merit, he should do it again and again. He should develop a desire (chanda), a liking, a keenness for that merit. What is the reason for this? Sukho puññassa uccayo—the accumulation of merit is happiness; it is a cause for happiness." Thus, a simple explanation was presented. It is said that upon hearing this verse, that faithful goddess attained the fruit of Stream-entry (sotāpatti-phala). This is a very brief story, but through it, we are shown how merit supports a human being to make their life happy, as mentioned before.

Let us now reflect upon this verse. In this verse, what the Buddha actually intended was merit (puñña). That is to say, after performing a meritorious deed, a person should not stop at that single instance thinking, "This merit is enough for my entire life," but should do it punappunaṁ—again and again. If one performs merit, and once it is completed, without being complacent, one should perform that merit again and again. When there is no opportunity to perform merit, or when one is unable to do so, at the very least, one should generate a desire or a keenness for it in one's mind. When you contemplate a little, you will understand the importance of generating this keenness. If we do not incline and orient our minds towards merit, if we do foster a desire for merit even during times when we are not actively performing it, we will hesitate and hold back when an opportunity to perform merit actually arises. We will remain indecisive. But for one who always thinks, "Oh, if only I could perform some merit!"—this 'desire' (chanda) is a very important factor in this Dhamma. It is called the desire for the wholesome (kusalacchanda)—the keenness or liking to perform merit. A person who possesses this will step forward, saying "I will do it, I will do it," to take charge of that meritorious work and lend a hand to it. Such is its strength.

Sometimes, if that desire (chanda) is absent when one is not performing merit, and if the mind has not been prepared accordingly, the opportunity to do merit slips away. Later, one thinks, "Ah, I missed the opportunity to perform that merit; I was just thinking about it." That is why, although it is a small verse, we can understand that it contains a very deep meaning. Why are we asked to perform merit again and again? Because the accumulation of merit is happiness. The accumulation of merit is a cause that brings happiness both in this world and in the next in samsāra. This, in brief, is the meaning of this verse.

Next, let us consider the meaning of this story and the verse further. Generally, this matter of merit is something extremely close to our lives. Therefore, it is not merely about doing it, nor about doing it for the sake of doing it, or doing it with expectations of fame and status. Rather, what is important is to understand the value of merit in its true sense according to the Dhamma and then perform it. Hence, even within the story related to this theme, there is a certain depth. First of all, let us contemplate the practice of the Great Arahant Mahā Kassapa. Indeed, if he had been fasting for seven days and possessed the divine eye, some might wonder why he did not go to royal palaces or mansions of wealthy merchants for alms-food. The Great Arahant Mahā Kassapa was a Thera of wonderful, severe ascetic virtues who observed dhutaṅga practices. It was his custom that after emerging from meditative absorption, the opportunity to give alms was granted to the poor and destitute. He mostly wandered for alms among poor huts, regardless of whatever he might receive. This was because he possessed such great compassion. It was not about securing a rich, heavy meal. At that moment—meaning when a monk wanders for alms immediately after emerging from meditative absorption—if one gets the opportunity to offer him alms, it becomes of great fruit and great benefit (mahapphala mahānisaṁsa). That is why he always took the trouble to grant this opportunity to a poor person. On this occasion too, he journeyed to the paddy field not for any grand, heavy food, but for some light puffed rice that floats in the wind, which might seem insufficient even to sustain a person. Yet, he accepted with great joy the puffed rice that the woman brought and offered with faith. It was not a grand offering, yet through the benefit of offering that little puffed rice, she obtained even celestial fortune.

Furthermore, we see that after obtaining that fortune, she made a great effort to further secure that merit and to perform merit again and again through duties and services. Although there was nothing wrong with that, the Great Arahant Mahā Kassapa opposed it and did not give his consent due to a certain scriptural purpose. This was because, through such actions, future human beings might fall into the unwholesome kamma of disparaging Noble Ones (ariya-upavāda). We call this "looking to the future"—that is, he followed these practices out of compassion for future generations. Although his action might seem unkind, it reflects this underlying thought: if future members of the Saṅgha were to say, "Even such-and-and-such deities came and performed services for us," it could lead to wrong understandings. At that moment, he firmly dismissed her using words that befitted his restraint.

Yet, the Buddha, with amazing compassion, resolved the issue from both sides in a balanced way, giving a middle-way answer: "Why? My son Mahā Kassapa did what was his duty. For those who perform merit, either they perform it when they can—as this verse states, they do merit when possible, and when they cannot, they at least generate the desire (chanda) for it." That itself is sufficient for a person. That is to say, when one keeps thinking, "Oh, if only I could somehow perform some merit!" one remains in a wholesome state of mind. It is for such a person, when the opportunity to do merit arrives, that the strength to step forward and lend a hand, to take charge of those activities, arises instantly—as it is said in the Dhamma: "Ahaṁ ahaṁ mitā, ahaṁ ahaṁ"—"I am here, I am here." Even though this is a short verse, there is a vital point here. We can understand many things through this verse of the Buddha.

Next, if we reflect on merit (puñña) in general, the final line here—usually the final line of verses expresses some theory or fundamental principle—states:

Sukho puññassa uccayo

"The accumulation of merit is happiness." The Buddha concludes the verse with this. Let us now direct our minds to this. First, let us see what this merit (puñña) is. It is said that we all know what merit is to the extent that it needs no further explanation. Even so, let us pay some attention to it. According to the Dhamma, in the scriptures, three main types of merit are shown:

Tīṇimāni bhikkhave puññakiriyavatthūni

Three grounds for making merit, or three bases of meritorious activity, namely: dāna (giving/generosity), sīla (morality/virtue), and bhāvanā (meditative development). We can generally understand that this refers to a certain spiritual strength developed in the mind through the acts of giving, observing virtue, and practicing meditation. In other places, this is expanded into ten items. You may have heard of them by the name Dasa puññakiriyavatthu—the ten bases of meritorious activity. In addition to dāna, sīla, and bhāvanā, they include: sharing of merit (pattidāna), rejoicing in others' merit (pattānumodanā), rendering services/duties (veyyāvacca), showing reverence to those worthy of respect (apacāyana), teaching the Dhamma (desanā), listening to the Dhamma (savana), and finally, straightening one's right view (diṭṭhijukamma). Thus, ten meritorious activities are shown under the ten bases of meritorious activity.

Now, here too, it was because performing duties (vatta-paṭivatta) is also a form of merit that this woman, not being satisfied with her giving (dāna) alone, was enthusiastic to perform services as well. These are things we can do in our daily lives, even in small ways, according to the opportunities that come our way, even if we might think that acts of giving involve high expenses. Now, those puffed rice were such a small thing. Yet, through that, the Great Arahant Mahā Kassapa received the strength to survive for a day. The food of such a noble Thera was puffed rice. From this, we can see that we should not regard these things as trivial. Moreover, what serves as the support in performing that merit is the mind and faith (saddhā). That is precisely why we think the Buddha declared Saddhā dhanaṁ—faith is a treasure. Faith is shown as a treasure. Why does faith become a treasure? We must reflect on this. What does it mean to have faith in the Triple Gem? What is the Triple Gem? We must first think about this. The Triple Gem (Tri-vidha Ratna). There is a great depth in this concept of "Gem" (Ratna). You have heard that there are no other gems equal to each of these gems:

Yaṁ kiñci ratanaṁ loke vijjati vividhā puthū, ratanaṁ buddhasamaṁ natthi, ratanaṁ dhammasamaṁ natthi, ratanaṁ saṅghasamaṁ natthi...

"Whatever gems there are in the world, in all their variety, none is equal to the Buddha Gem, none is equal to the Dhamma Gem, none is equal to the Saṅgha Gem." Thus, when a person is said to generate faith, in the word Saddhā there is an aspect concerning the heart. Depositing the treasure of faith in the heart, or depositing in the chamber of the heart—what is deposited is these three gems: the Buddha Gem, the Dhamma Gem, and the Saṅgha Gem. Through depositing these, a special value is added to that person's thoughts and aspirations. A great light, a clarity arises within that mind. A word that goes hand in hand with faith (saddhā) is Prasāda (clarity/serenity/devotion). The two words Saddho pasanno (faithful and confident/serene) are found together. In the past, various similes were used for this. There is mention of a certain water-clearing gem which, when placed in muddy water, makes the water clean. Similarly, when faith in the Triple Gem arises, the mind is freed from agitation and attains a state of serene clarity (prasāda). The Buddha declared that when a meritorious deed is performed with such a serene mind, it becomes highly beneficial. Even if it is a small thing, if given with faith in such a state, it becomes of great fruit and great benefit (mahapphala mahānisaṁsa):

Appamapi ce saddahāno dadāti teneva so hoti sukhī parattha

"Even if one gives a tiny bit, if one gives with a faithful heart, by that very act one becomes happy in the world beyond." Thus, regarding this merit, the Buddha shows that merit is happiness because, in the life of a human being, various material goods and hoards of wealth are accumulated. All of them can be claimed by fire, water, thieves, or rulers, or they can be destroyed. Unloved heirs can take them. But regarding merit, it is declared:

Asādhāraṇam aññesaṁ acoraharaṇo nidhī

kayirātha dhīro puññāni yo nidhī anugāmiko

This is a very famous verse. "A treasure that is not shared with others"—meaning others cannot claim it or use it as something common—"a treasure that thieves cannot steal, the wise man should perform merits, for this is the treasure that follows one." Other treasures, deposits, and the like—in modern times, banks, and in those days, vast treasures buried in river basins—can be destroyed by the aforementioned disasters. At the very least, due to inflation and various social and economic changes, the wealth we highly prize can become mere scrap paper overnight. But this merit, we can say, is like a gold coin of eternal value. If something has been deposited in our mind-stream (citta-santāna) as merit, that merit never fades away without yielding its fruit.

Furthermore, when more merits are added to that merit, they become stronger, and it is through this that even a Buddha arises in the future. Accumulated as perfections (pāramīs), the strength of merit developed through giving, according to one's aspiration (prārthanā) and resolve (praṇidhi), is accumulated under the name of "perfection of giving" (dāna-pāramitā). The store of merit accumulated through observing virtue becomes the "perfection of virtue" (sīla-pāramitā). In this way, we can understand that what lies beneath the word "perfection" (pāramitā) is this very mass of merit, the performance of merit. Therefore, we see a great value in the accumulation of merit. Moreover, the Buddha has declared: "Puññaṁ sukhaṁ jīvitasaṅkhayamhi"—"Merit at the end of life is a great happiness." No matter how much wealth, land, or vehicles one has accumulated, when one remembers them at the moment of death, it only brings Suffering / Unsatisfactoriness / Stress (dukkha). A grief arises thinking, "I have to leave all this behind, don't I?" One cannot take them along. That is why it is said they cannot be taken; they do not follow one. None of those treasures follow. But if one has performed merit, each time one recalls it at the moment of death, it becomes a cause for great joy and solace.

You have heard about the final moments of King Duṭugämuṇu. It was not other things he recalled, but he had the register of merit (pin-potha) brought and recalled the merits he had performed. In the past, some even kept a register of merit. Even nowadays, though very rarely, some keep registers of merit. Some do so out of pride (māna) to show others. It should not be so; it is for one's own recollection. If these performed merits are recorded in one's mind, even if not in a book, when one is on one's deathbed, one can reflect and rejoice: "I have these masses of merit accumulated throughout my entire life." Then, one does not go to the next world empty-handed. From the story of Lājā Devadhītā, we see that it is according to our very thoughts that our future Becoming / Existence (bhava) is shaped. A characteristic of her celestial mansion was the hanging of garlands of puffed rice. Why puffed rice? Because puffed rice was what was in her mind. Basing on that offered puffed rice, in exact accordance with that wholesome deed, a celestial mansion was formed.

We must understand that, let alone other things, even for this physical frame of ours to arise, and for us to receive our belongings, kamma lies beneath them in a very subtle way. We think these things happen by chance, or that we made them ourselves: "We can manage things in this world as we want." But beneath these lie the forces of kamma (kamma-vega), things of this nature. That which is called merit, then, becomes a support in this samsāra. Now, there are two sides to this.

Through merit, on one hand, we turn away from the path of miserable realms (duggati) and incline toward the path of happy realms (sugati). On the other hand, it also supports us in attaining Nibbāna according to our aspirations.

Now, when speaking of merit (puñña), a word that goes hand in hand with it is wholesome (kusala). People talk about doing merit (puñña) and doing wholesome deeds (kusala). Some have even made a question out of this: "Are these two the same? Is there a difference between them?" There are those who spend more time thinking about these things than actually doing them. Whosoever they may be, keeping them in mind as well, let us now explain the meaning of these words. This merit, indeed, has the word Puñña. Its etymology is somewhat hidden. But we have to consider that the ancient commentators (aṭṭhakathācāriyas) explain it in the sense of purifying the mind-stream: "Merit is that which purifies the mind-stream," deriving puñña from punāti (to purify). We can accept this to some extent because these words, puñña and pāpa (demerit/evil), have come down from ancient times. Puñña and pāpa. A concept that goes along with this is that the mind is purified by merit and defiled by demerit. The world holds this concept: one is purified by merit and defiled by demerit. This is highly consistent with the fact that through actions performed by our mind, body, and speech, there are occasions when we purify our minds, and occasions when we defile them. The things that defile, we call demerit (pāpa); the things that purify, we call merit (puñña).

In modern times, however, some people attempt to give Sinhala etymological explanations to this word pina (merit). There are indeed ways in which the Dhamma is distorted in various manners. Some explain pina in the sense of pleasing or gratifying the mind (hitha pinavama). If we define pina in the sense of gratifying the mind, there is a great danger of going astray. There are many things that gratify the mind which are actually demeritorious (pāpa). Therefore, it should not be taken in that way. Thus, it becomes meaningful to us only in the sense of purifying the mind—that is merit (puñña). What supports this, then, is dāna, sīla, and bhāvanā—in terms of giving, virtue, and meditation. The coarse or gross level of greed (lobha) is stinginess. It is described as a stain or rust (mala). If this rust is not constantly removed, it leads to one's own ruin from within. In the end, one becomes a great miser. Giving (dāna), then, supports the removal of this rust. In short, giving helps to abandon the defilement (kilesa) of greed (lobha). That is how it works through giving.

Through virtue (sīla), the defilement that can occur through wrong bodily actions, wrong verbal actions, and wrong mental actions—which are described as bodily misconduct, verbal misconduct, and mental misconduct—is prevented by observing the practice of virtue and the like.

Next, the same applies to meditation (bhāvanā). Going to the very depth of it, meditation has the power to eradicate all the defilements in the mind: greed (lobha), hatred (dosa), and delusion (moha). In that respect, merit possesses such power.

Next, when we reflect on the wholesome (kusala), it is also shown to be largely similar. We find the words puñña and kusala used in the Dhamma as synonyms, or at least as closely related terms. Yet, at times, we see a specific meaning in this word Kusala. The Dhamma mentions unwholesome roots (akusala-mūla) and wholesome roots (kusala-mūla). On one occasion, the monks asked the Venerable Sāriputta: "People talk about Right View, Right View (sammā-diṭṭhi). What is this Right View?" On that occasion, Venerable Sāriputta defined Right View using this very word kusala. While Right View can be defined in several ways, here Venerable Sāriputta explained: "Friends, if a person knows the unwholesome (akusala), knows the root of the unwholesome (akusala-mūla), and likewise knows the wholesome (kusala), and knows the root of the wholesome (kusala-mūla), by that much he is one of Right View." This refers to knowing good and bad. Then he analyzes further: what is the unwholesome? What is mentioned here as the unwholesome refers to what is stated in the training rules (sikkhāpada). Killing living beings is unwholesome; taking what is not given is unwholesome; sexual misconduct is unwholesome; false speech is unwholesome; malicious speech is unwholesome; harsh speech is unwholesome; gossip is unwholesome; and finally, wrong things of the mind are mentioned: abhijjhā—which means covetousness (intense greed); vyāpāda—which refers to ill-will, the opposite of loving-kindness (mettā); and micchā-diṭṭhi—wrong view. These are shown as the unwholesome (akusala). The roots of these unwholesome actions are shown as greed (lobha), hatred (dosa), and delusion (moha).

Next, when we take the wholesome (kusala) side, Venerable Sāriputta explains what is the wholesome and what is the root of the wholesome. The wholesome is abstaining from killing living beings: Pāṇātipātā veramaṇī kusalaṁ. What is this veramaṇī? Virati means abstention or turning away. Killing living beings, taking animal life, is an easy thing, or rather, something to which the mind is easily drawn and likes. It is difficult to abstain from it, but that is what must be done—that is a wholesome deed (kusala). Now, from this, we can understand the true meaning of the word kusala. In ordinary usage, kusala means skillfulness. Now, according to the Dhamma, what is the true skillfulness here? It is not the skill in killing animals. It is the skill of abstaining from the thought and intention of killing animals. In this samsāra, one is called truly skillful if one escapes the path of miserable realms (duggati) and goes to the path of happy realms (sugati), and eventually, transcending both happy and miserable realms, brings an end to samsāric Suffering / Unsatisfactoriness / Stress (dukkha) and realizes Nibbāna.

The wholesome (kusala), then, is abstaining from those aforementioned unwholesome actions. Next, what are the wholesome roots (kusala-mūla)? They are defined as: alobha (non-greed), adosa (non-hatred), and amoha (non-delusion). Alobha does not mean that greed is entirely eradicated all at once. It refers to the effort made to turn away from greed. It is the effort made to turn away from hatred, and the effort made to turn away from delusion. It is through this that, when one succeeds in one's target some day, one eradicates greed, hatred, and delusion. Thus, the journey from greed to non-greed, the journey from hatred to non-hatred, and the journey from delusion to non-delusion—these are what can be considered as the wholesome (kusala). Accordingly, we can understand that there is a deep meaning in that word kusala. However, in our day-to-day usage, we often use both terms: doing wholesome deeds and doing merit.

Be that as it may, on one hand, the mind is purified. On the other hand, as samsāric individuals whose minds are correctly turned toward Nibbāna, we display a certain skillful behavior and practice through merit and the wholesome. Therefore, we must understand that merit is something we must bring very close to our lives. The more merit accumulates, the good that comes to us from it—as the Buddha has said:

Puññāni paralokasmiṁ patiṭṭhā honti pāṇinaṁ

"Merits are the support for living beings in the world beyond." Merit stands as a support, a protection, and a refuge. Not only that, the Maṅgala Sutta mentions pubbe ca kata-puññatā—having performed merit in the past—as a blessing (maṅgala). Having done merit in the past becomes a blessing in this life. Thus, if we are to receive that blessing in the next life, we must perform merit in this life too. Why? Because we must realize that day by day, the merit and wholesome kamma that granted us this human existence is wearing away. We must make an effort to match this. It is in this regard that the Buddha tells us to be diligent (appamāda) in performing merit:

Appamādaṁ pasaṁsanti, puññakiriyāsu paṇḍitā

"The wise praise diligence in meritorious activities." It was following this very advice that Lājā Devadhītā was eager to do more merit to stabilize her celestial fortunes. We too must reflect, based on this example, that in our lives we have various targets such as acquiring wealth, gaining positions and titles, passing exams, and so on. Whether they succeed or fail, and even if they succeed, they might still face destruction. But far more valuable than all those targets is to be mindful of where we will land next in this samsāric journey. Indeed, if we do not possess such a mass of merit, at the last moment, a bad thought might arise as our near-death thought (āsanna-citta).

Now, from this story, another matter becomes clear to us. In the story of Lājā Devadhītā, that farm-woman—you have heard well about giving alms with clarity in the three-fold thought (ti-cetanā). Giving alms with clarity in the three-fold thought means: before giving, preparing the mind to give with good faith and clarity. Next, at the time of giving, performing the act of giving properly. Then, after giving, rejoicing over it without any regret. That is indeed how the goddess obtained celestial fortune. As mentioned in the Dhamma, these three stages are: pubba-cetanā (pre-volition), muñcana-cetanā (volition at the moment of giving), and apara-cetanā (post-volition)—these three stages of the mind are filled with serene clarity (prasāda). It was because she possessed great faith and a desire to give as her pubba-cetanā (pre-volition) that the Great Arahant saw her with his divine eye and came to her. Next, with great faith, prostrating with the five-fold touch, she offered a ladle of puffed rice. Thus, her muñcana-cetanā (volition at the moment of giving) was also pure. Next, as she went away thinking of it and rejoicing with great happiness, her mind was pure at that moment too. That moment arrived as her near-death thought (āsanna-citta). Because her death was a sudden, instantaneous death. Even for us, we must realize that even if we go after performing a great merit, if we go with regret at that moment, and if a sudden death occurs, we cannot expect to go to heaven. That is why we must reflect on the importance of giving with clarity in the three-fold thought.

In performing an act of merit, there are many things involved in the purification of the mind as pubba-cetanā. Some say that merit performed with difficulty and effort is highly beneficial. Why is that? A thousand thoughts pull one back. Yet, one rouses one's mind to match it. Rousing it with strong faith and effort, as one prepares for it, that merit becomes stronger. Having done so, even at the moment of performing the merit, one must try not to let the mind weaken. Next, after performing the merit, throughout one's life, one should reflect on it and rejoice—that is what is called sharing and rejoicing in merit (anumodanā). The 'Anumodanā sermon' (sermon of appreciation) exists precisely for this purpose. The value of this is also seen in this story—that the apara-cetanā (post-volition) must also be kept pure. Indeed, we must reflect that we cannot say at what moment our death will arrive. Even if we live to be ninety or a hundred years old, in the end, we will have to spend our final days not on two legs, but on four legs. One will have to lie on a bed. At that moment on the bed, what one has is only one's thoughts. Not those lands, vehicles, titles, or jobs. They are merely a pile of dreams. One feels as if one lived amidst a pile of dreams. But if one has been skillful in developing one's mind, purifying it, and turning it toward Nibbāna through accumulating this merit and wholesome kamma, then that person has some solace. That is how we must contemplate. Yet, in these times, some people, under the idea that we must abandon everything, speak with over-enthusiasm: "We do not need to accumulate anything. Why encourage only the accumulation of merit? That leads to the dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi)."

But we must correctly understand the Right View (sammā-diṭṭhi) shown by the Buddha. The Right View of the Buddha has two sides. On the mundane (lokiya) level, meaning that which applies to the samsāric individual, the Right View shown by the Buddha is called Kammassakatā sammā-diṭṭhi—the Right View that kamma is one's own property. The meaning of Kammassakatā sammā-diṭṭhi is the Right View that one's actions are one's own. This was referred to by another name: Dasa-vatthuka sammā-diṭṭhi—the Right View consisting of ten bases. To explain it further, it is as follows. In Sinhala, although brahmins used the three words dāna (giving), yāga (sacrifice), and homa (oblation), in our Dhamma they are also applied to giving (dāna) without distinction. In short, what is said there is that there is a fruit, a benefit in giving. There is giving, there is alms-offering, there is sacrifice, there is oblation. Next, there is the fruit and result (vipāka) of good and bad kamma. Next, there is this world, and there is the world beyond. The meaning of "there is this world and there is the world beyond" is that there is rebirth (punabbhava). Some do not believe this. There is this world and there is the world beyond. A distinction between this world and the world beyond exists if a person dies and is reborn. That too is accepted: there is this world, and there is the world beyond. Next, there is mother, and there is father. The view "there is mother, there is father" is presented there to show that there is a special importance in caring for mother and father. Otherwise, like brute animals who do not care for parents—animals have no distinction of parents—here, what is explained by the words "there is mother, there is father" is its deep meaning: there is special fruit and benefit in serving one's mother and father.

Next, there is another proposition: there are spontaneously born beings (opapātika-sattā). Like the goddess mentioned here who suddenly passed away and was born in the heaven—in this day and age, some who hold only science as supreme may not believe this. Because, according to their way of thinking, this mind is something entirely bound to matter. Therefore, once freed from matter, how can this mind go to the heaven or the Brahma world?—someone might question. Mention is made in the Dhamma of those who conducted experiments on this. There was a certain heretical warrior king named Pāyāsi. He thought that if a person's life-breath is prevented from escaping at the moment of death by sealing the vessel with clay, etc., it would not go anywhere after death. He even conducted such experiments. Placing matter first, even nowadays, some who hold a physicalist view wonder, "How can a person who dies here suddenly appear in a mansion and obtain such a state?" But here, in this Right View, the proposition "there are spontaneously born beings" is presented by the Buddha as something to be accepted. Even if one has not witnessed it oneself, there are individuals who have seen it. It is stated: Atthi sattā opapātikā—"There are spontaneously born beings." Next, it is also stated that there are in the world ascetics and brahmins who, having realized by their own higher knowledge (abhiññā), correctly understand this world and the world beyond. Where such Right View is absent, a wrong view (diṭṭhi) arises. The philosophy of those who held the view of annihilation (uccheda-diṭṭhi) or the view of nihilism (nātika-diṭṭhi) in those days is mentioned in a verse like this:

Yāvaj jīvet sukhaṁ jīvet, ṛṇaṁ kṛtvā ghṛtaṁ pibet,

bhasmībhūtassa dehasya, punarāgamanaṁ kutaḥ

"As long as one lives, one should live happily; even by incurring debt, one should drink ghee. Once this body is reduced to ashes on the funeral pyre, how can there be a return?" Those who held such views are called annihilationists or nihilists. It was against the ten items of that nihilistic view that the Buddha presented this ten-fold Right View (dasa-vatthuka sammā-diṭṭhi). To those things which they denied—saying "there is no benefit in giving, there are no fruits of good and bad actions, there is no mother, no father, no this world, no world beyond"—the Buddha declared, "There is, there is." Therein lies a middle path (majjhimā paṭipadā). The Buddha, therefore, did not accept that wrong view or nihilistic view.

Within samsāric existence, there is inevitably the notion "I am, mine" (mamaya, māgeya). What is called Kammassakatā sammā-diṭṭhi is the Right View that actions are one's own. Now, some of those intellectuals might say, "If there is no self (attā), then there is no such thing as good or bad. Next, how do we know, when reborn in the next life, whether we are experiencing its results?" They try to escape in this way, but there is a situation from which they cannot escape. This is because within kamma itself, there is the perception of self (atta-saññā). It is due to ignorance (avijjā) that preparations (saṅkhāra) arise. "Cetanāhaṁ bhikkhave kammaṁ vadāmi"—"Intention, monks, I call kamma." An intention arises based on the designation "I" (mama). This intention is put forward to keep the world as one wants. An intention to kill another, an intention to steal something from someone else—when we look back at that intention, an "I" is present there. There is someone called oneself. That cannot be denied. At that point, one cannot merely put forward the view of non-self (anattā). This is the reality that the Buddha presents.

The Buddha always speaks the knowledge and vision of things as they are (yathābhūta-ñāṇadassana) within the middle path. Then, according to things as they are, one wanders in this long samsāra due to that very error, that wrong notion—meaning, the notion of "self" (attā). That cannot be eradicated all at once merely by thinking, nor is it something that can be eradicated through logic. The way to eradicate it is to enter the path of meditation, and with a concentrated mind, through insight (vipassanā), see things as they are, see that there is no self within these five aggregates (pañcakkhandha), and thereby escape from it. It cannot be done by arguing: "Why, in our books the Buddha has said there is no self. Therefore, what does it matter to us? We can even kill mother or father and live." That goes to the view of annihilation, the nihilistic view. There were those who spoke in that manner in those days too. It was to turn away from that extreme that the Buddha presented the ten-fold Right View.

Next, the deep Right View we have pointed out on many occasions in sermons of deep themes. The deep Right View is the supramundane (lokuttara) Right View—the Four Noble Truths. Some confuse these two—mundane Right View and supramundane Right View. What we called mundane is a law that applies to samsāric existence. Why does that law apply? As long as ignorance (avijjā) exists, preparations (saṅkhāra) remain. As long as preparations exist, there is an operation of consciousness (viññāṇa), name-and-form (nāmarūpa), etc., in accordance with the law of dependent arising (paṭicca-samuppāda) in samsāra. Therefore, we cannot escape there by saying "there is no self." Within our action, within our intention, there is a wrong perception, an illusion of "I" (mama). We must experience its results; we must take that responsibility. If we did something with a certain responsibility, we must also experience its results. That is it. According to this, the Buddha says one must experience it. For the good one does, there are good results. The talk there is about oneself. Because it is by standing upon that proposition that one does wholesome or unwholesome deeds, merit or demerit. That is necessary. It cannot be done without it. One must escape from this.

On many occasions, we have given the simile of crossing a water-current. When crossing a great flowing current or a torrent of water, one has to yield a little to the current, and slowly and carefully place one's feet to reach the other side. A similar thing exists in this samsāra. For a long time, one undergoes Suffering / Unsatisfactoriness / Stress (dukkha) in this samsāra through ignorance (avijjā), craving (taṇhā), etc., experiencing the results of the kamma forces generated thereby. Then, all at once, this cannot be done merely by wishing or by logic. This must be realized by oneself—in the manner stated as paccattaṁ veditabbo viññūhi (to be personally realized by the wise)—that there is no self here. It is not because it is in the book, nor through logic. Until that is realized, intention arises in that very way, with strong grasping (upādāna), with holding. Where there is grasping, there is again Becoming / Existence (bhava). Again, Becoming / Existence is created. Here, indeed, it was said to be a celestial mansion. Just as this celestial mansion was created, if a person performed bad kamma, a Becoming / Existence in hell (niraya) or the realm of departed spirits (peta), etc., fitting for that action, is created. This is the natural law (dhamma-tā). It is in accordance with this natural law that the Buddha declared the Kammassakatā sammā-diṭṭhi. One cannot escape by saying "there is no world beyond, there is no mother, no father." Standing upon that very proposition, one must then turn to the other side. One must turn to the good side. One must abandon the unwholesome side and turn to the wholesome side. One must abandon the demeritorious side and turn to the meritorious side. That is why the Buddha declares that a Buddhist, without constantly arguing about this, must progress from merit to merit. One must accumulate merit upon merit.

Furthermore, when we speak of merit nowadays, we usually think only of the meritorious act of giving (dāna). But we must understand that virtue (sīla) is superior to giving; meditation (bhāvanā) is superior to virtue. Within all of them, there is a certain letting go. Giving (dāna) performs the relinquishment of external objects. Virtue (sīla) performs the abstention from various wrong behaviors of body and speech which our mind highly desires—veramaṇī virati (abstention). That is a very difficult thing. There too, it is about letting go. In meditation (bhāvanā), it goes even further. Our mind always has a scattered nature, drawing in this and that direction. Controlling it and placing it on a single object is what is done in meditation. Next, what is even deeper is seeing deeply and penetrating this notion of "I" and "mine" (mamaya, māgeya), and abandoning attachment toward them. That is the great letting go—abandoning the five aggregates (pañcakkhandha).

Looking at it from that perspective, although we consider merit in brief, within the three grounds of meritorious activity—dānamaya puññakiriyavatthu, sīlamaya puññakiriyavatthu, and bhāvanāmaya puññakiriyavatthu—lies the entire path of practice leading up to Nibbāna. The path of practice that a person must take. Why? We have heard that even during times when no Buddha arose, some, firmly adopting the thought of renunciation (nekkhamma), went to the Himavanta (Himalayas) and practiced meditation. Within those acts, whether they were fulfilled or not, underneath lay the thought: "Samsāra is fearful, we must escape from it." Sometimes they thought: "It is not enough if I alone escape; I must free others too from this Suffering / Unsatisfactoriness / Stress (dukkha)." This is because, in those lives, being possessors of higher knowledges (abhiññā), they saw the suffering and hardships experienced in hell or the realm of departed spirits due to these bad kammas. Out of great compassion, they thought: "It is not enough if I alone escape. I must free others too."

In any case, in terms of meditation, they strived to unify their minds. They attained states of jhāna, making great sacrifices and fulfilling renunciation (nekkhamma). Looking at it from that perspective, within all of them lies letting go. Through this letting go, we can understand that, on one hand, the mind is purified. Along with that, one draws close to Nibbāna. Drawing close to Nibbāna means the stilling of all preparations (sabba-saṅkhāra-samatha). Stilling all preparations means stilling the forces of kamma. Thus, turning away from bad kamma and unwholesome kamma, turning toward good kamma, and through that, seeing the true nature of ignorance (avijjā) and craving (taṇhā) which lie beneath kamma, with wisdom and concentration, removing them, escaping from them, and in the end, obtaining Nibbāna—which is the power to still all preparations and all kamma forces, called sabba-saṅkhāra-samatha. It is also called appeasement (upasama). It is this path leading up to Nibbāna that the Buddha has brought out through these words "merit" and "wholesome" (puñña and kusala).

We must constantly reflect that we should not give room merely to that extreme or over-enthusiastic logic—we are often forced to use the word "intellectuals." They, placing only the brain first and highly magnifying the activity of the brain, become indifferent to these matters. Indifferent to these acts of merit, faith (saddhā), and other factors. Now we said that in the word "faith" (saddhā), the heart is spoken of. Whosoever they may be, if they listen to the details well, they will understand that there is an influence of the heart in their daily lives too. But when one goes to the side of logic, that is forgotten. Thus, for a complete transformation to occur in a character, in a life—for a complete transformation to take place, both the brain and the heart must walk this journey together in the same manner, in the same way.

That is why the Buddha—now here too, those acts of merit like giving can be performed externally. If one has great wealth, one can give a great alms-offering. Even though it is a great alms-offering, if the mind is small, one cannot expect great benefit from it. But it was by offering some puffed rice that float in the wind, some parched corn that float in the wind, that this woman was instantaneously reborn in the Tāvatiṁsa heaven. Now, in this day and age, people spend a lot of money to go upwards, attempting to go to various visible worlds like stars by means of great science and technology. Even if they go, they might fall back and in the end even go to hell. Those astronauts who went to the sky and conquered the moon, where are they now? If they have passed away, we do not even know whether they are in hell.

Therefore, it is not like that temporary going upwards. If the mind is purified, if the mind is turned toward Nibbāna, and next, if states of jhāna are attained, that person can instantaneously obtain rebirth in the heaven, rebirth in the Brahma world, in the aforementioned manner. They can even obtain spontaneously born states. This is what is called the Dhamma. Thus, we must return to the very first verse declared by the Buddha in the Dhammapada:

Manopubbaṅgamā dhammā, manoseṭṭhā manomayā

"Mind is the forerunner of all states, mind is chief, they are mind-made." Mind is chief in all of these; they are prepared by this mind. There, "mind" refers to those aforementioned streams of thoughts. The heart also joins with it. Thus, doing these wholesome or unwholesome actions, one wanders in this world and in samsāra. But if, at some point, one purifies this heart, purifies thoughts, calms the mind, concentrates it, and through that, realizes the true state of oneself—regarding the five aggregates: form (rūpa), feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), preparations (saṅkhāra), and consciousness (viññāṇa)—at that moment, through that realization, the notion "I am, mine" (mamaya, māgeya) which was firmly held throughout samsāra as the dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi), is greatly loosened. Next, starting from there, precisely due to the weakening of the kamma force, the door to the miserable realms is closed for them. Those who possess a strong, gross view of self are found in places like the animal realm. Such is the nature found within animals. Therefore, if one realizes Nibbāna even through the first path (Stream-entry), one's kamma forces are weakened. Going in that manner, if at some point—as the Buddha has shown—one transcends even the subtle states of the conceit 'I am' (asmi-māna), and realizes the impermanent (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and not-self (anattā) nature of these five aggregates, then kamma that leads to Becoming / Existence (bhava-gāmī kamma) is no longer accumulated in that person's mind-stream. There lies liberation (vimutti). It is the path leading up to that which the Buddha has shown here as the middle path. Therefore, we should not throw these away, thinking that these meritorious deeds are something practiced only by those of simple, foolish faith. It is from this that the beginning starts; without the initial step, the others do not come together.

Therefore, on this day, these virtuous people, treating this observance of virtue (sīla) as important, have left their lay-homes for a day and came to observe these valuable practices of virtue. Within that too lies drawing close to the way of life of the Arahants. This observing of virtue—observing the eight precepts (aṭṭha-sīla), observing the ten precepts (dasa-sīla), and observing a higher virtue after undertaking it—is something highly praised by the Buddha. Next, by practicing meditation while established in that virtue, if one quickly concentrates the mind and realizes the true nature of these five aggregates through insight (vipassanā) in the manner shown by the Buddha, one possesses the strength to realize the paths and fruits (magga-phala) such as Stream-entry.

Therefore, you must now rejoice that on this Poyaday, this virtuous group, to the best of their ability, undertook a certain virtue (sīla) and listened to the Dhamma for about an hour. In listening to the Dhamma, we always remind you that the immediate benefit is the opportunity to generate or mature those faculties that support Nibbāna, namely: faith (saddhā), energy (viriya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā).

Reflecting in this manner, if faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom have developed to some extent through this one-hour Dhamma sermon, may you develop them further, make your Dhamma listening and meditation more successful through association with noble friends (kalyāṇa-mitta), remove obstacles (palibodha), bring close supportive factors, and as quickly as possible, before the decline of this Buddha Dispensation (Sāsana), escape from all samsāric suffering such as Birth / Arising (jāti), Decay and Death / Aging and Death (jarāmaraṇa), and sickness, and find solace in the supreme, deathless, great Nibbāna. May the deities also rejoice in this merit of teaching and listening to the Dhamma, and by means of their aspired-for enlightenment (Bodhi), may they find solace in the supreme, deathless, great Nibbāna! With this aspiration, recite this verse and dedicate the merits:

“Ettāvatā ca amhehi.....”

Dhammapada 209–211 (Piyavagga)

Dear Listeners,

None of us like to be separated from those who are dear (pleasant) to us, nor do we like to be united with those who are undear (unpleasant). However, by having to face both of these situations, we often fall into suffering (dukkha). That is why the Supreme Buddha, the Teacher of the Three Worlds, included these two circumstances within the Truth in His sermon on the (Four Noble) Truths. Likewise, the Buddha also explained to us the path to be freed from this twofold suffering (dukkha). From today's thematic verses and their corresponding background story, we will be able to gather certain important matters, matters of great significance to our lives. The Buddha uttered these three verses based on the improper conduct of three individuals who had entered the order.

In the city of Sāvatthī, a certain family had an only beloved, pleasing son. One day, after listening to an appreciative sermon (anumodanā dāna) delivered by the Sangha who had been invited to their home for alms, this boy developed a desire to ordain and asked his parents for permission. The parents did not give permission because of their deep affection for the child. The son thought, "I must go secretly from my mother and father and ordain." As if understanding this intention, whenever the father left the house, he would entrust the mother to watch over this child. When the mother left the house, she would entrust the father to guard and look after the child. One day, when the father had gone out, the mother was spinning thread at the doorway of the house, leaning against one doorpost and stretching her leg across to the other doorpost. You can imagine it. What is implied by this is that she was blocking the child, guarding him so that he could not go outside. So, this son also thought, "Even by tricking mother, I must go and ordain." He said, "Mother, please move your leg a bit, I need to go to the toilet," and went outside, quickly ran away, obtained permission from the Sangha, and ordained. The father returned home and asked the mother, "Where is our son?" "He was right here in this direction," said the mother. They looked and looked, but he was not there. Later, thinking he might have gone to the temple, they went to check and saw that he had ordained. The father cried out, "Oh son, do not destroy me!" and pleaded in various ways, but the boy did not wish to return home. The father also thought, "Now there is no point in staying, I too must ordain," and so the father also ordained. The mother was waiting for these two to return. When the son and the father were delayed, she thought they might have gone to the temple. When she went and looked, both of them had ordained. She thought, "Why should I stay at home without these two?" and she too went and ordained at a nunnery.

Now, indeed, all three of them had ordained. But despite being ordained, they spent the whole day gathering together at the nunnery, constantly engaged in conversation. A state arose where they could not live without one another. Perhaps the child did not have this attachment earlier, but it arose because of the parents coming there. Because of this, various kinds of criticism arose among the Sangha and the bhikkhunīs. When the bhikkhus complained to the Buddha about this matter, He summoned all three of them and inquired, "Is this story true, that you remain in one place speaking with each other all day long like this?" Then they replied, "Yes, Venerable Sir, that is so; we cannot live without one another." Then the Buddha admonished them: "It is precisely because of that quality of being dear (affection) that all these troubles arise. After ordaining, there is no room for household love (gehasita pema) as in the lay life. Therefore, one must engage in that work (of practice)." Admonishing them, He uttered these three thematic verses.

Ayoge yuñjamattānaṁ, yogasmiñca ayojayaṁ, atthaṁ hitvā piyaggāhī, pihayattānuyoginaṁ.

He who applies himself to what should not be applied to, and does not apply himself to what should be applied to, abandoning his own good and grasping after dear things, will one day, upon seeing those who apply themselves to the true ordained life, have to regret with envy. That is the general meaning of the first verse.

The second verse:

Mā piyehi samāgañchi, appiyehi kudācanaṁ, piyānaṁ adassanaṁ dukkhaṁ, appiyānañca dassanaṁ.

Do not associate with those who are dear, never associate with those who are undear. Not seeing the dear is suffering (dukkha), and seeing the undear is also suffering (dukkha).

The third verse:

Tasmā piyaṁ na kayirātha, piyāpāyo hi pāpako, ganthā tesaṁ na vijjanti, yesaṁ natthi piyāppiyaṁ.

Therefore, do not regard any person or any thing as dear. Do not take them as dear. Why? Because when one is separated from dear ones, separated from dear things, it is felt as a great suffering (dukkha), a trouble, a bad thing. Here is the conclusion stated at the end: For whomsoever there is no such thing as dear or undear, they have no knots (bonds). Thus, what this shows is that all knots (bonds) arise because of the state of dear and undear. It is mentioned that upon hearing these verses, many people attained the Paths and Fruits. However, those three said, "Oh Blessed One, as for us, we cannot remain separated in that way," and all three disrobed. They went home. No matter how much they said they could not separate, it is not that they are still living today; they must have had to separate someday. But they were unable to discipline themselves to the word of the Buddha.

If we think about the essence to be taken from this story, we see that in most instances, upon hearing the Buddha's instruction, various people achieved results. But in this case, that medicine was not taken. Now you, devotees, know that doctors give medicine for indigestion—either to go upwards or downwards, either as an emetic or a purgative. Now here, it was like vomiting. They left; that is the kind of thing that happened here. When we look at the end, that boy actually had a good intention of renunciation (nekkhamma), but he did not get an opportunity for it because of the parents' affection for their son. It was because of their attachment to that child that they went and ordained, and in the end, that itself became an impediment (palibodha).

The word "impediment" (palibodha) is used in the sense of an obstacle. It has the meanings of trouble and obstacle. There is something called the "impediment of relatives" (ñāti-palibodha). In ordinary daily life, relatives are the ones who come to help. Relatives are prominent. But in the ordained life, relatives are sometimes a great trouble to that journey. That journey to Nibbāna is a journey that must be traveled alone. Why is it called the impediment of relatives? Because with relatives, there are not only saṁsāric attachments but sometimes even in this life, various clingings and bonds come to the mind. Even for an ordained person, it is difficult to protect oneself when the impediment of relatives arises. Likewise is the "impediment of the lay family" (kula-palibodha). That means the connections to those lay households. Now, in this case, because of the parents ordaining, it was not only an impediment of the lay family, but in the end, it became home itself. These three made the ordained domain into a home.

From this, we see that the value lies in protecting that state of ordained life. Next, despite trying so hard to protect and keep that child, the child ran away. But in the end, he was not able to complete his goal. The parents themselves ultimately became an obstacle to him. Similarly, based on that story, the Buddha highlighted and showed that dear state—household love (gehasita pema). What is called lay love is the love between one another belonging to the lay life, such as maternal love, paternal love, filial love, affection for the son, and so on. The trouble arises from this. That these are obstacles to the path to Nibbāna. These verses contain a vast wealth of meaning; if we analyze them further, it may not be immediately understood by someone.

“Ayoge yuñjamattānaṁ”

Ayoge means that which should not be applied to. When taken in the dispensation’s sense, it is unwise attention (ayoniso manasikāra)—unwise reflection. There is a method of reflection belonging to the ordained, which is wise reflection. What is here is unwise reflection. If someone applies himself to what should not be applied to, if there are wrong reflections, only then do all other mistakes happen. Because of the attachment toward his parents, even that boy was ultimately unable to continue his ordained life. Likewise,

One does not apply oneself properly to what should be done in application (yoga). 'Yoga' or practicing application in this Dhamma actually means the proper way of reflection highlighted by the Buddha, which is wise attention (yoniso manasikāra). When any defilement arises, instead of looking outward, one must look inward: "Where did these start?" They started from within. That is what is meant by yoniso. One must look at the place of origin, the place where it arose. It is by looking in that way that one understands one's shortcomings properly. If one engages in unwise attention (ayoniso manasikāra) and abandons wise attention (yoniso manasikāra), likewise,

The meaning in the dispensation of "abandoning the good" (atthaṁ hitvā) is the development of virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā), and the realization of Nibbāna. Abandoning those, and “piyaggāhī”—grasping the dear thing. What is the dear thing? Mother and father. For the parents, it is that child. Because of grasping that dear thing, they abandoned the idea of Dhamma. Because they grasped what is dear, and abandoned the good, what must have ultimately happened to them is stated by the Buddha even in the final line of that very sermon:

“pihayattānuyoginaṁ”

This means that at some point when those three are back home, and they get to know that the bhikkhus with whom they associated even for a short time have meditated, become Arahants, and are experiencing the great supramundane bliss, envy will arise in them. Along with envy, they will have to regret: "Alas, we lost this opportunity. A valuable opportunity was received but slipped away, didn't it?" That is what is expressed by the final word.

Having said this, what does the Buddha declare in conclusion? "Therefore, mā piyehi samāgañchi—do not associate with the dear. Appiyehi kudācanaṁ—never associate with the undear." The reason is stated at the end: piyānaṁ adassanaṁ dukkhaṁ, appiyānañca dassanaṁ—separation from the dear is suffering (dukkha), and seeing the undear is suffering (dukkha). Finally, He says: tasmā piyaṁ na kayirātha—therefore, do not make anything dear. Because when one has to separate from the dear, even though it is suffering (dukkha) to oneself, one has to bear it. It is with the final two lines that He presents an eternal principle:

Ganthā tesaṁ na vijjanti, yesaṁ natthi piyāppiyaṁ

For whomsoever there is no distinction of dear and undear, they have no knots (bonds).

Thus, He uttered those few valuable verses. Through this, we see that because they could not overcome their affection for their son, even though those parents entered the ordained life, they could not benefit from it. However, there is an exemplary story regarding this in this discourse.

Once, there was a monk named Venerable Saṅgāmajī ordained in the Dispensation. That Venerable Saṅgāmajī went to a distant region, meditated, became an Arahant, and returned to Jetavana Monastery to pay respects to the Blessed One. Venerable Saṅgāmajī's former wife came to know that the monk had arrived. 'Former' means his previous wife; she came carrying their child. When she came to see Venerable Saṅgāmajī, Venerable Saṅgāmajī was seated in meditation under a tree. This woman brought the child and said to Venerable Saṅgāmajī, "I am a mother with this child. You are the father of this child. Please support me." The monk did not even look. He remained seated in meditation. She said it a second time. Still nothing. She said it a third time. Still, he remained silently in meditation. Then what did this woman do? Placing the child in front of him, she said, "Here, monk, support your child then!" and turned and walked away. After going a short distance, she turned and looked. She saw that Venerable Saṅgāmajī was neither looking at the child nor speaking, remaining just as he was. Then this woman came back, said, "These monks do not even have affection for their child," took the child back, and went away.

The Buddha was watching this with His divine eye. Having watched, it is said He uttered a certain verse of solemn utterance (udāna). What was that solemn utterance?

Āyantiṁ nābhinandati, pakkamantiṁ na socati,

Saṅgāmuttaṁ tamahaṁ brūmi, brāhmaṇanti.

"Seeing his former wife arriving, he did not rejoice; when she departed, he did not grieve. Saṅgāmajī, who is freed from the bond—him I call a true Brahmin, an Arahant." The Buddha declared this solemn utterance. There is a great example there. Affection for the son, past attachments and bonds—there is none of that. There is neutrality, equanimity (upekkhā). That is the conduct appropriate for the ordained life.

Now next, let us also reflect upon the matter of the Buddha's advice to abandon both the dear and the undear. Actually, as a starting point, what we have to think is that it is bad to make the word "dear" dear, and it is bad to make the word "undear" undear. Escaping from both, one must reach a state of neutrality. There is a fondness for dear things. There is an aversion for undear things. Instead of those two, one must develop equanimity (upekkhā). Why was it said that knots are tied? It is mentioned in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, where the terms piyarūpaṁ sātarūpaṁ (dear nature, pleasant nature) are shown. Whatever is of a dear nature and of a pleasant nature, it is precisely there that craving (taṇhā) lodges. Craving (taṇhā) is born and craving (taṇhā) lodges in what one thinks of as dear. That is why, although normally everyone is fond of dear things, the Buddha points out that it is a dangerous thing. Within this state of being dear, the bonds of saṁsāra are knotted.

How are they knotted? Craving (taṇhā) is described as a seamstress. It is by this craving (taṇhā) that knots are tied. Next to craving (taṇhā) is grasping (upādāna). Regarding things of a dear nature, craving (taṇhā) arises. Through craving (taṇhā), grasping (upādāna)—which is called holding—arises. It is through that holding that the knots of becoming (bhava) are tied. Now, just as in sewing, a knot is tied. It is pulled, isn't it? In sewing, there is a pulling of the thread by the needle, and behold, a knot is formed there. It is something of that sort. That is why craving (taṇhā) is called a seamstress. Knots are tied not only regarding the dear; they are also tied regarding the undear. You devotees have heard about the enmity between Devadatta and the Bodhisatta in the Serivāṇija Jātaka. The ill-will developed by the merchant Serivāṇija over the golden bowl, thinking "I must take revenge." Even from an undear thing, a knot is tied in the form of revenge; there too, a knot is tied. Thus, knots are tied by the dear, and knots are tied by the undear. What is to be understood is that knots are tied through both lust (rāga) and hatred (dvesa).

Therefore, the Buddha, on various occasions, expounded to the Sangha the methods to stop this tying of knots. Even though it was expounded to the Sangha, there are certain things to be taken even by the lay devotees. On one occasion, the Buddha says that because of the dear state, one develops a desire for those things. Because of the undear state, one develops a state of disgust, a feeling of aversion. The path to overcome this is shown as follows: "Monks, a certain monk must from time to time generate this kind of practice, this kind of thought. What is it? From time to time, let him dwell perceiving the repulsive in the unrepulsive (appaṭikūle paṭikūlasaññī). Let him do it as an exercise: 'At this moment, I dwell with the perception of the repulsive in the unrepulsive.' At another time, let him practice generating the perception of the unrepulsive in the repulsive (paṭikūle appaṭikūlasaññī). Next, thirdly, it is shown: let him generate the perception of the repulsive in both the unrepulsive and the repulsive. Fourthly, it is shown: let him generate the perception of the unrepulsive in both the repulsive and the unrepulsive. Finally, it is shown: avoiding both the repulsive and the unrepulsive, let him dwell with equanimity, mindful, and clearly comprehending (upekkhako vihareyya sato sampajāno)."

Of those matters mentioned, some might be difficult to understand. Let us understand them in this way. Why is it said to generate the perception of the repulsive in the unrepulsive? Because lust (rāga) and hatred (dvesa) arise in someone regarding a dear, pleasing thing. That is not repulsive. A dear form, a beautiful form—that is not repulsive. But there, one diligently develops the perception of the repulsive (paṭikūla-saññā). What is the reason? The aspiration: "May my mind not be overcome by lust (rāga)!" There, indeed, the Buddha says this for a practical purpose. The Buddha expounds this as a discipline to be practiced by the Sangha to overcome such situations when they arise in their lives. Why do we attribute repulsiveness to that unrepulsive thing? You devotees have heard about the perception of the foul (asubha-saññā), haven't you? What is called meditation on the foul (asubha-bhāvanā). In the present times, we often hear some people saying—perhaps out of fear that the world will cease because of the concepts of developing (renunciation) in this existence—that developing the perception of the foul (asubha-saññā) will cause great disgust. But the Buddha states that to subdue and thin out that lust (rāga), one must develop the meditation on the foul (asubha-bhāvanā). That is what He says. Next, what is the second point? Paṭikūle appaṭikūlasaññā—the perception of the unrepulsive in the repulsive. Sometimes people say, "I do not even want to see those things." You know those words, don't you? In such situations, one develops the perception of the unrepulsive. That means, because knots are tied through hatred (dvesa) as well. That is why. The others are mixed situations.

There are situations where one must perform such exercises. Generating the perception of the repulsive toward both the repulsive and unrepulsive. Generating the perception of the repulsive toward both the unrepulsive and repulsive. When we show examples, it will be understood at some point. The final state is the most important thing. That is, discarding both attitudes of repulsive and unrepulsive, and dwelling with equanimity (upekkhā), neutrally, mindful, and with wisdom. What is its benefit? It helps to eradicate lust (rāga), it helps to eradicate hatred (dvesa), and it helps to eradicate delusion (moha). Thus, all three—lust (rāga), hatred (dvesa), and delusion (moha)—are eradicated in that final state mentioned.

If we look to clarify this a bit more, we can say, regarding the first point, that meditation on the foul (asubha-bhāvanā) and the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā) are shown as the path that helps to generate the perception of the repulsive in the unrepulsive. By meditation on the foul (asubha-bhāvanā), one can generate a perception of the repulsive in the unrepulsive, and one can also do so by the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā). "Even though they look beautiful now, how many days will they remain like this?" There is no need to say more than that. By applying that to the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā), one can stop the mind from wandering far and keep it right there. That is how the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā) also helps.

Next, regarding the unrepulsive in the repulsive, let us think about a person. There, loving-kindness (mettā) is what helps. The highest state of loving-kindness meditation (mettā-bhāvanā) is the perception of the beautiful (subha-saññā). Everything one looks at is beautiful. Then, when one takes that undear person and thinks, "May he be well!", through the reason that he too desires happiness, one turns them into something unrepulsive. There, it is an eradication of hatred (dvesa). Likewise, there is another method: resolving to the perception of elements (dhātu-saññā). "The very same four elements (dhātu) present here are present there as well." In that way, one brings the mind to neutrality.

Two methods that help to overcome hatred (dvesa) are shown there. Sometimes, an insect might have fallen into the plate of rice one is eating. Sometimes, one might shout at that. There, one generates a perception of the unrepulsive regarding that repulsive thing. It could be a strand of one's own hair that has fallen into the plate of rice. When it falls, it is not dear. One does not go to shout about that undear thing. One sets it aside. One generates a perception of the unrepulsive regarding that repulsive thing. Or else, some dead insect is lying there. One does not develop a disgust out of hatred (dvesa) for it. One puts it aside, unless it is to the extent of stopping the meal. In this way, one sometimes has to stop the occasions where the mind goes into hatred (dvesa). We can imagine, now, for doctors in relation to their profession, when examining patients, they sometimes have to protect their minds from both sides. There could be patients who are outwardly very beautiful in form. There, too, one must protect the mind. Likewise, in surgeries required for the illness, a feeling of aversion can arise there too. Generally, it is not only for the ordained life. Depending on the situation, in that way, one generates the perception of the repulsive in the unrepulsive, in order to remove lust (rāga). One generates the perception of the unrepulsive in the repulsive. With the good intention of curing that person, surgeons have to touch things that an ordinary person would not even like to lay hands on. Behold, when we reflect in this manner, whether dear or undear, the Buddha pointed out that within both dear and undear are precisely those knots. The Buddha declared to be freed from them.

You devotees might have heard. When speaking about Dhamma and meditation for lay devotees, there is a discourse called the Abhiṇha-paccavekkhitabba Sutta, which expounds five facts that must be frequently reflected upon and contemplated by everyone, whether lay or ordained, woman or man. One is:

“Sabbehi me piyehi manāpehi nānābhāvo vinābhāvo”

"I must undergo change and separation from all that is dear and pleasing to me." He says to frequently contemplate this thought. What is the reason? What does the Buddha point out as its benefit? People have a desire-and-lust (chandarāga) toward dear ones. Because of the excess of that desire-and-lust (chandarāga), beings sometimes engage in misconduct through body, speech, and mind. What helps to prevent them from exceeding that limit is frequently contemplating the thought: "I have to be separated from all that is dear and pleasing." The Buddha has declared that this must be practiced by everyone, without distinction of lay or ordained.

Now, since you devotees have a greater preference for hearing stories, let us tell another short story. Perhaps it is one that is frequently heard. Visākhā is known as Migāramātā. One day, that great female lay disciple Visākhā came to see the Buddha during the daytime with wet garments and wet hair. The Buddha asked, "Why, Visākhā, are you in this state?" Then she said, "Venerable Sir, my very dear and pleasing granddaughter has died." She had come in great grief indeed. When such a death occurred, it might have been a custom at that time to bathe and go directly in those wet clothes. Then the Buddha asked, "Would you like it if all the people in this city of Sāvatthī were to become your children and grandchildren?" "Oh yes, Venerable Sir, I would like that very much," she said. Then the Buddha asked, "How many people die in Sāvatthī in a single day?" "On some days, about ten, nine, or eight. There is never a day when not even one person dies." "In that case, Visākhā, you would never be without wet hair and wet clothes mourning for your children and grandchildren!" Behold, then Visākhā said, "I do not want that many children!" At that moment, the Buddha uttered a very valuable verse; mentioning just its meaning is sufficient.

He said, "Whatever diverse sufferings (dukkha) arise in the world, all of them arise through the concept of the dear." Various manifold troubles arise because of the word "dear." Thus, it is through this very word "dear," which we all make dear, that manifold sufferings (dukkha) arise. The Buddha concludes it with the idea: for whomsoever there is no dear or undear, they have no suffering (dukkha) at all. They are sorrowless, free from grief.

In other instances, quarrels, disputes, slanders—all such sufferings (dukkha) that exist—arise through being attached to something as dear. On one hand, there are conflicts arising from the loss of that dear thing, or from someone stealing it. On the other hand, by being unable to control the sorrow arising from separation from dear ones, one falls into various kinds of troubles. In that way, the Buddha expounds the danger (ādīnava) of the dear state, meaning that craving (taṇhā) becomes established because of regarding something as dear. If one has no dear or undear, he has no knots. That is the final lesson.

The Buddha showed that the meditations helping to neutralize the mind according to the situation are indeed the perception of elements (dhātu-saññā) and the meditation on the foul (asubha-bhāvanā). These are not things that do not exist, but the reality. Normally, it is the foul nature of a body that exists. But at first glance, what appears is a dear nature. Even there, we specifically speak of a conscious body as foul. This living body, the body of a living person with consciousness (viññāṇa)—that too is foul. But if the mind is not directed to it, it is not seen. Hair of the head, hair of the body, nails, teeth, and so forth are called parts of filth because they are filthy. These are filthy not because the Buddha said so. Not a single one of these is fragrant, nor is it something that can be kept for a long time. When taken separately, these are not dear. But there is a dear nature in the body projected by these—the living body.

Likewise, you devotees know well the deceased body shown as the meditation on the foul (asubha-bhāvanā). Applying it to oneself:

“Yathā idaṁ tathā etaṁ, yathā etaṁ tathā idaṁ”

(As this body is, so is that; as that is, so is this.) One does not need to wait until one dies. In those days, there were charnel grounds. In charnel grounds, dead bodies were cast away. Seeing that, one contemplates: "I too am subject to this state, am I not? One day, I will come to this, won't I? This body too is of the same nature. That body too is of the same nature." Behold, in this manner, for a person who has systematically developed the mind attitudinally through this training, the mind that has gone toward lust (rāga) can be controlled. Likewise, the sorrow and grief arising from attachment to these—some are tempted to commit suicide when a dear, pleasing person is suddenly lost. What is shown by this is that they had been thinking of them as immortal. After death, that beautiful world they had projected slips away.

Now, dear devotees, we hear a vast amount of talk about positive thinking (or optimistic thinking). Holding hands with the material world, huge crowds are drawn toward positive thinking. In a short while, you devotees will not even get to hear this noble message of crossing over from this world, which the Buddha preached to us. Instead, they look at the "beautiful" (optimistic) side of everything. The Buddha declared: "There is a side of gratification (assāda); I do not say there is not. But the gratification (assāda) is little; the danger (ādīnava) is much more." It is precisely because of that danger (ādīnava) that the Buddha says this saṁsāra is a fearful place. Life cannot be maintained forever. Amidst how many illnesses and troubles is this life maintained! And only the person who maintains this daily knows the heap of filth inside it. Indeed, that is why it is called a walking toilet. Such is the body. However, it is apparent that a stream of thought is spreading, covering up those aspects and training people toward optimistic thinking. One must reflect on this. Through this, what arises are indeed those kinds of dangerous crimes, suicides, sexual crimes, and such things. Things we do not even think of happen. When we look at the animal world, like dogs and cats now. That is what will be seen on the streets in a short while as we walk along; restraint is lost. We showed that this training declared by the Buddha is important even for the lay life.

Let us think: if a doctor, without this training, starts to act regarding his patients, what kind of things would happen? That is why the Buddha declared this. Ultimately, protecting the mind depending on the situation through the perception of the repulsive in the unrepulsive and the unrepulsive in the repulsive. Finally, even higher than that, as its supreme purpose, by transcending both—surpassing them—and discarding both the repulsive and unrepulsive, dwelling with equanimity (upekkhā), neutrally, mindful, and with wisdom. Where the mind has taken to equanimity (upekkhā), there indeed is complete liberation. That is what is called sorrowlessness. That must be done with effort.

It is by bringing out that equanimity (upekkhā) at least to some extent that one actually has to develop the Four Foundations of Mindfulness (Satipaṭṭhāna). That is why, devotees, in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, there are a few words shown as a basic qualification when a meditator (yogāvacara), whether a bhikkhu or a layman, enters into the Four Foundations of Mindfulness (Satipaṭṭhāna). Some present various analyses on: (having removed covetousness and displeasure in the world). To develop mindfulness and clear comprehension—which means being mindful and clearly comprehending (sato sampajāno)—the primary requirement shown is “vineyya loke abhijjhādomanassaṁ”. There, it is not ignorance (avijjā); what is called abhijjhā is extreme greed, intense attachment. It is by controlling both that intense attachment and displeasure that one must develop the Satipaṭṭhāna. Because what is called the reality, seeing things as they are (yathābhūta), is understood only in the state freed from those two mentioned factors. It is when the mind is withdrawn from the dear and undear, from lust (rāga) and hatred (dvesa), that the realization of things as they are (yathābhūta) can be achieved. Therefore, having removed both intense clinging and displeasure, one dwells contemplating the body in the body. One dwells contemplating feelings (vedanā) in feelings (vedanā). One dwells contemplating mind in the mind. Regarding the objects that come to the mind, one can see those objects simply as objects. Because there, a neutral mind is required. Some might think that abhijjhā-domanassaṁ means the abandonment of the hindrances (nīvaraṇa). One does not need to think that far. Because the Four Foundations of Mindfulness (Satipaṭṭhāna) are developed precisely for the abandonment of the hindrances. The hindrances (nīvaraṇa) mean those respective factors of sensual desire (kāmacchanda), ill-will (vyāpāda), sloth and torpor (thīna-middha), restlessness and worry (uddhacca-kukkucca), and doubt (vicikicchā), which obstruct meditation and concentration. There is no need to go that far here. Because if so, there would be nothing new to say about those hindrances in the Four Foundations of Mindfulness (Satipaṭṭhāna).

“vineyya loke abhijjhādomanassaṁ”

At the very least, at a minimum, one must start seeing things as they are (yathābhūta) after removing that intense greed and displeasure. One must have the ability to look at one's body neutrally. Neutrally. Without separating it as "this is my body" or "this is another's body", looking at this as internal (ajjhatta)—that which is with me—and that as external (bahiddhā)—that which is outside. Inside and outside. Now, in this day and age, using the word "scientific" is also somewhat risky. But we can say there is something of this sort here: "internal and external." It is not a matter of "mine" and "another's." It is the body present here, and the body present outside. That is why:

"As that is, so is this; as this is, so is that." In that manner, the Dhamma points out to eradicate the desire (chanda), the attachment, regarding the body internally and externally. It begins, indeed, with a neutral mind. The final, highest state of that neutrality is equanimity (upekkhā). It is in the highest state of equanimity (upekkhā) that one is freed from everything. When we look at that training in the end, we cannot even separate it as inside and outside. The conflict in the entire world—the conflict between oneself and others, the conflicts among various nations, tribes, and within households—when analyzed, what is here is something like the conflict between the internal and the external.

Or else, to say it in another way, we can also call it a battle between the grasped (upādinna) and the ungrasped (anupādinna). What is called "grasped" (upādinna) is this consciousness (viññāṇa), mind, and body that we brought from the mother's womb. What is outside, which we prey upon for this, is "ungrasped" (anupādinna). It appears like a battle between those two. It tries to prey on external things for this, to protect this body. Within that, attachments and conflicts arise. But the Buddha points out, and also the Great Arahant Sāriputta points out, that what is present here are the four elements (dhātu)—earth, water, fire, and wind—and what is outside are the very same four. Contemplating them as elements in that manner is what is called the perception of elements (dhātu-saññā). Through the attention to elements (dhātu-manasikāra), the mind can be brought to neutrality. Through loving-kindness (mettā), without generating faults towards people, and with the perception of beings, based on the premise that "everyone desires happiness," it is through "May they be well!" that we overcome hatred (dvesa). But deeper and more in the domain of wisdom (paññā), what brings this mind to neutrality is the perception of elements (dhātu-saññā). What is present here is earth, water, fire, and wind; what is present there is also those same four. The values given to them are changed. According to likes and dislikes, according to dear and pleasing qualities. Some think in this way: "The four elements of the person I deeply love are not like the ones here." Or they might think, "The body of another animal is not that valuable; mine is highly valuable; I can make that animal my food." What is done here is the pacification of that distinction, bringing the mind neutrally to reality: "Here, there are only four elements (dhātu)."

All this is done for the sake of transforming the mind. The Buddha declares: "If wholesome states arise in a certain way, reflect in that way. If unwholesome states arise in a certain way, do not reflect in that way." Therein lies the distinction between wise attention (yoniso manasikāra) and unwise attention (ayoniso manasikāra) that we mentioned earlier. Wise reflection, meaning wise attention (yoniso manasikāra), is: if reflecting in a certain way removes the internal unwholesome states of lust (rāga), hatred (dvesa), and delusion (moha), that is called wise attention (yoniso manasikāra). Unwise attention (ayoniso manasikāra) means: if reflecting in a certain way increases lust (rāga), hatred (dvesa), and delusion (moha), that is unwise reflection. The method of separating from those two is present within all these meditations. We must apply it according to the situation. It cannot be done just as we please. One must apply oneself. That is why one is called a meditator (yogī). 'Yoga' means application. Without applying oneself, it cannot be done suddenly in an instant. Because in this saṁsāra for a long time, having sometimes been animals, demons, various defiled habits might have become deposited within our mental continuum. It is only through the systematic development called meditation that one can be freed from them. That is why the Buddha points out the path in that way.

Within the word 'yogī' is "application." How should the person who applies himself do so? Yoniso—by applying the mind to the very source, to the very place where something arises, not by applying the mind to the far end. "To this place, these start from here," is what the Buddha declared. Lust (rāga), hatred (dvesa), and delusion (moha)—all of them. One cannot purify the minds of humans by destroying all the fancy, luxurious things in the external world. This is the place that must be corrected. We cannot say, "Let us destroy all enemies in the external world, and on that day we shall live in peace and comfort." Here is where the entanglement lies. The Buddha declared: "Lust (rāga) is here, hatred (dvesa) is here, and delusion (moha) is here." Then He declared the path to eradicate them. To say further, especially within neutrality—therein lies hidden this wisdom (paññā).

You devotees might have heard of a seesaw ride between suffering (dukkha) and happiness. Such a seesaw ride is what exists between the dear and undear. We like the dear thing; we dislike the undear thing. We seek to acquire the dear thing; we seek to remove the undear thing. There too lies a seesaw ride. That is why the Buddha declares to separate from both dear and undear and come to the middle. When one comes neutrally to that place, what is there? Just as going according to the aforementioned perception of elements (dhātu-saññā), there is nothing to be taken as "I am" (asmi). Here there is only a heap of elements (dhātu). One understands that all those divisions made to separate a person are things attributed according to our own defilements. What is the Buddha declaring so much? The question of suffering (dukkha). That is why the Buddha, in the incident of Visākhā as well, declared: "Whatever sufferings (dukkha) arise in the world, whatever sorrows arise, all of them arise because of the dear state."

Because of regarding them as dear, one develops attachment to them. When one cannot keep that attached thing in that way, when it is obstructed, hatred (dvesa) arises. Within that indeed does the entire world exist. The Buddha declares to apply the mind to the "Dhamma-nature" of these. When the mind is applied to the Dhamma-nature, what is there is peace. What is ultimately expected through the Foundations of Mindfulness (Satipaṭṭhāna) is that these are merely phenomena (dhammatā) existing relative to each other. It is by dividing these with fences and gates that we have created a mass of suffering (dukkha). Even if we look at ourselves, what is taken in from one end goes out from another. Taking it as a single unit, we grasp it as "mine, mine". Taking a breath thinking "I", having taken it, even that has to be exhaled. Even in that situation, though taken with a perception of compactness (ghana-saññā) as "mine", there is no possibility of taking it as a single unit. It is to the person who sees through insight (vipassanā) that this begins to be understood little by little.

Because ordinary worldly people need to conduct daily life conventionally, they forget those rapid changes, arisings, and passings-away in practical terms. Therein lies ignorance; therein lies delusion. It is within that delusion that worldly people lead their lives. Saṁsāra itself is entirely a delusion. If one wants to develop saṁsāra, one must nourish delusion. The Buddha declares the crossing over from this saṁsāra, crossing over from the world. To cross over from the world, it is not delusion, not moha; where there was delusion, one must bring forth wisdom (paññā). It is for the purpose of bringing forth wisdom (paññā) that the mind is brought to neutrality. Only then can the reality of the world, that truth as it is, be seen. You devotees know very well that through virtue (sīla), separating from those coarse levels of harming and troubling others to satisfy one's own wants—physical and verbal actions of violence—and separating from (harmful) thoughts, one tries to become neutral to that extent. Next, in concentration (samādhi), the mind is gradually released. Without the mind going after unnecessary views, releasing the mind from the defilements flowing into it that destroy the value of the present moment, one places and unifies the mind on some object. That is what is called cutting off the defilements. Next, attention—wise reflection—is carried out. Through wise reflection, one sees those things that were held onto until now, things taken with the perception of compactness (ghana-saññā), things thought to be real. What is here is a flow of arisings and passings-away. A continuity (santati), a flowing river. Inhalation and exhalation too are a flow, a flowing river, a continuity, not a single thing. Inhalation and exhalation are not two either. Inhalation is not one thing either. There too exists a heap of ripples. A heap of ripples. There is a vast number of breath-waves. Other things are also like that.

What we take as "this body". From eating food and all other activities, what is seen is impermanence (aniccatā). The Three Characteristics (tilakkhaṇa) preached by the Buddha and revealed to the world. Because of impermanence (aniccatā) itself, because of being harassed by both arising and passing-away, there is suffering (dukkha). Some try to generate a perception of the beautiful (subha-saññā) within this impermanence. Someone might say: "Now we get a headache. When that headache ceases, it is pleasant, isn't it? So that headache is good." Someone is said to have said so. There are some in the lunatic asylum who go on banging their heads against the wall continuously. Why? Because when they stop banging their heads, it is pleasant, isn't it? Based on that logic, such madmen also exist. In that way, even within the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā), some see a pleasure—an optimistic way of thinking. Such a thing also goes on. Regarding impermanence (aniccatā), it is an outright rejection of the Buddha's word, a rejection of the Three Characteristics. The Buddha declared:

“Yad aniccaṁ taṁ dukkhaṁ, yaṁ dukkhaṁ tad anattā”

(What is impermanent is suffering, what is suffering is non-self). Whatever is impermanent (anicca) is suffering (dukkha). Whatever is suffering (dukkha), there it is non-self (anattā). There is nothing to be taken as "I." The Buddha declares that everything is afflicted by impermanence (aniccatā). There is a word of the Buddha: "Pleasant feeling (vedanā) is pleasant while it persists, and painful when it changes. Painful feeling (vedanā) is painful while it persists, and pleasant when it changes." But the logic is: nobody invites suffering (dukkha) saying "it is pleasant when it changes", do they? Only those foolish individuals invite it in that way. It does not remain in that way either. Even in what is called neutrality, there are defilements. The Buddha points to Nibbāna far above the kind of neutrality the world thinks of. The seesaw ride between pleasure and pain, as well as between dear and undear—it is when one comes to the middle of this seesaw that it is caught. What is it? How is this seesaw constructed? The underlying value is caught. What is that value? The conceit "I am" (asmi-māna). That is why the Buddha points out that ultimately, where the conceit "I am" (asmi-māna) is completely eradicated, there indeed is Nibbāna. There is the end of becoming (bhava). There is the halting. There is rest. There is peace.

You devotees, at this moment, must have gained some understanding of the supramundane values highlighted by the Buddha. Whether lay or ordained, the ultimate goal belonging to every Buddhist is Nibbāna. Therefore, even if something that belongs to everyone is preached on certain occasions addressing the bhikkhus, we cannot cast it aside saying "it does not belong to us." Hence, you devotees must take what should be taken from these and be energetic.

On this valuable day, you devotees started with virtue (sīla), having undertaken a very valuable virtue (sīla) early in the morning. Seated on the stage prepared by that virtue (sīla), you must have had an opportunity to unify the mind with a meditation familiar to each of you. If this Dhamma was understood deeply in some insight-oriented way by that unified mind, I believe it helped you, using that as support, to develop your wisdom (paññā). Without saying "it is impossible", but generating the perception of "it is possible", I aspire that this mass of merit accumulated may definitely be a supportive condition (upanissaya) to eradicate this saṁsāric suffering (dukkha) in this very life, before this Dispensation declines.

Likewise, may whatever beings from Avīci to Akaniṭṭha who wish to rejoice in this merit of preaching and hearing the Dhamma, by thus acquiring it, find peace in the supreme deathless Nibbāna through their aspired Bodhi! Recite these verses:

Saṃyutta Nikāya (SN 22.95, Pheṇapiṇḍūpama Sutta)

Dear Listeners,

Today is this Vesak Full Moon day, the day that commemorates the rare event of the appearance of a Tathāgata Fully Enlightened Buddha to the entire world. It is the day the deathless medicine of Nibbāna, which cures the disease of saṃsāra, was discovered through a noble quest. It is the day the light of wisdom dawned upon the world.

Today, let us try to see the Buddha through the Dhamma preached by the Teacher of the Three Worlds Himself. The Buddha has declared: "Yo dhammaṃ passati so maṃ passati"—"He who sees the Dhamma sees me." Therefore, on this noble day, by directing our minds to the Dhamma, let us strive to see the Buddha. The verses we presented as our theme contain the summary of a very special discourse delivered by the Buddha.

On one occasion, the Buddha, along with a group of monks, journeyed to the city of Ayodhyā near the river Ganges. The residents of Ayodhyā provided lodging facilities for them. While residing there, utilizing the river Ganges as an object, the Buddha addressed the monks and delivered a discourse concerning foam. Why? Because the perception of a self is the most severe defilement in the world. To assist in removing it, the Buddha presented five similes to the monks on that occasion. It begins like this:

"Just as, monks, a great lump of foam is carried along by the river Ganges, and a person with physical sight, as well as the eye of wisdom, sees that lump of foam, reflects upon it, and thoroughly investigates it with wisdom. As he reflects and investigates with the eye of wisdom, that lump of foam appears to him—to that person with eyes—as empty, hollow, and insubstantial (anattā). What essence, monks, could there be in a lump of foam?

In the same way, monks, whatever aggregate of form (rūpa-kkhandha) there is—here, aggregate of form means a heap of form—and how does the Buddha describe that heap? In eleven ways. Whatever form there is: past, future, present, internal or external (that is, concerning oneself or others, which we may call inside or outside), gross (rough) or subtle, inferior or superior, far or near; in this manner, it is shown in eleven ways. A person with the eye of wisdom investigates all that aggregate of form with wisdom. To that person with the eye of wisdom who thus investigates, it appears as empty, hollow, and insubstantial (anattā). What essence, monks, could there be in form?

Next, in the same manner, another simile is shown regarding feeling (vedanā). Just as, monks, in the autumn season, when rain with large drops is falling, bubbles of water rise and burst in rapid succession on the water, and a person with the eye of wisdom who sees those water bubbles rising and bursting, reflects upon them, and investigates them with wisdom, those water bubbles appear to him as empty, hollow, and insubstantial (anattā). What essence, monks, could there be in a water bubble?

In the same way, monks, whatever feelings there are—past, future, present, internal or external, gross or subtle, inferior or superior, far or near—a wise monk investigates all those feelings with wisdom and reflects upon them. To that monk who looks thus, they appear as empty, hollow, and insubstantial (anattā). What essence, monks, could there be in feeling?

Next, He speaks about perception (saññā). Just as, monks, in the last month of the hot season, at midday, a mirage is seen. A person with the eye of wisdom looks at that mirage, reflects on it, and investigates it with wisdom. To him who reflects and investigates with wisdom, that mirage appears as empty, hollow, and insubstantial (anattā). What essence, monks, could there be in a mirage?

In the same way, monks, a monk directs his eye of wisdom to investigate whatever perceptions there are—past, future, present, internal or external, gross or subtle, inferior or superior, far or near—indeed, that entire aggregate of perceptions. To that monk who looks thus, perception appears as empty, hollow, and insubstantial (anattā). What essence, monks, could there be in perception?

Just as, monks, a man seeking heartwood goes into a forest taking a sharp axe. He sees a large, straight banana trunk. He cuts it down at the root. After the tree falls, he cuts off the crown. Having cut it, he peels away the outer skins of that banana trunk in search of heartwood. As he finishes peeling it in that manner, he realizes that there is not even sapwood in this banana trunk, let alone heartwood. But a person who has not only physical sight but also the eye of wisdom, looking at this banana trunk, understands that this banana trunk is hollow, empty, and insubstantial (anattā). What essence, monks, could there be in a banana trunk?

In the same way, monks, whatever preparations (saṅkhārā) there are—past, future, present, internal or external, gross or subtle, inferior or superior, far or near—a monk reflects upon those preparations. He investigates them with the eye of wisdom. To that monk who looks thus, preparations appear as empty, hollow, and insubstantial (anattā). What essence, monks, could there be in preparations?

Next, fifthly, the Buddha points out concerning consciousness (viññāṇa). Just as, monks, a magician—or to put it in modern terms, an illusionist or a magician—or his apprentice, performs a magic trick at a crossroads. A person with the eye of wisdom who sees that magic trick reflects upon it and investigates it with the eye of wisdom. To him who looks thus, that magic trick appears as empty, hollow, and insubstantial (anattā). What essence, monks, is there in a magic trick, in an illusion? What heartwood?

In the same way, monks, whatever aggregate of consciousness (viññāṇakkhandha) there is—which is taken as that collection of thoughts, consciousness—past, future, present, internal or external, gross or subtle, inferior or superior, far or near, a monk investigates it with the eye of wisdom. To that monk who looks thus, the aggregate of consciousness also appears as hollow, empty, and insubstantial (anattā). What essence, monks, could there be in consciousness?"

Having declared this, the Buddha then said: "Monks, if a noble disciple possessing knowledge of the Dhamma looks at and investigates these five aggregates of grasping (upādāna-kkhandha) with the eye of wisdom, and engages in meditation on them, through such engagement he becomes disillusioned with form. He becomes disillusioned with feeling. He becomes disillusioned with perception. He becomes disillusioned with preparations. He becomes disillusioned with consciousness. Through that disillusionment, dispassion (fading of lust) arises. Through dispassion comes liberation; the mind is liberated. Once liberated, he understands that it is liberated. Through that very liberation of the fruit of Arahantship, he then understands: birth (jāti) is ended, the holy life has been lived, what had to be done has been completed. He attains the direct realization of Arahantship." In this way, He concludes the discourse by culminating it in Arahantship.

Next, the very essence of that discourse is presented there as the word of the Buddha. It has been presented in verses. A few of those are what we presented as our theme.

> Pheṇapiṇḍūpamaṃ rūpaṃ, vedanā bubbulūpamā,

> Saññā marīcikūpamā, saṅkhārā kadalūpamā,

> Māyūpamañca viññāṇaṃ, dīpitādiccabandhunā.

What is meant by 'Ādiccabandhu' is the Kinsman of the Sun, which is used as an epithet for the Buddha. The Buddha, the Kinsman of the Sun, has preached in this manner using similes. Form has been compared to a lump of foam. Feeling has been compared to a water bubble. Perception has been compared to a mirage. Preparations have been compared to a banana trunk. Consciousness has been compared to a magic trick. That He has shown similes in this manner is the essence of it.

> Yathā yathā yoniso upaparikkhati, rittakaṃ tucchakaṃ hoti,

> Yo naṃ passati yoniso.

Next, it is stated: in whatever way one reflects upon it and investigates it with radical attention (yoniso manasikāra), to him who thus investigates with radical attention, this appears as empty and hollow.

> Imañca kāyaṃ ārabbha, bhūripaññena desitaṃ,

> Pahānaṃ tiṇṇaṃ dhammānaṃ, rūpaṃ passatha chaḍḍitaṃ.

Next, 'bhūripaññena' means the Buddha of great wisdom. If one correctly understands what was preached by Him concerning this body, it means that when three things are removed from this body, this form (the physical body) is seen as something abandoned and cast away. In other words, look at it in that manner.

> Āyu usmā ca viññāṇaṃ, yadā kāyaṃ jahantimaṃ,

> Apaviṭṭho tadā seti, parabhattaṃ acetanaṃ.

Then, finally, it points out what those three factors are: vitality, warmth, and consciousness. When these three things abandon this body, at that moment, this body lies cast away like a discarded object. 'Parabhattaṃ acetanaṃ'—without volition, without the power of intention. 'Parabhattaṃ' means food for animals, a meal for beasts. So, the story of the body and the story of these five aggregates have been told through those verses. Let us try to understand these briefly presented similes in somewhat greater detail.

These are things seen in our daily lives, things everyone has seen to some extent. However, through these, the Buddha directs us toward the Dhamma. Using those very things, the Buddha highlights and shows through these similes the emptiness, hollowness, and insubstantiality (anattā) of these five aggregates of grasping (upādāna), which have not been seen with the eye of wisdom until now.

Form is compared to a lump of foam. Let us first direct our minds to this lump of foam. In a place like a river, due to the speed of the flowing water, the rubbish and debris in the water gather together. When they go and hit against something like a log, after a considerable time, a lump of foam is formed there. As it goes further and further, it becomes a large lump of foam. Looking at it from afar, it might even look like a white stone. But even if someone is deceived by such an appearance, when looking at it closely and investigating it with wisdom, one cannot do things with this lump of foam as one would with a stone or a solid, strong object. It is full of holes. Moreover, it rises and falls; it is fragile, liable to break at any moment. That is exactly how this physical body of form is. When we hear the word 'form' (rūpa), what immediately comes to our minds—especially in this age where visual media is highly emphasized—is this body of ours, presented in various forms with beautiful colors, even more than the actual color of the physical body.

What we have to take as 'form' is just an impression that falls upon our mind. But what lies beneath it? When we think about this cage of a body, it is not the beautiful form seen on the outside. It may look very beautiful. But inside, just as was said about that lump of foam, in this saṃsāric stream, at the moment of our conception in a mother’s womb, we began by depending on that embryonic form (kalala-rūpa), that stain of mud. Subsequently, this physical body of form is built up from milk-foam, gruel-foam, rice-foam, and so on. Furthermore, it breaks down moment by moment. Even if we forget that fact, this body changes moment by moment. Likewise, it goes on breaking and disintegrating. The final breaking is what is called death. Yet, for a long time, an attachment to this form and the concepts of 'mine' and 'I am' have arisen in worldly beings because they look at it from afar, without investigating with the eye of wisdom, but relying only on physical sight. It is also due to the craving (taṇhā), etc., they have for it. The Buddha presented the true nature in this way.

Similarly, comparing feeling to a water bubble is also not difficult to understand. It is raining heavily. When it rains heavily like this, through that force, momentarily combining with air and perhaps aided by dust and sand, a small water bubble is formed. No sooner is it formed than it bursts; very rapidly, water bubbles keep forming and bursting. Looking from afar, it may appear as a single continuous thing or as something substantial. But when looking closely, it does not remain the same even for a single moment. It is in the same way that those eleven kinds of feelings are called 'my feeling'. One goes to the physician and says, "Doctor, since last night I have had a feeling of pain in such and such a place." But it is not a single feeling. It is a stream of feelings that is arising, ceasing, and disintegrating very rapidly. We take this as one. Taking it as one, just as we take photographs and develop pride and attachment, we think 'I' and 'mine' of feeling as well. This is because of the 'perception of compactness' (ghana-saññā) in the world; the tendency of worldly beings is to consider everything as a solid, compact unit. To break that perception of compactness regarding feeling, the simile of the bubble arising in water has been shown.

You, devout laypeople, have heard much about mirages, haven't you? When speaking of perception (saññā) here, you must reflect that it is not merely the ordinary perception spoken of in the common world that is meant. There is a deep meaning here. When we say 'the mirage of the perception of form,' we immediately think of the perception of form. But the Buddha has compared the entirety of perception to a mirage. Therefore, we must reflect that it is not only the perception of form. The perception of sounds, the perception of smells, the perception of tastes, the perception of touch (which is felt by the body), and finally, the perception of mind-objects (dhamma-saññā) felt by the mind. This entire aggregate of perception (saññā-kkhandha)—all these perceptions are indeed like a mirage. Why? Because, although they exist as a collection of many things, they appear to us as one.

You have heard about mirages, haven't you? A mirage is called 'mṛga-tṛṣṇikā' (deer-thirst) because it creates craving (taṇhā) in a thirsty deer. To a thirsty animal looking at a mirage, in the midday heat of the summer season, there appears a shimmering that looks like a flowing river or a lake in the distance. Perception is exactly like that. Through perception, it deceives us, saying 'this is blue, this is yellow, this is red.' This perception has a deceiving nature. When looking closely at that perception, there is no such reality. Due to some defect of the eye, or perhaps because of the structure of the eye, taking hold of those aggregates of perception, worldly beings create pride, thinking 'I' and 'mine' within them.

Next, concerning preparations (saṅkhāra); this word 'saṅkhāra' is not a very commonly used word. It is a wonderful word that cannot be easily translated. But to get a general idea, there is a term used technically in modern times: 'activities' (kriyākārakam). It is not a very elegant word. A human being is prompted to activity through perception, corresponding to that intention, as a responsible agent, through body, speech, and mind. Therefore, bodily preparations (kāya-saṅkhāra), verbal preparations (vacī-saṅkhāra), and mental preparations (mano-saṅkhāra)—relying on these three doors, one is prompted to some activity due to ignorance and craving (taṇhā). Through these, even kamma is accumulated. That is why the word 'saṅkhāra' is very close to kamma. It is the activity present within that person.

Now, if we thought that form is the physical body, the feeling concerning it, the perception formed due to that feeling, and because one expects pleasure in accordance with that perception, one is prompted to various activities—whether wholesome, unwholesome, and so on—all of that can be considered as the aggregate of preparations (saṅkhāra-kkhandha). That too is not a single thing; although we take it as 'I' and 'mine', there too is a multitude, like a heap of plantain sheaths. That is why the banana trunk is used as a simile. At first glance, this appears like a unit, like a single thing. As if it has some heartwood or core. The term 'insubstantial'

(anattā) is used to show that it has no heartwood or core. Empty, hollow, and then insubstantial. The perception of self has arisen within because, even though it appears as a heap, one thinks there is a core or heartwood beneath it. Relying on that, one says 'I' and 'mine'. One says there is an eternal essence, that these things exist around something permanent. But from the simile of the banana trunk, it is clear that even these preparations, even that intention, are constructed by gathering a multitude of factors. Yet, due to ignorance, a concept, reckoning, or designation (saṅkhā) has been made, thinking 'I do it'. Preparations are also of this nature.

Next, the deepest simile of all is the comparison of consciousness (viññāṇa) to a magic trick or illusion. When a magician or an illusionist displays these tricks, anyone is deceived. There is such a deceptive nature in consciousness. That is what is shown by that simile: 'māyūpamañca viññāṇaṃ'. When a magic trick is performed at a crossroads, the spectators are deceived by it. But if someone is able to clearly see the tools of the magic trick shown by that magician, the things shown stealthily, by hiding somewhere, then that person understands this. Although people are prompted to various activities based on them, a realization arises in that person that 'here is a falsehood, an empty thing, an illusion.' Similarly, regarding this mind, in this era, many people are heard speaking about consciousness. This is the deepest matter. The Buddha also declares this. Addressing the monks on one occasion, He declared the difficulty of understanding this consciousness.

"Monks, it is easy for worldly beings to develop disillusionment toward this physical body of form. Why? Because how this physical body of form is made, how the body gradually grows, and how it wears away is easily visible to someone. How the body of form is grasped and how it is abandoned are well-known to the world. Therefore, it is easy for worldly beings to break the perception of self regarding form. But, monks, that which is known in the world by the names mind (citta), intellect (mano), and consciousness (viññāṇa)—(these are words used for the mind according to the occasion)—it is towards these immaterial, formless things that worldly beings have a stronger perception of self."

Then the Buddha declares: "Worldly beings grasp that which is called mind, intellect, and consciousness, thinking: 'This is mine, this I am, this is my self' (etaṃ mama, eso 'hamasmi, eso me attā). It is difficult to break that grasping." But the Buddha then declares the true state: "However, monks, it would be better for an untaught ordinary person to take this body composed of the four great elements as the self. Why? Because this body is seen to persist without change for a year, two years, three years, or even more. But as for that which is called mind, although it is taken as the self, here the Buddha points out a deep idea: day and night, it arises as one thing and ceases as another. It arises as one thing and ceases as another. It is so rapid that it is not even possible to give an adequate simile." As He stated: 'Upamāpi na sukarā yāva lahuparivattaṃ cittaṃ'—"It is not easy to find a simile to describe how rapidly the mind changes and turns."

On that occasion, the Buddha brought a simile somewhat close to this: Just as a monkey jumping from tree to tree in a great forest, running very fast, lets go of one branch and grasps another, very rapidly; in the same way, this mind goes on grasping objects after objects, rapidly. Indeed, the Buddha declares that one should by no means hold a view of self (atta-diṭṭhi) regarding the mind. But because worldly beings have no understanding of the immaterial mind, when they are unable to grasp those other things, they go and settle down in the view of self within the mind. There is a reason why everyone speaks about consciousness in this era. For, the Western scientists, who held the view of self and did not break the dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi) in their search for the true nature of matter, in trying to understand the physical phenomena of form, gradually realized at the end of their research that there is a mind underlying this. Although they do not have a correct understanding of that matter concerning the mind, an understanding has come from that direction that there is some secret here, that consciousness must be understood.

Similarly, to the Western psychologists who also held the view of self, at the end of the understanding obtained through various kinds of research on the mind, there are still parts they cannot understand—especially where this consciousness goes after death. That is exactly what the Buddha expressed in that final verse.

Such things are also mentioned in the Dhamma. On one occasion, a minister spent several days enjoying himself with a dancing girl. One dancing girl did not eat properly, thinking she must dance well. However, while dancing, her final dance ended in death, right there. The one who was dancing beautifully was next a corpse. In that manner, it speaks of three things leaving that place at some point. That too is a deep matter that many people forget. As soon as vitality, warmth, and consciousness (viññāṇa) leave this body, the body becomes like a log, a corpse that is food for others. It is when vitality, warmth, and consciousness are gone that a person is said to have truly died. That is why they also check whether there is warmth in the body.

Earlier, didn't the Buddha explain how form is formed, how the parts of form gather together, and how form gradually forms like that foam gathering—worldly beings can see this somewhat. They can also see how form wears away. How it is grasped, how it is abandoned; these too are clear to the world. But how does the mind gather? Where does this mind gather? Where does it grow? How is it abandoned? The moment of abandonment is death. At the moment of death, where does this consciousness go? All these have become problems for the world. That is why, just as the physicist is trapped within existence/becoming (bhava), the modern psychologist is trapped within the intermediate state (antarābhava). Because they do not look at it from a Buddhist perspective. The solution to everything expressed here is shown by the Buddha to be the law of Dependent Origination (paṭicca-samuppāda). According to the Buddha's Dhamma, nothing stands alone. Especially concerning consciousness, the Buddha declares that consciousness exists because of Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa), and Name-and-Form exists because of consciousness.

In a certain discourse, in response to a question asked by a monk, the Buddha declared the causes and conditions for the five aggregates of grasping. A certain monk asked the Buddha: "What, Blessed One, is the condition for form?" Since we previously said that form is not a single unit, when asked what the condition for form is, the Buddha declared: "The four great elements." The four great elements mean the four elements: earth (paṭhavi), water (āpo), fire (tejo), and wind (vāyo). What we take as various kinds of food contains just that, doesn't it? Thus, this is built up relying on the great elemental phenomena of earth, water, fire, and wind, which cannot stand alone or be identified individually. Therefore, the four great elements are shown as the cause and condition for the aggregate of form. Next, when asked what the cause for feeling is, the Buddha declared: "Contact (phassa)." It is owing to contact that feeling arises. It does not arise without cause. Likewise, for perception too, the cause and condition shown is contact. For preparations too, the cause and condition shown is contact. Lo and behold! When asked what the cause and condition for consciousness is, Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) is shown.

This term Name-and-Form may not be very familiar to you. Insight meditators are used to hearing it, and different people explain it in various ways. But the Buddha has analyzed Name-and-Form. What is shown as 'Name' (nāma) are the five phenomena: feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), intention (cetanā), contact (phassa), and attention (manasikāra). Next, 'Form' (rūpa) is explained as the four great elements and the form derived from those four great elements—the form and perception of form that arise through grasping them; so, Name-and-Form. Let us try to understand this further. We said consciousness is an illusion. There is no reality in what the magician displays. Yet, it has the appearance of truth. It is because of that appearance of truth that one is deceived by the magic trick, the illusion. In the same way, in Name-and-Form, which is the condition for consciousness, there is also such a displayed thing. A false thing. Form is not real. It is the same with the mental phenomena called feeling, perception, preparations, and consciousness.

Now, when we say 'Name' (nāma), it is a name. But what a person calls a name, he identifies as a form. Now, when we say 'clock,' a certain form is conjured in the mind because it has a name. But originally, one identifies it as a name through those mentioned phenomena: feeling, the perception that follows feeling, the intention created through perception, the contact caused by intention, and then attention (reflecting). Those five factors are shown as Name-and-Form. In short, it is merely of the nature of a name. It is not a conventional name of the world.

Next, even though we consider form as solid, what is it but a shadow falling on the mind? A perception of form, relying on the elemental phenomena of form. Thus, the Buddha has declared that there is a constant relationship between Name-and-Form and consciousness. The mind grasps objects very rapidly, and at every moment of grasping, the mind also changes. It is exactly like a whirlpool. When the mind grasps an object and lets it go, its value changes. That is why the rapid rotation between consciousness and Name-and-Form was called 'lahuparivattaṃ' (rapidly changing). The mind rotates rapidly, very rapidly. But consciousness is not a rotation on its own. Consciousness does not exist alone.

But Western philosophers think of consciousness as something existing alone, like a soul. The Buddha declares: "Aññatra paccayā natthi viññāṇassa sambhavo"—"Apart from conditions, there is no origination of consciousness." Without conditions, there is no arising of consciousness. Just as a fire does not arise alone without fuel, in every case: dependent on the eye and forms, eye-consciousness arises; dependent on the ear and sounds, ear-consciousness arises; dependent on the nose and smells, nose-consciousness arises... and finally, dependent on the mind and mind-objects (dhamma), mind-consciousness arises. In this way, the Buddha points out six kinds of consciousness: eye-consciousness, ear-consciousness, nose-consciousness, tongue-consciousness, body-consciousness, and mind-consciousness.

Is even one of those consciousnesses stored up anywhere? Due to causes and conditions, in a dependently arisen manner, consciousness arises and passes away. It arises with the help of something else. Just as a fire does not arise alone, but a wood-fire or a straw-fire arises by grasping some specific material; in the same way, eye-consciousness arises due to the eye and forms. It is in this manner that the Buddha has described consciousness. It is not something that arises on its own.

The Ven. Sāriputta, the Great Arahant, also illustrated the constant relationship between consciousness and Name-and-Form, showing how they support each other, using the simile of two sheaves of reeds. Not two reed-sticks, but two sheaves of reeds. There is also depth in the term 'sheaves of reeds'. Is there any heartwood in reeds? They are not things with heartwood. Ven. Sāriputta could have taken something else. He could have taken a wood with good heartwood. See how well this simile fits. Two sheaves of reeds. There is no heartwood in a reed. Even in a sheaf, there is no heartwood. Now, one sheaf of reeds is leaned against the other at the top. Think about it: a sheaf of reeds stands upright with the support of the other. In this very manner, Ven. Sāriputta has shown that in the law of Dependent Origination, with consciousness as condition, Name-and-Form arises; with Name-and-Form as condition, consciousness arises.

Let us present a simile that helps to understand the relationship between these two to some extent. It may not be a simile found in the Dhamma. There is a Greek myth, a somewhat tragic story. A certain beautiful Greek youth had never seen his own form. Perhaps he did not look into mirrors, maybe because there were none in those days. But one day in the forest, suddenly needing to drink some water, as he bent down to look at the pond, he saw his own face. However, because this Greek youth had never seen his own face before, he was deceived, thinking this was a goddess. Thinking it was a nymph living in the pond, he tried to embrace it. With every attempt to embrace it, it was covered by ripples of water.

On the first day, he tried very hard; when the water settled, he tried to catch it again. Trying and trying like this, going home and coming back, trying again and again, he spent several days in the same spot, and finally, Narcissus died of that very grief of separation. The story mentions that to commemorate the death of Narcissus, a highly fragrant flower plant nearby was named Narcissus.

What we have to take from this is the story of self-love. Narcissus grasped his own form, thinking it was someone else. Actually, when we reflect upon it, what we grasp as our form is a reflection. Think of the other side of it. He grasped it thinking it was someone else, a goddess. What Narcissus did is exactly what we have done in this saṃsāra for a long time. At the moment of death too, we do the same thing. When whoever it is dies, because the craving within the concepts developed throughout that person's lifetime is not yet ended, when those aspirations are activated through the power of kamma, some sign comes to the mind. Grasping that sign as 'I' and 'mine', lo and behold, another form arises. We have done the very same thing Narcissus did.

But here, one must understand the phenomena of feeling, perception, intention, contact, and attention that are within it. The youth Narcissus experienced a pleasant feeling through that sight. Because of that, a perception was formed; because of the perception, he formed an intention to grasp; and according to that, he paid attention. Now, that simile will help to understand those factors of Name-and-Form. In this era, everyone comes and asks about consciousness—the point where physicists got stuck and the point where psychologists got stuck. It cannot be understood in that way.

This question of consciousness is not a question of today or yesterday. The sages who wrote the Vedas and Vedānta, or the philosophers, also had the view of self within them. They saw things like form arising and passing away. But consciousness has no visible path. When one dies, where does consciousness go? This became a great problem: how to understand consciousness. There is a certain simile to show their inability to understand it. Finally, they decided that trying to understand consciousness is like trying to grasp a fingertip with that very same fingertip—a futile effort. One cannot grasp a fingertip with that very fingertip, can one?

Using these fingers as an aid, let us next try to understand consciousness in accordance with the Dhamma, and see what solution the Buddha has given. We said consciousness does not arise on its own; it is something that arises due to causes and conditions. It arises due to Name-and-Form. Let us try to take these Name-and-Form phenomena onto the fingertips themselves, using a simile. It is only a simile given to understand something.

When we think about the five fingers of this hand, there is the smallest one, isn't there? He is the reckoner/troublemaker. He is the troublemaker; although he is small, he always looks to hurt. And why is he called the reckoner? Because when we count, we first count 'one' starting with this little finger. Think of feeling in that way. Let us compare feeling to the little finger for a moment.

Next, perception (saññā). Next to the little finger is the ring-wearer (the ring finger). Just as there is a troublemaker, there is the ring-wearer, referring to various people who wear rings. Like wearing a ring. That second finger is perception. Perception is the ring-wearer. Perception is about identifying, while the other is about experiencing (feeling).

Next, let us think about the middle finger. He is the stubborn one (wilful one). When raising the five fingers up, he is the most prominent, the tallest one. Also, when tapping on something like a table, we use the middle finger, as it stands out more than the others. We thought of the little finger as feeling for a moment, and the ring finger as perception; and the stubborn one, intention (cetanā)—that is the middle finger.

Next, there is a quarreler (the index finger). The world also recognizes the index finger as such. He is the one who threatens. He has a lot of work. He always comes to quarrel. He is designated as contact (phassa).

Next, there is a giant (the thumb). If we speak of him directly in Dhamma terms, he is the attention-maker (manasikāra). Attention means reflecting. This thumb has two names; nicknames have been attached to him. The one who acts like the leader can be called attention (manasikāra). It is this attention-maker who, gathering the other four as well, has brought us along in saṃsāra for so long.

It brought us in the manner of unwise attention (ayoniso manasikāra). Unwise attention means reflecting in a wrong way. That wrong way of reflecting is seeing the impermanent (anicca) as permanent, the painful (dukkha) as pleasant, the foul as beautiful, and the not-self (anattā) as self. That behavior of showing things in a wrong way, we designate as a crime. That crime is these five taking us along in this saṃsāra.

What did the Buddha do to reveal the secret within this consciousness? As those philosophers say, consciousness is something not easily understood. To use a simile, it is like a court case without a witness. A murder has taken place, but there are no witnesses. The case would be dismissed, wouldn't it? Instead, there is a certain tactic in the legal field: one of the defendants is pardoned. Having pardoned him, the story is extracted.

The Buddha had to do a similar thing. That is what is called the Middle Path (majjhimā paṭipadā). The Middle Path is something extremely deep; generally, people think it is only the ethical aspect mentioned in the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta. But there is something much deeper in the Middle Path. Dependent Origination itself is a Middle Path. Although worldly beings take each thing individually, the Buddha showed through causes and conditions that nothing exists alone. Everything exists upon causes and conditions. In accordance with that very story of causes and conditions, the Buddha shows that what is to be done is not trying to grasp the fingertip with that same fingertip.

The truth must be understood. That attention-maker we spoke of, gathering the troublemaker and all the others, has dragged us into saṃsāra for a long time; he has trained us to grasp (upādāna). Grasping means taking hold of tightly. But the Buddha shows that here, the thumb maintains relationships with all the other fingers. The thumb and the index finger associate very closely. That is contact (phassa). We missed mentioning that. The index finger is contact. If we name those five, they are: feeling, perception, intention, contact, and attention. The phenomenon closest to attention is contact. Reflecting in this way, the Buddha shows that to get the secret of this, we must first change our attitude through radical attention (yoniso manasikāra). We must remove that distorted view.

One must understand how to see the impermanent as impermanent. One must correctly understand the word of the Buddha. One must take the painful as painful, the foul as foul, and the not-self as not-self, removing those wrong attitudes. It is through that vision that radical attention (yoniso manasikāra) develops. Unwise attention means forgetting the place where something arose and arriving at a conclusion based only on what appears from afar. Now, when reflecting on a mirage, this can be understood. It is the person who does not know how the mirage arises, but only how it appears from afar, who runs after the mirage. Instead, investigating how it arises according to causes and conditions, one tries to understand feeling as feeling, not as 'my feeling', but feeling simply as feeling. Perception as perception. That is what is in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta: seeing things as they really are, as they exist. Seeing them as not-self (anattā), without projecting a view onto them. The dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi) means taking them as 'I' and 'mine'.

Instead, seeing them in accordance with reality, as they are—feeling as feeling, perception as perception, intention as intention. When looking in that way, one eventually understands gradually how the senses clash with objects, just like the thumb and index finger coming together. That moment of clashing is what is called contact (phassa). Finally, what is caught is the mind and mind-objects (dhamma). That is the deepest place. It is called 'dhammārammaṇa' (mind-object). Here, 'dhamma' does not mean the Dhamma as understood in the ordinary world. It means the objects that come to the mind. The Buddha shows that each sense faculty has its objects: the eye has forms, the ear has sounds, the nose has smells, the tongue has tastes, the body has contact, and finally, the mind has mind-objects (dhamma). By 'dhamma' here, we mean 'things'. This is an extremely deep matter indeed.

It is from there that the Dhamma begins in the Dhammapada, which we constantly remind you of: "Mano-pubbaṅgamā dhammā, mano-seṭṭhā manomayā." The answer is right there. The Buddha declares that things did not exist first and then were thought of. Mind is the forerunner. Mind itself is chief; things are made of mind. Finally, it says 'manomayā'—these things are mind-made. But worldly beings do not realize that they are mind-made, due to ignorance. Radical attention (yoniso manasikāra) means recognizing the object right at the point where it arises.

But because worldly beings lack radical attention, they proceed in an unwise manner, allowing thoughts to go into conceptual proliferation (papañca), making it into a 'thing', and through that, they fall into defilements. But the Buddha shows that when one reflects in a subtle manner through radical attention—not in a wrong way, but reflecting on the painful as painful, the impermanent as impermanent—the secret of this consciousness is gradually understood.

It is revealed when, at whatever moment, if one catches the place where the mind and the object clash, through that very catching, the foundation of consciousness is shattered. Worldly beings think of this mind-consciousness as a self. But in reality, the Buddha declares that consciousness arises only with causes and conditions. What is the cause? The object that comes to the mind. That object is none other than 'manomayā'—something constructed by the mind itself. Through forgetting that it is something constructed by the mind itself, we are then prompted to think about it. That is the nature of the world. But in insight meditation, through gradually sharpening one's reflection, if at some point one understands the moment a thought clashes with the mind, then Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) is correctly understood. Without letting it go towards the side of feeling, without letting it go towards the side of perception, without letting it go towards the side of intention. Finally, what is left is the clashing point of the mind and the object, like the clash between the index finger and the thumb. If the trick is caught right at the moment the mind and the object clash, immediately consciousness loses its place. For, consciousness is an illusion. Consciousness finds its place only within ignorance.

It is stated: "Avijjā-paccayā saṅkhārā, saṅkhāra-paccayā viññāṇaṃ"—"With ignorance as condition, preparations arise; with preparations as condition, consciousness arises." It is as a result of that preparation, that collection of activities arising through ignorance, that there is a division as consciousness and Name-and-Form. Within that Name-and-Form, in the feelings, perceptions, etc., that belong to it, consciousness itself is naturally trapped.

But just as the youth Narcissus, by forgetting the reflecting nature of water, thought it was someone else, there is a reflecting nature in consciousness, which is called reflection (paccavekkhaṇā). That is where the trick lies. What does consciousness reflect? It reflects Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). Therefore, these are not entirely different things. Nor are they the same thing. These exist on causes and conditions. That must be understood insightfully, through the reflection of meditation as described. When reflecting with a concentrated mind, at some moment, the feeling aspect is abandoned, the perception aspect is abandoned, the intention aspect is abandoned, and finally, the mind and the thought are abandoned. The Buddha declared that mind-consciousness is also something that arises and ceases extremely rapidly. Even that concept of what we call 'things grasped', the Buddha declares as 'manomayā'—something made by the mind itself. The Buddha shows that through forgetting that it is something made by the mind itself, worldly beings fall into both extremes.

We expressed this matter not as an argument. This is not to be found in the way many people search for a solution. According to the word of the Buddha, according to the Middle Path, these mental phenomena must be understood. That is why the Buddha declared: if at any point consciousness is understood, Name-and-Form is understood. If Name-and-Form is understood, consciousness is understood. But Name-and-Form has to be understood not by bringing someone from outside. We must pardon the attention-maker who stands at the end of these mental phenomena; though he has brought us through saṃsāra in an unwise manner until now, we must remove the unwise aspect of unwise attention and make him behave in a radical manner. Then, through radical attention, he reveals the crimes he committed in association with the other four. Finally, what is revealed is how the mind arose concerning the clashing of mind with that index finger (contact). That is why the entire noble Dhamma of the Buddha is contained within the two lines: "Mano-pubbaṅgamā dhammā, mano-seṭṭhā manomayā." This can be called the Middle Path.

The Buddha declares that it is only when all three—vitality, warmth, and consciousness—are removed that a person dies. Yet, sometimes, when pointing out the state called the attainment of cessation (nirodha-samāpatti), someone who has entered the attainment of cessation ceases consciousness, but still lives. When the reason for this was asked, it is mentioned in the Dhamma that the Buddha declared that even vitality and warmth support each other. Because of the preparation of vitality (āyu-saṅkhāra), warmth exists. Because of warmth, the preparation of vitality exists. Neither exists alone. It is compared to a burning lamp: because of the flame, light exists; because of the light, the flame exists. Because of vitality, warmth exists. Because of warmth, vitality exists. There too, there is a relationship of cause and condition. Neither exists alone.

That is what becomes a problem for some. A person is on the verge of death, yet there is still warmth in the body. Thereafter, through surgery, etc., life returns. Meanwhile, it appears to that person that consciousness went somewhere. That person thinks consciousness went alone. No, that is only what appeared to that dying person at that time. It is seen from that person's point of view. There are not two people there. That state occurs relative to consciousness. Such is the situation there.

Because many people ask, we have merely brought the solution to this question to maturity. This is a deep matter. On this valuable Vesak day, we try to escape from saṃsāra by grasping only a very light portion of the Dhamma. Yet, we think about big questions. To compare these two, one must enter this path of meditation. Today, on this valuable Full Moon day, you have made a beginning—like starting with the alphabet—by starting with virtue (sīla). Likewise, you also tried to develop concentration (samādhi) to the extent of your ability. As mentioned, some of you are also walking on the path of insight (vipassanā). Especially for them, this sermon would have been helpful. In that way, we have made a small beginning. We must understand deep Dhamma for the sake of escaping from this saṃsāra.

Due to unwise attention (ayoniso manasikāra), we constantly go on doing exactly what Narcissus did in this saṃsāra. To eliminate this, we must understand the true nature of consciousness. The cessation of consciousness (viññāṇa-nirodha) is what is called Nibbāna. It is the direct realization of the cessation of consciousness. It is the escape from that illusion. One escapes from that illusion at the moment wisdom arises. The Buddha has declared: "Viññāṇaṃ pariññeyyaṃ, paññā bhāvetabbā"—"Consciousness is to be fully understood, wisdom is to be developed." But consciousness is correctly understood only at the moment wisdom arises. The seed of wisdom is what is called radical attention (yoniso manasikāra)—wise reflection. Therefore, reflecting that the seed of wisdom is within us, we must proceed on this journey.

May this beginning made by you today, this virtue observed today, the meditation practiced today, and this insight-oriented sermon heard today, serve as an aid to your liberation! With the help of association with noble friends (kalyāṇa-mitta), having succeeded in your Dhamma practice and meditation as quickly as possible, transcending the suffering of saṃsāra such as birth (jāti), decay and death (jarāmaraṇa), and through the realization of the stages of the path and fruit such as Stream-entry, Once-returning, Non-returning, and Arahantship, may this power of merit and the hearing of the Dhamma today lead to the realization of the supreme, deathless Nibbāna!

May whatever beings there are from Avīci to Akaniṭṭha, including your own relatives, by rejoicing in all these merits of delivering and hearing the Dhamma, and through rejoicing in these merits, realize the supreme, deathless Nibbāna through a Bodhi of their aspiration! Having aspired thus, recite these verses and share the merits.

Sumedhātherīgāthā (Verse 515)

Dear Listeners,

To conquer the forces of Māra that pull us into saṁsāra, a powerful strength of renunciation (nekkhamma) is necessary. Deeply contemplating the groups of discourses preached by the Teacher of the Three Worlds, the Fully Enlightened Buddha, regarding the terrifying nature of saṁsāra, helps to cultivate such a strength of renunciation. The story and biography of the Arahant Therī Sumedhā, who conquered the forces of Māra by relying on her own knowledge of the Dhamma, is an excellent illustration of this.

On this Vesak Full Moon Poya day that has dawned today, we can find a valuable biography in the Therīgāthā of the Arahant Nun Sumedhā, which helps us develop faith in this manner. It is a certain stanza among them that we have chosen as our theme today.

This Therī Sumedhā, having accumulated powerful wholesome potential under previous Buddhas, was born during the time of this Buddha in the city of Mantāvatī as the daughter of the regional King Koñca. After she reached youth, her parents decided to marry her to King Anīkadatta of the city of Vāraṇāvatī. However, by that time, Sumedhā, having visited the bhikkhunī monastery since her childhood along with royal princesses of her own age and maidservants, and having heard the Dhamma, had developed great faith in the Dispensation and a deep sense of urgency (saṁvega) regarding saṁsāra. Therefore, she did not agree to that proposal.

When the day approached for King Anīkadatta to come and see Sumedhā (perhaps something like the svayaṁvara custom of the past), Sumedhā went to her parents and said, “I have no expectation of staying in the household life enjoying the fivefold sensual pleasures. I am inclined towards Nibbāna; I remain loving Nibbāna. Therefore, grant me permission to go forth as a monastic.” Furthermore, she declared the impermanence (anicca) of this becoming (bhava), and the impermanence (anicca) that exists even in the heavenly worlds, showing how this becoming (bhava) is entirely impermanent (anicca). “One who has correctly understood the Four Noble Truths preached by the Blessed One does not wish even for the pleasures of the heavenly worlds. This becoming (bhava) is impermanent (anicca) everywhere, and sensual pleasures are extremely bitter; though they yield little satisfaction, they bring abundant suffering (dukkha) and trouble—this is the nature of the fivefold sensual pleasures. Therefore, I do not like this marriage proposal. Grant me permission to go forth (pabbajjā).”

Then, at the same time, she declared: “This body is entirely like a leather bag filled with excrement and carcasses. Why give this to someone else? This is a body filled with worms. At any moment, as soon as consciousness (viññāṇa) departs from this, one’s own relatives will carry it to a cemetery and discard it. Why give such a body of this nature to anyone?” She further declared to her parents: “If you do not grant me permission to go forth, I will meet my death. I will take no more food as a layperson.” Saying so, she lay down on the floor of the palace. Then her mother and father came, and the mother, weeping, said, “Rise, my child.” Addressing her daughter, she said, “You are extremely beautiful. You are to be the chief queen of King Anīkadatta; you are still young. Enjoy these sensual pleasures.” Thus, they tried to encourage her further regarding the proposal.

But she firmly insisted: “No, these fivefold sensual pleasures are not for me. This becoming (bhava) is impermanent (anicca) from every aspect. If one day the inside of this body were turned inside out, even one’s own mother would detest it, unable to bear the stench. At any moment, as soon as consciousness (viññāṇa) departs from this body, it is cast into the cemetery, and the relatives return and bathe. Such is the nature of this body. Therefore, what I need is liberation from this becoming (bhava). Decay and death (jarāmaraṇa) follow closely behind me. In the heavenly worlds, the animal realms, or the hells, there is no opportunity to go forth as a monastic. A Buddha is born only very rarely; therefore, in this rare opportunity, on this occasion when the rare wealth of the opportune moment (khaṇa-sampatti) has been obtained, grant me permission to go forth.” Thus she declared repeatedly.

“If you do not allow me, I will take no more food. Right here, I will meet my death,” she said, and lay down on the floor. At about that same moment, King Anīkadatta arrived in the city of Mandāvatī. On hearing this news, what Sumedhā did was cut off her hair, enter her chambers, lock the door, and, focusing on her cut hair, entered the first absorption (jhāna). Having emerged from the first absorption (jhāna) and while developing the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā), the king arrived. When her parents and the king were standing by the door, Sumedhā came and opened the door. She saw her parents weeping. Finally, the king said to Sumedhā, “These parents are in great sorrow. You are very young. Sensual fortune is extremely rare. I will hand over all this royal wealth to you. All pleasures and fortunes are here. Going forth is difficult.” In this way, he tried to persuade her to accept the proposal.

At that moment, Sumedhā declared the unsatisfying nature of sensual pleasures. King Mandhātā, who ruled over the four great continents and was foremost among all enjoyers of sensual pleasures, passed away completely unsatisfied. Even if it rained the seven kinds of gems, human beings would not attain satisfaction. Sensual desire is something that leaves humans unsatisfied. In particular, she briefly recalled for the king the ten similes mentioned in the Blessed One’s discourses regarding the fivefold sensual pleasures.

The Blessed One has declared this regarding sensual pleasures. If we explain these similes briefly and in a detailed manner so that you, virtuous friends, can understand: in a slaughterhouse, a butcher throws a bone scraped of flesh and blood to a dog. The dog gnaws at it. While gnawing it, it ultimately meets with suffering (dukkha); there is no essence in it. You, virtuous friends, have heard this simile of “the fleshless bone”.

Next, another simile given by the Blessed One to show the nature of sensual pleasures is that they are like a pit of glowing embers. Two strong men drag a person and throw him into a pit of embers, and he is burnt right there. Or, like holding a burning grass torch while walking against the wind—if one does not let go of that grass torch, one's hand will be burnt. Sensual pleasures are just like that. Furthermore, when a hawk flies up into the sky clutching a piece of meat, other birds and crows pursue and peck at it in order to snatch and eat that piece of meat. If that hawk or crow does not let go of the piece of meat, it will have to face death or deadly suffering (dukkha). This is common to all. Therefore, everyone fights over them and ultimately meets with destruction. Other similes are given: sensual pleasures are like borrowed goods. They are temporary; one never knows when one might lose them.

Next, these sensual pleasures are like a dream. They are deceptive, illusory. It is something that appears real only for a brief moment. Another simile shown in detail by the Blessed One is the simile of the tree fruit (rukkha-phala). It is a simile about fruits on a tree. Someone, seeing fruits on a tree, climbs it to pluck them. Meanwhile, someone else who cannot climb the tree begins to cut it down from the base. If the climber does not descend, he will fall along with the tree and meet with death. Just like that, due to the nature of these sensual pleasures, people fight for them in both lawful and unlawful ways. Because of that struggle, many fall into suffering (dukkha).

Furthermore, these sensual pleasures are compared to a serpent's head, showing their dangerous nature. This lady declared many such similes to the king. Not only that, she briefly reminded the king of the terrifying nature of this long saṁsāra, its extremely long nature, based on the discourses delivered by the Blessed One in the Anamatagga Saṁyutta. Perhaps during that era, the Buddha's discourses were more well-known than today. Thus, you, virtuous friends, may also have heard the Buddha's discourses found in the Anamatagga Saṁyutta. The Blessed One declared that if someone were to cut down all the trees and foliage in this entire Jambudīpa into four-inch pieces, and set them aside one by one saying, "This is my mother, this is my mother's mother, this is that mother's mother," even if all those trees and foliage were exhausted, one could not bring to an end the line of those who have been one's mother in this saṁsāra. That discourse is meant to show that one has been born in this saṁsāra for such a long period of time.

Similarly, if one were to make clay pellets the size of jujube seeds from the soil of the great earth, and count them saying, "This is my father, this is my father's father," and so on, that lineage of fathers would not come to an end even if the soil of the great earth were exhausted. This was declared to clarify that one has been wandering in this saṁsāra for an inconceivably long, anamatagga (without discoverable beginning) period of time.

Similarly, the Blessed One has declared, in relation to the four great oceans, that during this long period, in this long saṁsāra whose beginning is not apparent, if one were to collect the tears shed by a single person weeping when separated from the loved and agreeable, and united with the unloved and disagreeable, they would be greater than the waters of the four great oceans. That is, the tears shed due to the death of one's mother, the death of one's daughter, the death of one's son, and so on, as well as due to the loss of wealth and disasters of illness—these tears are greater than the four great oceans. Likewise, if the breast milk one has drunk from mothers in this long saṁsāra were collected, it too would be greater than the four great oceans. This is not presented as an exaggeration by the Blessed One; that quantity of milk is indeed greater than the four great oceans. Next, it is shown that if the blood shed by a person having their throat cut throughout this long saṁsāra were collected, it would be greater than the four great oceans.

On one occasion, the Blessed One declared to a group of about thirty forest-dwelling bhikkhus, as a sermon sufficient for them to attain Arahantship, this very discourse about blood: how the blood shed when having one's throat cut after being born as cows, buffaloes, goats, sheep, and chickens over a long period of time is greater than the four great oceans, and so on. Drawing from such sutta discourses that arouse urgency (saṁvega) regarding this wheel of saṁsāra, Sumedhā explained the terrifying nature of saṁsāra to King Anīkadatta.

Then she said: "While my head is on fire, and decay and death (jarāmaraṇa) follow closely behind me, there is no help for me from others. I must strive to bring this decay and death (jarāmaraṇa) to an end. I need no help from others. Go, I do not wish to marry you. You must go!" She declared in this manner. Finally, perhaps because the king was somewhat softened by her declarations, he rose, bowed to Sumedhā's father, and pleaded: "Grant Sumedhā permission to go forth to put an end to the suffering (dukkha) of saṁsāra." Thus, Princess Sumedhā, having overcome the opposition of both her parents and the king who had come to marry her, and having obtained permission to go forth, was ordained in the Dispensation and ultimately attained Arahantship.

Furthermore, after attaining Arahantship, in the final days of the Arahant Therī Sumedhā, she declared the powerful wholesome deed (kusala) that helped her attain this great gain, as recorded in the Therīgāthā. During the time of the Buddha Koṇāgamana, she, along with two of her female friends, had built and offered a dwelling (āvāsa) to the Buddha. Those two friends are identified in this Buddha's Dispensation as the brahmin lady Dhanañjānī and the Therī Khemā. It was through associating with Buddhas over a long period and contemplating the deep aspects of the True Dhamma (saddhamma) that Princess Sumedhā ultimately chose to become a bhikkhunī instead of becoming a queen consort or chief queen. She ended her life as an Arahant nun. Among the heroic characters in this Dispensation, Therī Sumedhā occupies a unique place. Indeed, as the longest stanza group in the Therīgāthā, the story of Therī Sumedhā is mentioned last. For many, especially lay women devotees, this biography can be a source of great encouragement.

Now, the stanza we have taken as our theme actually appears right at the end of the collection of Therīgāthā, which consists of about seventy poem groups. The stanza that precisely reflects the occasion that caused the king's mind to change—the very one that led to it—is what we have cited as our theme on this occasion:

Adhigatamidaṁ bahūhi amataṁ, ajja pi ca labhanīyamidaṁ,

Yo yoniso payuñjati, na ca sakkā aghaṭamānena.

Adhigatamidaṁ bahūhi amataṁ – This Deathless Nibbāna, has been attained by many. Ajja pi ca labhanīyamidaṁ – even today this Nibbāna can be obtained. Yo yoniso payuñjati – if one strives with wise attention (yoniso). Na ca sakkā aghaṭamānena – but it cannot be attained by someone who does not make a firm, strenuous effort.

"The Nibbāna obtained by many in the past can be obtained today if one strives; but for one who cannot strive, this Nibbāna cannot be obtained," the Blessed One declared. It was upon hearing this declaration that the king's views completely changed. Therefore, in accordance with these words of the Buddha, we must reflect on the possibility of attaining Nibbāna within this Dispensation today as well, in keeping with the occasion. That is why we said that this stanza is exemplary. As Therī Sumedhā declared, if someone strives, they can escape from this decay and death (jarāmaraṇa) to what is called the "Deathless" (amata / amṛta). That is why Therī Sumedhā said her head was on fire, and that decay and death (jarāmaraṇa) were chasing after her. Having been born again and again in various ways in this saṁsāra for an infinite time, one has had to face death—often termed ghāta, being slaughtered. It is because of such a nature of this saṁsāra that those who heard the Buddha's discourses in the past developed a sense of urgency (saṁvega) and strove to realize Nibbāna swiftly.

It is the long duration as well as the terrifying nature of this saṁsāra that the Blessed One depicted through those similes of blood, tears, and breast milk. Through the explanations of the terrifying nature and long duration of saṁsāra, the Blessed One endeavored to make us understand the Truth of Suffering (dukkha-sacca) within the Four Noble Truths, as well as to cultivate disenchantment (nibbidā) towards saṁsāra.

However, nowadays, the Truth of Suffering (dukkha-sacca) has often been reduced to a very simplistic level. One frequently hears people talking about daily disappointments or mental stress and anxiety as if they represent the Truth of Suffering (dukkha-sacca). But if one is to develop such a deep strength of renunciation (nekkhamma), one must contemplate the terrifying nature of saṁsāra, the long duration of saṁsāra, and its inconstant (anicca) nature, as found in the Buddha's discourses.

Now, one cannot say where one might be born next in saṁsāra. That is why Therī Sumedhā said that a person overwhelmed by the fivefold sensual pleasures, by engaging in bodily, verbal, and mental misconduct and unwholesome deeds, will be born in hellish realms and similar lower planes. Once born in such places, for another extremely long period, there is nothing but suffering (dukkha), and one cannot derive any benefit from this Dispensation of the Buddha.

Therefore, as the Blessed One declared, while there are eight inopportune moments (aṭṭha akkhaṇā) where one cannot practice the path of the Dispensation, if one has obtained birth during the arising of a Buddha, obtaining the wealth of the opportune moment (khaṇa-sampatti), one must strive to escape from these conditions of birth (jāti), decay (jarā), and death (maraṇa).

You, virtuous friends, may have heard the inspired utterance (udāna) declared by the Blessed One after attaining Supreme Enlightenment. The inspired verse beginning with "Aneka jāti saṁsāraṁ..." speaks precisely about this problem of rebirth (punabbhava). Aneka jāti saṁsāraṁ, sandhāvissaṁ anibbisaṁ – "Through many births (jāti) in saṁsāra I have wandered, searching but not finding the builder of this house." Dukkhā jāti punappunaṁ – "Painful is birth (jāti) again and again." It is this very condition that the Blessed One pointed out as the Truth of Suffering (dukkha-sacca).

We usually consider only daily disappointments, the inability to fulfill one's expectations, and such things as suffering (dukkha). But the nature of this saṁsāra is something far deeper than that. The Blessed One declares: “Anamataggoyaṁ, bhikkhave, saṁsāro, pubbākoṭi na paññāyati, avijjānīvaraṇānaṁ sattānaṁ taṇhāsaṁyojanānaṁ…” and so forth.

A first beginning of this saṁsāra cannot be seen, because the Blessed One has declared that there is no such beginning of ignorance (avijjā) where one could say that ignorance (avijjā) did not exist before and then arose. That is why it is said to have no first beginning, spanning such an immense duration of time. Avijjānīvaraṇānaṁ means covered by the hindrance of ignorance (avijjā), and taṇhāsaṁyojanānaṁ means fettered by the bond of craving (taṇhā); the Blessed One has declared that for a long time, beings have thus been wandering in saṁsāra.

Therefore, on a day like this, we must reflect: if we are asked what our goal as Buddhists is, we should be able to say without fear, “It is to see the end of saṁsāra in this very life.” Although the word Nibbāna is used for this, Nibbāna is defined in very strange ways. Many describe Nibbāna in a way that actually increases craving for becoming (bhava-taṇhā). Many assume Nibbāna to be a special, separate world; they define Nibbāna as a novel world. However, the Blessed One has shown, “Dukkhā jāti punappunaṁ”— “Suffering (dukkha) is birth (jāti) again and again.” Birth (jāti) occurs very easily, meaning as long as ignorance (avijjā) and craving (taṇhā) exist, one will certainly undergo birth (jāti) in various places and in various levels of becoming (bhava). That is why Sumedhā too said that this becoming (bhava) is essence-less. Whether in heavenly worlds or the human world, impermanence (anicca) is everywhere. Impermanence (anicca) is indeed the nature of things.

Thus, if there is birth (jāti) within that impermanent (anicca) becoming (bhava), decay (jarā), sickness (vyādhi), and death (maraṇa) will certainly be there. One cannot obtain a birth (jāti) that is devoid of death. Like a shadow, decay and death (jarāmaraṇa) go together with birth (jāti). For this reason, the suffering (dukkha) of saṁsāra is not those minor shortcomings as the worldly people generally think. It must be considered far more deeply; it must be understood far more deeply. It is only for someone who takes this deeply to heart that the practices of this Dispensation become meaningful.

Thus, the Blessed One has summarized for us the necessary steps for liberation from this long saṁsāra within the Four Noble Truths. First, what is this illness called suffering (dukkha)? As mentioned before, it is birth (jāti) again and again—dukkhā jāti. Then, along with it, birth (jāti), decay (jarā), sickness (vyādhi), and death (maraṇa). Furthermore, daily disappointments and such are also included in it: not getting what one wishes for, association with the unloved, separation from the loved, and so on—this is the nature of suffering (dukkha) inherent within existence. If the nature inherent in existence is suffering (dukkha), the Blessed One showed what lies beneath it: craving (taṇhā). The Blessed One declared that a being afflicted by the thirst of craving (taṇhā) is like one running after a mirage. No matter how far one goes in this, no satisfaction is ever found.

That is why Therī Sumedhā said that even if it rained the seven kinds of gems, no satisfaction would be gained; and why she said that King Mandhātā, who was the foremost among the enjoyers of sensual pleasures, died without attaining satisfaction. The Blessed One pointed out the unsatisfying nature of craving (taṇhā), which is like running after a mirage, and it is this craving (taṇhā) that is called the origin (samudaya) of this entire mass of suffering (dukkha). This craving (taṇhā) is thus generated through ignorance (avijjā). This ignorance (avijjā) is like when we think of a deer—the deer mistakes the distant shimmering vision for water, and then runs after it. It is just such a thing.

Due to the delusion arising from ignorance (avijjā), people run without limit after the goals they set for themselves in the world. The Blessed One has shown the craving (taṇhā) that arises towards things that object-ize the eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind as a thirst. In some places, it is shown as an insatiable hunger. Its liberation is shown as “taṇhakkhayo virāgo nirodho nibbānaṁ” (the destruction of craving, dispassion, cessation, Nibbāna, and the very destruction and calming of craving (taṇhā) is shown as bliss. This is not something received in a special, different place. The Blessed One shows it as a state that can be experienced in this very life. For this reason, Nibbāna is sometimes designated by the name “taṇhakkhaya” (destruction of craving).

The path leading to that is what the Blessed One has shown as the Noble Eightfold Path. All concepts and thoughts we generate through wrong views (micchā-diṭṭhi) drag us back to saṁsāra again and again. However, the Blessed One has declared that right view (sammā-diṭṭhi) is for the sake of escaping from this world. Whether one performs meritorious deeds or demeritorious deeds, one is still within saṁsāra. Therefore, the path for the exhaustion of these karmas is the supramundane Noble Eightfold Path. Through that Noble Eightfold Path, one proceeds towards a practice that puts an end to both merit and demerit. It is that very craving (taṇhā) that creates the urge in worldly beings to perform both meritorious and demeritorious actions.

As long as the perception of self (atta-saññā), the dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi), and the sense of “I” and “mine” exist therein, worldly beings strive to grasp those various things as grasping / fuel (upādāna). In the Blessed One’s Dhamma, the Three Characteristics—impermanent (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and not-self (anattā)—are particularly shown. Now, everyone understands impermanence (anicca) to some extent. However, the Blessed One saw all these things far more deeply than that. Not only everything visible on the surface, but also our sense bases—namely, the eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind, and everything that becomes their object—change extremely momentarily; they are impermanent (anicca). For this very reason, one has to experience their unsatisfying nature, their nature of suffering (dukkha). Therefore, they cannot be kept under one's control. This inability to keep them under one's control is what is called not-self (anattā).

Therefore, one must practice directing one's daily thinking in such a way that the Three Characteristics of impermanent (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and not-self (anattā) are properly established in one's mind. That is what helps to develop the supramundane path. Generally, within the Blessed One's teaching, there is a mundane aspect of right view (sammā-diṭṭhi), which involves turning away from actions leading to lower realms and heading towards happy destinies; there is that side too. However, that is something that increases saṁsāra (becoming / existence).

Therefore, one must contemplate deeply. That is why Sumedhā said that even in the pleasures of the heavenly worlds, there is no end, no satisfaction. Instead, what is to be killed is death itself. What is called "ghāta"—what is to be slaughtered is death itself; it is the fact of having to die in those various places. Thus, that fact of having to die is brought to an end only by bringing birth (jāti) to an end. Birth (jāti) is brought to an end by bringing death to an end, since birth (jāti) and death go together. The concept of birth (jāti) arises through grasping / fuel (upādāna). Through grasping (upādāna), there is becoming (bhava).

As long as craving (taṇhā) exists, worldly beings undergo birth (jāti) in hell realms, heavenly worlds, or the human world, whether through wholesome or unwholesome deeds, in accordance with the sign (nimitta) grasped by the mind. Within every such existence (bhava), decay (jarā), sickness (vyādhi), and death (maraṇa) are seen and experienced. Therefore, the Blessed One pointed out that one must understand the true nature of the world insightfully (vipassanā-wise), in terms of impermanence (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and not-self (anattā).

Now, what this world is trying to gratify is this skeletal cage of a body. The true nature of this body must be contemplated as unattractive (asubha). What Therī Sumedhā brought to light was this unattractive (asubha) nature of the body. Furthermore, its impermanence as impermanent (anicca-wise), or in terms of elements (dhātu). For some, even when contemplating in terms of elements (dhātu), the aforementioned Three Characteristics are understood. Because what exists inside this body, as well as externally, are the four great elements (mahābhūta) of earth (paṭhavī), water (āpo), fire (tejo), and wind (vāyo)—the four elements (dhātu).

Due to grasping (upādāna) towards them, a division has been made into internal and external. One grasps it as "this is mine." Next, one tries to grasp external things. To catch them, one runs after them. That is why it is said to be like running after a mirage.

These six sense bases (āyatana) are like an octopus, trying to grasp the entire world through these six senses. That is an unsatisfying run. That is why the Blessed One declares that if someone constantly contemplates that what exists there as well as here is only earth (paṭhavī), water (āpo), fire (tejo), and wind (vāyo), that person can reduce that aforementioned craving (taṇhā) and oppression. If on some occasion one understands: “What is taken here as 'I' and 'mine' is merely a certain illusion. It is because of the delusion developed over a long period in saṁsāra that we undergo this suffering (dukkha).” To put it precisely, in this consciousness (viññāṇa) called 'mind' that we hold in such high esteem, there exists a certain deceptive quality. It is something that is caught when we look back. The Blessed One shows this as Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). What is called Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) there is merely a name in appearance and a form in appearance. When this is understood as Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa), then this delusion is thinned out to some extent.

If someone recognizes that within everything that is seen and heard by them, there exists only a shadow cast in consciousness (viññāṇa) that is connected to that consciousness (viññāṇa), then the desire to grasp these things gradually thins out. It is in this way that one enters the path of insight (vipassanā). When watching a movie, our delusion arises because we glue together that rapidly running sequence of images with craving (taṇhā). We glue them together along the shadows falling extremely rapidly within this consciousness (viññāṇa), with some expectation of “I” and “mine”; through this, it appears to us as something that truly exists. It is in this way that the perception of permanence (nicca-saññā) arises. But if we practice looking closely, moment by moment, with mindfulness and clear comprehension (sati-sampajañña) through insight (vipassanā), we gradually realize that what exists here is only something like the aforementioned shadow. That is why the Blessed One takes Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) as merely a shadow cast in consciousness (viññāṇa) itself—namely, the mental factors (nāma-dhamma) of feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), volition (cetanā), contact (phassa), and attention (manasikāra); and next, what we hold onto as form (rūpa), which is merely those four elements (dhātu) of earth (paṭhavī), water (āpo), fire (tejo), and wind (vāyo), and the perception of form (rūpa-saññā) derived from those four great elements (mahābhūta).

Then, the nature of this grasping (upādāna) is understood through that. What we call “the thing to be grasped” is merely an illusion. In truth, there is nothing to be grasped. Within that grasping, there is only that aforementioned feeling (vedanā), a perception (saññā) formed because of that feeling (vedanā), a volition (cetanā) applied to it, a contact (phassa), a place of contact, and attention (manasikāra)—that is all there is. Thus, in every instance, only these things exist. Once this is understood, the sense of “I” and “mine” thins out. Therefore, entering the path of insight (vipassanā) shown by the Blessed One occurs by establishing the good mindfulness and wisdom called mindfulness and clear comprehension (sati-sampajañña). That is what is contained in the Four Foundations of Mindfulness (cattāro satipaṭṭhānā). The Blessed One has shown how to recognize the body as body, feelings (vedanā) as feelings, the mind as mind, and mental objects as mental objects through the Four Foundations of Mindfulness. That is why the Blessed One declared: “Within this very fathom-long body, I declare the world, the origin of the world, the cessation of the world, and the path leading to the cessation of the world.” If we contemplate with wisdom that Dhamma preached by the Blessed One in that manner and apply those practices, even today we can—if we strive as Sumedhā said—attain that aforementioned Deathless (amata / amṛta). What is called the Deathless (amata) is not something that exists in a strange, different world, nor is it a kind of beverage.

Generally, everyone is afraid of death. Why are they afraid of death? It is because of grasping (upādāna). The greater the grasping (upādāna), to that same extent is the fear of death. The fear or suffering (dukkha) that arises in us is exactly in proportion to the things we have grasped. Therefore, the Blessed One pointed out that it is through the gradually arising understanding, by gradually seeing the Three Characteristics of impermanent (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and not-self (anattā) of Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) insightfully (vipassanā-wise), that the dark mass of ignorance (avijjā) is removed.

Simultaneously, the craving (taṇhā) that exists along with the delusion generated through one’s own ignorance (avijjā) is thinned out to that same extent. It is where ignorance (avijjā) and craving (taṇhā) are absent that death is truly understood. Up to now, what was thought of as death was a massive fear arising at the moment this bodily cage is destroyed, because it was taken as “mine.” But we know, one cares for one’s teeth; yet if at some point, due to some reason, it becomes absolutely necessary to extract a tooth, we allow it. We give our consent. It is the same with the other organs of our body. When contemplating in that manner, the Blessed One shows: “What exists here is grasping (upādāna)—holding on.” Becoming (bhava) is said to be the cause of this continuation. The state that arises when that is let go is what is called extinguishment without grasping (*anupādā pariNibbāna. It is simply the peace that arises at that moment of letting go; it is not some other world.

Thus, the secret lies within this very consciousness (viññāṇa). This consciousness (viññāṇa) is trapped, narrowed down, within the six sense bases (āyatana). It is narrowed down within the six sense bases (āyatana) of eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind. One cannot hear with the eye; one cannot see with the ear. Within these, a world has been built: the world seen by the eye, the world heard by the ear, the world felt by the tongue. Every enterprise, commercial business, or activity contained within this concept we call “the world” is connected to these six sense bases (āyatana): eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind. The Blessed One pointed out these: it is within these six sense bases (āyatana) themselves that suffering (dukkha) lies. The entire world, too, exists right there.

The Blessed One declared a wonderful stanza:

> Chassu loko samuppanno, chassu kubbati santhavaṁ,

> Channameva upādāya, chassu loko vihaññati.

Chassu loko samuppanno – the world has arisen within these six. It is within these six sense bases (āyatana) that what is called “a world” has arisen. Chassu kubbati santhavaṁ – all connections and coordination in the world occur within these six; everything takes place within these six. Even the highly marvelous things considered as scientific products in this era, at one end of them lies either an eye or an ear. It is from the end of such a sense base (āyatana) that other things operate. This shows how true the Buddha’s word is.

Channameva upādāya, chassu loko vihaññati – grasping onto these six, the world is oppressed and weary within the six. This is the story of the six given by the Blessed One.

> Chassu loko samuppanno, chassu kubbati santhavaṁ,

> Channameva upādāya, chassu loko vihaññati.

>

> Born within the six,

> In the six it seeks its companionship,

> Grasping tightly onto the six,

> Within the six itself, the world grows weary.

Accordingly, we must reflect: in our daily life, we can develop the aforementioned Three Characteristics in relation to these six sense bases (āyatana), using the Buddha’s word as our help. Some make use of the meditation on the unattractive (asubha-bhāvanā) to cultivate disenchantment with this body. Others use the attention to elements (dhātu-manasikāra). Yet others, through mindfulness and clear comprehension (sati-sampajañña) regarding the objects arriving at these sense bases (āyatana), and by understanding their true nature, take the opportunity to escape from the aforementioned delusion in accordance with the Buddha’s word. By understanding that this is a mirage according to the Buddha’s word, we get the opportunity to free ourselves from delusion.

That is exactly what the Blessed One declared: the world is trapped within these six sense bases (āyatana). Becoming (bhava) or continuation exists only within these six. How does one escape from this? What helps to escape from these six is the light of wisdom (paññā). The Blessed One shows that the six sense bases (āyatana) function within ignorance (avijjā). But if on any occasion one understands the true nature of that consciousness (viññāṇa) through wisdom (paññā), through that light, then at that moment, having escaped from it, there is liberation.

That is to say, through that liberation, one realizes, as stated in the Buddha’s word, “loko suñño”—the world is empty. Because at that moment, one directly experiences that what is called “a thing” is merely something fabricated by the mind of the world. The mind is liberated. The mind does not bind itself to even one of those six. It is the attainment of that liberated mind that was called the Deathless (amata). Therefore, what is called Nibbāna is the escape from the concepts built up by this world—the concept of birth (jāti), becoming (bhava) caused by grasping (upādāna), birth (jāti) caused by that becoming (bhava), and decay and death (jarāmaraṇa) caused by that birth (jāti). These are severed through that very understanding shown by the Blessed One.

The secret of dependent co-arising (paṭicca-samuppāda), which you, virtuous friends, have heard in the form “avijjā-paccayā saṅkhārā” (dependent on ignorance, preparations / Preparations arise), also lies there. Within this darkness called ignorance (avijjā), and precisely because of that darkness—just as when one is in the dark, certain illusions or groups of uncertain feelings arise—that is what is called preparations / Preparations / volitional activity (saṅkhāra). Due to the concept of “I” and “mine” developed within that ignorance (avijjā), preparations (saṅkhāra) arise in the form of merit or demerit. It is as a part of that very preparation (saṅkhāra-ing / preparing) that there is a division into two: consciousness (viññāṇa) and Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa).

Consciousness (viññāṇa) has a reflective nature. Consciousness (viññāṇa) has a certain capacity, and that is precisely the deceptive, illusion-like nature of consciousness (viññāṇa). The Blessed One compared consciousness (viññāṇa) to an illusion; an illusion is taken as something that exists as long as it is not understood. When it is understood, the illusion ceases to deceive. That is why, when the Blessed One compared consciousness (viññāṇa) to an illusion, the simile he showed was that of a magician showing an illusion at a crossroads. But ultimately, the Blessed One declares: “What essence is there in that illusion?” There is no substance in it. Showing what does not exist as if it exists is what that illusion is. Just such a thing is present within this consciousness (viññāṇa). This consciousness (viññāṇa) has a reflective capacity. When looking back, something is seen. Misunderstanding that seen thing is precisely what is called unwise attention (ayonisomanasikāra).

Worldly beings wander in saṁsāra because they misunderstand that seen thing through unwise attention (ayonisomanasikāra). That misunderstanding is identified in the Dhamma as the four distortions (vipallāsa). Vipallāsa means distorted—the distorted feeling, the distorted understanding. What are the four distortions?

1. Anicce nicca-saññā – taking what is in reality impermanent (anicca) as permanent; adopting the perception of permanence (nicca-saññā).

2. Asubhe subha-saññā – taking what is in reality unattractive (asubha) as attractive (subha). This is what Sumedhā too said. Sumedhā was a beautiful lady, yet she herself explained the unattractive (asubha) nature of her body to her parents. The Blessed One pointed out that taking the unattractive as attractive is a distortion.

3. Dukkhe sukha-saññā – what is taken as pleasure, the Blessed One showed as suffering (dukkha). That which is taken as pleasure was compared to a dream (supinūpama), because its change turns into suffering (dukkha). It cannot be kept forever. It changes constantly. It cannot be taken as pleasure. Taking it as pleasure is merely an illusion. Taking what is painful as pleasant is thus the third distortion.

4. Anattani atta-saññā – taking what is not-self (anattā), what cannot be grasped as one's own, what cannot be kept under one's control, as though it could be kept under one's control.

Thus, the Blessed One shows that it is due to these distorted things (vipallāsa-dhamma) that the world has built up suffering (dukkha) in the darkness; suffering (dukkha) has arisen. To eliminate it, one must strive to see, as the Blessed One showed, the true suffering—to see impermanent (anicca) things as impermanent (anicca), painful (dukkha) things as painful (dukkha), unattractive (asubha) things as unattractive (asubha), and not-self (anattā) things as not-self (anattā). The Blessed One pointed out that this cannot be done with the instruments found in the world. Nowadays, we use various instruments for everything in the world. If the eye cannot see properly, we get glasses to see a bit better. If that is still not enough, we get a telescope. Yet, the Blessed One declares that the world of worldlings (puthujjana) is blind.

Why was it declared so? Not to disparage us. It is because until that Eye of Dhamma (dhamma-cakkhu) arises, until the Eye of Wisdom (paññā-cakkhu) arises, the world is merely groping in the dark. Generally, when we think of a blind person, we think, "Oh, that person is just groping around." But to the Blessed One's Eye of Wisdom, it was clear that what the world is doing—including the scientists—is merely a groping in the dark.

At that point, the Blessed One points out: "The world is trapped within these six sense bases (āyatana)." They say they see, they say they hear, they say they feel. All of this takes place within that narrow limit grasped as "I" and "mine"; it is within that that a world exists. It is like a sacrifice performed inside a gourd. Our ancestors may have heard of this "sacrifice inside a gourd"—the Blessed One declared something of that nature on a certain occasion to the Brahmin Verañja.

"Brahmin, I am the very first chick in this era to break through the eggshell and come out." One must contemplate the depth of this statement. What then is this eggshell? The Blessed One has shown it to be ignorance (avijjā). Therefore, everyone—including these scientists—remains inside this eggshell. It is this breaking through the eggshell that is called the arising of wisdom (paññā).

That is why Nibbāna is sometimes designated by the name "cessation of the six sense bases" (saḷāyatana-nirodha). Breaking through the eggshell is compared to the cessation of the six sense bases (saḷāyatana-nirodha). Where the six sense bases (saḷāyatana) cease, it is not death. Where the six sense bases cease, the Eye of Wisdom (paññā-cakkhu) opens. To the Eye of Wisdom, things that previously appeared to exist are seen not to exist. Therein lies the secret. But the world does not like this. They want to keep everything, but they also want to eliminate suffering (dukkha). The Blessed One shows that this is impossible, because of the craving for becoming (bhava-taṇhā).

Now, Therī Sumedhā said from the very beginning, “I have no desire for this becoming (bhava).” She said directly to the king too: “My head is on fire. Decay and death (jarāmaraṇa) follow me. Why do they follow me? I have no use for those things. Go!” Thus, the most important thing is eliminating the attachment to becoming (bhava). But in the world, there exists a strong craving for becoming (bhava-taṇhā). They want to remain in becoming (bhava) but also want to be free of suffering (dukkha). Both cannot be done. Because what is called becoming (bhava) is the sense of “I” and “mine.” The Blessed One shows the opposite. The Blessed One shows that the false notion existing within this world, this wrong grasping of “I” and “mine”—right there lies entire suffering (dukkha). Beings have thus been trapped within the sense bases (āyatana) in this saṁsāra for a long period of time.

The Blessed One has shown the simile of a dog bound to a post in relation to the dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi). The dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi) is the assumption that this group/body actually exists. Each of us has a name given by our parents. To that name, various titles and statuses added by society are joined. Accordingly, we identify ourselves as a person. We, too, say “I, I.” But this skeletal cage of a body also changes constantly. Everything changes. Forgetting this, we grasp it as “a thing” through the perception of compactness (ghana-saññā). It is the same regarding other things too.

However, if on some occasion the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā) is developed to the highest level, at that moment, an inability to grasp in that manner arises. That is called the perception of a heap (rāsi-saññā). The meditator on insight (vipassanā) understands this step by step. What was grasped compactly as one thing, as a unit, is at some point seen by the eye of insight (vipassanā): “Here exists only a certain kind of illusion.” An illusion—that is, merely an image falling in consciousness (viññāṇa). What actually exists here is a set of mental factors (nāma-dhamma) associated with a consciousness (viññāṇa)—namely, feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), volition (cetanā), contact (phassa), and attention (manasikāra); there is merely a name for a name there. Next, a perception of form (rūpa-saññā) that we adopt in relation to the four great elements (mahābhūta) of earth (paṭhavī), water (āpo), fire (tejo), and wind (vāyo), which we cannot identify separately. Thus, it is through the understanding that this is only Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) that one is gradually able to understand.

That is why it is said that in insight (vipassanā), as one proceeds forward from the understanding of Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa), this perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā) becomes very clear. What is present there is not the impermanence usually thought of by the world. It is understood extremely deeply that everything changes moment by moment, with extreme rapidity. Everything changes, at every single moment. Even within the in-breath and out-breath, in every single thing, the perception of not-self (anattā-saññā) gradually grows. One realizes that there is no basis for what was grasped as "I." Proceeding in this manner, at some point, one is liberated from the darkness of ignorance (avijjā).

Generally, when enjoying a movie, we do not think for even a single moment, "We are enjoying this movie thanks to the surrounding darkness." At that time, we do not think, "It is because of this darkness." If the thought of the darkness were to cross our mind for even a moment, we could not enjoy that movie. But because of that delusion, the delusion (moha) present in the world, our mind rests on that screen—the unstabilized screen. Relying on that unstabilized screen, a strange continuation of becoming (bhava) is conjured up, whether in the teledramas or films of this era, in every single one of them. Furthermore, we do not realize that this functions within a certain frame. That frame is what is called the prepared / conditioned (saṅkhata)—something fabricated. The Blessed One designates this frame as the prepared (saṅkhata).

It is something we ourselves have fabricated, but we do not see it. Thus, the world remains within the prepared (saṅkhata) that they themselves have constructed. It is within that that all this birth (jāti), decay (jarā), and death (maraṇa) occur. If this skeletal cage of a body had a beginning in a mother's womb at some point, it was not due to our mother's skill. This is said to occur because of grasping (upādāna). Thus, at the moment a being passes away in saṁsāra, in accordance with the sign (nimitta) that comes to the mind—as stated in "kammaṁ khettaṁ viññāṇaṁ bījaṁ taṇhā sineho" (karma is the field, consciousness is the seed, craving is the moisture)—as long as the seed of consciousness (viññāṇa-bīja) has the nature to sprout, the seed of consciousness (viññāṇa) is deposited, and the moisture of craving (taṇhā) is present. At that moment, a conception occurs in a mother's womb as a child. This being, this child, who emerges bringing joy to the mother and father, ultimately does not know, nor do the parents know, that what is present here is simply that very delusion, that same ignorance (moha) that has come along for a long time in saṁsāra. As long as the body called "I" and "mine" grows from that point, one calls it "I" and "mine." And so it is regarding other things in this world. As ignorance (avijjā) is eliminated through true understanding, the delusion present here is understood. Indeed, if there is no measuring viewpoint, there is no measurement either. Where there is measurement, there is narrowing. If at some point the primary peg that helps to measure is uprooted—that is what is called in the Dhamma the conceit "I am" (asmi-māna), the peg that says "I am."

That is to say, the most fundamental, extremely subtle part of continuation is the conceit "I am" (asmi-māna). The moment that is removed, things that appeared due to ignorance (avijjā) and darkness are no longer seen; things that were heard are no longer heard. Yet, one has not become blind; one has not become deaf. At that moment, the light of wisdom (paññā) arose. Just as mentioned regarding the cinema, the moment the light comes on, the things on the screen fade away. In the same way, there comes a moment when the world fades away. That very fading away is indeed liberation. Then, if someone has experienced that, it is registered in consciousness (viññāṇa) as a unique experience. What was prepared in consciousness (viññāṇa) at that point was a state of having died without dying.

What is called the Deathless (amata / amṛta) is therefore not some strange beverage. It is a moment when that wrong notion taken as "death" is directly and personally eradicated; that is, one understands that one is being held by the mind. If that existence (bhava) grasped by the mind, which was taken as "this is I," is let go at some point, at that moment, instead of suffering (dukkha), there arises peace—a sense of liberation, an escape. That bliss of liberation is what is called Nibbāna. The other side directly realized right here is that if it was previously a prepared consciousness (saṅkhata-viññāṇa) present in consciousness (viññāṇa), it was holding onto Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa); the delusion regarding Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) was present. Therefore, when one is liberated from Name (nāma-vimutta), that person has no sign (nimitta) to undergo birth (jāti) again.

You, virtuous friends, have heard that it is in accordance with the sign (nimitta) developed at the final moment—such as the sign of karma (kamma-nimitta) or the sign of destination (gati-nimitta)—that one undergoes birth (jāti) in a hell realm, a mother's womb, or an animal womb. Thus, if such a sign (nimitta) is not grasped at any moment, and consciousness (viññāṇa) is liberated, that person has no further becoming (bhava). Therefore, it was because the direct realization of "no further becoming (bhava), no further birth (jāti)" was obtained that the Blessed One declared that aforementioned inspired verse (udāna-gāthā)—the valuable inspired verse that everyone has heard. Why did he, upon obtaining this direct realization, not declare anything else but present only this account of birth (jāti) and decay (jarā)?

Aneka jāti saṁsāraṁ, sandhāvissaṁ anibbisaṁ – and so forth. "For a long time in this saṁsāra, I did not see the builder who constructed this house, this skeletal cage, this Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa), for all this time. Because I did not see him, I ran searching for all this time."

Gahakārakaṁ gavesanto – "Running, seeking the house-builder."

Dukkhā jāti punappunaṁ – "Painful is birth (jāti) again and again," because every house that is built collapses.

But the Blessed One declares:

Gahakāraka diṭṭhosi – "O house-builder, you are seen!" Who is the builder of this house? Consciousness (viññāṇa).

Puna gehaṁ na kāhasi – “You shall not build a house again.” That refers to the liberated consciousness (viññāṇa), the consciousness (viññāṇa) liberated from Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) when the light of wisdom (paññā) was obtained. That is why there is no further birth (jāti).

Sabbā te phāsukā bhaggā, gahakūṭaṁ visaṅkhitaṁ – “All your rafters are broken, the ridgepole is shattered.” This is the moment when everything is freed, because the house-builder has been understood.

Visaṅkhāragataṁ cittaṁ, taṇhānaṁ khayamajjhagā – “The mind has reached the un-prepared / unconditioned (visaṅkhāra), attaining the destruction of cravings (taṇhā).” This is exactly what the Blessed One points out: ultimately, one who has attained that peace, the peace of Nibbāna. It is because of such a state that one does not undergo birth (jāti) again.

Thus, it is that very state of the Deathless (amata) attained in this very life that the Blessed One has declared. The person who has obtained that direct realization knows with certainty that they will not be born again. That itself is the peace belonging to that person. Therefore, through the bliss experienced in this very life during the attainment of the Fruit of Arahantship (arahatta-phala-samāpatti), that person knows directly and surely that there is no further saṁsāra for them.

Thus, through the story of the Arahant Therī Sumedhā, we have explained the fear of saṁsāra, which is a highly important part of the Four Noble Truths shown by the Blessed One. We must constantly reflect that we have traveled in saṁsāra for an immense period of time. Furthermore, on this extremely rare occasion of a Buddha’s arising, possessing the wealth of the opportune moment (khaṇa-sampatti), we must not limit ourselves to mere backbone-breaking physical routines, but understand deeply and, without letting this opportunity for escaping saṁsāra slip away, strive as much as possible to attain that aforementioned supramundane state.

Therefore, today, you, virtuous friends, established in virtue (sīla), have listened to a Dhamma sermon that helps towards your Nibbāna. May all these wholesome deeds serve as a cause, a condition, and a strong support (upanissaya) for you to realize the supreme, deathless Great Nibbāna as swiftly as possible, before the decline of the Dispensation, through the penetration of the paths and fruits of Stream-entry (sotāpatti), Once-returning (sakadāgāmitā), Non-returning (anāgāmitā), and Arahantship! Thus you should wish.

Likewise, may whatever beings there are, from the Avīci hell up to the Akaniṭṭha heaven, including one’s own relatives, who wish to rejoice in the merit of this giving and hearing of the Dhamma, by doing so, find peace in the supreme, deathless Great Nibbāna through their own respective bodhi (enlightenment)! Wishing thus, recite these stanzas and share the merit.

Dhammapada 37 (Cittavagga)

Dear Listeners,

Beings in this world travel from country to country to see marvelous and wonderful things. They construct spacecraft and travel to other planets. By inventing instruments like microscopes and telescopes, they reveal wonderful details about things close at hand and things far away. But, pious friends, more wonderful than all of these things is this mind of ours. It was our Buddha who properly demonstrated to the world the way of the mind, the nature of the mind, and the great power of the mind. Our Buddha revealed to the world that it is because of this running mind that we wander in this saṃsāra for such an extremely long time, and that the place where the mind is brought to a halt is Nibbāna. Precisely by seeing the way of this running mind, we are able to bring forth a systematic program of practice that helps to halt the mind. The background story related to the stanza we have taken as our theme is indeed an excellent illustration of the behavior of a running mind.

In the city of Sāvatthī, there lived a good young man from a certain family. Having heard the Dhamma from our Buddha, that young man went forth and ordained under the name Saṅgharakkhita. Within a few days of ordaining and receiving higher ordination, he attained Arahantship. This venerable monk had a nephew. To remember the venerable monk, the nephew's parents also named him Saṅgharakkhita. Society knew him by the name 'Bhāgineyya Saṅgharakkhita'. 'Bhāgineyya' means nephew; thus, he was known as 'Nephew Saṅgharakkhita'. After this boy reached youth, he too went forth and ordained under his maternal uncle, the venerable monk.

Thus, he ordained as the novice monk Bhāgineyya Saṅgharakkhita. Having ordained and received higher ordination, he went to a village monastery to observe the rainy season retreat. At the end of the rainy season, from the offering made—the vassāvāsika offering—this monk received a piece of cloth seven cubits long and another piece of cloth eight cubits long. When he received this offering, this monk thought: "I must offer this eight-cubit piece of cloth to my preceptor, my teacher monk. I will use the seven-cubit piece of cloth." Having formed this great intention, after the rainy season, he set out to see his teacher monk. On the way, he went for alms, and while the teacher monk had gone to the village for alms, he entered the monastery, swept the venerable monk's cloister walk and chambers, performed the familiar duties, prepared water, and waited for the venerable monk to return.

Then, when the venerable monk arrived, he went forward to meet him, took his bowl and robes, performed those duties with great respect, made a seat ready for him, and having brought that eight-cubit piece of cloth, placed it at the feet of the venerable monk, saying, "Venerable Sir, please accept and use this offering." Offering it thus, he took the palm-leaf fan and stood fanning the venerable monk. The venerable monk said to his pupil, "My robes are complete. I have no need of this cloth. You may use this yourself." Monk Bhāgineyya Saṅgharakkhita said, "Alas, Venerable Sir, from the moment I received this, my only intention was to offer it to you. Please use it." Even though he said so, the teacher monk did not wish to accept it. "It would bring great blessings to me if you would use this, Venerable Sir," Monk Bhāgineyya Saṅgharakkhita pleaded repeatedly, but the preceptor refused it. And then, this monk's mind became displeased.

"Alas! In lay life, this venerable monk was my maternal uncle. Even though he is now my teacher monk, he does not wish to accept or use what I offer. Therefore, what is the use of this monkhood to me? I will return to the lay life," he thought. Then he wondered, "When I become a layman, what livelihood will I pursue? Maintaining a household is not easy; what job shall I do?" Then a way occurred to him: "I will sell this eight-cubit piece of cloth and buy a she-goat. Goats breed very quickly. I will sell the offspring as they are born and make money. Having earned money, I will take a wife. To that wife, a son will be born. Then, seating my wife and son in a carriage, I will come to visit my teacher monk, having named that son 'Saṅgharakkhita'. Then, while coming along the way, I will say to my wife, 'Give that child into my hands.' But the wife will say, 'You drive this carriage; I will look after the child.' Saying so, before they go far, due to the wife's negligence, the child falls right in front of the moving carriage wheel. The wheel runs over the child. Then, in anger, I will strike that wife with the goad, saying, 'When I asked for the child, you could not give him, and now you could not even protect him!' and I will beat her with the stick." Whom did he strike? He struck the head of his teacher monk, the Arahant! What did he strike with? The palm-leaf fan!

This venerable monk possessed supernormal powers (abhiññā). He was a great Arahant. He could see how another person's mind was working. Reflecting on it, he thought, "Why did my pupil strike my head with the palm-leaf fan like this?" Then he saw the thoughts that had been working in his mind. Thereupon, the senior monk said: "Saṅgharakkhita, you could not strike your wife, but what is the fault of this old elder?" At that moment, a great sense of urgency (saṃvega) arose in this young monk. "Alas, I am ruined! My teacher monk saw how my mind was working." Out of great shame, he dropped the palm-leaf fan right there and began to run. A group of novices ran after him, caught him, and brought him before the Buddha. Seeing them from afar, the Buddha asked, "Why are you bringing this monk by force?" They replied, "This young monk, having become dissatisfied with the monkhood, started to run away. We caught him and brought him here." The Buddha asked, "Why, monk, having ordained in such a Dispensation (Sāsana), do you wish to return to the lay life like this?" Then, this monk recounted the entire sequence of events, the way his mind had been working. The Buddha then comforted his mind: "That is the nature of this mind. Do not let your mind be weakened by this. The mind is something that wanders far like this. Such is the nature of the mind." Giving a discourse, he uttered the Dhamma stanza we mentioned at the beginning:

> Dūraṅgamaṃ ekacaraṃ,

> asarīraṃ guhāsayaṃ,

> Ye cittaṃ saññamessanti,

In this stanza, four characteristics of the mind are mentioned—four aspects of the nature of the mind. Dūraṅgamaṃ means wandering far; ekacaraṃ means traveling alone. The nature of the mind is to wander far, and it also travels alone. Asarīraṃ means bodiless (having no physical body). Guhāsayaṃ means dwelling in a cave—hiding inside a cave. Those (ye) who restrain (saññamessanti) the mind (cittaṃ) which has this kind of nature, will be freed from the bond of Māra (mārabandhanā)—the bond of defilements of Māra, the bond of saṃsāra. That is to say, they realize Nibbāna. Thus, he taught a stanza of such profound meaning.

As mentioned in that story, having heard this stanza and the sermon, even that monk Bhāgineyya Saṅgharakkhita attained the fruit of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala), precisely by seeing the peril (ādīnava) of how his own mind had operated. For many people, understanding arises based on their own downfall. When one sees the peril, from then on, a keen interest arises to develop energy, mindfulness, concentration, and faith. Perhaps for this reason, and due to his past merit, that monk attained Stream-entry, and it is mentioned that a large number of others also realized the Paths and Fruits.

Now let us try to understand the meaning of this valuable stanza a little further. It is worthwhile to consider the lessons we can extract for our lives from this stanza and story. Every single point mentioned about this mind is extremely deep.

Dūraṅgamaṃ (wandering far) is said because, according to the object the mind takes, it can travel very fast and very far. When we think of the Akaniṭṭha Brahma world, the mind goes to that Akaniṭṭha Brahma world. It travels that far, and with such rapidity. The Buddha declared, "I do not see any other thing in this world that changes, transforms, or turns as rapidly as the mind." So, this mind spins and turns extremely quickly, faster than any wheel. Just as it turns rapidly, it also goes very far—dūraṅgamaṃ. Scientists say that light is the fastest thing in the universe. Be that as it may, there is nothing as fast as the mind. The mind travels far with such immense speed.

Next, ekacaraṃ means traveling alone, according to its own whim. "Traveling alone" means that, while the physical body of monk Saṅgharakkhita was right next to his teacher monk, his mind wandered off all alone. It conjured up many dreams about the future, like daydreaming. It went very far into the future. The mind has a nature of wandering aimlessly at its own whim. Next, asarīraṃ (bodiless). We recognize a person based on their body. We recognize someone by their color, signs, and so on. But the mind has no body by which to recognize it. Moreover, when we think of a journey, there is a body associated with it. But the mind has no body. Therefore, when the mind wanders, it is difficult to grasp where it went—asarīraṃ.

Guhāsayaṃ (dwelling in a cave): the "cave" refers to this very cage of a body. This is indeed a cave. A cave is a place where one can hide. The primary elements (mahābhūta) of earth, water, fire, and wind are called dhātus (elements) or mahābhūtas (great elements). To put it briefly, this body is almost like a place haunted by "great ghosts"—that is, the great elements (mahābhūta). Every one of us has a body created from these four elements, known as the great elements. The mind is hidden inside this body. It is not easy to point out and say, "The mind is in such-and-such a place." Thus, all four terms—dūraṅgamaṃ, ekacaraṃ, asarīraṃ, guhāsayaṃ—indicate the subtlety of the mind. The mind travels very far. It also wanders alone according to its whim. Furthermore, this mind has no physical body for us to run after and catch. When that monk started running, four or five people went and caught him. But when the mind starts running, even twenty or thirty people running cannot catch it. The nature of the mind is such that the more you chase it, the further it runs. Thus, all of these show the subtlety of the mind—traveling far, wandering alone, having no body, and dwelling inside a cave. The stanza declares that whoever restrains, tames, or trains a mind that is so mysterious and incomprehensibly subtle, will be freed from the bond of Māra.

Just as he revealed the nature of the mind, the Buddha also showed the way of taming and taming this mind—the manner of taming indicated by the word saṃyama (restraint). In some instances in this Dhamma, this mind is compared to a wild bull. Indeed, like a wild bull, this mind is something ready to run wild without submitting to any control. It breaks loose and runs away. What then is the method shown in this path of Dhamma pointed out by the Buddha? Just as a wild bull is tamed by being tied to a post with a rope, the mind must be tamed. What is this post? The post is shown as the kammaṭṭhāna (meditation subject). Pious friends, kamaṭahana means kammaṭṭhāna. The meditation subject is a certain topic chosen for meditation. This is called kamaṭahana. Ṭhāna means place. Kamma means work or action. In modern terms, it is like a workplace or workshop. The workplace of the meditation practitioner is the topic of meditation—some specific subject. If it is loving-kindness meditation, it is "May they be well." If it is recollection of the Buddha, it is a word like "Araham" or "Buddho"—some meditation topic. This is the kamaṭahana, or the post. On this post, one must tie it with a rope. What is the rope? The Buddha has pointed that out too: sati. Sati means mindfulness. This wild bull must be tied to that post of the meditation subject with the rope of mindfulness.

What is done by that? It dispels the unwholesome states (akusala) that flow into the mind. It also has the nature of preventing future unwholesome states from flowing in, a state of not getting caught up in them. We can easily understand this through an illustration or a sight commonly seen even in this area. Sometimes, near a paddy field, we see a bull tied to a post. Why is it tied? If by chance the bull eats the paddy crop in the field, trouble will come to the bull from the owner of the field, and trouble will also come to the bull's owner. Therefore, it is tied to a post. But because a bull is a bull, what does it do? It goes on grazing on the grass and gradually, almost unconsciously, starts eating the paddy in the field. Right then, when the rope by which it is tied tightens around its neck, it becomes aware. Through this awareness, the bull is pulled back toward the post. Again and again, it grazes on the grass and wanders back toward the field, and again it is pulled back this way by the rope. Pious friends, it is exactly like this that mindfulness operates. Through this mindfulness, the mind is kept from wandering into unsuitable areas, allowing it to roam only within its proper domain.

In the Dhamma, a word that goes hand in hand with sati is sampajañña. Usually, sampajañña is translated as "clear comprehension." But a better word is "awareness" or "attentiveness" (being aware). In society, a word like "reminding" is used. But that is done by others; this is not like that. This is a self-awareness. Imagine someone faints and loses consciousness. After this unconscious person is taken to a hospital, let us say they regain consciousness. As soon as they regain consciousness, they look around, asking, "Where am I?" and search for an answer. That means they are trying to become aware. In the same way, it was without mindfulness that Monk Bhāgineyya Saṅgharakkhita was building daydreams about the future. Thus, the moment his teacher monk spoke those few words, he became aware. Mindfulness returned. That is what is called sampajañña. The terms that assist the meditator, therefore, are mindfulness and awareness (sati-sampajañña), which go together. Along with mindfulness, due to the application of mindfulness, awareness arises, and through that, defilements are suppressed.

In this way, the Buddha has pointed out a path of Dhamma based on this mindfulness and awareness. It is called the four foundations of mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna). We call the Buddha "Buddha," which implies that we are his children—the children of the Buddha. Not only the Sangha, but anyone who has gone to the Buddha for refuge with faith, when they call him "Buddha," it signifies that they are children of that Buddha. The Buddha on one occasion declared: "Monks, wander in your father's domain, your ancestral pasture. If you wander in your father's domain, Māra will not find an opportunity." What is this father's domain? "Father" refers to himself. The Buddha points out the pasture as the four foundations of mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna). Here, the four foundations of mindfulness are shown: contemplation of the body, contemplation of feeling (vedanā), contemplation of the mind, and contemplation of mind-objects. What are these four foundations of mindfulness shown by the Buddha in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta? It refers to a very simple form of awareness. The method employed by the Buddha is indeed wondrous.

Contemplation of the body is a certain kind of awareness regarding the body. That is, the activity of the body. In maintaining postures and so on, when walking, one walks with the understanding, "This is walking, this is walking." Next, when sitting, lying down, or reclining, one gives that understanding to the mind: "This is reclining." What is achieved by this? The scattering nature of the mind is halted. The mind gets scattered due to delusion. It was because he forgot that he had a palm-leaf fan in his hand while fanning his teacher monk, and forgot that he was standing behind his teacher monk—due to lack of mindfulness or delusion—that he behaved in that manner. If that monk had thought even slightly, "I am fanning, fanning, I am fanning here," if he had that awareness that "this in my hand is the palm-leaf fan," then that scattering of his mind would have been prevented. But what happened was the exact opposite.

That is why the Buddha points out, at a very basic level, to conduct oneself with a certain awareness of what one is doing and saying. The primary postures of the body—going and coming, sitting and standing—every one of them is reflected upon as, "I am going, sitting, standing." That awareness comes through reflection. "Reflection" means maintaining mindfulness that "the body is in such and such a posture." So much so that the Buddha points out that not only going and coming, but however the body is disposed, one knows it as it is. One constantly directs the mind to the way the body is disposed. In that way, regarding the body.

Next is the contemplation of feeling (vedanā). How feeling (vedanā) comes and goes. Pleasant feeling, painful feeling, and neutral feeling which is called equanimity. One is aware of how every single feeling arises and passes away. Through this understanding, the scattering nature of the mind is eliminated. When there is a rubber coating on an electric wire, the electric shock does not strike. In the same way, through understanding, when one proceeds with understanding, the mind does not scatter. That is the kind of thing the Buddha points out.

Contemplation of the mind means that due to various attachments, or due to hatred, or delusion, the mind takes on different colors, as it were. In other words, the mind changes. According to the way it changes, one recognizes it: "Lust has arisen in me, hatred has arisen in me, delusion has arisen in me"—thus recognizing the state of the mind. Next, the thoughts running and working within the mind. One understands those thoughts as just thoughts. If that monk, while all these thoughts were arising, had thought, "This is only a thought, this is only a thought. No trade or other activity of mine is actually taking place. Here, it is only the mind that is at work"—if he had that understanding, such a great upheaval would not have occurred. From this, it is clear that the four foundations of mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna) pointed out by the Buddha are what belong to all of us who are children of the Buddha.

That is the pasture (gocara). Gocara means the area where cattle roam—the domain belonging to cattle. In the ordinary world, there is the term "pasture." But its basic idea—the word "pasture"—is often derived from cattle, referring to the area belonging to cattle where they are meant to graze. In the same way, the Buddha points out the four foundations of mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna). He shows that the mind must constantly be made to wander within the four foundations of mindfulness. Within that wandering lies precisely that awareness which goes hand in hand with mindfulness and clear comprehension. Through this awareness, the scattering nature of the mind is prevented.

Anupassanā means "contemplating" or "seeing in accordance with." In this body, it is a contemplation of the body in the body. Looking at the body in the body, one understands the nature of the body. "This is the nature of the body; this is how the body functions." Next, "this is the nature of feeling (vedanā)." One understands each of these conditions. That is what is called contemplating. Or else, to explain the word anupassanā, we know that after a carpenter planes a piece of wood, he casts a peculiar look at it. He lets the piece of wood speak for itself, as it were, to see whether it is perfectly level or not. He casts a special glance at it like that. Similarly, one directs one's own attention towards all these things.

Not thinking, "this is beautiful" or "this is strong," but if there is something in the body, one understands it just as it is. It is the same with feeling (vedanā), and the same with the mind. Whether the thoughts that enter the mind are good or bad, one reflects on each of them in that manner. Through this reflection, understanding grows, wisdom grows. It is through understanding, when wisdom is developed to a high level, that one is able to realize Nibbāna one day. It is with such wisdom that one is able to be freed from all defilements and realize even that noble state of Arahantship.

Likewise, the Buddha has pointed out that breathing in and breathing out—which we constantly do unconsciously—is a very wonderful thing. Every Buddha attained Buddhahood through this mindfulness of breathing (ānāpānasati). Ānāpāna means breathing in and breathing out. That a Buddha emerges through this is a wondrous thing when one thinks about it; it is the simplest thing in the world. From the day of birth until death, this flow of breath back and forth is what takes place. Yet, within this lies the way to attain that highest wisdom. From this, we can see what an invaluable thing the Buddha has pointed out to us. Normally, inhaling and exhaling, the breath going up and down, happens unconsciously. Practicing to do that consciously is what is called ānāpānasati. In ānāpānasati, sati means mindfulness. One establishes mindfulness on the two processes: breathing in and breathing out.

Through this, a great understanding arises. To put it briefly, the lack of understanding of this in-breath and out-breath is a primary cause for the persistence of the notion of "I" and "mine," the view of self, which strongly holds onto the view of "I" and "mine." What we call life or vitality is indeed just this breath. But if one knows its true nature, one would think, "Where is an 'I' here?" Because we are constantly drawing in a portion of the wind blowing in the world. Sometimes it is clean air that we draw in. Then, we expel it along with the waste inside, like a bad toxic gas. Yet, within this process, we construct an "I." The foolishness of this is understood precisely when one develops mindfulness of breathing (ānāpānasati). This is a process that happens naturally, and it is an effort to perform this natural process with awareness. It is indeed something that must be practiced gradually.

Through the process of inhaling and exhaling, one understands that in this breath, there is only the drawing in of external air, letting it operate inside, and then expelling it. Then, to engage in this with attention, reflection is helpful. By applying reflection to each of these, and by focusing one's attention, one understands its true nature. When the nature of this in-breath and out-breath is understood in this very manner, one sees impermanence (anicca) through this itself. Every bit of it is impermanent (anicca).

Likewise, when directing the mind to the in-breath and out-breath, one realizes that what we think of as an easy thing is actually a great suffering (dukkha), a great trouble. That is, with what great difficulty we inhale and exhale! This is understood when its subtle aspect is revealed. Furthermore, it is only for a very short moment that we can live on an inhaled breath. We must exhale it and take another. No matter how fragrant—even if we inhale the scent of flowers or air filled with perfumes—we cannot hold it in. Such is the nature of this body that after a short while, we must expel it. Because of this, the understanding of suffering (dukkha) also arises.

Next, if something is impermanent (anicca) and of the nature of suffering (dukkha), there is nothing here that can be taken as "I" or controlled. "I cannot control this inhaling and exhaling. This too is of a highly unsatisfactory nature." Thus, the notion of "I" and "mine" gradually slips away, revealing not-self (non-self / anattā).

In this way, what the Buddha points out through the four foundations of mindfulness is to reflect wisely on the bodily processes, going and coming, and all other activities. Not in a wrong way, but wisely. That is called radical attention (yoniso manasikāra). Not according to one's own wishes, but according to how they actually occur. One develops the understanding: "In this way, this occurs; in this way, this occurs." Through developing such understanding, there emerges the realization that everything has a nature of arising, persisting, and passing away. Every single one of these—postures, going and coming, standing and sitting—has a beginning, a middle, and an end. It begins, there is a middle phase, and then it ends. Actually, there is only a beginning and a wearing away. Between this beginning and wearing away, or between arising and passing away, we construct a "persistence." What we call "persistence" is actually a state of impermanence between arising and passing away. This is called ṭhitassa aññathattaṃ (the alteration of that which persists); what is called "persistence" is constantly changing. Within it, there is a subtle alteration. It does not remain, yet we regard it as persistence.

This fact is understood in an increasingly subtle manner if one practices that mindfulness of breathing (ānāpānasati). When breathing, it is nothing complex; one simply inhales mindfully, and exhales mindfully. That is the basic training, the primary taming. Through this, the Buddha has specifically pointed out that, as a benefit of this mindfulness of breathing, the meditation of ānāpānasati especially cuts off thoughts (vitakka). Pious friends, vitakka means thoughts. How much time in daily life is wasted if one spends it building castles in the air about the future, or regretting the past! Preventing both of these, bringing the mind back, and living in the present moment is what a meditator does in the true sense. That is a great saving, a great economy. Think about yourself in daily life. How much do we waste time thinking about the past? How much do we ruin and waste time building castles in the air about the future? Thus, if someone makes an effort through these meditations to live in the present moment, it is a great saving for them. It is a saving, and as mentioned earlier, Māra the defilement cannot enter.

Because, like the rubber insulation of an electric wire, there is understanding in everything and through everything. Due to that understanding, the mind does not scatter in that brief moment. Through that, concentration (samādhi) emerges. It is to keep the mind from scattering that the Buddha has employed this method. This is a very subtle method, a method employed for living in the present moment. "When walking, one knows: 'I am walking.' When sitting, one knows: 'I am sitting.' When standing, one knows: 'I am standing.' When lying down, one knows: 'I am lying down.' In whatever way the body is disposed, one knows it in that way." Next, when inhaling, one inhales with the very understanding, "I am inhaling." When exhaling, one exhales with that understanding.

When practiced in this manner, one might think, "This is something that requires special dedication; therefore, it can only be done by monks." No, pious friends. Sometimes, lay devotees came to the Buddha and said, "Venerable Sir, although we lead household lives, if at certain times we live with our minds established in the four foundations of mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna), we experience and realize a great solace during those times." Similarly, the Buddha told the monks, "Monks, if you have compassion for your friends, companions, and relatives, you should teach them the four foundations of mindfulness, establish them in them, and explain them to them." Thus, the Buddha gave his permission.

This also shows that these four foundations of mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna) are common to all of us. Everyone who says "Buddha" should understand that their father's domain/pasture is indeed the four foundations of mindfulness. The "pasture" also means true nourishment. We consume so much food. With this food, we only increase saṃsāra. But it is through this nourishment of the four foundations of mindfulness, pointed out by the Buddha, that we can one day end the suffering of saṃsāra and realize the supreme Nibbāna. Therefore, one should especially maintain mindfulness and clear comprehension (sati-sampajañña) regarding one's daily activities, as well as practicing this mindfulness of breathing (ānāpānasati).

Let alone other things, the Buddha states in this Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta that not only major postures, but walking forward, returning, bending and stretching limbs, looking ahead, looking aside, and all other activities should be done with mindfulness and clear comprehension. Nay, even in passing stool and urine. When even the smallest things of daily life are done with mindfulness and wisdom established, through that, wisdom grows.

It is because of the lack of correct understanding of our body, the lack of correct understanding of sensations/feelings (vedanā), the lack of correct understanding of the mind, and the lack of understanding of the thoughts that enter the mind, that we wander in this saṃsāra for such a long time. Therefore, what the Buddha brings out through the four foundations of mindfulness cannot be taught by another, nor can it be shown by another. To see the true state of things in the world, some have invented microscopes—microscopes, telescopes, and so forth. Placing a very subtle thing under a microscope, they look at its interior. But, pious friends, the real microscope is not the one invented by science; it is this "contemplation" (anupassanā). If we were to approximate a Sinhala word for anupassanā, we might say "contemplating" or "seeing in accordance with." It is like the carpenter inspecting the knots in wood, looking at it to understand its true nature. When looked at, it is not something complex. It is simple. To reveal the true nature of everything, one looks at it with equanimity. Not thinking "it is mine" or "how can there be a fault in it?" but "this is of the body, this is of the physical frame," not "my body." Regard it as just a body.

That is why, when the Buddha preached on the four foundations of mindfulness, he did so not only regarding oneself, but also regarding others. Sometimes, we learn not only from our own body. There are things to be learned also from what happens to the bodies of others. A person who thinks their own body is beautiful may experience a sense of urgency (saṃvega) when they see the decaying state of another's body. That is why the Buddha sometimes showed the condition of others' bodies to those who possessed pride and intoxication, thereby opening the way for their understanding. In whatever way, taking both one's own body and others' bodies as objects, one understands the true nature of this body.

Next, the contemplation of feeling—the true nature of feelings, and the nature of the mind. Even regarding the nature of the mind, sometimes when intense anger arises in us, we do not see its perilous side. But when someone else is angry, we see how distorted their face becomes due to that anger. From that, we see its perilous side. We think, "Look how distorted someone becomes due to anger."

In this manner, what is done by the four foundations of mindfulness is to bring about a true understanding of one's body and one's life as it wanders in saṃsāra. Primarily, by applying the mind to this inhaling and exhaling, those thoughts (vitakka) are cut off, and thoughts are not allowed to arise. Thoughts generally arise because of not being aware that this process of inhalation and exhalation is taking place. If one keeps the mind focused on just that, then during that brief time, there is no room for the mind to scatter. That is how it is.

Next, through this mindfulness, concentration (samādhi) arises. Concentration (samādhi) means one-pointedness—the unification of the mind. Ekaggatā means one-pointedness. Therefore, the opposite of the mind's scattering nature is one-pointedness. Once the scattering mind is restrained, the mind gradually becomes calm. Let us say a wild bull, having pulled this way and that, and tried as much as possible to escape, pulls here and there. In the end, when it cannot escape, it goes and lies down right next to the post. Or, let us consider the bull tied near the field; it always tends to wander toward the crop. It drifts there almost unconsciously. Then, the rope reminds it. It is reminded by the rope called mindfulness. Thereupon, it returns to the post of the meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna).

In this way, let us understand the practical value of these teachings through those similes. These things pointed out by the Buddha can be put into practice in daily life, each according to their own level. A point comes when the bull realizes, "I cannot go beyond this. This is my portion," and grazes freely within that area. Similarly, if someone has chosen a certain meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna)—say, recollection of the Buddha (buddhānussati), using the word "Buddho, Buddho"—upon hearing the word "Buddho," a person of faith experiences a profound feeling. So much so that, during the time the Buddha lived, even Brahmins who were accustomed to associating with past Buddhas, when they heard, "There is a Buddha!" experienced a immense, wondrous concentration (samādhi), a wondrous transformation, solely through the faith that arose from that. Similarly, through the very word "Buddha," when one constantly reflects on it—this constant reflection is called anussati, buddhānussati. The meditation of buddhānussati means mindfulness that follows after the Buddha. Just like "contemplating" (anupassanā) or the "microscope", here it is the mindfulness that follows—mindfulness that follows after the Buddha.

Then, if one constantly brings to mind even one quality of the Buddha in that way, the result is that the scattering nature of the mind is prevented. Whenever the mind tries to scatter, one implants this word "Buddho" into the mind. It is like a mantra. However, it is not something recited without meaning like a magical formula. With faith, contemplating and recollecting the Buddha, one constantly gives the word "Buddho, Buddho" to the mind. Sometimes, at the beginning, one may have to say it silently. When thoughts come breaking in, to suppress them, one may have to repeat it almost verbally for a short while. After doing this for a considerable time, almost automatically, whenever the mind starts wandering far, the meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna) presents itself. After some time, once one is accustomed to it, without one even knowing, when defilements arise, the necessary weapon presents itself.

Similarly, let us say someone starting loving-kindness meditation (mettā-bhāvanā) constantly reflects on a phrase like "May they be well." If necessary, they may even say that phrase—not by shouting, but in the mind, saying "May they be well"—constantly giving it to the mind. This is done in alignment with the heart; it is not just a mechanical repetition. When that feeling is maintained for a long time, there is no opportunity for those defilements to enter, as there is no room left for them.

What then is accomplished by this satipaṭṭhāna method? Dispelling arisen defilements and preventing unarisen defilements from arising. It is through this that the mind is made calm. The scattering nature of the mind. The Buddha has pointed out that the mind scatters in five ways. These are called the hindrances (nīvaraṇa). The mind scatters due to sensual thoughts. Next, the mind scatters due to thoughts of hatred. Then, due to the sluggish nature of the mind, such as sloth and torpor, the mind's workability is lost. Due to restlessness and worry, one regrets things one could not do in the past. In that way, due to various regrets, the mind scatters. Or else, due to doubt, the hesitation that wonders, "Is this right or wrong?" Because of these scattering tendencies of the mind called hindrances (nīvaraṇa), and because of the mind's unworkability, the mind does not become concentrated or one-pointed. Just like a turbulent reservoir, no useful work can be derived from it.

The Buddha shows that in order to concentrate this, one should take up a certain meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna)—some meditation topic suitable for one's temperament. If one is of a hateful temperament, then loving-kindness meditation (mettā-bhāvanā). If of a lustful temperament, contemplation of foulness (asubha-bhāvanā). If faith is lacking, develop recollection of the Buddha (buddhānussati). If a sense of urgency is lacking, mindfulness of death (maraṇasati), constantly reflecting on some short phrase like Maraṇaṃ niyataṃ, jīvitaṃ aniyataṃ (Death is certain, life is uncertain). If one practices this constantly, it is a great protection for them.

The cause for all the crimes and things that happen due to sudden anger in daily life can be clearly seen from the behavior of that monk Bhāgineyya Saṅgharakkhita we mentioned. Due to the displeasure that arose in that monk—displeasure toward that Arahant—it was not actually a matter of revenge, but because of it, thinking "I am leaving, I am returning to lay life," and then, from that point, thoughts of lust and so forth arose, and he spent the rest of his time wandering in a dream world. Indeed, like falling from the sky, a great sense of urgency (saṃvega) arose in him in the end when he realized that his teacher monk knew his state of mind. From this, we can see that in daily life we must constantly monitor how our mind is working. We look after this body in so many ways. We bathe it, feed it, and give it drink. In addition to setting up whatever protective measures we can, we even employ others for this purpose. But another person cannot protect this mind in that way. One must protect it oneself. It is something one must protect oneself. One must do this oneself. That is why the Buddha declared: Tumhehi kiccaṃ ātappaṃ, akkhātāro tathāgatā (You yourselves must make the effort; the Tathāgatas are only teachers). Even the Buddha cannot grant us our Nibbāna. He can only point out the path to it. For that, we ourselves must do what needs to be done. What needs to be done is what is pointed out there: namely, the development of the four foundations of mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna).

According to the leisure one gets in daily life, perhaps by taking some time off if possible, or on free days, on a Poya day. Although there are ordinary observances of precepts, many people do not have much interest in meditation. After observing precepts, they spend their time talking about household matters or about what is happening in the country and the world. Instead of doing that, on such an occasion, one should actually withdraw, thinking, "Now I have received a good opportunity to develop the four foundations of mindfulness." Working quietly and alone, directing the mind to one's postures, inhalation and exhalation, and observing them, one begins to understand their nature of impermanence (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and not-self (non-self / anattā). Insight (vipassanā) means a special kind of seeing.

Looking through microscopes, scientists obtain various insights. Those are kinds of knowledge obtained in relation to certain external things. That is mere knowledge, not wisdom. No matter how vast a store of knowledge scientists gather, no matter what series of academic degrees they hold, their daily lives are often unsuccessful. They have no strength to overcome the problems of daily life. They have no strength to control the mind. Falling into grave dangers and crimes, they ruin their lives. What is the use of accumulating that vast store of knowledge when, if you look at the library, it is full of books, but indeed no wisdom has accumulated within? That is why only the Buddha points out the path to this wisdom. This wisdom is a light that illuminates the inside.

The Buddha has pointed out wisdom as a light. There are four lights in this world. The Buddha points out these four lights as: the light of the moon, the light of the sun, the light of fire, and the light of wisdom. Whichever of these lights there may be, the light that is superior to all of them is the light of wisdom—the radiance of wisdom. It is to develop this radiance of wisdom that, by reflecting and gradually through awareness of one's own activity, one develops understanding. As that understanding increases, mindfulness is developed. Next, concentration is developed. Next, its true nature (yathā-bhūta). "True nature," pious friends, refers to the impermanent nature of all these things. As one understands impermanence deeper and deeper, one sees that everything has an arising and a passing away. Between those two, there is something like a "persistence." Although we call it persistence, it is just a semblance of persistence. It is within that that we think so highly of "I" and "mine."

But when one realizes, "This is indeed the world; in this entire saṃsāra, what is actually taking place here is a kind of performance, or rather, something like an illusion," a disenchantment arises, recognizing, "There is nothing here to be taken seriously." It is through that disenchantment that one can one day be liberated from this saṃsāra. Generally, when people hear the words "disenchantment with saṃsāra," many pull a sour face. Nowadays, some very wealthy people, even when they go to a house of mourning, are often terrified. When they see it, they do not even like the word "death." That they will have to leave their wealth behind and depart one day is something most people dislike. But, pious friends, one day we will have to face this truth. Therefore, the Buddha states: do not wait until it is too late, but make an effort to become aware of this truth. Not making others aware. There is no liberation for oneself by making others aware. It is only by becoming aware oneself that one attains liberation.

That very awareness is called sampajāna—sampajañña. By reflecting in accordance with mindfulness, one understands: "This body grows, this body persists, this decays. These feelings arise—pleasant or painful feelings arise, persist, and pass away." Next, through these, one gains a deep, profound understanding. It is through that that one understands the three characteristics of impermanence (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and not-self (non-self / anattā), and attains the Paths and Fruits known as Stream-entry, Once-returning, Non-returning, and Arahantship. Understanding means the turning of that Wheel of Dhamma within one's own mind-stream (citta-santāna). Through the understanding of impermanence, the understanding of arising and passing away, when this is deeply understood, a genuine disenchantment regarding these things arises. What causes one to go on far in saṃsāra is craving (taṇhā). Gradually, the power of this craving (taṇhā) decreases. Next, through this disenchantment, one realizes, "There is nothing in any of this to be grasped. There is nothing to be taken as 'I' or 'mine'." It is at that very moment, at some point through insight knowledges (vipassanā-ñāṇa), that one gets the strength to attain that noble fruit of Stream-entry and be freed from the four woeful planes. Thereafter, by further turning that Wheel of Dhamma within one's mind-stream, through the realization of the Paths and Fruits of Once-returning, Non-returning, and Arahantship, one can free oneself from this entire mass of saṃsāric suffering—such as birth (jāti), decay and death (jarāmaraṇa), sickness, and death—and find solace in the supreme, great deathless Nibbāna.

Therefore, we must bring forth the path to this from that very running mind we spoke of earlier. Precisely by seeing the peril and the undesirable results of a running mind, we are able to bring forth some effort, some course of action, to halt this running mind. Perhaps the reason why Monk Bhāgineyya Saṅgharakkhita attained Stream-entry on that occasion was because he saw the perilous side. Understanding that "because my mind ran wild, I ended up in such a situation," he must have engaged in that activity with mindfulness, at least while the Buddha was preaching the Dhamma.

Therefore, you, pious congregation, should think about this occasion of listening to the Dhamma. Usually we say, "May we realize Nibbāna by the merit of listening to the Dhamma," and everyone says "Sādhu." It is far more valuable if we direct our minds to what we actually did during this listening to the Dhamma. Pious friends, through this listening to the Dhamma, we gained the strength to bring forth several valuable virtues within our mind-stream. Faith. Now, when everyone listens to the Dhamma of the Buddha, faith is present there. Next, due to that very faith, there is an application of energy. Dispelling sleepiness, with energy, keeping the mind awake, one engages in this listening to the Dhamma. Thereby, faith is developed. Next, energy is developed. Likewise, when listening awake and alert, from that comes mindfulness, attentiveness. The mind following along with this Dhamma—that is the development of mindfulness. Not unmindfulness, but mindfulness. Thus, having developed that mindfulness, some people, while listening to the sermon, feel a good concentration, a one-pointedness of mind, a deep calmness right on the seat they are sitting on. A concentration.

Next, through that concentration, while the Dhamma is being preached, even if it is a sermon heard a hundred times, a profound understanding arises. That is what is called wisdom. Indeed, "such is the nature of saṃsāra, the nature of my body, the nature of life—it is impermanent (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and not-self (non-self / anattā), isn't it? If so, there is nothing in this to be grasped. There is nothing here to generate craving (taṇhā) for"—when such a deep understanding arises within oneself, it is through that understanding that, even while the Buddha was preaching the Dhamma, people penetrated the Paths and Fruits such as Stream-entry. Therefore, one should understand that, as a benefit of this listening to the Dhamma, what we can experience at this very moment is faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom.

Among the requisites of enlightenment pointed out by the Buddha, these are shown as the spiritual faculties that assist in reaching Nibbāna. It is not through the external faculties of eyes, ears, nose, and so on that one sees Nibbāna. It is by generating and developing those qualities of faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom that one is able to realize Nibbāna. Therefore, you should bear in mind that today, on this valuable Poya day, you, pious congregation, have been able to develop those very benefits for yourselves through this listening to the Dhamma—namely, faith, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom. Developing them further, and as far as possible according to the time you get, by devoting some leisure or taking time off if possible to engage in meditation activities along this path of the four foundations of mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna), you should make the aspiration: "May this listening to the Dhamma, and the strength of determination accumulated through it, help us to escape from this extremely fearsome suffering of saṃsāra as quickly as possible and realize the supreme, great deathless Nibbāna!"

Furthermore, it is not only we who seek the realization of Nibbāna; every being in the heavenly worlds who has not yet seen Nibbāna, and every wise person in this entire universe, is looking to escape from this suffering of saṃsāra. Therefore, we do not merely reap the benefits of this listening to Dhamma for ourselves; there is also the custom of sharing the merit. Accordingly, you should reflect: "May whatever assembly of Sasana-protecting deities and Brahmas there be, as well as all the guardian deities and spirits presiding over this place—may all these deities, having rejoiced in this merit of our Dhamma preaching and Dhamma listening, realize the supreme, great deathless Nibbāna through their own aspired Bodhi!" Thus you should aspire. "May whatever relatives who have passed away in our name, and whoever from the Avīci hell up to the Akaniṭṭha Brahma world who desires merit and seeks Nibbāna—may every one of them, having rejoiced in this merit of listening to and preaching the Dhamma, find solace in the supreme, great deathless Nibbāna!" Aspiring in this manner, recite the stanzas and transfer the merit.

Dear Listeners,

Listening to the True Dhamma is pointed out in the teachings as something extremely rare. It is considered rare not only because the arising of a Buddha in the world who expounds the True Dhamma is rare, but also because those who have the capacity and the corresponding inclination to listen to the Dhamma with full attention are rare in this world. Various saṃsāric weaknesses obstruct the hearing of the Dhamma. When one is overcome by those weaknesses, even if the sound of a Dhamma sermon strikes the ear, that Dhamma does not enter the mind or the inner ear. Now, in the background story related to the verse chosen as today's theme, a relevant incident is mentioned.

One day, five lay devotees came to the Jetavana monastery to listen to the Dhamma. Having arrived, they paid homage to the Buddha and sat down to one side. The Buddha commenced the Dhamma sermon. While this Dhamma sermon was being delivered, one of these five fell into a deep sleep. The second sat scratching the ground with his finger. The third sat shaking a nearby tree. The fourth sat gazing at the sky instead of listening to the sermon. Only the fifth person listened to the Dhamma with keen attention. While this was going on, Ven. Ānanda, who was standing fanning the Buddha, observed this and asked: "Venerable Sir, when the Blessed One is preaching the Dhamma so wonderfully, what is the reason (for this behavior)?" When asked, the Buddha inquired: "Ānanda, do you know who these people are?" When Ven. Ānanda replied, "No, Venerable Sir," the Buddha then revealed their saṃsāric habits in this manner: “This person who has fallen asleep has been born five hundred times in the animal womb of serpents, as a cobra or a snake; he has taken birth (jāti) so for five hundred lifetimes. Due to that habit, he is now fallen asleep, as if coiled up with his head tucked in.” Ven. Ānanda asked: “Venerable Sir, when you say five hundred births (jāti), was it consecutively or intermittently?” Thereupon the Buddha declared: “Ānanda, the number of times they were born intermittently in the human world, deva world, animal world, etc., cannot be told even by a Buddha. What was declared here is that he was born consecutively without interruption for five hundred births (jāti). It is due to that saṃsāric habit that he has fallen asleep.” The Buddha declared the same regarding the others as well: “This person who keeps scratching the ground was born as an earthworm for five hundred births (jāti). This person who is engaged in shaking the tree was a monkey for five hundred births (jāti); he has repeatedly obtained monkey existences. The one who is gazing at the sky has taken birth (jāti) as an astrologer for five hundred lifetimes. The one who is listening to the Dhamma so well was born as a Brahmin versed in the Three Vedas for five hundred births (jāti). It is according to that habit that he listens so well.”

Then Ven. Ānanda asked again: “Venerable Sir, the Dhamma is being preached in such an extremely sweet manner. Despite this, why is it that these people do not listen to the Dhamma in this way?” Thereupon the Buddha declared: “Ānanda, do you think this Dhamma is sweet? That it is always a pleasant thing to everyone?” When Ven. Ānanda asked, “Why, is it not? Is it not pleasant?” the Blessed One replied: “Ānanda, for these saṃsāric beings, even the hearing of the three words ‘Buddha’, ‘Dhamma’, ‘Saṅgha’ is obtained only after millions of aeons (kalpas). For a longer time than that, they have spent their time engaging in various kinds of animal talk—that is, useless stories—and enjoying themselves in taverns and theaters. While those things are very pleasant to them, listening to this Dhamma is not a pleasant thing for many people.”

Next, he declared what the defilements are that dominate their minds for a long time. Pointing out the state of affairs in this saṃsāra—burning with the fire of lust (rāga) which surpasses all other fires in the world, suffering within the grip of hatred (dosa), entangled in the net of delusion (moha), and being swept away in the flowing river of craving (taṇhā)—the Buddha uttered the verse we cited as our theme:

Natthi rāgasamo aggi, natthi dosasamo gaho, natthi mohasamaṃ jālaṃ, natthi taṇhāsamo nadī.

There is no fire like lust (rāga). The Buddha points out the fire of lust (rāga) as a far more severe fire than other fires, arising from within and burning.

There is no grip like hatred (dosa). When pythons, crocodiles, demons, and monsters seize, they catch one at a time. But the grip of hatred (dosa) can seize even a vast number at once; they are caught by hatred (dosa).

There is no net like delusion (moha). Delusion (moha) is an amazingly entangled net from which it is impossible to escape.

There is no river like craving (taṇhā). While other rivers dry up from time to time, this river of craving (taṇhā) flows continuously and at all times.

The Buddha preached that verse to show that saṃsāra is indeed of such a nature.

Now, this story is a very short story, an incident. But let us see what can be drawn from this. Principally, we see the act of listening to the True Dhamma. The Buddha specifically showed here that beings incline towards various things according to the nature of their minds. The Buddha possessed a special power to declare such things. That is called the knowledge of inclinations and underlying tendencies (āsayānusaya-ñāṇa). The Buddha possessed six extraordinary knowledges not shared by other disciples. One of them is the knowledge of inclinations and underlying tendencies (āsayānusaya-ñāṇa). Through this, the past state regarding the temperaments of beings is well understood. Specifically, the things relevant to that knowledge of inclinations and underlying tendencies (āsayānusaya-ñāṇa) are shown as temperament (carita), inclination (adhimutti), and capability or incapability (bhavya-abhavya-tā). Temperament (carita) refers to the wholesome and unwholesome actions (kamma) performed by beings in saṃsāra. Inclination (adhimutti) refers to the saṃsāric bent of beings. Particularly, the degree to which the mind is directed towards the wholesome or unwholesome side in this life, the Buddha sees as their bent, their flexibility. That is what is meant by inclination (adhimutti). Next, capability or incapability (bhavya-abhavya-tā) means that whether one can attain a noble path and fruit (ariya-magga-phala) in this very life or not is also visible to the Buddha. Even today, when looking for qualifications for someone's job or position, it is often these very factors that are brought forward: how is the person's character and behavior? Next, their flexibility, bent, and inclination—towards which side? Next, capabilities. Capability or incapability (bhavya-abhavya-tā) refers to these capabilities. In this way, the complete file of a person is understood by the Buddha the moment he directs his mind to it. It is according to this that the Buddha understood the character traits of these five individuals.

Then someone might ask: "If so, why did the Buddha continue to preach without stopping, even while that group was behaving in that manner?" We have to think that if even one person would benefit, the Buddha preaches targeting that individual. Thus, in that manner, the fifth person listened to the Dhamma properly. Not only that, it is mentioned in that story that after the Buddha gave this analysis, having heard it, that person who had listened to the sermon well even attained the fruit of Stream-entry (sotāpatti-phala). Through that, through the analysis given by the Buddha, he must have understood the danger of saṃsāra. In any case, for the first four, their saṃsāric habits obstructed their hearing of the Dhamma. For the fifth person, who had been a Brahmin, that habit assisted him in listening to that Dhamma. Through that, he also attained Stream-entry. So, from this, one aspect we can understand is about that very listening to the Dhamma—in what manner listening to the Dhamma should be done. The Buddha himself on many occasions has pointed out four benefits of listening to the Dhamma. Almost everyone may have heard of these.

By hearing the Dhamma, it is said, assutaṃ suṇāti: "one hears what has not been heard before." One gets to hear something one has not heard previously. When listening well to the Dhamma, sometimes one gets to hear a point of Dhamma that one has never heard up to that time. Not only that, if one has heard it before, one gets an opportunity to hear it more clearly: sutaṃ pariyodapeti (purifying what has been heard). An opportunity is received to purify it. Likewise, one gets the opportunity to dispel one's doubts: kaṅkhaṃ vitarati, the opportunity to remove doubt is obtained. Next, diṭṭhiṃ ujuṃ karoti means that if there are shortcomings in one's right view, an opportunity is obtained to straighten them out. Therefore, reminding us of those four benefits of the Dhamma, the Buddha advises that one should listen to the Dhamma with wisdom and complete attention.

Likewise, on the flip side, he indicates what kind of attitude prevents a person from benefiting from a Dhamma sermon. Five factors are pointed out. The Buddha has declared that if someone, while listening to the Dhamma, disparages the Dhamma talk, insults it, blames it, or blames the Dhamma expounder, or blames themselves, or looks at their own shortcomings and regrets them, or listens to the Dhamma with a distracted, non-concentrated mind, or reflects on the heard Dhamma in an incorrect manner—then that person cannot derive any benefit or fruit from the Dhamma. Therefore, according to this, we must realize that indeed, listening to the Dhamma must be done with great respect for it. In short, respect for the Dhamma is something far greater in this Dispensation than respect for individuals. In the past, Buddhists paid homage even to books, to Dhamma books, based on that respect for the Dhamma. We say "we pay homage to the Dhamma preacher," but in reality, that preacher receives it through the Dhamma sermon, through that very act. That is why, no matter how many senior people are present, if even a young novice monk is preaching the Dhamma, he is given the high seat. From that, we see that the Buddha has given the primary place to respect for the Dhamma, even above respect for individuals. The Buddha himself declared this on one occasion from his own life.

In the fifth week after his Enlightenment, while residing at the foot of the Ajapāla banyan tree, the Buddha related that a thought, a reflection, arose in him: "He who lives without showing respect and deference to anyone lives in suffering (dukkha). To whom should I now live showing respect and deference?" Thus, the Buddha stated that he reflected upon himself. Looking thus, when reflecting on the entire world including devas and brahmās, he saw no one in the world superior to himself in virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). Then he thought:

“In that case, to whom shall I show respect and deference?” Next, he thought: “If there is a Dhamma that has been realized by me, I must dwell for the remainder of my time honoring and respecting that very Dhamma.” The Buddha made such a determination. Knowing that thought, Sahampati, the king of Brahmās, arrived there at that moment and, in approval of the Buddha’s thought, declared: “Whatever Blessed, Fully Enlightened Ones existed in the past, those Buddhas too followed this very custom; that is, they dwelt respecting and honoring the Dhamma. Future Buddhas too will likewise show respect to the Dhamma. May the Blessed One also dwell likewise respecting the Dhamma.” Thus, it is said that he approved that thought. This is the matter concerning respect for the Dhamma. Thus, it is extremely clear from the Buddha’s life itself. The Buddha himself has set the prime example regarding respect for the Dhamma.

Likewise, there are seventy-five training rules in the Vinaya Piṭaka, known as Sekhiya, in which both monks and novices must train themselves. Among those seventy-five training rules, sixteen are specifically about the preaching of the Dhamma. These also highlight this very aspect of respect for the Dhamma. If we consider them briefly, they mention those individuals to whom the Dhamma should not be preached. However, in almost all of them, a special concession is mentioned for a sick person. One can understand it in this way: It is said: “The Dhamma should not be preached to one who is not sick and is holding an umbrella in hand.” This Vinaya rule is laid down for the Sangha. When it is said “to one who is not sick and is holding an umbrella,” if there is sickness, there is an excuse. Otherwise, one must listen to the sermon after placing the umbrella aside. That is a custom that Buddhists have observed since ancient times. Next, it is also mentioned that the Dhamma should not be preached to one who is holding a staff in hand—something like a walking stick or a cane. If one is sick, there is allowance for it. Likewise, regarding a weapon (a weapon, a sword), the Dhamma is not preached to a person holding such a thing in hand. Next, it is similarly mentioned that if someone is wearing footwear—slippers, shoes, etc.—the Dhamma should not be preached to them either. It is because that custom is still followed that, leave alone other times, even when going to a sacred place, and especially during a Dhamma sermon, you, faithful devotees, remove your footwear. Likewise, it is mentioned regarding headwear: the Dhamma should not be preached to someone wearing a turban or a head covering. Through all of these, what is demonstrated is respect for the Dhamma. Next, it is said that the Dhamma should not be preached to someone who is lying down, unless they are sick.

Likewise, to one who is mounted on a vehicle, a person standing outside the vehicle should not preach the Dhamma. Next, there is a habit of some sitting on shop-fronts clasping both knees with both hands; there is a certain way of sitting when gossiping. That is not a decorous way of sitting. Sitting in that manner is called “binding with clasped hands.” The Dhamma should not be preached to one who is sitting in such an improper manner, clasping the knees with both hands or binding them with a cloth.

Next, it is specifically mentioned regarding sitting: if one is sitting on the ground, the Dhamma should not be preached to one seated on a seat, unless they are sick. Sitting on a low seat, one should not preach the Dhamma to one on a high seat. Likewise, suppose two people are walking along talking. If the one behind wants to say a point of Dhamma, they must come forward to the same level and speak. That is, there is a rule that while walking behind, one should not preach the Dhamma to one walking ahead. Similarly, let us suppose there are two roads—the main road on one side and a side path. It is also laid down that walking on a side path, one should not preach the Dhamma to one walking on the main road. When looking at these, it is amazing. To us, they seem like very trivial things. But through every single one of these, the Buddha highlighted that very respect for the Dhamma. The Dhamma should be preached to one who is prepared and ready to receive it with proper respect. Such is the matter.

But it becomes a question as to how far these matters regarding respect for the Dhamma are observed in this day and age. That is precisely why the discussion about directing full attention arises. Especially nowadays, there are loudspeakers and various other devices in the homes of faithful devotees, allowing them to listen to sermons whenever they wish. Likewise, because preaching sermons is now so common, this is an era where the value, excellence, and pricelessness of Dhamma preaching is being forgotten. Indeed, rather than listening to the Dhamma, now it is merely heard. Listening to the Dhamma is active; but now it has become something passive that is just heard. That is where it has gone. It is no longer something to be listened to attentively, but has turned into something heard automatically. Even at home, while songs, news, etc., are playing on devices, people engage in other chores. If, according to that habit, one goes on to do the same with listening to the Dhamma, sometimes a wrong, distorted understanding of the Dhamma can result. You, faithful devotees, may know in common parlance we say “songs and news are playing (going on).” In the same way, we say “the sermon is playing (going on).” So, that is the state to which home Dhamma preaching has arrived.

Indeed, although Dhamma sermons are abundant and the Dhamma is common, listening to the Dhamma is becoming rarer and rarer. That listening to the Dhamma is rare means that those who come forward to listen with full attention are fewer now, just as in the past. In the past, according to the story mentioned earlier, only one out of five listened to the Dhamma properly. Today as well, it could be the same, or perhaps even less than one percent. In that manner, there is a sign of decline. We must understand this. We cannot drag all those ancient lifestyles of the past back. But in everything, we must understand that there are two sides: benefits and drawbacks. We are compelled to use these loudspeakers and such things due to various reasons. But if respect for the Dhamma declines through that, we must be mindful of that too. At home, that can happen very often. Someone might ask: “Then, is it worse than not listening at all to listen to the Dhamma while doing some work?” The shortcoming in that is just this: sometimes, something not uttered by the Sangha is understood as having been said. Not only that, they go and tell others, “Look, such-and-such monk said this." What is the reason? It was not heard properly. They were doing some other work, or they were in a different line of thought. That is why this Dhamma is something extremely rare. The Buddha said that even the three words 'Buddha', 'Dhamma', 'Saṅgha' are heard by beings only after millions of aeons (kalpas). In the same way, the Dhamma, the preaching of the Dhamma, is extremely rare. Only as long as a Buddha's Dispensation exists will you, faithful devotees, get to hear the teachings that show the path to Nibbāna. Therefore, respect for the Dhamma must be cultivated within. These matters were indicated as Vinaya rules for the Sangha. To you, faithful devotees, these might sometimes seem like outdated things in this day and age. Someone might ask, "How can we observe these when we go to foreign countries?" But the Buddha highlighted these to protect the Dhamma, the True Dhamma. He himself remained respecting the Dhamma. He instructed his disciples to respect it in the same way. When saying "disciples," the fourfold assembly of monks, nuns, laymen, and laywomen is included. From that story, we see that through such behavior, one becomes unable to reap the fruits of that Dhamma. Many such instances are mentioned in the Dhamma.

Next, looking at the other side, the Buddha indicates the manner in which this Dhamma should be listened to. A certain valuable passage is mentioned regarding how the Dhamma should be listened to: aṭṭhikatvā, manasikatvā, sabbacetaso samannāharitvā ohitasoto dhammaṃ suṇāti. What this means is: "This Dhamma sermon is of benefit to me. This is useful for my life. This is helpful for my Nibbāna." Intending to benefit from it, one must listen. manasikatvā means reflecting word by word, listening to it by reflecting well on each and every point. samannāharitvā means gathering the entire mind, directing full attention to it. If, while working in the kitchen or doing other chores, one lets the sermon play in that manner, the sermon merely "plays on," but it does not come to oneself. It does not enter one's ear. Just as the Buddha declared, for four out of those five, it merely struck the ear, but did not enter the ear. That is exactly how it happens most of the time now. Dhamma sermons become abundant, but listening to the Dhamma becomes rarer and rarer. That is the reason. So, sabbacetaso samannāharitvā ohitasoto means listening to the sermon with ears inclined. In those days, the term "inclining the ears" was used with the meaning of full attention. Even today, "give ear" or "listen" is used. Why? It is said because the ears are given elsewhere. The words "give ear!" and "listen!" have to be specifically said because the ears are directed to other directions. In that manner, one must be ready to listen. It is when these factors are fulfilled and one listens to the sermon that one can derive results from this. Not only that, as mentioned earlier, if one insults the preacher or the Dhamma, one becomes unable to reap results from it.

The Buddha not only highlighted those matters. Next, in one place, he also mentioned three specific types of persons who listen to the Dhamma. Those three persons are introduced as follows: avakkujja-paññā, ucchanga-paññā, and puthu-paññā. Avakkujja-paññā means the person of upside-down wisdom. We will explain that later. Ucchanga-paññā means the person with lap-wisdom.

Puthu-paññā means the person of broad wisdom. The Buddha explains these three in this manner: “Suppose someone goes to a monastery and frequently listens to the Dhamma from the Sangha. And these monks preach this True Dhamma which is beautiful in the beginning, beautiful in the middle, and beautiful in the end. Beautiful in the beginning, middle, and end; whether viewed in terms of virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), or wisdom (paññā), it is beautiful. While such a Dhamma, beautiful in every sense at the beginning, middle, and end, is being preached, that person does not reflect on its beginning, middle, or end. While sitting there and even when rising and leaving, he does not reflect on the beginning, middle, or end. Such a person is compared to a pot placed upside down. No matter how much water is poured onto an upside-down pot, it does not retain any of it. It is just like that. That is why he is called avakkujja-paññā. He is the person of upside-down wisdom. Regarding the second, it is said: ‘Suppose someone comes in the same way and listens to the Dhamma. While sitting, he reflects well on the beginning, middle, and end. But after rising, he remembers nothing.’ The simile given for this by the Buddha: ‘Suppose someone is eating sweetmeats or fruits kept in his lap. All of a sudden, without mindfulness, he stands up quickly. The moment he stands up, all of those things are scattered. Just like that, while sitting he reflects well on the beginning, middle, and end. But after rising, that person remembers nothing.’ That is the second person. The third person is spoken of: ‘While sitting, that person reflects well on the beginning, middle, and end. After rising, he also remembers that Dhamma well. His reflection is clear; his attention is perfectly pure. He listened to the sermon well.’ That person is described as puthu-paññā (broad-wisdomed). Even though called ‘one of broad wisdom’, there too the Buddha employs the simile of the pot. If a pot is placed upright, then water remains in it; it does not flow out. That person is just like that.” Thus, the Buddha points out three distinct types of persons regarding the hearing of the Dhamma. This, then, is the exposition regarding human beings who can understand the Dhamma.

In addition, it is mentioned in our Dhamma literature how even animals—who cannot reap the flavor of the meaning of the Dhamma and can only benefit from the flavor of its sound—attained various results by listening to this Dhamma attentively. Most extraordinary stories are mentioned. One is the story of Maṇḍūka Devaputta (the frog-deity). On one occasion, the Buddha was residing on the banks of the Gaggarā lake, preaching the Dhamma to the citizens of Campā. At that moment, a frog that came out of the lake was listening to the voice of the Buddha. You, faithful devotees, may have heard that the Buddha’s voice is extremely special. It is referred to as the “brahmā-voice endowed with eight factors.” Just as with other attributes, this applies to the Buddha’s voice as well. That frog remained listening to that voice. Meanwhile, a cowherd who came there stuck his staff into the ground and, leaning on it, began to listen to the sermon. The staff went straight into the frog’s head. The frog died right there and was immediately born (jāti) in the Tāvatiṃsa heaven as a deity named Maṇḍūka (which means ‘frog’) in a golden mansion. It is mentioned in the Dhamma that he came to the Buddha at that very moment and revealed this news.

Thus, even that frog obtained the benefits of listening to the Dhamma. It was only the sound. Yet, the supremacy of the Dhamma is seen from this. Even nowadays, even if you, faithful devotees, do not know the Pali language, when a protection chant (paritta) is recited, a truly faithful person experiences an extraordinary fascination when the Karaṇīyametta Sutta, etc., are chanted, because the meaning and the tone of the Dhamma are so wonderfully blended.

Likewise, another story is mentioned, which was declared by the Buddha himself to Ven. Ānanda. On one occasion, while walking for alms, the Buddha saw a young sow. He asked Ven. Ānanda: "Ānanda, do you see this young sow?" He replied: "Yes, Venerable Sir." Then, the Buddha mentioned the past history, the past births (jāti), of that young sow. It is a story involving many births (jāti), a long story. But let us extract the part we need. The Buddha declared: "In the time of Kakusandha Buddha, this young sow was a young hen near an alms hall where the Sangha partook of meals. That young hen got to hear a meditating monk chanting a subject of insight meditation. While she sat listening to it, a hawk came, carried the young hen away, slit her neck, and ate her. But dying right there, the Buddha declared her next birth (jāti): she was born in a royal family as a princess named Ubbirī. But we can infer that, perhaps due to the benefit of listening to that subject of insight meditation even without understanding it, the following is mentioned regarding that princess: On one occasion, when that princess went to a toilet and saw maggots there, she brought to mind the perception of a worm-infested corpse (puḷuvaka-saññā)—meaning, meditating by reflecting on the impurity of a corpse infested with worms. This is a special subject of meditation, an insight meditation subject that can even yield Nibbāna. Directing her mind to that subject of meditation, it is mentioned that she attained even the first absorption (paṭhama-jhāna) right there in the toilet." It was shown how that very royal princess has now obtained the existence of this young sow. Not only that, in that story, after passing through numerous births (jāti), taking human and other existences, she came to Sri Lanka during the time of King Duṭugāmuṇu. Ultimately, at the time of her final extinguishment (*pariNibbāna as an Arahant nun, she declared her past history, as recorded in the books. So, the portion we require: see how even that young hen obtained some benefit by listening to the Dhamma, or rather, by listening to the insight meditation chanted by those meditating monks. Subsequently, she became strong enough to obtain a human existence. Through this, we must understand that we should develop respect for the Dhamma. Only then is the Dhamma properly understood.

Likewise, you, faithful devotees, may have often heard that when the occasions of realizing the paths and fruits are shown, it is mentioned there too that one can attain the realization of the paths and fruits on five occasions: while listening to the Dhamma, while preaching the Dhamma, while chanting a portion of the Dhamma, while reflecting on a portion of the Dhamma, and lastly, while cultivating a sign of concentration (samādhi-nimitta). That is: while listening, while preaching, while chanting the Dhamma, while reflecting on the Dhamma, and next, while cultivating some special sign of concentration—on all these five occasions, one can even attain the supramundane paths and fruits (lokuttara-magga-phala). Just because it is said so, we must not think that if one listens in a casual way, letting the sermon "play on," such a person can attain the paths and fruits.

The manner of listening that leads to the attainment of the paths and fruits is also mentioned right there in the Dhamma: "If someone listens to the Dhamma by directing complete attention in the manner described, at that moment he is atthappaṭisaṃvedī and dhammappaṭisaṃvedī—he experiences the meaning of the Dhamma, and he experiences the Dhamma itself." That person receives a great joy from both the meaning and the Dhamma. Even while listening to the Dhamma, he receives a state of composure and calmness from it. When thinking about its meaning, and when reflecting on that meaning, he receives calmness. In the end, that calmness and joy gradually lead directly to concentration (samādhi). Within that, it is shown in this way: "While listening to the sermon experiencing the flavor of the meaning and the flavor of the Dhamma, a great delight (pāmojja) arises in that person"—what is called joyful delight. A great happiness arises. Next, that delight turns into rapture (pīti). A great rapture arises in his mind. Next, when the mind is rapturous, the body becomes tranquil (passaddhi). The mind also becomes tranquil. Through that bodily tranquility, a unique kind of unworldly happiness (nirāmisa-sukha) is received by that person. From that happiness (sukha), concentration (samādhi) next arises; the mind becomes concentrated. He can even enter certain meditative absorptions (jhāna). With that concentrated mind, next, he contemplates the very Dhamma preached by the Buddha as insight meditation (vipassanā), by way of the three characteristics of impermanence (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and non-self (anattā). It is in that manner that the realization of the paths and fruits is obtained. It is not said here that the realization of the paths and fruits is attained by merely hearing the Dhamma. If one listens in the manner one ought to listen, by directing full attention as described, then if one's merits have matured, that person can even attain the realization of the paths and fruits. Such is the nature of listening to the Dhamma. Likewise, the Buddha has demonstrated to us on various occasions, also through those very Dhamma stories, in what manner the true result of a Dhamma sermon should be obtained. Therefore, if one listens to these casually, the Dhamma is also liable to be distorted.

In another place, the Buddha points out several factors that lead to the disappearance, the vanishing of the True Dhamma. There, it is specifically spoken regarding the monks. It says that if somehow the monks do not listen to the Dhamma properly, do not learn the Dhamma properly, do not bear the Dhamma properly, do not reflect on the Dhamma properly with wisdom—by way of radical attention (yoniso manasikāra)—and do not lead their lives in accordance with the Dhamma, then this True Dhamma will disappear. From this, we see that this Dhamma is not merely about listening at that moment and conceptualizing it in words, nor is it merely about memorizing it. It is by living within it that the True Dhamma is protected. This is a profound matter to be taken to heart.

In the Dhamma, the learned person (bahu-ssuta) is often mentioned. The learned person is someone of great value. Nowadays, there are various computers and similar devices where the Dhamma is stored. Because of their existence, some might think, “Why trouble ourselves to memorize? It is not necessary in this age. If there is a device, we can retrieve all this whenever we want.” Even if one gets other things from them, the Nibbāna that should be attained through them can never be harvested from a computer, no matter how advanced computers become. Therefore, if one expects Nibbāna, there is a series of terms mentioned regarding the learned person, just as was said in the past: sutā, dhatā, vacasā paricitā, manasānupakkhitā, diṭṭhiyā suppaṭividdhā. Bahu-ssuta means one who has heard much. Not only does he listen to the Dhamma, he also bears it (sutā, dhatā). He listens to the Dhamma and bears it. Having borne it, because there is a possibility of forgetting it, he practices it verbally (vacasā paricitā): he recites it constantly, chants it constantly.

In the past, the Sangha thus constantly held entire sections of the Dhamma in memory—sometimes so extremely long that it is even unimaginable—such as the entire Nikāya texts. Because they might forget, they chanted them again and again: vacasā paricitā. Next, not only that, but to make it useful, manasānupakkhitā means they examine it, reflecting on them constantly as to what their meaning is. It is at that point that it becomes something of one’s own—something that is not done by computers: contemplated with the mind (manasānupakkhitā). Next, by developing deep understandings of the Dhamma in that manner, diṭṭhiyā suppaṭividdhā: he penetrates it well with his right view. It was the Buddha who declared this. “This is the literal meaning of this; this is its deep meaning; this point was made by these words.” In that way, he has properly understood the Dhamma.

If the Dhamma is not understood in that way, it is merely a collection of words. That is what will happen in the future. This Tripiṭaka Dhamma will be preserved in words in that manner. It will be preserved even better than it was preserved in ancient times on ola-leaf manuscripts. But the flavor of their meaning, the fruit and benefit that should be derived through them, is liable to be lost to the future public, or rather, to the future generations. Because they will become enslaved to those aforementioned machines and shape their thinking accordingly. Therefore, we are compelled to remind you of these things at least occasionally. In all these modern things we have received, as you, faithful devotees, know, there are two sides: benefits and drawbacks. To many, it is understood only later. Sometimes, even those who manufactured the machines realize at some point, “Although we manufactured these on a large scale, they have such-and-such drawbacks.” Not only in destructive things, but even in the things we use daily, there is an aspect of drawbacks.

In short, you, faithful devotees, must realize that the most supreme knowledge among all mundane knowledges in this world is what is called the knowledge of drawbacks (ādīnava-ñāṇa). The moment when the side of drawbacks of everything—the wrong side, its shortcomings—becomes visible, that is the highest point of one’s mundane knowledge. Until then, only the side of benefits is visible.

Just like that, now in all these machinery and devices, there is both a side of benefits and a side of drawbacks. They arise in this civilization. But as wise individuals, we must understand that there is not only a side of benefits but also a side of drawbacks in this. While utilizing the benefits, we must protect ourselves from the drawbacks. Otherwise, we will be subjugated by those machines and eventually turn into mechanical human beings. That is indeed what is happening. A time is coming in the future when heartless humans will be born in the world. Such is the situation. Likewise, not only heartless, but brainless humans will also be born, because that too is now done by those iron brains. The next generation is liable to be born as those having such distorted physical and mental states. The reason for that is spending one's life in a servile and wretched manner, being subjugated by them without properly reflecting on both sides—the benefits and the drawbacks. Therefore, through this matter of respect for the Dhamma highlighted by the Buddha, we must take what should be taken, without thinking of them as outdated.

In accordance with the present era, various things might appear to you, faithful devotees, as benefits of the Dhamma: passing examinations, obtaining various degrees, and various other things. By learning this Dhamma, by learning it as a subject, one can derive these benefits—by-products. But if we consider the ultimate purpose of the Buddha, it is for none of those. A Buddha is born and preaches the True Dhamma in the world so that human beings—who have traversed this infinite time, who are subjugated by the stream of defilements in an extremely long and amazing way, who are subjugated by lust (rāga), hatred (dosa), delusion (moha), craving (taṇhā), etc., and are bent towards those lives—can emerge from them, shatter them and move forward, or enter the path to Nibbāna, cross over this becoming (bhava), and bring an end to saṃsāra. It is for this that the Dhamma has been preached.

Indeed, that craving (taṇhā) is compared to a river. But the Buddha has declared a going in the opposite direction. This Dhamma is against the current (paṭisotagāmī). This Dhamma is like going upstream. It is such an amazingly unique Dhamma. Now, the river of craving (taṇhā) flows simply downwards. Beings are caught in it and swept away. There is no end to this. But the Buddha points out the destruction of craving (taṇhā). The destruction of craving (taṇhā) is a name for Nibbāna itself. It is that path leading to Nibbāna that is shown through this Dhamma. That, indeed, is a journey to be traveled with effort, energy, and faith. What is required for that, first of all, is listening to the True Dhamma. Indeed, the Buddha also points out on one occasion a certain important thing that comes even prior to listening to the True Dhamma. Where is this hearing of the True Dhamma obtained from? We think that at some moment it is obtained from a machine. But the Buddha has pointed out that the real True Dhamma is heard from virtuous persons. It is through associating with virtuous persons that the True Dhamma is heard. Accordingly, on one occasion, the Buddha declared a discourse (sutta) thus: "When association with virtuous persons is fulfilled, one gets to hear the True Dhamma.

When there is listening to the True Dhamma, through that, radical attention (yoniso manasikāra) (grows).”

Prior to that, let us remind ourselves of this matter: Now, the Buddha points out four factors necessary for Stream-entry, known as the factors of Stream-entry (sotāpattiyanga): sappurisasaṃseva, saddhammasavana, yoniso manasikāra, dhammānudhammappaṭipatti—these four factors are pointed out as assisting one in attaining Stream-entry. Sappurisasaṃseva means association with virtuous persons. Next, saddhammasavana: the Dhamma heard next from virtuous persons, the opportunity to hear the True Dhamma. Next, yoniso manasikāra means reflecting with wisdom. Not in an unwise or wrong way, but reflecting in the correct manner is radical attention (yoniso manasikāra). Next is dhammānudhammappaṭipatti: living in accordance with the Dhamma. These four factors are necessary to realize the paths and fruits, to attain Nibbāna.

Next, that matter is mentioned in more detail in the discourse (sutta) we are prepared to present now: “When the factor of association with virtuous persons (sappurisasaṃseva) is fulfilled, when it is filled up, it flows over and, through that, listening to the True Dhamma is next obtained by that person. When listening to the True Dhamma is fulfilled, that very reflecting with wisdom called radical attention (yoniso manasikāra) emerges through it. When reflecting with wisdom called radical attention (yoniso manasikāra) emerges, mindfulness and clear comprehension (sati-sampajañña)—meaning mindfulness and great wisdom—grow in that person. When mindfulness and clear comprehension (sati-sampajañña) grow, that person’s restraint develops—the restraint of the senses (indriya-saṃvara). That person’s good conduct of body, speech, and mind—the threefold good conduct—grows. When that threefold good conduct grows, the four establishments of mindfulness (cattāro satipaṭṭhānā) grow within that person. As the four establishments of mindfulness are being fulfilled, the seven factors of enlightenment (satta bojjhaṅgā)—namely, mindfulness (sati), investigation of states (dhamma-vicaya), energy (viriya), rapture (pīti), tranquility (passaddhi), concentration (samādhi), and equanimity (upekkhā)—grow in this person. After those factors of enlightenment have grown, the Noble Eightfold Path is fulfilled, and one can attain true knowledge and liberation (vijjā-vimutti)—such as insight knowledges, paths, and fruits. In that manner, matching Dhamma factors one to another like the links of a chain, the Buddha preaches in that discourse (sutta) how the journey starting from the association with virtuous persons goes ultimately to Nibbāna, along with a simile for it.”

The Buddha always employs a simile to instill a Dhamma point deeper into the mind, to engrave it more firmly in the heart. The simile given on this occasion: “Just as when it rains heavily—when there are heavy rains on a mountain with drizzling and heavy downpours—they flow down the mountain slopes, fall into clefts and gullies, and flowing through them, fill up the small rivers. The small rivers flow and fill up the large rivers. The large rivers flow and next fill up the great ocean. Just in that way, when association with virtuous persons is fulfilled, listening to the True Dhamma is fulfilled. When that is fulfilled, reflecting with wisdom called radical attention (yoniso manasikāra) is fulfilled. When that is fulfilled, mindfulness and clear comprehension (sati-sampajañña), mindful wisdom, is fulfilled. From that, restraint of the senses; from that, next, good conduct of body, speech, and mind; as that develops, the four establishments of mindfulness; as that develops, the seven factors of enlightenment; as that develops, in the end, leading up to Nibbāna, the paths and fruits of Nibbāna are also obtained. In that manner, the Buddha declares in that discourse (sutta)."

In all of this, we must reflect: why is it said that this True Dhamma indeed comes from a virtuous person? Who is that virtuous person? We might sometimes think that what is called a virtuous person is something that comes from these devices. But in the truest manner, the True Dhamma—the True Dhamma that helps one go towards direct realization—is received only through a virtuous person. The term "virtuous person" (sappurisa) is used in the Dispensation specifically for those who have attained noble states, or rather, who have well engaged in that aforementioned practice in accordance with the Dhamma (dhammānudhamma-paṭipada) by way of the penetration of the paths and fruits, and have seen the Dhamma through themselves. He is the real virtuous person. The True Dhamma received from that very virtuous person is what genuinely helps towards Nibbāna. Therefore, we must understand that this listening to the True Dhamma is an extremely valuable thing. The True Dhamma is an extremely valuable thing. If we are to protect it, we should not protect it in that manner through external machines and devices. Not by writing in books or writing on palm leaves and burying them under the earth. One must deposit it in the depths of one's own heart, bring it up constantly, and reflect on it with wisdom in the manner described as radical attention (yoniso manasikāra), etc. Experiencing the flavor of its meaning and the flavor of the Dhamma, and concentrating the mind through that, one must then develop insight meditation (vipassanā) on impermanence (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and non-self (anattā), and properly understand the meaning of this Dhamma.

This Dhamma preached by the Buddha is an amazingly profound Dhamma. This cannot be understood by becoming enslaved to words alone. It is when one lives in accordance with it that the Dhamma becomes meaningful. You, faithful devotees, can read the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta in a matter of minutes. But the establishment of mindfulness is not fulfilled through that, if one does not engage in it. Likewise, this Dhamma preached by the Buddha indeed becomes meaningful only to the one who engages in it practically. For one who does not, just as it is said, gopo gāvova gaṇayaṃ paresaṃ: a cowherd counts the cows of others, but does not receive the five products of the cow himself. Thus, if one is to obtain those five products of the cow, one must engage in that Dhamma. Otherwise, it is merely looking after the cows. In that manner, by merely memorizing the Dhamma like parrots or by merely recording them on devices, neither this True Dhamma nor the Dispensation is protected. One must listen to that Dhamma properly and, according to it, apply reflection in that manner and make it directly realized to oneself. It is in that manner that the True Dhamma is protected. So, that is the respect for the Dhamma that the Buddha highlights.

Indeed, the specialty of the True Dhamma preached by the Buddha is revealing the causal relationship called dependent arising (paṭiccasamuppāda), which is an extraordinarily profound Dhamma not found in any other religion. Speaking of that Dhamma, the Buddha says on one occasion: “Whether Tathāgatas arise or do not arise, whether Tathāgatas appear or do not appear, this Dhamma-nature, this truth, always exists in the world.” What Tathāgatas do is make it directly realized and understood within themselves, and demonstrate it to the world by way of preaching. Therefore, we must reflect that what is embedded in this True Dhamma is this eternal Dhamma-nature.

That is precisely why these Buddhas did not pay respect and deference to other external ascetics and brahmins. In this way, there is no ascetic, brahmin, or brahmā in this entire world-system who can be compared to the Buddha. Yet, the Buddha, as well as all Buddhas, respected that very True Dhamma. That is to say, it is that profound Dhamma-nature regarding this world that is present in this True Dhamma. That Dhamma-nature cannot be obtained by merely memorizing a word. Sometimes, it cannot be obtained by merely passing examinations either. Having properly understood that Dhamma, experiencing the flavor of the Dhamma and the flavor of its meaning as described, and next, shaping one’s life in accordance with it, one must directly realize that Dhamma for oneself. That is why we constantly remind ourselves of the six qualities of the Dhamma: svākkhāto bhagavatā dhammo, sandiṭṭhiko, akāliko, ehipassiko, opanayiko, paccattaṃ veditabbo viññūhi. That this Dhamma is well-expounded (svākkhāta) is said not merely because it was spoken in beautiful words, but because of the ultimate purpose promised by it. It is well-expounded because it has the power to yield Nibbāna. Likewise, that it is directly visible (sandiṭṭhika) is said because these ultimate purposes can be obtained right before one’s eyes in this very world, in this very life. It is likewise immediate (akālika). Simultaneously with fulfilling the necessary practice for this, the result is right there. That is immediate (akālika). Likewise, inviting one to come and see (ehipassika) means that this Dhamma has a power that leads one step by step. As we are mentioning now, if someone draws close to the association with virtuous persons, through that they are automatically directed towards listening to the True Dhamma. Through that, automatically to those other aforementioned factors like radical attention (yoniso manasikāra). In that manner, there is a nature of pulling one factor after another, a nature of interconnectedness, a causal relationship in this Dhamma. That is precisely why it is ehipassiko—it comes and takes one along, saying, “Come and see this Dhamma.” Where does it take one? Not to some external place. It takes one right inside, into one’s own heart—that is why it is called ehipassiko. Next, opanayiko (leading onwards) means, just as it is said “to lead towards,” it brings it in. That is what is meant by bringing the Dhamma into oneself.

That is, the nature of the Dhamma is such that when one factor is fulfilled, the next grows through it.

You, faithful devotees, may have often heard as a well-known matter regarding the Noble Eightfold Path: when right view (sammā-diṭṭhi) grows, right intention (sammā-saṅkappa) grows. Right intention (sammā-saṅkappa) means that when good thoughts grow, good words emerge through them. When good words grow, when one keeps practicing good words, one is automatically inclined to perform good actions. When performing good actions, it becomes the cause for establishing right livelihood (sammā-ājīva)—meaning a good way of living. When a good way of living is established, next, through that, right effort (sammā-vāyāma)—meaning the energy that brings wholesome states close and removes unwholesome states—emerges well. Through that, right mindfulness (sammā-sati), clear awareness, emerges. Next, through that is right concentration (sammā-samādhi). Thus, from whichever side one takes it, whichever section of the Dhamma one takes, the most unique characteristic you, faithful devotees, can see through these teachings leading towards Nibbāna is the causal relationship. That is precisely why it is ehipassiko. It has a nature of calling one towards it. Then, this goes and demonstrates to oneself alone. That is what is said at the end as paccattaṃ veditabbo. This is not something that goes and demonstrates to someone else. The Buddha himself says: “Not even I can do it. I am only a teacher. You themselves must travel on this path: paṭipannā pramokkhanti jhāyino mārabandhanā (those who have entered the path, meditators, will be released from the bond of Māra).” That is, the Tathāgatas are merely those who point out the way. If one is to be freed from this bond of Māra, one must walk on the practice of this very path. If one is to walk on the practice, what helps is that very causal relationship mentioned earlier. It is not that someone else sits and pushes you. There is an amazing kind of push within this Dhamma itself. That is what is meant by opanayiko. It leads from one to another. We must benefit from that. When the utilization of it is fulfilled, then indeed paccattaṃ veditabbo viññūhīti (to be personally realized by the wise). The wise person can make this Dhamma directly realized to themselves and see it through themselves. That state is called dhammabhūta (become the Dhamma). That person has become a treasure-house of the Dhamma, or rather, has become the Dhamma itself. It is mentioned regarding the Buddha: although we consider the Buddha as a person, in reality, he became the embodiment of the Dhamma. In that manner, the respective Arahants also become embodiments of the Dhamma to their respective extents.

Next, simultaneously, we must reflect that it is to conquer those saṃsāric weaknesses shown here that the Buddha has pointed out three trainings: virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). In every single person—not only in those four mentioned earlier, but in everyone—there are saṃsāric weaknesses due to lust (rāga), hatred (dosa), delusion (moha), craving (taṇhā), etc., which obstruct the hearing of the Dhamma. To conquer them, at this moment when our understanding has come, we must conquer those old saṃsāric habits by applying virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), wisdom (paññā), etc. Virtue (sīla) means taming, by directing oneself to something. If we thus direct ourselves to good things, a good virtue (sīla), a state of being virtuous, is established. Otherwise, that wildness arises. Comparing the mind from the wild state of an animal to the virtuous, or rather, disciplined state, we see that the Buddha first showed how to conquer saṃsāric weaknesses through virtue (sīla). Next, to develop it further, the mind is composed through what is called concentration (samādhi), by removing the distracted state. With that composed mind, ultimately, wisdom (paññā). It is through the power of understanding that, in the end, having conquered those saṃsāric weaknesses, and by penetrating the paths and fruits of Stream-entry (sotāpatti), Once-returning (sakadāgāmi), Non-returning (anāgāmi), and Arahantship, one can cross over this ocean of saṃsāra—which has been filled with saṃsāric suffering (dukkha) like birth (jāti), decay (jarā), sickness, and death (maraṇa) for an infinite time—be freed from the bond of saṃsāra, and attain that liberation of nibbāna.

You, faithful devotees, must reflect with wisdom: on a Poya day like today, having undertaken a certain virtue (sīla) at your own level, you listened to the Dhamma at this moment, meditating on a subject of meditation (kammaṭṭhāna). Today, this Dhamma sermon is indeed a Dhamma sermon about listening to the Dhamma. As we say on other days, the benefits of listening to the Dhamma are indeed to be reflected upon in the manner described as faith (saddhā), energy (viriya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). If one listened to the Dhamma properly, faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom grow within that person. It is according to the level of that growth that, as mentioned in the Dhamma, some individuals attained the penetration of the paths and fruits at the very moment of listening to the Dhamma.

Reflecting in that manner, through this store of wholesome merit accumulated up to now, through the association with noble friends (kalyāṇa-mitta), meditating, may these benefits of listening to the Dhamma definitely be a supportive cause for crossing over all saṃsāric suffering as quickly as possible and attaining this noble, great, deathless Nibbāna which is the supreme goal expected by each of you! Likewise, may all beings, including the assembly of deities and brahmās protecting the Dispensation, and our saṃsāric relatives from Avīci up to Akaniṭṭha, rejoice in this store of wholesome merit accumulated by us through preaching and listening to the Dhamma. Through that power, may they at some point be freed from unhappy states, reach happy states, develop meditation through association with noble friends (kalyāṇa-mitta), and as quickly as possible, realize the great, deathless Nibbāna through their aspired state of enlightenment (bodhi). Aspiring thus, recite this verse:

“Ettāvatā ca amhehi.....”

Dear Listeners,

Just like a florist who enters a flower garden and walks about gathering beautiful flowers, a human being who is infatuated with the treasures of the fivefold sensual pleasures is lost in a world of flowers. That person has no correct understanding of the reality of life, or the Anicca (Impermanent) nature of life. Suddenly, Death (Māra) comes and drags him away, shattering the sweet dreams of that person who had fallen into the sleep of negligence.

Now, this verse we have taken as our theme was preached by the Buddha on an occasion when a group of people, who had fallen into the sleep of negligence while dreaming sweet dreams of victory, were swept away by a great flood and fell into the jaws of death.

King Pasenadi of Kosala once thought that if he could establish a blood relationship with the Buddha, the Saṅgha would come to the palace more often for alms. To make himself more trusted by the Saṅgha, he devised a plan to marry a princess of the Sakyan clan. Thinking thus, he sent a message to the Sakyan kings asking them to send a princess. So, those Sakyan princes gathered in their assembly hall and discussed: “Now, this king is not of equal clan to us; how can we give him a Sakyan daughter? If we do not give her, since this king is powerful, he might think to destroy us.” While discussing this problem, Mahānāma the Sakyan came forward and said, “I have a daughter named Vāsabhakhattiyā, born from the womb of a maidservant. Let us give her and save ourselves."

So, the Sakyan kings sent a message saying they were ready to give a daughter of a son of the Buddha's uncle. King Kosala, very pleased, sent a delegation to bring her. However, King Kosala also had a suspicion. He told his men, "These people called Sakyans are very crafty; they might even give a slave's daughter. Therefore, tell them to send a daughter who dines from the same dish as her father." When this condition was mentioned, Mahānāma the Sakyan used a trick: he adorned Vāsabhakhattiyā beautifully, showed a demonstration of her eating together with him, and handed her over to the royal emissaries. Thus, having taken her back, King Kosala made her the chief queen, putting her at the head of the five hundred women of the harem, and consecrated her.

In the course of time, a son was born, and this son was named Viḍūḍabha. With the aim of becoming even more trusted by the Buddha, King Kosala appointed Prince Viḍūḍabha as the commander-in-chief in his childhood. In fact, nominally, he was designated as commander-in-chief from his early childhood. Also, when this prince was seven years old, he asked his mother, "Other princes of my age receive gifts and presents from their mother's side. Why is it not so for me? Doesn't mother have relatives—parents and others?" Then she deceived him, saying, "They live very far away; that is why they do not send anything."

Next, when Prince Viḍūḍabha turned sixteen, he asked for permission, saying, "I would like very much to see my mother's relatives; please give me permission to go." She tried to prevent him, saying there was no use going there, but failed. Having no alternative, she allowed him. A message was also sent to the Sakyans: "Prince Viḍūḍabha is coming." So, this was a problem for the Sakyan princes as well. Gathering again in the assembly hall, they thought: "Now when Prince Viḍūḍabha comes, if we are to perform the custom of salutation, the younger princes will have to bow to Prince Viḍūḍabha." To prevent this, they used a trick: they sent all those who were younger than Prince Viḍūḍabha to the countryside, as if sending them on some business. When Prince Viḍūḍabha arrived with his retinue, the elders introduced the relatives to him, saying, "This is your uncle, this is so-and-so." Prince Viḍūḍabha bowed to all of them, but when he looked around next, there was no one bowing to him. He asked, "Why is there no one to bow to me?" They told another lie there: "We have sent the younger princes to the countryside on an urgent matter." So, after showing great hospitality and honor to them, they sent Prince Viḍūḍabha and his retinue back.

After they departed, a certain slave woman, while washing the wooden bench where Prince Viḍūḍabha had sat with milk-water, muttered and cursed: "This is the bench where the son of the slave-woman Vāsabhakhattiyā sat. What a nuisance!" While she was washing it with milk-water, an incident occurred. One of Viḍūḍabha's soldiers, having forgotten his weapon, came back to fetch it and heard her cursing Prince Viḍūḍabha. When he investigated and inquired into this, he found out through gossip that Vāsabhakhattiyā was indeed the daughter of a slave woman. That soldier went and told the rest of the army. It became a huge uproar among the army: “This Vāsabhakhattiyā is a slave's daughter!” and the story spread. Hearing this, Prince Viḍūḍabha developed intense hatred and malice, forming a firm determination and grudge: “Very well! This lot washed the bench where I sat with milk-water. On the day I become king, I will cut their throats and wash this bench with their blood!”

Having harbored this, after the group returned, the members of this soldier group revealed this secret to King Kosala. King Kosala became extremely angry, thinking, “They have given me a slave's daughter!” and conceived intense rage against the Sakyans. Right then, he stopped all the hospitality and special privileges previously given to Queen Vāsabhakhattiyā and Prince Viḍūḍabha, and began treating them in the manner of slaves. He completely suspended the hospitality and benefits given to them up to that point.

A few days later, when the Buddha visited the palace, King Kosala complained, “Blessed One, your relatives have given me a slave's daughter…” Then the Buddha stated, “That is a very unjust thing the Sakyans have done. To say the least, they should have given someone of their own clan. Even so, Great King, I tell you this: Vāsabhakhattiyā, when looked at from the father's side, is after all the daughter of a king, and she has also been consecrated as the queen of a king. Similarly, Viḍūḍabha too, from the father's side, is a royal prince.” Next, he said, “The mother's clan is secondary; the father's clan alone is sufficient.” To support this, he cited a Jātaka story—we do not intend to relate that Jātaka story at this moment. Recounting the Kaṭṭhahāri Jātaka, where in the past a similar event occurred where a child was born due to a connection between a wood-gathering woman and a king, yet eventually received the kingship, the Buddha consoled the King. Consoling his mind with that, King Kosala restored Vāsabhakhattiyā to her former status and Prince Viḍūḍabha to his previous position. But Viḍūḍabha's hatred did not cease.

We are telling this long story in brief. At a certain point, King Kosala was over eighty years old, quite aged. Because King Kosala was extremely faithful, when the Buddha was staying in a village near the Sakyan country, he went to see the Buddha, handed his royal insignia to his commander-in-chief named Dīghakārāyana, and went alone to see the Buddha, entering his chamber. Meanwhile, the commander-in-chief Dīghakārāyana took those royal insignia, went with the army, and made Prince Viḍūḍabha the king. He did so to settle an old grudge. On a previous occasion, King Kosala had put the commander-in-chief named Bandhula to death. This Dīghakārāyana was a nephew of that commander-in-chief Bandhula. Because he harbored that anger, he took the royal insignia and installed Prince Viḍūḍabha on the throne. Meanwhile, when King Pasenadi of Kosala came outside and looked, there was only a horse and a certain maidservant near that horse. After hearing this story, King Kosala, extremely angry and with the intention of seizing back the kingdom from Viḍūḍabha, went to Rājagaha seeking the help of his nephew, King Ajātasattu, riding that horse, with only that woman as his follower. On that occasion, as he could not reach there before the city gates were closed, King Kosala ended up passing away helplessly during the night in an open hall.

The story of King Kosala ends there. Now, Viḍūḍabha was indeed the king. A few days after becoming king, he remembered the hatred he had harbored in the past. Thinking, “Now is the time for revenge,” he set out with a large army, determined to destroy the entire Sakyan clan. On the morning of that day, when the Buddha surveyed the world with the Attainment of Great Compassion, he saw the impending mass slaughter of his relatives. Seeing this destruction, and with the intention of preventing it, the Buddha traveled through the air. On the border of the Sakyans, in the portion belonging to the Sakyans, there was a tree that did not have much shade. He had gone for alms, partaken of his midday meal, and then departed. He traveled through the air in the afternoon. Thus going, the Buddha sat under that tree which had little shade. Beyond that, within Viḍūḍabha’s territory, there was a large banyan tree with plenty of shade. Now when Viḍūḍabha arrived with his army, he saw the Buddha, paid homage, and asked, “Blessed One, the banyan tree on my side of the border has good shade, why are you sitting like this in this hot sun?” Then the Buddha replied, “The shade of relatives is indeed cool.” From this, Viḍūḍabha understood that the Buddha had traveled this far for the protection of his relatives. Thinking so, he returned with his army. In the same way, for a second time, Viḍūḍabha’s mind urged him: “I must take revenge somehow.” So, when he went the second time, the Buddha was there. He came a third time as well. Even when he came the third time, the Buddha was there.

Thus, having gone three times, on the day he set out with his army for the fourth time, the Buddha investigated the past kamma (action/deed) of the Sakyans. This kamma of the Sakyans had now reached a point where it could not be prevented. What had these Sakyan princes done in the past? Collectively, through a certain conspiracy, they had put poison in a river. Perhaps with the intention of destroying the people of a kingdom downriver, they had committed the evil kamma of putting poison in a river, and that was now manifesting in an unpreventable manner. For this reason, the Buddha did not travel there on that day. So, Viḍūḍabha went with a huge army, and it is said that they did not even fight a proper battle with the Sakyans. They surrendered completely, as it were. Prince Viḍūḍabha commanded his men to kill everyone who said “I am a Sakyan,” but to spare the life of Mahānāma the Sakyan (who was his mother's father) and the retinue with him. According to that command, almost the entire Sakyan clan, including infants at the breast, were massacred, and Viḍūḍabha had that wooden bench washed with their blood.

Having finished all that, while this army was returning, it became night by the time they reached the river called Aciravatī. So, the army camped there. Although that river Aciravatī was a large river, during the dry season it was completely a bed of sand; it dried up entirely. Due to such a situation, some of that group prepared to sleep on the riverbank, and some on the sandy bed in the middle of the river. After they lay down to sleep, some insects—let us say a type of small creatures like winged termites—emerged from the ground. Among those on the sandy bed in the middle of the river, there were some who had not committed the evil kamma, and among those on the bank, there were those who had committed the evil kamma. Those who had not committed the evil kamma, sleeping in the middle of the river, were troubled by the insects. Therefore, they got up and came to the bank to sleep, saying, “Because of these creatures, we cannot sleep here.” Likewise, those on the bank who had committed the evil kamma were troubled when the insects emerged, so they went to the middle of the river and slept on the sandy bed—those who had done wrong. Look how kamma operates! Meanwhile, suddenly, as if a thick, dark cloud gathered—perhaps at the upper reaches of the river—a massive rain fell unexpectedly, and a flash flood rushed down, sweeping away the entire army and drowning them in the sea. Thus, just as they had destroyed the Sakyan clan, Viḍūḍabha and his entire host met their destruction in the very same way.

After this event, a discussion arose among the general public: “Alas! This Sakyan clan, the Buddha's own relatives, were needlessly and blamelessly destroyed in this way by Viḍūḍabha, weren't they?” When the monks mentioned this talk to the Buddha, the Buddha stated, “No, monks, although the Sakyans did not commit such wrongs in this life, in the past they committed that unwholesome deed of putting poison in the river. It is because that could not be prevented that it happened in this way.”

Next, on another day in the Dhamma assembly, the monks gathered and were talking about Viḍūḍabha: “Having committed such a great sin, he did not even get the chance to return and rule as king; they were swept away by the river water.” It was on that occasion that the Buddha uttered the verse we presented at the beginning. Now, let us look at the meaning and the exposition of that verse.

> “Pupphāni heva pacinantaṃ, byāsattamanasaṃ naraṃ, > Suttaṃ gāmaṃ mahogho va, maccu ādāya gacchati.”

The meaning is: “Just as a great flood sweeps away a sleeping village, so Death comes and carries off the human being who gathers only flowers, who is infatuated with flowers, and whose mind is attached to gathering flowers.” Thus, although it is a four-line verse, the more we analyze it, the deeper the meaning we can extract. In all of this, there is a profound meaning within this verse that goes far beyond the mere historical event. Indeed, the Buddha did not merely utter this verse; he must have preached a major sermon related to it. It is recorded that upon hearing it, people even attained the Fruits of the Path.

If we reflect on this story, we can see how much disaster can occur due to clan conceit (pride of birth). Because of the clan conceit of those Sakyans, they employed such tricks. When those crafty tricks were exposed, Viḍūḍabha conceived intense hatred. It was like King Kosala also developing hatred and aversion. Even more so, Viḍūḍabha harbored a grudge over the insult done to him, and even though the Buddha tried three times, he could not prevent it. So strong was the thought of hatred and revenge that Viḍūḍabha came for the fourth time and, as they say, seemed to have fulfilled his heart's desire—the thing he hoped for. But just as the Buddha said, in the end, having fulfilled it, he did not get the chance to rule as king; he met his death.

However, from this we can realize how much heartbreak and destruction occur due to clan conceit. On the other hand, that aversion, the thought of revenge, is such a massive crime. Viḍūḍabha intended to destroy the entire Sakyan clan, including young infants at the breast. And it is mentioned that he did so to a great extent. There are various historical records regarding this. Some say that certain groups escaped. At any rate, that thought of revenge became the root of an astonishingly massive destruction. Furthermore, even though the Buddha saw the destruction coming to his Sakyan clan, and though there were so many who had gone forth into homelessness from the Sakyan clan, without even a trace of agitation in them, he peacefully tried to save that Sakyan clan using his own Buddha-power. But when it was impossible, he left it to kamma itself. This cycle of kamma is something that even Buddhas and Arahants cannot prevent. Allowing it to take its course, the Buddha accepted the truth. So, that too is an example for us. To protect his clan, the Buddha employed a peaceful and very subtle method to indicate that he had come to save his relatives. Apart from that, he did not make any great appeal to Viḍūḍabha. So, at any rate, that is how it was.

Next, there are many things we can draw from this. Now, although this Viḍūḍabha, intoxicated by royal power and wealth, and by the pride of possessions and all that, acted high and mighty, thinking “I can do all of this,” in the end, he had to experience the results of his kamma (actions) in this very life (diṭṭhadhammavedanīya). Next, we can understand why the Buddha declared that the domain of kamma is unthinkable (acinteyya). Kamma operated in such an astonishing manner. See how those small insects emerged from the earth, as if to give results to those who had done wrong, and to save those who had not done wrong. Meritorious friends, even today you can recall such events. In various severe disasters—not only floods but also tsunamis (sea-water flooding) and other destructive events—how certain individuals escaped in miraculous ways. When looking at it from a worldly perspective, when we hear how even some who had led good lives somehow ended up there, we are amazed. Since we are not Buddhas, we cannot say definitively, but we can understand through the Dhamma what lies underneath. Some people have the idea that there is no influence of kamma beneath such collective destructions, and that these are things that happen automatically by nature. But leave aside other things, even these four elements—paṭhavī, āpo, tejo, vāyo—the four elements in our body, as doctors well know, undergo disturbances of wind, bile, and phlegm. These disturbances mostly occur within the underlying forces of kamma. It is the same with the disturbances of the four external elements. At certain times, amazing forces of kamma connect with them too, because the attraction of kamma is that powerful. That is indeed the fearsome nature of this saṃsāra, which is shown as “owners of their kamma,” “heirs to their kamma,” and so forth. Similarly, there is “the order of kamma” (kamma-niyāmatā); there are incomprehensible, amazing karmic energies. One is drawn to them. Even the four great elements assist them at times. The Buddha has illustrated the karmic results that affect beings in this saṃsāra with the simile of “a tangled ball of string.” When we think about kamma, we can understand that idea. For instance, because of you meritorious friends, even if one person does a small offering, others share that merit by saying “Sādhu! Sādhu!!” and rejoicing in it. That is regarding merit. Many do not know that one can also participate in demerit (sin). You meritorious friends get to know through various media channels that a certain enemy of yours has died, or let us say, an enemy army has been killed. This is a common thing during times of war. When it is announced that such a number of enemy soldiers have died in this war, how many people rejoice over it, jump with joy, and even light firecrackers in the end? But even if one rejoices in that manner, what is done by it? Behold, one participates in the unwholesome deed. One must guard against that. There is no need to explain to you meritorious friends about sharing/rejoicing in merit. If, when someone does a good thing, one can share that merit by saying “Sādhu! Sādhu!!”, then demerit can also be shared in the same way. It must have been such a sharing that the Sakyans did. Putting poison in a river is something even one person can do. But a large group conspired, gathered collectively, and put that poison in the river.

Such things happen even today. Even according to ordinary law, if a group gathers, the responsibility or the guilt is shared by the entire group. Even more than the legal aspect, there is a cosmic law in the world; that is what is called “the order of kamma” (kamma-niyāmatā). According to that, everything is contained within the Buddha's word: “Cetanāhaṃ bhikkhave kammaṃ vadāmi” (“Monks, intention is what I call kamma”). If one shows solidarity or rejoices in it through intention, then indeed, one is caught. So from this, we have to reflect on how terrifying this saṃsāra is. That is why we spoke of a tangled ball of string. If you give a tangled ball of string to a cat and say, “This is tangled, untangle it for me,” it will pull it this way and that, tangling it even further. A person who does not know the Dhamma, who lacks right view, interacts with the world in just that manner. When such an event occurs, he rejoices and leaps with joy, happy that the enemy is destroyed. But just like what happened to Viḍūḍabha, he too accumulates that kamma.

There are such terrifying things in the world. People tangle these up, gathering others' things to themselves. They get entangled with them. That nature of entanglement is present in the world. One can get entangled in good, and one can get entangled in bad. You meritorious friends have often realized the Dukkha (Suffering) that ultimately lies even in those entanglements you thought were good. Even in the entanglements done thinking they are good, in the course of time, one realizes how many drawbacks (ādīnava) there are in this entanglement. You must understand what I am saying. It is the same with bad entanglements on the other hand. Right there lies the terrifying nature of saṃsāra.

We mentioned a word, ‘ogha’, which is found in these verses. ‘Mahogha’, ‘a great flood/torrent’. In fact, as it appeared to us, up to now we thought of ‘mahogha’ as a flood of a river. Starting from inland, the flood sweeps down to the sea. That was the greatest flood. Now, however, there is a new concept. A new word has also come to us—where the sea itself comes, sweeps over, and drags things back into the sea. There is such a flood too. That is what everyone is talking about now. But four floods far more terrifying than that are mentioned in this Dhamma. They are called the ‘cattāro oghā’. Now we are coming to the deep aspect of the Dhamma. In this Dhamma, there are the cattāro oghā, four floods. The Dhamma mentions these four floods that drag one into this ocean of saṃsāra. What are these four floods? They are: kāma-ogha (flood of sensuality), bhava-ogha (flood of existence), diṭṭhi-ogha (flood of views), and avijjā-ogha (flood of ignorance). Briefly described, they are as follows. Kāma-ogha refers to being infatuated with the fivefold sensual pleasures, just like the infatuation we mentioned earlier. Being dragged towards the fivefold sensual pleasures is the most manifest and powerful one—the flood of sensuality. One is dragged into that torrent of sensuality.

Next, bhava-ogha (flood of existence) is in a subtler sense. Beyond the fivefold sensual pleasures, there is a deeper aspect of the mind called attachment to form and formless realms (rūpa-arūpa-rāga). In accordance with those, one is born in the rūpa and arūpa Brahma worlds. The desire to be born in the Brahma worlds is a form of Taṇhā (Craving) for Bhava (Becoming)—it occurs through craving for existence. Similarly, what is called jhāna-nikanti is the attachment to jhānas (meditative absorptions). We consider jhāna to be a good thing. Even the yogis of the past took jhāna as a great thing. The Buddha pointed out that even there, craving for existence is present. Entering into a jhāna is just like a spinning top. You know how when spinning a top, you wind the string around it tightly and cast it with force. As long as the top has that speed, it keeps spinning on and on. Although the top stands straight, and it appears to stand straight due to the speed it has gathered, in the end, it falls over. It is just like that with the power of jhāna; no matter how hard you work to develop them, the top spun by those jhānas is what keeps spinning in the Brahma worlds. Having spun in the formless realms for aeons, it falls, and it falls back into saṃsāra itself. That is the terrifying nature of the craving for existence. Those who think only of samatha (tranquility) think highly of these things like jhānas. There is a good side to them; calming and unifying the mind is good. But if you form an attachment to them, it is called jhāna-nikanti (attachment to absorption). If you develop an unlimited attachment to jhāna, or if you specifically target birth in the Brahma worlds as your sole goal, this is what happens. Because in the end, you are dragged into the ocean of saṃsāra, and the problem is not resolved there.

Next, diṭṭhi-ogha (flood of views) refers to the sixty-two wrong views, which the Buddha has specifically declared as wrong views. Once one is overcome by them, it is not easy to escape from them. After the mind is dragged into them, nothing else is seen. One is blinded by the guise of views.

Next, likewise, what is called avijjā-ogha (flood of ignorance) is the non-knowing of the truth. That is the subtlest problem existing at the highest level. Failing to understand the truth does not mean the mere reciting of words from memory. It is the failure to understand that this entire existence is Dukkha (Suffering), the failure to understand that this fivefold aggregate is entirely dukkha. What does it mean to say that Saṅkhāra (Preparations) arise due to ignorance? Because of not understanding that this fivefold aggregate is dukkha, those preparations, arrangements made to bring about another fivefold aggregate—those are indeed what are called saṅkhāra. In short, it can be regarded in this way. It can be said that our effort to accumulate those saṅkhāra, and our engagement in them, is due to the lack of understanding of the Four Noble Truths. Because in the end, everything is shown to be dukkha. So, the lack of deep understanding of that is indeed what is called avijjā-ogha. Ignorance, the flood of non-knowing. So that is the explanation regarding those floods.

Next, another aspect of this, regarding the floods mentioned in the Dhamma, is that the Buddha speaks of crossing over these torrents. That is what is meant by ‘oghassa nittharaṇāya’, crossing over. It speaks of crossing the flood (ogha-taraṇa). It is mentioned that the Buddha crossed over all four torrents. The Arahants too are said to have crossed over those four. Now, why is it applied in this way? There, this concept of the torrent goes much deeper. In the exposition of crossing over this torrent, it is mentioned in certain places:

> “Pañca chinde, pañca jahe, pañca cuttari bhāvaye, > pañca saṅgātigo bhikkhu, oghatiṇṇoti vuccati.”

The Buddha uttered this verse in reply to a question asked by a certain deity. The deity's question was as follows:

> “Kati chinde, kati jahe, kati cuttari bhāvaye, > kati saṅgātigo bhikkhu, oghatiṇṇoti vaccatīti.”

A deity comes and asks the Buddha, “How many are to be cut? How many are to be abandoned? How many more are to be developed? A monk who has surmounted how many ties is said to have crossed the flood?” Such riddles and catechism-like verses on Dhamma points are mentioned in the Dhamma. So, the Buddha's reply to the question asked by that deity was: Pañca chinde—five must be cut. Pañca jahe—five must be abandoned. Pañca cuttari bhāvaye—five more must be developed. Pañca saṅgātigo bhikkhu—a monk who has surmounted five ties. Oghatiṇṇoti vuccati—is indeed said to have crossed the torrent.

Beings in the world are bound to Bhava (Becoming) by fetters (saṃyojana). Those fetters are ten in number. They are divided into two: the lower (orambhāgiya) and the higher (uddhambhāgiya). Out of these, five are forces that pull downwards. They are: Sakkāya-diṭṭhi (View of existing group/body), sīlabbata-parāmāsa (adherence to rules and rituals), kāma-rāga (sensual lust), and paṭigha (repulsion/anger). These are known as the lower fetters. These are the five that are to be cut. The simile given for this is as follows: if a bird is tied by its feet, even though it tries to fly, it cannot, can it? Then, the bond tying its feet has to be cut. It is said to be just like that with the lower fetters.

Next, the higher fetters (uddhambhāgiya) are the subtle bonds known as lust for form (rūpa-rāga), lust for the formless (arūpa-rāga), conceit (māna), restlessness (uddhacca), and ignorance (avijjā). Now, what is the simile mentioned for them? When someone is hanging onto a tree, he cannot let go of that branch, can he? There, on that branch, there is an upward pull. Hanging onto a branch is an upward pull. That is why it was said here: five are to be cut, and five are to be abandoned. The forces pulling downwards must be cut. The forces pulling upwards must be abandoned. Having understood their true nature, once those that pull one towards the Brahma worlds, such as lust for form and lust for the formless, are removed, only then are the five abandoned.

Next, what is helpful for this? Pañca cuttari bhāvaye—those to be developed are the five: faith (saddhā), energy (viriya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). It is through the development of these five that the cutting and abandoning of those fetters can be accomplished. Next, pañca saṅgātigo bhikkhu—there are various attachments (clings). The attachments known as lust (rāga), hatred (dosa), delusion (moha), conceit (māna), and views (diṭṭhi) must also be abandoned. Such a monk is indeed called oghatiṇṇa—one who has crossed over the torrent. In this manner, the flood, the torrent, is mentioned.

Similarly, if we analyze further and explain this verse, there is ‘suttaṃ gāmaṃ’, which speaks of a sleeping village. It is said that just as a sleeping village is swept away, Death comes and carries one off. Let us talk and reflect a bit on this sleep as well. Regarding this sleep, too, there are similar catechism-like verses. It is mentioned in the Dhamma that a deity comes and asks:

> “Kati jāgarataṃ suttā, kati suttesu jāgarā, > katībhi rajamādeti, katībhi…”

Among those who are awake, how many are asleep? Among those who are asleep, how many are awake? When asked thus, the Buddha declares: Pañca jāgarataṃ suttā, pañca suttesu jāgarā. That means, among those whom ordinary worldlings think are awake, five are asleep. What are those five? The five hindrances (nīvaraṇa) known as sensual desire (kāmacchanda), ill-will (vyāpāda), sloth and torpor (thīna-middha), restlessness and worry (uddhacca-kukkucca), and doubt (vicikicchā). The five hindrances are things that put a person into the sleep of defilements. Thus, among those who are awake in the world, those who have these are asleep. That is how we have to understand it. These riddle-like verses, riddle-stanzas, are presented as riddles concerning Dhamma points.

Pañca jāgaratam suttā—among those who are awake, five are asleep. Next, among those who are asleep, five are awake. Although they appear to be asleep in the ordinary sense, if they possess those qualities of faith (saddhā), energy (viriya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā), they are awake. Those who have the hindrance-factors of sensual desire, ill-will, sloth and torpor, restlessness and worry, and doubt are asleep. But those who have faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom—these are called the wakeful factors (jāgariya-dhamma)—are awake. Let me tell you a good illustration of this. Saccaka the Niganṭha was someone who debated much with the Buddha. On one occasion, while debating with the Buddha, Saccaka asked the Buddha, “Do you remember, Blessed One, sleeping during the daytime?” “Yes, Saccaka, in the last month of the summer season, during the day, after my almsround, I lay down on my right side in the lion’s posture, mindful and fully aware (sati-sampajañña).” Then he said, “The ascetics and brahmins say that is a deluded sleep.” The Buddha replied, “I do not call it a deluded sleep merely because of that. If someone has the defiling taints (āsava) and other things that lead to future rebirth, that indeed is the deluded sleep. But the sleep of the other (one who is free) is not a sleep at all.” That is what we have to take in this sense. While ordinary people in the world are awake, when they possess the hindrances of sensual desire, ill-will, sloth and torpor, restlessness and worry, and doubt, it is like being asleep. But even if someone is asleep, there—where mindfulness and full awareness are also mentioned—if they have developed those virtues of faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom, they are awake even while sleeping. So, we can draw such deep meanings from this.

Next, let us consider why flowers were mentioned. It is the fivefold sensual pleasures that were compared to a flower garden. There are, especially in this era too, various kinds of optimistic attitudes in the world. Even though so many disasters occur, to the world deluded by defilements, only happiness is seen everywhere.

So let us think about production now. In the commercial world—we call it commercial. What is in it? Within the competitive commercial world, there are pleasing objects (subha-ārammaṇa). Brand new, latest fashions and designs are presented to consumers at a highly competitive level. Thus, there is a competition among manufacturers to present the most luxurious fashions and consumer goods in a newer way than others. Likewise, on the consumers' side too, there is that competitiveness, the desire to enjoy the fivefold sensual pleasures at a level far higher than one's neighbor.

So, even though everyone pursues happiness in that manner, if we look at it from the perspective of this life, at some point they are swept away either by a flood coming from inland like that, or by sea-water coming from the ocean. In this life, there are such disastrous things. If we look at it from the perspective of the next life, from the perspective of saṃsāra, they are overcome by those aforementioned kāma-ogha, bhava-ogha, diṭṭhi-ogha, and avijjā-ogha, and are dragged into the ocean of saṃsāra nonetheless.

That is indeed what is meant in that verse by “Pupphāni heva pacinantaṃ, byāsattamanasaṃ naraṃ”—going about seeking only flowers, seeking flower after flower. When one falls into that flower garden of the flowers of the fivefold sensual pleasures, one falls into the sleep of negligence and goes on gathering them. One does not understand the reality of life. What is that reality? That is what we highlighted at the very beginning here: first, the terrifying nature of this kamma. In fact, why is saṃsāra considered an extremely terrifying place? The Buddha has declared that this (unwholesome action) never passes away without giving its result. It never passes away without giving its result!

Next, the Buddha has shown a way to break the power of their results. At the highest level, it is broken by the supramundane paths (lokuttara-magga). It is through the supramundane paths that this cycle of kamma is broken at some point. Short of that, it is broken by the person who lives according to a certain right view, having separated himself from those wrong views—which is called kammassakatā-sammādiṭṭhi (right view that one is the owner of one's actions). At the very least, without falling into woeful states, escaping from the path of the planes of misery which are regarded as terrifying abysses and indicated by words such as apāya, duggati, vinipāta, niraya, one can obtain at least those good human existences, good living conditions, lives that can assist in realizing Nibbāna. If one lives according to right view, on one hand, it is possible to make an effort to break that power of the force of kamma. More than that, what is to be done during the period of a Buddha’s appearance is, as we mentioned at this time, in order to become oghatiṇṇa (one who has crossed the flood), to cut five, abandon five, and then develop another five, as said before. We must think specifically about the five to be developed: the spiritual faculties (indriya) known as faith (saddhā), energy (viriya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā).

Now, ordinary worldlings, those who walk inside that aforementioned flower garden, use only the five sense-faculties received along with our Jāti (Birth). But those mentioned in this Dhamma are spiritual faculties. Five faculties. They are things pertaining to the mind. Now, these five physical sense-faculties are common even to ordinary animals. But it is only a human being or a deity who can practice the Dhamma who is able to develop these faculties of faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom. It is when one attains their value that these faculties are said to arise properly.

So, next, that they are helpful is what is mentioned in the Ālavaka Sutta and elsewhere: “Saddhāya taratī oghaṃ”—it is by taking faith as one's support that one can cross over these four torrents. To cross over the four torrents, over the ocean of saṃsāra, faith is helpful as the primary factor.

Next, if one receives encouragement from faith, what is done through faith? One is ready to bring forth even the energy hidden within oneself. Let us imagine that after a heavy rain, a great torrent is flowing. At first glance, looking at this flowing torrent, it seems: “Leave aside crossing to the other side, one cannot even think of it.” But from the other side, the Buddha demonstrates with the gesture of fearlessness (abhaya-mudrā): “I have crossed over, it is possible to cross over. If you practice in this way and that, you can cross over.” Behold, then faith arises. It is in accordance with that faith that one leaps into the water. Otherwise, saying, “Oh, how cold it is!” one would remain standing with arms folded. Instead, the faithful person, deciding “death or crossing,” enters into these dispensational practices to cross over this torrent. There is such a great commitment within this faith. That is why faith is called resolution (adhimokkha). Through that faith, energy is released. Otherwise, one keeps it hidden. The capacity is there, but it does not come out. It comes out through that faith when the perception (saññā) arises: “This can be done.” He can go there. There are people who have gone there. He sees that through the Buddha. That is what is called faith in the Teacher. Through the faith that arises from that, one generates physical and mental devotion/faith. Up to now, how much effort does a human being make to increase the heap of dukkha in daily life? How much suffering and hardship does he undergo? Hundreds and thousands of times more energy must be exerted to cross over this ocean of saṃsāra. That is what the Buddha declares regarding that energy. The Buddha applied energy at the highest level. What is called the fourfold-factored energy (caturanga-samannāgata-viriya) is: “Let only skin, sinews, and bones remain! Let flesh and blood dry up! If I am making this effort for a certain goal, without reaching that level, I shall not give up this energy.” Applying it at that supreme level, the Buddha attained Buddhahood. So, even if we cannot do it at that level, we can apply an energy close to it only when we have that kind of faith.

Next, although we say “energy,” it is not agitation that is there; it is not the arising of restlessness (uddhacca), but something that must be done mindfully. It must be done with mindfulness (sati). It is the energy applied with mindfulness that actually succeeds. Accordingly, in applying that energy, one has to use mindfulness so that the energy is not wasted.

Next, likewise, when these come together, mindfulness becomes strong, and at some point, concentration (samādhi) comes. What is called a more stable concentrated mind is this: up to now, the capacities of the scattered mind could not be fully brought forth, but once it is unified, a power comes to see what was previously unseen. That is indeed what is called wisdom (paññā). One can understand the true nature of things as they are through wisdom. All of these are shown as spiritual faculties (indriya). These are things to be developed; through development, these must be brought forth. They are not things received for nothing from within. Through engaging in them itself, these faculties must be brought forth.

It is by bringing forth faith (saddhā), energy (viriya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā) that, at some point, one is able to cross over that flood. So we must constantly reflect on life. This reality is very quickly forgotten by most people. Once they are overcome by the fivefold sensual pleasures, they forget the true nature of the world, and leave aside other things, they even forget the Anicca (Impermanent) nature of their own lives. Life is a very short time; we live for less than a hundred years. Yet within this, embracing the entire world, just like Viḍūḍabha did, one tries to perform all the exploits one can. But one never knows when or from where Death (Māra) will emerge. When past karmic forces gather together and operate at some moment, all of those become dreams. Life is a dream! In the end, the entirety of life is a dream!! Now, some think that at the final moment, they will be able to rejoice because of the exploits they performed in life. None of those are what will be presented before them in the end; an unexpected sign (nimitta) of some murder, theft, etc., which they kept hidden, might emerge. As the sign of destination (gati-nimitta), a thought regarding such a place as a plane of misery (apāya) or the animal world finally arises. When being swept away by seawater or a flood, it is not the success of this life up to now, nor the many experiences called successful in this life that are remembered at that moment. That becomes just a dream, and in the end, what is remembered in its place is the mind-produced form (cittaja-rūpa) presented in accordance with the karmic energy that brings about the next Jāti (Birth). It is according to that that the next form is created, a body is created. Such is the way of saṃsāra.

Thus, our lives have been spent in this manner for an infinite time. It is only during the period of a Buddha's appearance that one can cross over from this ocean of saṃsāra, from these four floods called saṃsāra. You lay meritorious friends know better than us how daily lay life is spent. Life is overcome by and drawn to various amazing forces, and within that aforementioned commercial civilization, there are amazing situations in society where the mind completely enters a state of madness. To avoid being caught in them, we must develop from within those spiritual faculties of faith, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom. One must apply oneself at least in an effort to develop those faculties. Likewise, turning towards a simple life rather than those various fashions and designs mentioned, on an occasion like this of observing precepts, you meritorious friends get to recognize the true value of that Dhamma. It is not those fashions and designs in the world. Those are things that exist temporarily and then vanish. What can be regarded as eternal values is the recalling of the values of those virtues such as virtue (sīla) pointed out by the Buddha, and maintaining one's life in accordance with them. It is through that that one can establish real peace in life. Both in the past and in the present, even for those lay meritorious friends who led good lives, at least some peace could be established only by that kind of success—which we do not consider successful in this ordinary world, but is for those who led righteous, blameless, and virtuous lives in accordance with the Dhamma. It is only for those who listened to the Dhamma and meditated.

Having understood that with wisdom, according to what is said in this verse, since we do not know at what time that Death (Māra) will come in accordance with kamma, we must be ready for it at any time. That is why we say in certain instances, in this disastrous and calamity-prone era we have now, everyone should actually live with the “near-death mind” (āsanna-citta). We usually consider that when our aged parents or other relatives are close to death, we should bring a monk, preach a sermon, and think: “We must set this person's mind right”—thinking of the near-death mind, we make an effort for that. But a person who constantly has the fear of death, who has the awareness of the power of death, always tries to remain in a near-death state of mind. Why? Because he does not know at what moment death will come. Not only from external disasters, but from illnesses and ailments coming from within the body, in an completely unexpected manner—one can be talking like this, and suddenly one's speech can stop. Such things are present in this life. Therefore, that is why we are constantly, as the Buddha declared, said to be “prepared to die.” One can say one is prepared to die, at least to some extent, only if one has led a life in accordance with the Dhamma. Yet the Buddha does not say that one should be satisfied even with that. Why? No matter what kind of state in the Brahma worlds one is born into, or even if one is born in the deva worlds, they too have to pass away (cuta) one day. They have to pass away from there once that kamma is exhausted. That top spins only as long as its energy is there, only as long as the force applied to it is there; next, having spun and spun, it slowly falls over. Such is the situation in the Brahma worlds and the deva worlds too. That is what the Buddha pointed out to the world.

Therefore, we must reflect: to resolve this fundamentally, we must bring forth that wisdom, insight-wisdom (vipassanā-paññā). We must always direct the mind towards the Anicca (Impermanent) nature of Saṅkhāra (Preparations). That is the reality of life. The Buddha has declared that reality in three words: Anicca (Impermanent), Dukkha (Suffering), and Anattā (Not-self). Even though we take all of this as “this is me, this is mine,” what is here is merely a heap of efforts made to survive. In reality, there is no such thing as a life. Although we call it a “life,” there is only an attempt to survive here. At times, it is merely a multitude of futile efforts. To use a simile, it is like trying to sleep on a brand new reed mat. When you unroll the new mat and try to lie down, behold, it curls up again. All the works we do are like that; just when we think they are well finished, behold, they curl back the other way.

That is what happened to Viḍūḍabha too. Having tried and made an effort four times like that, he fulfilled his heart's desire. He destroyed that entire Sakyan clan and tried to return after fulfilling his heart's desire by washing the bench he sat on with their blood as he had hoped. They lay down to sleep, whether in the middle of the river or on the bank, and were simply swept away by the water. It is just like that with our life-goals; just when we think we have attained each of them in a big way, sometimes due to various things they can be destroyed. Even if not, at the very least, at the moment of Jarāmaraṇa (Decay and Death) we have to abandon them. A moment comes when we have to leave behind all obtained positions, accumulated wealth, gathered and raised children, and finally depart. At that time, preparing the mind for that is indeed what one should do. So, the moment of conquering that is what is called the Deathless, the deathless Nibbāna. It is the moment when the mind can be detached from this fivefold aggregate. That Deathless means: one dies, but there is no fear of death. The state where one can die without the fear of death is indeed what is called Nivīma (the Mind Stilled / Extinction / Extinguishment).

What is called the deathless Nibbāna is not some strange food, nor a drink, nor something like a food found in the deva worlds. The deathless Nibbāna means, if at some moment, one can die without any fear of death. The fear of death is indeed what is present in the world, in everyone. If there is a state where one can die without a fear of death, it is the attainment of that. The noble ones who attained that state in this very life enter into those attainments—that is what is called the attainment of the Fruit of Arahantship—and having entered the attainment of the Fruit of Arahantship, they enjoy that peace (nivīma). That is not some strange world either. What is there is liberation from the world. There is the crossing over of Bhava (Becoming). There is the crossing over of the flood (ogha). That is what is called Nivīma, called Nibbāna. The terrifying nature of saṃsāra is indeed that one is born and dies again and again, born and dies. Born, dies. Born, dies. Thus, even though we rejoice when born, we are born only to die. Therefore, because of such a state, escaping from death is indeed the ultimate, highest, and most skillful thing to be done in the world. That is indeed Nibbāna, called the deathless Nibbāna. Even when that word is used, you meritorious friends might think of it as a world.

But for one who has developed those aforementioned faith (saddhā), energy (viriya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā), as their ultimate result, he is able to experience that strength to face Jarāmaraṇa (Decay and Death) without any fear of death. That is what the Buddha and the Arahants experienced. It is with that goal in mind that today you meritorious friends have observed the valuable precepts and listened to this Dhamma. Therefore, if everyone, if every Buddhist, aspires for Nibbāna, this is indeed what they aspire for. It is liberation from that aforementioned ocean of saṃsāra, from the flood.

Therefore, in order to attain that capacity, if you have accumulated any wholesome energy (kusala) through observing precepts, listening to sermons, and meditating up to now today, may that wholesome energy, with the help and assistance of noble friends (kalyāṇa-mitta) in this very life, succeeding in sermons and meditation, assist you in quickly obtaining that! May the wholesome energy of Dhamma-preaching and Dhamma-hearing be a supportive condition! Thus, make your aspiration. Including the deceased relatives who have passed away in your names, may whatever living beings from Avīci up to Akaniṭṭha who wish to rejoice in this wholesome deed of Dhamma-preaching and Dhamma-hearing, by doing so, realize the supreme and great Deathless Nibbāna through a Bodhi of their choice! Aspiring thus, recite these verses and share the merit.

Dear Listeners,

The Esala Full Moon Poya Day reminds us of the occasion when the Fully Enlightened Buddha, the Teacher of the Three Worlds, delivered the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta at the Deer Park in Isipatana, Varanasi. It was the moment the Wheel of Dhamma was set in motion. According to the history of the Sasana, today we have chosen as our theme a stanza that highlights certain important factors that formed the background to that miraculous event of setting the Wheel of Dhamma in motion.

While addressing a group of monks gathered at the hermitage of the Brahmin Rammaka in Savatthi, the Buddha, expounding a certain phase of His life story—disclosing it—brought to light a series of events related to this stanza. The Buddha declared that after attaining Supreme Enlightenment, having spent several weeks experiencing the bliss of liberation (vimutti-sukha), while He was staying at the foot of the Ajapala Banyan tree, a thought of this nature occurred to Him:

“This Dhamma I have discovered is extremely deep. It is very difficult to explain to others. It is peaceful, refined, beyond mere logic, the deep Dhamma of Dependent Arising (paṭicca-samuppāda), the Dhamma of Nibbāna. It is difficult to understand for those who are trapped in attachment, who remain with Taṇhā (Craving) within attachment. Even if I preach the Dhamma, if they cannot understand it, it will only be a weariness and fatigue for me." Thus the Buddha expressed His hesitation to preach the Dhamma. But knowing that the Buddha was disinclined to teach, Sahampati Brahma of the Brahma world felt deep compassion and, knowing the thought of the Buddha, realized:

"The world is perishing, the world is being destroyed, if the Tathagata, the Fully Enlightened One, does not preach the Dhamma to the world!" At that very moment—as quickly as a strong man would stretch his bent arm or bend his stretched arm—he appeared before the Buddha, paid homage, and made an invitation: "May the Blessed One preach the Dhamma to the world! May the Sugata preach the Dhamma! There are those in the world with little dust in their eyes who have the capacity to understand the Dhamma." He then made this invitation to the Buddha in three stanzas.

"In the past, in this Varanasi, the Dhamma has been presented by various teachers with defilements. But may the Blessed One preach this pure Dhamma! May He open the doors of the Deathless!" he invited. The Brahma also presented a simile: "Just as a man standing on a rocky peak would look upon the people all around, may the Blessed One, the Tathagata, who has ascended the palace of Dhamma, look down upon the world of beings who are sunk in this samsaric Dukkha (Suffering) such as Jāti (Birth), Jarāmaraṇa (Decay and Death), sickness, and so forth." Then, as a special invitation in the final stanza, he declared:

"Uṭṭhehi vīra vijitasaṅgāma satthavāha anaṇa vicara loke;

Desassu bhagavā dhammaṁ, aññātāro bhavissanti."

"Arise, O Hero, victor in battle (who has conquered the battle of defilements)! O Caravan leader (satthavāha), wander in the world debtless. May the Blessed One preach the Dhamma to the world! There will be those who understand!" Thus the Brahma made his supplication and invitation.

At that moment, the Blessed One declares that, taking into account both the invitation of the Brahma and the Great Compassion for the world which He had cultivated throughout samsara, He surveyed the world with the Eye of a Buddha (buddha-cakkhu). When He surveyed with the Buddha-eye, He saw: those with little dust in their eyes, those with much dust in their eyes, those who have developed spiritual faculties such as faith (saddhā), energy (viriya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā), those who have not developed them, the good, the bad, and also those who have fear of the next world, those who can easily understand the Dhamma, those who cannot, and so on—the Buddha explained to the monks that these various levels of understanding appeared to Him.

Then, to illustrate this, He declared a simile. Just as in a pond of blue, red, or white lotuses, some blue, red, or white lotuses are born in the water, grow in the water, and remain nourished entirely under the water. Some blue, red, or white lotuses rise to the surface of the water and stand level with the water. Yet other blue, red, or white lotuses rise completely out of the water and stand undefiled by the water. In the same way, the various levels of understanding among the people of the world appeared to the Buddha through the simile of the lotus pond. Seeing this, in acceptance of the Brahma's request, the Buddha uttered this stanza. This is the stanza we chose as our theme today:

“Apārutā tesaṁ amatassa dvārā, ye sotavanto pamuñcantu saddhaṁ;

vihiṁsasaññī paguṇaṁ na bhāsiṁ dhammaṁ paṇītaṁ manujesu brahme ti.”

“Open to them are the doors of the Deathless. For whom? Let those who have ears release faith. I open those doors to those with ears, those with hearing.” Let those who have ears release faith. Let them direct their faith towards it. Vihiṁsasaññī paguṇaṁ na bhāsiṁ, Dhammaṁ paṇītaṁ manujesu brahme. “O Brahma, thinking it would be a mere weariness, I did not initially preach this refined Dhamma to the world, but now I open the doors of the Deathless to those who have ears, let them release faith!” Thus, with this stanza, the Buddha made the decision to preach the Dhamma, saying He had opened the doors of the Deathless. Thereupon, the Brahma King, being delighted, circumambulated the Buddha and returned to the Brahma world.

The Buddha then contemplated: “To whom shall I preach the Dhamma first?” according to their levels of understanding. First, He thought of Alara Kalama, who had been a teacher to Him, or rather, who had met Him during the Noble Quest (ariya-pariyesana) and had helped Him to a certain extent. This Alara Kalama was wise. He was someone who had suppressed defilements for a long time. He had the capacity to understand things quickly. He was capable of realizing this Dhamma very soon. Just as He thought of preaching the Dhamma to Alara Kalama, deities came and said: “Venerable Sir, the teacher Alara Kalama passed away a week ago.” Then the Buddha thought: “A great loss has occurred. If Alara Kalama were alive, he would have understood this Dhamma quickly.” Next, He contemplated: “Who else?” and remembered the other teacher, Uddaka Ramaputta. Just as He thought: “This Uddaka Ramaputta is also wise, capable of understanding the Dhamma quickly,” deities came and informed Him: “Last night, Uddaka Ramaputta passed away.” At that moment too, the Buddha thought: “That too is a great loss. If Uddaka Ramaputta were alive, he would have understood the Dhamma quickly.”

Then, thirdly, He contemplated: “To whom shall I preach this Dhamma?” He then thought with gratitude: “When I was practicing extreme self-mortification (dukarakiriya), these five monks were of great help to me. They are capable of understanding this Dhamma quickly.” Next, He looked to see where they were residing. He saw that they were staying at the Deer Park in Isipatana, Varanasi. Then the Blessed One set out from there to preach the Dhamma to them. On the way, between Gaya and the Bodhi tree (Bodhgaya), the Blessed One declared that He met an Ajivaka named Upaka. This Ajivaka Upaka saw the extremely serene manner of the Blessed One, saw the purity of His complexion, and questioned Him: “Friend, your faculties are so pure, so serene. Your complexion is bright. Whose Dhamma do you follow? Who is your teacher?" Then He replied: "I have no teacher." The Buddha then uttered a series of stanzas: Sabbābhibhū sabbavidūhamasmi... ('I am the conqueror of all, the knower of all...'), declaring that He had attained Supreme Enlightenment and Buddhahood.

Furthermore, "Na me ācariyo atthi, sadiso me na vijjati" ("I have no teacher, my equal is not found in the world. I am the Worthy One, the Fully Enlightened One in this world"), thus He introduced Himself. However, for some reason, this Ajivaka Upaka asked, "Then, according to what you say, you are the Infinite Victor (anantajina)?" and having heard this, said, "It may be so, friend," shook his head, took a different path, and departed.

Next, the Blessed One, journeying by stages towards Varanasi, finally approached the Deer Park in Isipatana. The five monks saw Him from afar and made an agreement among themselves: "Friends, here comes the recluse Gotama. The recluse Gotama is coming, having abandoned his self-mortification. Having reverted to a life of abundance (bāhulika), a life of luxury, he is coming in search of us. Let none of us stand up for him. Let us not pay him the respect of receiving his bowl and robe. If he wishes, let us merely set out a seat for him to sit on." Thus they agreed. But the Blessed One expressed to the monks that as He drew closer and closer, they were unable to abide by their agreement. Spontaneously, as it were, one of them came forward and received My bowl and robe. Another from among the five prepared a seat. Another prepared water to wash My feet. However, although they performed these hospitable services, they addressed me with the term "friend" (āvuso) and by my name.

Then the Blessed One declared: "I told the five monks: 'Monks, do not address me by name or as 'friend'. I have discovered the nectar of Nibbāna. I have realized the Dhamma. I have attained Supreme Enlightenment. Therefore, it is not proper to address me in this manner. Lend your ears, bend your ears, I shall preach the Dhamma to you. By listening to this Dhamma, you will realize that purpose for which you went forth into homelessness.'" But the five monks did not believe it at first. "How can that be, recluse Gotama? When you could not achieve it even after practicing such severe self-mortification, now that you have abandoned that effort and become a bāhulika, or rather, turned towards a life of luxury, how could you have found it?" Thus they did not believe it. Even when the Blessed One declared it a second and a third time, the five monks did not accept it.

Finally, the Buddha said: "Monks, have I ever spoken to you in this manner before? Monks, have I ever made such a statement to you before?" As soon as they heard this, the attitude of the five monks changed, and they replied, "No, indeed, Venerable Sir." The five monks, who had addressed Him as "friend" (āvuso) until then, now said, "No, indeed, Venerable Sir." From this, we must learn something. What the Blessed One used there was nothing other than the miracle of truth (saccā-pāṭihāriya). Through the miracle of truth, those five monks were subdued. Being subdued, from that moment on, they were ready to bend their ears. It was on that occasion that the Blessed One said, “Then, monks, give ear. I shall preach this Dhamma,” and delivered the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta discourse we mentioned.

In the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta, within this matter of setting the Wheel of Dhamma in motion, there are valuable points. We will try to bring out briefly only the main points as appropriate to the occasion. Actually, the Buddha directed this sermon to these five monks. Their view (diṭṭhi) was attakilamathānuyoga—the idea that liberation can be attained through self-mortification, by giving pain to the body. To help remove this, the Buddha presented the Noble Eightfold Path which He had discovered as the Middle Path (majjhimā paṭipadā). Right at the beginning of that discourse, He said: “Monks, there are these two extremes that should not be pursued by one who has gone forth. What are they? Kāmasukhallikānuyoga—which is being attached to and immersed in the pleasure of the five cords of sensual desire. It is low, vulgar, common (pothujjanika), fit for worldlings, ignoble (anariya), and unbeneficial (anatthasaṁhita). It is something that does not bring welfare, but leads to harm.” Introducing it thus, He called kāmasukhallikānuyoga one extreme. Then, as the second extreme, attakilamathānuyoga (self-mortification). This is not low and vulgar, but it is “dukkho, anariyo, anatthasaṁhito”—it is Dukkha (Suffering), ignoble, and unbeneficial.

So, having bypassed those two extremes, the Tathagata has awakened to the Middle Path. It is described as cakkhukaraṇī, ñāṇakaraṇī—giving rise to vision, giving rise to knowledge, leading to understanding, wisdom, and liberation (vimutti). Then, that Middle Path is the Noble Eightfold Path. You all know this: Right View (sammā-diṭṭhi), Right Thought (sammā-saṅkappa), Right Speech (sammā-vācā), Right Action (sammā-kammanta), Right Livelihood (sammā-ājīva), Right Effort (sammā-vāyāma), Right Mindfulness (sammā-sati), and Right Concentration (sammā-samādhi). This Noble Eightfold Path was then presented as the Middle Way.

Next, the Buddha briefly pointed out the truth. That is the Noble Truth He discovered, the Noble Truth of Dukkha (Suffering). You have heard many times of the Four Noble Truths: Dukkha, Samudaya (Origin), Nirodha (Cessation), and Magga (Path). It is here, for the first time, that the Buddha introduces them to the world. Each of these is introduced with the designation “Noble” (ariya). The Noble Truth of Dukkha, then Samudaya, the cause for the arising of dukkha. Then, the cessation of dukkha, which is Nibbāna. Then, the path, the practice leading to it. That itself was shown as the Middle Path.

The Noble Truth of Dukkha was introduced as: jātipi dukkhā, jarāpi dukkhā, vyādhipi dukkho, maraṇampi dukkhaṁ, appiyehi sampayogo dukkho, piyehi vippayogo dukkho, yampiccaṁ na labhati tampi dukkhaṁ, saṅkhittena pañcupādānakkhandhā dukkhā—thus was dukkha described. Jāti (Birth), Jarāmaraṇa (Decay and Death), sickness, death, association with the unpleasant, separation from the pleasant, not getting what one wishes. In short, in brief, the five aggregates of grasping (pañcupādānakkhandhā)—namely rūpa (form), Vedanā (Feeling), saññā (perception), Saṅkhāra (Preparations), and viññāṇa (consciousness)—these five aggregates of grasping are dukkha. Thus He introduced the mass of suffering, the Noble Truth of Dukkha. Next, as the second, the Truth of Origin (samudaya-sacca), He declared the nature of Taṇhā (Craving). Yāyaṁ taṇhā ponobhavikā—this taṇhā is what causes renewed Bhava (Becoming). Nandīrāgasahagatā—accompanied by delight and lust. Tatra tatrābhinandinī—seeking delight now here, now there. He then showed it to be threefold: kāma-taṇhā, bhava-taṇhā, and vibhava-taṇhā. Kāma-taṇhā is the craving for the five cords of sensual pleasure; bhava-taṇhā is the desire for becoming, to wander in samsara; and vibhava-taṇhā is the craving associated with the view of annihilation (uccheda-diṭṭhi), which runs counter to bhava-taṇhā, moving along with the concept of a self (atta-saññā) towards self-annihilation. Just as bhava-taṇhā is connected to the view of eternalism (sassata-diṭṭhi), vibhava-taṇhā is bound up with the view of annihilation.

To escape this existence, they seek a practice like suicide. But the Buddha does not approve of such things. As you know, within the Middle Path, there is a complete transformation of one's personal identity, starting from Right View and leading up to Right Concentration. The Buddha declared that it is along such a path of liberation that one gives rise to vision, knowledge, and wisdom. So, He declared the nature of that craving. Next, as the Truth of Cessation (nirodha-sacca), He showed: tassāyeva taṇhāya asesavirāganirodho—the remainderless fading away and cessation of that very craving, its giving up, its relinquishment, which is the Truth of Cessation. That is what was shown as Nibbāna. Then, the path to it is the aforementioned Middle Path. As the Truth of the Path (magga-sacca), there are the eight factors starting from Right View and leading up to Right Concentration.

Having thus briefly introduced the Four Noble Truths, He then presents another unique analysis. Regarding each of these truths, the Buddha declares: concerning this Noble Truth of Dukkha, first there arose in Him the initial realization, “This is the Noble Truth of Dukkha.” Next, “This Noble Truth of Dukkha is to be fully understood” (pariññeyyaṁ). The world has only a partial, incomplete understanding of this. It must be fully understood. Therefore, the word used regarding the Noble Truth of Dukkha is: the Noble Truth must be fully understood (pariññeyyaṁ). That realization arose in the Buddha.

Then, thirdly, it is said: “I have achieved full comprehension (pariññātaṁ).” These three phases are what is called the “three rounds” (tiparivaṭṭaṁ). Finally, the Four Noble Truths are mentioned as having three rounds and twelve aspects (tiparivaṭṭaṁ dvādasākāraṁ). For some, this has been a puzzle: a Dhamma Wheel of three rounds and twelve aspects. How do these twelve aspects come about? Now, concerning the Truth of Dukkha: first, “This is the Truth of Dukkha.” Finding out something anew is itself a turn. The first turn is identifying, “This is the Noble Truth of Dukkha.” Next, the realization that this can be overturned from within one's own mind-stream, that this can be put into practice, is pariññeyyaṁ—'it must be fully understood.' When that full understanding is completed, the wheel has turned and is complete: pariññātaṁ ('it has been fully understood'). There, indeed, you have the three rounds (tiparivaṭṭaṁ) or three revolutions.

Next, regarding the Truth of Origin (samudaya-sacca) as well: the origin is identified as craving (taṇhā), as mentioned earlier. First, the realization arose, "This is the Noble Truth of the Origin of Dukkha." Regarding this, there is "abandoning" (pahāna): if it is craving, it must be abandoned, dispelled, removed. So, those three words are mentioned regarding the Truth of Origin: "This is the Noble Truth of the Origin of Dukkha"; next, "This Noble Truth of the Origin of Dukkha is to be abandoned" (pahātabbaṁ); and finally, "It has been abandoned by me" (pahīnaṁ)—it has been expelled from the mind-stream.

Next, regarding the Truth of Cessation (nirodha-sacca): cessation is what comes about through the destruction of that craving. That cessation is the cessation of Bhava (Becoming), the cessation of craving. Regarding this, it is mentioned as something to be realized, to be personally experienced. He understood that cessation is something to be realized, and then He realized it: sacchikātabbaṁ ('to be realized') and sacchikataṁ ('realized'). Here too, there are three: "This is the Noble Truth of the Cessation of Dukkha"; "This Noble Truth of the Cessation of Dukkha is to be realized"; and "It has been realized by me." Thus, that aspect too is complete.

Next, the Truth of the Path (magga-sacca). When these are done, the path is already developed. So, regarding the path, it is said: bhāvetabbaṁ—the Truth of the Path is to be developed. It can be developed. And "It has been developed" (bhāvitaṁ). Now, there you have the four—the Four Noble Truths. If you divide each into three in this way, there are twelve aspects (tiparivaṭṭaṁ dvādasākāraṁ). The Blessed One declares to the five monks: "Monks, as long as my knowledge and vision (ñāṇadassana) regarding these Four Noble Truths in their three rounds and twelve aspects was not completely purified, I did not claim to be Fully Enlightened (sammā-sambuddha). Only when it was purified did I make that declaration." Thus He convinced the monks.

From this, what we have to understand is—and some of you might know this—that initial vision is obtained during the path-knowledge of Stream-entry (sotāpatti-magga-ñāṇa). Although a general understanding of the Noble Truths is obtained in that manner, it was when they were fully put into practice and perfected that the Buddha attained Arahatship or the aforementioned Supreme Enlightenment. That is what is meant by saying "it was purified". In this way, the Buddha declared: "When my knowledge and vision of the three rounds and twelve aspects was complete, I set in motion this Wheel of Dhamma, which cannot be turned back by any deity, Mara, Brahma, or anyone else in the world." That indeed is what is called dhammaccakkappavattana. He set the Wheel of Dhamma in motion there. Having set that Wheel of Dhamma in motion within His own mind-stream, He also introduced it to the world. It is mentioned that by the time the Buddha finished preaching, from among the five monks of the human world, Venerable Kondañña attained the Path of Stream-entry. This is indicated there by the words: “yaṁ kiñci samudayadhammaṁ sabbaṁ taṁ nirodhadhammaṁ.”

So, we can understand that the realization within the Fruit of Stream-entry (sotāpatti-phala), if expressed briefly, can be described by those few words: “yaṁ kiñci samudayadhammaṁ sabbaṁ taṁ nirodhadhammaṁ.” “Whatever is of the nature to arise, all that is of the nature to cease.” That is the principle of Dependent Arising (paṭicca-samuppāda). So there too is a wheel. There is a wheel concerning arising and ceasing. You know that even though the twelve-fold Dependent Arising (paṭicca-samuppāda) was not explicitly mentioned here, even laywomen chant it in forward and reverse order (anuloma-paṭiloma). Within that too, there is a wheel: due to ignorance (avijjā), Saṅkhāra (Preparations) arise, and so on, until finally this mass of suffering called the five aggregates of grasping (pañcupādānakkhandhā) is built up. At whatever point ignorance is abandoned, the five aggregates of grasping cease. That is what was briefly mentioned here.

So, looking at this sutta, we might not understand how Venerable Kondañña became a Stream-enterer. But once they abandoned the view (diṭṭhi) they had held, once they abandoned the extreme of attakilamathānuyoga (self-mortification)—and they had already abandoned the extreme of kāmasukhallikānuyoga when they entered the ascetic life—then, when the Buddha presented the Middle Path in terms of Right View and so forth, the strength of the path-factors (maggāṅga) developed within the ascetic Kondañña, and he obtained that realization. The very principle of Dependent Arising is what is found within the Four Noble Truths. Dukkha—if there is suffering, there must be a cause for it. When the cause is abandoned, suffering is abandoned. There too, a circular nature (wheel-like nature) exists.

If anything exists in the world, there is a cause for it. When the cause is removed, by the cessation of the cause, that suffering also ceases. Thus, in every aspect, there is that wheel. It was by the turning of that Wheel of Dhamma within the ascetic Kondañña that there arose the realization: “yaṁ kiñci samudayadhammaṁ sabbaṁ taṁ nirodhadhammaṁ.” What is meant by “whatever” (yaṁ kiñci)? It is the very five aggregates of grasping (pañcupādānakkhandhā) mentioned earlier. If it is due to ignorance that one grasps these five aggregates of grasping, then, at the point where ignorance ceases, where misunderstanding is replaced by understanding, where the view of self (atta-diṭṭhi) is abandoned, where the view of self that caused kāma-taṇhā, bhava-taṇhā, and vibhava-taṇhā is removed—there, indeed, that realization comes to a person. It was because this was realized internally that the Eye of Dhamma (dhamma-cakkhu) arose in Venerable Kondañña. It is said, cakkhuṁ udapādi, ñāṇaṁ udapādi (‘the eye arose, the knowledge arose…’)—this is what is called the arising of the Eye of Dhamma. It is mentioned that after this Eye of Dhamma arose in the ascetic Kondañña, the Buddha granted him ordination by the formula of ehi bhikkhu (‘come, monk’).

After this event occurred, at that very moment, the Buddha uttered an inspired utterance of joy (udāna): “Aññāsi vata bho Kondañño, aññāsi vata bho Kondañño” (“Kondañña has indeed understood, Kondañña has indeed understood!”). It is because of this that he received the name “Aññā Kondañña” from that day onwards. When we consider how the Wheel of Dhamma that had turned within His own mind-stream was successfully set in motion within one of those five, we can call it a transformation that occurred not only within this human world. It was at that moment that—as many like to hear in protective chants (paritta)—the news of the Wheel of Dhamma being set in motion spread from heaven to heaven, from Brahma world to Brahma world. When we speak of the Wheel of Dhamma rolling, it is an upward rolling that takes place here. An upward rolling. Starting from the earth-dwelling deities (bhumma devas), it rolled through the six devalokas, and then to the Brahma worlds. It rolled onwards as the reverberating sound of this event. The news that the Blessed One had set the Wheel of Dhamma in motion in the Deer Park at Isipatana spread up to that point. So, that is the essence of what is contained in the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta.

Now, if we think a bit more about this Wheel of Dhamma, many things in the world exist as a wheel. The wheel of time (kāla-cakka). If we think about the wheel of time, let us first think about a day. At the end of the daytime, there is the night. At the end of the night, there is the daytime. This is how the wheel of time operates within a day. Thus it goes on through days, weeks, months, and years. Finally, in terms of aeons (kalpa). Even if we look at aeons, there too, the Dhamma mentions aeons of contraction and expansion (saṁvaṭṭa-vivaṭṭa kalpa). There is a cyclical form concerning this world. A wheel of time operates in that manner.

It is the same with the wheel of authority (āṇā-cakka). The wheel of authority is—like in ancient times, by the beating of drums, or let's say when a rebellion arose in a neighboring province, a king would send his ministers and generals to suppress it, and after they returned, they would report back. Then they would be given gifts and rewards. That reporting back. There too, the wheel rolls out and returns. It is a similar thing here. So, how was this reported back at the end of the Wheel of Dhamma? That is what is mentioned at the end of this sutta: “ayañca dasasahassī lokadhātu saṅkampi sampakampi sampavedhi, appamāṇo ca uḷāro obhāso loke pāturahosi atikkammeva devānaṁ devānubhāvaṁ”—so the sutta concludes. Just like that reporting back, through the shaking of this entire ten-thousand-fold world system and the spreading of this boundless, magnificent light, it became evident to the world that this Wheel of Dhamma had been set in motion. The wheel of authority is also like that.

There is another matter. You may have heard about kings in the Dhamma stories—in this day and age, some people might not believe it. But if we speak of the Buddha's words, for example, there is the Mahāsudassana Jātaka. The Buddha speaks of a Wheel-turning Monarch (cakkavatti) named Mahāsudassana in the Mahāparinibbāna Sutta as well. Mention is made of a kingdom called Kusāvatī.

Wonderful, miraculous things are mentioned there concerning the Wheel-turning Monarch Mahāsudassana of the past. The Wheel-Treasure (cakka-ratana) that arises for such a king. It is said that the Wheel-Treasure appears to a Wheel-turning Monarch on a Uposatha day, when he has ascended to the upper terrace of his palace and is observing the eight precepts of the Uposatha. It is with the help of this Wheel-Treasure that he conquers the four quarters, the entire world. This is how it is mentioned in the Dhamma. A Wheel-turning Monarch is described as dhammiko dhammarāja—a righteous king. There is a concept of a righteous reign. The Wheel-Treasure is one of the seven treasures that arise for such a highly meritorious king. In the account of King Mahāsudassana, it is mentioned that since he had heard previously that such a Wheel-Treasure arises only to a Wheel-turning Monarch, he sprinkled water on the Wheel-Treasure from a ceremonial vessel and made a determination: “May this Wheel-Treasure roll forth.” That Wheel-Treasure rolled forth to the four quarters, and the kings of those various countries accepted the sovereignty of this Wheel-turning Monarch and became his subjects. They became subjects not through war, as is mentioned there. Even though he went with a fourfold army, how did the Wheel-turning Monarch subdue them? By establishing them in the five precepts (pañca-sīla).

“Do not destroy life. Do not steal. Do not commit sexual misconduct. Do not lie. Do not drink intoxicants. You shall rule your own territory which belongs to you.” It is through these instructions that he subdues them. This is the kind of story mentioned regarding the Wheel-turning Monarch. But there too, it was said that the Wheel-Treasure is a highly miraculous Wheel-Treasure. It is described as sahassāraṁ sanābhikaṁ—that is, with a thousand spokes (ara), a rim, and a central hub. A great wheel with a thousand spokes, a rim, and a hub in the center. That wheel rolls forth, and the king and his army follow it. Sometimes, rolling even across oceans, having conquered the kingdoms of the four quarters, it finally returns and stands as if planted firmly in the capital city. There too, it is a turning. Just like the turning of the wheel of authority.

In accordance with that concept, you might remember the prophecy uttered by the ascetic Asita during the Bodhisatta's infancy. “If he remains in the lay life, he will become a Wheel-turning Monarch. If he goes forth, he will become a Fully Enlightened One (sammā-sambuddha).” So, you can understand what this Wheel of Dhamma means in relation to that concept of Supreme Enlightenment. That is why the Wheel of Dhamma is said to have three rounds and twelve aspects (tiparivaṭṭaṁ dvādasākāraṁ). The Wheel-Treasure of a Wheel-turning Monarch has a thousand spokes, a rim, and a hub, being complete in every way (sabbākārasampannaṁ). Similarly, this Wheel of Dhamma of the Tathagata, the Fully Enlightened One, concerning the Four Noble Truths, is tiparivaṭṭaṁ dvādasākāraṁ—three rounds, three revolutions, and twelve aspects according to the Four Noble Truths. So, that is the setting in motion of the Wheel-Treasure.

What is meant by dhammaccakkappavattana? Instead of the Wheel-Treasure of the Wheel-turning Monarch which crossed the ocean to other lands by the power of its motion, the Buddha's Wheel of Dhamma rolled upwards. The Wheel of Dhamma set in motion within His own mind-stream finally rolled upwards from the earth-dwelling deities through the heavens to the Brahma worlds, up to the Akanittha Brahma world. Next, it was that sound, reverberating as a great noise, through which light and other wonders spread throughout the world. In the same way, we can understand the value of this concept of the Wheel of Dhamma. Within the mind-stream, just as everything exists in a single wheel, within this Dependent Arising (paṭicca-samuppāda) too, there is this yaṁ kiñci samudayadhammaṁ—whatever is of the nature to arise, all that is of the nature to cease. This cyclical nature of the world shown by the Buddha is also expressed here through the setting in motion of the Wheel of Dhamma.

Thus, we can understand the transformation that took place in the world due to the setting in motion of the Wheel of Dhamma. The transformation in the mind-streams during the Buddha's time, and also through the spreading of the Dhamma across lands, the entire essence of the Dhamma is summarized within these Four Noble Truths. Everything can be gathered into the Four Noble Truths. Within it lies the law of Dhamma (dhamma-niyāma) related to Dependent Arising (paṭicca-samuppāda), namely: yaṁ kiñci samudayadhammaṁ sabbaṁ taṁ nirodhadhammaṁ. Therefore, due to this setting in motion of the Wheel of Dhamma, we especially commemorate the Esala Full Moon Poya Day as the occasion when the greatest transformation in the world took place.

In the world, there is the extreme that "everything exists". There is the extreme that "everything does not exist". There are two extremes called the view of eternalism (sassata-diṭṭhi) and the view of annihilation (uccheda-diṭṭhi). Bypassing both, the Buddha showed the path. Due to ignorance (avijjā) in their mind-streams, worldlings build up this mass of suffering called the five aggregates of grasping (pañcupādānakkhandhā), remaining trapped within them for a long time in this samsara. If at any point this ignorance is removed, then the preparations (Saṅkhāra (Preparations) caused by ignorance—the preparations arising through the view of self—are removed. It is due to those saṅkhāra that there arises the concept of two: "this world" and "this is I" (so loko, so attā).

Through that, a cycle of viññāṇa (consciousness) and nāmarūpa (name-and-form) is formed. It rotates like a whirlpool within the mind-stream. As a result of this, it proceeds through Taṇhā (Craving) and upādāna (grasping/holding/fuel) towards Bhava (Becoming). It is a transformation leading to Nibbāna—which is the cessation of bhava—that the Buddha presented through this Dhamma. Many people consider this Wheel of Dhamma merely as an ordinary symbol. But one must contemplate the depth within it. The Buddha had the capacity, through the powers He possessed, to become a Wheel-turning Monarch.

On one occasion, when a Brahmin named Sela saw the Buddha, he uttered a series of stanzas in wonderful praise of the Buddha. This is mentioned in the Dhamma as the Sela Sutta. As soon as the Brahmin Sela heard the word “Buddha”—that a Buddha had appeared—such great faith arose in him that he asked Keniya, the ascetic who had told him the news: “Buddhoti bho Keniya vadesi?” (“Did you say 'Buddha', Keniya?”). “Buddhoti bho Sela vadāmi.” (“'Buddha', indeed, I say, Sela.”). After repeating this, great faith arose, and seeing the thirty-two marks of a Great Man (mahāpurisa-lakkhaṇa) on the Buddha's body, out of deep devotion, the Brahmin Sela said: “Rājā arahati bhavituṁ” (“You are worthy to be a king, a Wheel-turning Monarch, and as a Wheel-turning Monarch, you should subdue the entire world to yourself”), expressing this out of his faith. At that moment, the Buddha replied: “Rājāhamasmi Sela.” (“I am indeed a king, Sela.”) “Rājāhamasmi Sela, dhammarājā anuttaro.” (“I am a king, Sela, the supreme King of Dhamma.”)

Consider this: some might think that when the Buddha says this, referencing the concept of kingship, it might lead to a reduction in respect towards the Buddha. But the Buddha introduced Himself: “I am the King of Dhamma.” Not a Wheel-turning Monarch of that sort. He told the Brahmin Sela: “Rājāhamasmi Sela, dhammarājā anuttaro.” The supreme King of Dhamma. “I indeed am the king.” Next, the Brahmin Sela did not stop there. He asked: “Then who is your general?” “My general is Sariputta.” “Sariputta rolls the wheel after me.” That is why the chief disciple, Venerable Sariputta, is called the Dhammasenāpati (General of the Dhamma). That we refer to the Buddha as Buddharāja or Dhammarāja—the King of Dhamma—is according to His own words. Similarly, referring to him as Dhammasenāpati is also according to that concept of kingship. From this, we can understand that the alternative path available to our Lord of the Triple World was to become a Wheel-turning Monarch. Instead, He became a Dhammarāja.

So, the status of a Wheel-turning Monarch is what the worldly consider to be the highest position. Thinking from a worldly perspective, in an era when a Buddha does not appear, a Wheel-turning Monarch enjoys the highest pleasures in the world. These are mentioned in the Dhamma in a way that is unbelievable to some—pleasures lasting eighty-four thousand years. It shows that they lived a righteous life at the lay level, but with a wonderful luxury that would make those who live luxurious lives today feel ashamed. Thus, it is the highest concept of the lay world. One can easily think of a lay person as a king who conquers the entire world, subduing the whole world merely by establishing them in the five precepts—there is a wonderful concept within the Wheel-turning Monarch concept.

Yet, it is due to a great mass of merit (puññakkhandha) that on a Uposatha day, while observing the precepts on the upper terrace of the palace, these seven treasures, including the Wheel-Treasure, arise for such a king. The Buddha, however, attained the supramundane (lokuttara), supreme state of a King of Dhamma, which surpasses that. That is what He declared to the Brahmin Sela: “I am the King of Dhamma, the supreme King of Dhamma. My general is Sariputta. This Wheel of Dhamma that I have set in motion, Sariputta rolls it further." Also, you can think of another sutta among these discourses which serves as a reason, namely the Saccavibhaṅga Sutta of the Majjhima Nikāya. On one occasion, the Buddha assigned the chief disciple, Venerable Sariputta, to analyze this sutta which He had preached in brief—the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta. Venerable Sariputta presented a detailed analysis of it. The Buddha approved of this. Then we can understand from Dhamma literature that the General of Dhamma rolled that Wheel of Dhamma further, in accordance with what the Buddha had set in motion.

Accordingly, we must understand that what we have to roll now is this very Wheel of Dhamma within our own mind-streams. To roll that Wheel of Dhamma, we must bring about that aforementioned transformation. Nowadays, everyone talks about attaining Stream-entry (sotāpanna) and ending samsara. Everyone who comes to us says: "I do not want to be born again." But some have mistaken the path to it. There are those who say that if someone keeps the five precepts properly, by that alone they are a Stream-enterer. In defining certain states, sometimes its essential basic requirements are mentioned, along with ancillary factors. Ancillary means not directly, but additional matters are also pointed out by the Buddha. Taking hold of such parts, some people think that if someone keeps the five precepts properly, they have become a Stream-enterer by that alone. But from this very Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta, we can see the transformation that occurred, expressed in a few words regarding Venerable Kondañña: yaṁ kiñci samudayadhammaṁ sabbaṁ taṁ nirodhadhammaṁ. Therefore, attaining the Fruit of Stream-entry is a major transformation that occurs internally, within the mind-stream.

How does that happen? If we contemplate according to the Dhamma, not only from this sutta but also with the help of other Dhamma discourses, it happens through a deep disillusionment (nibbidā), a disgust towards this suffering we are grasping as the five aggregates of grasping (pañcupādānakkhandhā). This is called nibbidā. On certain occasions, the Buddha declared the fundamental principle to distinguish between Dhamma and non-Dhamma. If something is non-Dhamma, non-Vinaya, the Buddha makes this statement: "Netaṁ ekanta-nibbidāya, virāgāya, nirodhāya, abhiññāya, sambodhāya, nibbānāya saṁvattati" ("This does not lead to complete disillusionment, to fading away (dispassion), to cessation, to direct knowledge, to self-awakening, to Nibbāna").

From this, we can understand that if it is the Dhamma, it must lead to that nibbidā—samsaric disillusionment. It must lead to dispassion (virāga). That is the principle to identify whether something is Dhamma or non-Dhamma. Accordingly, we can understand—just as it arose within the ascetic Kondañña at that moment—there was absolutely no question regarding the pleasure of the five cords of sensual desire. There was only the question of attakilamathānuyoga (self-mortification). He must have realized, by hearing the words bhava-taṇhā and vibhava-taṇhā, that this too was based on the view of self (atta-diṭṭhi). We cannot comprehend the capacity of their understanding. We can only give a slight hint. Such noble ones were complete with merit. But as far as we can see according to the law of Dhamma, without clinging to such narrow viewpoints, the insight (vipassanā) taught by the Buddha is presented in three special words. For us Buddhists, it is familiar to the tongue. Even if it is unfamiliar to the heart, it is familiar to the tongue. Whatever happens, we say: “aniccaṁ, dukkhaṁ, anattā”. We are used to it almost like a song. But this must sink deep into that depth, so that samsaric disillusionment is completed. If some things are done partially, that transformation does not take place.

Now, we also spoke about this Dhamma: through the attainment of Stream-entry, which is called the state of a trainee (sekha), the initial vision is obtained. What is meant by sotāpanna? We often hear even those words being explained in a distorted manner. Sota does not mean “ear”; sota means a stream, a current. If a log of wood falls into the water of a river, it flows down to the ocean and stops there. The state of having entered that stream of Dhamma so firmly is what is called sotāpanna. One has joined the stream of Dhamma. Going outside the stream of Dhamma, or going against it, is the momentum of the world. That is what happens within the pleasure of the five cords of sensual desire. The stream of preparations (saṅkhāra) caused by ignorance—whether meritorious or demeritorious—builds up these five aggregates of grasping. That indeed is what is called Taṇhā (Craving). It arises again and again. At the moment of death, the grasping (upādāna) caused by that unabandoned craving presents karma: “kammaṁ khettaṁ, viññāṇaṁ bījaṁ, taṇhā sineho”—in the manner that karma is the field, viññāṇa (consciousness) is the seed, and Taṇhā (Craving) is the moisture; sprouting thus, we go on this samsaric journey.

If we are to end that, according to the hints given by the Buddha, one must follow that line of thought that leads to nibbidā, samsaric disillusionment, and dispassion (virāga) which is non-attachment. Yogis would know that these three characteristics (tilakkhaṇa) are shown in various ways of contemplation: sometimes as three, as eleven, as eighteen, or as forty-odd, depending on how these three characteristics are understood by each individual. Where they are shown as eleven, they are: aniccatoti, dukkhatoti, rogatoti, gaṇḍatoti, sallatoti, aghatoti, ābādhatoti, paratoti, palokatoti, suññatoti, anattatoti—and so on. This shows how it is understood by each individual. The five aggregates of grasping—each aggregate must be contemplated as impermanent (anicca), as suffering (dukkha), as a disease, as a tumor, as a dart, as a calamity, as an affliction, as alien, as disintegrating, as empty, as non-self (anattā), in various ways so that a turning away arises.

What is shown through various meditations like the meditation on foulness (asubha-bhāvanā) is the method to generate that aforementioned nibbidā. Why should we generate nibbidā? Complete disillusionment. It is when complete disillusionment (nibbidā) arises that non-attachment (virāga) comes about.

Through non-attachment, dispassion is attained. Liberation, which is close by, is revealed through dispassion. It is through dispassion that the door to liberation is opened. Through liberation, there is the letting go of these five aggregates of grasping. It is not an active letting go, but it gets let go of to some extent. If a dead rat snake carcass or a dog carcass falls onto the shoulders of someone who likes to be well-dressed, they do not make an effort—spontaneously, as it were, they shake their shoulders and throw it off. In the same way, if the mind, through those methods of meditation, personally experiences the five aggregates of grasping as impermanent, suffering, and non-self—if each of these is understood as a great suffering, a trouble, a dart, a tumor, a disease, an affliction, as belonging to others, as something that breaks, as empty, as hollow—then, at that moment, a great disillusionment arises through direct experience, and the five aggregates of grasping are let go of. It is by that letting go that one touches liberation. That is what is called touching Nibbāna, personally experiencing Nibbāna.

What is meant by extinguishment? If those are the burnings, where that burning is absent, there is extinguishment (Nibbāna. Many people have made a plaything of this word Nibbāna. Thinking of it as some other world, they conceptualize Nibbāna in a way that increases the craving for becoming (bhava-taṇhā). But within the Dhamma, the Truth of Cessation (nirodha-sacca) is the very destruction of that craving: tassāyeva taṇhāya asesavirāganirodho. The remainderless fading away and cessation of that very craving, its abandoning. It is nothing other than that.

That matter is found within the Four Noble Truths themselves. If this becoming (bhava), these five aggregates of grasping, arise due to certain causes and conditions, then, where those causes and conditions are absent, there indeed is Nibbāna. That is what we have to understand. The path to it is the Noble Eightfold Path. Even there, it is not a matter of developing it marginally or retail-wise; it is the occasion when it is completed in depth at the moment of the Path and Fruit (magga-phala). At that single moment, all eight factors of the Noble Eightfold Path—just like a path that was crooked until then becomes straight—arise powerfully from Right View to Right Concentration, in a single moment, in a single mind-moment. That Truth of the Path is what arises in that mind at the stage of the Path of Stream-entry, Once-returning, Non-returning, and Arahatship. The Noble Eightfold Path, which was developed little by little until then, becomes straight and emerges as a powerful Noble Concentration (ariya-samādhi) in a single moment. It is through that Noble Concentration that the five aggregates of grasping are let go of. Through that letting go, one experiences a state of cessation of becoming (bhava-nirodha) in this very life (diṭṭheva dhamme). There indeed is liberation. That is liberation. So, we must understand that this is what we should target. We must remove those wrong concepts. Stream-entry is not a story about sota falling into the ear or eye. A simile is given: like a log of wood that has fallen into a river going to the ocean. If that direct experience is obtained, that is the trainee (sekha). From then onwards, the completed state is called the non-trainee (asekha). When this Wheel of Dhamma is turned four times in four stages on the path leading to Arahatship—when those three characteristics are powerfully developed and turned four times—there indeed is Supreme Enlightenment.

At that stage, the Buddha said He was purified. Although that state is not as all-encompassing as Supreme Enlightenment (sammā-sambodhi), the history of the Sasana is proof that one can realize it within Arahatship through one's own capacity. You, on a day like today, must recognize that Wheel of Dhamma. You must know where to turn it. Not from country to country, from land to land, as the Wheel-turning Monarch turned it. It must be turned within one's own mind-stream, in four ways, in four manners, at four stages. Then, the reverberation of that—the supremacy of that Wheel of Dhamma—spread up to the Akanittha Brahma world at that moment.

Thus, on this valuable day, we commemorated the core meaning, the essence within the preaching of the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta in Isipatana, Varanasi. We must renew that today. In accordance with that Wheel of Dhamma, to shape our lives, may the virtue (sīla) observed, the meditation practiced, and the Dhamma heard up to this point, definitely serve as a cause and support (hetu-upanissaya) for all of you. I wish.

May all beings from the Avici hell up to the Akanittha Brahma world rejoice in the mass of merit accumulated through this preaching of Dhamma and listening to Dhamma. By rejoicing in it, may they make it a support to realize the supreme, great, deathless Nibbāna through a Bodhi of their aspiration. Likewise, to maintain this Sasana for a long time, may you all, with a correct understanding of this Wheel of Dhamma, by fulfilling virtue, concentration, and wisdom (sīla, samādhi, paññā), if you have those aspirations, realize the supreme, great, deathless Nibbāna in this very life through the realization of the paths of Stream-entry, Once-returning, Non-returning, and Arahatship, and be released from all samsaric suffering! May you be free from suffering! Chant this stanza.

Dhammapada 277–279 (Magga-vaggamu)

Dear Listeners,

The honor of being the first member of the Sangha community established by the Tathāgata, the Fully Self-Awakened One, belongs to the Great Arahant Aññā Koṇḍañña. For this very reason, the Buddha bestowed upon him the chief position (etadagga) among the monks of long standing (rattaññū). "Monk of long standing," devotees, means a monk who has spent many nights, many days—that is to say, a long period of time—in this Dispensation. The oldest monk. Furthermore, as you have heard, the honor also belongs to the Great Arahant Aññā Koṇḍañña as the monk who was the very first among human beings to realize the fruit of Stream-entry (sotāpatti-phala) upon listening to the Buddha's first Dhamma sermon.

According to the Theragāthā Commentary, this Great Arahant Aññā Koṇḍañña was one who had fulfilled the perfections (pāramīs) in the dispensations of past Buddhas in order to achieve this chief position. Thus, even before our Buddha appeared in the world, Ven. Koṇḍañña was born into an eminent family in the Brahmin village named Doṇavatthu, close to the city of Kapilavastu. By his clan name, he was known as Koṇḍañña. Later, when the Bodhisatta passed away from the Tusita heaven and was born as the son of King Suddhodana, on the auspicious occasion of the naming ceremony, one hundred and eight Brahmins were invited to the palace. Among them, by that time, the Brahmin Koṇḍañña had mastered the three Vedas and the science of physiognomy (body marks) to their absolute limit. Not only was the Brahmin Koṇḍañña included among those one hundred and eight, but out of those, only eight were assigned the task of examining the prince's bodily marks and giving him a name. The eight Brahmins assigned to this important task were Rāma, Dhaja, Lakkhaṇa, Mantī, Koṇḍañña, Bhoja, Suyama, and Sudatta. Among these eight, the Brahmin Koṇḍañña was the youngest. Then, as described there, after examining the marks, all the other seven Brahmins raised two fingers and declared: "If he remains in the lay life, he will become a Wheel-turning monarch (cakkavatti). If he renounces, he will become a Buddha." However, the Brahmin Koṇḍañña raised only one finger and said: "This prince will definitely attain supreme self-awakening (sambodhi)."

So, after those auspicious ceremonies were over, those seven Brahmins went to their respective homes and told their children: "By the time this prince attains Buddhahood, we will not be alive. Therefore, when a Dispensation is established, you at least must ordain in the Dispensation of that Buddha." Having said this, it was not long before they passed away. Then, as we have all heard, at the age of twenty-nine, Prince Siddhartha made the Great Renunciation. Having renounced and gradually making his way, by the time he began practicing self-mortification (duṣkarakriyā) in the Uruvelā district, the Brahmin Koṇḍañña went to the homes of the other Brahmins and told their children: "If your fathers were alive, they would ordain at this moment. Therefore, I have now resolved to ordain following that Great Being, that noble prince. If you also wish, join me." Only four of them came forward. Accordingly, in addition to the Brahmin Koṇḍañña, the other Brahmins—Bhaddiya, Vappa, Mahānāma, and Assaji—who are known to everyone as the "Group of Five Monks" (pañcavaggiya), set out and went to the Uruvelā district, where they attended upon our Bodhisatta for six years during his practice of self-mortification.

Next, as you may have also heard, when the Buddha practiced self-mortification and realized its futility, he entered upon the Middle Path, abandoned those painful austerities, and inclined toward a balanced life. Accordingly, unlike how he had previously rejected food, he then went for alms in search of solid food. Seeing this, the group of five monks became disillusioned. They thought, "Now this ascetic Gotama has abandoned effort and has turned to a life of abundance," and having become disillusioned, they abandoned him and went to Isipatana in Varanasi (Benares).

Meanwhile, as everyone has heard, on the full moon day of Vesak, the Buddha attained supreme self-awakening in this manner, spent the seven weeks at the foot of the Bodhi tree, and due to the invitation of Brahma and other matters, made the determination to teach the Dhamma. He then contemplated to whom he should first preach this Dhamma. First, the ascetic Āḷāra Kālāma came to his mind. You have heard that when the Buddha first went in search of teachers, he first took Āḷāra Kālāma as his teacher. When he thought about it, unfortunately, the ascetic Āḷāra Kālāma had passed away a week earlier. Next, he thought of the ascetic Uddaka Rāmaputta. He too had passed away the previous night. It was only after that that the Buddha thought, "I must go in search of the group of five monks who were of great help to me. They will be able to understand this Dhamma." From that point onward, many of the details are mentioned in a wonderful way in the Buddha's own words in the Ariya Pariyesana Sutta.

The Buddha says: "When I set out and approached Isipatana in Varanasi, the group of five monks saw me from afar and made an agreement among themselves: 'Here comes the ascetic Gotama, who abandoned his striving and has now turned to a luxurious life. Let us not pay homage or show respect to him. Let us not go forward to receive his bowl and robes, but let us only set out a seat; if he wishes, let him sit.' Despite making such an agreement," the Buddha declares, "as I came closer and closer, those five monks were unable to keep to their agreement. Some came forward and received my bowl and robes. Another prepared a seat. Another prepared water to wash my feet." However, those five addressed the Buddha using the term of address 'āvuso' (friend/brother). "They addressed him by name as 'Avuso Gotama' and in the manner of 'Avuso'." Then the Buddha said to the group of five monks: "Monks, do not address the Tathāgata by the name 'āvuso'. I have attained supreme self-awakening (sammā sambodhi), I have attained the Deathless—Nibbāna. Therefore, listen, I shall teach the Dhamma."

Then those five said: "When you did not attain Buddhahood through such severe austerities, how can you attain it through this lax lifestyle?" and they did not accept it. A second time the Buddha spoke. A second time the group of five monks rejected it. A third time he spoke. But a third time too they rejected it. At that moment, the Buddha did not perform any other miracle, but rather the miracle of truth. He asked: "Monks, did I ever speak to you in this manner before?" At that moment, faith arose in the group of five monks, and addressing him as "Venerable Sir" (bhante), they accepted it. It was after that, as you have heard, that he preached the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta not only to the group of five monks but also to the devas, Brahmas, and others. At the end of that sutta discourse, because the monk Koṇḍañña attained the fruit of Stream-entry, you will find a passage in the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta where the Buddha uttered an inspired utterance (udāna): "Aññāsi vata bho Koṇḍañño, aññāsi vata bho Koṇḍañño!" That means,

"Koṇḍañña has indeed understood, has comprehended, has realized the Dhamma." It was through this that Ven. Koṇḍañña received the name "Aññā Koṇḍañña."

Then it is mentioned that at one time, the Buddha bestowed upon Ven. Koṇḍañña the chief position (etadagga) among the monks of long standing, as mentioned before. However, as the nature of Ven. Koṇḍañña is shown to us, he was extremely humble. The chief disciples, such as Sāriputta and Moggallāna, would constantly pay homage and respect to him as an elder. He rejected all of this, and in order to dwell devoted to meditation, he lived for twelve years in a solitary place in the Himalayas known by the name Chaddanta, receiving service from elephants, as recorded in the books. It is said that even Sakka came to him during that time to engage in Dhamma discussions. The verses we have taken as our theme, according to what is stated in that book, were uttered by him while residing there, having observed how the minds of worldlings (puthujjana) behave, and demonstrating the Dhamma method and the Dhamma path to conquer them. Let us look at their meaning.

Bahūni loke vicitrāni asmiṁ paṭhavimaṇḍale

Mathenti maññe saṅkappaṁ subhaṁ rāgūpasaṁhitaṁ

"There are many variegated things, variegated objects in this world, or rather, on this earthly sphere. These—I think—agitate the lustful intentions and thoughts (saṅkappa) arisen due to the perception of beauty (subha-saññā)." Then he says:

Rajamūhatāñca vātena yathā meghopasammaye

Evaṁ sammanti saṅkappā yadā paññāya passati

"Just as the dust raised by the wind is calmed by a great rain cloud, so too do those defiled thoughts and intentions (saṅkappa) calm down at whatever time one sees with wisdom." Having said this, next, the method of seeing with wisdom is mentioned by quoting the three very famous verses related to the Three Characteristics (tilakkhaṇa), which you have heard so often.

Sabbe saṅkhārā aniccāti yadā paññāya passati

Atha nibbindati dukkhe esa maggo visuddhiyā

"At whatever time one sees with wisdom that every saṅkhāra (formation) is Anicca (Impermanent), at that moment one becomes disillusioned with Dukkha (Suffering). This itself is the path to purity." In the next verse, there is only a slight difference:

Sabbe saṅkhārā dukkhāti yadā paññāya passati

Atha nibbindati dukkhe esa maggo visuddhiyā

"At whatever time one sees with wisdom that every saṅkhāra (formation) is Dukkha (suffering), at that moment one becomes disillusioned with this dukkha—that is to say, the dukkha of the five aggregates of grasping (pañcupādānakkhandha). 'Nibbindati' means to become disillusioned. This is the path to purity." Now, the third verse is slightly different from this:

Sabbe dhammā anattāti yadā paññāya passati

Atha nibbindati dukkhe esa maggo visuddhiyā

"At whatever time one sees with wisdom that all dhammas (all things / phenomena) are Anattā (not-self) , then one becomes disillusioned with this dukkha of the five aggregates of grasping. This is the path to purity." Thus he uttered these three verses. Now, these Dhamma points are worth discussing a little. Here, he indicates the Three Characteristics through these three verses. He declared that it is precisely by means of the Three Characteristics that those defiled thoughts and intentions can be conquered. At the same time, some people raise a question: "Why did the Brahmin Koṇḍañña not believe when the Buddha attained self-awakening, even though he had predicted in the past that this prince would definitely become a Buddha?" Someone might raise such a question. But what we have to understand is that the idea prevalent among most people at that time was that in order to realize Nibbāna, one must subject the body to pain—self-mortification (attakilamathānuyoga). That is why they became disillusioned and left. They did not know anything about a "Middle Path". However, we can understand that the Buddha must have preached the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta in that manner precisely to dispel this wrong view of the group of five monks. Because, as you know, the most fundamental point of the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta is the showing of two extremes: devotion to sensual pleasures (kāmasukhallikānuyoga) and devotion to self-mortification (attakilamathānuyoga). Without going to either, the Buddha presented the Noble Eightfold Path at that time, stating, "I have discovered a Middle Path." Therefore, among the five, the monk Koṇḍañña attained the fruit of Stream-entry because he understood before the others that the prediction he had given in his childhood had indeed come true.

Later, the Buddha himself once made this amazing statement: "During the remaining days, this is how I trained these five for Arahantship. I did this: I would instruct two of them, while the other three went for alms. On the food brought by those three, all six of us would survive. The next day, I would instruct three of them, while two went for alms. On the alms-food brought by those two, all six of us would subsist." In this way, the Buddha trained all five of them, and then, as you have heard, it was when he preached the Anattalakkhaṇa Sutta that all five of them attained Arahantship. Therefore, the Anattalakkhaṇa Sutta helps us to understand these Three Characteristics. For that reason, we will present it briefly on this occasion, because it is very closely connected to the life of Ven. Koṇḍañña. He became an Arahant by listening to this Anattalakkhaṇa Sutta.

The meaning of the words "Anatta Lakkhaṇa" is the characteristic of Anattā (Not-self). So, the word Anattā (not-self) was placed at the forefront by the Buddha in that discourse. The Buddha began it in this way. Straight away, the Buddha says to the five: "Monks, form (rūpa) is anattā. If form were self, this form would not lead to affliction. We should be able to say to form: 'Let my form be thus; let my form not be thus,' according to my wish. But this cannot be said, and form cannot be tamed in this way. Therefore, monks, form is anattā."

Then the Buddha declared the same concerning form (rūpa), feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), preparations (saṅkhāra), and consciousness (viññāṇa)—the five aggregates of grasping (pañcupādānakkhandha). Then he asked those five:

"Monks, is form permanent (nicca) or impermanent (anicca)?"

"Impermanent, Venerable Sir," they replied.

"If something is impermanent, is it ease (sukha) or suffering (dukkha)?"

"It is suffering, Venerable Sir," they replied.

"If something is impermanent, suffering, and subject to change, is it fit to conceptualize it in terms of craving (taṇhā), conceit (māna), and views (diṭṭhi) as: 'etāṁ mama, esohamasmi, eso me attā'—'This is mine, this I am, this is my self'?"

Then those five said: "No, Venerable Sir."

Accordingly, the Buddha made them realize the Three Characteristics, and showed them what ought to be done. Concerning the five aggregates of grasping—an "aggregate" (khandha) means a heap or collection, and eleven factors are gathered into this heap: past, future, present, internal, external, gross, subtle, inferior, superior, far, and near. In these eleven ways, one can think about this aggregate of form. Thoughts can arise, and this is what is grasped by the mind as "my aggregate of form." Therefore, one should contemplate all these eleven aspects through comprehensive investigation (sammasana) in this manner:

“Netāṁ mama” — This is not mine. “Nesohamasmi” — This I am not. “Na meso attā” — This is not my self.

When the Buddha declared that it must be seen with wisdom in this manner, it is seen that at the conclusion of this discourse, those five attained Arahantship.

From this, we can understand the great wonder contained within these Three Characteristics of anicca, dukkha, and anattā. First, let us raise a problem that many people have. In the first two verses, it was said: "Sabbe saṅkhārā aniccā" (All preparations are impermanent) and "Sabbe saṅkhārā dukkhā" (All preparations are suffering). But in the third verse, it says: "Sabbe dhammā anattā" (All dhammas are anattā). This is a big problem even for scholars. It says all preparations (saṅkhāra) are impermanent. By seeing them as suffering, one develops disillusionment (nibbidā) toward the five aggregates of grasping; this is the path to purity. Next, it speaks of them as suffering—the suffering of preparations (saṅkhāra-dukkha). Thirdly, it says: "Sabbe dhammā anattā." What is meant by

"dhammā" there is a problem for many. We can get a clue about this. You might have heard of the Girimānanda Sutta. In it, the Buddha points out ten perceptions (saññā): the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā), the perception of anattā (anattā-saññā), the perception of unattractiveness (asubha-saññā), the perception of danger (ādīnava-saññā), and so forth.

The Buddha explains the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā) in terms of the five aggregates of grasping: form is impermanent, feeling is impermanent, etc. But the perception of anattā (anattā-saññā) is explained there in terms of the six sense bases (āyatana). What are the six sense bases? The eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind. The eye is anattā, forms are anattā; the ear is anattā, sounds are anattā; in that manner, the perception of anattā is structured. The last one to come is: "mano anattā, dhammā anattā" — the mind is anattā, and mind-objects (dhammā) are anattā. There is a deep point here. Because, in the end, what has to be regarded as anattā is the very object that comes to the mind. This is a very deep place in the Dhamma. Because, as the Buddha has shown in certain places, the Middle Path in this Dhamma does not consist merely in being free from the two extremes of sensual indulgence and self-mortification. In many places, the Buddha's Middle Path is shown with much deeper meanings than that. We have pointed out the reason for this on many occasions. The Dependent Arising (paṭicca-samuppāda) is its depth. Underneath lies the law of Dependent Arising. Thus, according to Dependent Arising, ultimate liberation lies in not grasping anything. So, in certain places, the Buddha points out: "nissāya nissāya oghassa nittharaṇā" (crossing the flood by depending on one thing after another). This means: "One has to cross over this flood of Saṁsāra by using certain things as support." That is to say, one crosses over using them as support, but one does not take them along, grasping and clinging to them, to Nibbāna.

For this, even though it does not belong to the Buddha's time but to the later Visuddhimagga and other texts, there is a simile. Since we spoke of a rapid current of water, here is an appropriate one. Sometimes, during the rainy season when the water of a stream flows rapidly, if there is no way to cross, there is one method: one clings to a creeper hanging from a tree on this side and swings well. Having swung back and forth and gained the necessary momentum, as soon as one reaches the other side with that momentum, one does not keep holding onto it. One lets go. When one lets go, one lands on the other side. It is such a thing that is found in this Dhamma. That is its deepest side. Indeed, scholars of the past point out that there is a wonderful Middle Path in this Dhamma. That is, one makes use of tranquility (samatha). "Samatha" means utilizing concentration (samādhi) as a support. But one does not grasp concentration either. One does not cling to it. If one develops craving (taṇhā) for it, one gets stuck there too. Similarly, in insight (vipassanā), one makes use of preparations (saṅkhāra). As we said, in tranquility, one attains concentration. Using that concentration as a support, one develops insight, and in the end, just like breaking through concentration, this Nibbāna is something that penetrates through that as well.

Next, what are called preparations (saṅkhāra) in insight: every time one directs the mind to the five aggregates of grasping, something comes to the mind. Whether it is regarding forms or regarding feelings, every such moment is like something bubbling up. These are called preparations. Because they perform the function of preparing and conditioning. Thus, the word saṅkhāra is described in some places in this manner: "saṅkhataṁ abhisaṅkharontī ti saṅkhārā" (they prepare and condition the prepared, hence they are called preparations). "Saṅkhata" means that which is prepared or conditioned. Then, it is the preparations that bring the prepared to the state of being prepared. This is the important point there. Thus, what is done by preparations is that through preparations, something is prepared; it is brought to the state of being prepared (saṅkhata). The Buddha points out: "Behold, all preparations (saṅkhāra) are impermanent." Ordinary worldlings regard all these preparations as permanent. But they are impermanent. Likewise, they are fraught with suffering (dukkha).

Next, finally, he points out the objects that come to the mind. In passages like "manopubbaṅgamā dhammā" (mind precedes all phenomena), we see that mind is the forerunner. It is by the mind itself that these dhammas (phenomena) are prepared. Therefore, even the dhammas have to be abandoned. Now, as a matter of common parlance, we say "Nibbāna," "going to Nibbāna," or "one must journey quickly to Nibbāna." But there is a wonderful thing in this Dhamma. In the end, one does not grasp even the concept of Nibbāna—the term "Nibbāna". There is an extremely deep sutta called the Mūlapariyāya Sutta, which points out that one does not tightly grasp any concept, not even Nibbāna, but only uses it as a support.

We can understand this point through "Sabbe dhammā anattā" (All dhammas are anattā - not-self). There are various other similes for this. You might have heard of a highly valuable simile used by the Buddha in the Alagaddūpama Sutta—the simile of the raft. The Buddha declares: "Kullūpamo bhikkhave mayā dhammo desito" — "Monks, I have taught this Dhamma as comparable to a raft." "Nittharaṇatthāya no gahaṇatthāya" — "For the purpose of crossing over, not for the purpose of grasping (carrying it on one's back)." The Buddha presents the simile there in a wonderful way. A person comes to a stretch of water, which could be a large river, with the intention of crossing over. But there is neither a boat nor a bridge. Then what does this person do? He collects grass, twigs, branches, and leaves from the trees around, binds them together with creepers to make a raft, and making an effort with his hands and feet, somehow crosses over to the other side. Once he has crossed, the purpose of the raft is over. He abandons it and goes on. In the same way, the Buddha presented this Dhamma. We make use of these concepts, words, etc., as support. But in the end, we are told to abandon them too. This is a wonderful thing. In this journey, one thing has to be used to support another. One cannot abandon everything all at once.

Nor can one grasp it. Right there lies the depth of this Dhamma. This is where it differs from all other religions. One cannot grasp everything, nor can one abandon everything. Abandoning everything is what is found in attakilamathānuyoga (self-mortification). Clinging to everything is what is found in kāmasukhallikānuyoga (sensual indulgence), looking at it from that perspective. But if one contemplates more deeply, this journey to Nibbāna is presented in the structure of that simile of crossing the river.

On another occasion, a valuable point raised through a discussion among disciples, which is a highly valuable sutta showing this idea of crossing over by using various things as support, is the Rathavinīta Sutta of the Majjhima Nikāya. The simile in it is that of King Kosala when he had to make an urgent journey from Sāvatthī to Sāketa. In those days, there were horse chariots—but one could not travel with a single chariot. The horses would get tired. Therefore, for an urgent journey, horse chariots were kept ready at various stages for the king's urgent travel. So, King Kosala leaves the inner palace and gets onto the first chariot. Having traveled to where the second chariot is, he leaves the first chariot. He gets onto the second chariot. Next, when he reaches the third chariot, he leaves the second and gets onto the third. Traveling in this manner, in the end, when he arrives at the city of Sāketa, if his relatives ask which chariot he came by, the king cannot say "by the first chariot," nor "by the second chariot," nor "by the third chariot." He has to tell the entire story. One supported the other. Finally, he has to alight even from the seventh chariot. That is the kind of thing the simile shows.

The disciples point out another seven stages of purification (visuddhi) for the realization of Nibbāna: purification of virtue (sīla-visuddhi), purification of mind (citta-visuddhi), purification of view (diṭṭhi-visuddhi), purification by overcoming doubt (kaṅkhāvitaraṇa-visuddhi), purification by knowledge and vision of what is and is not the path (maggāmagga-ñāṇadassana-visuddhi), purification by knowledge and vision of the way (paṭipadā-ñāṇadassana-visuddhi), and purification by knowledge and vision (ñāṇadassana-visuddhi). This purification of virtue is solely for the sake of purification of mind. Purification of mind is solely for the sake of purification of view. Purification of view is solely for the sake of purification by overcoming doubt. Purification by overcoming doubt is solely for the sake of purification by knowledge and vision of what is and is not the path. Purification by knowledge and vision of what is and is not the path is solely for the sake of purification by knowledge and vision of the way. Purification by knowledge and vision of the way is solely for the sake of purification by knowledge and vision. In this manner, seven stages of purification are shown. What is shown in the end? One does not grasp even the final purification by knowledge and vision. For what purpose does one develop purification by knowledge and vision? "Anupādā parinibbānatthāya" — for the sake of final extinguishment (*pariNibbāna through non-grasping (without fuel / holding / grasping).

This shows us that the ultimate goal of this Dispensation is not like joining with some substance, as in many other religions. It is not joining with a deity or some mystical substance of that sort. It is liberation (vimutti) itself. Therefore, for liberation, that Middle Path is necessary. Because, as we see from the simile of the chariots, what is needed from the chariots is momentum. In the end, these are employed solely to generate this momentum. If we call the strength and power developed through purification of virtue a momentum, that is purification of mind. From purification of mind to purification of view in that manner, this can be well understood through the simile of the chariots. Such is the nature of what is in this Dhamma. Therefore, looking at the final chapter, even those dhammas are abandoned. "Dhamma" means what we conceptualized as Nibbāna. Ordinary worldlings think of Nibbāna as a strange, new world where there is no birth (jāti), decay (jarā), and death (maraṇa). But what the Buddha shows here is not such a thing. All of these—birth (jāti), decay and death (jarā-maraṇa), and so forth—exist within Dependent Arising (paṭicca-samuppāda). All of these have arisen through causes and conditions (hetu-paccaya). Therefore, to be freed from these, what is to be done is—one cannot abandon everything at the beginning either. First, the Buddha points out the arising of conditions (paccaya-samudaya). The Buddha has highlighted both the causal arising that leads to bondage and the causal arising that leads to liberation. If these things go on, one supporting the other, it will finally end in Dukkha (Suffering). If one goes on in this way, these things coming together will finally end in liberation. Such a wonderful Dhamma is this.

Therefore, it is difficult for some people to understand when it is said that everything is abandoned. But the Buddha points out that these have a value like that of a raft, or like chariots running stage by stage. If one grasps something, within that grasping (upādāna), there is becoming (bhava). "Upādāna-paccayā bhavo" — with grasping as condition, becoming arises. It is through grasping itself that becoming is prepared. Therefore, it is when there is letting go and abandoning that there is the cessation of becoming (bhava-nirodha). The cessation of becoming is then what is called Nibbāna. The Buddha has shown on many occasions that the cessation of becoming itself is Nibbāna. Therefore, from the simile of the raft and the simile of the chariots, what we have to understand is that letting go itself leads to the cessation of becoming.

On another occasion, the Buddha has shown this Middle Path. That too is related to the simile of crossing a stream, called the Oghataraṇa Sutta. "Ogha" means the sweeping flood. The Buddha points out this entire Saṁsāra as the flood of sensuality (kāma-ogha), the flood of becoming (bhava-ogha), the flood of views (diṭṭhi-ogha), and the flood of ignorance (avijjā-ogha). One is swept away in these four sweeping floods. The question is how to cross over this. There too, struggling blindly does not work. Striving wildly is attakilamathānuyoga (self-mortification). The Buddha did that first. He struggled to cross this flood. That did not succeed either. Standing still, one is swept away. Therefore, there is a Middle Path. One can understand that in the case of such a sweeping flood, one has to cross over little by little, step by stage, using that very current to gain some momentum. Such is the way.

Next, the most special part of this sutta is the aforementioned Three Characteristics (tilakkhaṇa). How to apply these Three Characteristics practically in daily life is a question for many. This is shown as the Buddha's own words in many ways—this aggregate (khandha). What we call the heap of form, the aggregate of form, the aggregate of feeling, etc., which we grasp, was shown in eleven ways. Similarly, the Buddha has shown the way one should look at each aggregate in a manner that helps in developing the Three Characteristics: as impermanent (aniccato), as suffering (dukkhato), as a disease (rogato), as a boil/tumor (gaṇḍato), as a dart (sallato), as a calamity (aghato), as an affliction (ābādhato), as alien/other (parato), as disintegrating (palokato), as empty (suññato), and as not-self (anattato). Within these eleven modes is contained the very same Three Characteristics.

When it says "as impermanent" (aniccato), its meaning is: contemplate each aggregate, such as form and feeling, as impermanent (anicca). Investigate it. Next, there is "as suffering" (dukkhato). The aspect of disease also falls under the category of suffering; see it as a disease. Not only form, but even feeling, perception, etc., and including consciousness (viññāṇa)—everything. We usually think that this applies only to form when we speak of these eleven modes. But indeed, the Buddha asks us to apply this comprehensive investigation (sammasana) in eleven modes to all of the five aggregates of grasping (pañcupādānakkhandha): form, feeling, perception, preparations, and consciousness. Why? For the sake of developing disillusionment (nibbidā) toward them—it is through that disillusionment that comprehension and liberation arise.

Now, in these verses too, it was said: "yadā paññāya passati" — when one sees with wisdom. At whatever time one sees these as impermanent and as suffering through wisdom, then disillusionment (nibbidā) toward the suffering of the five aggregates of grasping arises. Therefore, as impermanent (aniccato), as suffering (dukkhato), as a disease (rogato)—disease too can be taken as suffering. A boil (gaṇḍato) too can be taken as suffering. "Aghato" means a wound—some people have festering wounds. Similarly, affliction (ābādhato) is directly suffering (dukkha). Next, there is "as alien" (parato)—which means to look at it as if looking at someone else's property. He asks us to look at it as if looking at another's thing, as alien (parato). "As disintegrating" (palokato) means as things that break; there too, impermanence (aniccata) is present. Damage/decay. Alien (parato), disintegrating (palokato). Next, "as empty" (suññato) relates to the vision of Anattā (Not-self). In many places, the Buddha has chosen the word "empty" as: "suññamidaṁ attena vā attaniyena vā" — empty of a self or of what belongs to a self. That vision is "empty" (suññato). Finally:

"As not-self" (anattato) — look at them as anattā. These are the eleven modes. The eleven modes mentioned earlier are for understanding what each aggregate is. It is so broad. It is broad in terms of past, future, present, etc. And the way to look at them is what was just mentioned.

If one gets used to applying that comprehensive investigation (sammasana) as impermanent (anicca) and as suffering (dukkha) based on the things one experiences in daily life, gradually that turning away (nirveda) and disillusionment (nibbidā) will grow. As a result of that, one can attain liberation. For those who have practiced this for a long time in past Saṁsāra, even a single sermon of the Buddha might be enough. But for others, they must practice and train in these Three Characteristics in daily life. One must see those things that are seen as impermanent, as suffering, and as Anattā (Not-self) according to the clues given by the Buddha. In some places, it is shown in an even broader manner—not just eleven, but in eighteen ways, in forty ways. This is called comprehensive investigation (sammasana). What the world does is misapprehension and clinging (parāmasana)—grasping tightly. Instead of that, one investigates (sammasana): "This is of such a nature." If one practices that in daily life, one can largely conquer those concepts in the mind. Concentration (samādhi) also helps with that in daily life.

So, you must make an effort regarding all of these during the brief period of time received in this life. From all sides, the floods (ogha) and so forth are constantly flowing. In such an era, it is up to each individual, based on these clues highlighted by the Buddha, to develop disillusionment (nibbidā) toward the five aggregates of grasping, and accordingly develop concentration (samādhi) and other qualities that support it. Through that, one can realize those supreme goals in this very life. I expect to conclude a bit briefly today.

You should consider taking advantage of at least this much that was said. Now, having understood in a broader manner that advice given by Ven. Aññā Koṇḍañña by looking at our own thoughts and wishes, if we develop insight (vipassanā) based on the things we encounter, meet, and experience in daily life, then at a moment when we least expect it, we can attain the realization of the Path and Fruit we hope for. Indeed, that noble state is often attained when one does not expect it.

Because as long as expectation is there, during that time, the aforementioned insight (vipassanā) does not operate. Expectation is necessary, and determination is also necessary. But one must be engaged in the work. When one is engaged in the work, if those factors have matured, at some point, one will be able to realize them through that very state of direct experience. Therefore, consider this briefly and shape your lives accordingly. So far, having observed virtue and practiced meditation to some extent, may you take what is to be taken from this Dhamma sermon, and may you gain the strength and power to realize those expected states as quickly as possible! This is my wish.

Dhammapada 146 (Jarāvagga)

Dear Listeners,

According to the Dhamma expounded by the Buddha, the Teacher of the Three Worlds, darkness and light remind us of two things: ignorance (avijjā) and wisdom (paññā). The Blessed One declared that the reason why beings in this world have been caught up, entangled, and enmeshed in a great heap of Dukkha (Suffering) in this saṃsāra for an endless period of time—a heap of dukkha whose beginning and end are invisible—is because their eye of wisdom has been blinded by the darkness of ignorance. That is why the Blessed One has illustrated that realization of life, the realization of Nibbāna, and the seeing of Nibbāna, as the arising of the Dhamma-eye, as the dawning of a light. Beings in this world do not realize that their eye of wisdom is blinded because they have fallen into a state of grave negligence (pamāda). Worldly beings do not understand the darkness of ignorance they are in; they spend a long time in saṃsāra groping about in this darkness. Due to various reasons for falling into this negligence, and because of being subject to many forms of intoxication, worldly beings do not understand the dangerous situation they are in. Therefore, the Great Compassionate Blessed One on certain occasions had to arouse spiritual urgency (saṃvega) in his listeners through various skillful means. An incident of this nature is mentioned in the background story of the stanza we have taken as our theme today.

During the time of the Buddha, five hundred householders of Sāvatthī, wishing to see their wives live diligently and with love for the Dhamma, entrusted them to Visākhā, the great lay female disciple, like a group of pupils. These five hundred female lay disciples would always go to the monastery and the park together with the great lay disciple Visākhā. In this way, they remained highly obedient. However, a certain occasion arose—a drinking festival in Sāvatthī. A festival of drinking alcohol. It was held for seven days; such customs, like social festivals, existed in those cities. When such a drinking festival was held, those wives had to prepare alcohol for their husbands. After those seven days had passed in that manner, a large amount of alcohol was left over. These lay women thought, "We too should at least taste a little of this." However, they were afraid to do so in a way that their husbands would find out. Therefore, as a clever ruse, they went and asked for permission from Visākhā, saying, "We would like to go to the park; we had a desire to go to the park." Visākhā also took them along. After going to the park, what happened? Those lay women secretly got the alcohol brought there—since they were a large group, they managed it by some means. Next, they secretly drank it and became intoxicated. Being intoxicated, they behaved badly, in the various ways an intoxicated person behaves. Visākhā felt a great sense of spiritual urgency and dismay (saṃvega), thinking, "This will cause a bad rumor among the non-Buddhist ascetics (tīrthakas) that Visākhā, the chief female lay disciple of the Ascetic Gotama, also drank alcohol; a great blemish has been cast upon us due to an incident of this nature." Visākhā then admonished those lay women.

She also said to those lay women, "You will also have to undergo punishment from your husbands. What are you going to do now?" The lay women said, "We will go home and feign illness, showing that we are sick." Visākhā said, "Very well then, try and see," and sent them on. Similarly, when they went home and went to a separate room as if they were sick, and when the husbands came to know of this, they understood the reason. Having understood, they beat and punished them thoroughly.

After some time passed, another drinking festival came, just like before. On that occasion too—and this is the danger of alcohol and intoxication: once someone acquires a taste for it, they continue to go along with it—so, in the same way, after their husbands had finished drinking, for the second time a thought arose in those lay women, "We must go hide somewhere and secretly use this alcohol." Perhaps it was due to thriftiness, or perhaps due to a reluctance to throw it away. For whatever reason, they came to Visākhā again and presented a proposal to go to the park. Visākhā said, "Once we went and got such bad publicity," and when she rejected that idea, they next presented it under a different guise, saying, "We want to go perform offerings to the Blessed One; we have such an intention." "Ah, very well," said Visākhā, and took this group along. In an unbelievably clever way, while taking flowers, incense, and other offerings, they also carried alcohol in vessels. Having taken it, they drank the alcohol before entering the monastery, and came into the presence of the Blessed One drunk and intoxicated. Visākhā, unaware of this, invited the Blessed One to preach Dhamma to them. Not long after the Blessed One started the Dhamma sermon, so great was the danger and peril of that alcohol that these women felt like dancing and singing songs right in front of the Blessed One.

Along with that thought, now, generally it is said here that when one is in a state of mindlessness, there are various forces in this world and the universe that can possess us—forces that are opposed to the Dispensation (Sāsana), opposed to the Dhamma, and pull us back into saṃsāra, preventing our journey to Nibbāna. In the same way, it is mentioned here that deities belonging to Māra's retinue (māra-kāyika devatā) possessed that group and made them clap, laugh, dance, and sing in front of the Blessed One. When the Blessed One reflected on what this was, he understood it. It is mentioned that next, in order to arouse spiritual urgency (saṃvega) in them, the Blessed One at that moment emitted a great darkness from his eyebrows. Due to that dense darkness, the intoxication of those lay women vanished because of the fear of death. With the arising of the fear of death, their intoxication vanished. Next, the Blessed One declared to them as advice: "It is not proper to come to me fallen into negligence in this manner. That is why you are possessed by various forces of Māra. Now, with diligence and having aroused great spiritual urgency (saṃvega), you must make an effort to escape from this fire." Saying so, he uttered the stanza we have taken as our theme:

Ko nu hāso kimānando niccaṃ pajjalite sati

Andhakārena onaddhā padīpaṃ na gavesatha

"When there is constant burning, what laughter, what joy? Enwrapped in deep darkness, do you not seek a lamp?"—this is the meaning of that short stanza. It is mentioned that after listening to that sermon by which the Blessed One aroused spiritual urgency (saṃvega), that group of women attained the fruit of Stream-entry (sotāpatti), based on the spiritual urgency they had developed. Be that as it may, next Visākhā, the great lay disciple, specifically said to the Blessed One: "Venerable Sir, what a dangerous thing this alcohol is, giving rise to sinful, unwholesome states (akusala). Was it not due to this alcohol that a group like this began to behave in this manner in front of someone like the Blessed One?" The Blessed One replied, "Indeed, Visākhā, in the past too, many people experienced various troubles due to alcohol," and at that moment he also related a Jātaka story.

From this, we have to reflect on the challenge the Blessed One presented to the world in this stanza. From the music heard from all directions, we can see that in this world, people always try to remain constantly submerged in an ocean of entertainment. But the Blessed One poses a highly powerful challenge to us through this stanza. We like to spend our time laughing, singing, enjoying ourselves, and dancing. Yet the Blessed One asks, "When there is constant burning, what laughter, what joy? Enwrapped in deep darkness, in dense darkness, do you not seek a lamp?" It is worth reflecting on why the Blessed One presented such a challenge to us.

In the world today, there are fires everywhere to the extent that even the word "fire" truly evokes fear in a person. It is not only those visible fires. Because the Blessed One knew very well that this world is burning with many invisible fires, he often described the world as burning with eleven fires, or often as three fires—namely, the fires of lust (rāga), hatred (dosa/dvesha), and delusion (moha). On other occasions, he describes them as eleven fires: rāga, dosa, moha, and then Jāti (Birth), jarā (aging), maraṇa (death) (the latter two making up Jarāmaraṇa (Decay and Death)), soka (sorrow), parideva (lamentation), Dukkha (Suffering), domanassa (grief), and upāyāsa (despair). The three defilements (kilesa) that constantly burn within the minds of beings in saṃsāra, burning other things and other people connected to those respective beings, are lust (rāga), hatred (dosa), and delusion (moha). Accompanying them is Jāti (Birth), which is also a fire. Birth too is a fire. What is meant here is a fire of Dukkha (Suffering).

It is because of Jāti (Birth) that all other sufferings flow in. Along with jāti, next comes Jarāmaraṇa (Decay and Death). Along with birth, there is jarā, which is aging/growing old, then death (maraṇa), sorrow, and lamentation. Accordingly, there are sorrows, crying, lamentations, physical and mental suffering, and intense struggle and exhaustion. The Blessed One declared that beings are constantly burning and running about due to each of these. Since we are burning with these eleven fires in this manner, we must reflect that this entire saṃsāric existence is a terrifying Dukkha (Suffering). Many people think of dukkha as if existence is one thing and suffering is something inside it. But the Blessed One declared: dukkhe loko patiṭṭhito—the world is established in dukkha. Dukkha is established in the world. Just like two shutter-doors that fit each other perfectly, dukkha and the world are identical, to the extent that there is nothing to be separated from one another. In these times, when explaining the Noble Truth of Suffering (dukkha-sacca), even when explaining the Dhamma, many people just mention a few things like birth is dukkha, aging is dukkha, sickness is dukkha, a heap of dukkha, and then stop there. But because there is no end to listing them in that way, the Blessed One ultimately declared, saṅkhittena pañcupādānakkhandhā dukkhā—in brief, the entire five aggregates of grasping are dukkha.

Having shown separately that Jāti (Birth) is dukkha, aging is dukkha, illness is dukkha, etc., he finally declares that this entire five aggregates of form, Vedanā (Feeling), perception, Saṅkhāra (Preparations), and viññāṇa (consciousness), which we grasp as "I" and "mine"—in brief, the five aggregates of grasping (pañcupādānakkhandha)—are dukkha. In short, this body of ours is a heap of dukkha. That is why the Venerable Vīdāgama Maitreya has stated in the Lō Väḍa Saňgarāva:

Dara räsa gini äviluṇu kala nibandē

Gini misa darayäyi yana nama noyedē

Ema lesa ek koṭa vadahaḷa muniňdē

Duka misa kayakäyi yana nama noyedē

"When a heap of firewood is constantly ablaze,

It is called 'fire', the name 'firewood' no longer applies;

In the same way, as expounded by the Sage,

It is only dukkha, the name 'body' no longer applies."

A beautiful simile is shown there. "When a heap of firewood is constantly ablaze"—when a pile of wood is continuously burning, "it is called 'fire', the name 'firewood' no longer applies." We refer to it as fire; we do not call it a pile of firewood anymore. Once the entire pile of wood has caught fire, nobody refers to it as a pile of firewood. That is what that Venerable Thero is reminding us of. "In the same way, as expounded by the Sage, it is only dukkha, the name 'body' no longer applies." Likewise, the Blessed One has shown dukkha and the body together. Therefore, rather than calling this a body, it is better to call it dukkha. But worldly people do not like to use such terminology, nor do they do so. Yet, according to the word of the Buddha, according to the true state of affairs, this entire body, the very acquisition of a body—that is why birth (jāti) is said to be dukkha. In the world, the statement "birth is dukkha" is generally explained—and even we usually explain it for convenience—only as the pain caused to the mother and the child due to birth. However,

If we reflect more deeply, Jāti (Birth) means the acquisition of a bodily cage made of the four great elements (mahābhūta): earth (paṭhavī), water (āpo), fire (tejo), and wind (vāyo). From the very moment of acquiring this, because of past ignorance (avijjā), the dense darkness of ignorance, one accumulates Saṅkhāra (Preparations) or kamma, merit and demerit, because of the craving for existence (bhava-taṇhā). Everyone likes to remain in this existence. Because of the wrong understanding of "I" and "mine", because of ignorance (avijjā), there is an unquenchable, endless, and extraordinary Taṇhā (Craving) in worldly beings to maintain this "self" and to increase "my" possessions—a grave craving. We spend our entire lives trying to satisfy that Taṇhā (Craving). Through the wholesome and unwholesome kamma performed for its sake, Bhava (Becoming) is brought about for us.

Bhava (Becoming) means it grants another birth (jāti), a subsequent existence somewhere. The initial stage of that existence is Jāti (Birth). Birth means a bodily cage is formed, made of those elements mentioned earlier. Next, from the very moment of its arising, the fire element (tejo-dhātu) within it becomes active and produces something called hunger. For this, one must provide food. As soon as a little child is born, they are born crying. Thus they ask for milk. In that way, there is Taṇhā (Craving) for food. The fire element in this bodily cage operates and hunger is produced. This is the fire that no one can bear. This is common to everyone. One is burned by this hunger. In this way, this bodily cage is like a burning pile of firewood. One must put firewood into it again and again—that is, food. Next, there is thirst. That too is a fire. It is called the fire of hunger. The painful fires of hunger and thirst. Those two are common to everyone.

In addition to that, there is the fatigue of satisfying and preparing them. Next, due to various disturbances concerning those elements—paṭhavī, āpo, tejo, and vāyo—in that cage, and because of those very defilements, it is said that the three humors of wind, bile, and phlegm (vā, pit, sem) become deranged. Due to these various causes, and due to external and internal afflictions, illnesses and diseases flow in—sickness (vyādhi). Next, even if there are no such illnesses, this bodily cage begins to decay from the moment of birth. It gradually undergoes decay. We make a certain distinction between youth and old age, and we look upon one part of it favorably, thinking, "We are young." But in reality, from the very day of birth, decay begins. This decay is hastened by sickness, by illnesses and diseases. That too is indeed the derangement of these four elements, or of wind, bile, and phlegm, arriving according to one's kamma through various other external and internal afflictions. Thus, a life is spent in the midst of such a heap of Dukkha (Suffering). Yet we think we possess good health. We now generally express wishes for "long life and the blessing of health" (āyur-ārogya-sampatti). That wish or blessing is good. But its fulfillment actually depends on the kamma of each individual; otherwise, in terms of worldly nature, no one can say they spend even a single day in perfect health.

The Blessed One once declared that if anyone, carrying around a bodily cage like this, proudly says, "I am healthy," there is no greater foolishness than that. Not even for a single moment is there real health in this body. What is here is a heap of diseases. It is called a cage of diseases—a fragile cage of diseases. When this heap of diseases manifests outwardly, that is when we say, "I have fallen ill." Thus, there is a whole heap of illnesses and diseases that come along with this bodily cage. Next, we also try to escape from decay (jarā) and old age. No matter how much effort is made through various medical treatments and medical research, these two—Jarāmaraṇa (Decay and Death)—cannot be prevented. At some point, one must submit to them. The Blessed One has declared: na hi so upakkamo yena jātā na mīyare—"There is no device by which those who are born do not die." Jarāmapi pāpuṇitvā maraṇaṃ, evaṃdhammā hi pāṇino—"Even after reaching old age, there is death; such is the nature of living beings." In the end, even after reaching old age, one has to die.

Thus, within us there is generally a desire to be ageless and immortal; within worldly beings, there is a desire to escape decay, escape death, and obtain a certain happiness, a permanent state. But the Blessed One declared that death is something that goes hand-in-hand with birth (jāti). Birth and death are a tethered pair, something bound together. Therefore, we cannot accept only birth and reject death. Death arises along with birth. That is why the verses on mindfulness of death (maraṇānussati) that you often use state: uppattiyā sahevedaṃ maraṇaṃ āgataṃ sadā—"This death has arrived together with birth itself." "At all times, death comes along with birth." In that way, because these tethered things cannot be separated, as soon as a person takes birth, sickness, decay, and death—all of these—belong to them. Such a dangerous situation exists along with this body. In addition to being burned by those defilements (kilesa), next, as a result of the unwholesome kamma one performs, one has to be born in the realm of hungry ghosts (peta-loka) and undergo suffering for a long time, burning with extremely severe fires of hunger and thirst, and various other such miseries.

Likewise, we can see how animals suffer in the animal realm. In the ghost realms, and next in the planes of misery (apāya), and in the even more terrifying hells (niraya). There are places where the Blessed One himself from his own sacred mouth preached the details of the Great Hell and other such places, showing how terrifying the sufferings of hell are. In the Lohakumbhī hell, molten metal is poured into the mouths of some. There are extraordinary details about this. According to one's kamma, one has to drink molten metal. Sometimes, instead of that alcohol which was drunk with great relish, one has to drink molten copper. Otherwise, the Blessed One points out instances of beings undergoing suffering without dying, according to their kamma, boiling in metal cauldrons of the Lohakumbhī hell, going up and down. The Blessed One declares that the suffering endured by worldly beings in those hells cannot be fully described.

In the Great Hell, inside a hall with burning, blazing walls where even the floor is ablaze, those beings run up and down. There are four gates; they try to escape through these gates. Then, the gates supposedly open suddenly. But while they are opening, there are descriptions of how long they spend running about like this, undergoing the results of the sinful kamma they have committed. Likewise, they sometimes have to walk on burning, blazing mountains. They have to swallow red-hot iron balls. The Blessed One has declared that through the medium of fire, various terrifying retributive sufferings and miseries exist in those planes of misery (apāya) and hells (niraya). That is why the Blessed One has illustrated this entire saṃsāra as a place that is burning and blazing with fire. Therefore, the Blessed One has told us to constantly reflect on these subjects of spiritual urgency (saṃvega-vatthu) in order to prevent the negligence (pamāda) that generally arises within us.

The world is fallen into negligence. Various things cause this. We all know the negligence of sleepiness. In addition to that, there is the desire to get intoxicated. The negligence that arises due to addiction to alcohol is extremely dangerous. Due to that intoxication, one sometimes behaves in this very world like an animal, a hungry ghost, or a demon, performing various sinful deeds. Surā-meraya-majja-pamādaṭṭhānā—there are places in these times where this is explained as a joke in various ways. An era has now arrived where those jokes are sometimes taken as the truth. But drinking alcohol is called pamādaṭṭhāna—the ground for negligence. A cause for negligence. Drinking alcohol is specifically shown as a cause for negligence.

Many other causes of negligence are shown in the Dhamma: the intoxication of health (ārogya-mada), the intoxication of life (jīvita-mada), the intoxication of wealth (bhoga-mada)—in this way, there are various forms of intoxication. One thinks about one's health, gets intoxicated by conceit, and falls into negligence. Next is the intoxication of life (jīvita-mada). In that way, regarding life, one has a notion that one will not die. The intoxication of youth (yobbana-mada) means thinking about one's youth and forgetting that one will grow old. Thus, through forgetting all these things, it is through mindlessness (loss of mindfulness) that these intoxications occur.

Therefore, we can understand: what must we arouse to overcome these intoxications? Mindfulness (sati), awareness. The Blessed One declares that we must always try to live with mindfulness and clear comprehension (sati-sampajañña). That is why, as the primary task in the Blessed One's path of meditation, it is shown that while guarding virtue (sīla) and other qualities, and established on that virtue, one must constantly reflect on some wholesome object through a certain meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna). By constantly reflecting on a meditation subject such as loving-kindness (mettā), recollection of the Buddha (buddhānussati), foulness (asubha), or mindfulness of death (maraṇasati), one unifies the scattered mind and thereby calms the mind. Next, on the basis of that established mindfulness (sati) and concentration (samādhi), one can gain true understanding of the world by way of insight knowledges (vipassanā-ñāṇa). What helps to awaken all of this is spiritual urgency (saṃvega). That is why they are called subjects of spiritual urgency (saṃvega-vatthu).

Regarding the cultivation of this saṃvega, worldly people think and believe that being entertained is the way, that by being entertained they can escape from these things. We try to remove this dukkha by bringing about various forms of entertainment. All that does is make us forget the suffering; the medicine is not truly applied. It is like applying a plaster, covering up the disease. It is just like when a house is on fire: instead of fleeing from the house, someone might drink alcohol and sleep inside the house. They will sleep well, but before long, they will be burned to ashes. In that very way, worldly beings try to solve the problem of dukkha through shortcuts. But what did the Blessed One try to make worldly beings understand, after striving and fulfilling the perfections (pāramī) for four incalculable aeons and a hundred thousand eons? It is the path of practice (paṭipadā) that helps to completely escape from this saṃsāric suffering.

That is why the Blessed One asks that question: Ko nu hāso kimānando niccaṃ pajjalite sati? In this way, even in this world, you are burning with this fire of hunger, and next with this fire of illness, and with various other fires arising in the mind such as lust, hatred, and delusion—you are burning with a multitude of such fires. Next, we must also remind ourselves of the factors shown as subjects of spiritual urgency (saṃvega-vatthu). Even if we are not burning at this very moment, as a result of the kamma performed during our long saṃsāra, at least until one is freed from the four planes of misery (apāya) through the knowledge of the path of Stream-entry (sotāpatti-magga-ñāṇa), everyone must be prepared to burn with the fires of hell.

Thus, it is not only when we have jumped into the fire, but rather the understanding that there is a fire ahead into which we might have to jump, or into which we might fall—that is the understanding the Blessed One tries to cultivate within worldly beings. Until one is freed from the four planes of misery, those fires of hell belong to oneself. One does not know at what moment they will be felt. After this life is lost, if a grave past kamma arises, sometimes in the four planes of misery, one will have to undergo terrifying suffering such as burning in those fires which the Blessed One himself described as "impossible to fully detail." Or else in the ghost realms or the animal realm. It is in the midst of such a heap of fire that we sing songs, dance, and chant. Scholars of these times level various accusations, saying that the Blessed One preached an absolute pessimism. Now, this is a challenge. But this is the true state of affairs. Like a doctor, one cannot treat an illness without diagnosing it. The illness must at least be indicated to some extent. Otherwise, the patient will not agree to the required treatment.

That is why the Blessed One reminds us of these illnesses as subjects of spiritual urgency (saṃvega-vatthu). Various kinds of Jāti (Birth), jarā (aging), vyādhi (sickness), maraṇa (death) (i.e., Jarāmaraṇa (Decay and Death)), soka (sorrow), parideva (lamentation), and so on—there is no need to separately explain birth, aging, and next, death. One must reflect on the saṃsāric dukkha endured in the past. One must reflect on the suffering to be endured in the future. One must reflect on the suffering of the planes of misery. Next, the suffering regarding what we have to do for hunger, for food in this life. By constantly reflecting on these various matters, the desire for this Bhava (Becoming) must be removed.

Something called bhava-taṇhā (craving for existence) exists within all beings. The desire for bhava. Everyone likes to carry on this existence. But how we demonstrate what this existence is, according to the Dhamma, is like this: the wheel of a moving chariot touches the ground for only an extremely brief moment. But if we do not consider that the wheel is constantly moving, it is as if this wheel goes on scraping and scraping. It is upon a perception (saññā) of that nature that worldly beings have formed a perception of permanence (nicca-saññā), and have developed the feeling, "I exist," "I" and "mine". But there is constantly a rolling-over in this. Existence (pavattana) means rolling over. Even if we look at the literal meaning of the word pavattiya (occurrence/rolling on), it is a rolling over. We treat this rolling-over as something permanent, saying, "I exist," and we use the terms "I" and "mine". Worldly beings do not understand the nature of ignorance (avijjā) in this, the delusion (moha) in this. It is so profound that it cannot be expressed in words. Why can it not be expressed in words? Because words themselves have been formulated based on this delusion. The language accepted by the world, which exists by way of convention (sammuti) and is used by worldly beings, also consists of a multitude of symbols constructed according to the perception of permanence (nicca-saññā). Such is the deep state of affairs.

That must be why the Blessed One was initially hesitant even to preach this Dhamma. "How am I to explain this to the world using the language developed by the world?" How can I explain this to worldly beings in the language they themselves have created? All of this, this existence, which is a rolling-over—when worldly beings talk of existence, they regard it as something permanent, but in reality, there is only a rolling-over there. It is because of this rolling-over that all this dukkha flows in. Yad aniccaṃ taṃ dukkhaṃ, yaṃ dukkhaṃ tad anattā—the Blessed One has briefly illustrated the three characteristics (tilakkhaṇa) in this way. Whatever is Anicca (Impermanent) is Dukkha (Suffering). Anicca means anicca-vipariṇāma-dhamma—subject to change and impermanence. It is anicca because it is not permanent. What is not permanent is anicca. And that anicca means, next, there is a rolling-over right there. There is a change right there. It is called vipariṇāma-aññathābhāva—change, turning into something else. Within that turning, there is a vibration, a rolling-over. And because of that rolling-over, it is dukkha, because it does not remain in one way.

Why do worldly people change their postures? Why is it that one cannot remain sitting in one position? When one sits in one way for a little while, even in a highly comfortable seat, a Vedanā (Feeling) is felt. A pain is felt somewhere. Be it a wind-pain or some other kind of pain, a vedanā is felt. Then, because of that vedanā, we change postures to cover up that dukkha. It is through things of this nature that we try to cover up this dukkha, just like the person who drinks alcohol to forget their suffering. Such a nature exists within worldly beings. Thus, worldly beings do not want to face the problem. They do not want to face the problem. That is exactly why this problem drags on and on. But the Blessed One, like a skilled physician, like a teacher, like a guide, had to introduce this problem. That is why the Blessed One reminds us to constantly reflect on those subjects of spiritual urgency (saṃvega-vatthu). Moreover, just as in the story where he conjured a great darkness to cause pain and created a great fear and terror (santrāsa) within them, it is when such terror and fear arrive that a person's eyes are opened.

Many people know from Dhamma points and stories what helped Paṭācārā to attain Arahantship. There is no need to explain the story of Paṭācārā anew. Everyone knows this. For Paṭācārā, her present was lost with the loss of her husband. Next, her future was lost with the loss of her two children. Her past was also lost when she went in search of her home and found her parents had also been burned to ashes. So she understood, "There is nothing more to be wished for in this. Such is the present, such is the future, and such is the past." In that way, through the dukkha that has come upon oneself, one must try to realize this truth. One should not wait until such a situation arrives. The wise person, the person who applies mindfulness and wisdom, the person who makes use of that spiritual urgency (saṃvega), understands that fear before it comes to them and prepares for it.

What is called the supreme bliss of Nibbāna is the complete liberation from all this saṃsāric dukkha, the liberation from that craving for existence (bhava-taṇhā). As long as this bhava-taṇhā exists, because worldly beings wish for bhava, Māra says, "Here, take it," and gives it to them. What does he give, saying "Here, take it"? It is this very bodily cage mentioned earlier. That cage which is said to be pure dukkha. "Well, you asked for it, so I am giving it," says Māra, and gives it. He gives it like a tethered thing. He gives this only to pull it back. Māra pulls this bodily cage in that way. Under the force of that pulling, and because of that vibration, illnesses and all those things mentioned earlier come along. Māra always looks to—as said in "this death has arrived together with birth itself"—he gave this body only to take it back, to pull it back. This is like a game of tug-of-war.

This was given only to be pulled back. Along with that, seeing the suffering, fatigue, terror (santrāsa), and torment (santāpa) that the person undergoes, Māra rejoices. Such is the nature of Māra. What is the easiest solution to this pulling? Letting go. That is the solution the Blessed One offers. One must let go of it from Māra. Otherwise, being dragged along with it, one falls into dukkha. This letting go is what the Blessed One shows for the destruction of the craving for existence (bhava-taṇhā). There is a nature within worldly beings to desire existence. The solution offered by ordinary worldly beings is that, to satisfy those desires, they seek and provide whatever they want—be it food, drink, wealth, positions, etc. But none of these can ever fill the void. It is like the great ocean.

This thirst of Taṇhā (Craving) can never be quenched. Instead, what is the path of training shown by the Blessed One? He shows a certain method precisely to quench this craving, this thirst of taṇhā. The method shown for that is the destruction of ignorance (avijjā). It is by thinning out ignorance that the thirst of taṇhā can be destroyed. To thin out that feeling of "I" and "mine", which is called ignorance (avijjā), the Blessed One points out: "Constantly reflect on the fact that this state you are in is Anicca (Impermanent), Dukkha (Suffering), and Anattā (Not-self)." The Blessed One makes us understand through wisdom that there is nothing here that can be taken as "I" or "mine".

"Is this form permanent? Is Vedanā (Feeling) permanent?" Is even one of them permanent? If it is not permanent, if something is anicca, he asks, "Is it happiness or suffering (dukkha)?" One has to say, "It is dukkha." It is a state of suffering. If something is of a nature to change, of a nature to roll over, if it is something that must constantly be reconstructed and prepared, then this is a great dukkha. Saṅkhāra (Preparations) means a heap of preparations. Now, the word saṅkhāra is frequently used. What is here is entirely a heap of preparations. This entire existence is a heap of preparations. For these preparations, a certain effort is required. That itself is dukkha. Thus, when it is said saṅkhārā paramā dukkhā—that the heap of preparations is the ultimate dukkha—it means that worldly beings have to undergo great suffering just for the sake of this preparing. However, this is not visible; it is not understood.

It is precisely by the stilling of this heap of preparations (saṅkhāra) that the Blessed One points to true happiness. It is called sabba-saṅkhāra-samatha (the stilling of all preparations). What instigates the arising of these preparations is Taṇhā (Craving), the force of craving. Based on those two ideas of "I" and "mine" derived from ignorance (avijjā), there is a grave craving in worldly beings to increase the measure of what belongs to them. It is for its sake that one has to undergo all this suffering. But that craving is never quenched. To escape from this Taṇhā (Craving), as mentioned earlier, one must arouse the eye of wisdom, the light, the lamp, in the form of insight knowledges (vipassanā-ñāṇa). It is described as the light of wisdom (paññā-āloka). It is described as the lamp of wisdom (paññā-padīpa), the lamp of knowledge (ñāṇa-padīpa).

It is only when that eye of wisdom is aroused that the true nature of the world is understood. On such occasions, that craving mentioned earlier naturally understands that this is a futile thing, a baseless thing, without any foundation. Through that realization, that craving for existence (bhava-taṇhā) is destroyed. Ignorance (avijjā) is fundamental here—the view of "I" and "mine" is an opinion derived from not knowing. To quench this great thirst of Taṇhā (Craving) born from that, one has to remove the darkness of ignorance (avijjā). To remove that, one has to arouse the mindfulness and clear comprehension (sati-sampajañña) called heedfulness, having freed oneself from those intoxications.

This cannot be done through the ways of entertainment available in the world. Therefore, if we were to openly declare some of the Blessed One's discourses in these times, we might perhaps face serious accusations from certain quarters. There is one short passage where the Blessed One declared—to say it in Sinhala: "Monks, in the Noble Discipline, singing is a form of crying." The Blessed One declares that music, what is called song, heard from all directions, is a form of wailing. This is a severe challenge. This entire world exists completely enmeshed and entangled in song.

However, the place the Blessed One gives to this song and music might sometimes cause some people to feel displeased, at least to some extent, even towards the Blessed One. They talk about "this music." But we can realize this for ourselves: even the sweetest music in the world—if placed inside a machine like this, by turning a small key or screw here and there, that sweet music can be turned into a sound of crying. In that way, one can understand that this music is indeed a form of crying. In truth, some music is indeed crying. That is why, in a more recent era, a certain Western poet stated that the sweetest songs in the world are those of saddest thought. Everyone knows this.

Why do these sad songs become sweet songs? Within the minds of these beings in saṃsāra, there are deposited fear, terror (santrāsa), and sorrow. Due to these, there is a great heap of accumulated Dukkha (Suffering). That heap of dukkha is recalled by worldly beings. Through that, even from that, worldly beings derive a kind of gratification (assāda). That is why these sad songs are regarded as the most pleasant songs in the world. Sometimes we say that a dove, a cuckoo (kokila), or a koel is singing a very sweet song. But in truth, that could be a cry of wailing due to separation from the beloved (piya-vippayoga), due to the loss of their young or their mates. We call this a song. Thus, we can understand the word of the Blessed One accordingly.

Next, there is also another declaration by the Blessed One when speaking of ways of entertainment: ummattakaṃ idaṃ, bhikkhave, naccaṃ—"Monks, in the Noble Discipline, dancing is a form of madness." This drama, this dancing, is madness. If we declare this to the world today, some might present strong counter-arguments: "Why call dancing a form of madness?" If society accepts as a convention that the way an insane person dances is to be regarded as a tradition, then that becomes a great drama. Seeing an insane person dance, if we create a tradition out of it and establish a convention that "this is the highest form of drama," from that day on, it is considered a drama.

Otherwise, let us think of it in another way: someone beautifully dressed is placed on a stage that is extremely hot. Because she is burning, she jumps here and there. She leaps up; unable to stand on one foot, she shifts to the other, and in this way she can be seen shifting feet and dancing. But perhaps a foreigner might record this, saying, "This is the dramatic tradition of this country." This dancing is indeed like dancing in madness. Yet, we construct a "tradition" within it and employ a method to derive gratification (assāda) from it. It must be for this reason that the Blessed One, according to the Noble Discipline, declared dancing to be a form of madness.

In the same way, the Blessed One has declared that laughing excessively, showing one's teeth, is a low thing. It is called komārakaṃ—something fit for children (childish). Now, while a small child is crying very intensely, someone shows a very trivial thing and begins to make that child laugh. Then, without even remembering that they were crying, that child begins to laugh continuously. Such is the way of the world. That is exactly why the Blessed One raised that question, "What laughter, what joy?" We must remind ourselves of this at least once in a while.

If not every day, at least once in a while, even on an occasion like this, we should reflect on the truth of this word of the Blessed One. Until we understand this truth, until we direct our minds according to those subjects of spiritual urgency (saṃvega-vatthu), we cannot realize this true Dhamma and dispel ignorance (avijjā). We cannot quench the thirst of craving (taṇhā). We can never escape from this. Therefore, the word of the Blessed One might sometimes be unpalatable. It might be unpalatable to society. It might be unpalatable to the present day, when considered from a contemporary perspective. Looking at contemporary things, someone might say that although these statements belonged to the Blessed One's time, they are not applicable to the present. But, pious devotees! In the Blessed One's time as well as in this time, the very same heap of fire is blazing. It was the fires of lust (rāga), hatred (dosa), and delusion (moha) that blazed then, and those same fires are blazing now.

The only difference is the firewood that is thrown into them. If it is blazing with whatever firewood, it is called a fire; there is no need to speak of the fire in terms of the firewood. This is a heap of fire. That is why this, which belonged to the Blessed One's time, is indeed called the eternal truth (sanātana-dhamma). The Blessed One has declared regarding this Dhamma: satañca dhammo na jaraṃ upeti—"The Dhamma of the virtuous ones (the Buddhas and Arahants) never undergoes decay." It never becomes obsolete. Worldly people imagine that this is obsolete. But this truth is applicable to the life of anyone in this world, then, now, and forever.

Therefore, we must reflect, at least once in a while, on this matter declared by the Blessed One—this true state of affairs. This is called "knowledge and vision of things as they really are" (yathābhūta-ñāṇadassana). The Blessed One expounds the actual state of the world. It may be unpalatable. Nothing can be done about that. Even though it is unpalatable, it is the truth. Some things are unpalatable. As soon as you put a myrobalan fruit (nelli) into your mouth and bite it, a highly astringent and bitter taste is felt. Do we throw it away just because of that? The myrobalan fruit is a highly valuable medicine, like nectar. But as soon as you bite it, it tastes astringent. Yet, once you begin to suck on it for a while, the real sweet taste of the myrobalan fruit emerges.

It is just like that when showing the insight knowledges (vipassanā-ñāṇa) in this Dispensation: danger (ādīnava) and weariness (nibbidā). Danger-knowledge (ādīnava-ñāṇa) means, among the insight knowledges, one must gain an understanding of the disadvantages and dangers in this world, in this life, in this existence, and in these five aggregates—their nature of dukkha and the nature of having to endure suffering. The culmination of all mundane knowledges (lokiya-ñāṇa) in the world is the knowledge of danger (ādīnava-ñāṇa). You know that as scientific inventions are developed further and further, what is regarded as the highest stage? It is the stage where the defects and shortcomings of that product become visible. In the same way, the knowledge of danger is the highest end of mundane knowledges. If one has understood danger in that way, what arises next? Nibbidā. Nibbidā means disenchantment/weariness with saṃsāra.

Worldly people are afraid of the term "disenchantment with saṃsāra" (nibbidā). If someone develops disenchantment with saṃsāra, people look at that person with a strange gaze. They think, "Either this person is insane, mad, or something like that"—as if they have an abnormal mind. But if someone tries to escape from this madhouse, the inmates of the madhouse do not like them leaving. That is why the Blessed One declared: sabbe puthujjanā ummattakā—"All worldlings, everyone who has not attained the state of a Noble One (ariya), are insane." The Blessed One has declared that all worldlings, everyone who has not attained Noble status, exist in a state of madness. Such is the situation in the world.

Thus, that disenchantment (nibbidā), the weariness with saṃsāra, is like the myrobalan fruit. Through disenchantment with saṃsāra, what does that person arouse? Based on that dispassion (virāga) or non-attachment arising from disenchantment with saṃsāra, they attain liberation—liberation from saṃsāra. The strength to realize that supreme, deathless Nibbāna is obtained through that knowledge of disenchantment (nibbidā-ñāṇa). This is just like an iron door that separates the entire saṃsāra from Nibbāna.

Pious devotees, you know that sometimes in various tea factories and similar places, there are areas where great furnaces are blazing. But there is an iron door in them; they are separated as if by an iron door. In the same way, once this knowledge called nibbidā arises, there emerges an opportunity to escape from saṃsāra. Because it is only by saying goodbye to this saṃsāra that one can go to the other side. One cannot cross over while clinging to this. What is present here is also like that tethered thing mentioned earlier. One can never go to Nibbāna while clinging to saṃsāra. Therefore, a certain moment arrives, specifically when those insight knowledges (vipassanā-ñāṇa) mature. This is a natural thing. It is not an unnatural thing; the Blessed One points it out by way of natural laws (dhammatā).

When one first deeply reflects on the impermanence of this world, the law of impermanence (aniccatā-dhamma), what is understood is an arising and a passing away. It is that realization of arising and passing away. That is what is called the "knowledge of arising and passing away" (udayabbaya-ñāṇa). Within this arising and passing away, just like the first two leaves of a plant emerging from a mango seed or some other seed—just like those first two leaves, the beginning of seeing this arising and passing away is a valuable state. From then on, as that state and the insight knowledges develop, then next, the other insight knowledges also emerge. One begins to understand how passing away occurs with extreme rapidity; this is called dissolution (bhaṅga). Everything is breaking and dissolving; this is called the "knowledge of dissolution" (bhaṅga-ñāṇa). These are seen breaking and dissolving with rapidity. Because of that breaking and dissolving, next there arises a fear: "Is it not something that is breaking and dissolving that I am holding on to, that I am clinging to?"

Having experienced that fear and terror (santrāsa), next the aspect of danger (ādīnava) in it is understood. The realization comes: "If this is something that breaks, and if I hold on to it, I too will be overturned, broken, and destroyed along with it." Therefore, the realization comes that one must escape from this. What helps in that realization of the need to escape is the three characteristics (tilakkhaṇa) of Anicca (Impermanent), Dukkha (Suffering), and Anattā (Not-self) pointed out by the Blessed One. When looking in every direction of this world, the practitioner of insight (vipassanā-yogī) sees only these three signs. There are various other road signs, advertisements, and other signs. But to the practitioner of insight, through all of these, through the trees and plants, and through the existence of their own body, what must be seen are those three signs: anicca, dukkha, and anattā.

Not a single thing is permanent. Not a single thing can truly be taken as happiness (sukha). Likewise, as the realization gradually arises that there is not even a dream of a possibility to maintain things under one's control as "I" or "mine", the other insight knowledges (vipassanā-ñāṇa) mature within that person. They arrive at the point of that disenchantment with saṃsāra (nibbidā), which is like the iron door, and next, at some point, they are able to see that light precisely through that disenchantment with saṃsāra. That is the path of liberation (vimutti-magga) shown by the Blessed One. Every other teacher in the world sought to solve this problem by other means—by methods similar to applying plasters. Or through some kind of nectar-like drink to become ageless and immortal. Now, it is said that those deities drink some nectar to avoid death; that is an absolute myth. Neither for deities, nor for Brahmās, nor for anyone else, is it ever possible to escape from this saṃsāra through any other nectar than that supreme Nibbāna shown by the Blessed One—the nectar of the supreme, deathless Nibbāna obtained through the stilling of all preparations (sabba-saṅkhāra-samatha). Such is the state of affairs in the world.

Therefore, all of you, pious devotees, must reflect on a valuable Poya day like today, having abstained from those forms of intoxication—especially when a year ends and a new year begins, how many people in this society, in this world, try to use intoxicants to forget that their lives have been depleted by a year? Intoxicants flow freely. The ending of a year and the dawning of a new year is an occasion when alcohol flows freely. In that way, through highly trivial entertainment, worldly beings try to forget the truth declared by the Blessed One. Therefore, especially as a disadvantage of this alcohol, not only does it cause various sicknesses, premature deaths, and other forms of mental derangement and madness, but even if one obtains a subsequent birth (jāti), one has to be born with a weak mental state due to addiction to alcohol. In that way, its dangerous disadvantages (ādīnava) must also be understood through this background story. What we must do is make an effort to constantly arouse mindfulness and wisdom, just as the Blessed One declared.

Not only from alcohol, but we must also protect the mind from various other intoxications, such as the intoxication of youth (yobbana-mada), the intoxication of health (ārogya-mada), the intoxication of life (jīvita-mada), and the intoxication of wealth (bhoga-mada). Reflecting even more deeply, it is only when the mind is turned away from those terrifying defilements (kilesa-dhamma)—namely greed (lobha), hatred (dosa), and delusion (moha), or lust (rāga), hatred, and delusion—that one can gain a good understanding of the true state of affairs in the world, the true nature of life, and ultimately be liberated from this entire saṃsāric dukkha, realize the supreme deathless Nibbāna, and find peace from this terrifying saṃsāra.

Therefore, by listening to the Dhamma on a day like today, what do you, pious devotees, generate? If we consider the benefits in this world, you must reflect that you have made a certain effort to develop or bring about the five faculties (indriya) and five powers (bala) pointed out by the Blessed One, namely faith (saddhā), energy (viriya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). Generally, the benefit of listening to the Dhamma is not a benefit obtained merely by sitting there and somehow listening to it while feeling sleepy. One listens to the Dhamma with faith (saddhā) in the Triple Gem, by applying one's mind to the Dhamma. While there are various forms of worldly entertainment such as sweet music, the reason you come to a place like this and spend an hour listening to this Dhamma is because you possess an unshakeable and deep faith (saddhā) in the Triple Gem.

It is also because of the energy (viriya) that follows that faith that you were able to sit in one posture, with difficulty, directing your mind to one point, removing it from various scattering tendencies, and listen to it. It is through the energy associated with that faith. Next, when the mind is unified in that way, what arises is mindfulness (sati), awareness. You removed mindlessness and aroused mindfulness. While listening to it with mindfulness and clear comprehension (sati-sampajañña) during that brief period, next, concentration (samādhi) is produced. Within oneself, even for a brief moment, the mind becomes calm and composed. When directing the mind to this Dhamma-listening, without paying attention to the surrounding sounds, a certain concentration (samādhi) is established. Through that concentration, certain matters might be understood which were never understood before, no matter how much you had read books.

Even things you have heard or read a hundred times begin to be understood well at a moment when that faith, energy, mindfulness, and concentration are developed. We do not understand merely because it is in books. We do not understand merely by going to libraries. We do not understand worldly things merely by seeing them. We understand only when our minds are prepared in the necessary way to understand them. We can see this fact: it must have been due to the spiritual urgency (saṃvega) aroused through the miracle performed by the Blessed One—to the extent of making Visākhā's lay women sober up—that they obtained some realization of the Dhamma. They were not without merit. In that very way, we must reflect that although there are various shortcomings in the lives we all lead, if on an occasion like this one directs the mind to the Dhamma and arouses faith, energy, mindfulness, and concentration, realizations of the Dhamma can be achieved on such occasions.

We should rejoice that in this manner, on this valuable day, we listened for an hour to a valuable Dhamma, a Dhamma that follows a discourse of the Blessed One. The group of wholesome volitions (kusala-cetanā) generated within one's mind is what we consider here as merit (puñña). That mass of merit can also be shared with others through their sharing in it (anumodanā). There are many in the world who wish to share in merit—those who have fallen into distress, and next, those who have understood the value of Nibbāna.

Reflecting on such beings, may all, especially the guardian deities of the Dispensation, along with the deities presiding over this place, share in this store of merit accumulated by both parties of us through the giving and receiving of this Dhamma sermon at this moment. Having shared in it, may they realize the supreme, deathless Nibbāna through whichever Bodhi they have aspired for, and may they provide protection to the Dispensation and to us—with such wishes and blessings we must conclude. Likewise, may our departed relatives, and all beings from Avīci hell up to the highest plane of existence (bhavāgra) who desire merit and desire Nibbāna, share in this store of merit accumulated from preaching and listening to the Dhamma, and as quickly as possible, be liberated from various saṃsāric dukkha such as Jāti (Birth), Jarāmaraṇa (Decay and Death), sickness, and so forth, and find peace in the supreme, deathless Nibbāna. With this wish in mind, please recite this stanza.

Dhammapada 96 (Sahassavagga)

Dear Listeners,

The word "peace" (santi) is a word dear to us all. Many people seeking peace perform peace-rituals (shanthikarma). They make offerings to deities. The ultimate goal of the path of practice taught in the Dhamma of our Supreme Teacher, the Buddha, is also peace. That is why that supreme, great Nibbāna is referred to as "paramam santam"—the ultimate peace. However, devotees, that peace is not something that can be obtained from the outside. It is a sublime state that must be brought forth from within, by calming the mind, body, and speech. Nibbāna——is the extinguishment of internal lust, hatred, and delusion that occurs through that calming. One who has realized Nibbāna uses patience and equanimity (upekkhā) to free the mind from the entanglements of kamma that prolong saṃsāra. It is the wonderful strength of patience and equanimity of a seven-year-old small Arahant novice (sāmaṇera) who became fully stilled (upasanta) that is presented as the story behind the stanza we have chosen as our theme.

In Kosambi, a certain person ordained and received higher ordination under the Buddha and came to be known as Elder Tissa of Kosambi. This Elder Tissa received an invitation from a lay supporter in Kosambi to spend the rains-retreat in a monastery there. Soon after the Elder entered the rains-retreat, the lay supporter brought three robes, ghee, honey, and other requisites for medicinal drinks, and placed them at his feet to offer them. This venerable monk asked, "What is this, lay disciple?" The lay disciple replied, "This is an offering I make to everyone who
