Verse 216 Piya Vagga (the Chapter on Affection) of the Dhammapada

Dear Listeners,

Today is the Poson Full Moon Poya Day. As the day on which the Buddha's Dispensation was received by this island of ours, Poson Poya Day is a very valuable day for us. What is called the "Buddha's Dispensation" (Buddha Śāsanaya) is the Buddha's path of Dhamma, the path to Nibbāna. It is recorded that the Great Arahant Mahinda, having journeyed to the Mihintale rock with his companions, addressed King Devanampiyatissa as "Tissa, Tissa" to bestow this path of Dhamma—this path to Nibbāna—upon him. In that manner, having diverted the attention of the King—who was engaged in hunting deer, an unrighteous act—towards the Dhamma, the Great Arahant Mahinda systematically gifted the Buddha's path of Dhamma—the path to Nibbāna—to this island. The Buddha too did just this: he went in search of individuals who had the capacity to practice the Dhamma and realize the Dhamma, approaching even those in the poorest conditions if they were capable of receiving the gift of Dhamma—the realization of Dhamma—and bestowed this Buddha's Dispensation—that is, the path of Dhamma, the path to Nibbāna—upon them. Now, in the background story related to the stanza we just recalled, we find how the Buddha carried the Buddha's Dispensation to a certain poor brahmin.

While the Buddha was residing at the Jetavana Monastery, a certain wrong-viewed (mithyādiṣṭika) brahmin was preparing a field. At that time, the Buddha arrived there. Since this brahmin held wrong views, even though he saw the Buddha from afar, he went on with his work as if he had not seen him. However, the Buddha walked right up to him and asked, "Brahmin, what are you doing?" The brahmin replied, "Venerable Gotama, I am preparing a field." That was all. The Buddha returned. On another day, this brahmin was plowing the field. On that day too, the Buddha went there. Having arrived, he asked, "Brahmin, what are you doing?" "Venerable Gotama, I am plowing." The Buddha returned. The man went on with his work. Next, on another day, the brahmin was sowing seeds in his field. On that day too, the Buddha went there. "Brahmin, what are you doing?" "Venerable Gotama, I am sowing." The conversation ended there too. The Buddha returned. Now the crop in the field was growing. One day, the brahmin was weeding the field. On that occasion too, the Buddha went there and asked, "Brahmin, what are you doing here?" "I am weeding, Venerable Gotama." Then came the time to guard the field. Now the paddy was ripening. On that occasion too, the Buddha went there. "What are you doing, Brahmin?" "I am guarding this field." "That apart, Venerable Gotama, you come to me constantly. You must be a friend of mine. From today, I accept you as my friend. When the harvest of this field is ripe, I will not consume it without giving a portion to you, Venerable Gotama," he promised. The Buddha also returned.

Now the paddy was ripe. With great expectations of harvesting the crop the following day, the brahmin went home. That night, a great torrential downpour accompanied by loud thunder fell, and the entire crop was washed away into the river just like that. In the morning, when the brahmin came to the field and looked, the entire field was desolate. An unbearable sorrow arose in him. He was most sorrowful because he could not give a portion of the harvest to his friend, Venerable Gotama. Somehow, this brahmin returned home, and due to that sorrow, he refused food—undertaking a fast—and went to sleep in a room. On that day too, the Buddha visited the brahmin's house, and having arrived, he asked, "Where is the lay disciple, the brahmin?" The household members said, "There he is, sleeping, unable to bear the sorrow of such a loss." The Buddha went there. "What is this, Brahmin?" he asked. The brahmin replied, "Venerable Gotama, I had such great expectations; I said that after the harvest is ripe, I would not consume it without giving a portion of it to you. Such a great destruction has befallen me. Because of the sorrow of it, I have refused food, given up expectation for life, and am lying down." The Buddha inquired, "Do you know the cause of this sorrow?" The brahmin said, "I do not know, do you know?" "Yes, Brahmin, I know." It was on that occasion that he preached the stanza we recalled earlier:

Taṇhāya jāyatī soko

Taṇhāya jāyatī bhayaṃ

Taṇhāya vippamuttassa

Natthi soko kuto bhayaṃ

"Sorrow is born of craving (taṇhā), sorrow arises from craving (taṇhā). Fear is born of craving (taṇhā). For one freed from craving (taṇhā), there is no sorrow. Whence fear?" This is all the Buddha preached. Yet, it is recorded in the Dhamma that upon hearing this Dhamma, a great mental revolution occurred within the brahmin's mind, and through the systematic progress of insight-knowledge (vipassanā-ñāṇa), he realized the noble fruit of the path of stream-entry (sotāpatti-magga-phala).

Then, we must think a little about how such a great mental revolution occurred. How did these insight-knowledges arise? Insight (vipassanā) means a special seeing. That brahmin had gone home to sleep carrying the mental image of his field. What constantly came to his mind was that desolate field. The Buddha preached that stanza in a way that provided an opportunity for the brahmin, who was looking at that field, to look at his own mind. The brahmin thought that the sorrow arose because the field was ruined. But after the Buddha uttered that stanza, he must have realized that this sorrow arose not because the field was desolate, but because his mind was desolate. Along with the growth of the crop in that field, something else had grown. The desire in his mind had also sprouted and grown—things to be done with this harvest, and so many other things. You devotees know, those who engage in agriculture, with what a massive bundle of expectations the paddy grows. In that very way, various desires and expectations grew like weeds in this brahmin's mind. When the torrential rain destroyed the crop and washed it down the river, all those desires and expectations were washed away. At that time, the brahmin was constantly bringing up the sight of that ruined field in his mind. Because of that, he lamented, grieved, and sorrowed. The revolution created by the Buddha's stanza was so great that instead of looking at the field, the brahmin looked within; he looked at his mind. Virtuous friends, the word used in the Dhamma for this looking within is Yoniso manasikāra (Wise attention)—wise reflection. Wholesome or unwholesome states arise from the mind. Mind is the forerunner of everything. The Buddha has declared: "Manopubbaṅgamā dhammā manoseṭṭhā manomayā" and so forth. "Mind is the forerunner of all states, mind is chief, they are mind-made." It has been declared in that manner. Just like that, here too, the brahmin realized that his own mind was the root cause of the arising of this sorrow—that it was something that sprang from within his own mind. Then, when the Buddha declared, "Taṇhāya vipparamuttassa natthi soko kuto bhayaṃ" [For one freed from craving (taṇhā), there is no sorrow, whence fear?], the brahmin understood that eradicating this craving (taṇhā) right there was something within his own power. The crop that was washed away could not be recovered. There was no remedy for that. Instead of that, refusing food and sleeping, or moving toward death through fasting, was not the remedy. Then, the ultimate result of the revolution that occurred in the mind of the brahmin who understood that reality was the attainment of the fruit of the path of stream-entry, which is nobler even than universal emperorship (cakkavatti reign). This story began with him being a wrong-viewed brahmin. Now, virtuous friends, along with the attainment of this fruit of stream-entry, a person is known as a Noble One (ariya-puggala). He attained a noble state. He attained a supreme state. Right view (sammā-diṭṭhi) arose. Such a massive mental revolution occurred. This brahmin might not have been a learned man. He was also a poor man. Yet, such a great thing took place here because there is a profound Dhamma in this. It is something worth directing our minds to. Now, these days, something we often hear is: "This is not the time to focus on the deep aspects of the Dhamma. This is a time of much hardship, distress, and calamity. We should think about that Nibbāna, about those deep things, only after this country overflows with milk and honey." Some people think like that. But, virtuous friends, in the world, there is a kind of thing called "blessings in disguise." Some calamities and disasters come just like blessings. Now, for this brahmin, the desolation of this field became a great blessing. Because of the mental revolution that arose through it, this brahmin was able to attain that sublime, noble state—which is nobler than universal emperorship, and which the Buddha praised in an extraordinary way.

Thus, through these disasters, calamities, and shocks, we can bring to light these Four Noble Truths: suffering (dukkha), its cause, its stilling which is realized as extinguishment—Nibbāna—and the way to it, the practice—the Noble Eightfold Path. When we reflect on bringing forth insight-knowledge through these calamities, and when we think about that knowledge—about education—our minds often run to universities, which are so common nowadays. They have an artistic name, "Sarasavi" (abode of the goddess of learning). Many people try to enter these sarasavis. Those who have entered them make great efforts to leave them—to pass out—successfully. But, virtuous friends, most people do not know that we are all in a certain sarasavi. It is called the "University of Life" (jīvita sarasaviya). In other universities, there are various kinds of sciences, arts, and technologies to learn. In this University of Life, there are only three subjects to pass, to master. What are they? The Buddha has shown them as: assāda (gratification), ādīnava (danger), and nissaraṇa (escape). Assāda refers to the side of gratification—enjoyment—the fivefold cords of sensual pleasure, gratification. This is the first lesson. I think everyone present here has passed this lesson thoroughly. Every samsaric being has passed this fivefold sensual pleasure. The next lesson is ādīnava [danger]. That refers to the hardships one has to undergo in pursuing those fivefold sensual pleasures—for their sake—the undesirable consequences in life, and so forth. Troubles, hardships, calamities, disasters—all these fall under the category of danger (ādīnava). The side of gratification is little, the side of danger is much, yet most people remain in the class of gratification. They are not even inclined to think about the danger. They do not even direct their minds to look at them. But, virtuous friends, it is through this danger (ādīnava) that one can proceed to the next class. Nissaraṇa means the escape from saṃsāra. Saṃsāra (wandering on) means moving around in this cycle, like spinning in one place. Now, you devotees know that if a vehicle travels a long distance, that distance is recorded. But no matter how far it goes, what happens? The wheel spins in the very same spot. In the same way, looking at it from one perspective, we have traveled in this saṃsāra for an infinite time. We use the words "vast saṃsāra." We employ such terms. But what of having gone this far? It is just spinning in the same place. We can also take it as the spinning of the wheel in the manner of birth (jāti), aging and death (jarāmaraṇa), sickness, and death. Or else, it is just the effort one exerts to fulfill those various expectations one hopes for. There is no end to that either. It is like the wheel spinning in the very same place.

So, in this way, wandering in saṃsāra is a spinning in the very same place, or a wandering about. Likewise, nissaraṇa means leaping out of that circle, departing, escaping from saṃsāra. It is this grade of nissaraṇa—this subject of nissaraṇa—this lesson of nissaraṇa—that we have to pass. In this world, in this era, the supreme one who first passed and mastered these three lessons in this University of Life is the Buddha. Accordingly, the Arahants too. Now this brahmin too obtained the first noble state called the fruit of stream-entry in that university. If we learn lessons from this University of Life according to the occasion, that is what remains for life. That is what supports one's liberation (vimukti). The Buddha has shown through various similes how noble this liberation obtained through the fruit of stream-entry is. On one occasion, taking a tiny amount of soil on the tip of his fingernail, the Buddha asked the community of monks, "Is this soil on my fingernail more, or is the soil of the great earth more?" The monks replied, "Venerable Sir, this soil on the fingernail is very little. The soil of the great earth is indeed much more." Drawing upon that simile, the Buddha declared that the amount of saṃsāra suffering (dukkha) that a stream-enterer has escaped from and finished is like the soil of the great earth. What is left to be finished is extremely little, like the soil on the fingernail. Why is that? A stream-enterer is born in saṃsāra only seven more times at most. Furthermore, he does not go to the lower realms (apāya). That is a massive—extraordinary—solace. For a person who is not a stream-enterer, the lower realms are like his own home. There is no knowing at what moment, due to what kind of bad karma, he will have to go to the lower realms. Because of the transformation of the revolution that arose in the stream-enterer's mind, due to that noble state, due to the arising of that eye of Dhamma (dhamma-cakkhu) through insight-knowledges, the capacity to perform unwholesome deeds that lead to the lower realms is destroyed. None of the unwholesome deeds done in the past will lead him to the lower realms again. It is such an extraordinary liberation that one receives even from the fruit of stream-entry. That is why the Buddha declared that the samsaric suffering (dukkha) still to be endured by a stream-enterer is like the soil on the fingernail, while the samsaric suffering (dukkha) he has freed himself from is like the remaining soil of the great earth. He has shown other similes in the same way. It is like two or three drops of water taken from the great ocean compared to the remaining suffering (dukkha) to be endured. The mass of suffering (dukkha) endured—the mass of suffering (dukkha) escaped from—is like the remaining water in the great ocean. He has shown another similar simile: if the Himalaya mountain range were to gradually wear away until only seven tiny pebbles, the size of mustard seeds, remained—those seven pebbles are like the remaining suffering (dukkha) left for the stream-enterer to endure. The mass of suffering (dukkha) he is freed from is like the portion of the Himalayas that has worn away. In this way, various similes have been shown. There are four paths and fruits: Stream-entry (sotāpatti), Once-returning (sakadāgāmi), Non-returning (anāgāmi), and Arahantship (arahatta). One can understand what a massive thing, what a noble thing, the liberation obtained even from the first of these is.

Then, that wrong-viewed brahmin—who was leaning on his hoe and clearing weeds, addressing the Buddha as "Venerable Gotama"—after that crop was destroyed, attained that fruit of stream-entry which the Buddha considers nobler than universal emperorship, nobler than sovereignty over the entire world, and nobler even than going to heaven. From this, we can see that what are called the deep Dhamma—what are called "insight-knowledges" (vipassanā-ñāṇa)—are not things limited only to the learned, to degree holders, or to those who went to universities. If you virtuously-disposed devotees who engage in agriculture also think of utilizing your University of Life, these can be attained. Now, because that wrong-viewed brahmin possessed some deep merit-power, the moment he heard the Dhamma-stanza of the Buddha, such a transformation took place. You devotees might feel a little doubt: why did the Buddha, the foremost in the three worlds, when there was so much work to be done, when there were so many matters concerning the community of monks, visit the place where this brahmin was plowing his field several times? The Buddha did not go there waiting for the brahmin's field to ripen to get a portion of the harvest. He went there waiting for the brahmin's mind to ripen, to bestow a portion of the harvest of the deathless, great Nibbāna he had attained. The brahmin's mind ripened on the very day that harvest was destroyed. Sometimes, your minds too ripen when calamities and disasters strike. In this day and age, there is no need to speak anew about these things—how one's children, relatives, and loved ones lose their lives in various circumstances. Sometimes through incurable diseases, sometimes through great shocks, they meet destruction amidst great blazes of fire. Even after receiving such lessons in the University of Life, because they do not direct their minds to them, Buddhists cannot even achieve what that wrong-viewed brahmin was able to do for himself. Instead, some such people think that thinking about these deep Dhammas—Nibbāna, the supramundane paths and fruits—is only for a time when this country is prosperous and overflowing with milk and honey. "Until then, let us look to build up the economy. Never mind what happens to righteousness." Such are the opinions that exist in the world. But you devotees can understand through this small story—nowadays, you devotees read stories, short stories, novels, and so on, with great relish. There is no example to be taken from them, only amusement. But through Dhamma stories, through the accounts of lives, the lessons we can learn are many. When reading about the life accounts of the monks and nuns in this Dispensation, and the life accounts of laymen and laywomen, it becomes clear that for many, this noble Dhamma of Nibbāna was realized at times when they faced massive life-shattering shocks. The stories of Kisā Gotamī, Paṭācārā, and various others like Aṅgulimāla, show that it was through those experiences amidst great life struggles that they realized the Four Noble Truths. Therefore, we too have such opportunities. It is to those that we referred as "blessings in disguise." What are called "blessings in disguise" appear to us as calamities. They appear to us as disasters, as shocks. But for what purpose do those shocks occur? In saṃsāra, a certain moment arrives as the "opportunity of the moment" (khaṇa-sampatti). The Buddha has shown the value of this khaṇa-sampatti. The "moment" (khaṇa) means an instant. The Buddha has declared, "Do not let the noble moment pass."

Khaṇo ve mā upaccagā

Khaṇātītā hi socanti

Nirayamhi samappitā

"Do not let the noble moment—the auspicious juncture—pass by. For if it passes, you will have to fall into hell and suffer." What is this noble moment?

On certain occasions, the Buddha declared that many in the world say, "khaṇakicceva loko, khaṇakicceva loko"—that this world is a place where work is done by the moment, where work is done on time. Nowadays, time is so chaotic that it is almost impossible to keep track of. But what the Buddha referred to as the "auspicious juncture" (nakkhatta) is the intelligent human life-state obtained during the time of a Buddha's appearance. It is when many factors come together that one can obtain an intelligent human life-state during the time of a Buddha's appearance. Even if a Buddha arises, if one were born in the animal realm, the realm of hungry ghosts (peta), the realm of asuras, or in hell, there would be no opportunity to incline toward the Dhamma, live according to the Dhamma, realize Nibbāna, and escape from saṃsāra. But if, during the time of a Buddha's appearance, in a place where that Dhamma exists, one has obtained a human life-state, free from physical or mental disabilities, and with the power of intelligence—that is what is called khaṇa-sampatti (the opportunity of the moment). It is to make use of that khaṇa-sampatti that the Buddha constantly advises us. He has shown its value. Why? Especially as mentioned here, the stream-enterer escapes from hell—the very first escape. Everyone must reflect: escape from saṃsāra—from the entirety of saṃsāra—is obtained through Arahantship; but even before that, a wonderful kind of liberation obtained through the first fruit of the path is the escape—the deliverance—from the terrifying state of going to the lower realms. The Buddha and the Great Arahants possessing direct-knowledge (abhiññā) have declared that for infinite time, world beings suffer immense pain in the animal realm, the ghost realm, the asura realm, and in hell. Since such a calamitous, risky situation exists in the world—in life—one must learn lessons through the disasters and calamities one experiences, through the experiences in these terrifying periods, without pushing aside these noble states, insight-knowledges, the paths and fruits, and the Four Noble Truths. Some people solve the very same math problem every day. They solve it and solve it, but it is wrong. The right answer does not come. In just the same way, beings in this saṃsāra wander on, unable to understand these Four Noble Truths. The Buddha himself has declared: "Monks, it is because of not knowing these Four Noble Truths that both you and I have wandered in this saṃsāra for such an infinite time, covered by ignorance and bound by craving (taṇhā)." One must utilize the experiences of life to realize the Four Noble Truths. If any disasters or calamities come, that is the truth of suffering (dukkha) declared by the Buddha. Just like that brahmin understood, "A part of that has come to me; at the bottom of this lies craving (taṇhā)." That is something done through wise attention [yoniso manasikāra].

What is called wise attention [yoniso manasikāra] is wise reflection. If things spring from a certain place, looking right there—at that. If one looks away from there, the truth of it will never be understood. What is called ayoniso manasikāra is inappropriate reflection. In fact, the Buddha has declared that there are four factors that help one to become a stream-enterer: sappurisa-saṃsevo, saddhamma-savaṇaṃ, wise attention [yoniso-manasikāro], dhammānudhamma-paṭipatti.

Sappurisa-saṃsevo means association with virtuous people, association with a spiritual friend (kalyāṇa-mitta). Saddhamma-savaṇaṃ means hearing the true Dhamma—listening to the sublime Dhamma. Yoniso-manasikāro means wise attention. Next, dhammānudhamma-paṭipatti means practicing in accordance with the Dhamma—the Noble Eightfold Path. Thus, these four. Now, someone might doubt whether these four were completed for that brahmin. But for someone who has fulfilled them in past saṃsāra, that deep understanding can be gained with a very slight stimulus. Understanding comes to different individuals in different ways. Even among you devotees, there are those who understand when a little is said. There is a saying in society: "I understand even as someone turns." Just like that. There were those who understood even as they turned. When the Buddha just used a word or two, there were those who understood through that alone and realized Nibbāna. For some, it has to be explained at length. For some, various expedients must be employed. Here too, the Buddha, in order to cultivate faith in that brahmin, went to the field constantly, behaving like an intimate visitor. The Buddha saw that such a great loss was going to happen to the brahmin. It was not that he did not see it—not that he expected a portion of the harvest. But gradually, taking special trouble for his sake, he carried the Buddha's Dispensation to that brahmin. The result of that was the brahmin's attainment of liberation.

In that way, you devotees too must make an effort to understand the true state of life, to understand the nature of saṃsāra, through the life struggles and disasters you encounter. Do not always remain in the class of gratification (assāda) as if you are in a good class. The Buddha declared that there is a side of danger (ādīnava) to this. "I went in search of the side of gratification in the world. Whatever gratification there is in the world, I understood that. Next, I went in search of the side of danger. That state of danger too, I understood. Next, I researched the escape (nissaraṇa)—the departure—from the world." He also uses that word "research." That is something used nowadays in scholarly works—"research." Two terms have been used: anariya-pariyesana and ariya-pariyesana—the ignoble search and the noble search, the inappropriate search and the appropriate search. Thus, the Buddha, through this noble search, realized that escape—Nibbāna. Having realized it, the Buddha then helped the beings of the world—devas, humans, poor individuals of that sort, men and women who had fallen victim to various harassments, great bandits, those of corrupted character, and likewise monks, various sectarians, wanderers (paribbājakas), Nigaṇṭhas, and so on—everyone. He saw that these beings also had certain good qualities from their past saṃsāra. Delivering sermons of a nature that subdued their bad qualities, he brought them to the practice in accordance with the Dhamma. Here, that association with virtuous people (sappurisa-saṃsevo) helps. Next, hearing the true Dhamma. That brahmin received all four of these at once. The supreme spiritual friend (kalyāṇa-mitta) in the world visited the field—that house—of that brahmin. Thus, the gain of a virtuous person was obtained. As the hearing of the true Dhamma, even those stanza lines sufficed. Next, wise attention [yoniso manasikāra]. The brahmin directed his mind, turned to look at his mind instead of the sight of the field, and understood that truth. Through wise attention [yoniso manasikāra], the path was cleared for the practice in accordance with the Dhamma (dhammānudhamma-paṭipatti). Now, sometimes, someone might think that this means applying the entirety of the Noble Eightfold Path throughout one's whole life. Indeed, such application is necessary for a person. But for someone who has fulfilled those Dhammas in the past, that practice in accordance with the Dhamma is completed in a very short time. If someone detaches their mind from the world and refrains from food, saying "I do not want life," that person has few defilements. Though they have given up expectation for life with a wrong idea, yet, on such an occasion, the moment this Dhamma fell upon the brahmin, the Noble Eightfold Path must have been completed within his mind. That is something extremely profound.

Now you devotees know that many are eager to see the colors of a rainbow—especially small children. When looking at the sky at a time when it is about to rain, it is something we can see only rarely. But even if we cannot see it like that all the time, we can see the beautiful colors of the sun in a rainbow by looking at a tiny dewdrop hanging from a leaf of a creeper, exactly in line with the rising sun. It shines like a gem. Within it, those rays can be seen. Through a dewdrop, one can see something like a rainbow. In the same way, through a small stanza—a line of a stanza, a word—if someone looks exactly in line with the target, if they establish right view (sammā-diṭṭhi), they can see Nibbāna through it. The mental revolution that occurred within that brahmin was such a thing.

Thinking deeply in that manner, we can take many examples from this Dhamma story. In the same way, we must constantly reflect on how our lives are spent, on the true nature of life. The Buddha has shown the true nature, the reality of this life (this word is used in society now)—"things as they really are"—in four sentences, in four Dhamma themes. These four are:

1. Upanīyati loko addhuvo (The world is swept away, it is impermanent (anicca))
2. Atāṇo loko anabhissaro (The world is without protection, without a ruler)
3. Assako loko sabbam pahāya gamanīyaṃ (The world has nothing of its own, all must be left behind and gone)
4. Ūno loko atitto taṇhā dāso (The world is insufficient, insatiable, a slave to craving (taṇhā))

We get an excellent exposition of these four Dhamma themes from Venerable Raṭṭhapāla. Venerable Raṭṭhapāla is one who received the foremost position among those who went forth out of faith in this Dispensation. On many occasions, the Buddha gave foremost positions in various fields to his disciples. In wisdom, Venerable Sāriputta is foremost. Among those of psychic power, the great Venerable Moggallāna is foremost. Among attendants, Venerable Ānanda is foremost. Nowadays, in universities too, various degrees are given in that manner. That is as an example to the world. If you want wisdom, look this way. If you want psychic powers, look that way. If you want matters of personal service, look this way. In that manner, if you want to see the power in faith, the extraordinary miracle in faith, look at Venerable Raṭṭhapāla. Because Venerable Raṭṭhapāla, having heard the Dhamma from the Buddha once, asked permission from his parents to go forth. Venerable Raṭṭhapāla belonged to an extremely wealthy family. When he asked permission from his parents at that young age, permission was not granted. He lay down on the floor right there. "Either death, or permission to go forth," he said. He began a fast unto death. Finally, unable to resolve this, his friends gathered, spoke to the parents, and somehow obtained permission for him to go forth. After Venerable Raṭṭhapāla became an Arahant, he visited his home village. When he visited the Kuru country, King Koravya of that Kuru country asked Venerable Raṭṭhapāla, "Venerable Raṭṭhapāla, having been born in such a wealthy family, at such a young age, why did you go forth? What was the reason to go forth?" On that occasion, Venerable Raṭṭhapāla said, "It is after hearing four Dhamma themes declared by the Buddha—four Dhamma themes that declare the reality of life—knowing their state, seeing them, and understanding them to be true, that I went forth. It was not for nothing." We mentioned what these four points are.

He declared to the king: the nature of the world is "Upanīyati loko addhuvo"—"The world is an unstable place, swept forward." The king asked him to explain this, since it seemed a bit like a riddle. Then, Venerable Raṭṭhapāla, by way of explaining it, asked the king: "Great King, when you were about twenty or twenty-five years old, how was it? Did you have good physical strength, bodily vigor? Were you skilled in managing the elephant, horse, chariot, and infantry forces, in riding elephants and horses, and in the arts of swordplay and archery?" "Oh yes, at that time, I felt that there was no one as powerful, as strong as I. I even felt that I possessed psychic powers. To that extent, I had physical power and strength." Then, Venerable Raṭṭhapāla asked, "Well, Great King, is it the same now?" "Oh, it is not so now. Now I am about eighty years old. A decrepit old man. Now sometimes when I mean to place my foot here, I place it there. Even my limbs are not under my control." "This, Great King, is what the Buddha declared: 'Upanīyati loko addhuvo', the world is swept forward by decay. This is an impermanent (anicca) thing. The world is impermanent (anicca)—what is called 'the world' is worldlings—life; this is that very truth of life." Then the king declared, "It is wonderful, Venerable Sir, it is marvelous, this matter. How true is what the Buddha declared!" Thus, the truth, the reality regarding the life of an extremely poor person as well as the life of a great king, is what the Buddha declared through this line of Dhamma.

Next, concerning the second point, the king asked Venerable Raṭṭhapāla: "Venerable Sir, why did you declare 'Atāṇo loko anabhissaro'?" The general meaning of that is "The world is a place without protection, without a ruler." Even nowadays, if that is said, one is startled. "The world is a place without protection, without a ruler: why was that declared?" The king asked, "I have elephant, horse, chariot, and infantry forces. I have so much protection. Why was this declared?" Then, Venerable Raṭṭhapāla asked the king, "Great King, do you have any chronic illness?" The king declared, "Yes, Venerable Sir, I have a severe wind-illness (vātābādha). On some occasions, when that wind-illness becomes acute, my relatives and friends surround me, and I hear them saying, 'Now King Koravya will pass away, he will die.'" Then, Venerable Raṭṭhapāla asked, "Great King, on such occasions, can you tell those relatives and friends, 'Oh, please, gather together and share a little of my pain, reduce my pain'? Can you do that? Can you share your pain with those relatives and friends of yours and obtain relief?" "I cannot do that," the king declared. "That, Great King, is what the Buddha declared: 'Atāṇo loko anabhissaro'. The world is a place without protection, without a ruler. One cannot obtain protection in such situations." Then too, the king accepted it, saying, "What a wonderful, marvelous matter!"

Next, the king asked: "Now, in this royal palace, I have gold, silver, pearls, gems, and much wealth and grain. While having these, Venerable Raṭṭhapāla, why do you declare 'Assako loko sabbaṃ pahāya gamanīyaṃ'?" The meaning of that is: the world is a place where there is nothing one can call one's own, a place where everything must be left behind and gone. When asked about the meaning of this statement, Venerable Raṭṭhapāla inquired: "Now, Great King, you live well, enjoying these fivefold cords of sensual pleasure. When going to the next world, can you take these with you? Or do you have to hand them over to someone here and go? You have to abandon them and go, do you not?" "It is just so, Venerable Sir, I cannot take even one of these with me. I go to the next world in accordance with my own karma; taking the good and bad I have done, I go to the next world," the king said. "This, Great King, is what the Buddha declared: there is nothing in the world one can call one's own, everything must be abandoned and gone." The king accepted that.

Next, what is declared finally is also what is relevant to the stanza we recalled on this occasion—"Ūno loko atitto taṇhā dāso". The king asked about the meaning of this too. The meaning of that passage is: "The world is a place with a constant deficiency, insatiable, a slave to craving (taṇhā)." Then, Venerable Raṭṭhapāla, to make the king realize it, asked several questions: "Now, Great King, you reign as the ruler of this Kuru country, which is highly prosperous, do you not?" "Yes." "Now, some spy, or a trustworthy person, comes to meet you. Having arrived, he tells you this news: 'I am coming from the eastern direction. In that direction, there is a very wealthy and prosperous country. You can conquer it very easily.' When that is said, Great King, what do you do regarding that—when such news is received?" "I will conquer that country too." "Next, he asks: 'Very well, in the same way, a messenger comes from the western direction and says: "In that direction, Your Majesty, there is such a large territory, you can conquer it very easily."' Then I will capture that too, I will conquer that too.' In the same way, from the northern direction, and from the southern direction." When the king declared in this manner, Venerable Raṭṭhapāla drove the point home: "It is because of that, Great King, that the Buddha declared: 'The world is a place with some kind of deficiency.' All the time, something is needed. Never is one satisfied. A slave to craving (taṇhā). The king too has become a slave to craving (taṇhā). The king thinks he is the sovereign. Now, in this day and age too, there are those who hold various titles of 'sovereign' (adhipati). Even though the word 'sovereign' has a general meaning, all these people are slaves to craving—'slaves to craving (taṇhā)'. The king too is a slave to craving (taṇhā)." "

Then, escaping from this state of being a slave to craving is what is called freeing oneself from craving (taṇhā). Nibbāna is the stilling of this thirst of craving (taṇhā), the occasion when that thirst is stilled. Like a feverish patient asking for water, this craving (taṇhā) has pushed us through saṃsāra for an infinite time. This is never stilled, even if one is replete with the most exquisite things, the most valuable luxury items. When thinking about the luxury and wealth of a universal monarch (cakkavatti), the pleasures enjoyed by the wealthy in those countries called "developed" nowadays are "beggarly pleasures"; universal monarchs have enjoyed such vast pleasures. Yet, even with that, they were not satisfied. This is the nature of craving (taṇhā). This fire can never be extinguished by adding firewood to it. Instead, right where that fire arose—right there—it must be extinguished, just as that brahmin eradicated his craving (taṇhā) right there regarding his field. At the same time, he gained a deep understanding. "This is the trick to escaping from saṃsāra, this is the secret here"—because the brahmin understood this, he attained the state of stream-entry. It is by bringing to light this principle through the life struggles, disasters, and calamities one encounters, that one can utilize that blessing in disguise. Because of that, whether they appear as calamities of the times, or whether they are various other revolutions that occur in the world, we must look to bring to light this Buddha's Dispensation through them. "Buddha's Dispensation" (Buddha Śāsanaya) is a big word, a heavy word. Nowadays, there is a tendency for only the sound of words to remain while the meaning slips away. Especially, the sound of words related to the Dhamma increases more and more, but the meaning slips away. One such word is "Buddha's Dispensation." Nowadays, if "Buddha's Dispensation" is mentioned, buildings come to mind. Various things must come to mind when "Buddha's Dispensation" is mentioned. But when thinking deeply, the very Buddha's Dispensation that the Great Arahant Mahinda brought to Sri Lanka and handed over to King Devanampiyatissa is what the Buddha went to that poor brahmin's house and gave. The ultimate goal of that Buddha's Dispensation is Nibbāna. The philosophy of life is the Noble Eightfold Path, right view (sammā-ditṭhi), and the Four Noble Truths. The practice of life is the path of virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). This is the Buddha's Dispensation. Thus, it is this Buddha's Dispensation that Buddhist devotees must bring to mind and protect on a day like today.

The things that help to protect this Buddha's Dispensation are what we mentioned. Now, it was declared that four factors help to attain the state of stream-entry. Association with virtuous people (sappurisa-saṃseva)—when reflecting on daily life, this is a factor that must be utilized with much mind-application and care, this "association with virtuous people." The person called "virtuous" (sappurisa) is introduced in the Dhamma as a spiritual friend (kalyāṇa-mitta). A spiritual friend is a layperson or a monk who possesses Dhamma-knowledge, lives according to the Dhamma, and practices meditation. The one who leads a life in accordance with the Dhamma is the virtuous person. Such a virtuous person is like a lighthouse to society. He is like a lamp-post (pahan kanuwa). You devotees know well what a lamp-post is. A lamp-post is an object that gives light to others. In the same way, the person called a "virtuous person," a "spiritual friend," is a lamp-post. The greatest lamp-post in the world is the Buddha, the foremost in the three worlds—the Buddha who diffused that light of Dhamma. Next to him is the Community of Noble Monks (Ariya-saṅgha) of the eight noble individuals. Or else, those lay or ordained devotees who lead a life in accordance with the Dhamma and practice meditation. Every such person is a lighthouse, a lamp-post, a virtuous person, a spiritual friend. It is by associating with such spiritual friends that one's progress is ensured, and samsaric liberation can be obtained. When thinking on the other hand, it is bad friends (pāpa-mitta) who are in the majority in the world, in the majority in society. Keeping such persons at a distance as much as possible, if possible avoiding them altogether, being wary of them, one must lead one's life. Why? Because through association with bad friends, one meets with terrifying destruction.

On one occasion, Venerable Ānanda, going to express the value of this association with spiritual friends, said to the Buddha: "Venerable Sir, as it appears to me, spiritual friendship (kalyāṇa-mittatā) is half of the Buddha's Dispensation; half of this Buddha's Dispensation is valued as spiritual friendship." The Buddha declared: "Ānanda, do not say so. It is not half of this Buddha's Dispensation, but the entirety of the Buddha's Dispensation is spiritual friendship. What is called the Buddha's Dispensation is spiritual friendship, the fortune of a spiritual friend." Now, you devotees have gathered here due to some spiritual friendship. You might not know one another. Personally, you might not be people with individual relationships. But in terms of the Dhamma—in terms of listening to the Dhamma, in being devoted to the Dhamma—the quality of a spiritual friend is there. It is in that manner that a Buddha's Dispensation exists. Through association with bad friends, the Dispensation falls into decline. Going in search of spiritual friends, associating with them, taking from them what should be taken—taking help—is how a Buddha's Dispensation has to be protected. Association with virtuous people—"association with virtuous people" (sappurisa-saṃsevo)—is an extremely rare thing. The Buddha has shown six rare things:

1. Dullabho buddhuppādo lokasmiṃ (Rare is the appearance of a Buddha in the world)
2. Dullabho manussattapaṭilābho (Rare is the acquisition of a human birth)
3. Dullabhā khaṇasampatti (Rare is the opportunity of the moment)
4. Dullabho pabbajjā (Rare is ordination)
5. Dullabhaṃ saddhammassavanaṃ (Rare is the hearing of the true Dhamma)
6. Dullabho sappurisa-saṃsevo (Rare is association with virtuous people)

The time of a Buddha's appearance is extremely rare. Human birth is extremely rare. In the same way, the opportunity of the moment (khaṇasampatti) is rare. What we mentioned—the intelligent human life-state, free from disabilities, obtained during the time of a Buddha's appearance—is khaṇasampatti. That too is rare. Nobler than that, ordination is rare. Next, nobler than that, hearing the Dhamma is rare. More than all of those, finally, association with virtuous people (sappurisa-saṃsevo) is the rarest. Association with virtuous people is just like the bullseye in the center of a target board. Why? Because even though the time of a Buddha's appearance is rare, within it, many other factors must come together for someone to attain liberation. Even if one obtains the time of a Buddha's appearance, a human birth must be obtained. Along with human birth, the opportunity of the moment, ordination, and next, the hearing of the Dhamma. In this way, the factors become extremely rare one by one. If proper association with a spiritual friend is obtained, then for such a person, Nibbāna is hastened. For that brahmin, as if by fortune, the supreme spiritual friend in the world was met. It is because of that that he attained that state so quickly. In the same way is the hearing of the true Dhamma. One must listen to the Dhamma that leads to Nibbāna, incline one's ear to it, direct one's mind to it. One must make an effort to understand the Dhamma. Hearing the Dhamma is not to be done as a mere custom. Gathering together the group of Dhammas within oneself that help toward Nibbāna, directing the mind, focusing the mind to the extent of obtaining the realization of the paths and fruits even during that occasion of hearing the Dhamma, listening with concentration—that is how the Dhamma should be heard. Next, it is during such an occasion of hearing the Dhamma that wise attention [yoniso manasikāra]—wise reflection—occurs. Now, that brahmin reflected wisely and, while looking at the field, suddenly began to look at his mind by way of wise attention [yoniso manasikāra]. Next, the mental revolution that occurs due to such looking is what is called the practice in accordance with the Dhamma (dhammānuddhamma-paṭipatti). For certain persons, it is completed in a single moment. But for most, it has to be practiced as a preliminary part over a long period. That is how one's pattern of life must be shaped. That pattern of life is what is called the Noble Eightfold Path. Through that Noble Eightfold Path of sammā-diṭṭhi, sammā-saṅkappa, sammā-vācā, sammā-kammanta, sammā-ājīva, sammā-vāyāma, sammā-sati, sammā-samādhi*, a person's entire life is shaped in accordance with the Dhamma.

Sammā-diṭṭhi means right view—the right philosophy of life. Understanding good and bad, wholesome and unwholesome, having gained some level of understanding of the Four Noble Truths of suffering (dukkha), its cause, its stilling which is Nibbāna, and the way to it, the Noble Eightfold Path, one puts that view—that right view—at the forefront. It is declared: "Sammā-diṭṭhi pubbaṅgamā." Everywhere, view is chief, it is at the forefront. Now, even when you devotees walk on the road, why do you look ahead? By looking ahead, you establish some resolution, some determination, regarding the place you are going. In the same way, if there is an understanding of the Four Noble Truths through right view, one establishes the target of Nibbāna, saying "My journey is a journey to Nibbāna, a journey going toward Nibbāna." "Buddha's Dispensation" means a way of life that has Nibbāna as its target, not buildings. Then, if right view—right seeing—has arisen, next there are right thoughts and intentions that go in accordance with right seeing. In accordance with that philosophy of life, one must cultivate good thoughts and concepts—good thoughts. Thoughts of loving-kindness (mettā) opposed to ill-will, thoughts of non-harming (avihiṃsā) opposed to cruelty—one must constantly develop these thoughts. If right thoughts and intentions have arisen in that manner, the words that come out from that person are also correct words, truthful words, words that do not divide others, gentle words that are not harsh, words in accordance with the Dhamma. In that way, they use good words. Next, the courses of action are abstaining from the wrongs done by the body: killing living beings, stealing, and sexual misconduct. Next, right livelihood is what is mentioned in the livelihood-as-the-eighth virtue (ājīva-aṭṭhamaka-sīla) that we undertook on this occasion. It spoke about abstaining from wrong livelihood (micchā-ājīva). These days, many, enslaved by the effort to build up the economy, turn to wrong livelihoods. Whether they did those due to poverty or other reasons, it is because those help one to go to terrifying places like hell in this saṃsāra that the Buddha prohibited them. What are they? Trading in weapons, trading in living beings for meat, trading in poisons, trading in flesh, trading in intoxicants. The Buddha declared that carrying on one's livelihood through these leads to one's decline. Sometimes, one can become rich quickly through these. But even though one becomes rich, it is because one will have to suffer their terrifying consequences that the Buddha prohibited them. Because of that, abstaining from wrong livelihood and establishing a good livelihood is a source of great solace for a person. There is no regret for such a person. That mind is constantly pure. That purity is not possessed even by a person with a massive amount of wealth. Or else, even someone with a large salary does not have that happiness—the happiness of one's own blamelessness. That is called the happiness of blamelessness (anavajja-sukha). The happiness regarding correctness, the absence of regret, is a great solace. A person who obtains a massive amount of wealth sometimes cannot sleep. He remembers that he obtained that wealth through improper means. Therefore, one who expects ultimate solace must necessarily consider one's own livelihood. Sometimes, some people are addicted to ancestral wrong livelihoods. "We cannot abandon those jobs that came from our parents; those are what we have inherited as our custom; those are things we are used to." But if someone has properly understood the Buddha's word, regardless of the loss to themselves, they adjust their livelihood in accordance with the Dhamma. Sometimes, they turn to a righteous job that yields a small salary, a lower income. That is what is called establishing right livelihood (sammā-ājīva). Through the effort exerted to establish right livelihood, "right effort" (sammā-vāyāma) arises in that person. The correct effort is the exertion made to prevent unwholesome thoughts from entering one's mind, to remove unwholesome thoughts that are in the mind, to produce wholesome thoughts not yet in oneself, and to establish wholesome thoughts that are in oneself. It is to this fourfold effort that "right effort" (sammā-vāyāma) is called. The person who exerts effort in that manner, because of the mindfulness (sati) applied for that sake, lives with good mindfulness called "right mindfulness" (sammā-sati). Like a good watchman, they apply mindfulness well. If mindfulness is applied well, the Four Foundations of Mindfulness (cattāro satipaṭṭhānā) is well understood. One understands well regarding one's body, regarding feelings / sensations [vedanā], regarding the mind, and regarding the thoughts that come to the mind. It is by developing those Four Foundations of Mindfulness systematically that one can attain even those noble absorption states (jhāna) called right concentration (sammā-samādhi). If the Noble Eightfold Path is completed within someone in that manner, right there is Nibbāna. Supramundane-wise, along with the completion of the Noble Eightfold Path, one can obtain the realization of the paths and fruits called Stream-entry, Once-returning, Non-returning, and Arahantship.

Then, you devotees must reflect: if we talk about a Buddha's Dispensation on a day like today, what is called the Buddha's Dispensation is just that—the Noble Eightfold Path, the Four Noble Truths, or else the development of virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). Except for describing it through such words, the Buddha's Dispensation cannot be described by way of other buildings or symbols. Therefore, if protecting that Buddha's Dispensation is our duty as Buddhists, we must also be eager to adjust our way of life and our outlook on life accordingly. The story presented in this Dhamma sermon is a simple, ordinary story. We should not discard these saying they are things in old books. Unlike those novels and short stories of these days, these are things directly relevant to the experiences of our University of Life. Therefore, you devotees must make an effort to realize Nibbāna through those very experiences. Especially, the occasion of hearing the Dhamma is—as declared by the Buddha—a place to obtain liberation, an avenue of liberation (vimuttāyatana). There are various kinds of liberations. But the Buddha has declared the places where samsaric liberation is obtained. The occasion of hearing the Dhamma is such an occasion. The occasion of preaching the Dhamma is also such an occasion. Therefore, if you devotees have heard the Dhamma well, many wholesome thoughts that help toward that liberation—that help in life—must have arisen in your minds on this occasion. Utilizing that mass of wholesome feelings / sensations [vedanā] as a strong support (upanissaya), you must wish: "May we be able to escape from this extremely terrifying, dreadful saṃsāra, be freed from all samsaric suffering (dukkha) of birth (jāti), aging and death (jarāmaraṇa), sickness, and death, and realize the sublime, deathless, great peace of Nibbāna, which is immeasurable and beyond reckoning!" In the same way, you must wish: "May the guardian deities and Brahmas of the Dispensation, and whatever assembly of deities are presiding over this place, and all those who desire Nibbāna, who desire merit, rejoice in this merit of preaching the Dhamma and hearing the Dhamma!" In the same way, you must make the wish: "May all beings, including one's own relatives and friends, from the lowest hell (Avīci) up to the highest heaven (Akaniṭṭha), whoever desire merit, whoever desire Nibbāna, rejoice in this merit of preaching the Dhamma and hearing the Dhamma, escape from all samsaric suffering (dukkha), and be solaced by the sublime, deathless, great peace of Nibbāna!" Having made this wish, now share the merit by reciting the stanzas in this manner:

“Ettāvatā ca amhehi.....”

Verse 40 from the Cittavagga (Chapter on the Mind) of the Dhammapada

Dear Listeners,

The Blessed One has on many occasions presented the spiritual effort to escape from this extremely terrifying suffering (dukkha) of saṃsāra as a battle against Mara—a warfare with Mara. We must reflect a little on why the Blessed One introduces this concept of Mara, putting the concept of a battle into our minds. Generally, for the practicing devotees (yogāvacara) who begin meditation to free themselves from this suffering (dukkha) of saṃsāra, numerous obstacles present themselves from both outside and within. Faced with these obstacles, the meditating yogi often becomes weak-minded, discouraged, and hesitant. It is to eliminate that tendency to hesitate and to make them courageous that the Blessed One presented this battle against defilements as a warfare with Mara. The reason for this is that bringing out the combative nature inherent within the human mind helps to strengthen the mind in times when it becomes discouraged and hesitant. That is why, in various places in the Buddha's teachings, amazing battle cries and slogans of the warfare with Mara are mentioned. It is such a verse, like a battle slogan, that we have chosen as our theme on this occasion.

The occasion that led the Blessed One to deliver this verse is recorded in the scriptures as follows. During the time the Blessed One was residing at Jetavana monastery in Sāvattihī, five hundred monks practicing insight meditation, having obtained meditation subjects (kammaṭṭhāna) from the Blessed One, departed for a distant village with the intention of practicing insight in a suitable and comfortable place. Having arrived at that place—a certain village—while the monks were walking through, the faithful lay people of that village inquired about the monks' intentions. Upon understanding that they were searching for a place suitable for meditation, they invited them, saying, "There is a very secluded forest grove nearby. Venerable Sirs, please reside there during these three months of the rains retreat. This will be an excellent opportunity for us to observe the precepts and develop faith in the Triple Gem." Thus, they extended an invitation.

In accordance with that invitation, these monks entered the secluded forest grove. The tree deities inhabiting the trees in that grove, out of respect for the virtue of these moral monks and reflecting on the majesty of their virtue (sīla), thought, "It is not proper for us to stay high up while these venerable ones are on the ground," and so they descended from the trees. They assumed that these monks would only spend that single night there. However, having gone to the village for alms, the monks returned to the same spot the next day. Then, the deities realized they would have to remain on the ground continuously. As the monks continued to stay day after day, the deities realized that these monks might remain there for several months. Then they thought, "We must drive these monks away by some means. Otherwise, we won't be able to climb back up or live in our trees." So, what did they do? They began to display various forms in the places where the monks meditated. They showed terrifying sights, such as headless corpses, and made non-human noises around the walking meditation paths to frighten the monks. Due to the fear that arose in their minds, the monks could not sleep properly and became ill, each monk suffering from a different ailment. As they discussed this among themselves, each disclosing the visions they had seen, they concluded, "This is not a suitable place for us. This place is infested with non-human disturbances. We must go and find another place. But first, we must inform the Blessed One of this matter." Thus, they returned to the Blessed One.

The Blessed One asked, "Monks, why have you returned?" Then they explained, "We are facing these kinds of afflictions and troubles." But the Blessed One said, "Monks, nevertheless, you must go back to that very place. That indeed is the best place for you." The monks pleaded again, "Venerable Sir, we simply cannot go back there." Then the Blessed One said, "Monks, you went there unarmed. This time, depart fully armed with a proper weapon."

Then those monks asked, "What, O Blessed One, is that weapon?" That weapon was what the Blessed One then expounded as the Metta Sutta. For the first time, for the sake of those monks, the Blessed One delivered this Metta Sutta, which is of immense benefit to the world. The Blessed One advised those monks, "Memorize this Metta Sutta, and as you enter that forest grove, chant it from afar as you go in. Practice it constantly." The monks did exactly as instructed; they entered the forest grove chanting it from the very moment of their approach. Depending on that Karaṇīyametta Sutta, they developed a mind of loving-kindness (mettā). By the power of that loving-kindness, the hearts of the deities who had previously harassed them softened—it is recorded that, far from troubling them, they even came forward to welcome them, perform various duties for them, and even arranged for their protection. Those non-human noises and various apparitions completely ceased. An environment was created in which the monks could meditate comfortably and calm their minds. The minds of the venerable ones became concentrated, aided by the concentration of loving-kindness (mettā-samādhi). Once concentrated, the venerable ones then directed their minds toward insight (vipassanā). Reflecting on this cage of a body, realizing that it is like a fragile clay pot, all five hundred monks began to develop insight, contemplating its unstable nature, its impermanent (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and non-self (anattā) nature.

At this juncture, the Blessed One, residing many leagues away at Jetavana monastery, observed these monks. It is a unique feature of the Blessed One that no matter where or how far those monks were whom He had sent after giving meditation subjects, He could encompass them in His net of Buddha-knowledge. Because He possessed an extraordinary Buddha-knowledge that no modern machine could ever replicate, the Blessed One constantly kept watch over how the minds of His disciples to whom He had given meditation subjects were functioning. Thus, He saw that all five hundred of them had now entered the path of insight, and their thoughts were directed in that direction. Based on the very theme they had initiated—the meditation subject of the clay pot which they had taken to heart—the Blessed One then uttered the verse we mentioned at the beginning. So meaningful was this verse, and so many deep aspects of meditation were contained within it, that upon hearing it, those monks are said to have attained Arahantship together with the four analytical knowledges (paṭisambhidā). Let us now recall that verse once again:

Kumbhūpamaṃ kāyamimaṃ viditvā

Nagarūpamaṃ cittamidaṃ ṭhapetvā

Yodhetha māraṃ paññāyudhena

Jitañca rakkhe anivesano siyā

“Kumbhūpamaṃ kāyamimaṃ viditvā” — Knowing and understanding that this body, this physical frame, is comparable to a clay pot.

“Nagarūpamaṃ cittamidaṃ ṭhapetvā” — Keeping this mind of ours in a state comparable to a fortified city, treating it as a city that must be guarded.

“Yodhetha māraṃ paññāyudhena” — Fight against Mara with the weapon of wisdom.

“Jitañca rakkhe anivesano siyā” — Having fought and won a victory, protect that win. However, “anivesano siyā” means do not get attached to, wallow in, or settle down in what has been won. Do not just stop there—this special advice is also contained in this verse.

Thus, this is an extremely deep verse. Particularly for those who turn to meditation, we can reveal a vast number of highly important instructions from this verse and from its background story.

Now, if we reflect on that background story for a moment, it shows that those venerable ones went there with the intention of developing insight (vipassanā) and realizing Nibbāna. However, although the venerable ones were perfect in virtue (sīla), they had a certain deficiency on the side of concentration (samādhi)—that is, on the side of serenity (samatha). That is to say, they had not properly practiced the meditation of loving-kindness. It must have been due to this deficiency in loving-kindness (mettā) that they had to face such great disturbances. Subsequently, it was through the benefits of the instructions given by the Blessed One in the Karaṇīyametta Sutta that they were able to concentrate their minds. In this connection, we must remember that the Blessed One has pointed out eleven benefits as the advantages of the meditation of loving-kindness. These venerable ones must have experienced many of those eleven benefits. Namely:

* Sukhaṃ supati — One who develops loving-kindness sleeps happily.

* Sukhaṃ paṭibujjhati — One wakes up happily with a refreshed mind.

* Na pāpakaṃ supinaṃ passati — One does not see evil or terrifying dreams.

* Manussānaṃ piyo hoti — One is dear to human beings.

* Amanussānaṃ piyo hoti — One is dear to non-human beings.

* Devatā rakkhanti — Devas protect him.

* Nāssa aggi vā visam vā sattham vā kamati — Fire, poison, or weapons do not harm the body of one who practices loving-kindness.

* Tuvataṃ cittaṃ samādhīyati — The mind concentrates quickly.

* Mukhavanno vipasīdati — One's facial complexion becomes clear and bright.

* Asammūḷho kālaṃ karoti — One dies unconfused; that is, one dies with clear mindfulness.

* Uttariṃ appaṭivijjhanto brahmalokūpago hoti — If one does not penetrate higher and attain Arahantship, at the very least, by the power of that mettā absorption (jhāna), one is reborn in the Brahma world. Thus, the Blessed One has shown these eleven benefits.

It was in accordance with these benefits that the disturbances previously suffered by those monks due to terrifying visions were appeased, and they were able to satisfy and calm their minds.

Thus, we can see the value of serenity (samatha) in the first part of this story. Thereafter, the mind thus satisfied realized the value of insight (vipassanā). Put another way, one must not be satisfied with serenity (samatha) alone. Therefore, the one who has developed serenity should next turn toward insight. For the highest result that can be obtained during the era of a Buddha's appearance is the realization of the Paths and Fruits—seeing Nibbāna. Therefore, in that manner, they turned from serenity to insight. At that moment, they reflected on their own bodies and compared them to a clay pot.

Indeed, what is meant by formations (saṅkhāra) is the preparations made by our minds, the accumulation of karma, and so forth. There is an extremely deep meaning within the word saṅkhāra. It is through such forces operating within the mind itself that even this cage of our body is created. Next, what is specifically expressed here is the breakable, disintegrating nature of formations (saṅkhāra). They break apart moment by moment. This cage of a body, which we regard as something solid, real, and great, is decaying from within at a speed that is almost invisible to us—moment by moment. Because of the ordinary worldling's attachment to form (rūpa), this is not understood. But as the yogi's mind becomes increasingly stilled and subtle, he understands how this body disintegrates according to the moment-to-moment changes occurring within it. He realizes that a multitude of arisings (jāti) and passings away are operating within this bodily machine. Consequently, the understanding dawns on him that just as a potter molds a clay pot, this cage of a body and all other things are constructed by formations (saṅkhāra).

Thus, especially here, in accordance with mindfulness of the body (kāyagatāsati), the disintegrating nature of the body is understood. Generally, worldlings possess a perception of permanence (nicca-saññā) regarding this cage of a body. The root of all attachment and binding is this very cage of a body. That was the moment when those monks realized that such a body can be compared to a breakable clay pot or a vessel. It was at that very moment that the Blessed One preached that verse in that manner. Now let us examine the deep meanings contained in this verse, one by one.

“Kumbhūpamaṃ kāyamimaṃ viditvā” — Having understood this body to be like such a clay pot. Yet, most of the time, ordinary worldlings commit various evil deeds for the sake of this body. Forgetting that this body is breakable, that it decays moment by moment, and that no matter how much effort is made or how much comfort is provided, it must be abandoned around a hundred years of age or a little beyond, many people commit evil deeds solely for the sake of this body. Indeed, it might have been because even those monks gave too much prominence to the body that they became afraid and declared, "We cannot go back there anymore." You all know very well that if a soldier going to war remains attached to his body, he cannot fight. It is in this very way that the Blessed One presents this concept of warfare with Mara to the practicing yogi (yogāvacara). If the yogi prioritizes pampering this body and protecting it, he can never succeed in his spiritual life.

The soldier going to battle makes self-sacrifice for its sake. One who steps into a rapid river with the determination of "either death or crossing over" acts with that single-minded resolve: "death or crossing." In the same way, one engages in the task with a life-sacrificing dedication until victory is achieved. That should be the attitude of the yogi. That is why the Blessed One did not send them elsewhere—He did not say, "Then, monks, let me find a better place for you where there are no such troubles," but instead told them to return to that very place. However, the difference lies in what the Blessed One gave as the weapon for this battle against Mara. That is what we must truly reflect upon during this time.

When we think of war, a massive pile of weapons comes to our minds. We think of the standard weaponry of the respective eras of the world. But when those monks asked, "Venerable Sir, what is the weapon we should take?" the Blessed One presented loving-kindness (mettā). It was with that weapon that they stilled their minds. That is what we must reflect upon. Through that, the side of serenity (samatha) was fulfilled for those monks, and they learned a lesson: we must make a sacrifice if we are to escape from saṃsāra. The realization must have dawned on those monks that if we start working while holding onto this body, trying to protect this breakable clay pot, we can never realize Nibbāna. That is why, as soon as their minds became concentrated, those venerable ones directed their minds to insight (vipassanā).

Thus, “Kumbhūpamaṃ kāyamimaṃ viditvā.” Confirming the very thought of those monks, the Blessed One spoke further, encouraging them to make use of that realization. Having understood that this body is like a breakable clay pot, then: “Nagarūpamaṃ cittamidaṃ t̐apetvā” — what truly must be guarded, like a fortified city, is this mind. The value of guarding this mind is expressed in the next line. Keeping this mind in that state as a city to be guarded, then—“Yodhetha māraṃ paññāyudhena” — there comes the battle cry. Fight against Mara with the weapon of wisdom. Earlier, He gave the weapon of loving-kindness for serenity (samatha). Now He says to battle with Mara using the weapon of wisdom. And then: “Jitañca rakkhe anivesano siyā” — if you have fought and won something, protect it. But do not settle down there. Do not cling to it and stop there. Do not be attached to it. In those two lines, a highly practical piece of advice is contained, especially for meditating yogis. Then, “Yodhetha māraṃ” — who is this Mara? Who is the Mara that can be fought with the weapon of wisdom?

When we say "Mara", various forms might come to mind from different pictures one has seen. But if we reflect deeply, the real Mara for the practicing yogi (yogāvacara) is thought—known as vitakka (thought/reflection). Behind this Mara of thoughts (vitakka), a massive army of Mara flows in. If we reflect on our own minds, we can see how our mind operates, especially when we fall into defilements (kilesa). How rapidly does a stream of thoughts (vitakka) flow in? Submerged by them, through our actions, we get entangled in a heap of great sins and head towards hell, the animal realm, and so forth. Thus, Mara is this very thought (vitakka). The army of Mara is the army of thoughts (vitakka). So, one must fight this Mara with the weapon of wisdom.

What is this weapon of wisdom? Let us reflect on that next. If we consider it deeply, the weapon of wisdom refers to a special task that the practicing yogi (yogāvacara) has to perform. What is it? 'Contemplation' or 'attention'. It is called manasikāra (attention). It is through contemplating how our mind operates—all these things—that wisdom is developed. Because, through contemplation, the momentum of those thoughts (vitakka) is broken. By understanding each arising thought as "this is this, that is that" with mindfulness, clear comprehension (sati-sampajañña), and awareness, one realizes their true nature. In that moment, the rapidly running stream of thoughts (vitakka) is suppressed.

Therefore, to manage the stream of thoughts flowing into the mind and not let them wander aimlessly, one must contemplate to fight against Mara—the Mara of thoughts. If anger arises: "Here is an angry mind." Similarly, contemplating the objects that enter through the six doors of the eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind right at those very places. The action relevant to the insight meditation (vipassanā-bhāvanā) that a yogi has to perform is contemplation. It is the contemplation of formations (saṅkhāra). Thinking of these as formations (saṅkhāra)—the very term saṅkhāra implies that they are disintegrating things. Instead of taking what disintegrates as permanent (nicca), through contemplation one sees how they arise, exist for a brief moment—even for a mere split second—and then pass away. They come, exist, and disappear. To see this nature of arising (jāti) and passing away within one's own mind-stream is indeed the fundamental work of insight meditation (vipassanā-bhāvanā). Thus, the contemplation and attention (manasikāra) that performs this is what is presented here as wisdom. In truth, the ultimate purpose of insight meditation is the understanding of these phenomena of

Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). Our understanding of the entire world is gained by properly understanding these phenomena of Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa).

The mental phenomena (Name) are things anyone can identify just by looking at the mind. There is no need for a strange word for feeling (vedanā). Everyone knows feeling (vedanā) includes not only pleasant feeling and painful feeling but also neutral feeling—all of them. Perception (saññā)—recognition. One can call them perceptions. Based on feeling (vedanā), various perceptions are formed. Then, based on perceptions, intentions (cetanā) arise—various intentions. Everyone knows what intention is. Next, contact (phassa). A sense of contact (phassa) arises where things impinge. Then there is attention (manasikāra)—contemplation. These five mentioned phenomena are often taken as mental phenomena (Name). Next, what are shown as material phenomena (Form) are earth, water, fire, and wind (pathavī, āpo, tejo, vāyo)—the four great elements (mahābhūta) out of which our body and external things are composed. It is their combination that miraculously conjures up and displays various forms (rūpa). These four 'ghosts' (elements) are the ones that create and show forms. If one understands these few points, it is as if one has understood the entire world. What helps us escape from saṃsāra is the understanding of these phenomena of Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa).

In this context too, among these phenomena, attention (manasikāra)—the contemplation that comes at the end—is extremely important. It is through that very contemplation that these are understood. Right there lies the great marvel. If we need an analogy, we can compare these five mental factors to the fingers on our hand. Now, feeling (vedanā) is like the little finger. Next, the ring finger, the finger on which rings are worn, is like perception (saññā), representing various recognitions. Next, the middle finger is like intention (cetanā) \[note: Sinhala text reads 'feeling' again, but contextually refers to intention\], the index finger is like contact (phassa), and if we take it that way, the thumb is attention (manasikāra). So, it is dominant and essential. This thumb—as is evident to everyone—can touch and know the state of the little finger. Similarly, it can know the state of the other fingers as well when needed. It is only when the thumb moves close to the little finger that contact (phassa) occurs between them. The same applies to the other fingers. Thus, even though the thumb stands apart, it is the leader, the chief. It is with the help of this thumb that the entire group of Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) is identified.

It is just like when a gang commits a crime and there is no witness to testify; what does the court sometimes do? They grant a pardon to one of the perpetrators themselves. The pardon is given on the condition: "You must speak the truth. Only if you tell the truth will you be pardoned." Then, when that person comes forward and tells the truth, he himself is implicated. But the case is proven. In the same way, we use one of these five mental factors to understand these phenomena of Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). We use this very contemplation (attention) as our aid. However, it is not unwise attention (ayoniso manasikāra) or wrong contemplation.

It is proper contemplation—wise attention (yoniso manasikāra). That is to say, like a thief in that gang who was initially a thief, once he starts testifying, he testifies as a state witness. In the same way, preventing unwise attention (ayoniso manasikāra), one directs the mind to wise contemplation.

Thus, applying wise attention (yoniso manasikāra) in this way allows one to understand the true nature of things through wisdom, attention (manasikāra), and contemplation. Furthermore, through that very contemplation, one gets the opportunity to recognize those elements—earth, water, fire, and wind (pathavī, āpo, tejo, vāyo). Through contact (phassa), one understands them as hardness, softness, and so on. This is the fundamental practice of insight meditation (vipassanā-bhāvanā). Therefore, this is the weapon that helps conquer the armies of Mara: attention (manasikāra)—contemplation—wise contemplation.

Just like with any weapon—say in a sword fight—one must wield one's sword with great speed to block the enemy's strikes. Similarly, in the practice of attention (manasikāra), contemplation must be as fast and rapid as possible, if one is to win this battle against Mara. So, meditation teachers show this method of speeding up according to the occasion—in the beginning, one contemplates these as "form, form", "sound, sound", "odor, odor"—and similarly with tastes, fragrances and smells. One contemplates them as "taste, taste" and so on. Even a thought—when a thought arises, recognizing it as "this is a thought"—if an angry thought arises, understanding it as "a thought"—breaks the stream of thoughts (vitakka) through that understanding. It is through such rapid contemplation that one can conquer the stream of thoughts (vitakka).

Next: “Jitañca rakkhe anivesano siyā” — an extraordinarily deep meaning is expressed here. What is specifically meant for those monks by the phrase “jitañca rakkhe” (protect what is won) here? Generally, as obstacles that arise for a yogi, we can consider attachment to the concentration of loving-kindness (mettā-samādhi) that he has attained. These monks had also attained a certain degree of progress in concentration (samādhi). Because when concentration (samādhi) arises, it is accompanied by a great pleasure—physical pleasure. And they take that to be something great. They think, "This is the great thing, this indeed is the bliss of Nibbāna." There is such a deceptive tendency. They are also called corruptions (upakkilesa), or corruptions of insight (vipassanā-upakkilesa). When various lights appear, when comfort is felt in the body, when tranquility is felt, when special understandings arise, one grasps all these very tightly. There is a tendency to think, "Now I have seen extinguishment, I have become a Stream-enterer (sotāpanna)."

That is why it is said, “jitañca rakkhe” (protect what is won). If there is some concentration (samādhi) one has attained, one must protect it. However, “anivesano siyā” — if one settles down there, one will never be able to reach the state one aspires to. Therefore, do not settle down in them. One must be careful of that. That is specifically the word of the Buddha here. A special instruction that aids meditation subjects (kammaṭṭhāna) is mentioned in this verse. Generally, a practicing yogi (yogāvacara) falls into delusion if there is no teacher's guidance. The reason for this is that when one experiences physical pleasure and other things never experienced before through concentration (samādhi), the mind is tempted to indulge in them. One must prevent that.

To use the war analogy, when a warrior fights, if a real battle is raging, he must also have a fortress. At any point, if his weapon is broken or damaged, or if he needs food and drink, the warrior retreats to that fortress, rests, attends to his needs, and then returns to the battle. But if, upon returning to the fortress, he just goes to sleep there, he can never win that battle. In the same way, there is a certain necessity for serenity (samatha). Serenity (samatha) means concentration (samādhi). But what is the marvel of the Blessed One's Middle Way? It makes use of everything, but does not grasp even a single thing. It does not settle down in any of them. For it is mentioned in the Dhamma that if one grasps anything in the world, Mara pursues him by way of that very thing:

Yaṃ yaṃ hi lokasmim upādiyanti

Teneve māro anveti jantum

— Sutta Nipāta, 1108

"Whatever they grasp in the world, by that itself Mara pursues a person." It is said that if we grasp even the slightest thing in the world, Mara will chase after us because of it. Such is the nature of the mind. That is what the battle with Mara is. The mind always seeks to roost in formations (saṅkhāra), to grasp them. That grasping tendency can only be prevented through that very contemplation. When one contemplates rapidly, that grasping tendency is cut off, and those things slip away through contemplation. One contemplates, and then lets it go—in that manner, by understanding its nature, that delusion is removed; if delusion is present, one is tempted to grasp it entirely. When understanding comes through attention (manasikāra) and wisdom, one does not tend to grasp it. Then, its impermanent (anicca) nature is realized. One understands that these are things that come and go.

Relying on that, one can then proceed forward on the 'path of insight' (vipassanā-vīthi). To advance along the path of insight, the cognitive series of insight (vipassanā-citta-vīthi)—which can also be called a cognitive series—one must not get attached to or wallow in what has been won. Using them as aids, employing that power of concentration (samādhi), and instead of clinging to them, establishing equanimity (upekkhā)—using equanimity as an aid—one should understand the true nature of things. This is the Blessed One's instruction in this verse:

“Jitañca rakkhe anivesano siyā”

This means do not settle down in them. The nature of this mind is always to build houses. The mind is constantly seeking to build houses. The Blessed One uses the word “nivesana” in the sense of a home or dwelling. It is connected to the concept of settling down. Now, if we reflect wisely on the Blessed One's Dhamma—it is just like when we construct a building, we erect scaffolding. We build the scaffolding while constructing the building. But no one should think of living on the scaffolding. If one lives on the scaffolding, the building will never be completed. One constantly dismantles them and goes higher. The path of the Dhamma is similar to that—that is what the Middle Way is.

Thus, the advice, “Jitañca rakkhe anivesano siyā” is an extremely useful point for us, especially for 'yogis'—or those engaged in meditation. Because quite often among meditators, when asked about their results, they happily declare, "I have this and that experience." But they do not realize they have been deluded, overcome by the corruptions of insight (vipassanā-upakkilesa): "Look, I see beautiful lights. There is an extraordinary pleasure. I can sit for as long as I want—even for hours." But they have roosted there. They have roosted in that concentration (samādhi) they attained. There is no forward progress. That is why it is said, “anivesano siyā” — it is through that very contemplation that we can ultimately win this battle. For wherever there is grasping, Mara is right there. Right there, one is subjugated by Mara.

Such a wonderful Dhamma is found here. Thus, in light of that verse, we can understand how important this attention (manasikāra) is, which helps to reveal the three characteristics of insight meditation: impermanence (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and non-self (anattā). Everything is caught through this very contemplation. Even if it is not expressed in words, when one sees how those formations (saṅkhāra) arise, exist for a very brief moment, a split second, and pass away, their impermanent (anicca) nature becomes clear. Furthermore, if something is impermanent (anicca), if it changes—if it turns upside down, if it breaks apart—no pleasure can be found there. Therefore, its nature of suffering (dukkha) is understood. One also understands and directly experiences that taking such a thing as 'I' or 'mine' is foolishness. Thus, to realize those three characteristics through direct experience, that contemplation is of assistance.

In the beginning, as mentioned, contemplation is done as "form, form", "sound, sound", and so on. That is to say, in the ordinary world, names like "there is a car", "there is so-and-so", "a woman", "a man", and further details about those persons are necessary for everyday worldly convention. We cannot do without them. But the insight yogi must transcend them if he is to realize Nibbāna, to become transcendent. In worldly terms, everything that comes along is identified by name. These are called 'signs' (nimitta) and 'features' (anuvyañjana). We grasp signs regarding what is seen and heard. It is due to the lack of control over those signs that we are submerged in this stream of defilements and undergo various sufferings throughout this long saṃsāra. Therefore, to escape from these, the meditating yogi must make a special effort to break the habit of grasping signs. It cannot be broken all at once.

But an aid to this is the recognition called perception (saññā). Initially, a certain experience of something occurs, and on that basis, it is recognized. It does not stop there. Then feelings (vedanā) arise regarding it, often feelings of anger, or a strong attachment to pleasure. Thus, the true nature of all these can be understood through that attention (manasikāra). Reflecting in this way, in attention (manasikāra), one tries to understand very briefly—without following after perceptions (saññā)—what the ordinary worldling understands through numerous words. One stops right there, identifying it simply as a 'form' or a 'sound'. Something like 'erasing it on the spot' must occur there.

Then, as one proceeds further and develops insight, one has to contemplate even the mere awareness of these. Just the mere awareness of it, stopping right there—that rapid contemplation. Just as we mentioned in a sword fight, when both are fighting equally, if one is to conquer the enemy, one must be strong enough to block at a speed faster than the speed with which the enemy wields his weapon. In the same way, to prevent these thoughts that run with the extraordinary, indescribable speed of Mara's army, this contemplation must be done with equal rapidity. If this contemplation becomes weak, what happens? One is caught by those perceptions (saññā).

Perception (saññā)—the Blessed One has declared—is a mirage. A mirage means that when one sees it, one chases after it. We take this perception to 'know' it properly. We feel like knowing what this is. For instance, if someone is traveling on a road—say, heading to Colombo. But if on the way, looking around from the vehicle, he tries to see what those beautiful things around him are like and explore them, he will never reach Colombo. If he thinks he must stop and fully examine every single thing he sees wherever his mind wanders—that is the case.

Then one might think, "If we do this, we cannot live in the world, can we?" One can always live in the world if one wishes. But the Blessed One is showing the path to escape from saṃsāra. Therefore, the practicing yogi (yogāvacara) must especially make an effort to break that habit of grasping signs for the sake of this task—the task of realizing Nibbāna. That is why it is done systematically. It is not a matter of closing one's eyes or shutting one's ears. To guard these senses, one first removes those concepts of 'this person' or 'that thing', discards worldly names, and begins contemplating them simply as 'form' or 'sound'. As one continues and goes deeper, one sees that even this, in some way, is still—even slightly—getting caught in the mirage of perception (saññā).

In that way, at a certain point, one can develop the strength to cut off the stream of thoughts right at the stage of mere contact (phassa) or mere awareness, through that very attention (manasikāra). It is through that indeed that one can clearly and directly experience the nature of arising (jāti) and passing away of formations (saṅkhāra), and even progress to states such as the realization of the Paths and Fruits.

Thus, many such matters are contained in this verse. We must reflect that we are living in the extremely rare era of a Buddha's appearance, having obtained a human existence. We hear about 'meditation' all the time, and everyone says they are practicing it. However, the goals of those meditations often do not help in escaping from the suffering (dukkha) of saṃsāra in the way the Blessed One declared. Often, they are trapped in goals such as soothing the body, obtaining physical health and freedom from disease, seeing pleasant visions, or achieving various other worldly purposes and healing illnesses. Those are indeed instances of 'settling down'.

Instead, what should be done is that if a level of concentration (samādhi) is developed through some serenity meditation subject (samatha-kammaṭṭhāna), one must contemplate the disadvantages (ādinava) present in that concentration. Everything has its side of gratification and its side of danger—the Blessed One has declared that there are three things in the world: gratification (assāda), danger (ādinava), and escape (nissaraṇa). There can be a good side to these, but along with it, there are also many dangers (ādinava). Therefore, one must escape from this—"escape" (nissaraṇa) means departing from all of these.

In grasping lies becoming (bhava). In letting go lies cessation. Understanding this, when one habituates the mind to the nature of arising and passing away in the world, the realization comes: "If I grasp this, I will be overturned along with it and meet destruction." In that way, one does not remain stuck even in that concentration (samādhi). Even during the Buddha's time, teachers like Āḷāra Kālāma and Uddaka Rāmaputta, whom the Bodhisatta originally approached as teachers, had reached extremely high states through concentration (samādhi) and serenity (samatha). But because they clung and settled down in them, they were unable to see Nibbāna.

Thus, the greatest light that the world receives through the appearance of a Buddha is this light of insight (vipassanā). It is these very valuable aspects relevant to insight meditation that are contained in this verse. In accordance with this, we must reflect that we should enter this path of Dhamma to the best of our ability, and even in daily life, try to withdraw from these as much as possible. For that, a great sacrifice may sometimes have to be made. What is the reason for this? Now, particularly for lay devotees, a major problem might arise when practicing insight meditation and similar activities. This complex society is actually running after that mirage of perception (saññā). Just like deer running, lured by a mirage, this world—or rather, the worldly-minded who are entirely bent on the mundane—tries to delude people and turn them into madmen. They do this either to sell their wares, or to pull and drag them into other worldly things. It is in the midst of a multitude of such forces that we are living.

In such an era, some bodily seclusion (kāya-viveka) is obtained when one observes the precepts, such as on a Uposatha poya day like today. One can keep one's mind aloof from those things. One must increase this habit of keeping the mind aloof. It is through that indeed that renunciation (nekkhamma) arises. Thus, in regard to that body, there are three kinds of seclusion: bodily seclusion (kāya-viveka), mental seclusion (citta-viveka), and seclusion from acquisitions (upadhi-viveka). When bodily seclusion occurs, a certain happiness arises from it, but that is not complete. Merely saying "we are in a very quiet place without any noise" does not make it complete. Next, through bodily seclusion, one develops mental seclusion, keeping the mind aloof. Then comes seclusion from acquisitions (upadhi-viveka). Abandoning the five aggregates (pañcakkhandha) is the final step. Abandoning these five aggregates—these five heaps: form, feeling, perception, formations, and consciousness (rūpa, vedanā, saññā, saṅkhāra, viññāṇa)—which we have been clinging to and carrying through this long saṃsāra, is what is done through insight, and this is what is called the realization of Nibbāna.

Why are these called five heaps (aggregates)? The ordinary worldling thinks of this form (rūpa) as a single unit, as 'my form'. When we take a photograph, the first thing that usually comes to our mind is, "This is my form." But we do not see the power of change, the speed of change, the constant flux within it. That is why when a friend visits after a long time, they ask, "Oh, how much you have changed!" It did not change just at that moment of seeing, nor did it change suddenly over that period of time. Such is the nature of this form (rūpa). In truth, form changes very slowly. But this mind changes even faster. This mind changes with extreme rapidity.

Yet, the entire world is wrapped up in delusion, taking even that mind as a soul (attā), as 'I' and 'mine'. This is what is meant by terms like the dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi). This is regarded as a 'soul' (attā). They think: "Form is my soul." The same applies to feeling (vedanā). We take feeling (vedanā) as a single unit. To us, it suddenly appears as one single thing. But when the insight yogi applies that attention (manasikāra) to it, he sees that there is only a multitude of sparkings and breakages. Feeling (vedanā) is like a great series of sparkings that arise and pass away.

One can also understand form (rūpa) through the analogy of the clay pot. Similarly, form is something made up of a multitude of elements: earth, water, fire, and wind. Feeling (vedanā) too is like that. It is a vibrating event that changes extremely rapidly depending on contact (phassa). A multitude of sensations (vedanā) are present there—what is called the aggregate of feeling (vedanā-kkhandha) is a heap of feelings, not a single one. So how can one say 'I' to a mere heap? They are oppressed by arising (jāti) and passing away.

Next, perception (saññā)—recognition. That too is a heap of recognitions. Normally, we say we recognized something instantly. In common parlance, we say, "I recognized it at once." It is not all at once; rather, we recognize something through a rapid series of recognitions. We take that entire bundle of recognitions as a single thing. The same is true for intention (cetanā). Intention too is extremely rapid. A multitude of intentions are there—a heap of intentions. This is what we call formations (saṅkhāra). All these things, including feeling, perception, formations, and intentions, are formations (saṅkhāra)—a heap of preparations. A constructive force within the mind. One thinks of such a heap of preparations as 'I' and 'mine'.

An even more serious delusion is this mind—consciousness (viññāṇa), the hiding place of this sense of 'I'. Now, we know that after breaking through the enemy's fortresses, the final fortress—like the city of Vijitapura—is consciousness (viññāṇa). This is where the greatest magic (illusion) lies. That is why the Blessed One compared this consciousness (viññāṇa) to an illusion (magic trick). One cannot easily escape from an illusion. Therefore, the Blessed One declared that if one reflects deeply in daily life even on the analogies He provided for these five aggregates (pañcakkhandha), one can realize Nibbāna through that. Form (rūpa) is compared to a lump of foam. Feeling (vedanā) is compared to a water bubble.

A lump of foam—when we see it, we are tempted to perceive it as a solid unit (ghana-saññā). It looks beautiful. But what is there is a multitude of extremely subtle bubbles. Similarly, the Blessed One compared feeling (vedanā) to the numerous water bubbles that rapidly arise and burst when rain falls on water. Feeling (vedanā) is like a multitude of sparkings. Next, perception (saññā) is compared to a mirage. We also mentioned the mirage on this occasion. That is to say, there is no end to recognition. This running to find out what 'this' is—is entirely like the running of a deer after a mirage. In the end, there is nothing there. It is a dragging illusion. In the end, it terminates in a magical illusion. That is perception (saññā).

Next, formations (saṅkhāra) are compared to the trunk of a banana tree. A banana trunk has no core, no heartwood. It lacks any essence. There is only a pile of layers. The world has a tendency to take a multitude of formations as a single unit. Thus, these formations (saṅkhāra) made by the mind are the heap of thoughts (vitakka) passing through the mind. When we reflect ultimately, it is by the mind itself that these are prepared: as the word of the Buddha says: mind is the forerunner, mind is chief, mind-made are they. Ultimately, when we look at it, this world is conjured up by the mind itself. Such is the situation. A great marvel is found here, expressed in a way no other religious teacher has ever done.

So then, what is the cause of that delusion? Consciousness (viññāṇa) is compared to a magical illusion. When a magician performs a magic trick at a crossroads, in a public place, everyone who watches stands with mouth agape, shouting in amazement, deceived into thinking it is a great wonder. But only the magician knows that it is entirely a deception, showing a heap of things that do not exist. This is exactly like that. It is our mind, our consciousness (viññāṇa), that conjures up and displays what is non-existent as if it exists.

This state cannot be understood by the ordinary worldling. It cannot be understood by logic. Scholars cannot understand it through degrees. This must be understood by the wise, each for themselves, according to the phrase: “Paccattam veditabbo viññūhi”—through one’s own wisdom. “The wise” (viññū) refers to those who possess real wisdom—not merely intellectual pedants. This is something that must be understood by oneself through that insight-wisdom. No one else can do it for you. Not even the Buddha can do it. One must establish oneself in virtue (sīla), develop concentration (samādhi) to some level, and then—with proper guidance, entering into insight meditation (vipassanā-bhāvanā)—it is through that attention (manasikāra) that one can understand the true nature of this illusion of consciousness (viññāṇa). And only through this can one escape from this illusion.

This is what is meant by abandoning the five aggregates (pañcakkhandha). It is not a matter of grabbing them with one’s hands and throwing them away. If, through this wisdom, one understands the aggregate of form (rūpa-kkhandha) as just the aggregate of form, one realizes right then that there is nothing to be grasped, and one does not get caught. One is not trapped into grasping it. The same applies to feeling (vedanā). When the water-bubble analogy is understood, one realizes that there is no core here, nothing worth taking—its unsubstantiality (anattā). Perception (saññā) is a mirage, and formations (saṅkhāra) are a banana trunk.

If someone, thinking there is heartwood in a banana trunk and intending to build a wardrobe, carries the trunk home for the first time—upon examining it and peeling a bit, he finds only another layer beneath. In this way, the insight yogi understands this matter taught by the Blessed One through the word sammasana (comprehension/investigation). Comprehension (sammasana) is like gently feeling and examining. What the world does is grasping (parāmāsa), which is holding on tightly. Relinquishing this habit of tight grasping, contemplating in the extremely subtle way of comprehension (sammasana) is what assists insight.

We know that generally when stropping a razor, one holds it lightly, as if it could easily slip out. Holding it in that manner, when sliding the razor up and down on the whetstone, one must do it in a way that does not blunt the edge. It is honed, not blunted. If held too tightly, the razor becomes blunt. Instead, it is by holding it subtly and gliding it back and forth that a razor can be sharpened. In the exact same way, without getting bound to anything—neither to perceptions (saññā) nor to feelings (vedanā) and so forth—one contemplates each thing as it comes, just like swordplay, and stops right there. It is by proceeding in this manner, through this path of insight, by penetrating the Paths and Fruits of Stream-entry, Once-returning, Non-returning, and Arahantship, that one can directly experience the supreme, peaceful bliss of Nibbāna, which is called the stilling of all formations (sabba-saṅkhāra-samatha).

Thus, in accordance with that teaching of the Buddha, you have received numerous instructions on this Poya day to help you turn toward meditation. One should resolve not to stop at mere hearing, but to enter this path oneself, associating with those who can provide guidance and instructions, and strive to escape from this extremely terrifying suffering (dukkha) of saṃsāra.

Furthermore, having established yourself in some good virtue (sīla) on this occasion, and having listened to this Dhamma teaching with a concentrated and stilled mind, allowing the intellect to understand, I believe that your virtue, concentration, and wisdom (sīla, samādhi, paññā) have been developed to some extent. Walking along that path of virtue, concentration, and wisdom, may you develop within your own mind-stream those faculties and powers (indriya and bala)—namely faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom (saddhā, viriya, sati, samādhi, paññā)—which are the benefits of hearing the Dhamma, as quickly as possible. You should make a resolution and aspire: "May this hearing of the Dhamma assist me in attaining the realization of the supremely peaceful Nibbāna that helps cross over this suffering (dukkha) of saṃsāra as taught by the Blessed One."

In addition, if there be any store of merit accumulated by us through both preaching and hearing the Dhamma during this time, may all beings from the lowest hell of Avīci to the highest heaven of Akanitṭha, including the guardian deities of the Dispensation who rejoice in these merits, share in this store of merit gathered by us on this occasion. Having rejoiced, may they realize the noble, deathless, great Nibbāna through whatever state of awakening (bodhi) they aspire to. Likewise, may all departed relatives who have passed away in your names rejoice in this store of merit and obtain the strength to bring an end to suffering! May you aspire in that manner.

Now, on this occasion, let us transfer merits by reciting these verses:

“Ettāvatā ca amhehi.....”

From:

Verse 315, from the Nirayavagga (Chapter on Hell) of the Dhammapada

Dear Listeners,

Our Father, the Teacher of the Three Worlds, the Fully Self-Awakened One, having practiced difficult austerities for six years, discovered the Path to Nibbāna, namely, the Four Noble Truths. He first revealed this to the world of gods and humans on an Esala Full Moon Poya Day. Therefore, today is an extremely valuable Poya day. Moreover, looking at it from another perspective, it can be considered a day of great dispensary value to the Dispensation (sāsana). When taken as a Poya day that marks the beginning of the rainy-season retreat (vassa) of the Sangha, this Esala Full Moon Poya Day is a highly significant day. Now, the term used in ancient texts for what we call the Buddha Dispensation (Buddha Sāsana) is "Dhamma-Vinaya" (Doctrine and Discipline). "Dhamma-Vinaya" is applied to describe the Dispensation of the Teacher because both the Dhamma and the Vinaya are relevant to it. When considering the rainy season, it is particularly connected with a set of disciplinary rules of the Sangha, and therefore this rainy season is considered a highly important period from the perspective of the Vinaya. However, in the time of the Buddha, we see from ancient stories that the rainy-season retreat was also considered an extremely valuable period from the perspective of the Dhamma, from the aspect of the Doctrine. For there was a custom in the Buddha's time: during the period when the Buddha was living, the members of the Sangha, before the rainy-season retreat, would go to meet the Buddha, obtain a meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna), go to a remote, secluded area, observe the rainy-season retreat in a suitable place, meditate according to that meditation subject, and endeavor by all means to realize Nibbāna within that rainy season and bring that joyful news back to the Buddha. There was a great eagerness among those monks. Looking at it in this light, the wise and far-sighted Sangha of that era considered the realization of Nibbāna as the highest and noblest meritorious deed to be performed during a rainy-season retreat—as the ultimate vassa-merit. If, despite striving as much as possible and exerting effort during those three months, they were unable to realize Nibbāna, a sense of spiritual urgency (samvega) would arise within those monks. Why? Because when they returned to meet the Buddha after the rainy-season retreat, the question the Buddha usually asked, after first inquiring about their well-being in a friendly, conversational manner, was: "Monks, have you fulfilled the purpose of your ordination?" If they could not answer this properly, it would cause a great listlessness and hesitation in the minds of those monks. To put it briefly, it would be like returning empty-handed from a journey to see the Buddha. That is why the Sangha made a great effort to realize Nibbāna during the rainy-season retreat. Now, a story that clarifies these matters is connected to the stanza we took as our theme.

During a time when the Buddha was residing at Jetavana monastery, a group of monks went to a remote border village—even though we use the word "remote," what is meant there is a village situated on the frontier—to observe the rainy-season retreat. During the first month, those monks were able to carry out their meditation activities well. The support and offerings of the lay devotees were excellent. However, in the second month, a band of thieves—a gang of robbers—invaded that village and took the villagers captive. Thereafter, the villagers began to set up security measures. Fearing that the gang of robbers would return and attack in this manner, they began to establish defenses. Building various kinds of ramparts and protective walls, they set up various security systems along the streets. Because of this, difficulties arose for the monks. Consequently, somehow or other, these monks were unable to fulfill the purpose they had hoped for. When these monks went to see the Buddha after the rainy-season retreat, the Buddha asked, "How was it, monks, did you spend the rainy-season retreat comfortably and in peace?" Then these monks complained: "Venerable Sir, during the first month indeed we lived well without any trouble. Thereafter, robbers invaded, and due to the situation that arose in the village, the villagers—the lay devotees—directed their minds towards establishing security measures, which led to various shortcomings for us. We were unable to practice our Dhamma and meditation properly during the rainy-season retreat." They expressed this as their excuse. At that moment, the Buddha declared: "Monks, it is indeed so. A comfortable and easy lodging is not something that is obtained every day. It is not something to be constantly expected. That is the normal nature of things. But what should have been done by you? Just as those people protected their city, you should have protected yourselves. Just as those people were diligent in protecting their village, you ought to have secured your own protection." Thus declaring, he spoke the verse we introduced as our theme earlier:

Nagaram yathā paccantam

guttam santarabāhiram

evam gopetha attānam

khaṇo ve mā upaccagā

khaṇātītā hi socanti

nirayamhi samappitā

The meaning of this is: just as a city situated on the frontier is well-guarded inside and out—internally and externally—just as a frontier city is provided with excellent internal and external protection, in that very same manner—evam gopetha attānam—so one must secure one's own protection. Evam gopetha attānam - khaṇo ve mā upaccagā—the next phrase indicates that these tasks must be performed diligently: khaṇo ve mā upaccagā—do not let the moment—the right moment—pass you by. Do not allow the moment—the opportunity—to slip away. Khaṇo ve mā upaccagā. Next, the danger of not being properly heedful of this advice is expressed in the next two lines: khaṇātītā hi socanti - nirayamhi samappitā. If one allows the moment to pass by, what happens to such people? Khaṇātītā hi socanti—they will have to cry, lament, feel regret, and sorrow. Nirayamhi samappitā—why? Because having fallen into hell—falling into hell, they will have to suffer. In this manner, the Buddha delivered an instructive, advisory verse. It is said there that upon hearing this verse, those venerable monks attained Arahathship. Now, when we reflect based on this verse, we see the deep Dhamma contained within it. Monks direct their minds to Dhamma and meditation, putting effort into those activities, and just as if completing some lack in them, the Buddha delivers this Dhamma verse in many instances. Therefore, we can understand that even a single statement of Dhamma, a single verse of the Buddha, helps in bringing the efforts of those monks to their culmination and in completing their meditation subjects. That must be why it is mentioned that the monks attained Arahathship upon merely hearing the verse. Be that as it may, let us reflect upon the depth of this Dhamma verse according to our own capacity.

Now, this simile is very beautiful. The reason we follow a simile in these instances is that a simile helps the Dhamma point to descend deep into the mind. Nagaram yathā paccantaṃ - guttaṃ santarabāhiraṃ—we can understand that this simile is highly appropriate for this day and age as well. Here, it speaks of protecting a city situated on the frontier, both inside and out. Likewise, the monks are told, evam gopetha attānaṃ—secure your self-protection in this manner. Even today, "self-protection" is a term commonly used. But nowadays, when we say "self-protection", it generally refers to physical safety—protecting the body. Using it in the sense of physical protection to guard the body. As for the mind—perhaps there is a concept in the world that it does not matter if it is handed over to the devil or Mara. However, what the Buddha declared here as "self-protection" (protecting oneself) is the guarding of the mind. For what we carry along in this saṃsāra is this mind—the mental continuum. This body, this physical cage, is abandoned and left behind. Therefore, the Buddha actually gave greater weight to guarding the mind. Here too, the meaning to be taken is not merely guarding the body, but guarding the mind. To guard the mind, a certain degree of interest in the body must arise. However, what most people do is guard the body without any concern for the mind, whatever may happen to it. So, if we take this deep meaning to be the guarding of one's mind, let us next reflect upon this system of security—about what is said here regarding protection.

If we reflect according to the Dhamma, who is the security guard of the mind? Mindfulness, awareness (sati). In accordance with the Dhamma, it is shown as sati ārakkhasārathī (mindfulness is the guarding charioteer). The task of taming the mind, the work of guarding the mind, that responsibility is borne by the sentry called mindfulness (sati). When this sentry called mindfulness is well-uniformed, we can understand this more broadly as mindfulness and clear comprehension (sati-sampajañña). For sampajañña, because we need a Sinhala word in some instances, we have translated it as "conscious awareness" or "knowing awareness." Otherwise, it is staying mindful with clear understanding. The clear understanding that goes hand in hand with mindfulness. So, what is expressed here is mindfulness endowed with this conscious awareness. Now, when placing security guards in the world, in a place like a city, protection is described as being both inside and out. Usually, in a city, there is the inner gate, the entrance, then the fort walls, ramparts, etc. If looking outward, there are watchtowers, sentry boxes, moats, and so on—in the past, various measures—security measures—were deployed to protect cities. Even today, a sentry is usually stationed near a gate. When stationed near a gate, that gate must be a very narrow gate. If it is a large gate, a crowd of people can force their way in. In the same way, if we reflect on mindfulness in accordance with the Dhamma—sati—the word sati also has the meaning of memory. But when speaking of Right Mindfulness (sammā sati) in accordance with the Dhamma, this is always established mindfulness in the present moment. This is something relevant to the present. Because if the mind begins to run to the past, or if it begins to leap into the future, then that gate becomes wide. Then, what is the gate we have to guard? When looking at it according to the Dhamma, it is these six sense-doors: eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind. Including the mind, these are the six sense-doors. The five external senses are the eye, ear, nose, tongue, and body. Then there is the mind—the mind-faculty (manindriya). These six sense-doors are what must be guarded. In guarding these six doors, the army of Mara, the army of defilements, the enemy host, is constantly waiting to break in. The host waiting to invade is the sense-objects. For the eye, visual objects; for the ear, sound objects; for the nose, odors. In this manner, the enemy hosts that agitate the mind, drawing it to attachment, aversion, and delusion, are waiting to invade. And they come very rapidly. In such a situation, when a large crowd comes to the gate, they must first be told, "You must come in a queue." Come in a queue, one after another. Otherwise, it cannot be guarded. Making it a narrow gate in that manner is the very way to easily anchor the mind in the present. Anchoring the mind in the present, without running to the past, without leaping to the future, and directing mindfulness to each and every thing as it comes—this is what is expressed here. Together with that mindfulness, what is done through mindfulness? A certain active limit is required. Using that conscious awareness as an aid, one reflects. A certain attention, a reflection is applied.

Let us think: if there is a security guard, his duty is not to fall asleep. Remaining fully awake and alert, he casts an inquiring eye on each person who comes. That depends on his skill. It must be done very rapidly. He cannot keep one person waiting there for a long time either. They come; then, subjecting them to an inquiring eye, if it is someone who should be let in, he lets them in. If it is someone who should be kept out, he turns them away. Only these two options exist. Therefore, what is needed here is that skill; that reflection cannot be done extensively here. 基因 Nowadays, as you well know, in such places they ask for something called an identity card. Thus, even if not in the form of an identity card, there must have been methods of identification in the past when people arrived. On that identity card, there is a name. There is a picture. So, this person is known by this name. This person comes presenting a certain form (rūpa) corresponding to that identity. But what is usually done? If enemy forces come, if spies come, they come in disguise. Not in their true form. Therefore, they must be recognized. If he is a highly skilled sentry, without letting them engage in irrelevant chatter, he must make them present their identity card and prove their eligibility to enter. In that same way, if we reflect according to the Dhamma, these incoming objects—these enemy hosts—have a common method of identification. That is called Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). They are recognized by reflecting on them as Name-and-Form. Now, let us say a form (rūpa) comes forward. Some object/form comes. This is something that happens to the insight meditator (vipassanā-bhāvanāyogī). Then, this incoming form comes in disguise. They are called color-configurations—their colors, various kinds of colors. Then, various other shapes. Because of this, the mind might become distinctive/involved. Without directing the mind to those—"this is a form." Then, that meditator, whatever kind of form comes, reflects on it as "form, form" (rūpa, rūpa). He does not go any further than that. Why? The reason the Buddha has shown is that if one is to go further than that, the mind cannot be stopped. It gets dragged into defilements. Those are called signs (nimitta) and features (anuvyañjana). That means, taking a sign, and taking other characteristics associated with the sign. When that person sees the form—when he sees some person or some thing—since various other thoughts—thoughts of defilement—can invade regarding it, he reflects on it briefly as "a form."

Likewise, relevant to this, what is to be considered here, in brief, are the three characteristics: the three characteristics of impermanent (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and non-self (anattā). It is by applying these three characteristics that everything is passed through. So, what helps to apply those three characteristics—to recognize this, there is nothing else here. Now, name-dhamma (mental factors), as shown in accordance with the Dhamma, are feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), volition (cetanā), contact (phassa), and attention (manasikāra). Now, the attempt is to parallel this with the Dhamma. Name-dhammas are generally things connected to the mind. So, the things connected to the mind here are feelings (vedanā). A person recognizes something—even a small child who does not yet know how to speak recognizes things—through such things. A certain experiencing. Or else, experiencing something given to them, based on the feeling in it. Or else, a certain perception through it. Then, a thought that arises regarding it, their contact (phassa). The way we reflect on them. In this way, when looking deeply, these are the name-dhammas that help insight meditation (vipassanā). Next, when taking form-dhammas (rūpa-dhamma) too, one does not think about those previously mentioned color-configurations or color-shapes. All these things, as many as there are in the world, our body, and external things—what are the primary elements

(mūla dhātu) they are made of? Earth (pathavī), water (āpo), fire (tejo), air (vāyo). This great earth and our body are made of that solid nature called earth. Next, water, which is of a flowing nature—indicated by water. Next, fire, which is heat. Next, wind, which is air. It is of things relevant to these four that our body and external things are made. Because of this, when reflecting according to the Dhamma, that is how the sentry called mindfulness (sati) has to understand through attention. He does not let the mind run along other external signs of the incoming form, because defilements would flow in. If we take it as Name-and-Form in this way, this is the identity card. We pass these through after checking this identity card. Now an object has come. It is not held back. It has gone. It came and went, came and went. Through that, we understand the impermanent nature—the arising and passing nature of all of these. In this way indeed, the eye, ear, nose, etc., function. Now, a sound—when we stop a word, a certain contact (phassa) comes to the ear along with it. Now, in things like a rabana (one-sided drum) or a drum, after something strikes it, an echo also sounds for a long time. When striking something like a rabana, an echo comes naturally. Similarly, the thoughts that arise in the mind through words, a certain echo comes regarding them too. That is why they can be remembered again. They are remembered. In this way indeed, concerning the ear. One can think about each of these. Concerning the tongue, even a small child can easily understand. Thus, in all of these, these objects come flowing in. They come very rapidly. Now, the meditator, in a manner that does not lead to being dragged along or pulled by them, in a manner that does not cause attachment, recognizes them with a certain middle measure. Within that recognition, within that reflection, wisdom (paññā) becomes active. Then, if one is to realize Nibbāna, both mindfulness (sati) and wisdom (paññā) must be developed. This wisdom becomes active at that moment through that reflection. That is to say, using mindfulness, a recognition of this is done. It must be done very rapidly. The reason for this is that the Buddha has declared that the objects flowing into our senses in this world come very rapidly. On one occasion, the Buddha declared to the young Brahmin Ajita:

Yāni sotāni lokasmim

sati tesam nivāraṇam

sotānam samvaram brūmi

paññāyete pidhīyare

—(Sutta Nipāta, v. 1039)

"Whatever streams there are in the world, mindfulness is their barrier. I call mindfulness the restraint of the streams. But they are shut off by wisdom." Whatever flowing streams of water there are in the world, mindfulness—this awareness called sati—is the way to obstruct them. Obstruction—sati tesam nivāraṇam, sotānam samvaram brūmi, I declare this to be the method of blocking these flowing streams. Paññāyete pidhīyare, but actually, all these can be closed, the streams can be completely shut off, by wisdom. Then, by this mindfulness—just as in a river flowing with a certain speed, one cannot build a dam all at once. One has to use some device to block the flowing water to some extent. Just as the security guard stops the invading crowd, saying "wait a moment." Then, subjects them to inspection. Through subjecting them to inspection, he understands that person's true nature. If it is an object of defilement, he pushes it away entirely. In that way, even with water, it is only after the dam is built that it is complete. Wisdom is the dam. Wisdom, deep understanding, realization of the Dhamma. The true nature of this.

So, here we have a matter relevant to meditation. It must have been by understanding based on this that those monks attained Arahantship. Thus, what is said here is the guarding of the mind; the mind is the city. This is said to have six gates. Through these six gates, what is called the mind is the thoughts that come to the mind. Apart from that, other external objects: forms, sounds, smells, tastes, and touches. When these are flowing in, applying mindfulness, applying conscious awareness accompanied by mindfulness, one must reflect on each and every one. And that reflection must be done very rapidly. It is not about saying it at length. If it is a form, a form, "form, form." If it is a sound, a sound, "sound, sound"—saying it twice. "Form, form," "sound, sound"—giving that designation to the mind. Through that designating, understanding it, one brings it to an end right there. It is this kind of discipline that one employs in meditation, in insight meditation (vipassanā-bhāvanā). This is the meaning that the Buddha has expressed through this verse. In short, it is about Nibbāna that is expressed here. The qualities that help towards Nibbāna. That is why the Buddha declares next, khaṇo ve mā upaccagā—do not let the opportunity to realize Nibbāna pass you by. This moment—the possession of the opportune moment (khaṇa-sampatti)—is described in this Dhamma. The Buddha has declared that the human existence obtained during a time of a Buddha's appearance—one's whole life—must be considered as a single moment. The Buddha declares: "Monks, people in this world often say, 'The world is one of timely duties (khaṇakicco loko)—the world is one of timely duties.' They say this world is a place where things must be done on time, a place that works by the moment. But the world does not know what the right moment is, and what the wrong moment is." Next, the Buddha declares, "Behold, monks, a Buddha is born in the world. He also teaches the Dhamma. But some person is born in hell. Then, even though a Buddha is born, one does not get the opportunity to realize Nibbāna. That is the wrong moment." That is to say, the Buddha points out eight situations where the timing can go wrong—non-opportune moments. Showing these eight, he says that one who is freed from these eight obtains the right moment during a time of a Buddha's appearance.

First, he said: a Buddha is born and teaches the Dhamma. But this unfortunate person is born in hell. Then it is impossible to benefit from this Dhamma, to make an end of suffering. That is the first. Next, he declares—and this is similar: a Buddha is born and teaches the Dhamma. But that person is born in the realm of hungry ghosts (peta-loka). Thirdly, he shows: a Buddha is born and teaches the Dhamma. This person is an animal, in the animal realm. In such a situation too, it is impossible to travel along the path of Nibbāna and free oneself from the suffering of saṃsāra. Next, similarly, a Buddha is born and teaches the Dhamma. Some person is born in a very long-lived celestial assembly—in a heaven world. While living indulged in the pleasures of that heaven world, they do not get the opportunity to practice the dispensational holy life (brahmacariya), develop the three characteristics—the three characteristics of impermanent (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and non-self (anattā)—and make an end of the suffering of saṃsāra. That is difficult, due to various reasons like their celestial pleasures. The human world is indeed the best place to realize Nibbāna. Next, sometimes a Buddha is born and teaches the Dhamma. But some person is born in a remote frontier region. It is usually said that Buddhas are born in the Middle Country (Majjhima-desa) of India. Then, the one born in that Middle Country has obtained a fortunate birth. That is to say, a situation existed in that region during the Buddha's time where one could hear the Dhamma as well as practice according to the Dhamma. If, during such a time, some person is born in a very remote place, where they do not even get to hear the Dhamma, and where the fourfold assembly of bhikkhus, bhikkhunīs, upāsakas, and upāsikās does not visit, such a person cannot benefit from this Dhamma. Then, that occasion too is not a right occasion. It is an unfortunate time. Next, sometimes a Buddha is born and teaches the Dhamma. Some person lives in that very Middle Country itself. But that person is deeply of wrong view (micchā-diṭṭhi). He is blinded by a rigid wrong view. Such a person cannot benefit from the Dhamma. That situation is an unfortunate one. Next, it is shown: a Buddha is born and teaches the Dhamma. This person cannot be made to understand anything. He lacks wisdom. That is, a person whose wisdom has not matured. Such a person cannot benefit from the Dhamma. In this way, that occasion too is an unfortunate one. Next, in the final occasion, some person is indeed highly wise. He is born in the Middle Country of India. All other factors are complete. But a Buddha has not arisen. The Dhamma is not taught. That is the eighth occasion.

In this manner, the Buddha declares: there are eight non-opportune moments. Escaping these eight moments, if one is born in a proper region during the time of a Buddha's appearance where one can hear the Dhamma and practice according to the Dhamma, without any sensory impairment, and possessed of wisdom—that, the Buddha declares, is an extremely rare moment, a rare opportunity. Therefore, what you have to think about yourselves is that you have obtained such a noble opportunity. The Buddha tells us not to waste this opportune moment (khaṇa-sampatti). If that moment is missed, if that opportunity is lost, the Buddha gives a simile: it is just like a merchant who had an opportunity to buy a commodity at a cheap price. Without taking advantage of it, he regrets it in the end. In the same way, one will have to regret—having obtained such an extremely rare opportunity in this incredibly long saṃsāra, during a period when one can benefit from the Dhamma, yet not taking advantage of it. What is meant by taking advantage? Realizing Nibbāna, making an end of the suffering of saṃsāra. At the very least, as mentioned, obtaining a supramundane state through the attainment of the Path of Stream-entry (sotāpatti-magga), which helps to escape the lower realms of misery. This is how we have to understand this verse.

That is why: khaṇātītā hi socanti, nirayamhi samappitā—if one lets this noble moment slip away, what happens to that person is that he falls into hell and suffers. He sorrows. Indeed, as we mentioned earlier, in this day and age we put so much effort into guarding the body, but because we are not interested in guarding the mind, this short lifespan is spent setting up various security measures, sometimes meeting death due to those very guards, and where do they end up being born? In the ghost realms (peta-loka), the yakkha realms, in bad destinations, or else in hell. We hear stories of births in such places in various ways. It is in such an extremely unfortunate era that we live. But virtuous people who reflect with wisdom must always think, in accordance with the Buddha's advice, that what is meant here by "self-protection" is the guarding of the mind. Guarding the mind means applying mindfulness (sati)—deploying that quality called mindfulness at those doors that come to the mind, the six doors connected to the mind—and assigning the sentry his proper duty in a manner relevant to one's own meditation. Regarding the conscious awareness called clear comprehension (sampajañña) that goes hand-in-hand with mindfulness, it is shown in the Dhamma in four ways. For someone practicing a meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna), they have to apply that conscious awareness in accordance with that meditation subject. That is, when an object comes, they have to reflect in this way: is this object something that helps, something useful, something purposeful for the meditation subject I am practicing? Next, is it suitable (sappāya), is it proper, is it fitting for my meditation? One has to think in that way too. Likewise, one must also see whether one can maintain the meditation subject through every object on every occasion. Next, regarding the deceptive nature of this object—one must also obtain the ability to look at that object without that delusion. In this way, when reflecting deeply, just as that security guard maintains a considerable degree of conscious awareness in performing the task—the responsibility—belonging to him, the meditator, the one engaged in meditation, guards his meditation subject. The meditation subject is the only thing one has that needs to be guarded. It is through maintaining those meditation subjects that one can realize Nibbāna. That is why that clear comprehension (sampajañña)—this awareness, clear understanding—must be understood in a very broad manner. Thus, the objects that help to guard this mindfulness in this way are what the Buddha has declared as the Four Establishments of Mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna). That is, what is spoken of here is not other things, external things. One establishes mindfulness on the very body received—this body. Next, in accordance with feelings (vedanā). Next, in accordance with the mind (citta)—the nature of the mind. One understands it in its respective ways. Next, in accordance with thoughts (dhamma) that come to the mind. In general, they can be taken as the body, feelings, the mind, and thoughts. Establishing mindfulness on these—on these—means constantly living in the present moment. Normally, people live either in the future or in the past. Thinking about what has to be done in the future, or else thinking about things that happened in the past, people generally live with a dead past and an unborn future. The Buddha has given advice to remove this tendency and to try as much as possible to live in the present.

There too, we can think about that sentry. If that sentry tries to run after someone who has already passed his guard post, he will not be able to perform the duty belonging to his post. Directing full attention for a brief moment, understanding the situation through inspection, he lets that person go. He stands ready for the next person. A skilled, alert sentry is always ready for each and every person who comes. Similarly, the person who has well-established his mindfulness understands the true nature of each and every incoming object as impermanent (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and non-self (anattā), and lets them go. Why does he let them go? Because they are all things whose nature is to come and go, things of an impermanent nature. Understanding the impermanent as impermanent—this is through direct realization itself. By practicing mindfulness in this way, that wisdom gradually develops. Wisdom means understanding. It is by understanding that everything existing in the entire world is of an impermanent nature that one can realize Nibbāna. Because within the world, there are distorted views. They are called "perversions" (vipallāsa)—four distorted views are mentioned: taking the impermanent (anicca) to be permanent (nicca); taking the foul (asubha) to be beautiful (subha); taking what is accompanied by suffering (dukkha) to be pleasurable (sukha); taking what is non-self (anattā), not one's own, to be one's self. It is within these four distorted views that people in the world live. The Buddha declares that beings travel long in this saṃsāra because of these four perversions, these distorted dhammas. Getting rid of this distorted state, getting rid of delusion, getting rid of ignorance (avijjā), the path of living in accordance with wisdom is indeed these Four Establishments of Mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna). This is not something that costs much. It costs nothing at all. However, one has to make a certain sacrifice. One has to reconsider the things that people in the world—or rather, the ostentatious people of the world—think of as important and valuable in daily life, the values they themselves assign to them, and come to a certain conclusion in accordance with the Dhamma regarding them, and also regarding the way one's life is being spent. Now, normally, even though the Buddha described this lifespan as a single moment, people divide this life, this one small moment, and set it apart as "the final period of my life". Sometimes thinking that practicing meditation, keeping precepts, and so on are for the final period of life. But the Buddha always reminds us of diligence/heedfulness (appamāda), and also that there is no knowing when death will come. On one occasion, the Buddha spoke a verse that arouses spiritual urgency (saṃvega):

Ajjeva kiccamātappaṃ

ko jaññā maraṇaṃ suve

na hi no saṅgamaṃ tena

mahāsenena maccunā

—(Bhaddekaratta Sutta, Majjhima Nikāya)

If we translate this into Sinhala:

Do today indeed what is to be done,

Who knows, death may come tomorrow.

For there is indeed no bargaining for us,

With Death and his great army.

One cannot enter into an agreement with Death who has a great army, can we? Saying, "Give me a little time until I am free of my children, until I retire from my job, since I was unable to perform other meritorious deeds like Dhamma and meditation," or "I was unable to set aside time." One cannot make an agreement with Death in that way. That is the situation that exists in the world. That is why the wise human being, who has obtained a birth in a region where one can hear the Dhamma and practice according to the Dhamma during this time of a Buddha's appearance in this incredibly long saṃsāra, must consider this entire life as a single moment.

Then, that moment—that is indeed why it is said, "the world is one of timely duties (khaṇakicco loko)—the world is one of timely duties." Everyone says this world is a place where things must be done on time. Even in this day and age, in a city, we constantly hear this being said. In offices, and in other places. In places where worldly work is done, the talk is always of diligence. In the travel of vehicles, there too, the talk is of speed/haste. But in the journey of the Dhamma, in the journey of the Dispensation, regarding Dhamma and meditation, there is no such diligence there. Such is the situation in the world. The Buddha's vision is different from that. Now, to put it briefly, to establish that previously mentioned mindfulness, we sometimes have to perform even our daily activities slowly. Diligence (appamāda) in accordance with the Dhamma means bringing forth mindfulness regarding these. Therefore, to bring forth mindfulness, especially in the beginning, one sometimes has to maintain one's postures like a sick person. One has to perform those activities in that way. Why? Because objects come flowing in rapidly. When these are taken through a narrow gate, when they are made to pass through one by one, controlling them is easy. Therefore, doing each of these very slowly, sometimes, one has to gain a deep understanding of them. But if we look at the life stories of those highly-placed, very wealthy people who achieved what is called a successful life in the world, they did not spend their lives in that way. Grasping a vast amount of work, losing sleep, committing various wrongs, they gathered wealth. But the Dhamma does not speak of such a thing. Leaving aside that vast accumulation of wealth, turning to a simple/noble dress, according to the principle of "simple living and high thinking", even with difficulty, observing the precepts on a Poya day or a holiday, separating oneself for that purpose, one must test the truth of the Dhamma declared by the Buddha for oneself. One must practice it for oneself. If one spends even a single day in that way, one can obtain an experience entirely different from the experiences gained throughout a whole lifetime. That is why the Buddha declared: paccattam veditabbo viññūhi—this Dhamma is to be understood by the wise, each for themselves. There are six terms describing this Dhamma that you frequently hear and recite. "Svākkhāto"—a well-expounded Dhamma. Why is it called well-expounded? This Dhamma is well-declared not merely because the Buddha's Dhamma is sweet. Not merely because those words, that teaching, is extremely complete. It is well-expounded (svākkhāto) in a deep sense because one can obtain results by practicing that Dhamma. In a poorly-expounded (durakkhāto) doctrine, dispensation, or religion, the Buddha declared that the lazy person lives in comfort. In a well-expounded (svākkhāto) Dhamma, taught in the proper way, the Buddha declares that the energetic person lives in comfort. This is a deep idea. That is to say, in a doctrine taught in a wrong way as wrong view, if that person lives in the right way (by that doctrine's standards), that person goes to hell. Therefore, the lazy person lives in comfort there. But in this well-expounded Dhamma, it is the energetic person who can live in comfort, who lives in comfort. The lazy person lives in misery. The one who does not perform today indeed what is to be done—the previously mentioned task to be done—falls into regret. In this life too, and on his deathbed, he sorrows. Next, in a more terrible manner, as described in "falling into hell, he has to suffer," he has to suffer. Again, he has to seek the help of living relatives, visibly or invisibly, in various ways. Since such a situation exists in saṃsāra, in the world, the Buddha delivered these teachings on many occasions. Such is the quality of Svākkhāto (well-expounded) in this Dhamma.

"Sandiṭṭhiko" (to be seen for oneself) means: practicing this Dhamma as something directly experienced in this very life, one can test its success for oneself. Directly experienced (sandiṭṭhika). It is not a Nibbāna to be obtained in a next life that is expressed here, in the Buddha's Dhamma. In all other doctrines, what is called the ultimate goal, the highest thing, is shown as a state to be obtained after death. Our Buddha alone declared that this bliss of Nibbāna can be realized in this very life—diṭṭheva dhamme means in this very life—that making an end of the suffering of saṃsāra can be done in this very life. So, in that higher sense, it is not only the realization of the paths and fruits like Stream-entry. In daily life, in the manner we mentioned earlier, a person who sets aside even one day, maintaining postures slowly, practicing some meditation subject appropriate to their temperament, and testing the truth of those dhammas in accordance with the meditation subject, can develop faith (saddhā) in the Buddha within that single day. Not the faith mentioned in books, but from within oneself. Thinking, "The Buddha has taught such a Dhamma indeed!" That is sandiṭṭhiko. Next, "Akāliko" (timeless) means this Dhamma has the nature of yielding results without delay. This is not like giving a gift. For some things, when someone achieves a certain status, a gift is given for it. One has to present one's qualifications and wait until the gift is given. There is no such thing here. The result comes along with the completion of these factors. The Buddha showed this both in a very simple manner and in a deep manner. He has expressed it simply. When a certain Brahmin asked on one occasion: "What, Venerable Sir, is the meaning of this sandiṭṭhiko, akāliko, ehipassiko?" the Buddha explained it to that Brahmin in a way that he could understand even while remaining in his status as a Brahmin. "Behold, Brahmin, suppose there is some greed in you. Understanding the value of generosity by applying some effort, suppose you have removed that greed. At that very moment, do you not realize: 'I suffered so much because of that greed. Now, because I have abandoned greed, I have obtained this much peace'? That indeed is what is meant by sandiṭṭhiko and akāliko. The result is obtained right there. One does not have to wait for this." Next, regarding aversion (dosa), it is the same. "Now, suppose you get angry with someone. You develop aversion. At the moment that aversion arises, your face changes completely, it becomes distorted, and you experience some suffering and displeasure because of that aversion. If you remove that aversion through thoughts of loving-kindness (mettā) and so on, if you remove it through compassion (karuṇā), at that moment you obtain a great peace. Then, you get to experience it right there." Regarding delusion (moha) too, it is the same. If, at the moment delusion arose, one established mindfulness and acted accordingly. If one reflected properly at that moment, the benefit of that wisdom is right there. Thus, in a general sense, it is so. When looked at in a deep sense, along with the completion of the Noble Eightfold Path, the fruit of Stream-entry is obtained. The Buddha does not have to come and say, "Here, I am giving you Stream-entry." There is no such thing. What is expressed there is that it is inherent in the Dhamma itself, and is obtained by practicing the Dhamma. "Akāliko"—it yields results without delay.

"Ehipassiko" (inviting to come and see) means: come and see. It says, "come and see." It is not the Buddha who says "come and see," but the Dhamma itself. This Dhamma calls out, "Practice me and see." Therefore, it is the Dhamma that becomes ehipassiko here. "Come - see." "Come and see, practice and see." In this way, it makes an invitation. "Opanayiko" (leading onwards) means the nature of this Dhamma is such that one thing is connected to another in a wonderful way, according to the relationship of cause and condition (hetu-paccaya). Now, someone can easily understand that. A person who had wrong view, having heard the Dhamma from the Buddha, having understood good arguments, having understood the wholesome and the unwholesome, and having gained some understanding of the Four Noble Truths, develops Right View (sammā-diṭṭhi) to some extent at that point. Along with that Right View, good thoughts arise in that person. Thinking, "Renunciation (nekkhamma) is good—leaving behind is good. Harmlessness is good. Loving-kindness is good," and in that direction, thoughts of loving-kindness, such good thoughts arise. That is Right Thought (sammā-saṅkappa). That is why the Buddha declares: sammādiṭṭhissa sammāsaṅkappo pahoti—in the person who has Right View, Right Thought—good thoughts—arise naturally, spontaneously, without effort. In that way, instead of remaining in lay life with stinginess, "how valuable a thing is renunciation—that nekkhamma?" Next, similarly, getting rid of harm and maintaining thoughts of harmlessness, thoughts of compassion—how valuable a thing is that? Getting rid of anger and thoughts of loving-kindness. In that way, through those thoughts, that person obtains benefits at that very moment. Therein lies "opanayiko"—it leads onwards from one to another. In the one who has Right View, Right Thought arises. In the one who has Right thoughts, good words come out of his mouth accordingly. Truthful words, words that reconcile others, gentle words, words in accordance with the Dhamma, come out of his mouth. Then, sammāsaṅkappaṇa sammāvācā pahoti—in the one who has good thoughts, good wishes, because of those very good thoughts and wishes, good words come out from within that person. Next, sammāvācassa sammākammanto pahoti—the person who purifies Right Speech thinks, "I maintain these thoughts of renunciation, thoughts of loving-kindness, thoughts of harmlessness in this way." That is how thoughts are purified. That is how words are purified. Therefore, "killing living beings, stealing, sexual misconduct, etc., do not suit me," and in this way, there is naturally an abstaining from them as well. Next, doing so not just for a day or two, but as Right Livelihood (sammā-ājīva)—one molds one's livelihood and lifestyle accordingly, even if one has to make some sacrifice. Thinking, "These are not things to be kept occasionally only on Poya days. I must correct my very livelihood, my entire lifestyle, according to this declared path," that person becomes energetic and establishes Right Livelihood. The correct way of living. So, the person who has a correct way of living, through the effort he exerts, next develops what is called Right Effort (sammā-vāyāma)—the correct exertion. Correct exertion is not about engaging in some work until one sweats profusely. What is correct effort? It is the fourfold effort of remaining highly attentive to the mind, preventing unwholesome states that are ready to flow into the mind, discarding unwholesome states already present in the mind, bringing close wholesome states, and consolidating those good wholesome states present within oneself. This is the effort that arises in the person who makes some sacrifice for his livelihood and establishes a righteous way of living. Then, through that very effort, this person next falls naturally into that previously mentioned satipaṭṭhāna. The Four Establishments of Mindfulness are completed. Why? Because that person is constantly examining his own mind. About the body that acts in accordance with that mind. The body and the mind act in connection with each other. The ordinary person is subservient to the body and disregards the mind. The Buddha, in accordance with the Dhamma teaching manopubbaṅgamā dhammā, shows that the mind is the forerunner. Now, in the book called the Dhammapada, shown as the beginning of many verses declared by the Buddha—as the door to that treasury of gems—is: manopubbaṅgamā dhammā, manoṣeṭṭhā manomayā—mind is the forerunner of all things, mind is supreme, they are mind-made. Everything is preceded by the mind. The mind is chief. Everything is made of the mind. No one can prove this to be false. Even a worldly scientist cannot prove this to be false. Such a wonderful teaching. That is why the Buddha gave the foremost place to the mind. Cittena nīyati loko—the Buddha declared. The entire world is led by the mind. Now, normally, is it not with the mind that people in the world think of these things? That scientist does those things in the laboratory with the mind. Therefore, it is with the mind that all of this is led. Going to the moon is also done with the mind. All of this is done with the mind. Some people might misunderstand these things and explain them in a distorted way. But what is here is that the mind is chief in everything. That statement made by the Buddha is always a truth.

Cittena nīyati loko (the world is led by the mind), that is indeed why the Buddha gives the foremost place to the mind itself.

If that correct vision called Right View has arisen within someone to any extent, the sequence of dhammas arising from there is called the Noble Eightfold Path. The Buddha has declared that this path is superior to all paths in the entire world. There are various kinds of wide paths, paths where one can travel in comfortable vehicles, various kinds of paths in the world. But the Buddha declares, maggānaṭṭhaṅgiko seṭṭho—the path consisting of eight factors is the best. In that way, if this mindfulness is completed through the Four Establishments of Mindfulness, concentration (samādhi) also grows naturally within such a person. By directing the mind to a single object, while that sentry applies mindfulness well to each thing, concentration arises within him, even if only for that brief moment. He can then maintain it for a long period. Indeed, it is through completing this Noble Eightfold Path that one can realize this noble Dhamma of Nibbāna, free oneself from all the suffering of saṃsāra, and find peace in that deathless supreme bliss of Nibbāna. Therefore, today is a valuable Poya day. The day the Buddha set the Wheel of Dhamma in motion (Dhamma-cakka-pavattana). Thus, one must endeavor to set this Wheel of Dhamma in motion within one's own mental continuum (citta-santāna) and free oneself from this mass of suffering. Today, then, on this valuable day, established in virtue (sīla)—or in a highly valuable virtue—you have heard this Dhamma in this manner, for about an hour. During this period, you may have been able to realize those previously mentioned dhammas to some extent, according to your store of merit (puñña-shakti) and store of wisdom (ñāṇa-shakti). To put it briefly, if this time had been spent on other things, worldly things, such a peaceful, pure collection of thoughts would not have arisen. Thus indeed, one must understand the value of the Dhamma as sandiṭṭhiko and akāliko.

Now then, this is a store of merit you have gathered by listening to the Dhamma for this long. As benefits, in the manner declared by the Buddha, the qualities of faith (saddhā), energy (vīriya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā) can be experienced by you at this very moment. Having sat in this posture during this time with a certain degree of faith, and with energy following that, and establishing mindfulness accordingly, you heard the Dhamma and experienced a certain concentration. Next, if some understanding of the Dhamma arose, wisdom is developed by that. When reflecting in this way, traveling along this path of Dhamma gradually, even little by little, one must firmly resolve to take the maximum benefit from this human life—the maximum benefit from this opportune moment (khaṇa-sampatti). Having firmly resolved thus, as the benefit of this vast store of merit gathered by listening to the Dhamma, one must wish: "May this give me the strength and power to realize the deathless supreme Nibbāna in this very life, as quickly as possible, through the paths and fruits of Stream-entry (sotāpatti), Once-returning (sakadāgāmī), Non-returning (anāgāmī), and Arahatsip."

Likewise, this store of merit gathered so far—gathered by both of us through this teaching of Dhamma and hearing of Dhamma—may the assembly of deities who protect the Dispensation, and whatever deities reside in this sacred place, joyfully rejoice in it! May everyone realize the noble deathless supreme Nibbāna through their own aspired Bodhi (Enlightenment)! May they provide protection to us and to the Dispensation! Thus indeed, one must share the merit with the deities. Likewise, one's departed relatives, including all beings from the Avici hell up to the Akanitha heaven who desire merit and desire Nibbāna—may they all rejoice in our merit of teaching and hearing the Dhamma! Having rejoiced, may they be freed from all suffering states, reach happy states, and by practicing Dhamma and meditation as quickly as possible, find peace in the noble deathless supreme Nibbāna! With this aspiration, recite these verses and transfer the merit.

Verse 282 from the Maggavagga (Chapter on the Path) of the Dhammapada

Dear Listeners,

The Sublime Dhamma declared by our Teacher of the Three Worlds, the Buddha—indeed, that Buddha-word—is in truth a path of practice that helps one to be released from the suffering of saṃsāra and to realize Nibbāna. Therefore, no matter how detailedly one studies the Buddha's teachings along with their commentaries and sub-commentaries, or memorizes them, if one does not walk upon that path of practice called virtue, concentration, and wisdom (sīla-samādhi-paññā), the ultimate purpose of the Buddha's teaching is not fulfilled. One cannot realize Nibbāna. To realize Nibbāna, meditation is especially necessary. Without meditation, no one can attain Nibbāna. The word used to convey this meaning of engaging in meditation is 'Yoga'. In other religions, the word 'Yoga' may be used in various other senses. But in our Dhamma, 'Yoga' means meditative attention (bhāvanā manasikāra)—meditative reflection. 'Ayoga' means not engaging in meditation. Thus, 'Yoga' is engaging in meditation, while 'Ayoga' is not engaging in meditation. Today, we take as our sermon's theme the verse declared by the Buddha to show the difference between these two.

The background story of this verse is a very exemplary one. During the time the Buddha was residing at the Jetavana Monastery, there was a senior monk named Poṭhila. This Venerable Poṭhila was an expert in the Tipiṭaka; he had memorized it entirely and was a teacher instructing five hundred disciples. Judging by today's standards, you know there are various degrees such as 'Tipiṭakācārya' (Teacher of the Tipiṭaka), 'Tipiṭaka Vāgīśvarācārya' (Supreme Master of the Tipiṭaka), and so on; he was a monk worthy of being honored with such great titles. However, although Ven. Poṭhila was filled with learning, he did not direct his mind towards meditation. He did not think about his own Nibbāna or his own escape from saṃsāra, no matter how many disciples he taught. The Buddha felt compassion and a sense of spiritual urgency (saṃvega) regarding this monk, thinking: 'Alas! Though he is a person of such vast learning, he has still not thought about his own Nibbāna.' What was the method the Buddha used to arouse a sense of urgency in this monk? When Ven. Poṭhila came to pay respects to Him, the Buddha would address him as 'Empty Poṭhila' (Tuccha Poṭhila). No matter how the word 'tuccha' (empty/worthless) is used in society, its meaning is 'empty'. Thus: 'Come here, Empty Poṭhila. Welcome, Empty Poṭhila. Sit down, Empty Poṭhila. Ah, well, you may go, Empty Poṭhila. There goes Empty Poṭhila.' In this manner, whenever Ven. Poṭhila came, the Buddha used these words—the word 'Empty'. A great sense of urgency arose in this monk: 'Alas! The Buddha, my Teacher—to me, who am so highly learned and teach such a massive crowd of disciples—uses this word "Empty"! Now, why did the Buddha, out of great compassion, give him this 'insulting name'? It was to arouse in that monk a sense of urgency regarding escape from saṃsāra, and also to shatter the conceit that had arisen due to his learning and his large following.

For someone who practices virtues in this Dispensation, when doing things like meditation, it becomes necessary to seek various instructions under the guidance of a teacher. If one is to receive such instructions, there must be humility. This monk might have been thinking, 'Now I know everything.' A full vessel cannot be filled again. It must be emptied to be filled. It was with this intention of emptying and shattering conceit that the Buddha began addressing this monk as 'Empty'. Yet, this monk did not get angry because of it. He did not harbor hatred or ill-will toward the Buddha, thinking, 'He is disrespecting me.' Understanding his own state, he then decided: 'Now, I must abandon all these disciples and leave. I must go to some forest monastery, to a remote forest, and meditate.' Having made this resolution, the next morning he taught his disciples for the last time, and as the very last disciple departed, in a way that no one could see or understand—as if in disguise—not exactly in disguise, but in a manner unseen by anyone, even before dawn, he departed. Having departed, he traveled hundreds of leagues away and arrived at a certain forest monastery. In that forest monastery, there resided thirty monks. It was a forest monastery where thirty Arahants resided. This monk went to the chief monk of that monastery and pleaded: 'Alas, Bhante, please be a refuge to me.' That is, to be a refuge for Nibbāna. The chief monk first said, 'Alas, is not your reverence a person of such great learning? Is it not from people like you that even we must learn something?' Ven. Poṭhila replied, 'Alas, do not say so, Bhante. I have come here seeking a refuge; please give me a meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna) for Nibbāna.' To break his conceit, the chief monk sent him to the second monk. That monk sent him to the next monk. Going on like this, they finally sent him to a seven-year-old novice monk (sāmaṇera) who had recently ordained and was at the very end of the community of monks. This novice monk was no ordinary person either. He was an Arahant. When Ven. Poṭhila approached, this young novice, who was indeed a great Arahant, was sewing a robe in a quiet spot. Ven. Poṭhila went up to this novice monk, paid respects, and pleaded: 'O virtuous one, please be my refuge, please help me.' The novice monk also said, 'Alas, Bhante, you are a very elderly, highly educated, and deeply learned monk. When even we must learn things from you, why do you speak like this?' Ven. Poṭhila replied, 'No, no, do not say so. I have come with the hope of realizing Nibbāna. Please be my refuge. If you tell me to, I am even ready to jump into a fire,' thus expressing his obedience. Then, to eradicate his conceit and test his obedience, the young monk pointed to a pond nearby and said, 'If that is so, Bhante, step into that pond over there.' Ven. Poṭhila, who was wearing high-quality, valuable robes, stepped into the pond with those very robes on. Just as he stepped in, and the edge of his robe was barely wet, the young Arahant novice called out, 'Come back, Bhante,' and then began to give him the lesson.

You, meritorious people, can think a little about how this must have been. A seven-year-old novice monk—a clever, skillful novice, but indeed an Arahant. And that senior monk was highly learned, with graying hair, possessing a very dignified appearance. Yet, that senior monk sat in a squatting posture and was now learning this lesson to realize Nibbāna. He was ready to learn a lesson from this seven-year-old novice, a lesson he had been unable to learn all this time. What was the lesson this Arahant novice gave? He gave a simile that anyone can take deeply to heart, or understand very simply. 'Then, Bhante, let us suppose there is an anthill with six holes. A monitor lizard entered through one of these six holes. If one wants to catch this monitor lizard, what should one do? One must close five of the holes and watch over the single hole through which the monitor lizard entered. While watching there, one can catch the monitor lizard. In the same way, Bhante, we have six senses—like the anthill, in this body of ours. Various objects enter through these six sense doors. If we want to "catch" those objects that have entered'—here, 'catching' means, in a deep sense, to comprehend them, to 'grasp' them. In modern parlance, we say, 'I couldn't catch what was said.' It is that kind of catching meant here. Catching the monitor lizard means, regarding the object—various objects, when we think of various things we call them 'objects'—it means correctly comprehending the true nature of the object; that is what is called catching the object. 'Just as one closes those five holes to catch the monitor lizard, among these six senses, one must close the five doors of the external senses, namely the eye, ear, nose, tongue, and body, and engage in guarding this door called "mind", called the "thought-mind".' That is the idea. There was no need to explain further. As soon as the young monk spoke this simile, Ven. Poṭhila's past merits surfaced, and he understood it deeply. Next, as he was understanding it, the Buddha, watching this event from hundreds of leagues away, through His Buddha-knowledge, in order to further encourage Ven. Poṭhila at that final moment—to encourage him to exert himself in that meditation subject—uttered the verse we took as our theme earlier.

Yogā ve jāyati bhūri

ayogā bhūrisaṅkhayo

etaṃ dvedhāpathaṃ jñātvā

bhavāya vibhavāya ca

tathāttānaṃ niveseyya

yathā bhūri pavaḍḍhati

'Yogā ve jāyati bhūri'—Yoga means engaging in meditation, meditative attention (bhāvanā manasikāra). Through that meditative attention, one can gain great wisdom as vast as the earth. One can obtain a great result. 'Ayogā bhūrisaṅkhayo'—But if there is no such meditative attention, no such engagement, what happens there is the decline of wisdom. Wisdom is destroyed; understanding is lost. 'Etaṃ dvedhāpathaṃ jñātvā - bhavāya vibhavāya ca'—understanding these two paths, this crossroads—fully understanding these two paths diverging in two directions—'tathāttānaṃ niveseyya - yathā bhūri pavaḍḍhati'—'in whichever way wisdom grows, practice in that way, walk on that path, turn towards that path.' This is how the Buddha advised Ven. Poṭhila through this verse. It is recorded that, encouraged by this instruction, Ven. Poṭhila very rapidly applied meditative attention and became an Arahant. From this, we can understand that there is a depth within that verse sufficient to aid the realization of Arahantship. Why? Because the young novice monk had presented the Dhamma Ven. Poṭhila had realized himself as a meditation subject through that small simile—the simile of the monitor lizard and the anthill.

Now, we too can draw many lessons from this story. Let us first look at that. First of all, from this story, we see the difference between knowledge and wisdom. Today, this is something many people mix up. This is an era where knowledge is overflowing. In the name of science and other various arts and sciences—when you look at a library, it is full of books. There is such an overflowing store of knowledge in the world. But wisdom is not that. Wisdom is subtle understanding. Most people lack it. Especially, wisdom here means the deep understanding that helps realize Nibbāna—the deep understanding of the Four Noble Truths. Most people do not have that. Nor do they exert themselves for the sake of wisdom. Instead, carrying a burden of knowledge, crushed under its weight, they spend their lives and finally die, sometimes to be reborn in the lower realms, as animals, or ghost worlds. Why? A person cannot escape saṃsāra through that accumulation of knowledge. For the sake of wisdom, one must walk upon that path of virtue, concentration, and wisdom (sīla-samādhi-paññā) and receive training in it. Or to put it another way—by concentrating the mind through a certain meditation subject, and developing the three characteristics of impermanent (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and non-self (anattā), realizing the stages of awakening is what is called wisdom. This difference between the two is well illustrated by Ven. Poṭhila, who, despite having qualifications worthy of receiving various degrees, did not realize Nibbāna, which is the true purpose of the Buddha's teaching. He had not even attained the stage of Stream-entry (Sotāpanna). But that seven-year-old novice monk, who was a newly ordained monk—whom we call 'the small monk'—was not small at all; he was a great Arahant. Such is the vast gap between knowledge and wisdom.

Next, when we think of the word 'Empty' (tuccha), which seems like an insult from the Buddha, we can understand that the fundamental thing required to practice a meditation subject and to be disciplined according to it is humility. Although Ven. Poṭhila had such shortcomings initially, how humbly did he seek refuge from the novice monk at that moment! This is exemplary for everyone. It is an occasion worthy of drawing a discipline from. Thus, he demonstrates the quality of humility. It is an example to the world. Despite possessing great academic learning, in the presence of one who had supramundane realization, he humbly and respectfully sought advice. Ven. Poṭhila set a wonderful example.

On the other hand, look at the simile given, and also the discipline that showed the spiritual power of that novice monk. He told Ven. Poṭhila to step into the pond, and Ven. Poṭhila obeyed that spiritual power. Next, the simile given by the young monk: the simile of the monitor lizard that entered the anthill. This anthill carries a deep meaning. The simile of the anthill is shown in the Dhamma itself. This physical body, born of mother and father, nourished by food and drink, and constructed from the four elements of earth, water, fire, and wind—arising from these four elements of earth, water, fire, and wind—is compared to an anthill. The six holes of this physical body are what was mentioned. The five external sense doors are the eye, ear, nose, tongue, and body. Why are these called 'holes'?—They are 'doors'. Through these doors, we take in various objects. Forms are seen by the eye. Sounds are heard by the ear. Odors are smelled by the nose. Tastes are tasted by the tongue. Tangibles are felt by the body. Likewise, thoughts come to the mind. In this way, objects stream in through these six doors. But there is a specialty here. The objects taken in by those five external senses—the eye, ear, nose, tongue, and body—the experience of those streaming objects, their consumption, is done by the mind. If we consider this like a picture, those five external senses are around the periphery, and the mind is in the center. All messages from those five—sensory messages—are deposited in the mind. Even if we think about that anthill, the mind is like the topmost hole of the anthill. That is the chief one. The five external senses are like the five holes around it. We can think of it like that for a moment. Usually, we think that the eye took the object, that the ear took the object. But no matter from where they are taken, these go and deposit themselves in the mind.

The mind is chief. This is the most special and supreme statement in the Buddha's teaching. Even if modern science does not take this into much consideration, the Buddha's teaching gives the chief place to the mind. The Dhammapada begins its first two verses with the words: 'Mano-pubbaṅgamā dhammā, mano-seṭṭhā manomayā.' This is like a fundamental principle of the Buddha's teaching. 'Mano-pubbaṅgamā dhammā'—here, 'dhammā' means the objects of the mind. We can call them 'things'. In everything we consider as 'things', the mind is the forerunner. The mind is chief to these. 'Mano-seṭṭhā'—the mind is supreme. 'Manomayā'—when we really reflect, these are mind-made. In things taken as 'forms' or 'sounds' and so on, it is the mind-connected part that the Buddha highlights most. They are, as it were, constructed by the mind itself. Therefore, this problem must be resolved through the mind itself. What is meant by resolving the problem through the mind itself? It is by reflecting on these incoming objects. Through reflecting on these objects, it is the comprehension of their true nature—their true nature according to the Dhamma. What does the ordinary worldling do? To see a form coming to the eye more clearly, they run after it. They run after the sound coming to the ear. These are perceptions (saññā). The Buddha compared perception (saññā) to a mirage. What is a mirage? In the hot season, a deer, seeing a shimmering, vibrating appearance on the ground caused by climatic and weather conditions, is deceived into thinking it is water and runs after it. The more it runs, the further it recedes. Therefore, it is called a mirage, 'mṛgaṭṭṣṇikā' (deer-thirst). The thirsty deer runs after it. The Buddha compares perceptions (saññā) to this very mirage. If so, how much do we exhaust ourselves to see clearly a form that appears to the eye, to the point that microscopes are not enough, telescopes are not enough! In that manner, we analyze and analyze them. But one does not draw closer to the Dhamma through that. One does not draw closer to seeing the reality declared by the Buddha. It does not ultimately help in realizing the three characteristics of impermanent (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and non-self (anattā).

It is the same with sound and other things. We run far after them. What is the danger of this running? Why do we run? It is because of desires for them. Desire is something that grows. Running after these perceptions is what causes the growth of defilements, which are called by various names such as craving (taṇhā), desire, and greed. Instead of that, what is advised—especially in insight meditation (vipassanā bhāvanā)—is to briefly note everything. That yogi, the meditator (yogāvacara), is on a path to Nibbāna, a journey to Nibbāna. Now, even if we are going on a long journey, if we are traveling with that journey as our target, and if we stop our vehicle everywhere along the way because 'here is a good view, here is a good song' to see and hear them, we will not be able to complete our journey. It causes delay. Therefore, a person who aspires to Nibbāna without delay, when engaging in that work of yoga, in meditation, in meditative attention, does not chase after a form that is seen. He does not run after it. Instead, he gives a note to the mind: 'form, form,' reflecting twice in this manner: 'this is merely a form.' That is what is called noting/reflecting—meditative attention (manasikāra). 'Form, form.' Next, regarding a sound as well—if it is a song, without analyzing whose song it is, or what kind of song it is, the one who has sat down for meditation notes: 'sound, sound' and ends it right there. 'sound, sound.' In the same way, regarding odors too—that too is a certain sensation, an odor or fragrance. He notes it briefly and ends it right there; in that manner. Or else, even if a thought arises, without letting that thought grow, without letting it expand, he notes it as a thought. It is merely a thought that is noted here. Through this, instead of running after the mirage, the mind can be stopped. Stopping this running mind is the special exercise done through this.

What have we been doing for a long time in this saṃsāra? Like the deer running after the mirage, we ran after the perceptions received through our senses. There is never any satisfaction. The deer runs to quench its thirst, but its thirst only increases, and it cannot find water to end it, because there is no water there. In the same way, to quench our desires, we run after a 'thing' created by the mind. The things we think of as 'things' are those very objects. But not a single one of them can be caught by us. Their true nature cannot be grasped. We cannot be satisfied by looking with the eye or hearing with the ear. Instead, the Buddha says to close those five doors and note the things that come to the mind in the manner described. Even the incoming thought is noted as a thought—without submitting to that thought, without allowing it to grow. Recognizing it as 'thought, thought,' it is ended right there. In this way, as in 'nipping it in the bud' (lat-tana lop karanavā), this insight attention (vipassanā manasikāra) is what is meant here by 'catching the monitor lizard'; it is the comprehension of the true nature of the object. This 'monitor lizard'—these objects—have been deposited in the mind in a very subtle way over a long period in this long saṃsāra. The objects we formed due to the perceptions coming to this mind in the past saṃsāra lie as if asleep within the mind. They wake up and try to escape through those five external senses. A certain past perception regarding a form coming to the eye arises—arising from within the mind—and grasping the external form, it runs after it, thinking, 'Ah, what a beautiful form!' It runs after it, thinking, 'Ah, what a good song, what a sweet sound!' These also arise from the mind. Once they arise and start running after the five external senses, they cannot be stopped again. Instead, what is done? Closing those five doors, the meditator, without giving room to them, treats them briefly, nips them in the bud, and remains watchful over the mind. What is used to help maintain this watchfulness? That is what is called mindfulness and clear comprehension (sati-sampajañña). 'Sati' means mindfulness. 'Sampajañña' can be called 'clear understanding' or 'awareness'—the ability to understand something, which means a power of comprehension. Thus, we can call it mindfulness and wisdom. Possessing mindfulness and wisdom, one becomes aware of something oneself—not making others aware, but becoming aware oneself: 'the nature of this is such.' If it is a form, that too is a mirage. That too is perception. Therefore, without running after it, one stops right there, noting: 'it is merely a form, it is merely a sound.'

It is through noting in this manner that one can gradually free oneself from perception (saññā). It is by freeing oneself from perception that wisdom (paññā) can be brought forth—that deep understanding. What is that deep understanding? As declared by the Buddha, everything in this world has an impermanent (anicca) nature. A person must realize this impermanence (aniccatā) for themselves. Through this noting, the power to realize it arises in a person. If we reflect on impermanence (aniccatā) in more detail, in everything there is an arising (jāti) and a passing away. Arising and passing away—these two are what is called impermanence (aniccatā). Whether we take form, feeling/sensation (vedanā), perception (saññā), formations (saṅkhāra), or consciousness (viññāṇa)—this entire five aggregates is impermanent (anicca). It is this group of five aggregates that we designate as 'I' and 'mine'. This is a pile of form. Sometimes we take a photograph and proudly say, 'my form.' What was recorded there? A series—a continuity—of forms changing at extreme rapidity. This is shown as a single thing by that perception, like a mirage. There is such a deceptive nature in the world. Due to the weakness in the structure of these senses, we do not see that rapid change. This is because of what is called the 'perception of compactness' (ghana-saññā). There is a tendency for everything in the world to appear as a solid thing, a dense thing, a real thing, a permanent thing. The mirage seen from afar is thought of as water. But there, only a great shimmering, vibrating mass exists. In the same way, not only that which is far, but this physical body of ours also changes moment by moment with extreme rapidity. That is form. Next, feeling/sensation (vedanā) is also like that. We say 'Alas, sensation!' thinking of it as a single thing. But there too, when one notes with mindfulness and wisdom in the manner of meditative attention, it is seen. There too, exists only a heap of feelings. Likewise, perception (saññā) is also a pile of layers. It is through a pile of perceptual layers that we recognize someone. With extreme rapidity, we take that pile of layers as one due to the perception of compactness—as a form. Similarly, formations (saṅkhāra), which are our intentions—they too arise and pass away with extreme rapidity. Even consciousness (viññāṇa), though we call it 'the mind,' though we call it 'my mind,' arises and passes away with a speed that is 'unimaginable'. While such a state exists in the world, we usually take these as one through the perception of compactness and designate them as 'I' and 'mine'. When we say 'I', if there is an 'I', there must also be something that belongs to me. So, it is by trying to divide these two that we create this saṃsāric knot. 'I' and 'my things.' In this way, due to that perception of compactness, a delusion (moha) arises.

When someone engages in that meditative attention, establishing a certain state of concentration (samādhi) and stilling the mind—first, by not letting the running mind run, and keeping watch over the mind—and then, as they go on noting more deeply, they see that there is only a heap of arising and passing away here. There is no 'thing' that arises, nor any 'thing' that passes away. Ultimately, even the thing taken as a 'thing'—that too is not there. The feeling comes that here is only a mass of vibrations. Though we say 'thing' in ordinary parlance, even this object—this object taken as a 'thing'—it is seen that there is nothing here to grasp anew. Why? Because that perception of compactness is removed and it is seen as a multitude—everywhere, wherever one looks. When that realization approaches a meditator (yogāvacara), his own body, feelings, perceptions, and everything else are understood as a heap of vibrations. That cannot be shown to another. It is understood by oneself. That is what is called 'direct realization' (pratyakṣa). Through such an understanding, next, a disenchantment arises, thinking: 'Is it not a thing of arising and passing away that I am grasping as "I" and "mine", and desiring?' Likewise, when the effort to reproduce these is lost, what is seen more is the vanishing, the breaking up nature. Because of that breaking up, a fear arises. Now, if we are holding onto something, if we are grasping something seeking a refuge, when that thing we are holding onto, that thing we are grasping breaks, a certain fear and urgency arises in us. In the same way, to that meditator, as he goes on noting the five aggregates in this manner, the understanding comes: 'There is nothing to be taken here. There is nothing to hold onto. This is a very dangerous situation. It is while sitting on a pile of breaking foundations in this entire saṃsāra that we are singing joyfully.' Therefore, in truth, it is due to delusion (moha) and ignorance (avijjā) that we travel for a long time in saṃsāra, like the deer running after the mirage. Instead, when that understanding arises here, when wisdom arises, it is seen that this form, feeling/sensation (vedanā), perception (saññā), formations (saṅkhāra), and consciousness (viññāṇa)—all of which were taken as 'I' and 'mine'—are changing and breaking up with extreme rapidity. They arise and pass away. It is in this manner that the insight knows mature.

Therefore, we must consider the value of this attention (manasikāra). Attention is something done entirely within the mind. The meditator does not do any extraordinary work in the world, like a hen hatching eggs. What he does is not visible. But it is through this attention done inside the mind that his wisdom (paññā) grows. It is difficult for the ordinary worldling to understand this. Through this meditative attention, at some point, it gradually becomes clear to a person: 'In this entire saṃsāra, I have been engaged in a futile journey due to ignorance (avijjā) and craving (taṇhā). Taking this breaking thing, this rapidly changing thing, as "I" and

"mine", and being submerged in a stream of defilements, a heap of defilements created because of it, I spend this saṃsāra. We undergo various births (jāti) according to karma.' As this understanding deepens and deepens, a person gains the strength to let go of this. Now, when we say 'letting go,' the feeling comes to a person that something one is holding is slipping away from one's hand. But if we look at it that way, a question arises as to how one can let go of the five aggregates. Though we say 'letting go' in words, something completely different happens here. As that meditator goes on noting in that manner, he sees this arising and passing away, and next, its breaking up. It begins to be understood as breaking up even faster than it arises. Next, because of this very thing, a certain fear and urgency arises. Likewise, the danger of this is seen, and the understanding comes that there is nothing to grasp here. Next, the comprehension arises that one must be freed from this—the need to be freed from this. The path to that freedom is that disenchantment. Now, we know well that a person who likes to be well-groomed, whether a young man or a young woman, dressed in all their finery and ready to go to a grand festival—if someone throws a dead dog, a dead snake, or a corpse onto their shoulders, how quickly would they shake their shoulders and cast it off? In the same way, when that understanding comes, regarding the dangerous nature of these, a certain disgust arises within the mind. A disenchantment arises. That disenchantment is not something to be told to others. That disenchantment arising from within oneself is what is used as an aid to escape from saṃsāra. Why? Because the bondage of saṃsāra is based on craving (taṇhā), on desire, on attachment, which is the mental grasping called holding/fuel (upādāna). What is here is a mental grasping. At this moment, we are not holding anything with our hands. But you, meritorious people, know very well how many things we are holding with our minds. What is meant by saying we have owned this entire world? Mental grasping. How did the kings who conquered the entire world own the world? They grasped it with the mind, with craving (taṇhā). They thought, 'this is mine.' Even this physical body of ours does not belong to us, in truth. For it is said that a multitude of ninety-thousand families of worms live inside it and excrete in it. It belongs to all of them. That is why it is called 'shared with many' (bahu-sādhāranā). This body is something that belongs to anyone. Likewise, our lands and properties are shared with thieves and enemies. They are shared with insects, monkeys, and other animals. But 'ours'—everything is ours. The country is ours, the village is ours, the world is ours—we usually designate all of this as ours. But when we look at the reality of this, not a single one of these is ours. The Buddha declared this truth, which is usually considered bitter. Though bitter, if it is the truth, we must accept it.

It is through such a vision of truth that a person is able to escape from this saṃsāra. The path that helps towards this is this meditative attention. Therefore, you meritorious people must reflect today. A person might think that the stories we present as similes are things that cannot be put into practice in daily life. But how did that seven-year-old novice monk attain such a sublime state, the state of Arahantship? Was it by reading books? Was it by gaining a vast store of academic knowledge? No. It was through meditative attention. That young monk caught the monitor lizard in the anthill correctly. Closing the five holes of the external senses, and catching the monitor lizard correctly through that hole called 'mind', is why he became an Arahant. Therefore, a highly practical lesson for daily life was taught here by this seven-year-old novice monk to Ven. Poṭhila. We too must make use of it. We must make it a practical thing in our daily lives. In this day and age, we often say 'it is impossible.' But through this simile, we see that we can create a moment for this meditative attention even in our daily lives. Some might wonder how these can be stopped merely by noting them in the manner described. One might think, in daily life, 'should we not run after these?' But the meditator does not think from such an ordinary perspective. For a long time, we have been in a great deception. A great deception called ignorance (avijjā) and delusion (moha) has been created due to these five senses. If we are to understand their true nature, a certain discipline is necessary, as declared by the Buddha. Just as you have undertaken today, one must first undertake a certain virtue (sīla) and discipline body and speech. Establishing oneself on that virtue, to concentrate the mind means to make the mind one-pointed. It is to a concentrated mind that this reality appears. To a scattered mind, the reality of the world is not understood. Therefore, removing the causes that distract the mind, one must still the mind on some meditation subject.

After concentrating the mind in that way, next, if this noting is done correctly, one begins to understand gradually: regarding the thing we took as one—through the perception of compactness—here, there is only a multitude, a heap. Why is it called a heap? It is understood as a heap because each one is understood separately. When we look at a broom and examine whether it is a broom, we see that here is only a heap of ribs (coconut-leaf midribs). Then, each rib is seen separately. Within that separate seeing, there are those phenomena of Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). That is an occasion when a certain deep Dhamma matter called Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) is understood. According to the Dhamma declared by the Buddha, in truth, there exist here only two things: Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). There is no 'I' here. That is the Buddha's teaching. Although we think 'Name' (nāma) means a name, it consists of these five phenomena: feeling/sensation (vedanā), perception (saññā), intention/volition (cetānā), contact (phassa), and attention (manasikāra). Even in daily life, we experience some feeling—and based on that feeling, we form a certain recognition, which is perception. Based on that recognition, we think—intention. Through those thoughts, we make a certain contact, and direct our attention to a certain place. This is what is called mental phenomena (nāma-dhamma).

Next, what is the Form (rūpa) part of this? Form (rūpa) is considered as these four great elements of earth, water, fire, and wind. These four elements are mixed in an extremely subtle manner. In what we call water, the other elements are also included. But the water-element (āpo-dhātu) is more prominent in it. Therefore, we call it water. In this manner, mixed in a highly wondrous way, these four elements are like four ungraspable ghosts—the great primary elements (mahābhūta-dhamma). It is from these four elements that this body of ours is constructed. Now, keeping others from getting close to our bodies which we designate as 'I' and 'mine', keeping watch from afar, cleaning it—after this physical body dies and is cast into a cemetery, how do others recognize it? Ultimately, everything turns back to earth. Taking the essence of this earth as food is how this body was built. Over a long period, for a period of twenty, thirty, or a hundred years, this physical body was built up. Next, when it decays, it also turns to earth. Arising from earth, it becomes earth. That is what is there. Thus, there are only the four elements. But we do not understand this in our daily lives. The mind does not understand it. To the meditator, this is understood in an extremely subtle manner. So, this is what is called Form (rūpa). In the language of the meditator, when we say 'Form' (rūpa), what is understood? The four elements of earth, water, fire, and wind. While others, in various ways, say, 'what a beautiful form, what a gorgeous form, what a lovely form indeed!' to the one who has that deep wisdom, the understanding comes: 'what is there here? Only the four elements.'

It is the same with what is called the mind. Or rather, the 'mental phenomena' (nāma-dhamma) part. There too, exists a feeling that is directly realized by oneself. Through that, there is a perception that is taken. Even while sitting right now, there is a certain feeling, in such a way that one can say, 'it hurts in such-and-such a place.' Next, there is a recognition, 'has a mosquito bitten me?' A feeling arises. Next, regarding contact—regarding the place of collision—an understanding comes. All of this is done through the noting called attention (manasikāra). Ultimately, when we look, it is attention. It is through attention, therefore, that one understands the emptiness of an object. We also started with the story of 'Empty Poṭhila'—regarding emptiness. That is from another perspective. Now, here, ultimately what comes is the emptiness called voidness (suññatā). This means a penetrative vision of the object. What the ordinary worldling does is run after an object, like the deer running after the mirage. What the meditator does is stop and look at the object, seeing it penetratively. To see the object penetratively means to see the impermanence (aniccatā) of the object. That which was taken as an object is something that arises and passes away with extreme rapidity. Now let us suppose we are looking at a candle flame. That large candle flame appears very beautiful, yellow, or with a slight touch of red, in a lovely manner. How is this seen when that meditative attention is developed? Like a heap of candle flames arising and passing away with extreme rapidity. It is not a single flame. Similarly, let us suppose there is a stream of water flowing. Or rather, water pouring from something. Now, in a water spout or a waterfall, the stream of water appears from afar like a silver wall. When looking closely, ultimately what is there is a stream of water falling and breaking up with extreme rapidity, not remaining in the same state for even a single moment. And it is seen dispersing. It is understood as one only because of taking it with the perception of compactness. But to wisdom, to comprehension, it is understood in the end that there is nothing here to be taken as one. 'There is nothing.' This object is ultimately seen penetratively. This is a very wondrous thing. It starts with the object. It starts by noting the object. But it ends with seeing the emptiness of the object—seeing the object penetratively.

It is through that penetrative seeing that ultimately it is directly realized by oneself: 'there is nothing here to grasp as "I" and "mine".' If there is an 'I', then there is something that belongs to me; if there is no 'I', there is also nothing that belongs to me. Likewise, one understands that this perception of 'I' is a certain ignorance (avijjā), a delusion (moha) deposited in the mind over a long period through ignorance, which society instigates and tries to retain. Now, a person cannot make society understand this realization by shouting. This cannot be made to happen by telling anyone. Why was Ven. Poṭhila unable to understand this despite learning so many books? The Buddha declared this Dhamma as well-proclaimed (svākkhāto); this Dhamma is visible here and now (sandiṭṭhiko), timeless (akāliko), inviting to come and see (ehi-passiko), leading onwards (opānāyiko), and to be personally realized by the wise (paccattaṃ veditaṃ viññūhi), and so on, in various terms. Why? This is something to be directly realized by the wise themselves. Another cannot make one realize this. The path to be applied for that is what was called 'Yoga'—meditative attention, the correct form of meditative attention.

Taking some meditation subject—let us say, mindfulness of breathing (ānāpāna)—through this process of inhalation and exhalation, which stays with us from birth to death, some people can bring forth this aforementioned knowledge. That is a very well-known fact. Now, though we say we take a breath, what is here is a heap of breath-waves. To exhale a breath is also a heap of waves—a heap of vibrations there too. But this wavy nature is usually not understood. Why is it not understood? 'I am breathing.' 'This is my breath.' Let us suppose we took a breath filled with the fragrance of nice flowers, with great attachment. Or we took a breath with something like the fragrance of incense. 'I' took a breath, but we cannot hold onto it. Such is the cosmic order (dhammatā). No matter how desirously we take a breath, we cannot retain it. Later, we suffocate. Therefore, that breath must be expelled. Within that exhalation lies a similar heap of vibrations. So, in the end, when we look, we have to say that what arises is a heap of vibrations, and what passes away is a heap of vibrations. Ultimately, after that too has passed away, even those vibrations are understood by a person in an extremely subtle manner. This cannot be understood by a person through external machines, no matter how subtle those machines may be. It is only through the wisdom developed within oneself that this is understood by a person. It is through this understanding that a person is able to let go of this five aggregates. Trying to escape from this physical body by destroying oneself does not solve that problem. It only worsens the problem. Next, according to karma, one is born again somewhere. Now, many people, speaking of life-sacrifice or life-surrender, sacrifice their lives for something they hold dear, or someone they hold dear—treating it as a great thing. One cannot escape from this saṃsāra in that way. For the habituation of consciousness (viññāṇa) possesses such a great pull. But instead, what is advised to be done is to directly realize those supramundane states through wisdom.

There are four levels of escaping from this saṃsāra, called Stream-entry (Sotāpanna), Once-returning (Sakadāgāmi), Non-returning (Anāgāmi), and Arahantship. Within our minds, there are forces that pull us to the four lower realms (apāya), evil forces. In the supramundane wisdom of the Stream-enterer, there is a power that destroys those unwholesome forces. A Stream-enterer is not born more than seven times in saṃsāra. Likewise, he does not go to the four lower realms. That is the greatest guarantee received through Stream-entry itself. That is why the Buddha preached that the fruit of Stream-entry is supreme compared to sovereign lordship over the entire world, compared to being a universal monarch, compared to going to heaven. For if one is a universal monarch, he is a righteous king. But in the ordinary world, kingship is a state where committing sin is unavoidable. As a result of those sins committed, next, one is born in the terrible lower realms, in states of ghosts (peta) and demons (yakkha). But the Stream-enterer is freed from the four lower realms. That is the first supramundane state. Next, Once-returning means coming back to this world only once more. Perhaps being born in a heavenly world, and then being born in the human world only once more. All of these are named according to how they shorten saṃsāra. Non-returning is the third state. He does not return to this world. Ending the suffering of saṃsāra in the Brahma world itself, he attains final extinguishment through sublime Arahantship. This is the last life of the Arahant. After this life, there is no birth (jāti) again. Although the ordinary world conducts grand celebrations saying 'someone is born,' 'it is a birthday'—how much suffering is birth? The child does not remember it, and sometimes the mother does not remember it either. Not only that, if we look with our eyes wide open, according to the state of the world, is it not because of birth that all these calamities arise? This physical body of ours is also due to this birth. Through the craving (taṇhā) we formed in the past, through mental grasping, we received a certain body according to karma. Sometimes one might be born maimed, mute, or deaf; how much suffering does one have to undergo because of that? Well, let us suppose we are born without any of those, in a healthy state of mind and body. Even then, to nourish this body, to keep it in health, from the day of birth, if someone—like our parents—nourishes us, we can live. When we reach a stage where we can no longer hang onto them, next, we must earn and provide with the sweat of our brow, struggling, and undergoing various sufferings. Such is the situation for protecting this life—for guarding this physical body. Thus, the suffering that arises because of birth. Next, what comes along with birth is decay (jarā). From the day of birth, one decays. Usually, we say we have aged, we have reached old age, by setting some limit—saying it is after 40, or 35. But in truth, this decaying starts from birth itself. The hair that was born, or whatever, goes on decaying. When this decaying accelerates, affliction and disease (vyādhī) come. Gradually, illness accumulates and worsens this problem. Ultimately, this ends in death (maraṇa).

It was because of these four—birth, decay, disease, and death—that the Buddha renounced such royal luxuries and departed. Other sufferings in the world are secondary. They can increase or decrease. But these are common to all. Therefore, if someone reflects on this saṃsāric condition with wisdom, instead of running after the vast accumulation of knowledge which the world has grasped as convention, what is to be done, as Ven. Poṭhila did in the end, as he learned that 'lesson' in the end, is to engage in this path of practice declared by the Buddha—Yoga. One must depart from Ayoga and engage in Yoga. Yoga means meditative attention (bhāvanā manasikāra). In this manner, taking some meditation subject, approaching those who can give instructions on them, and obtaining and following their instructions—humbly, like Ven. Poṭhila—one must walk on that path of Dhamma. This has been a futile running in saṃsāra for a long time. Like the deer running after the mirage, in this life we form certain targets in our childhood. The small child, looking at the lives of adults, forms desires after their lands, properties, and vehicles they use. Those very things are given to the young child as toys, placed in front of him on the day of his first solid feeding. Those are the target objects of his parents' desires. Those objects are what that small child goes and grasps on the day of first solid feeding. Next, that child dedicates his entire life to the thing he grasped. Those are the toys of small children. There is no need to speak anew about the toys of grown-up children. They spend their entire lives after them. Sometimes they sacrifice their lives. But in the end, those are empty things. One can never escape from saṃsāra through such things.

Instead, what is to be done is to stop that running and try to stop the mind, by means of a meditation subject. What the Buddha said even to the thief Aṅgulimāla, that bandit, was: 'I have stopped, you too stop.' It is like that. This stopping is what is needed for the world—not running. Everyone invites us to run. Stopping this running is what is called meditative stillness. To aid this, by means of a meditation subject, noting the objects coming to the sense doors very subtly as they arise—with mindfulness and clear comprehension (sati-sampajañña)—a person becomes able to realize the three characteristics of impermanent (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and non-self (anattā) within himself. If everything changes, if everything is of the nature of arising and passing away, if we are oppressed by them, if they break up with extreme rapidity, this is a very dangerous thing—this is suffering (dukkha). If we are repairing and using a vehicle whose parts are falling apart, how much trouble is that? How much suffering? In the same way is this body of ours. Even if we take food and drink, in a few hours we must nourish it again. We take this breath with great attachment, thinking it is the sweet fragrance of flowers, but we are forced to expel it. It is the same with other things. Due to this breaking up nature—this changing nature, this transiency—the Buddha declared this as suffering (dukkha). Identifying the three characteristics must be the target of everyone's life: the characteristic of impermanence (anicca), next the characteristic of suffering (dukkha), and next the characteristic of non-self (anattā). If this is suffering, if it is a thing of suffering, if there is in truth no pleasure here, how can we proudly say 'I' and 'mine'? It is because it cannot be maintained according to our wishes that it breaks up. If we can say it is 'mine', it must remain as we want. But this is not such a thing. In a way we did not think of, at a moment we did not think of, the things we wish for, the things we are holding onto, the things we possess, change, break up, are destroyed, and depart. Such is the nature that exists in this saṃsāra.

The person who has directly realized this nature with wisdom is the one who obtains that sublime bliss of Nibbāna, which is called 'the settling of all formations' (sabba-saṅkhāra-samatha). The extinguishment, Nibbāna is extinction. In this entire world, in this entire saṃsāra, there is what is called a burning. In a very wondrous way, there is a burning inside and outside in the world. The Buddha has declared, 'O monks, everything is burning.' The eye, ear, nose, and so on—all of these are burning. It is within such a multitude of burnings that the worldlings exist. Through the Dhamma He declared, the Buddha, having freed Himself from these burnings, has shown the path to that cooling called 'Nibbāna'. That path of practice is what is called the Buddha's teaching. Its core is the engagement in that practice. Therefore, you meritorious people, having undertaken a valuable virtue today on this valuable Poya day—the virtue of the Eight Precepts—(there are also meritorious people here who have undertaken virtue more valuable than their lives)—having disciplined body and speech in whatever manner, you have now listened to several Dhamma points related to the Buddha's teaching. Through this—whether through the similes we presented or other narratives—even if you absorb only the practical portion necessary for your daily lives, that is enough, even if not everything. Next, what is important is to make this in daily life—not as something to be tested—but to integrate it into your lifestyle, to integrate it into your daily routine, to dedicate a small amount of time during the day to this meditative attention, even a few minutes, and then, if possible when there is leisure, or even by making leisure, to turn towards these. I hope that you will direct your lives towards that sublime task, action, and target of liberation from saṃsāra—the realization of Nibbāna—a very important task that was missed due to falling into negligence in this long saṃsāra.

Therefore, at this time, during this sermon, we believe that several valuable Dhamma qualities that help towards Nibbāna have been deposited in your minds. You listened to this with faith (saddhā). Faith is a very valuable quality. So much so that the Buddha declares faith as a spiritual faculty (indriya) that helps realize Nibbāna, and also as a power (bala). Mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā)—we believe that you meritorious people have gained the strength to develop these to some extent by listening and reflecting on this sermon. Therefore, considering the strength you received as the benefit of hearing the Dhamma today, if a great store of wholesome feelings/sensations (vedanā) arose by directing a pure mind, body, and speech to these, let us now share those merits with those who expect and desire merits.

If we have accumulated a sublime store of merit through preaching and listening to the Dhamma at this time, may the devas and brahmas who protect the Dispensation, and especially all those deities who guard this place, rejoice in this store of merit! According to their own aspirations, may they realize the supreme, deathless, great Nibbāna through whichever path of awakening they choose! May they provide protection to the Dispensation and to us! Such is the aspiration we must make. Likewise, including our own relatives, whichever host of beings from Avīci to Akaniṭṭha who desire merit and desire Nibbāna—may all of them rejoice in this sublime merit and, as quickly as possible, realize the supreme, deathless, great Nibbāna through their aspired path of awakening! Reciting these verses, share the merits.

Pali Stanza:

*Sīladassanasampannaṃ, dhammatṭhaṃ saccavedinaṃ;
Attano kamma kubbānaṃ, taṃ jano kurute piyaṃ.*

From:

Verse 217 from the Piyavagga (Chapter on Affection) of the Dhammapada

Dear Listeners,

Having a correct understanding of the true purpose and the true values of the Sambuddha Sāsana among both the laity and the clergy is a cause for the dispensation to endure for a long time. Therefore, the Buddha utilized various opportunities to highlight these objectives and values. He specially praised and showed special regard to disciples who practiced accordingly. Why? Because practice is the life of the dispensation. Where there is no practice, realization—which is the direct realization of the Paths and Fruits, the realization of Nibbāna, and putting an end to the Dukkha (Suffering) of saṃsāra—cannot be achieved. Therefore, the Buddha on many occasions extolled the value of establishing a mutual relationship between the laity and clergy in a way that fosters the growth of supramundane virtuous qualities.

The stanza we just recited, and its background story, is a good illustration of this.

One morning, when the Buddha was residing at the Veluvana Monastery, he entered the city of Rājagaha for alms, accompanied by five hundred monks, including the eighty chief disciples. That day was a festival day in Rājagaha. Perhaps it was a festival like the New Year festival we speak of today. Exactly at that time, a group of five hundred children was leaving the city carrying baskets of oil-cakes. When these children met the Buddha, they placed their baskets of oil-cakes to one side, paid homage to the Buddha and the Sangha, and then went on their way. After they had passed, the Buddha asked the monks:

"Monks, will you eat oil-cakes?"

"Where, Venerable Sir, are there oil-cakes?"

"Why, did you not see that group of children carrying baskets of oil-cakes passing by here?"

"Venerable Sir, to whom would children like that give oil-cakes?"

"Monks, do not say so. The reason why those children did not offer oil-cakes to me or to you is because the rightful owner of those oil-cakes is walking behind us." Saying so, the Buddha added, "Monks, we must eat these oil-cakes before we go." And the Buddha sat down under a nearby tree with his retinue.

Who was this monk who was the rightful owner of the oil-cakes? Walking separately behind this group of five hundred was the Great Arahant Mahā Kāśyapa, who constantly received praise from the Buddha, who had even received the Buddha's own robes as an offering—having exchanged robes with him—and who had received the foremost position among those who observe the dhutaṅgas (ascetic practices) from the Buddha. He was the supreme monk in terms of ascetic virtue. Because this Venerable Sir preferred seclusion, in his usual manner, he was walking slowly behind, separated from the main group.

When the children carrying the baskets of oil-cakes saw this Venerable Sir, they developed a wonderful faith, clarity, and devotion. They bowed placing five points of their body on the ground, and offered the baskets of oil-cakes in their entirety to him, saying, "Please accept this, Venerable Sir." The Great Arahant Mahā Kāśyapa said to those children, "Children, our Teacher and the Sangha are seated there under that tree; go and if you wish to offer something to all of them, do so."

Having said this, the Great Arahant Mahā Kāśyapa, together with the group of children, went to the tree where the Buddha was seated. Then, the children offered the oil-cakes to the entire retinue, with the Buddha at the head. They stood by, waiting until the monks finished eating, and then offered water.

After the offering of water was finished and the eating of the oil-cakes was over, a sort of whisper—a few critical words—was heard among the monks: "These children have behaved as if distributing alms by looking at faces. While the Buddha and the great elders like the chief disciples are present here, they offered all the oil-cakes to the Great Arahant Mahā Kāśyapa who was walking behind."

Hearing this, the Buddha declared, "Monks, do not say so. My son Mahā Kāśyapa is dear to devas and humans. Therefore, devas and humans—not only humans but even devas—attend on Mahā Kāśyapa with alms and the four requisites. They make offerings to him." Having declared thus, the Buddha uttered the stanza we took as our theme:

> Sīla dassana sampannam - dhammatṭham saccavedinam

> Attano kamma kubbānam - tam jano kurute piyam

Let us look at its meaning.

“Sīla dassana sampannam”: There is a fourfold virtue (sīla) belonging to the Sangha, known as the Sīla of Purification of the Four Requisites (catupārisuddhi-sīla). To mention them briefly, the first is the virtue of restraint according to the Pātimokkha (pātimokkha-saṃvara-sīla), which comprises the disciplinary rules laid down by the Buddha; training in this regard. That is one.

The second is the virtue of restraint of the sense faculties (indriya-saṃvara-sīla), which means restraining and guarding the senses such as the eye, ear, nose, etc., from defilements.

Thirdly, the purity of livelihood (ājīvapārisuddhi-sīla), which means obtaining the four requisites righteously and properly, without resorting to improper means.

Fourthly, the virtue connected with the use of requisites (paccayasannissita-sīla), which means using the acquired requisites after reflecting on them with wisdom—reflecting on the true purpose of consuming the requisites—and utilizing them as an aid to meditation.

In this way, there is a fourfold virtue (sīla) for the Sangha. The Great Arahant Mahā Kāśyapa, supreme in ascetic virtue, was complete in all these four kinds of pure virtue (sīla). So, that is sīla.

Next, “dassana” means Right View. By virtue of the realization of the Paths and Fruits—since we are here speaking of an Arahant—he is endowed with that Right View. Thus, “sīla dassana sampannam”.

“Dhammatṭham” means established in the Dhamma. He is properly established in the Dhamma. Through the direct realization of the supramundane Paths and Fruits, he stands firmly established in the Dhamma. “Dhammatṭham”.

Next, “saccavedinam” means he has correctly understood the Four Noble Truths.

Likewise, “attano kamma kubbānam” means, virtuous friends, "one who does his own work." Doing one's own work. Here, 'one's own work' refers to the work belonging to the Sangha as declared by the Buddha: the threefold training of Virtue (sīla), Concentration (samādhi), and Wisdom (paññā), which are aids to Nibbāna. It is the development of these. Thus, it means one who performs his own work, namely, virtue, concentration, and wisdom.

Therefore, the meaning of this stanza is: a monk who is endowed with virtue (sīla) and Right View, who is properly established in the Dhamma, who has understood the Four Noble Truths, and who does the work that belongs to him—*“taṃ jano kurute piyaṃ”

Thus, when we look at this stanza and the story, it seems like an oil-cake sermon fit for the New Year. But this is not merely an "oil-cake sermon." There is a very valuable fragrance of virtue and a taste of the Dhamma within it. Let us try to absorb it.

First, let us reflect on this. Here, the Great Arahant Mahā Kāśyapa is a special person. He is someone special in this dispensation. Although there were chief disciples, their spiritual qualities were of a different order. Similarly, the Great Arahant Mahā Kāśyapa becomes special because of those ascetic qualities—the dhutaṅgas—which assist virtue (sīla). There are thirteen such supreme practices that help one guard virtue (sīla) in the best possible way, and the Great Arahant Mahā Kāśyapa was a monk who practiced all thirteen of them properly. He depended on alms, lived in the forest, wore rag-robles, was content with only three robes, and practiced many other such rigorous disciplines.

Also, it was because he loved seclusion that he walked separately from the crowd in that manner. On several occasions, the Buddha delivered special discourses to the Sangha, holding him up as an exemplar. Highlighting the special characteristics of his lifestyle, the Buddha illustrated the conduct of the Great Arahant Mahā Kāśyapa and his relationship with the laity through two beautiful similes.

Now, according to the stanza, the Great Arahant Mahā Kāśyapa appears to be a very popular person. He was popular even among young children. We know that in this day and age, for a monk to be popular, he must be deeply involved with laypeople, associating closely with them and taking part in their affairs. However, the two similes given by the Buddha regarding the lifestyle of the Great Arahant Mahā Kāśyapa help us understand something quite different.

What are the similes given?

The Buddha gave a simile about the moon, called *“candūpamā” always new. The moon is renewed every day. Whether in the waning fortnight or the waxing fortnight, it is always something new.

In the same way, even though the Great Arahant Mahā Kāśyapa went from house to house for alms, he was always a new person to those laypeople. How does he become new? Because he does not have excessive relationships with the laypeople. We know there is a common saying in our villages about "the comb of the cock seen twice a day." Such a situation arises if one associates too closely. There was no such thing with the Great Arahant Mahā Kāśyapa; he was like the moon.

Now, when we speak of the moon, it is seen in our well, in the pond, and everywhere. But no one can catch the moon. No one can grasp the moon. In the same way, no one could "catch" the Great Arahant Mahā Kāśyapa, even though he visited lay households. Therefore, it is said, "kulesu apragabhā"—he had no over-familiarity with those families. There were no improper relationships. Pointing out those two qualities through the simile of the moon, the Buddha on one occasion advised the Sangha to live taking the Great Arahant Mahā Kāśyapa as their exemplar.

The Buddha also presented another simile: the "jarūdapāna" simile. That is, "an abandoned well."

The Great Arahant Mahā Kāśyapa was compared to someone looking down into an abandoned well. Just as when someone looks down into an abandoned well, they do so without any intention of falling into it, but with body and mind withdrawn, so does he walk for alms among the laity, keeping his body and mind detached. Thus the Buddha praised the Great Arahant Mahā Kāśyapa.

From these two similes, it is clear that the Great Arahant Mahā Kāśyapa does not fit the word "popular" in the way we think of it today. He could not be a popular person in that sense. However, virtuous friends, there are two levels of popularity. There is popularity due to wealth, title, power, and so on. That is a very superficial popularity; it vanishes very quickly. Popularity born of virtuous conduct is something much deeper.

Here we see that when we speak of young children, we know that children can sense certain things almost by instinct. Compared to the minds of adults, which are mixed and confused with various thoughts and criticisms, children possess a purer mind. They can sometimes sense this abundance of spiritual qualities by instinct. This must be why those five hundred children, while not lacking in respect—as they did pay homage to the Buddha and the rest—were particularly captivated by the ascetic virtue of the Great Arahant Mahā Kāśyapa who was walking alone. Being captivated, they offered the baskets of oil-cakes in that manner.

From this, it appears that those children must have had some innate meritorious potential. There is a saying, "The growing tree is known by its leaves." Likewise, within these children, there was a certain strength of virtue like a growing tree. It is for this very reason that upon hearing the Dhamma, they so quickly attained that noble state, the fruit of Stream-entry.

The Buddha has declared that even the state of Stream-entry—the first path and fruit—is superior to universal kingship. Why? Because there are only seven more lifetimes to be spent in saṃsāra, and one is forever freed from the four states of misery. They achieved such a state.

We can also understand how the minds of those children were prepared in that instance. First, they gladdened their minds based on the spiritual qualities of the Great Arahant Mahā Kāśyapa. They recognized those spiritual qualities through the short stanza uttered by the Buddha. What we analyzed first was the meaning of that stanza. Through it, they understood: "Our minds were pleased because the Great Arahant Mahā Kāśyapa possesses these spiritual qualities." If one rejoices in something with sympathetic joy, one simultaneously grows in that very virtue.

Furthermore, the pleased minds of those children became even purer. Next, we can understand that their generous giving helped to purify their already pure minds even further. Here, it was not only the oil-cakes that were surrendered. The mental impulse bound up with the oil-cakes was also surrendered. These children had set out with the intention of going to the park, eating these oil-cakes, and playing. Yet, all five hundred of them, with one mind, offered all those oil-cakes to the Sangha headed by the Buddha. Through that, their giving was complete. Their minds became exceedingly clear and bright. It was indeed with such a bright mind that they subsequently attained the state of Stream-entry through the realization of the Path and Fruit. Accordingly, we can see from this that there is a valuable taste of Dhamma and a fragrance of virtue within this.

Furthermore, if we reflect on this, the popularity of the Great Arahant Mahā Kāśyapa, according to the facts declared by the Buddha, was a popularity among devas and humans born of his spiritual qualities. Now, there is a common concept—especially in this day and age—that members of the Sangha are those who depend on the four requisites provided by lay devotees. Therefore, they must repay a certain debt for this. This is an exchange; it is a transaction. This is also true. There is indeed a certain transaction here. It is just that the manner of repaying this debt is somewhat different. It is not like an ordinary worldly repayment of debt. This debt is repaid by producing a supramundane benefit in place of worldly things.

That is why the stanza used the phrase "attano kamma kubbānaṃ"—"doing his own work." For someone who does their own work, there is a word used in society: "selfish." Thus, the Buddha describes the Great Arahant Mahā Kāśyapa as one who seeks his own benefit. However, as this self-interest is being fulfilled—what is this self-interest? Fulfilling the Dhamma of virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā) which are aids to Nibbāna—when these are completed, the welfare of others is already accomplished. Therefore, in that state, self-interest itself becomes the welfare of others.

Now, when we consider the four requisites offered by lay devotees to the Sangha, offering these is different from giving to the poor, travelers, and beggars. Giving to the poor, travelers, and beggars, virtuous friends, is done primarily out of compassion. Offering to the Sangha is done primarily out of faith. For this reason, the Buddha on many occasions, to remind the Sangha of the work that belongs to them, declared: "Monks, you consume the food given out of faith." It is by consuming food given out of faith that you live. For that, you must repay the debt. You must repay the debt. How is the debt repaid? Four ways of utilizing the four requisites are shown in the Dhamma. What are those four?

The first one is:

Theyya-paribhoga (consumption as a theft) — if we use a common word, it is like "stealing" and eating. Consuming as a theft.

The second one is:

Ṇa-paribhoga (consumption as a debt) — like borrowing and using.

The third one is:

Dāyajja-paribhoga (consumption as an inheritance) — using something as an inheritance.

The fourth one is:

Sāmi-paribhoga (consumption as an owner) — using the requisites as the rightful owner.

These are the four concepts shown in the Dhamma. Let us analyze each of these in some detail.

Theyya-paribhoga (consumption as a theft) means consuming the four requisites without any spiritual qualities, without virtue (sīla) and other virtues. Through this, the consumer—the monk—becomes a debtor to the laypeople. No matter how much he tries to repay the debt on a worldly level, according to the Dhamma, he remains a debtor. He will have to repay that debt in saṃsāra, perhaps for a long time. Such is that situation. That is theyya-paribhoga—like "stealing" and eating.

Next, the second matter is ṇa-paribhoga (consumption as a debt). Using it as a loan. The second state is somewhat better than taking and using as a thief—borrowing. One cannot live without doing so. The four requisites are essential for the Sangha to survive. Some support is necessary for life: robes, alms-food, lodging, and medicinal requisites—something to wear, food to eat, a place to reside, and medicine. These are the four requisites. However, these members of the Sangha took these requisites as a debt.

Now, we know that if someone takes a debt—let us say they took a loan for a business or for farming—and if they squander it without any intention of ever repaying it, they are not actually a borrower, but a thief. Instead, if someone uses it properly and correctly to achieve that purpose, employing it in business or farming, and pays interest as occasion demands, then that person is a true debtor. He is someone who fulfills the duty of a debtor. In the same way, how has the Buddha explained this īṇa-paribhoga—"consuming by taking as a debt"? If a monk uses each and every one of those four requisites—robes, alms-food, lodging, and medicinal requisites—by reflecting on them, considering them with wisdom, then it is just like consuming as a true debtor.

This reflection has two aspects. Now, let us say, to take an example, alms-food—food. Normally, lay devotees use food not only to appease hunger but also for the gratification of taste, to build up the body, and to make it beautiful. Since such purposes are not suitable for the Sangha, the Buddha has declared that one should contemplate the true purpose of the food—the alms-food—received. One aspect is considering the true meaning of food with wisdom: "I take this food only to maintain this body, to cross over this saṃsāra, and to lead this noble life of celibacy,"—this is considering the true meaning of the alms-food with wisdom.

Moreover, not only that, but the consumption of alms-food is also made into a form of meditation. How? "This food that I consume, called alms-food, is composed of the elements of earth, water, fire, and wind. My body is also composed of the very same elements. Although this alms-food was pure, when it enters this loathsome body, it becomes loathsome." What is achieved through this? Contemplation on the elements and contemplation on the foulness of the body. These two meditations are accomplished through it. That is it.

As we said earlier, when a loan is taken, the duties of a true debtor are to remember the purpose of taking the loan, to act accordingly, and to pay interest as occasion demands. Here too, the same is done. Regarding each of the four requisites—if it is food: "I took this as a debt. For what did I take it? To maintain this body in order to cross over the wilderness of saṃsāra." Thus, the purpose was considered. Next, what is the payment of interest? Turning to meditation. "This alms-food and this body of mine are made of the four elements: earth, water, fire, and wind." Right there, the truth of non-self is present within it—Anicca (Impermanent), Dukkha (Suffering), and Anattā (Not-self).

Furthermore, it is turned toward the aspect of foulness: "This pure food, entering my body, this filthy body, becomes soiled." Thereby, interest is paid. Why? Because this is a journey toward Nibbāna. Meditation is essential for the journey toward Nibbāna. Thus, meditation is performed through the consumption of the four requisites. That is the payment of interest.

Why did we describe this in such detail? Because some people do this in a different way. Some argue that simply by reflecting on the four requisites while consuming them, a monk is freed from debt. That cannot be said to be correct. There is a shortcoming in that view. A monk is not freed from debt merely by reflecting on the four requisites while consuming them. There is still work to be done further ahead. When the other points are explained, this will become clear.

That was the second matter we spoke of—iṇa-paribhoga. Next, what is the third matter? Dāyajja-paribhoga (consumption as an inheritance). Using it by considering it as an inheritance. This is explained as follows: Let us say a monk has attained the state of Stream-entry. From the moment of that attainment, that monk is a true son of the Buddha. Those who are in the three stages of Stream-enterer, Once-returner, and Non-returner are sons of the Buddha. But they have not yet finished their work. Such people are called "disciples in training." Those who are training in the proper manner in this dispensation. They have not finished their work. Such individuals consume these four requisites as an inheritance, just as children use their parents' possessions.

When parents are not at home, young children use their parents' things without fear, even though those things do not belong to them, simply because they belong to their parents. In the same way, the consumption of the four requisites by those members of the Sangha who have directly realized the initial Paths and Fruits—Stream-entry, Once-returning, and Non-returning—is compared to children consuming their parents' property. That is dāyajja-paribhoga. That is the third matter.

Finally, there is sāmi-paribhoga (consumption as an owner). Using the requisites as the rightful owners in every sense and meaning. This occurs after attaining Arahantship. At the moment of attaining Arahantship, the person who has attained Arahantship is described as one who is free from debt.

That is why—since we were speaking about the Great Arahant Mahā Kāśyapa—the Great Arahant Mahā Kāśyapa attained Arahantship seven days after his ordination. He expressed this on one occasion: "For six days, I consumed alms-food as a debt; on the seventh day, I consumed it without debt." What did he mean by this? "Until six days had passed, I had not attained Arahantship. On the seventh day, I attained Arahantship." From this, it is clear that an Arahant consumes alms-food without debt. There is no debt to be repaid afresh. If they do any further work—if they show any special favor to the world—they do so out of compassion for the world. Out of compassion for the world.

That is why the Buddha waited until the first sixty attained Arahantship before sending them in various directions for the welfare of the many, for the happiness of the many, and not before. After they attained Arahantship, the Buddha did not say, "Go and repay your debts," but rather, "wander without debt in the world." It was not with the intention of "going and preaching Dhamma to repay debts" that he sent those sixty. We emphasize this particularly because some people interpret this incorrectly. When sending those sixty with the words, "for the welfare of the many, for the happiness of the many," the Buddha did not mean for them to go and repay their debts. It is something done out of compassion for the world by those Arahants during the remainder of their lives.

Yet it is said there: "wander in the world free from debt." From then on, they wander without debt. Such a state of debtlessness is indeed true freedom from the bond of debt. From then on, sāmi-paribhoga exists. They consume the four requisites as the rightful owners. This is what shows how the debt is repaid.

Next, we know that because of the development of those spiritual qualities through the repayment of debt, Arahantship is described as a state of debtlessness. As a state of debtlessness. The Buddhas, the Arahants, and the Pacceka Buddhas consume the four requisites without debt. It is because of the supramundane value inherent in this transaction that you, virtuous friends, must often hear at alms-givings and other meritorious deeds that three factors must be fulfilled for an alms-giving offered by lay devotees to be of great fruit and great benefit. What are those three factors?

1. Dāyaka-sampatti (the excellence of the donor)
2. Deyyadhamma-sampatti (the excellence of the gift)
3. Paṭigrāhaka-sampatti (the excellence of the recipient)

Dāyaka-sampatti does not mean the wealth of the donor. It means the spiritual qualities that a true donor should possess. Being complete in a group of virtues: faith, the volition of giving, virtue (sīla), and so on. If one is complete in these, he is a true donor. That is dāyaka-sampatti.

Deyyadhamma-sampatti means the righteousness of the gift. Something earned righteously. Not something obtained through theft or violence. Likewise, preparing it well and offering it with care, not as something discarded. Offering in such a manner is deyyadhamma-sampatti.

Paṭigrāhaka-sampatti refers to the receiving side. When considering paṭigrāhaka-sampatti, in the highest sense, those worthy of receiving gifts are the Buddhas, Pacceka Buddhas, and Great Arahants. Or else, those who follow according to their spiritual qualities. That is paṭigrāhaka-sampatti. It is according to this that the gift becomes of great fruit and great benefit. This very matter is expressed in a stanza, often illustrated through the simile of farming:

> Khattūpamā arahanto / dāyakā kassakūpamā / bījūpamaṃ deyyadhammaṃ / etto nibbattate phalaṃ

The Arahants are like fertile fields. "Dāyakā kassakūpamā"—donors endowed with all the virtues of a donor are like skilled farmers. "Bījūpamaṃ deyyadhammaṃ"—the gift offered is like good seed-paddy. "Etto nibbattate phalaṃ"—from this the true fruit is produced, becoming of great fruit and great benefit. It is in this way that a great mass of merit flows in. Thus it is explained.

Accordingly, we understand that the Buddha has shown us this proper, correct, and righteous relationship between the laity and the clergy through this story and the stanza, for the sake of future generations and the future progress of the dispensation.

In addition to this, let us reflect a little more. When we started telling this story, some might have wondered if this was a true event. There is a very deep matter here. Reading about the Buddha's life, one feels astonishment and wonder at the great wisdom and great compassion of the Buddha. The Buddha looks on with a correct understanding of the three periods of time—past, future, and present—just like watching a play unfold. He sees the minds of people in the world, what they do, and what they say. He sees all their past potential.

That is why the Buddha spoke in that manner: "Monks, would you like to eat oil-cakes?" and then, "Let us eat oil-cakes before we go." What was the Buddha doing here? Throughout the four incalculable aeons and a hundred thousand cosmic cycles during which he fulfilled the perfections, there is no oil-cake he has not eaten. It was not a strange thing to him. Nor did he have any special desire to make the Sangha eat oil-cakes. Rather, there is a very deep matter here. The Buddha created this opportunity for those five hundred children because he saw their supportive potential, saw the moment when their faith would arise, and saw that by acting on that faith, they would be able to realize the Paths and Fruits. It was to create this opportunity that the Buddha declared, "We shall go only after eating the oil-cakes." Here, we must contemplate the skillful means within that great compassion. It is truly wonderful.

At the same time, a noble quality of the Buddha, which we and the world can take as an exemplar, is his praising of the noble qualities of even his own disciples. In the case of anyone else, if they were offered an oil-cake that was not offered to me, their face would turn sour, perhaps looking like an oil-cake itself. Such things happen often in society, thinking: "An oil-cake that was not given to someone of my spiritual stature was given to my disciple." Instead, what did the Buddha do? "Monks, even though those children did not give oil-cakes to you or to me, the rightful owner of the oil-cake is coming behind us. Let us wait until then."

Thereby, the Buddha gives a great example to the world. He also used that opportunity to express the noble spiritual qualities of the Great Arahant Mahā Kāśyapa through that stanza. Within this, there is also a message for the dispensation—a sāsana message—showing how the relationship between the laity and the clergy should be maintained.

Thus, we can harvest many such points from this story and the stanza. Within this "New Year oil-cake sermon"—as we mentioned earlier—there is a fragrance of virtue and a taste of the Dhamma. The more you think about it, the more you can absorb its taste. This is a good opportunity for that.

Also, you are now preparing for the New Year festival. Let us reflect on the Dhamma principles within it. What is this New Year festival? The wheel of time keeps turning and turning. It does not stop anywhere. It cannot be stopped. The wheel of time is just like a cogwheel. Along with it, our wheel of life also wears away, without our even knowing it—our age slips away. This cannot be stopped. We are only pushed forward; there is no time to stop and think. That is why certain customs have arisen. Many do not understand the deep meaning behind some of these New Year customs. They consider it only as a time for amusement.

Now, regarding this New Year, you know there is a period called "non-auspicious time." The non-auspicious time is a period that is not an auspicious hour. There is a belief among people in the world that everything—all worldly affairs—must be done at an auspicious hour. Therefore, when there is no auspicious hour to perform worldly affairs, that is the non-auspicious time. Some think, "We cannot just spend the non-auspicious time doing nothing, so let us perform meritorious deeds." That is a wrong view. This non-auspicious time has been designated as the "period for merit."

If we consider it deeply, it is indeed a "period for merit." How does it become a period for merit? We should make that non-auspicious time a pause in our lives. We should consider it as a small rest, a pause, in the midst of our activities. There is the old year, and there is the new year. In between the two, there is the non-auspicious time. We should make this a period for merit. Not by eating, drinking, and making merry. We should stop and reflect calmly: "In the past year, what were the wrongs committed by me—through body, mind, and speech? What were my shortcomings toward neighbors, relatives, friends, and the Triple Gem? What were my shortcomings in terms of virtuous qualities? What were my shortcomings regarding virtue (sīla)?" One reflects on these.

Now, you know that in households, for the New Year festival, they clean the houses well, remove rust, and tidy up; moreover, they even build a new hearth to begin the New Year. This becoming new—this should be made a renewal of the mind. An opportunity to renew the mind—washing away the refuse and rust in the mind, looking toward the future in accordance with the Dhamma, and making this period a good period for merit to direct one's thoughts and actions toward Nibbāna so as not to fall into the states of misery in this perilous saṃsāra. That pause.

For such an occasion, we have presented some good, subtle aspirations in this Dhamma sermon. Accordingly, one can reflect: "Having understood this abundance of spiritual qualities, having correctly understood the values and purposes of the dispensation, how should we maintain the relationship between laity and clergy? What are the values of this dispensation? What is considered a 'transaction' in this dispensation? What has the Buddha shown us?" The non-auspicious time, the period for merit, is a good opportunity to reflect that we too must shape our lives accordingly.

Now, our life—the wheel of time may turn endlessly. It has no beginning and no end. Our wheel of life, caught in that cogwheel and wearing away, is not such a great thing. It is something that could cease at this very moment. Generally, no one can even state the lifespan of a human being today. Although we say it is a hundred years, it is much less than that now. In addition, due to various other disasters and dangers, both external and internal, we cannot say when our life will pass away or cease. Even while speaking like this, if the heart stops, that life is ended. There is such a perilous situation. Such is the brevity of life.

Next, one must reflect on the length of saṃsāra. For how long a time have we been born and reborn, dying and dying, suffering in this saṃsāra? Our true situation lies between these two. Having reflected on this, what has the Buddha declared to escape from this? Virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā), or the collection of virtues shown by the Buddha as giving, virtue (sīla), and meditation. There are many factors within them. Reflecting on each of them, we should make proper use of this non-auspicious time, the period for merit.

You know, in shops and businesses at the end of the year, they have "sales" to clear out old stock, selling them even at low prices to clear them out and bring in new things. In the same way, what we must do is clear out the pile of rubbish in our minds—even if we have to give them away to anyone who would take them—and renew our minds. That is what the New Year means. The New Year is not a renewal through clothes, cleaning houses, or paint. If it is a true New Year, it must be a New Year in which we grow in spiritual qualities. That is what a festival means—internally.

Now, thinking in that way, we must also consider the example of those young children in this story. Especially in this day and age, those young children give a good example to lay devotees. Why? Because on that day, those children went to the park carrying baskets of oil-cakes, not with the intention of offering them to the Sangha, but to eat, drink, and make merry. Yet, they surrendered that. They surrendered that idea. Those oil-cakes, which are a very delicious food, they surrendered them all to the Sangha headed by the Buddha. Instead of the taste of those oil-cakes, those children received a supreme, supramundane taste right at that moment by attaining the fruit of Stream-entry.

In that way, we must reflect that the Buddha has introduced to us a set of noble values that are far superior to the values of this world. Living in accordance with those values and shaping our lives accordingly is what the Buddha Sāsana means. So, if we reflect according to the example given by these children, if we use the New Year merrymaking—though some level of amusement may be necessary—in a way that degenerates our future and ruins our lives, we will have to repay that debt. We will have to suffer for a long time in saṃsāra.

Therefore, if a festival is to truly gladden our minds, it must bring peace of mind. Everyone would agree that the highest happiness in the world is indeed peace. It is the path to that peace that the Buddha has introduced under the name of the peace of Nibbāna. That is it—that is the further shore.

To bring that peace close to our daily lives, some adjustment in our lifestyle, our schedule, and our daily routine may be necessary. If every virtuous person reflects in this manner, the next non-auspicious time will become a true auspicious time.

Indeed, we must reflect—some might think that if they do anything during the non-auspicious time, they will meet with misfortune. But, virtuous friends, "If one lives having obtained human birth without performing meritorious deeds, that is misfortune." It becomes fruitless. That is what misfortune means.

The true auspicious hour is indeed this period of a Buddha's appearance. Since we have received such a true auspicious hour, we must make use of this opportunity. Because we cannot do this every single day, wise people of old must have created a "non-auspicious time" at the turning of the year, designating it as the period for merit, and creating a brief pause to benefit from it.

But instead, what have the unwise done? They have added various other unnecessary things to that non-auspicious time, directing it only toward paths of amusement that cause their degeneration. Therefore, we must reflect in accordance with the Dhamma, making this period for merit a true period for merit, purifying our minds in the New Year, and resolving to spend the next year better in accordance with the Dhamma, reflecting on each and every one of our shortcomings in virtue (sīla) and correcting them.

In particular, the question of livelihood is a major problem for lay devotees in this day and age. The world is moving in a perilous manner in pursuit of material progress. This is an era that thinks only of the economy, disregarding righteousness. They do not realize this until they fall into the ultimate abyss. Therefore, for the sake of acquiring and earning wealth quickly, various livelihoods—wrong livelihoods—are coming to the forefront in this era. Wise Buddhist devotees must reflect on their livelihood, placing the Dhamma declared by the Buddha at the forefront.

Sometimes, there may be shortcomings and scarcities in daily life. One might not be able to become rich quickly. However, just as we have undertaken the precepts on this occasion, one must make a special effort to develop that noble virtue of abstaining from wrong livelihood.

Sometimes, one might think that what the Buddha points out are things that cannot be done in this day and age. Raising animals for meat, abstaining from the trade of flesh, the trade of weapons, the trade of poisons, the trade of intoxicants—to the extent that we might feel we have no job left if we abstain from such things. In this way, society is heading toward a perilous abyss.

But one must reflect: "Shall I continue to suffer in this long saṃsāra, or shall I make some sacrifice to escape from this, now that I have obtained such a rare opportunity of a human life?" Reflecting on this with wisdom, no matter what society says, and even regardless of how others in one's own home think, wish, or live—we are born alone and we die alone. Therefore, we must be responsible for our own kamma. The Buddha has declared:

> Kammassakā māṇava sattā

> Kammadāyādā kammayoni

> Kammabandhū kammaṭṭisaraṇā

> Kammaṃ satte vibhajati

> Yadidaṃ hīnappañātātāya

This kamma is our own. This kamma is our inheritance. It is because of kamma that we are born; kamma is the cause of our birth. Furthermore, kamma is our kinsman. Kamma is our refuge. Therefore, we must be responsible for the kamma we perform. For that reason, shaping our lifestyle is our duty.

Those shortcuts are often dangerous. Shortcuts, hastiness, are often dangerous. If one takes the unrighteous path to acquire and earn wealth quickly, or to quickly solve the problems of the household, that person will have to suffer for it someday.

Therefore, particularly at that time of taking account—taking the non-auspicious time as an occasion to take account—one must reflect on one's income during the past year. When we say income, if we look at it in a worldly sense, we can see a budget in figures. If we look at it in a deeper sense, what is this budget? The income side is merit. The expenditure side is demerit. What are the sins committed by us? What are the unwholesome deeds? What are the wholesome deeds, the merits, we should have done, could have done, and strove to do? Reflecting in that way is what is meant.

Now, in this manner, each person must perform a "transaction" regarding themselves. Now, a part of this New Year festival is to settle accounts with neighbors, remove ill-feelings, perform transactions, and thus begin a New Year. There is also a transaction that must be performed internally. We must not remain in debt to this life we have obtained, this rare human existence. How many die remaining in debt to the human existence they obtained? They were born as human beings, yet they live their lives and die just like human-ghosts or human-demons. One must make an effort to shape one's lifestyle so as not to fall into such a state; this is a good opportunity for that. Therefore, you must bring yourselves closer to the lifestyle suitable for this life.

In daily life, many people these days say—when speaking of a good life, it has become a sort of fashion to say—"We do not commit sins, we do not do wrong." It is something said very easily. But the work is not completed merely by saying "we do not do wrong." There is a positive side to this. One must perform wholesome deeds. Preparing the mind—ordinary practices, the practice of virtue (sīla). It is not merely a matter of observing these precepts. One must constantly reflect on them daily to see if one's lifestyle is maintained in accordance with virtue (sīla).

Furthermore, one must not stop there. The true purpose of virtue (sīla) in this dispensation is concentration (samādhi), meditation. If one does not build concentration (samādhi) upon virtue (sīla), it is of no avail. Then, virtue (sīla) is essential. Whether it is the five precepts, the eight precepts of pure livelihood, the ten precepts, or the eight precepts observed on Uposatha days—any precept is undertaken to restrain body and speech, and through that, to calm the mind and bring it to concentration (samādhi). Therefore, one must also be diligent in this concentration (samādhi). This calm.

This concentration (samādhi) also has two aspects, as tranquility (samatha) and insight (vipassanā). The mind is calmed on some wholesome object: loving-kindness, recollection of the Buddha, foulness, or recollection of death—practicing such a meditation subject in daily life during moments of leisure. Especially in the morning, before going to sleep at night, or when others are asleep, one should somehow find leisure and spend a short time—even five or ten minutes—developing a meditation subject like loving-kindness. By this, one's mind is purified as well as brought to concentration (samādhi). Through that, the mind is calmed.

Furthermore, one must not stop there. Those who developed only concentration (samādhi) and obtained high attainments and supernormal knowledges existed not only during the time of a Buddha's appearance but also during times when no Buddha appeared. Yet, they could not put an end to the Dukkha (Suffering) of saṃsāra merely by that.

Therefore, the Buddha points out that, established upon concentration (samādhi), one must next develop insight (vipassanā). It is for this that virtue (sīla) and concentration (samādhi) are developed. It is that wisdom-aspect of insight that is referred to as virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). An effort must be made to develop that as well.

One should not think: "How can we do these things while living in lay households?" In the past, during the Buddha's time and even in more recent times—as we just said, young children directly realized the fruit of Stream-entry. Within this, there is not only concentration (samādhi) but also insight knowledges. This is a very subtle thing. We must have developed meditation in various instances during our long journey in saṃsāra. Those are stored in our minds. They are stored in our Viññāṇa (Consciousness). It is like a treasure of wealth. But we do not know this.

Even if there is a gold plate in our kitchens, we cannot recognize it. It is only when we scratch it even with a pin that we can recognize it. In the same way, within our mental continuum—after all, we have obtained a human life through some special meritorious power. Within it, there may lie those strengths of having practiced Dhamma and meditation in the past. They lie hidden. Whether they are laypeople or ordained—to bring those to the surface, one must begin insight meditation. Meeting suitable meditation teachers and with the help of noble friends, one must direct the mind to insight meditation in terms of Anicca (Impermanent), Dukkha (Suffering), and Anattā (Not-self).

One must make everything encountered in daily life within this lifestyle a witness to this Dhamma, a lesson. Through them, one must practice seeing the Three Characteristics declared by the Buddha. When the mind is habituated to this, at some moment, just like that, one can very instantly realize the Paths and Fruits.

There is a story from the past where a princess, seeing worms in the toilet she visited, developed the perception of foulness. She reflected on how worms appear in this body after death. That small thought assisted her even to attain Arahantship. In the same way, without letting our minds be disturbed or soiled by lust, hatred, and delusion by the things we see on the road, the news we read in newspapers, and the reports we hear, we must instead see within them the Three Characteristics of Anicca (Impermanent), Dukkha (Suffering), and Anattā (Not-self) declared by the Buddha. That unique view is indeed insight.

These days, some might say that whatever may have been the case in the past, or whatever the lifestyle of our ancient Sinhalese was, these things cannot be done today. In the past—as mentioned in our historical texts—our ancient mothers, even while pounding paddy, would not let the husk of a grain of paddy peel off in vain; they would elevate even that to meditation, reflecting on its impermanence.

In the same way, no matter what kind of luxury goods have been produced in the world today, you must see impermanence within them too. Is not what is in the living room today in the kitchen the next day? Is it not in the rubbish heap in the end? How everything—everything that is taken as modern, new, and beautiful—goes toward destruction, toward the mouth of destruction.

Next, how everyone—those who reign supreme with high offices and various fashions—meets their fate, destroyed in a single hour, in a single moment. Within these, one must see the Three Characteristics declared by the Buddha.

None of these are strange things. None of these are unusual. We commonly use the expression: "This is an accident"—that there is a category of things called accidents. But indeed, in nature, there are no accidents. Let us say a wheel of a traveling vehicle suddenly detached, or some such accident occurred. This did not happen only at that very moment. It was loosening slowly and slowly before it detached. Because we did not see it, we call it a sudden accident. In the same way, that is one side of our sudden accidents. The events that happen to us, the disasters we face—underneath them lies kamma. That wheel of kamma. None of them are sudden accidents.

The Buddhas and those with supernormal powers, seeing this, display a gentle smile. Why? "I saw this happening—it cannot be prevented, however." That is why they display a gentle smile. Just like a mother watching a young child trying to stand up. He must stand up somehow. Every time he falls, she smiles gently, does she not?

In the same way, when the Buddhas see human beings in this world distressed by being destroyed by these things called accidents, they think: "Alas, these people did not see this. The cause of this is some unwholesome deed committed aeons ago. It is its result they are experiencing now." Thus, such is the state of things in this world.

Indeed, in nature, there are no sudden accidents. They are natural events. To the word "natural", we must add—usually we call "natural" only those things that concern the inanimate, things without life—but the result of kamma is also included in this. Kamma is also a result. Just as we spoke of farming when talking about merit and demerit. Likewise, the Buddha has declared:

> Yādisaṃ vapate bījaṃ tādisaṃ harate phalaṃ

> Kalyāṇakārī kalyāṇaṃ pāpakārī ca pāpaṃ

Whatever kind of seed one sows, that is the kind of harvest one reaps. The doer of good, the doer of wholesome deeds, reaps good results. The doer of evil reaps painful results.

Because of such a state of affairs, we must take the coming non-auspicious time as a true period for merit, conducting a special review, a reconsideration, a reflection on our lives, and based on the things we learn from it, we must resolve to begin the next New Year with a good lifestyle and a good schedule—on a valuable Uposatha day like today.

This New Year and the Uposatha day coming together should be considered as an opportunity to shape our righteous lives. You must reflect on the purity that has arisen in your minds through listening to the Dhamma for an hour today. Endowed with the eight precepts of pure livelihood or the higher Uposatha eight precepts, you have listened to the Dhamma, restraining body and speech, and generating good faith in the Triple Gem. It is based on a certain energy generated in accordance with that faith that you sat on the floor at this moment and listened to the Dhamma, directing your minds amidst various other obstacles and troubles.

The mindfulness applied in accordance with that effort, the mindfulness applied to listen to every word of this Dhamma sermon, and next, if any calm arose in the mind through this, directing the mind in terms of the recollection of the Dhamma—which can be considered as concentration—in this way, a basic exercise in developing the spiritual faculties and powers of Faith, Energy, Mindfulness, Concentration, and Wisdom, which are aids to Nibbāna, was accomplished through this listening to the Dhamma. It is through this that you will be able to directly realize the Dhamma of Nibbāna on some day.

You must aspire: "May I have the strength and power to directly realize that noble Dhamma of Nibbāna without delay, in this very life, within this human existence obtained during this noble period of a Buddha's appearance!"

Likewise, if there is any mass of merit we have accumulated through this listening to the Dhamma and preaching of the Dhamma, may the devas and Brahmas who protect the dispensation—the divine and Brahma assembly—rejoice in it! Continuing to provide protection to the dispensation and to us, may they realize the noble, supreme, deathless Nibbāna through their aspired Bodhi! Thus, we must share the merit with the devas.

Likewise, if there are any groups of beings, from the Avīci hell up to the Akaniṭṭha heaven, including our deceased relatives, who are expecting to rejoice in this merit of preaching and listening to the Dhamma, by rejoicing in this merit, may they be freed from states of suffering and reach states of happiness, obtain the association of noble friends, complete all wholesome qualities such as meditation, and be appeased by the noble, supreme, deathless Nibbāna! Thinking in this manner, transfer merit at this moment by reciting these stanzas:

“Ettāvatā ca amhehi.....”

Verse 239 from the Malavagga (Chapter on Impurity) of the Dhammapada

Dear Listeners,

Today is the Vesak Full Moon Poya Day. Because three events—the birth, the enlightenment, and the passing away (*pariNibbāna of the Greatly Compassionate Fully Self-Awakened Father—occurred on a Vesak Full Moon Day like today, Vesak Full Moon Day is an extremely noble day for the Buddhist world. In fact, the Buddhist New Year is Vesak day—the Vesak day on which the Buddhist Era begins. Various people in the world have various concepts regarding a New Year. In the Western world, they have formed a notion of a year starting at the beginning of January. Astronomically, they have similarly formed a notion of a New Year. In the same way, we in the Buddhist world, commemorating the Buddha, consider this Vesak Full Moon Day as the New Year.

Therefore, for the Buddhist devotee who wakes up in the morning having understood this matter well and calling to mind the virtues of the Buddha, today is a beautiful day. Today is a peaceful day. Today is a pure day. Devotees offer various kinds of colorful decorations, offerings, and tributes as a mark of respect and homage to the Greatly Compassionate One, who attained Buddhahood after fulfilling the difficult perfections (pāramīs) for an extremely long period that cannot be measured even by billions of aeons (kalpas), sacrificing his eyes, head, flesh, and blood, because the Buddha has pointed out to them the path to Nibbāna which extinguishes the suffering and fires of saṃsāra.

When decorating to pay this respect and homage, we must actually reflect that there are two kinds of decorations we can perform in honor of the Buddha: external decoration and internal decoration. External decoration refers to those decorations visible from the outside on Vesak day, such as flags, Vesak lanterns, pandols, and so on. Internal decoration means decorating one's own mind-stream by spending this day observing precepts (sīla), listening to the Dhamma, and practicing meditation (bhāvanā), thereby cultivating those virtues pointed out by the Buddha within one's own mind. Thus, that is internal decoration. Furthermore, when considering offerings (pūjā), the Buddha Himself pointed out that we can pay respect and homage to the Buddha through two kinds of offerings: material offerings (āmisapūjā) and practical offerings (paṭipatti-pūjā). Material offerings mean offering oil, flowers, lamps, incense, food and drinks, medicinal beverages, etc., to the Buddha. Practical offering means practicing those virtues of virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā) which constitute the path leading to Nibbāna pointed out by the Buddha. Between these two kinds of offerings, the Buddha praised practical offering (paṭipatti-pūjā) as the more noble offering. Thus, the faithful Buddhist devotee gradually directs the program that begins with external decoration towards internal decoration.

Likewise, the beginning made with material offerings is gradually oriented towards practical offerings. Indeed, the Buddha always admonished us and advised us to systematically bring about development within ourselves in this manner, both regarding those decorations and regarding offerings. A story that makes this matter very clear to us, a short, simple story, is given in the Dhamma commentaries as the background story of the verse we mentioned earlier. One day, a certain brahmin, a faithful brahmin—who must have had some degree of faith in the Saṅgha—came to the place where the monks gathered in the morning to drape their robes before entering the village for alms-round, and stood there watching out of idle curiosity. Because the grass had grown very high at that place and there was morning dew, the brahmin saw that when the monks draped their robes, the corners of their robes got wet with dew. Seeing this, this lay devotee thought, "I must clean this place a bit." After the monks had left, he brought a hoe, cleared the grass there, and prepared a circular area like a small threshing floor.

On the second day too, this person came and stood watching when the monks were entering the village for alms-round, probably to see if there was any shortcoming in the work he had done. While watching like that, he noticed that because the grass had been removed there, there was now dust. Seeing dust rising and staining the corners of the monks' robes as they draped them, after the monks had left, this lay devotee brought white sand and spread it, eliminating the dust. On the following day, he came to the same place and stood watching in the same manner. On that day, the sun was shining intensely early in the morning. Seeing the monks sweating due to the heat of the sun, he thought, "I must make a small shelter here." After the monks left, he prepared a small shed, a shelter, there. Coming again another day, he stood watching; on that day, it was raining heavily. Seeing the monks suffering due to the rainstorm, he thought, "I must build a small hall here." Thus, having built a small hall there for the monks to gather during their alms-round, he then thought, "Now I must offer this hall to the Saṅgha led by the Buddha." He invited the Buddha and the Saṅgha—it was not a grand place—and having conducted the Saṅgha around that hall, he offered an alms-meal. Before the appreciation of merits (anumodanā), that devotee declared to the Buddha: "Venerable Sir, Blessed One, it was in this way that I began this great meritorious deed, very humbly. First, as mentioned, I cleared the grass and cleaned a small space like a threshing floor. Next, I sprinkled some sand there. Next, I made a small shed there. Next, I built a small hall in this way, and now I have performed an alms-giving meritorious deed as well."

On that occasion, praising him, the Buddha declared to the brahmin: "Indeed, brahmin, a wise person, from moment to moment, little by little, by performing wholesome deeds, removes all the rust of defilements from his own mind-stream." Declaring this, He uttered the verse we mentioned earlier. Indeed, that verse is a very simple one. Furthermore, it is a verse so valuable that anyone can adopt it as a motto for their life, memorizing it and using it as an exemplary guide. It is a verse found in the Malavagga of the Dhammapada.

Anupubbena medhāvī

thoka-thokam khaṇe khaṇe

kammāro rajatasseva

niddhame malam attano

The general meaning of this: "Medhāvī" means the wise person, the intelligent person. "Anupubbena" means gradually, step-by-step. "Thoka-thokam" means little by little. "Khaṇe khaṇe" means from moment to moment. "Kammāro rajatasseva": "Kammāro" means the smith. Here it refers to a gold or silversmith. "Rajatasseva" means in silver, as one does with silver. "Attano malam niddhame" means just as the smith removes the rust of silver, the "medhāvī", that wise person, the intelligent person mentioned before, removes the rust of defilements in his own mind-stream. This is the meaning of that verse. Whenever the Buddha uttered a verse, even if it was a four-line verse, every single word carries an extremely profound meaning. It fits together so perfectly, and the verse is structured with such amazing organization that not even a single word can be removed. Moreover, within every such verse, there is a spiritual power sufficient for someone to realize Nibbāna.

Such a valuable taste of liberation (vimutti-rasa) is present in every single one of those verses. Now, if we reflect a bit deeply on the words we mentioned in this verse: "Medhāvī" is used for people whose situational wisdom is naturally strong from birth, and whose wisdom has matured through saṃsāric experience—even if they do not possess much academic learning. Such is the "medhāvī" person. The word "anupubbena" is an extremely valuable word—"orderly" or "step-by-step". It displays systematic progression. A special characteristic of this Dhamma is systematic progression. There is an amazing systematic progression in this Dhamma. If the Buddha pointed out any category of Dhamma, they fit together perfectly like the links of a chain. Furthermore, on one occasion, the Buddha declared to the lord of asuras named Pahārāda: "Just as, Pahārāda, the great ocean has a gradual slope, a gradual slant, a gradual inclination, with no abrupt precipice; in the same way, Pahārāda, in this Dhamma-Vinaya, there is gradual training, gradual performance, gradual practice, and no abrupt penetration of final knowledge." Thus, the Buddha declared, comparing the Dhamma of this entire Dispensation, this path of practicing the Dhamma, to the great ocean.

The great ocean—as you devotees know—the seashore is a very beautiful place where even a small child can pick up seashells. Next, as one goes a little deeper, one can splash in the waves. It gradually becomes deeper. Going further inside, it is extremely deep. In the same way, in the path of practice found in this Dispensation, anyone can approach and make a start at their own level. There is a nature of the Dhamma itself drawing one in systematically, step-by-step, from one stage to another. So, when speaking of profound things, this entire Dispensation, or the path of Dhamma, the path of practice, is compared to the great ocean, in consideration of its depth. In some other instances, where this Dhamma is shown as something that goes upward little by little, towards higher things, the simile used is a flight of stairs or a ladder. Just like climbing a flight of stairs, this Dhamma leads one upward step-by-step. Thus, the simile of the great ocean shows the depth—going deeper little by little. Similarly, if it is something like a flight of stairs climbing to a mansion, one climbs it step-by-step to reach the top. It is this amazing feature of the Dhamma that is shown by this word "anupubba"—gradual/orderly sequence. Step-by-step. It carries one along from one to another, implying systematic progression, connected to each other.

Next, "thoka-thokam khaṇe khaṇe". These few words also possess great depth. At first glance, they seem very easy and simple to understand. But the meaning underlying them is extremely valuable. "Thoka-thokam" means little by little. "Khaṇe khaṇe" means from moment to moment. If we examine the meaning of these words: little by little, or systematic progression. If one said "just a little", there is no systematic progression. When saying "little by little", a systematic progression is felt. If one said "just a moment", there is no systematic progression. When saying "from moment to moment", there is systematic progression. In this way, what is shown here, what is offered to the world here, is a certain "perception of possibility" (hakī saññāva / sense of "I can"). This feeling is absent in many people. Now, if we speak to someone about listening to Dhamma, meditating, or other Dhamma activities, especially regarding the Dhamma, in this day and age, what we often hear is, "Where is the time for such things? We have so much work. Where can we find time to do these? We don't even have time to breathe."

They utter various complaints of this sort. The best medicine for such people is what the Buddha has shown here: "thoka-thokam khaṇe khaṇe"—little by little, from moment to moment. This practice, or rather, this formula, this fundamental principle, is applied in the world in various ways to worldly things as well. As you devotees know, there is the "savings movement". No one has money to throw away, no surplus money, but everyone, thinking of their children, thinking of their future emergencies, saves little by little, whenever opportunity arises. A big work from a small beginning. The Dhamma path is also like this. Instead of wasting time by saying "there is no time, we have so much work", the Buddha gives the idea here that one can make a small start regarding these wholesome Dhammas (kusala-dhamma) and systematically carry out development.

He provides a perception of possibility to the world with these few words: "thoka-thokam khaṇe khaṇe". Understanding it wrongly, one must not do just a little and think that is enough. Little by little. For the person who can do a little, they can bring a great deal closer through that little. If they do not engage even a little towards it, they will never be able to do it at all. Likewise, if one uses one moment correctly, that person can carry it forward from moment to moment. Now we know that a great river, which goes towards the sea making a great sound, sometimes begins from the collection of a few drops of water falling from a roof. In this way, everything gathers together and eventually becomes a massive thing. In another such place, in the Dhammapada itself, the Buddha has shown another very appealing simile, also on an occasion when speaking about meritorious deeds.

Udabindunipātena

udakumbhopi pūrati

pūrati bālo pāpassa

thoka-thokampi ācinam

"Do not underestimate merit, thinking 'this small merit will not come to me.' Do not think lightly of it, do not look down on it." The simile given next is:

"Udabindunipātena udakumbhopi pūrati." When it rains and water trickles down from the roof drop by drop, if a pot is placed there, after some time the pot fills up.

"Udabindunipātena." by the falling of water drops, "udakumbhopi pūrati" even a water pot is filled. According to that, following that, one can think: "pūrati dhīro puññassa thoka-thokampi ācinam". "Dhīra" means the wise person. That wise person, the intelligent person, "thoka-thokampi ācinam"—the word "thoka-thokam" is used—"little by little". Gathering it little by little, "pūراتi puññassa" becomes filled with merit. Thus the Buddha declared. Drawing from that, we can understand that these few words, "thoka-thokam khaṇe khaṇe", are a very valuable set of words.

Let us also reflect on the simile given next: "kammāro rajatasseva". We said "kammāra" is used here, meaning a smith, not a person who beats iron, but one who works with gold and silver. We generally call him a goldsmith. But the simile given here is about silver. That too has been declared by the Buddha with a certain meaning. As you devotees know, silver is a substance with a beautiful white brilliance. A white thing. But the situation regarding this white thing is what is said here: "kammāro rajatasseva niddhame malam attano". Yet, rust has formed on this silver. When a goldsmith finds a piece of silver covered in rust, he cannot remove its dirt all at once according to the stated principle. Those who work with gold and silver know that they work with gold and silver in a systematic way—heating it little by little, cooling it, allowing it to rest for a while, and so on. In that very same way, just as the smith systematically, little by little, from moment to moment, removes the rust from silver, "attano malam niddhame"—one removes the rust of defilements that has accumulated in one's own mind-stream for a long time in saṃsāra. This is what the Buddha pointed out in that verse.

Thus, through this, besides the perception of possibility, a still deeper meaning is brought out. There is no need to say afresh that rust has formed on our mind-streams; we know, even without a Buddha to tell us, that it is rusted. We suffer from it. Sometimes, the nature of that rust—how powerfully it has rusted—is what the ordinary person does not know. That is what the Buddha brings to light. But a more valuable fact is that beneath that rust, there lies a certain brilliance. That is a fact that brings great enthusiasm and courage to the world. The Buddha, on one occasion, declared this nature of the mind in an amazing manner, in a way no other teacher had ever declared: that there is a natural brilliance in the mind, and that it has been covered by the rust of defilements.

"Pabhassaramidaṃ bhikkhave cittaṃ, tañca kho āgantukehi upakkilesehi upakkiliṭṭhaṃ. Taṃ assutavā puthujjano yathābhūtaṃ nappajānāti, tasmā assutavato puthujjanassa cittaabhāvanā natthīti vadāmi"

"Monks, this mind is luminous. Bright. Radiant. But 'tañca kho āgantukehi upakkilesehi upakkiliṭṭhaṃ'—yet, this mind is defiled by adventitious, externally coming impurities, by adventitious defilements. 'Taṃ assutavā puthujjano yathābhūtaṃ nappajānāti'—the ordinary worldling (puthujjana) who lacks Dhamma knowledge does not know this fact as it really is, in accordance with reality. 'Tasmā assutavato puthujjanassa cittaabhāvanā natthīti vadāmi'—therefore, that ordinary worldling who lacks Dhamma knowledge does not show interest in mental cultivation (citta-bhāvanā), in meditation." Next, the other side is shown:

"Pabhassaramidaṃ bhikkhave cittaṃ, tañca kho āgantukehi upakkilesehi vippamuttaṃ. Taṃ sutavā ariyasāvako yathābhūtaṃ pajānāti, tasmā sutavato ariyasavakassa cittaabhāvanā atthīti vadāmi"

"Monks, this mind is luminous. There is also an occasion when it is liberated, freed from those external defilements. The instructed noble disciple (ariya-sāvaka) who has Dhamma knowledge knows this fact as it really is. Because of that, for such an instructed noble disciple who has Dhamma knowledge, there is mental cultivation. That person engages in meditation, the Buddha declared." Accordingly, we can understand that this is a matter that gives immense courage to the world: that there is a natural, inherent brilliance, a luminosity, in our mind-stream, and that it is possible to bring out that luminosity. If we begin to remove this rust systematically, little by little, from moment to moment, then one day, according to the power one has accumulated continuously throughout saṃsāra and also according to present effort, even those supramundane states, those deep and extremely pure states that an ordinary person cannot even think of, can be brought about; mental purity can be attained. This is what is brought out for us in this verse.

Next, the course of action for this has also been pointed out by the Buddha in various ways on various occasions. In particular, this is a simple simile. A place where the Buddha showed with a simile that even a small child can understand is the simile shown to the young Venerable Rāhula regarding how to purify this mind, and the advice given accordingly.

On one occasion, the Buddha asks the novice Rāhula, "Kiṃ maññasi Rāhula kimpāṭiyogo ādāso"; "What do you think, Rāhula, what is the purpose of a mirror?" He asks what a mirror is for, just as one would ask a small child. Then Venerable Rāhula replies, "Paccavekkhaṇattho bhante" "Venerable Sir, it is for looking at closely and examining." A mirror is there for looking at oneself carefully. Next, then the Buddha, drawing upon the simile, declares: "Evameva Rāhula",—here, the word "paccavekkhitvā" mentioned earlier was inserted. "Paccavekkhitvā" means turning back and looking carefully; it has the meaning of reflecting with wisdom.— "In that very same way, Rāhula, reflecting with wisdom, paccavekkhitvā paccavekkhitvā—reflecting again and again, bodily actions must be done. Reflecting with wisdom on actions done by body, reflecting again and again with wisdom, they must be done." In the same way, regarding actions done by speech and actions done by mind, He declared this method of purifying the mind.

Next, He explains in further detail: "Rāhula, if you now have to do some work by body, before doing it, reflect, review—using the word paccavekkhitvā. Just like looking into a mirror, look at that action, looking with wisdom. Reflect with wisdom: 'This action that I am about to do, will it lead to my own harm? Will it lead to the harm of others? Will it lead to the harm of both of us?' Reflect in this way beforehand. When reflecting like that, if you realize, 'If I do this action, there will be such-and-such results, it will turn out badly for me, it will turn out badly for others, it will turn out badly for both sides,' then do not perform that action. That is before doing it. Likewise, while doing it—if by some chance in the initial stage you did not realize it, and you are carrying it out. But, even while carrying it out—the Buddha declares next—even while doing it, reflect in the same way. Just like looking into a mirror, reflect with wisdom on that action: 'If I carry on with this work in this way, will it be harmful to me? Will it lead to my downfall? Will it be harmful to others? Will it be harmful to both sides?'... If you realize so while carrying it out, you must abandon it right there on the spot, you must stop it right there, the Buddha declared. If you realize, 'No, this action I am carrying out is not harmful to me, it is indeed good for me, it is for my benefit, it is for the benefit of others, it is for the benefit of both sides, no harm is caused,' then carry on with that action, He pointed out in that way. That is while doing it. Not only that, but also after doing it. There are some actions that one does not understand before doing them, nor while doing them, but it is only after doing them that their true nature is understood. Therefore, even after doing it, reflect in this very same way—examine it. 'If I did some action by body, did that action lead to my harm, my downfall? Did it lead to the harm of others? Did it lead to the harm of both sides?' If it was so, if you realized so, on that occasion—nothing can be done about it now—but the practice pointed out by the Buddha there is a method belonging to the Saṅgha. That is, confessing, 'Alas, such a mistake has been committed by me,' to the Teacher Himself, that is, to the Buddha, declaring it as a confession of an offense. Or else, going to one's other senior monks and declaring, 'A mistake, a slip, has occurred from me,' and promising, 'I will not do such a thing again.' That is what is called restraint in the future (āyati-saṃvara). One resolves not to do it again. In this way are actions done by body. In the same way, by that same principle, by that analogy, reflect also on actions done by speech—before doing, while doing, and after doing. Likewise, actions done by mind. Actions done by mind are thinking about various things. One must reflect on that too: 'Are these thoughts, this stream of thoughts, for my own good? Are they for the good of others? Are they for the good of both sides?' In this way, the Buddha pointed out that principle of Dhamma on that occasion, drawing from the simile of the mirror."

Next, He declares it as a natural law (dhammatā): "Rāhula, whatever ascetics and brahmins in the past purified their bodily actions, purified their verbal actions, purified their mental actions, they all did so according to this very principle, this method. Whatever ascetics and brahmins in the future will bring about purity in their actions of body, speech, and mind, they will do so according to this method. Ascetics and brahmins of the present time also do so according to this method." Thus, the Buddha declared that sutta discourse to Venerable Rāhula.

The mirror taken here is very useful for us. You devotees know about mirrors. There are mirrors in houses. Sometimes there are full-length mirrors in houses. But they only show the body. This is not a mirror that shows the body—it is a Dhamma-mirror. It is a mirror that shows the mind. Through this, this Dhamma is entirely a mirror that shows the mind. It shows the impurity of the mind. But through this analogy, we can understand: now, when combing hair, preparing the face, grooming oneself, etc., before doing so, one looks into the mirror to see if there is any place to adjust on the face or hair. One looks while doing it too. Even after doing it, one looks back to see if there is any shortcoming in how well one has dressed.

In that very same way, one must look into this Dhamma-mirror. According to the principle shown in the Dhamma, that story of wholesome and unwholesome (kusala and akusala) was spoken of there in terms of harm to others, harm to oneself, harm to both sides, and so on. If it leads to harm in that way, it is unwholesome (akusala). If it does not lead to harm, it is wholesome (kusala). If it leads to good, it is wholesome. You devotees can easily understand that. In this way, this is a Dhamma-mirror; this Dhamma is entirely a mirror. So much so, a female Elder (therī) who attained Arahantship, an Arahant Nun, declared regarding her direct realization: "dhammādāsaṃ apekkhitvā"—"I looked at my face in the Dhamma-mirror." Looking at the face there means looking at the mind. "I adjusted these by looking into the Dhamma-mirror," she said.

Through that, we can understand that the advice given by the Buddha in the sutta discourse also helps us in our day-to-day practical lives. The biggest problem for everyone is finding time. Next, how to do this—the perception of possibility is not there. Likewise, how to make a start, how to carry it on.

We have found such good advice in these sutta discourses. Similarly, on another occasion, the Buddha delivered a sutta discourse containing a highly valuable simile.

There is a sutta called the "Accharāsaṅghāta" Sutta. Devotees, "accharāsaṅghāta" means the snap of fingers. You devotees know what finger-snapping is. Now, catching the thumb and the middle finger, one makes a small sound, a snap, on certain occasions. Exorcists and such also snap their fingers when doing rituals, or when they want to drive away a demon. But here, the Buddha in this discourse intends the time it takes to snap a finger. Very little time is spent on this. It implies a mere moment. In the Accharāsaṅghāta Sutta, the Buddha preaches: "Monks..." He addresses the monks, but He is informing the beings of the three worlds of this matter. "If, for the duration of a finger-snap, for even that brief moment, some monk develops a mind of loving-kindness (mettā), even within that brief duration of a finger-snap, regarding such a monk, I declare that he acts according to the Teacher's instruction, follows the Teacher's advice, and does not consume the almsfood provided by the world in vain." He declares him to be one who does not leave the development of absorption (jhāna) empty, who does not let it go to waste, and who lives without neglecting meditation. That is, even for a brief moment, a brief moment like a finger-snap, if someone develops a mind of loving-kindness, that too, in a small measure, is a form of absorption (jhāna). Even in a small measure, it is practicing according to the advice pointed out by the Buddha. Moreover, because of that very thing, some strength of monkhood is obtained from it, a value is added to it. That is why it was declared that he is worthy of consuming the alms-meal.

From that, one should not wrongly think that meditation should be restricted only to a brief duration like a finger-snap. But what is shown here is that if someone starts with a brief duration like a finger-snap, that person can carry that path of practice forward. Now we know that those who do great works in the world are those who obtained time from such brief moments. If the mind is trained to do a valuable work in a brief moment, that person, in the midst of doing their work, can recollect the Buddha's advice, "I have the time of a finger-snap here, don't I? Can't I apply that to meditation?" and travel on that path. In that way, He spoke about that mind of loving-kindness. Next, "If, monks, for the brief duration of a finger-snap, someone develops the perception of Anicca (Impermanent), reflects on Anicca (Impermanent)—that is, the meditation on Anicca (Impermanent). Reflection on Anicca (Impermanent) is insight (vipassanā). Next, similarly, if they contemplate the perception of Dukkha (Suffering), the nature of Dukkha (Suffering) in this saṃsāra—for everything that is Anicca (Impermanent) is Dukkha (Suffering). Next, if they contemplate that this painful thing is Anattā (Not-self), if they practice the recollection of death (maraṇasati), if they develop the recollection of the Buddha (buddhānussati), the recollection of the Dhamma (dhammānussati), the recollection of the Saṅgha (saṅghānussati)... if some monk practices these meditations even in a small measure, for the duration of a finger-snap, I declare that monk to be one who acts according to the Teacher's instruction."

From this sutta discourse too, we can understand, here too He provides the "perception of possibility." He provides a perception of possibility to the three worlds. This matter of time like a finger-snap—now we took the simile of the "exorcist". The similes given by the Buddha are extremely profound, extremely meaningful. Now we know, just as exorcists sometimes snap their fingers to drive away demons, here, by maintaining a wholesome mind for a brief moment, for the duration of a finger-snap, one creates an opportunity to remove the "demon of defilements", or rather, that rust of defilements. In that way, what is shown there too is the value of generating a "perception of possibility" in one's daily life and engaging in these activities—as shown by the Buddha.

So, if one is to do this kind of work, there is something else that must be used as an aid. We are presenting what can practically help you, these Buddhists, in a practical way. One must also understand the importance of this kind of work. The Buddha has often brought this to light on many occasions. In this Dispensation, these are known as the bases of urgency (saṃvega-vatthu). All vehicles and such have a certain speed. Various fuels are added to build up this speed—whether "regular" or "super"—things of that sort are added. In the same way, a certain speed is required to travel this journey of the Dispensation. That speed is called saṃvega (spiritual urgency). Things that act as fuel for that speed are called saṃvega-vatthu (bases of urgency). What are these saṃvega-vatthu? They are not things that can be touched with hands. Nor are they things that can be bought. But these matters are:

Jāti jarā vyādhī cuti apāyā

atīta anāgata vaṭṭa dukkhaṃ

idāni āhāra gavesi dukkhaṃ

saṃvegavattū imāni aṭṭha

Reflecting according to the word of the Buddha, we have been born in this saṃsāra for an endless time; reflecting on this Jāti (Birth), or rather, this very Jāti (Birth), this very life—how terrifying an event is Jāti (Birth)? Mothers know this, even if the young child does not. Next, after being born, is there not Dukkha (Suffering) right from there? This Jāti (Birth) is Dukkha (Suffering); thus, even without a Buddha saying so, it is something the world must understand. In this day and age, they consider it something to celebrate. It is a matter for lamentation—obtaining this Jāti (Birth). For an extremely long time in saṃsāra, we have committed this foolishness. Due to that very Jāti (Birth), the first gift received next, the birthday gift, is death. If one is born, death is certain. The next station on the path to death is jarā [decay/aging]. From Jāti (Birth)—Jāti (Birth), jarā. Next, jarā [decay/aging] is the second saṃvega-vatthu. Jāti (Birth), jarā, next vyādhi (illness); as one goes to jarā, as the body decays, illness draws closer to assist it—diseases. Next cuti (passing away), next ending in death. Thus, Jāti (Birth)—birth. Next, growing old, what is called jarā. Subject to jarā. Next, diseases. Next, death. Next, reflecting on the past according to the Buddha's word, how much Dukkha (Suffering) have we suffered in past saṃsāra? Next, if we do not see Nibbāna in the future, if we do not realize Nibbāna, for how long a time in the future—according to the Buddha's word—the Buddha declared that we travel in this saṃsāra from an extremely long, beginningless time. Therefore, in the future too, we will have to suffer Dukkha (Suffering) in that way. The Dukkha (Suffering) of the round of existence (vaṭṭa-dukkha) in past and future. In this saṃsāra, in this spinning in one place, the foolishness involved, the Dukkha (Suffering) arising due to this—next, one must reflect on that daily. Likewise, the effort made to seek food in this life. How much Dukkha (Suffering) is that? One must reflect on how animals strive for this food. Perhaps for wealthy people, obtaining food might seem like a small thing. Sometimes, as Venerable Anuruddha in the past declared regarding the "arising of rice", as if food just appears on the table. But how much does one toil throughout the day for this bit of food? That too is Dukkha (Suffering). In this way, these saṃvega-vatthu, regarding life in this saṃsāra, the nature of Dukkha (Suffering) in saṃsāra, must be reflected upon constantly. Reflecting according to that saṃvega (spiritual urgency), then, the small space one gets—just as we save a little, thinking of emergencies and children—one must strive to apply that brief moment to a meritorious deed, to Dhamma, to meditation.

It is due to the lack of generating such saṃvega (spiritual urgency) that ordinary Buddhists gradually move away from the Dhamma. Because of that, Dukkha (Suffering) increases in this world. And they accumulate Dukkha (Suffering) for the next world too. Thus, this Buddha Sasana is the work, the program of removing a multitude of rust. The Buddha pointed out this rust. There are various kinds of rust in the world, but more than all those kinds of rust, the real rust is shown as:

...Malā ve pāpakā dhammā asmiṃ loke paramhi ca

tato malā malataraṃ avijjā paramaṃ malaṃ

In the world, both in this life and the next, the real rust is indeed evil deeds. Committing sins is a huge rust in the world. A well-known type of rust in the world. Next, even more than that, "tato malā malataraṃ"—the greatest rust of all is: "avijjā paramaṃ malaṃ"—ignorance (avijjā), what is called non-knowledge, the lack of knowing the Four Noble Truths, that foolishness, that ignorance. The ignorance present in saṃsāric beings. That indeed is the greatest rust. Thus, it was to cut away this rust that the Buddha pointed out the Noble Eightfold Path as the Middle Path (majjhimā paṭipadā). There too we have a gradual program. What is this Noble Eightfold Path? Often, it remains restricted to words. Many people do not understand the value found here. An amazingly wonderful Dhamma-path is present here: sammā-diṭṭhi, sammā-saṅkappa, sammā-vācā, sammā-kammanta, sammā-ājīva, sammā-vāyāma, sammā-sati, sammā-samādhi—these eight factors are shown as the Noble Eightfold Path.

If we state this in the Sinhala language understandable to us, sammā-diṭṭhi means "right seeing" (or "right view"). Seeing here is not the vision seen by the eye. It is about the vision of life—the view regarding life. The view regarding the world. It can be called "right seeing". Next, sammā-saṅkappa means "right thoughts and aspirations" ("right intention"). Next, sammā-vācā means "right saying" ("right speech"). Right words. sammā-kammanta means "right doing" ("right action"). sammā-ājīva means "right living" ("right livelihood"). The method of maintaining life. Next, sammā-vāyāma means "right striving" ("right effort"). Energy. sammā-sati means "right recollecting" ("right mindfulness"). Recollecting in the correct way. sammā-samādhi means "right mind-unifying" ("right concentration"). Unifying the mind in the right way. Since time is insufficient to explain each of these at length, to mention briefly: sammā-diṭṭhi means that everyone has a vision of life. Even the criminal, everyone has some vision of life. Even the grasshopper has a vision of life—it ends in burning. Next, in that way, if someone's vision of life is correct, they can go towards development right from there. If someone's vision of life is wrong, there is downfall right from there. Thus, the first step is indeed the vision of life. That is shown in the Dhamma as sammā-diṭṭhi. That means, on one hand, if shown shallowly, if speaking only with reflection on this saṃsāra, understanding good and bad. Understanding wholesome and unwholesome deeds (kusala and akusala). In the world there are fruits of giving, etc. There are fruits and results of wholesome and unwholesome kamma, there is this world, there is the next world, there is mother, there is father, etc., shown as ten matters. A certain view that helps in doing wholesome deeds, doing merit. This is a view that helps one to go to a happy destination (sugati) instead of a miserable destination (dugati) in this saṃsāra.

But what goes even deeper than that is the Four Noble Truths. This entire saṃsāric existence, this very five aggregates (pañcakkhandha), is Dukkha (Suffering) as shown by the Tathāgata Fully Self-Awakened One. The cause of this Dukkha (Suffering) is Taṇhā (Craving). The place where this Taṇhā (Craving) thirst is stilled is Nibbāna. The path to that Nibbāna is this very Noble Eightfold Path. Understanding these Four Noble Truths is sammā-diṭṭhi. If someone's vision of life has been prepared in this way, a certain subtle transformation begins to take place within them systematically, little by little, from moment to moment. Just as when one climbs the first step, as one steps with one foot, the other foot is raised. Thus, if this view called sammā-diṭṭhi, this vision of life, has arisen in someone, a certain subtle transformation regarding thoughts and aspirations begins to occur systematically within them. That is shown as nekkhamma-saṅkappa (thought of renunciation), abyāpāda-saṅkappa (thought of non-ill-will), avihiṃsā-saṅkappa (thought of non-harming). That is, generally, nekkhamma means the idea of departing from the household life, the idea regarding renunciation of the household life. When speaking of this, one must not think that this is something belonging only to the monks. Renouncing the household life actually means that this saṃsāra is Dukkha (Suffering). Now, sometimes even lay devotees in troubled times declare that they want to ordain. At least in the deeper mind, there is some inclination towards ordination within these Buddhist devotees. Helping that is the sight of the monks, associating with the monks, and so on. On such occasions, what arises in these devotees is nekkhamma-saṅkappa. An idea regarding departure. That is a wholesome thought. That is a wholesome mind. It is through the arising of thoughts regarding departure for an extremely long time that someone gets the strength even to ordain.

In that way, the mind is inclined towards the "nekkhamma" concept. Abyāpāda-saṅkappa, that is, thoughts of loving-kindness, thoughts opposite to hatred. Next, avihiṃsā-saṅkappa, departing from violence and practicing non-violence. Thoughts of "may no being be harmed." These thoughts are called sammā-saṅkappa. Based on those thoughts, that person's words also change next. Those words mean striving to depart from lying, slander, harsh speech, and frivolous chatter. They try to abstain from those. In the ājīva-aṭṭhamaka-sīla (eightfold virtue with livelihood as the eighth) observed on this occasion, this is spoken of. Next, while speaking those good words, abstaining from those bad ones, if they use truthful words, words that unite others, next, meaningful words, gentle words, then that person thinks: "My actions must also be in accordance with my words." They try to abstain from those wrongs called killing, stealing, and sexual misconduct. They try to abstain from destroying other lives, stealing, and sexual misconduct. This is sammā-kammanta (right action). That is "right doing."

Next, it does not stop there. Sometimes, a big problem for many people in this day and age is the question of livelihood, the path of living. From various places, from various big places, support is received for being dragged down to unrighteous paths. By that, the life of the Buddhist goes towards downfall in a huge way. So, micchā-ājīva means wrong livelihoods. Those must be abandoned. The Buddha pointed out, as things that must not be done by a Buddhist devotee, as livelihoods that must not be practiced: trade in weapons, trade in living beings for slaughter, trade in meat, trade in poisons, and trade in intoxicants. Abstaining from these, one must strive to establish a righteous livelihood. Otherwise, that Buddhist path of living, that matter of livelihood (sammā-ājīva), cannot be completed.

If someone has prepared their livelihood in this way, even with difficulty, even with some sacrifice, it does not go to waste. It is through the effort applied for that, next, through that effort, that person enters the plane of yoga, the plane of meditation, automatically. Automatically, they obtain the qualification to enter. For what does that person do through the effort made to prepare their livelihood, what is being done inside the mind? There is a big piece of work there. That is what is called sammā-vāyāma (right effort). That is the real striving. It is not a striving done in the world. It is a striving done inside the mind. What is that striving? The striving applied to prevent the arising of unarisen unwholesome states. The striving applied to abandon arisen unwholesome states. The striving applied to generate unarisen wholesome states. Next, the striving applied to protect and consolidate arisen wholesome states. To consider briefly, within these four kinds of striving, there is an extremely great, valuable meditation. It is through the continuation of that meditation that sammā-sati (right mindfulness), what is called good recollecting, a good mindfulness, arises in that person. Just as if a watchman were given a job, "Do not let bad people enter here, if there are bad people, drive them away from here, bring good people close, treat them well"—if a watchman were given such a job, that person would have to do that work without sleeping, without falling into negligence. In that very same way is that great revolution occurring in the mind-stream of the devotee who strives regarding their livelihood. Because of that great transformation, that great energy, effort, and strive, a valuable virtue, an extremely rare virtue, arises in that person: sammā-sati. Real mindfulness, real recollecting.

When mindfulness emerges properly, what it directs itself to, when reflecting in accordance with the Dhamma, is the four establishments of mindfulness (cattāro satipaṭṭhānā). One begins to think about the nature of this body. About feelings (vedanā) [Feeling / Sensation] arising in this body, about the nature of this mind, about thoughts—arising, coming to the mind—about these. This is what is called the four establishments of mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna). Those four establishments of mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna) are the sole path (ekāyana-magga) to Nibbāna. The sole path, an unerring path, is those four establishments of mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna). Thus, through the development of those establishments of mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna), next, if someone has obtained the strength to maintain that mindfulness for a brief moment, as they gradually increase that duration, they can generate a certain concentration (samādhi). They can settle their mind. In that way, through right mind-unifying, they can unify the mind on a certain meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna). What is done by that is one-pointedness of mind (cittakaggatā). In this day and age, we use a word "personality" (paurushaya). To show the idea regarding someone's life, we say "personality". Indeed, personality emerges right here. Just like beginning to build a stupa and placing the pinnacle, if sammā-samādhī has arisen in some mind-stream, that person's personality becomes unified. Arriving at that state is what is called completing the Noble Eightfold Path.

If someone has completed that Noble Eightfold Path supramundanelly, right there is Nibbāna. How amazing is this Dhamma-path! The Buddha has declared: "This well-expounded Dhamma is directly visible (sanditṭhika), immediate (akālika), inviting one to come and see (ehipassika), worthy of being applied (opanayika), to be personally realized by the wise (paccattaṃ veditabbo viññūhī)." That is, this well-expounded Dhamma, the Dhamma-practices, are those of non-empty practice. It is a Dhamma containing an unerring practice that yields results directly. Because of that, it is well-expounded (svākkhāta). Sanditṭhika (directly visible) means that in daily life, right in this life, before one's very eyes, one can see their results. Those can be implemented. As expressed in the manner "thoka-thokam khaṇe pheṇe", little by little, even starting slowly, there are results in proportion to what one does. Next, in that very same way, it yields results according to its immediate (akālika) nature. Especially, as we declared, when the Noble Eightfold Path is completed, right there is Nibbāna. There is no need for someone else to come and say, "Now you have completed it, so I will give you Nibbāna*." That is the immediate (akālika) nature of this Dhamma.

Next, ehipassika means "come and see." The Dhamma itself draws one in. The Buddha does not declare "come and see" as vendors on pavements invite people, "come and see." That is not the kind of thing shown by the Buddha here. It is the Dhamma itself that says, "come and see." Just like saying, "taste and see," it says, "put me into action in this way and see if there are results." That is the meaning of ehipassika—"come and see." Likewise, opanayika (worthy of being applied/leading inward) means it has a power of drawing one from one stage to another. We mentioned, according to the simile of the great ocean, it draws one from one to another. There is a systematic progression from one to another. Just as there is a connection from one step to another when climbing a flight of stairs. Therefore, if one has made a start at some point on this Dhamma-path, if one has made a proper start, a correct start, from that very point, that person has progress—not in vain, if they engage in it.

In that way, the Buddha shows the ehipassika and opanayika qualities. Next, paccattaṃ veditabbo viññūhī—for wise individuals, there is no need for someone else to come and tell them; they can put it into action and realize it for themselves, the Buddha declared. One must try it out and see whether there is a result of this Dhamma-path, whether this saṃsāra can be ended right in this life, in the manner called "diṭṭheva dhamme"—right in this life—whether that bliss of Nibbāna can be realized or not. Thus the Buddha declared here. Therefore, there is no reason for these lay devotees to hesitate regarding this Dhamma-path because of their lay status. In the past, even during the Buddha's time, Anāthapiṇḍika and others—when considering the wealthy of today, Anāthapiṇḍika was a person of hundreds of thousands of times greater wealth. Yet, he was a Stream-enterer (sotāpanna) lay disciple. The children of that lay prince also attained realization of the fruits of the path. The great laywoman Visākhā, next Citta the Householder, Hatthaka of Ālavī, and so on—there is a great number of names of laypeople among those who realized the fruits of the path.

Those devotees did not spend their time in vain. They utilized the real Dhamma-path at all times. They discussed the Dhamma with the Buddha, engaged in Dhamma and meditation; in that manner indeed did they spend their lives. In that way, Buddhist devotees who lead their lives successfully can reap the results from this Dhamma-path today as well. Therefore, you devotees must reflect: now, especially due to the works in one's life, many people hesitate in this day and age. Many say they cannot find time for these works. And because of that, they fall into negligence (pamāda).

This non-negligence (appamāda) is a fundamental word of the Buddha. Like the letter "A". These things cannot be postponed. That is, we hear many people saying, "Only after retiring can we do Dhamma and meditation." But after retiring, other problems arise next. Or else, due to physical weakness, one becomes unable to do them. Therefore, it is because of this postponing that we have traveled in this saṃsāra for such a long time. The Buddha, in order to generate fear of saṃsāra (saṃsāra-bhaya), on some occasions delivered amazing discourses. There is a collection of discourses called the "Anamatagga Saṃyutta". To thirty monks who had practiced Dhamma and meditation, who had arrived from the city of Pāvā, on one occasion the Buddha delivered an extremely moving, extremely amazing discourse. So powerful was that discourse that, at its conclusion, those monks became Arahants, it is declared. So, what kind of discourse did He deliver? This is how the Buddha began:

"Monks, this saṃsāra is so extremely long that its beginning point is not visible. A beginning point of this saṃsāra cannot be seen by anyone; of these beings who have traveled for an extremely long time, covered by ignorance (avijjā) and bound by craving (taṇhā) [Craving / Thirst], a beginning point is not visible." Next, He declares—asking a question of the monks—"Monks, what do you think? Traveling in this saṃsāra for such a long time, is the blood shed by you having your heads cut off greater, or is the water in the four great oceans greater?" The monks respectfully declare: "Venerable Sir, Blessed One, if we have understood the Dhamma preached by the Blessed One correctly, as we traveled in this saṃsāra during this extremely long time, the blood shed by us having our heads cut off is indeed greater; the water in the four great oceans is less." Next, the Buddha did not stop there: "Monks, when you were born as oxen, that is, born in the animal state of cattle, is the blood shed by having your heads cut off greater, or is the water in the four great oceans greater?"

On that occasion too, the monks had to reply in succession. Now, someone might think that this is a question about the blood shed by being born in various different births in this entire saṃsāra. But the Buddha asks, bringing up the matter regarding each individual animal: "Monks, when you were born as cows, born as buffaloes, born as goats, born as chickens, born as pigs, having your heads cut off, is the blood shed in each of those births greater, or is the water in the four great oceans greater?" To all of those, the monks reply: "Venerable Sir, Blessed One, if we have understood the Dhamma preached by the Blessed One correctly, that shed blood indeed is greater; the water in the four great oceans is not greater." Having replied in that way, by the time it concluded, how deeply did those monks understand the nature of saṃsāra!—They had arrived there without having attained any fruit of the path previously, but they had meditated well.—At the conclusion of that discourse, removing all the rust of defilements, they realized the extremely pure Nibbāna and ended the Dukkha (Suffering) of saṃsāra, it is mentioned.

Following that, you devotees must also reflect: as the bad side of this saṃsāra, there may be within many—even though you are currently lay devotees—wholesome Dhammas (kusala-dhamma) accumulated by living many lives as ascetics throughout endless time, or perhaps appearing as monks in previous Dispensations, regarding Dhamma and meditation. But, just like sparks under ashes, if one does not apply some effort, energy, towards them, one will never be able to do Dhamma and meditation, and will never be able to get results from them. Therefore, what we have to think is, generating the "perception of possibility," some strength may be present within us, we may have fulfilled certain perfections (pāramīs) in saṃsāra; relying on them, adding a present effort to them, traveling on this path of Dhamma, as the Buddha pointed out—just as wise individuals do—gradually, little by little, from moment to moment, just as the goldsmith removes the rust from silver, we must resolve to remove the rust of defilements present in our own mind-streams.

Today—as we stated—is the day of the Buddhist New Year. On a day like today, if one made such a resolution, calling to mind such a verse daily according to that resolution, keeping it as a motto, one would apply whatever small time one gets daily, even five or ten minutes before going to sleep. Now, what many people say is, "We have no free time." Government holidays and such are received in abundance. Free time is not something given; it is something one must obtain for oneself. Plenty of holidays are received. But one has no free time. Free time is something that must be obtained with effort. If the desire is there, if the speed called saṃvega (spiritual urgency) is there, if one trains in that Dhamma without negligence (appamāda), that person has time, has a moment, can make a start, even little by little. Therefore, based on this Dhamma sermon, drawing your lives closer to the Dhamma-path, following the noble Dhamma-path, the Noble Eightfold Path pointed out by the Buddha, gradually, systematically practicing Dhamma, meditation, virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā), at some point, through the supramundane path-attainments of Stream-entry (sotāpatti), Once-returning (sakadāgāmitā), Non-returning (anāgāmitā), and Arahantship, you must pray to be liberated from this entire saṃsāric Dukkha (Suffering) and realize the noble, deathless, great Nibbāna. Even on this occasion, even while listening to this sermon, if you listened to the Dhamma from moment to moment with meditative attention (manasikāra), all unwholesome states in your minds were dispelled, they were removed, and instead, a mountain of wholesome thoughts, a mountain of refined wholesome thoughts, arose in your mind-stream on this occasion. You must pray that this mountain of wholesome thoughts may support the effort of realizing Nibbāna during this very lifetime, serving as a supporting condition (upanissaya) for realizing Nibbāna.

Likewise, now, this accumulated mountain of merit—if we too have gathered some mountain of merit in the form of preaching the Dhamma on this occasion, and you in the form of listening to the Dhamma—if there is a host of devas and Brahmas, such as the Sasana-protecting deities who are awake during this period of Sasana decline, the devas in this place, this sacred place—as you devotees know, Pahankanuwa is a particularly powerful place. If there are any deities or such states of existence residing in connection with such places, may all those who desire merit rejoice in this merit of listening to the Dhamma and preaching the Dhamma. Having rejoiced, may they be liberated from all saṃsāric Dukkha (Suffering) and realize the noble, supreme, peaceful, deathless, great Nibbāna through a preferred Bodhi (enlightenment state). We must share merits with those devas. Likewise, if there are any beings, from the Avīci hell to the Akaniṭṭha heaven, including your deceased relatives, who wish to receive merits, may all of them rejoice in this merit and be comforted by the noble, deathless, great Nibbāna. With this aspiration, recite these verses and share merits.

Verse 28 from the Appamādavagga (Chapter on Heedfulness) of the Dhammapada

Dear Listeners,

After attaining supreme enlightenment, when our Buddha looked at the world with His Buddha-eye, this world appeared to that Buddha-eye just like a lotus pond or a water-lily pond. In a lotus pond or a water-lily pond, some flower buds are submerged in the water, growing under the water. Some other buds have grown level with the water's surface, just barely emerging. Yet other buds have risen above the water, waiting as if for the sun to rise, standing tall and ready.

Just so, according to that simile, our Buddha understood the different levels of intelligence of beings in this world. Some people have very low saṃsāric intelligence; they live attached and deeply immersed in the world. They do not think of a next world, nor of the Nibbāna nor of ending the suffering (dukkha) of saṃsāra. There are some other human beings, another group, who have the capacity to at least occasionally think about the next world and the suffering (dukkha) of saṃsāra in a way that allows them to gain some understanding. There are still others who have cultivated their minds by practicing meditation for a long time in saṃsāra. They are like those flower buds that have risen above the water, waiting for the sun to rise. As soon as the rays of the Dhamma from that sun—the Buddha-sun—fall upon them, they bloom. In the same way, human beings who possess such a refined mental continuum, who are highly developed beings, bloom just like a lotus flower or a water-lily flower when the Dhamma-rays of our Buddha fall upon them. The Dhamma-eye arises in them. Their eyes are opened.

Although this sermon was delivered based on the Udāna Pāḷi, the story also appears with certain variations in the commentary to the Bālavagga of the Dhammapada.*

While our Buddha was residing in the Veluvana monastery in the city of Rājagaha, one day He was preaching the Dhamma to a large gathering near a street. There lived in that very city of Rājagaha a very poor leper named Suppabuddha. This man, while searching for food on that day, saw a large crowd gathered on this street. He thought, "Surely, this must be a place where food is being distributed. If I also go near this crowd, perhaps I might find some food." So, he hurried there and approached. Having arrived, he realized, "This is not a place where food is being distributed. The Blessed Gautama Ascetic is preaching the Dhamma to a crowd here. No matter, I too should listen to at least a bit of the Dhamma." Thinking so, he sat down to one side. At that moment, the Blessed One examined, scrutinized, and reflected upon the minds of that entire gathering with His Buddha-knowledge. He looked to see who among this great crowd was capable of understanding the deep Dhamma, the Dhamma of the Nibbāna which He was preaching, and who could understand it best.

To that Buddha-knowledge, to that Buddha-eye, there appeared Suppabuddha the leper sitting at the edge of the crowd. Realizing, "It is he who can understand and grasp the Dhamma I preach most quickly," our Buddha, targeting that very leper—as if preaching a sermon specifically for him—systematically began that Dhamma sermon with the graduated discourse (anupubbikathā) in accordance with the Buddha's method of teaching.

The graduated discourse (anupubbikathā), pious devotees, means—now, in this instance, you devotees have sat down having undertaken the precepts, but those who came there were not like that; people of various statures and temperaments arrive. In order to prepare their minds, to prepare the mind in the manner required to understand a deep Dhamma, our Buddha employs a certain method of teaching, a pathway of teaching. It is described as: "dāna-kathaṃ, sīla-kathaṃ, sagga-kathaṃ, kāmānaṃ ādīnaṃ okāraṃ saṅkilesaṃ, nekkhamme ca ānisamsaṃ pakāsesi." It is shown in this manner. "Dāna-kathā" (discourse on giving) means preaching first about giving as a good practice, a highly beneficial practice, praising and showing the benefits of giving. Next, "sīla-kathā" (discourse on virtue) means declaring that just like the sacrifice of material goods in giving, the sacrifice made by restraining body and speech is also highly beneficial—thus declaring virtue (sīla). Next, in "sagga-kathā" (discourse on heaven), He declares that as a result of giving and observing precepts, one can be born in heaven, and relates accounts of those who were so born. In this way, when the listener's mind is focused on the pleasant qualities of heaven and is gladdened, our Buddha next points out the danger (ādīna), the undesirable side, the evil side of the fivefold sensual pleasures—the sensual accomplishments enjoyed in the human world as well as in heaven. "Ādīna, okāra"—these are very low things. The accomplishment of fivefold sense pleasures is something common even to animals, a base thing that cannot be considered noble—thus He declares: okāraṃ. Next, saṅkilesaṃ—how many people go astray and generate defilements due to these fivefold sensual pleasures. In this way, he shows: ādīnaṃ okāraṃ saṅkilesaṃ. After their minds are directed to these aspects, our Buddha next declares instead nekkhamme ca ānisamsaṃ—the benefits of renunciation. Leaving the household life—becoming ordained—is a most valuable and noble practice. He then praises and commends these high virtues of separating oneself from fivefold sensual pleasures and departing from the household life, as a practice that helps one escape saṃsāra and realize the Nibbāna

In that manner, while our Buddha was delivering this graduated discourse and speaking about renunciation (nekkhamma), He was constantly watching how Suppabuddha's mind was working. Then our Buddha understood that the mind of Suppabuddha the leper was now prepared to hear the deep Dhamma—kallacittaṃ, muducittaṃ (a prepared mind, a soft mind), vīnīvaraṇacittaṃ (a mind free from hindrances, meaning that thoughts of sensual desire, ill-will, sloth and torpor, restlessness and worry, and doubt or indecision, which obstruct concentration, had been removed), and now the mind was highly—as in udaggacittaṃ, pasannacittam—cheerful and clear, and Suppabuddha was in a state of waiting, as it were, for what was to be said next. At that moment, our Buddha preached that deep teaching called the Four Noble Truths, which is introduced to the world only by the Buddhas: suffering (dukkha), arising (samudaya), cessation (nirodha), and path (magga). He declared: "These five aggregates that we are grasping—form (rūpa), feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), preparations (saṅkhāra), and consciousness (viññāṇa)—this entire saṃsāric existence is suffering (dukkha). The cause for this is craving / thirst (taṇhā). The calming of this craving / thirst—this burning—is extinguishment (nirodha). Nibbāna is the supreme bliss. The path to this is the Noble Eightfold Path: right view (sammā-diṭṭhi), right intention (sammā-saṅkappa), right speech (sammā-vācā), right action (sammā-kammanta), right livelihood (sammā-ājīva), right effort (sammā-vāyāma), right mindfulness (sammā-sati), and right concentration (sammā-samādhi)." Thus our Buddha declared the Four Noble Truths.

At that moment—the simile is given—just like a clean cloth that has been thoroughly washed takes dye perfectly, the prepared mind of Suppabuddha grasped this Four Noble Truths fully, and right on the seat where he was sitting, it is said: "virajaṃ vītamalaṃ dhammacakkhuṃ udapādi"—the stainless, dustless Dhamma-eye arose. He realized the fruit of stream-entry through the path-knowledge of stream-entry. Thus he attained that state. However, no one else knew that he had attained this; only our Buddha knew. At that moment, a massive change, an inner transformation, had occurred within that leper. So much so that Suppabuddha saw the Nibbāna. He saw extinguishment through the first path-knowledge—he became diṭṭhadhammo (one who has seen the Dhamma), pattadhammo (one who has reached the Dhamma). Likewise, doubts and hesitation regarding these things, regarding the Dhamma, were removed; doubts regarding the path to the Nibbāna were removed, and he entered into that practice. Furthermore, he attained a state of supreme confidence—boldness—in this Dispensation (Sāsana).

That first path-insight is a supramundane state. Having attained it, and when the Dhamma sermon concluded, this leper approached our Buddha and, praising Him, declared: "Excellent, venerable sir! Excellent, venerable sir! It is just as if—" and then he gives a simile—"Venerable sir, just as if one were to set upright what had been overturned, or to reveal what had been hidden, or to show the way to one who was lost, or to light, or hold up, an oil lamp in the dark so that those with eyes could see forms, in the same way the Blessed One has revealed the Dhamma to me in various ways. I go to the Blessed One for refuge, to the Dhamma for refuge, and to the Saṅgha for refuge. May the Blessed One accept me as a lay follower who has taken refuge from this day onwards for life." Having thus declared his exclamation of joy, he departed from that place.

Before going very far, before going a great distance, a fierce cow with a young calf gored Suppabuddha the leper and caused his death; he met his demise. The monks, seeing this incident, approached our Buddha and said, "Venerable Sir, Blessed One, that leper who was just inspired by the Blessed One with a Dhamma talk has died. Where has this person been reborn?" Then our Buddha declared, "Monks, this Suppabuddha was a wise man (paṇḍita). Suppabuddha was a wise man. He practiced according to the Dhamma I declared, and having broken three of the fetters that bind one to saṃsāra, he attained that noble state of stream-entry—a state more noble than even universal monarchy—whereby he will not fall into the four lower realms and will take at most seven more births (jāti), seven more existences in saṃsāra." Thus our Buddha declared. Having attained that, now at this very moment of speaking, Suppabuddha the leper has been reborn in the Tāvatiṃsa heaven, and he outshines the other devas in his retinue and bodily complexion. Why? Because this Suppabuddha the leper, having approached this Dispensation, developed those virtues called faith (saddhā), virtue (sīla), learning (suta), generosity (tyāga), and wisdom (paññā). By listening to just that one sermon, Suppabuddha the leper acquired these five virtues: faith, virtue, learning (which is the gift of Dhamma), generosity (the quality of sacrifice), and wisdom (the capacity, the power of comprehension, to realize the Mind Stilled [Nibbāna]). He declared to the monks that Suppabuddha had acquired these five qualities. These indeed are called the "Noble Wealth" (āriya-dhana). Faith, virtue, learning, generosity, and wisdom are the five types of wealth belonging to the Noble Ones in this Dispensation. In this way, He declared it.

Then, from among those monks, one monk asked, "Blessed One, why did this Suppabuddha, who attained such a state, become a leper? Why was he so poor?" Why did such a fortunate person take birth in such a life? Next, our Buddha declared that story of the past. "Monks, in the past, in the distant past, this Suppabuddha the leper was the son of a treasurer (setthi-putta) in this very city of Rājagaha. One day, while this treasurer's son was going to the pleasure garden, leaving the city for the garden, Tagarasikhī, the Paccekabuddha, was entering the city for alms. Seeing the robes worn by this Paccekabuddha, this treasurer, intoxicated with pride, conceived a feeling of disgust. 'Who is this leper, wearing a garment of lepers?' thinking in such a derogatory manner, he spat in that direction, and then turning his left shoulder—to turn one's left shoulder and go was a sign of disrespect in ancient times, because 'paying respect' or circumambulation means turning to the right and walking—saying such disrespectful words and spitting, he went on to the garden." Then our Buddha declared the result of the unwholesome kamma (akusala) committed by that treasurer's son in that brief moment. It is mentioned in the Dhamma in terms of results: "bahūni vassāni, bahūni vassasatāni, bahūni vassasahassāni, bahūni vassasatasahassāni niraye paccitvā"—because of that evil deed committed in that brief moment, the treasurer Suppabuddha boiled in hell for many years, many hundreds of years, many thousands of years, many hundreds of thousands of years. Having boiled there and suffered grave pain, as the residue of that kamma—as the remaining portion—he took birth in this very city as a poor leper. Having thus declared the terrifying results of that evil deed, He uttered that verse of Dhamma which we took as our theme earlier:

Cakkhumā visamānīva

vijjamāne parakkame

paṇḍito jīvalokasmiṃ

pāpāni parivajjaye

"Cakkhumā" means one who has eyes. "Visamāni" means uneven places—potholes, heights, thorny thickets; uneven places are called visama. Just as a person with eyes avoids uneven places on the ground—"Cakkhumā visamānīva, vijjamāne parakkame"—when there is the strength and effort (parakkama) to avoid those uneven places, those potholes and thorny thickets on the ground, when it is possible, if a person has eyes, if they can see, if they have the strength, they go avoiding those potholes and thorny thickets. That is what is expressed here. Showing this simile in this manner: "paṇḍito jīvalokasmiṃ, pāpāni parivajjaye"—likewise, the wise man—the true wise man, the true intelligent one—what does he do? In this living world, in this human world, he completely shuns those things called evil deeds. In that way, our Buddha uttered an advisory verse at that moment.

Therefore, let us reflect on the lessons we can extract for our lives from this verse and also from this story. Even from this present story of Suppabuddha the leper—from that itself, we can take many examples. Now, that Suppabuddha came to the place where our Buddha was preaching the Dhamma while searching for food, having seen a crowd and approaching them. "Perhaps here I can get something to eat," he thought. After drawing near, when he saw that this was a place where a sermon was being preached, he did not turn away with contempt, as some people with materialistic views in this day and age say, "Can we eat the Dhamma?" Instead, what did he do? "I too must listen to a bit of the Dhamma," he thought, and sat down. So, we can understand what arose in that person's mind at that moment: sacrifice, letting go. Now, you devotees also perform giving (dāna) and various meritorious distributions. In all of those, what is expected is this very sacrifice, this letting go. At that moment, he could have turned back to go search for food. Instead, he thought, "It does not matter if there is no food, I must listen to at least a bit of the Dhamma," and sat down. How great were the benefits of that sacrifice! He was able to attain that fruit of stream-entry, which is more noble than even universal monarchy. He was able to gain rebirth in heaven after death. This fruit of stream-entry, then, is the first step on the path to the Nibbāna which consists of Stream-entry, Once-returning, Non-returning, and Arahantship. He attained that state, reducing his saṃsāric suffering (dukkha) to only seven lifetimes and destroying all the rest. He will never again go to the four lower realms. Such a noble state was attained by Suppabuddha the leper through that sacrifice made in his mind.

Next, let us reflect on our Buddha's method of preaching the Dhamma. Our Buddha always preaches the Dhamma targeting the person whose mind is prepared, who has developed saṃsāric intelligence. From this, we can see that just because a person is sitting at the edge of the crowd, our Buddha does not marginalize them. Kings, royal princes, treasurers, extremely wealthy people, high-caste people, learned people, scholars—scholars of the world—might be present in that great crowd. Yet, our Buddha does not preach the Dhamma to them. It is to the person who is advanced in terms of saṃsāric intelligence. When we reflect on this, we can gain a very deep understanding. Our Buddha does not look at the world with the eyes of ordinary society. As we spoke of the condition of the lotus pond or water-lily pond, if we think about it, some flower buds might be hidden among the leaves. In the same way, some individuals might be born poor, destitute, as lepers, and with various other afflictions due to some grave evil deed committed in this world. But that person might have the strength to understand the noble Nibbāna. They might have practiced meditation in past saṃsāra. This can be a very great source of encouragement for someone to turn towards this Dhamma. Therefore, no one can be marginalized. Perhaps even in this very gathering, there might be those in such poor and destitute conditions who think, "We cannot go on this path of Dhamma; we cannot do these things by listening to sermons." But we can take an example from the story of Suppabuddha the leper. Perhaps, despite what they think of themselves, they too might be like those lotus flowers that bloom as soon as they receive the Dhamma-rays—the rays of the Buddha-sun. From this, we can take a valuable lesson.

Next, when our Buddha preached the Dhamma, the way Suppabuddha developed the Dhamma-eye—there it is mentioned: "yaṃ kiñci samudayadhammaṃ sabbaṃ taṃ nirodhadhammaṃ." That deep Dhamma—sometimes many who have learned Dependent Arising (paṭicca-samuppāda) from books make great efforts. Dependent Arising is a deep Dhamma. The fundamental principle of that deep Dhamma is what Suppabuddha the leper understood by listening to just that one sermon. What is its meaning? "Whatever is of the nature to arise, all that is of the nature to cease." That means he understood impermanence (anicca) thoroughly. That everything in the world is of the nature of arising and passing away. Here, "everything" means these five aggregates that we are grasping, called form (rūpa), feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), preparations (saṅkhāra), and consciousness (viññāṇa). This is a heap of form. Here, "the aggregate of form" (rūpakkhandha) means a heap of form. We take it as a single form. By way of the perception of a being (satta-saññā), we take it as one. Because of grasping it as "me" and "mine", worldly people try to beautify form, thinking "this is my form". When a feeling arises, they think "this is my feeling". Perception means recognition; they think "this is what I recognize". Preparations (saṅkhāra), intentions, expectations, and so forth—most of the time, these too are regarded as one. Next is consciousness (viññāṇa). When one says "my mind", one thinks of it as a single mind. These are a multiplicity. Indeed, although worldly people take them as one due to the perception of a being, within each of these, there lies a great heap. That is why in one place our Buddha has given similes—very deep similes. If one contemplates them, one can realize the Nibbāna through any single one of them.

This aggregate of form, this which is called form, is something made of the elements—earth, water, fire, and wind—which make up everything in this world. Next, our Buddha compares this to a lump of foam. When a stream is flowing, if a log is stuck somewhere, foam gradually accumulates there. If one looks at this lump of foam, one sees that it is changing at every moment. It arises and passes away, arises and passes away. In the same way, this cage of a body is made of the foam of milk, the foam of rice, and the foam of gruel. When food is taken throughout the day, this cage of a body is formed from the digestion of these things—this which we call the body. In this way, one can deeply contemplate a lump of foam.

Likewise, feeling (vedanā)—next, our Buddha showed that feeling is like a water bubble. When it rains heavily and water pours from the roof, water bubbles are formed, and in a single moment, in that very instant, they disappear; they do not last long. It is a very short time. When the rain falls, a beautiful little water bubble is formed. It bursts immediately. Feeling is just like that. Although we take it as one, it is like a flash—it is a multiplicity. That is the understanding.

Next, perception (saññā) means recognition. Our Buddha compares recognition to a mirage. You know what a mirage is—during the hot season, on a road or a plain, you can see what looks like flowing water in the distance. Because of the heat, something that trembles and wavers rises up like vapor, visible in the distance. That is called a mirage; from afar, one is deceived into thinking it is water. Thinking that there is water, one runs. As one runs and runs, the mirage recedes. Our Buddha describes this perception, this recognition, as such a thing. We say, "I recognized so-and-so; it is indeed that person and no other." Next, there might be a beautiful sight, perhaps a mirage of some lovely scenery. Thinking it is very beautiful, we might even take a photograph of it, and then, to see that scenery better, let us say we go there. Having gone there, that scenery is not there. When we turn back and look, perhaps that beautiful scenery is now on this side. In this way, perception too is layer upon layer. When examined, there is nothing substantial to be grasped there.

Next, our preparations (saṅkhāra)—our intentions, expectations, thoughts, and all such things—these too, through a simile shown by our Buddha, are like a banana trunk. There is no pith, no substance, no core. There is only a heap of sheaths here, like in a banana trunk. It is not apparent that it is just a heap of sheaths. In that way, they are called preparations (saṅkhāra). The feelings, expectations, and so forth that we generate are also like that.

Next, consciousness (viññāṇa), which we refer to as "my mind". This too is not one. It is something that arises and passes away with extreme rapidity. Furthermore, the things shown by it—it presents various things to this mind, distinguishing one from another. But both this and that, both of these, are of the nature of arising and passing away. This is merely a heap of illusions. Our Buddha compares it to a magician, an illusionist, showing something through sleight of hand. He displays what does not exist as if it exists. In that way, various things are conjured up before our mind; there is a conjuring nature in it.

When this is said, the world does not understand it immediately. Nor do they wish to understand it. But for one who has contemplated deeply on the Three Characteristics of impermanence (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and non-self (anattā) over a long period in saṃsāra, as they think about these things, they understand them deeper and deeper. That penetrative seeing is called wisdom (paññā), the true nature of the world. So, what is meant here is that Suppabuddha the leper understood, through that sermon of our Buddha, Dependent Arising—that everything in this world arises due to causes and conditions. "If anything is of the nature to arise, all that is of the nature to cease." Then, what assists in this is these five aggregates—these five aggregates of grasping (pañcupādānakkhandha) which we hold onto. We hold onto either form, feeling, perception, preparations, or consciousness, labeling them as "me" and "mine". It is when the true state of affairs—the reality—of each of these is understood, pious devotees, that one can realize the noble fruit of stream-entry and so forth through supramundane path-knowledge. Therefore, through this story, we can reflect on these things: we too must have practiced meditation to some extent in saṃsāra. We must make an effort to bring these back to the surface, thinking that they might be buried within us. In that way, we can learn many things from this present story.

Likewise, when we reflect on those five wealths—faith (saddhā), virtue (sīla), learning (suta), generosity (tyāga), and wisdom (paññā)—even through a single sermon, when someone listens to the Dhamma, they develop faith through it. They develop faith in the Triple Gem. Next, when the benefits of virtue are declared, they develop virtue. Our Buddha shows it there as if they are undertaking the precepts. Indeed, during the Buddha's time, when our Buddha preached the Dhamma through the graduated discourse, they undertook them in their minds. Even without specifically asking for and undertaking the precepts, they would think in their minds, "How excellent a practice this is! From today, I shall protect this practice," and thus undertake it in their minds. That is it. They develop faith; they develop virtue. Next, "learning" (suta) means they retain this Dhamma well, bearing it in their minds. Next, as they understand the Dhamma, they realize that what truly must be done is the relinquishing of all these things—sacrifice (tyāga). It is through that sacrifice that the understanding called wisdom (paññā) arises. Generally, worldly knowledge is something gathered, something accumulated. To accumulate and obtain various titles, degrees, and so forth is what is expected from worldly knowledge. But, pious devotees, wisdom (paññā) is described as the power of penetrative seeing, the power of comprehension. It is the emergence of a Dhamma-eye, the emergence of a wisdom-eye, so that what is covered in the world becomes open and visible, or so that what is hidden is clearly seen by one's own eye. In this way, we can reflect on the five benefits of these virtuous qualities. That is the good side.

Next, when we reflect on that past account specifically declared here by our Buddha—which is closely connected to the verse—everyone can develop a great sense of dread. How many grave evil deeds might we commit unknowingly in saṃsāra—in this life? Pious devotees, in the past, that Suppabuddha was a treasurer's son, and by defiling his mind, polluting his mind for just a brief moment, and spitting, whom did he disrespect? Even though he wore a soiled robe, in the forests of that time, before Buddhas arise, a noble class of beings called Paccekabuddhas appear. They attain a certain state of Buddhahood through their own efforts. They cannot make others realize the Nibbāna but they are called "Paccekabuddhas"—private Buddhas. The Buddha, the Paccekabuddha, and the Arahant—these are the three greatest individuals in the world. Therefore, disrespecting the noble treasures of the world is an evil deed that brings extremely grave consequences. This is called the "offense of disparaging the Noble Ones" (ariyūpavāda-kamma). Disrespecting, abusing those who have attained the paths and fruits, such as Buddhas, Paccekabuddhas, Arahants, and Stream-enterers, is declared as the kamma of disparaging the Noble Ones. It is a grave evil deed. That is why he boiled in hell for many years, many hundreds of years, many thousands of years, many hundreds of thousands of years. When we reflect on this, these are the uneven places, the potholes of the world. We must protect ourselves from these, if we have eyes—the eye here means Right View (sammā-ditṭhi), correct seeing. The value of someone having correct seeing is evident from this. Ordinary worldly people are blind. Our Buddha has declared: "andhabhūto ayaṃ loko, tanukettha vipassati"—"This entire world is blind; only a few here see with insight." Therefore, worldly people think they have eyes. To enhance this visible fleshly eye, they buy spectacles. But, pious devotees, our Buddha has declared that the world is blind. So, if one is to dispel blindness—blindness is dispelled to some extent when one understands good and bad, when one understands black and white, when one understands merit and demerit by listening to the Dhamma. Next, what is even deeper is what Suppabuddha the leper did. Understanding that noble fundamental principle of the Dhamma of Dependent Arising, understanding the Four Noble Truths, he developed the eye of wisdom—the Dhamma-eye. It is called the Dhamma-eye (dhammacakkhu). When that eye—the path-knowledge of stream-entry—arises, the doors to the four lower realms are closed forever. That is a massive gain, a gain so immense that it is beyond imagination. Therefore, in the ordinary world, one must protect oneself from these uneven places—from these potholes. In physical travel, falling into these and getting injured is a minor thing. But in this saṃsāra, if we fall by defiling our mind, corrupting our speech, and corrupting our actions, we will have to suffer the grave consequences for aeons. That is the lesson we can take from this past story.

Energy. That is such a thing. So, Suppabuddha the leper committed that mistake in his past life. But in this life, he did not make that mistake. Instead, as if he had learned his lesson well, without showing disrespect to the Dhamma at that moment, without saying "Can we eat the Dhamma?", he sat right there and began to listen to the Dhamma. Let us reflect on what kind of sacrifice that was.

Now, in this verse, our Buddha declares: "Cakkhumā visamānīva, vijjamāne parakkame." When effort/power (parakkama) exists—when hearing the word "parakkama" (power/effort), some might think this is something belonging only to people like King Parākramabāhu. But, pious devotees, our Buddha declares that whether poor or rich, high or low, learned or unlearned, within everyone there exist three types of energy. Our Buddha describes these three energies as ārambha-dhātu (element of initiating energy), nikkama-dhātu (element of exerting energy), and parakkama-dhātu (element of making an effort / overcoming energy). Here, "element" (dhātu) means that fundamental principle. "Ārambha-dhātu", pious devotees, means the energy we all have to start something new. Even a small child has it. Before parents arrive, small children make this and that—that is the initiating energy. The capacity to produce something new. There is such an ārambha-dhātu. Next, "nikkama-dhātu" means, having initiated something, we have the energy within us to carry it on continuously. Next, "parakkama-dhātu" means the victorious energy to crush, conquer, and move forward against the obstacles and difficulties that arise while carrying it on. That too is present in this mental continuum. What was meant here by "vijjamāne parakkame" is that one can avoid these things with such effort. One can abandon these, avoid these. While there is such capacity, and when one's eyes can see, our Buddha asks, "Why do you do these things?"

Therefore, at that moment, what Suppabuddha the leper did was also a certain act of effort (parakkama). That is, he conquered his mind. The mind might say, "No, go find some food, there is no use listening to this." Perhaps he felt that way too; it is not mentioned in the story. Generally, if a poor person is hungry, they feel that way. Yet, this person sat right there, thinking "I must listen to a bit of Dhamma." That too is a victory. It was through that effort (parakkama) that Suppabuddha the leper attained that noble state of stream-entry, achieving a victory far greater than even universal monarchy. Now, as soon as we hear the word "parakkama" (power/effort/valor), we often think of battle—warfare. Our Buddha also made use of this word. For the Buddhist, too, there is a battle. Not only for those ordained, but even for the layperson, there is a battle. It is called the battle against Māra (the battle with death/defilements). There is also a battle-cry given by our Buddha for this battle against Māra—not only in this Dispensation, but in the Dispensation of all Buddhas. There is a battle-cry in a very beautiful verse:

Ārabhatha nikkamatha

yuñjatha buddhasāsane

dhunātha maccuno senaṃ

naḷāgāraṃva kuñjaro

— there is such a battle-cry. If we translate this into Sinhala:

"Arouse yourself! Exert yourself!

Commit yourself to the Buddha's Dispensation!

Deconstruct/Destroy the army of Death,

As an elephant crushes a reed-hut!"

There is such a battle-cry. So, when worldly people think of battle, of war, they think of defeating and killing other human beings, and winning thereby. That is what the world thinks of as effort (parakkama), valor, heroism, and greatness. But even if we think so, our Buddha, it seems, did not think that way. Because our Buddha has declared in the Dhammapada:

"Yo sahaṣṣaṃ sahaṣṣena*

saṅgāme mānuse jine

ekañca jeyya attānaṃ

sa ve saṅgāmajuttamo

— thus."

Though a brave and heroic warrior goes to battle and defeats a million men—this one warrior—yet he defeats a million enemies. Think of what a feat that is! One person defeating a million enemies. Our Buddha next shows something greater than that: "ekañca jeyya attānaṃ, sa ve saṅgāmajuttamo"—but to conquer this single "self" which one thinks of as "myself". Conquering oneself—this is called "self-conquest" (ātma-vijaya). "Conquering oneself" means through giving, virtue, and meditation; by cultivating virtue, concentration, and wisdom; by developing those virtuous qualities—the qualities of the Dispensation—practicing meditation, and thereby penetrating the noble paths and fruits of Stream-entry, Once-returning, Non-returning, and Arahantship, to realize the noble Dhamma of the Nibbāna. It is to conquer the entirety of saṃsāric suffering (dukkha) and the death-dealer of defilements. Now, our Buddha too waged that battle against Māra and is declared to have conquered the army of Māra. This army of Māra resides in this mind. Ultimately, in a deep sense, what is declared here is an army of Māra arising in the mind. Therefore, here, our Buddha made use of the concept of "war" and "battle" to bring out the power of effort—initiating energy, exerting energy, and overcoming energy—within man. Now, you are preparing to perform some feat. For that, you get well equipped, dressed in matching attire, armed with weapons, and ready. Next, you go forward prepared. As you go forward, there are enemies. Completely attacking those enemies, crushing them, you win. That is what effort (parakkama) is. Thus: ārambha-dhātu, nikkama-dhātu, parakkama-dhātu. Based on these three energies, we conquer even the difficulties that come in our day-to-day lives.

If that is so, then our Buddha shows a victory far greater than that—conquering oneself, self-conquest. We must reflect according to that concept of self-conquest: every victory we win in this world ultimately becomes a defeat when viewed from the perspective of the next life. If a possessor of higher knowledges (abhiññā-lābhī), a Buddha, were to declare where some of these conquerors go and are reborn, what a sense of urgency and dismay (saṃvega) would arise! Those whom we think of as heroic and brave are sometimes reborn in very sorrowful places after death. This is the nature of the world, the saṃsāric condition. But our Buddha has shown us the truth of these things, even if we do not like it. Therefore, if one is a wise person, if one has eyes, if one has that correct seeing called Right View (sammā-diṭṭhi), one must accept the word of the Buddha. Thus, "sa ve saṅgāmajuttamo"—"saṅgāmajī" means the one who has won the battle. The path to that is, in this world, to shun those evil deeds, to remove unwholesome states, and to constantly incline the mind towards the wholesome—by mind, body, and speech—protecting the three doors of mind, body, and speech. Now, we protect our fort, if we have one, from enemies. Without letting enemies enter, we guard it day and night. In the same way, the meditator, the practitioner, or the one who hopes for the Nibbāna protects their three doors of mind, body, and speech while cultivating those qualities of virtue, concentration, and wisdom. When we reflect even deeper, there are six doors: the eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind. In this way, by guarding these doors, one guards the fort. Next, instead, one cultivates the good side—that virtue, the quality of concentration. Through concentration, one unifies the mind. Removing the scattered nature of the mind, one then generates the penetrative power of wisdom (paññā) in one's mental continuum, and it is through that wisdom that one realizes the Nibbāna and conquers all saṃsāric suffering (dukkha).

Therefore, one must make an effort to bring out this power of effort (parakkama)—for the battle against Māra that must be waged for this. We must start this from where we are. In day-to-day life, there are various obstacles to these things. In day-to-day life—now, many people live attached and deeply immersed in life, just like those lotus buds and water-lily buds submerged in water. But our Buddha has declared that no one should defile their mind based on the social level they find themselves in externally. If they have made a beginning, they might obtain those states much faster than they expected. Suppabuddha the leper would not have even thought, when he went there, that he would receive such a noble state. Yet, he obtained it. In that way. What assists in that is "the perception of capability" (haki-saññā). Pious devotees, "the perception of capability" means the understanding that "I can do this". Now, we know that when we need to roll something over or remove it, as soon as we think "I cannot do it", we are defeated right there. We must make at least an intentional effort. Having generated the effort, thinking "I must do this", we next think "I can do this". That is called "the perception of capability". It is by putting forward "the perception of capability" in this manner that we must tread this path of Dhamma.

Our Buddha has assured us that we can tread this path. Sometimes, like a mother persuading her child to drink a bitter medicine, our Buddha declares to the monks—even if He declares it to the monks, He is declaring it to the entire world: "Monks, these unwholesome states (akusala) can be abandoned, can be eliminated. It is possible to be freed from them. It is possible to destroy them. In the same way, wholesome states (kusala) can be developed. Monks, if it were not possible to destroy these unwholesome states, I would not tell you to do so. It is because it is possible to destroy unwholesome states that I tell you to do so, monks." In this way, He sometimes declares it with persuasion. At other times, to increase that effort, He says, "Monks, if you abandon just two things, I guarantee that you will become Non-returners (Anāgāmi): abandon greed (lobha) and hatred (dosa)." Because of this persuasive nature, sometimes instead of saying "our Buddha", we call Him "our Buddha-Mother" or "our Deathless-Mother" (Amā-maṇi). It is because of that great compassionate quality.

Therefore, according to that Dhamma of our Buddha, we must reflect on our own lives. By listening to this story, what we expect is—this Dhamma story is not a fabricated story, a novel, or a short story. These are true events. The way those individuals met our Buddha during the Buddha's time and attained those noble states. These are good examples and lessons for us. Through these, we must understand that this energy can exist within us too, and we must make an effort to bring it out. Now, on this occasion too, you devotees undertook a valuable virtue called the Eight Precepts with Livelihood as the Eighth (ājīva-aṭṭhamaka-sīla). One must reflect on each of these virtuous practices. What do we do through these? What do we do by undertaking these precepts? When saying "samādiyāmi", I make a determination that I abstain from taking life, that is, from killing animals and so forth. In protecting that determination too, one can gain an understanding of those states called ārambha-dhātu, nikkama-dhātu, and parakkama-dhātu. I determined that I will not kill animals. But due to various reasons—for whatever reason—either for food, or for entertainment, or due to the instigation of others, or to obtain more wealth, or to satisfy hatred, thoughts to kill animals arise. A thought comes. But as soon as that thought comes, next, on this path of Dhamma, in the manner of ārambha-dhātu, nikkama-dhātu, parakkama-dhātu, one must recollect this virtuous practice. "It is not good to do that. There are such consequences. I have undertaken the Five Precepts; I have undertaken the Precepts with Livelihood as the Eighth. This is one practice of this virtue. I myself have accepted this and promised to practice it," and thus one makes an effort to protect it. Making such an effort, at some point, one completely pushes away that unwholesome thought from the mind. Sometimes, it is difficult to push it away like that. At times, one even has to fight with it. "It doesn't matter—even if there are consequences, let us do this," the mind says. "It cannot be helped at this moment. This is 'timely', 'appropriate'. According to the moment, we must do this"—in this way, those unwholesome states arise from deep within the mind. That is indeed Māra standing behind and saying, "Do it, do it." It is there that one must next employ faith. Faith in the Triple Gem, deep faith, thinking, "The Buddha's word is indeed true." Reflecting in that way, and thinking, "No, I shall not break this," and thus firmly reflecting and driving away the unwholesome thoughts—that indeed is effort (parakkama). It is the same regarding theft, sexual misconduct, lying, harsh speech, and those unwholesome states, and ultimately, those wrong livelihoods (micchā-ājīva)—for many, carrying on this livelihood seems impossible without doing them. But even regarding those, one must make an effort to see if it is impossible. Trading in weapons, trading in poisons, trading in intoxicants, breeding animals for slaughter, trading in meat—regarding such things, regarding life, we must reflect on whether we cannot conquer them. Because there is a terrifying side of consequences to these.

In the Buddha's Dispensation, there was the great Venerable Moggallāna. Venerable Moggallāna had a special power—his power of higher knowledges (abhiññā). Because of that, and because of his noble parami power, he would go to the heavens and ask the devas about the merit that helped them obtain those states. Next, he would go to the hells and ask the beings in hell about the cause for their suffering—what evil deeds they had committed. Through that, he declared to the world: "These are the terrifying consequences; do not do these things because of this." If we have to pay for these in saṃsāric time for a long period, there is no use in performing these "feats" in a single life. Therefore, we must make a special effort to be freed from saṃsāra. This terrifying nature of the mind—it is unpredictable when it will incline towards evil. Therefore, "protecting" this mind is what is called meditation. To destroy these promptings of the mind, these things the mind says, we must systematically practice some meditation. We must make an effort to calm the mind. Now, it was when the mind of Suppabuddha the leper was calmed and clear that our Buddha declared that deep Dhamma. In that way, one must make an effort to concentrate one's mind. In day-to-day life, practicing "recollection of the Buddha" (buddhānussati)—by constantly reflecting on the qualities of the Buddha—loving-kindness meditation (mettā-bhāvanā), also meditation on foulness (asubha-bhāvanā), and mindfulness of death (maraṇasati)—you devotees know these are called the Four Guardian Meditations. By constantly practicing such things, one must keep the mind, which runs to the world, within a deep wholesome thought, and make an effort to unify the mind.

Likewise, there is a great power in that unified mind. When this flowing water is collected in a reservoir, and taken through certain pipes, or taken from mountains through tunnels, and when this water is brought through a single pipe, what is it used for? To spin an iron wheel. This flowing water has enough power to spin an iron wheel. But there is a special technique to develop this. In the same way, this mind, this scattered mind—one must concentrate it. Having concentrated it, one must next make an effort to look at the true nature of the world with that concentrated mind. Suppabuddha the leper must have used the consequences of that evil deed to develop disillusionment regarding these five aggregates. Now, if someone is beautiful and strong, if they are proud of their body, it is difficult for them to understand that this form (rūpa) is suffering (dukkha), that it is a heap of diseases. Our Buddha calls this cage of a body "a nest of diseases" (roga-nīlaṃ), "a fragile framework". Our Buddha declares it is a nest of diseases that can break apart. At other times, it is declared in the Dhamma as "a great wound with nine openings" (navadvāro mahāvaṇo). Hearing these, some might even get angry. "Why did our Buddha disparage this?" Those who got angry in this way are mentioned in stories like that of Māgandiyā. But the one who has faith in our Buddha reflects, "This is true." And that can be understood by someone who has physical weakness. No one else needs to say it. Everyone disgusts this body if it is a leper. Then, when he reached that state, Suppabuddha the leper, like a "blessing in disguise", made use of the consequences of that evil deed. In that way, we must reflect that to travel on this path of the Nibbāna we should not think of realizing the Nibbāna after this country overflows with milk and honey, obtaining a prosperous life, and becoming wealthy. If we have some shortcomings—whether in wealth, or in body, or through diseases and afflictions—we must use that very thing to bring out that energy called ārambha-dhātu, nikkama-dhātu, parakkama-dhātu. Why? Most of the time, we learn the lesson from the consequences themselves. It is only after the teacher beats us that the "sum" is solved correctly. In that way, although we have suffered endless afflictions from Māra in this disobedient saṃsāra, we did not learn the lesson from them. Our Buddha has shown us the way to learn that lesson.

Therefore, you devotees should be glad now that the time was spent to shape our lives by making use of the Dhamma preached by our Buddha. On this occasion, you made a determination to observe a valuable virtue called the Eight Precepts with Livelihood as the Eighth. Likewise, during the time of listening to the Dhamma, we must think that we made an effort to cultivate five faculties (indriya), five powers (bala), which will assist us in realizing the Nibbāna on some day. It is by bringing out the five faculties of faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom (saddhā, viriya, sati, samādhi, paññā) that one realizes the Nibbāna. Faith is a faculty. "Faculty" (indriya) means a state of dominance, a dominant state in one's mental continuum. One must adorn this—faith. Next, one must bring out energy—viriya. One must turn the faculty of energy into a dominant state. Next, mindfulness (sati)—mindfulness, next concentration (samādhi), next wisdom (paññā)—this helps to cultivate, to generate these faculty-Dhammas. If one has generated those faculties, they become "powers" (bala) for that person: the power of faith (saddhā-bala), power of energy (viriya-bala), power of mindfulness (sati-bala), power of concentration (samādhi-bala), power of wisdom (paññā-bala). At this moment, you engaged in listening to the Dhamma in a way that serves as a powerful supportive condition (upanissaya) to generate them. You must reflect that many wholesome thoughts were deposited in our mental continuum moment by moment. From them, many saṃsāric benefits will flow. There is no need to speak of that separately. But more than all of that, we must reflect on the nature of suffering (dukkha) in saṃsāra, which our Buddha has declared on countless occasions. Therefore, in this rare era of a Buddha's appearance, we must use all the wholesome wealth we can obtain—we must "invest" these—for the Nibbāna for the peace of the Nibbāna to bring an end to this saṃsāric suffering (dukkha).

Reflecting in this way, may we, by the power of this mass of merit accumulated through listening to the Dhamma and undertaking the precepts for this long, be able in this very life, if possible, like Suppabuddha the leper, through the penetration of the paths and fruits of Stream-entry and so forth, to end all saṃsāric suffering (dukkha) of birth (jāti), aging (jarā), sickness, and death (maraṇa) in the noble, deathless Nibbāna. Thus you must make an aspiration. Likewise, if there are any sāsana-protecting deities, or deities presiding over this sacred place, who are expecting merits, expecting the Nibbāna may they all rejoice in this mass of merit accumulated by us through preaching and listening to the Dhamma. Having rejoiced, may they realize the noble, deathless Nibbāna through a path of awakening of their aspiration. Likewise, not only our relatives who have passed away and gone to the next world, but all beings from Avīci to Akaniṭṭha who desire merit and desire the Nibbāna may they all rejoice in this mass of merit of ours, be freed from all saṃsāric suffering (dukkha) of birth, aging, sickness, and death, and find peace in the noble, deathless, unconditioned (asaṅkhata), supreme, and stilled mind of Nibbāna. Reflecting thus, share the merits by reciting these verses:

Verse 33 and 34 from the Cittavagga (Chapter on the Mind) of the Dhammapada

Dear Listeners,

Today, this Poya day is conventionally referred to as the 'Ada Vesak' (Half-Vesak) Poya. Even the mere mention of the word 'Vesak' is sufficient to arouse a deep strength of faith (saddhā) in devout Buddhists towards the Buddha, his life, and his immense store of virtues. We all know that what we call a Buddha is a spiritual friend (kalyāṇa-mitta) who points out the path to Nibbāna at a time when beings in this saṃsāra, having burned for an extremely long time in this saṃsāric suffering (dukkha / unsatisfactoriness / stress), oppression, and fire, direct their minds toward [real] life. The Buddha himself has declared himself to be a spiritual friend to the world.

With the appearance of a Buddha, we are afforded the opportunity to receive instructions that reveal this path to Nibbāna. Now, what is called saṃsāra is a journey akin to travelling in a circle. When one tries to escape from this circle—to direct the mind toward that noble state of deliverance called escape (nissaraṇa) or Nibbāna—the mind, accustomed to the momentum of running in this circle, does not listen. Because of saṃsāric habits, this is no easy task.

Considering the past, this is like an attempt to escape from the kingdom of Māra, to break free from it. It is like the effort made to escape from the kingdom of Māra after having been his subjects for an exceedingly long time. This is something that must be done with extremely intense effort and exertion. If one enters upon this task thinking it is an easy one, they will very quickly have to retreat. Therefore, the person who hopes to realize Nibbāna, who is preparing to strive for the realization of Nibbāna, must first gain some understanding of the saṃsāric weaknesses, the deceptive states (vañcaka dhamma), and the obstacles of Māra that may arise in one's mind. It is the Buddha who reveals this matter to us. The Buddha is indeed that greatest and most noble being, the spiritual friend (kalyāṇa-mitta), who can give us timely advice regarding the obstacles that may arise in this journey to Nibbāna.

Now, the two verses we have taken as our theme demonstrate the weaknesses, deceptive states, and forces of Māra that generally hold sway in the mind of a saṃsāric being. Just as these verses provide some understanding of these things, they also contain guidance on how they can be overcome, along with helpful instructions. The introductory story (nidāna kathā) that occasioned the preaching of these verses is as follows:

On one occasion, the Buddha was residing on the Cālika mountain. At that time, a venerable monk named Meghiya was serving as his attendant. One day, Venerable Meghiya approached the Buddha and asked permission to go for alms to the nearby village of Jantu. The Buddha granted permission. Thereupon, Venerable Meghiya took his bowl and double-robe, entered the village for alms, and after his alms-round, was walking up and down on the bank of the Kimikālā river. In the meantime, he saw a highly beautiful mango grove nearby. Seeing it, he thought, "Ah! This mango grove is sufficient for a son of a noble family preparing to strive for Nibbāna. This is the best place. I must obtain permission from the Blessed One and come here to meditate."

Later, in the evening, he visited the Buddha, and said to him: "Venerable Sir, when I went to the village of Jantu for alms today, I saw a place like this. It occurred to me that this is quite sufficient for a son of a noble family to arouse energy for Nibbāna. It is a good place, a delightful place. If the Blessed One grants me permission, I would like to go to that place to meditate." Then the Buddha said: "Meghiya, I am alone at this moment. Wait a little until another monk arrives." But Venerable Meghiya did not comply. Once again, he said to the Blessed One: "Venerable Sir, you have nothing more to do. Everything has been completed by you. Furthermore, there is nothing new to be added to the state you have attained. As for me, I still have much work ahead. To attain Nibbāna, I have many things to do by way of meditation to add to what I have done. Therefore, if the Blessed One permits me, I shall go."

For the second time, the Blessed One said: "Meghiya, I am alone at this moment. Wait until another monk arrives." Yet, he did not comply. For the third time, he pleaded, saying that the Blessed One has nothing more to do, but that he has work to do. "Therefore, if the Blessed One permits me..."—here the word padhāna is used. Padhāna means intense exertion/striving. "If you permit me to apply padhāna exertion for meditation, I shall go there." At that moment, the Buddha neutrally remarked: "Well, Meghiya, if you say you are going to apply padhāna exertion, what can we say? Then, do as you wish." Thus the Buddha gave permission "neutrally."

So, Venerable Meghiya went to the said mango grove with great expectations and determination. Having gone there, he prepared a seat in a good spot under a fine mango tree, and sat down for meditation. But despite sitting down for meditation, from the very moment he sat down, streams of thoughts (vitakka) started flooding his mind—unwholesome thoughts: thoughts of sensual desire (kāma-vitakka), thoughts of ill-will (byāpāda-vitakka), and thoughts of cruelty (vihimsā-vitakka). As you, devout practitioners, know, these are the opposites of Right Intention (sammā-saṅkappa) in the Noble Eightfold Path—wrong thoughts (micchā-saṅkappa): thoughts of sensual desire, ill-will, and cruelty. These came flooding into his mind. He tried to meditate the entire evening. He could not unify his mind. He could not collect it. Instantly, a great sense of urgency (saṃvega) arose in him: "Alas, I am one who went forth into homelessness with great faith (saddhā). Isn't it a great wonder that such thoughts still flood my mind?" Then, in the evening, he returned to the Buddha and said: "Venerable Sir, I went there and sat down for meditation. From the moment I sat down, grand thoughts of sensual desire, ill-will, and cruelty have been flooding in." At that moment, the Buddha delivered a very valuable sermon: "Meghiya, if a person's concentration (samādhi) is not strong, not mature, there are five things, five factors, that help to mature that concentration, to bring it to maturity. What are those five factors?"

"What is the first factor? It is when a monk has a good spiritual friend (kalyāṇa-mitta), possessing the blessing of a spiritual friend. That is the first factor: having a spiritual friend. What is the second factor? A monk is complete in the virtue (sīla) appropriate to him. That is, he protects his training rules properly, seeing danger in the slightest faults, training himself in accordance with the training rules, and maintaining discipline. He has perfected his virtue. What is meant there is being virtuous. Next, what is the third factor? That monk gets the opportunity to hear Dhamma discussions conducive to Nibbāna, bringing thoughts of Nibbāna, which are called the ten subjects of talk (dasa-kathāvatthu). What are the ten subjects of talk shown in the Dhamma? Here, the Buddha lists them one by one: talk on wanting little (appicchatā-kathā), talk on contentment (santutṭhi-kathā), talk on seclusion (paviveka-kathā), talk on aloofness/dissociation (asaṃsagga-kathā), talk on arousing energy (viriyārambha-kathā), talk on virtue (sīla-kathā), talk on concentration (samādhi-kathā), talk on wisdom (paññā-kathā), talk on deliverance (vimutti-kathā), and talk on the knowledge and vision of deliverance (vimutti-ñāṇadassana-kathā). These are the ten subjects of talk."

If we understand them briefly: talk on wanting little (appicchatā-kathā) means talks about having few desires. Here, "talks," dear practitioners, refers to things heard during a sermon or a Dhamma discussion. Suppose that monk gets to hear a Dhamma discussion or a sermon where his spiritual friends (kalyāṇa-mitta) explain the benefits of having few desires—this is appicchatā-kathā. Next, talk on contentment (santutṭhi-kathā) means talks on being satisfied with what one has. Talk on seclusion (paviveka-kathā) means talks about living in deep seclusion and its value—its benefits. Next, talk on aloofness/dissociation (asaṃsagga-kathā) means separating oneself from crowds, leaving the herd. As you, dear practitioners, know, if you look at wild buffaloes or other animals, they have a tendency to move in herds. Generally, even humans have made it a habit to live in herds. To live without the herd, without crowds, is a great science to many; that is why it is called asaṃsagga-kathā. It is the value of living while protecting the mind from the herd and the currents that come with the herd—asaṃsagga—meaning the benefits of living without association with crowds. Next, talk on arousing energy (viriyārambha-kathā) means talk on arousing effort—the benefits of putting forth effort and arousing energy to burn away defilements, to draw wholesome qualities near, and to remove unwholesome qualities. What follows is understood by the words themselves. Talk on virtue (sīla-kathā) means talks on virtue. Talk on concentration (samādhi-kathā) means talks on concentration. Talk on wisdom (paññā-kathā) means talks on wisdom. Talk on deliverance (vimutti-kathā) means talks on Nibbāna. Talk on the knowledge and vision of deliverance (vimutti-ñāṇadassana-kathā) means talks on the knowledges related to Nibbāna. In this way, getting the opportunity to hear matters regarding the ten subjects of talk is a valuable gain for a monk to prepare his mind. Next, it is said: making use of that, what is the fourth factor? A monk applies himself to the task of removing unwholesome thoughts and drawing near wholesome qualities with intense energy, relentless energy, and energetic exertion. This is called aroused energy (ārabdha-viriya). That is the fourth factor. What is the fifth factor? A monk possesses the deep insight-knowledge that sees arising and passing away, or what is called udayabbaya—that is, a deep understanding of the impermanent / inconstant (anicca) nature of the world. He becomes one who has a penetrating wisdom that constantly sees arising and passing away.

These five factors are highly helpful for a person to prepare their mind before going to meditate. What are the five factors? If we mention them briefly: a monk—though we say "monk," dear practitioners, you can understand this as applying even to any meditating practitioner (yogāvacara)—has a spiritual friend (kalyāṇa-mitta).

"Friend" is not used in the ordinary social sense—as you, dear practitioners, know, a spiritual friend in the Dispensation is not someone who merely puts an arm around your shoulder. In society, a "friend" or "companion" is someone with whom one associates in good or bad times. That is not what is meant by "spiritual friend" here; that is not why the word is used. When the Buddha speaks of a kalyāṇa-mitta, we can understand how deep a word this "friend"—kalyāṇa-mitta—is. He is a teacher whom one must worship, respect, and from whom one must receive advice.

Therefore, the first factor mentioned here is association with a teacher. The second factor is being virtuous in the virtue (sīla) appropriate to oneself. The third factor is the ten subjects of talk in that manner. Just as described for the Saṅgha, it is the opportunity for lay practitioners as well to hear Dhamma discussions, Dhamma talks, sermons, etc., regarding Nibbāna and relating to Nibbāna, to help their meditation. Next, the fourth factor is applying effort, intense effort, unwavering effort on one's own part in accordance with that. The fifth factor is one's own power of wisdom (paññā): applying well-established mindfulness (sati) and wisdom to engage in the task. These five factors are fundamental and primary for anyone embarking on the work of Nibbāna with deep intention.

Having said this, the Buddha declared: "Meghiya, one who has brought their concentration to maturity with the support of these five qualities, these five factors, must next develop four meditations. What are they? Here they are shown: Foulness (asubha) must be developed for the abandoning of lust (rāga). As you, dear practitioners, know, the meditation on foulness is practiced to free the mind from lust (rāga)—the attachment that is a grave defilement carried along for a long time in saṃsāra. Next, loving-kindness (mettā) must be developed for the removal of ill-will (byāpāda), which means hatred and anger. Now you know that with these two, the Buddha has declared the medicine for both attachment and aversion. Next, thirdly—as the third meditation—mindfulness of breathing (ānāpānasati) must be developed. Mindfulness of breathing (ānāpānasati), which is the establishing of mindfulness on inhalation and exhalation, must be developed. Its purpose, the main objective, is the cutting off of thoughts (vitakkupaccheda). Applying the mind to one's inhalation and exhalation helps to cut off thoughts. Generally, when thoughts come flooding, one does not even remember that one is breathing. Yet, when one directs the mind, even with difficulty, to this subtle process, thoughts find no room. That is why it was declared that mindfulness of breathing is especially helpful for cutting off thoughts. Next, what is the fourth meditation shown? The Buddha has enjoined: 'Develop the perception of the impermanent / inconstant (anicca).' Keep the perception of the impermanent / inconstant (anicca) constantly present. That helps to eradicate the conceit 'I am' (asmimāna). The deep conceit called asmimāna, which lies beneath the ordinary pride, arrogance, and haughtiness of the world, is the extremely subtle part: the conceit 'I am' (asmi). The perception of the impermanent / inconstant (anicca) helps to remove that."

In this manner, the Buddha taught four meditations. Having declared this, he explained to Venerable Meghiya the connection between them, and showed the reason for presenting them so. There, the perception of the impermanent / inconstant (anicca) was given as the meditation. He shows how, through the perception of the impermanent / inconstant (anicca) itself, one can proceed to Nibbāna. "Meghiya, in one who has the perception of the impermanent / inconstant (anicca), the perception of not-self / non-self / unsubstantial (anattā) becomes established. One who has the perception of not-self / non-self / unsubstantial (anattā) removes the conceit 'I am' (asmimāna)—the subtle conceit 'I am'—and in this very life (diṭṭhe va dhamme), in this world, right here, attains that calming of all saṃsāric suffering (dukkha / unsatisfactoriness / stress), that extinguishment, the noble state of Nibbāna." Having declared so, he uttered two verses as joyful utterances (udāna gāthā) at that moment. Those are not the verses we took as our theme earlier, but were spoken in addition to them. The Buddha spoke two verses there demonstrating the pressure caused to a person by thoughts and his own freedom from them.

Khuddā vitakkā sukhumā vitakkā,

Anugatā manaso uppilāvā;

Ete avidvā manaso vitakke,

Hurāhuraṃ dhāvati bhantacitto.

That means: minor thoughts, subtle thoughts—khuddā vitakkā, sukhumā vitakkā, anugatā manaso uppilāvā—thoughts that float on the mind, arising from within the mind itself. These thoughts—ete avidvā—the ignorant person, not knowing these thoughts arising in the mind—manaso vitakke—hurāhuraṃ dhāvati bhantacitto—becomes exhausted, bewildered, and runs hither and thither, just as it happened to Venerable Meghiya. They run from this side to that side, driven by these thoughts inside the mind. As you, dear practitioners, know, although the physical body might not move back and forth according to the thoughts in the mind, it is as if one is running hither and thither. Just as we see an ordinary animal running here and there in accordance with its thoughts, a person with a distracted mind falls into such a restless state. Thus, referring to the person who cannot tame their thoughts, the verse describes this, and the next verse shows:

Ete ca vidvā manaso vitakke, ātāpiyo saṃvaratī satīmā;

Anugate manaso uppilāve, asesam'ete pajahāsi buddho.

Here, next, he declared regarding himself. Recognizing this kind of thoughts, this host of thoughts—ete ca vidvā manaso vitakke, ātāpiyo saṃvaratī satīmā—the Buddha, or the wise person, what does he do? ātāpī means, with defilement-burning energy and mindfulness (sati), he restrains them. He restrains these thoughts. He tames them. Here, what was declared by way of this joyful utterance (udāna gāthā) is that the Buddha is entirely free from all such thoughts arising in the mind.

What was the mistake made by Venerable Meghiya? Now we can understand that Venerable Meghiya went for a good purpose—for intense striving (padhāna-viriya). That is why the Buddha finally said, "If you say so, what can we say? Then go." But he went before the right time had arrived. He was too hasty. That is what we must consider. Meditation is a good idea, but Venerable Meghiya was too hasty. Moreover, he committed a serious mistake: disobeying the words of the Buddha. He made that request for the third time. That is a grave action, almost like an antagonistic karma (āṇāticchevaka / acts of defiance). Its very consequence is enough to make the mind restless. It is that serious. Coming as an attendant, forgetting his duties of service, forgetting his duties toward the Buddha, and ignoring the advice, he went to meditate in that manner. It was a grand idea, but he was not ready for the task. The mind was not yet prepared.

Now, even if one is given a car to drive, or buys a new car, if one does not know how to drive it, one goes around with an 'L' board for a while, keeping another person beside them. Similarly, this monk was a person who should have taken instructions from the Buddha and proceeded at the proper time. But he was hasty, also due to pride and conceit (māna). That is why he even uttered words like, "The Buddha has finished his work, but I have not." So, to address this, the Buddha delivered the verses we took as our theme earlier, revealing the nature of the mind, the character of a mind.

Phandanam capalam cittam

durakkham dunnivārayam

ujum karoti medhāvī

usukāro'va tejanam

It comes with an excellent simile. As you, dear practitioners, know, in these Dhammapada verses—and this too is a verse from the Citta Vagga—the Buddha gives wonderful similes. Here, describing the nature of this mind: "Phandanam capalam cittam - durakkham dunnivārayam." This mind—phandanam means it trembles or wavers. This is explained as the trembling nature of the mind in an ordinary saṃsāric being in the presence of sense objects like forms and sounds. That mind wavers—phandanam—and capalam, it is also fickle. Now, Venerable Meghiya went with the intention of realizing Nibbāna, yet the mind was fickle. Ultimately, it was overcome even by thoughts of sensual desire. This is the nature of the mind; there is nothing strange about it. This is a condition to be expected. Why? Because a mind that has run for so long in the circular track of saṃsāra cannot be pulled out of it all of a sudden. That saṃsāric momentum is still active. A quite powerful momentum must arise from within to counter it. That is where those five factors, such as association with a teacher, help. So—phandanam capalam—this mind is fickle. You know what "fickle" means; there is no need to explain it anew. It does not refer merely to being fickle in speech. We often use "fickle" (capala) regarding words, but here "fickle" means the mind does something else other than what it set out to do. That is why it is said, "Wavering, fickle is the mind."

"Durakkham" means, just as it is difficult to guard ripening paddy from cattle, similarly, it is difficult to guard the object of meditation (kammaṭṭhāna), to maintain the mind on the object of meditation—"durakkham"—in short, this mind is difficult to guard. Likewise, "dunnivārayam" means it is difficult to restrain the mind from wandering to unwholesome objects. The mind is difficult to guard. When it tries to break free and burst out, restraining it is not easy. That is the condition of the mind. Declaring the truth as it is, is the characteristic feature of the Buddha's Dhamma teachings. Thus, these weaknesses of the mind are to be expected. "Ujūṃ karoti medhāvī"—but what does the wise person, the intelligent one, do? He straightens the crooked, bent, and fickle mind. How? Here is the simile: "usukāro'va tejanam"—just as a fletcher straightens an arrow. Straightening an arrow: let us imagine bringing a suitable piece of wood with good core from the forest, cleaning it, and then, if it is bent, straightening it by heating it over fire or using some other method, then oiling it, seasoning it, and sharpening it well to make an arrow. Once the arrow is made, it is so strong and performs such a great task that a skilled archer can split a horsehair at a distance by the flash of lightning. You have heard this simile: "To shoot a horsehair in the dark from afar—if the flash of lightning is missed, the shot goes wrong." Realizing Nibbāna is a similar thing. What is meant there is sharpening the power of wisdom (paññā) to realize Nibbāna. All of this is done through the mind. Just as a fletcher seasons, straightens, and sharpens an arrow with systematic effort, the wise person straightens his mind—this mind with such weaknesses—so it is declared.

Vārijo'va thale khitto

okamokata-ubbhato

pariphandat'idam cittam

māradheyyam pahātave

Here too, a simile is given. Water is the home of the fish. Just as a fish taken out from that home of water and thrown onto the dry land flutters this way and that, when one tries to depart from the familiar realm of Māra, this mind trembles this way and that, just 'like a fish drawn from water'. Thus, the Buddha has shown the state of the mind in these two verses.

Therefore, this is a highly valuable Sutta sermon for us in several ways. Now, with the help of that story, we can gather what is lacking. Here, we have shown the general meaning of the verses. Even if we think about the story, as we mentioned earlier, the intention of a meditating practitioner (yogāvacara) to realize Nibbāna is good. That desire is good. Yet, the mind must be prepared in a manner suitable for it—for this, desire (chanda), meaning a strong desire, is required. First of all, the primary factor is receiving guidance. That is why association with a spiritual friend (kalyāṇamitta) is necessary. Next, there must be a powerful desire—what is called chanda. A person must truly arouse a powerful desire within themselves. Now, Venerable Meghiya thought that simply because he ordained with the intention of realizing Nibbāna, or with great faith (saddhā), these defilements would not flood his mind. Thinking so, he fell into that state of urgency (saṃvega). But this is a natural law (dhammatā).

Let us think of it in terms of a vehicle, as we did before. When a car is parked in a garage, it does not meet with accidents. A car in a garage never experiences things like road accidents. It is only from the moment it is taken out onto the road that it has to face accidents. Similarly, as long as the practitioner (yogāvacara) is merely thinking about meditating, there is no danger. It is on the day they actually plunge into it and go into seclusion that the oppressions of Māra arrive. That is the situation. It is to be expected. The Buddha advises us to go prepared for this. In that way, there must be association with a teacher. One must follow instructions with respect. Next, there must be a powerful desire (chanda). Next, one must be complete in virtue (sīla). If one is not virtuous, regrets arise. When one goes and sits down, thoughts about regrets flood in: "Alas, I have done such and such, haven't I?"

Now, you, dear practitioners, know. A person who meditates, who strives to bring the mind to concentration (samādhi), must know about the five hindrances (nīvaraṇa) that obstruct that concentration, in some way or another—whether by name or in general. If we translate the terms kāmachanda, byāpāda, thīna-middha, uddhacca-kukkucca, vicikicchā into plain language, they are: thoughts regarding sensual desires, or sensual thoughts; next, thoughts of ill-will; next, sleepiness and sluggishness; next, restlessness and regret (uddhacca-kukkucca), where restlessness means restless thoughts about the future, and regret means regret over things done or said in the past (these two are shown as one hindrance); and doubt (vicikicchā), which is indecision—thinking, "Will this work or not?" Freeing the mind from these factors is how one makes the mind still. Concentration (samādhi) means stillness.

Now, the aforementioned factors help to eliminate these hindrances. If one's virtue (sīla), especially virtue, is impure, then doubts and regrets arise in that person in that manner. Thoughts about one's past come flooding: "I have done such and such, haven't I?" Therefore, one must be endowed with virtue (sīla). Next, by hearing the ten subjects of talk (dasa-kathāvatthu), just as one gains some understanding regarding Nibbāna and the path of progress, one must also gain some understanding regarding the qualities to be practiced through them—such as wanting little (appicchatā), contentment (santutṭhitā), etc.—and train accordingly. Next, aroused energy (ārabdha-viriya) means one must proceed with determination, having intense energy, relentless energy. Next, one must be a person of wisdom (paññā)—an intelligent, wise person. Ignoring all such matters, and especially showing no regard for serving the Buddha, one cannot succeed in meditation by proceeding in that way. No progress can be expected when one turns their back on the advice of the teacher.

So, we can take a great deal of instruction from that story. Next are these other matters. Let us think about the four meditations mentioned. If we contemplate them, we can see that the way the Buddha presents these four meditations here is highly systematic. Often, the Buddha's teachings—not just often, but always—in fact, the best way to determine whether a teaching is truly the Buddha's or not, is to see how these factors fit together. They fit together in such a wonderful manner: the first leads to the second, the second to the third, the third to the fourth, the fourth to the fifth, and so on. Here too, when showing them as meditations, he shows at the very outset: the strongest saṃsāric habit in a saṃsāric being—as you all know—is attachment, lust (rāga). In whatever way one takes it, whether subtle or coarse, strong attachments are the very nature of saṃsāra. What is called craving / thirst (taṇhā) is, in another sense, this very same thing. Therefore, the remedy for it is foulness (asubha). Especially, this attachment arises because of the lust towards one's own body. Thus, what is done by developing foulness is understanding the foul nature of the body. Whichever object of meditation (kammaṭṭhāna) is used—whether something from the thirty-two parts of the body such as hair of the head, hair of the body, nails, teeth, etc., or something regarding a bloated corpse, etc.—this reflecting on the foulness of the body is called the perception of foulness (asubha-saññā). That perception of foulness must be developed for the abandoning of lust (rāga). Next, just as on one side there is attachment, on the other side there is aversion (paṭigha / collision / friction)—often arising because attachment is not fulfilled—which is a serious weakness of the mind. The remedy for it is the meditation on loving-kindness (mettā). This, dear practitioners, you can understand very easily.

Now, next—this is all about preparing the mind. It is between these two [attachment and aversion] that the mind chiefly becomes crooked, bent, and fickle. But the matter does not end there. Generally, we speak of the five cords of sensual pleasure (pañcā-kāmaḡa). These are the objects coming through the five external senses—eye, ear, nose, tongue, and body. Ordinary people think that it is because of these that our minds are disturbed. Therefore, some think: "If I close myself off from these, close my ears, and close my eyes as much as possible, and go to a secluded place, I will be able to realize Nibbāna." This is a wrong idea. Why? Because all the objects taken in through these five senses accumulate in the mind. As you, dear practitioners, know, just as various machines are invented in this day and age, our viññāṇa (Consciousness) is also like that. All those many saṃsāric habits acquired in the past saṃsāra are deposited in this viññāṇa (Consciousness)—attachments and aversions. Similarly, the objects taken in from those five senses are deposited in the mind in some way. Sitting around, these five [senses], like messengers, bring everything and deposit them in the mind. Then, those deposited things surface precisely when one sits down alone in silence. No form comes to the eye, no sound comes to the ear; one is protected from all of them. Yet, they arise from within the mind itself. Due to saṃsāric tendencies, and in accordance with one's karma, various defiled thoughts (vitakka) surface through this viññāṇa (Consciousness). It was to these that Venerable Meghiya succumbed. That is the situation. The remedy the Buddha gives for that is mindfulness of breathing (ānāpānasati).

Mindfulness of breathing (ānāpānasati) is an extremely subtle meditation. If we describe it with a simile—there are indeed numerous meditation subjects, but the meditation on mindfulness of breathing is the royal road. We can say it is like the royal road. Why? Because every Buddha attained Buddhahood through the meditation on mindfulness of breathing. If you think about it, you will realize that once the mind is calmed through other auxiliary meditations like foulness or loving-kindness, mindfulness (sati) naturally establishes itself on one's inhalation and exhalation. Mindfulness of breathing (ānāpānasati) means mindfulness regarding inhalation and exhalation. Usually, people do not apply mindfulness to this. Most people do not even remember that they are breathing. They think of this as a machine that operates eternally. Ordinary people also forget that everything depends on this life-breath beneath it. But in that manner, when these two grave defilements, lust (rāga) and hatred (dosa), are subdued by the meditation on foulness and loving-kindness, then mindfulness of breathing becomes very easy. However, mindfulness of breathing is mentioned here as being for the purpose of cutting off thoughts. Some practitioners (yogāvacara) say, "Even though the Buddha said this is for cutting off thoughts, it is when I sit down for mindfulness of breathing that thoughts start flooding in." That is nothing to be surprised about. Sometimes, a disease only surfaces when one begins to treat it. It is the disease inside. So, one must be prepared to face it, and the necessary medicine must be at hand. That is the kind of situation we have in mindfulness of breathing. It is not that the disease was absent; the existing disease surfaced. Some physicians do exactly that. To bring out the disease, they first give a strong purgative mixture. Having given something to bring the disease out, they then administer the required medicinal elixir. Similarly, it purges in that manner. But indeed, then the host of thoughts arrives. The host of thoughts arrives. How powerful it is can be seen from how this monk must have tried the entire evening, sitting under that beautiful, delightful mango tree—sitting properly in the cross-legged posture—yet he could not unify his mind. Only when it was impossible did he go back. So powerful is the momentum of these thoughts. That is the most wonderful thing. What oppresses the world is this host of thoughts. This comes from within the mind in accordance with karma and the character of each individual. Mindfulness of breathing helps to cut these off. Through mindfulness of breathing, those are understood at various levels. Only when the disease surfaces at its various levels can the remedies be applied. Thus, when the mind finally scatters through these thoughts arising from within, an understanding comes to that person.

Now, let us take the perception of the impermanent / inconstant (anicca-saññā). Let us also understand why the Buddha, fourthly, speaks of the perception of the impermanent / inconstant (anicca-saññā). This is a somewhat deep idea. If you, dear practitioners, have understood this: having applied remedies for lust and hatred, the disease was brought out through mindfulness of breathing. That is, thoughts (vitakka). Now it is a battle with thoughts. What are thoughts? The objects taken in through those five senses throughout this saṃsāra up to now, and in this life—whether today, yesterday, or in the past—are deposited in this mind. They surface and trouble the meditator. So, when they surface, this person has to battle with them. That is why it was said, "ātāpiyo saṃvaratī satīmā."

In those initial verses preached by the Buddha, it was expressed as "khuddā vitakkā sukhumā vitakkā anugatā manaso uppilāvā"—minor thoughts, extremely small things, not grand things. Sometimes, a word spoken by someone years ago, which might lead to hatred. Or a form barely seen somewhere years ago; thoughts arise based on this. They crash in so forcefully that one cannot remove them. A practitioner (yogāvacara) gets to experience such conditions. In those instances, one sees how serious an obstacle these thoughts are to meditation. One must be strong to cut them off. Thus, those minor thoughts, subtle thoughts, come from within the mind itself and float on the mind, stirring it up. How does one restrain these? "ātāpiyo"—with defilement-burning energy, not giving way. What helps in this is the object of meditation (kammaṭṭhāna).

Now, you, dear practitioners, know—during the time paddy is ripening, a person ties a bull to prevent it from being attracted to the paddy. That bull also tries as much as possible to reach the paddy. But it cannot, and it is pulled back. Finally, when it can do nothing else, it lies down near the post. Similarly, that is the value of tying the mind to an object of meditation (kammaṭṭhāna). It is in relation to some object of meditation—only when one holds onto an object of meditation—that one can gain the awareness that the mind is wandering away from it. Some people think that merely watching how the mind wanders is enough to make it still. That does not work. You can never do this by running along with a wild bull. Instead, what must be done is to give it an object of meditation, to tie it to a post. Once it is tied, every time it pulls, with defilement-burning energy and mindfulness—mindfulness (sati) helps there—applying the two terms sati-sampajañña, which are mindfulness and clear comprehension, very rapidly and as quickly as possible according to the situation, it is brought back near the post. If you let it go, you will, without even knowing it, end up in a state where you do not even know where you are. Such is the nature of thoughts (vitakka).

That is why, as you, dear practitioners, know, to anyone who has a general understanding of the nature of the mind, some object makes contact (phassa). It touches. Accordingly, a sensation / feeling (vedanā) arises. That sensation / feeling (vedanā) can be a pleasant sensation or an unpleasant sensation. Neutral sensation is almost imperceptible; regarding it, it is called ordinary equanimity (upekkhā)—mostly ignorant equanimity—but mostly it is pleasant sensation or unpleasant sensation. In accordance with these two, next, one takes a perception (saññā). One takes a perception, as good or bad. It is upon that perception (saññā) that thoughts (vitakka) are built up. Once one succumbs to those thoughts, something happens. That can be called conceptual proliferation / prolific conceptualization (papañca). Conceptual proliferation / prolific conceptualization (papañca) means that because of those thoughts, due to their branching out, one finally falls into a wonderful state of delusion. One falls into a grave delusion. Within thoughts themselves, one wanders this way and that. Running to the past and the future, to the extent that one does not even know where one is. These stages are shown in the Dhamma: "yaṃ vedeti taṃ sañjānāti"—what one feels, that one perceives; "yaṃ sañjānāti taṃ vitakketi"—what one perceives, that one thinks about; "yaṃ vitakketi taṃ papañceti"—what one thinks about, that one conceptually proliferates (papañca). Overwhelmed by a massive tangle of thoughts for which one cannot find beginning or end, one is finally overwhelmed by the very thoughts one created, and forgets the very purpose for which one came. The mind is distracted in that manner.

Why does all this happen? It is because of unwise attention (ayoniso-manasikāra). It is there that the meaning of the word Yoniso manasikāra (Wise attention) declared by the Buddha becomes important. Now, everyone in the world knows about reflection, about attention (manasikāra). Our minds have the ability to reflect. We reflect on something. We bring it to mind, to the thoughts. Ordinary people practice this reflection in an unwise way (ayoniso). In some old books, it is translated as "unwisely" or ignorantly. In modern terms, we can explain it as "inappropriate reflection," ignorant reflection. It is incorrect reflection, in a way that gives room to defilements. Yoniso manasikāra (Wise attention) means reflecting with wisdom. If we think about it more deeply, yoniso means directing the mind to the very root where a thought, an idea, arises—directing the mind to the very cause from which a disease originates—and reflecting. That is the reflection a meditating yogi must practice: Yoniso manasikāra (Wise attention). Here too, it is the same. Without letting it go further—when contact (phassa) occurs, without letting it go further—as soon as one gives room to sensation / feeling (vedanā), next, perceptions (saññā) arise in accordance with it. As soon as perceptions arise, in accordance with those perceptions, thoughts—ideations—are built up in the mind. Succumbing to those thoughts is what is called conceptual proliferation / prolific conceptualization (papañca).

Such a state exists in this world. It is within this that the entire saṃsāra is found. It is within these thoughts; it is by the mind itself that this saṃsāra is created, and it is by the mind itself that one is freed from saṃsāra. Thus, with reference to this, we can contemplate the perception of the impermanent / inconstant (anicca-saññā) given by the Buddha. Indeed, the perception of the impermanent / inconstant (anicca-saññā) can be understood by everyone in the ordinary world. We all see this perception of the impermanent / inconstant in daily life: look, something that existed has decayed. That is its coarse, gross aspect. In the deepest aspect of the perception of the impermanent / inconstant (anicca-saññā), it arises by seeing the impermanent / inconstant (anicca) nature of thoughts. These thoughts—even what we took as "my thoughts," do they not scatter in this manner? Or, one gains some understanding regarding this scattering nature, that this mind scatters due to the influence of past defilements—precisely through that training. That training is practiced. The training is practiced to make the mind still through concentration (samādhi). Yet, what is understood by the stilled mind—understood in accordance with reality (yathābhūta)—is the nature of this mind. This is not a single mind; there is nothing to be called "I" here. Different thoughts arise at each moment. These thoughts exist for a moment. The understanding arises that it is because we tightly hold onto this by way of grasping / holding / fuel (upādāna) that an entire saṃsāra is created, an existence / becoming (bhava) is brought about. That is what the Buddha declared: in one who has the perception of the impermanent / inconstant (anicca-saññā), the perception of not-self / non-self / unsubstantial (anattā) becomes established. He who has the perception of not-self / non-self / unsubstantial (anattā) removes this conceit "I am" (asmimāna)—this subtle conceit "I am"—and right in this life is cooled by the noble, supreme Nibbāna; that is why it was so declared. Because, due to that distracted, scattering nature of the mind, the understanding arises that there is nothing here to be taken as "myself," there is no such thing as a self here. These thoughts arise. While deleting them as they arise, like deleting characters here and there, the understanding comes to oneself that there is nothing here to be grabbed as "myself," nothing to be taken as "mine." Now, the thought grabbed as "myself" ends in another moment. It disappears. That is understood when sati-sampajañña, which is mindfulness and clear comprehension—mindfulness and wisdom—is well applied.

Indeed, that too is a concentration (samādhi). Why? Because on one occasion, when showing four developments of concentration (samādhi-bhāvanā)—let us speak only of the relevant one—the Buddha says, "Monks, there is a development of concentration that leads to the development of mindfulness and clear comprehension (sati-sampajañña)." What is that development of concentration? It is shown thus: here, for a monk, sensations / feelings (vedanā) arise known. They persist known. They pass away known. Likewise, perceptions (saññā) arise known. They persist known. They pass away known. Likewise, thoughts (vitakka / ideations) arise known. They persist known. They pass away known. What is the natural law (dhammatā) found in this? It comes down to those three words: arising, persisting, and passing away—arising, persisting, passing away. If we take it briefly, there is only arising and passing away. But what is called "persisting" is indeed that grasping / holding / fuel (upādāna)—the holding on. In that instance, within that, it "persists." Within that, a "person" persists. So, that is all there is in the world: arising, persisting, passing away. This is realized very deeply—now, the difference between arising and passing away in the material world is difficult for many to understand. Their decay is not understood in the ordinary world. It is only on the day it is thrown away, on the day it is thrown onto a garbage pile, thinking "this is of no use now, this is finished, no use can be made of it," that it is discarded. But in the material world, that arising and passing away, or impermanence / inconstancy (anicca), is at a highly gross, coarse level. This impermanence / inconstancy (anicca) is understood in a subtle way precisely by seeing these thoughts in that manner—arising, persisting, and passing away. It begins to be understood by one's mind stilled through defilement-burning effort (ātāpa).

In that meditation, the effort is to keep mindfulness (sati) established on the breath. Yet, in the meantime, those thoughts come. Those thoughts taken in from the past or various things come. One has to subdue them too. It is through the understanding that "this is the condition of this mind" that one finally realizes that there is nothing to be taken as a self even in this viññāṇa (Consciousness). That there is no self (anattā) in form (rūpa) can generally be understood easily when it decays. Sensation / feeling (vedanā) too—one sensation comes, another sensation comes—can also be understood with a bit more difficulty. Perception (saññā) is also understood with a bit more difficulty. The impermanence / inconstancy (anicca) regarding Saṅkhāra (Formations), which are intentions, is also understood with some difficulty. But viññāṇa (Consciousness) is the grand illusion, the greatest illusion of beings in this world. The Buddha also compared this viññāṇa (Consciousness) to an illusion. That is something one must experience for oneself. The path to that is what the Buddha has shown here by systematically presenting the meditation subjects.

Therefore, with reference to that, you, dear practitioners, can also understand that for a person who hopes for this life of a practitioner (yogāvacara), who hopes to plunge into this, it is wrong to think of this as an easy task. If one thinks of this as easy, they will soon get disappointed with it. Knowing that this is a difficult task, preparing the mind for it, and developing great energy, one must plunge into this work. Otherwise, what do they do? Either they blame the teacher, or they blame the meditation. Now, just because a road accident occurs, does a person stop driving? No. There can be various reasons for that road accident. Sometimes, it could be the ignorance of the driver. Similarly, because some people suffer mental stress and various afflictions through meditation, some in this day and age think of meditation as an easy way to get the mind distracted. That is a wrong idea. It is the hasty ones, like Venerable Meghiya, who do so, think so, and fall into such a state.

The wise person remembers those instructions given by the Buddha. We must enter upon this task having prepared the mind. What helps in this, principally, is the association with a teacher. The Buddha, as we expressed earlier, is the incomparable spiritual friend (kalyāṇa-mitta) of the world. Then, after the demise of the Buddha, or even during the time he was living, the great Arahants headed by Venerable Sāriputta, like parents to children, helped to guide disciples up to the state of Arahantship, just like the Buddha. Next, the eighty chief disciples. Next, the other monks of the Saṅgha according to their respective capacities. Next, after their demise, as long as this Dispensation of the Buddha (Buddha-sāsana) exists, whether lay or ordained, if some person has traveled on this path of meditation and achieved some progress, having an understanding of these matters, that person indeed is the spiritual friend (kalyāṇa-mitta), the teacher. Obeying their word, one must be ready to take steps according to the situation. For that, humility is required.

Next, other factors are strengthening the mind through virtue (sīla), hearing the Dhamma, etc., developing a powerful desire (chanda), an aspiration, and next, exerting energy, applying the mind intelligently and wisely—wisdom (paññā). These kinds of factors help. The same goes for the said path of meditation. Without mixing them up, without causing confusion, one must enter that path of meditation. One should not do last what should be done first, and one should not do first what should be done last. Some people jump into mindfulness of breathing (ānāpānasati), thinking it is a highly valuable meditation. But they are not prepared for it. So, they next blame the practice: "Even though the Buddha told us to practice mindfulness of breathing to cut off thoughts, as for me, when I go to practice this, it is thoughts themselves that come!" In this way, some even blame the Buddha's teaching.

What is the reason for this? It is that coarse level mentioned earlier. Now, you, dear practitioners, know how a carpenter uses a plane. Think about it. First, he uses it to cut away the coarse parts of the wood. Having done that, by tapping the plane or taking a different plane, he next shaves a little more. After that, he takes a finer plane. A similar thing applies to this mind. There are coarse levels and subtle levels of the mind; so, coarse levels are eliminated by coarse means. That helps. Some say—there is an opinion that the meditation on foulness (asubha-bhāvanā) is not good for laypeople. Whether lay or ordained, if one hopes for Nibbāna, this is helpful. Even if we think about this society, and the defilements of lust (rāga), etc., if we think about laypeople, how many crimes are committed because of attachment to these? If there is some restraint and control regarding these, even society would reach a more peaceful state. Even in a home, in a household, there would be control and restraint. The same applies to the other: ill-will (byāpāda). Thus, the world mostly lives within these two—attachments and aversions. But after subduing them, there is further to go. It is from there onward that the simile of the subtle plane applies. That is what must be taken there. The Buddha has declared: "khuddā vitakkā sukhumā vitakkā" (minor thoughts, subtle thoughts).

Just by seeing a good mango grove, thinking "If I go there and meditate, I will be able to attain Nibbāna all at once; what the Buddha strove for so long to achieve, I can do in a single evening"—with this thought, Venerable Meghiya went. But although everything else was fine—the mango grove was highly delightful, there was good shade and a good seat, everything was perfect—still, he could not tame his mind. Why? Because from beneath, those thoughts arose. All that trash, just like a stream carrying all the garbage when it flows after a heavy rain. A practitioner (yogāvacara) striving for Nibbāna even has to face such situations.

In such moments, one should not get discouraged. This is something to be expected. That trash must flow out from somewhere. Now, you, dear practitioners, know what happens after taking a purgative mixture—there is no need to explain details to you about that. So, after taking a purgative, look, one thinks, "Alas, is this the reality? Isn't this the reality of the body I took to be mine? Isn't this the reality of food?" In those moments, it becomes clearly apparent. Similarly, after sitting down for mindfulness of breathing (ānāpānasati), having fulfilled those initial factors, then comes the stream of trash from within this mind. Yet, through that, training is also achieved. Through training, understanding also comes. This is something difficult to tame. But why do we tame it? To sharpen this understanding. This is the Middle Path (majjhimā paṭipadā). A highly deep matter is being discussed here. In truth, this is unparalleled. The solution to the problem, the question, of escaping from this saṃsāra, which no other teacher in the world could solve, was presented by the Buddha through the Middle Path.

A certain stilling of the mind is fundamentally necessary. Unifying the mind is also necessary. Although we say "unifying," this is not a single entity. At the moment of unifying the mind, its scattering nature is understood. It scatters moment by moment. Due to habits, etc., coming from various character traits shown as past karma, character, tendencies, and virtues, various kinds of thoughts (vitakka) arise. One does not get discouraged by them. But ultimately, what is done through that? Next, one sees: "There is nothing here to be held onto. Where there is holding on, there is Māra. Where there is holding on, 'I' am there. Where there is holding on, all these troubles are there." One sees the truth as it is, in accordance with reality (yathābhūta). All this is impermanent / inconstant (anicca). Whatever is impermanent / inconstant (anicca) is suffering (dukkha / unsatisfactoriness / stress). Because one holds onto what is impermanent / inconstant (anicca), one falls into suffering / unsatisfactoriness / stress (dukkha). Similarly, the understanding arises that "nothing here can be maintained under my control as 'myself' or 'mine'." When that understanding arises, when it arises very deeply, that is when a person removes that final tumor called "the conceit 'I am'" (asmimāna), as declared by the Buddha. It is through the tumor called "I am" (asmi) that this entire world is projected.

Now, "I" is generally a gross, coarse feeling. That is what is called the dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi). The work is not finished merely by eliminating the view "I" and "mine." The most subtle level is "am-ness" (asmi). It is not even "I am"—it is "am-ness." That lies deposited in the mind in a highly subtle manner. That can be properly seen only when the scattering nature of the mind is correctly realized, at the very point where that holding on is let go. At the point of holding on—now, when contact (phassa) occurs, it is through holding onto it that sensation / feeling (vedanā) arises. When it is held onto there, it turns into perception (saññā). Perception turns into thought (vitakka). Having turned into thought, the point where the thought is held onto is conceptual proliferation / prolific conceptualization (papañca). From there onward, the mind finally ends up in a state like an asylum. To prevent that, one must abandon that incorrect method called unwise attention (ayoniso-manasikāra). The battle is not to be started from the other end. This battle must be started as the Buddha declared in the first verse of the Dhammapada:

"Mind precedes all phenomena, mind is chief, mind-made are they."

The understanding that everything arises from the mind itself in this manner emerges clearly in the deep stages of that meditation.

Therefore, you, dear practitioners, must reflect. On this present Poya day, we should not arouse faith (saddhā) merely by thinking about the life of the Buddha. The one who truly knows the Buddha is the one who has actually realized Nibbāna.

Otherwise, we only see some forms, or a Buddha created by our thoughts. Therefore, if we hope to see the Buddha, if we hope to know him, we must travel on the path to Nibbāna. We must understand this truth that has been declared. Only then can the Buddha be truly seen. Only then does faith (saddhā) in the Buddha become complete.

Therefore, on this valuable day, through this hearing of the Dhamma, certain matters related to those ten subjects of talk mentioned earlier would have been spoken to you. It is still possible to benefit from this Dispensation (sāsana) in this very life. Some think of this as something outdated. But the very same fires that burned during the Buddha's time are burning now—the fires of lust, hatred, and delusion. So, the extinguishing of the fires is what is called Nibbāna. It is nothing else; it is not some strange world, not some place like a celestial realm. Some think so. It is extinguishment. Therefore, what is found in saṃsāra is burning. In place of that, the Buddha presents extinguishment. What is found in saṃsāra is existence / becoming (bhava / continuation). Understanding that this existence / becoming is suffering / unsatisfactoriness / stress (dukkha), and bringing about its cooling—that is what we called escaping from the circular track of saṃsāra. Spinning in the circular track of saṃsāra is faring on (saṃsaraṇa). Escaping from it is escape (nissaraṇa). Escaping from the kingdom of Māra is what is called Nibbāna—from the perspective of defilements!

Therefore, taking that state as the goal of one's life, in this rare human existence during this rare period of a Buddha's appearance, in this final phase of the Dispensation—perhaps after a few generations, a situation will arise where one cannot truly benefit from this Dhamma. Why? Because association with a teacher will be lost. Those who are engaged in these practices and can give instructions on this path to Nibbāna will not be found. Earlier, it was still easy to find them. That will become impossible. For that very reason, you, dear practitioners, should diligently, keeping in mind the Buddha's exhortation on diligence, make a firm determination to walk on this path to Nibbāna.

You should not think that the few wholesome qualities that arose in your minds through listening to this Dhamma sermon up to now are insignificant. Specifically, faith (saddhā), energy (viriya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā) are listed among the thirty-seven factors of enlightenment (bodhipakkhiya-dhamma). They perform dual functions as spiritual faculties (indriya) and spiritual powers (bala). Faith (saddhā) is a faculty as well as a power; it is a quality that can demonstrate capability as well as powerful action. Likewise, energy (viriya) is the energy that follows faith. Next, through the energy applied to burn away defilements and draw near wholesome qualities, mindfulness (sati) arises—mindfulness, awareness. The very state of maintaining mindfulness for a long time becomes concentration (samādhi). Finally, mindfulness overflows and turns into concentration. To the concentrated mind, the seeing of things as they truly are in accordance with reality (yathābhūta)—wisdom (paññā)—arises. Indeed, these [faculties of] faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom operate as spiritual faculties and spiritual powers precisely when one correctly plunges into the meditation for realizing Nibbāna.

But even to arouse them at a minor level—according to your capacity to apply yourselves to meditation—I hope this Dhamma sermon has been of help. May you make the aspiration: "By the power of having aroused those qualities of faith (saddhā), energy (viriya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā) through listening to such a sermon, striving as much as possible in this very life, may we have the strength and power to escape from this entire saṃsāric suffering / unsatisfactoriness / stress (dukkha) through the penetration of the paths and fruits of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti), Once-returning (Sakadāgāmitā), Non-returning (Anāgāmitā), and Arahantship, and be cooled by the noble, supreme Nibbāna!" Likewise, may all those who expect to share in our merits—from the deepest Avīci hell up to the highest Akaniṭṭha heaven, including the guardian deities of the Dispensation and one's own departed relatives—rejoice in this store of merit we have accumulated through the preaching and hearing of the Dhamma. Having rejoiced, and having found association with spiritual friends (kalyāṇa-mitta), may they be freed from all saṃsāric suffering / unsatisfactoriness / stress (dukkha) as quickly as possible and be cooled by the noble, supreme Nibbāna! With this aspiration, next, dedicate the merits by reciting these verses:

Pali Stanza:

Attanāva kataṃ pāpaṃ, attajaṃ attasambhavaṃ; Abhimatthati dummedhaṃ, vajiraṃ vasmamayaṃ maṇiṃ.

From:

Verse 161 from the Attavagga (Chapter on the Self) of the Dhammapada

Dear Listeners,

Some people, when they see someone who is leading a good life in society meet with death due to an unexpected accident or enemy hostility, doubt the value of a principled life, saying, "Look at what happened to him, despite living so well!" They weaken their conviction in the fruits and results of wholesome and unwholesome actions (kamma). They doubt in this manner because they lack a proper understanding of the subtle operations of the round of kamma.

The Buddha has pointed out that because of ignorance and Taṇhā (Craving) – covered by ignorance and bound by Taṇhā (Craving) – beings themselves are responsible for the wholesome and unwholesome deeds they perform selfishly with the notion of "self". He declared that they must experience their fruits and results, and that one day they will inevitably have to undergo those results. Although the subtle operation of kamma was not visible to other religious teachers, it was clearly visible to the Buddha. Therefore, on certain occasions when such wrong views arose in society, he would expound the past story related to the present event as an example – as empirical evidence – presenting such direct proof to the world. In doing so, he made use of the opportunity to rescue people from the path to woeful states and direct them towards happy realms and Nibbāna.

The background story related to the stanza we have chosen as our theme today is just such a case. While the Buddha was residing at the Jetavana monastery, there lived in the city of Sāvatthi a virtuous lay disciple named Mahākāla, who was a Sotāpanna (stream-enterer). He was accustomed to regularly observing the eight precepts. Eight days a month, he would come to the monastery, observe the precepts in this manner, and listen to sermons throughout the night. He was deeply devoted to this practice. One day, while this lay disciple was staying at Jetavana, during the night, a band of thieves broke into a nearby house. Hearing the noise as they were preparing to take the goods, the householders woke up and began to pursue the thieves. The thieves started running, dropping the goods here and there. One thief from this group was running along the road leading to Jetavana with the stolen goods he had taken. By that time, in the early morning, the lay disciple Mahākāla had come to the pond to wash his face. What did this thief do? He dropped the bundle of stolen goods right where the lay disciple was standing – probably intending to deceive the people pursuing him – and ran away. When the householders arrived and looked, there was the bundle of goods, and there was the lay disciple. They grabbed him immediately. Saying, "You broke into our house, and now you are pretending to listen to sermons here, posing as a lay devotee! You are a fake devotee!" they beat him mercilessly, killed him, and left him right there.

In the morning, novice monks came to that pond to fetch water. Seeing the lay disciple lying dead in this manner, they went and reported it to the Buddha: "Venerable Sir, that innocent lay devotee, the one who listens so well to the Dhamma, has been beaten to death and left there."

The Buddha said, "Monks, although from the perspective of this present life, the death this lay disciple received seems unfitting, according to the evil kamma he performed in the past, it is a perfectly fitting death." Then he related the story of the past.

In the past, at the entrance to a forest in a border village of the Kingdom of Benares, the king had stationed a certain royal guard because of the danger posed to travelers by the thieves living in that forest. What was the duty of this royal guard? It was to provide security to those who came and went along that forest path. One day, a certain man arrived there in a carriage, accompanied by his beautiful wife. As soon as the guard saw her, he conceived a desire for her and devised a plan to detain them. Even though there was plenty of time for them to travel, he said, "It is too late this evening. Therefore, stop for today. I will provide lodging at my house. You may leave tomorrow morning." But the man said, "No, no, there is still enough time. Please let us go." What did that royal guard do? Using his men, he stopped the carriage by force, and accommodated both the man and his wife there, providing them with food and drink. During the night, he employed a scheme. He had his men hide a gem belonging to his house inside their carriage. He also made some noise to suggest that thieves had entered the house. The next morning, after the couple had departed, he raised an alarm, crying, "Now, search those who are about to leave this village! The gem in our house is missing. Thieves have taken it!" So the crowd went, intercepted the carriage, searched it, found the gem that they themselves had hidden, and presented the man to the village headman along with a false accusation: "This man stole the gem belonging to the royal guard who gave him lodging." The village headman too did not know the truth of the matter. Therefore, he ordered this man to be beaten and executed. The Buddha explained the consequences of that unwholesome act of taking life. As a result of that action, that royal guard boiled in the Avīci hell for a long time. As the remainder of that result, for a hundred lifetimes, he had to suffer death in the very same manner by being beaten. The Buddha revealed that this present occurrence was the very same, and that this story was about Mahākāla. Having shown this, he uttered the Dhamma stanza we mentioned earlier, along with a simile: "Monks, if a person is thus deluded and performs an evil deed himself, it will bring results in this manner."

Attanāva kataṃ pāpaṃ

attajaṃ atta sambhavaṃ

abhimatthati dummedhaṃ

vajiraṃ vasamayaṃ maṇiṃ

The meaning of this stanza is that the evil deed, born of oneself and produced from within oneself, destroys the ignorant person, just as a diamond born of rock cuts and destroys a hard stone.

Here, this stanza mentions a gem. It seems to have at least a slight connection to the story. But there is a much deeper meaning here. When it says "done by oneself," we see in this the sense of responsibility. In the past, that lay disciple, driven by selfishness, holding onto the notion of "self," performed that evil deed. Its inevitable result, the consequence of that false charge – for indeed he had framed an innocent man – was what he had to experience in this life. Thus, in the world, we often see innocent people being killed, as it were. But to the Buddha-eye, their past connection is often visible. We can understand this through this story. Especially here, we see that the lay disciple Mahākāla, having been a royal guard in the past, violated the third precept and the first precept by causing the destruction of life of an innocent man. It was the verdict of that framed charge. It was because of this that the thieves dropped the bundle of goods there. It was kamma that prompted the thieves to drop it there. There is such a wondrous karmic connection in these events. We can see that this reality exists in everything we hear. We can contemplate this based on this story. Today, too, many such events occur. Events of the kind shown in these present and past stories are still seen in the world today. From this, we can understand that the law of kamma and its result is subtly hidden in every single one of these occurrences.

Next, we must particularly contemplate the deeper aspect of this. In this stanza, it is mentioned in several places: "done by oneself," "born of oneself," "produced from within oneself." Thus, "self" is specially mentioned. Indeed, this stanza comes in the section called the "Atta Vagga" (Chapter on Self). Many people easily translate this as the soul or self. However, there is a section in the Dhammapada about oneself. Many take it as a permanent soul. But what is spoken of here is not a permanent self. Some sophists and theorists raise the question: "If this Dhamma of the Buddha is Anattā (Not-self), how can one be responsible for one's own actions? How is responsibility demonstrated? After all, is it not someone else who experiences the results?" In this way, they try to argue their way out. But what is the idea here? It is the intentions (cetanā) that worldly beings generate while being covered by the veil of ignorance and bound by the fetters of Taṇhā (Craving). You may have heard the phrase: "Cetanāhaṃ, bhikkhave, kammaṃ vadāmi" ("Intention, monks, I say is kamma"). You must have heard this often. The Buddha pointed out that intention itself is kamma. Thus, through the ignorance that aids that intention – the feeling of "I and mine" – the notion or idea of "self" arises. Having established that notion of "self," when one performs actions thinking about one's own happiness, protection, progress, or gain, the results of those actions must be experienced by oneself eventually. Why is this? It is because Vedanā (Feeling) and mental activity are extremely rapid. The activity of the mind is incredibly fast. If this is directed towards the wrong side, we can imagine what great destruction it causes. If a driver of a fast-moving vehicle, out of negligence or drowsiness regarding his own hands and feet steering the vehicle, swerves the steering wheel even slightly, where does it end? The mind is just like that. It operates extremely fast. It is something that changes so rapidly that it cannot be compared to anything else in the world – called "lahuparivattaṃ" (swiftly changing). Therefore, if such a mind, according to the principle and method shown by the Buddha, inclines towards unrighteousness, unwholesomeness, and evil, then one will have to suffer grave consequences for a very long time. Not just in one lifetime – depending on the strength of that volition – the Buddha declares that the results of some kamma are experienced in this very life as diṭṭhadhammavedanīya (to be experienced in this life). The results of other kamma are aparāpariyavedanīya (to be experienced in some future lifetime). In this way, the results of kamma are generally presented in various ways. However, when we contemplate deeply, the Buddha declares that the domain of kamma is unthinkable (acinteyya). The entanglement of kamma is that dangerous. The vast store of kamma performed in various lifetimes accumulates in this viññāṇa (consciousness). Deposited there, they arise as results some day. It is from this that we can understand the presence of such a perilous situation in this world.

If one pours poison upstream, when one takes water downstream, that poison can cause harm to oneself. This mental continuum (citta-santāna) is also like that. If some unwholesomeness – a defilement – is added to the mental continuum, it will surface as rounds of results over a long period, bringing suffering to oneself.

Now regarding this karmic result, there is a usage among our Buddhists called "kamma-sarikkhatā" (similarity of kamma and its result). We can point out a close similarity – a certain parallel – between kamma and its result, as shown by these two stories. Furthermore, even Western scholars who are waking up to this fact provide another simile for this operation of kamma. How it returns to oneself; how kamma performed by oneself returns to oneself. They sometimes point out that among some primitive tribes there is a weapon called the "boomerang". When that boomerang is thrown at an animal, it hits the animal and returns to one's own hand. In the same way, this kamma has a nature of turning back. If this kamma arose from a certain mental continuum, it returns to that very mental continuum. Therefore, one cannot escape by saying "there is no self." Why? Because we know that saṃsāra is the uninterrupted continuation of this succession of aggregates – even though there is no self – namely, form (rūpa), Vedanā (Feeling), perception (saññā), Saṅkhāra (Formations), and viññāṇa (consciousness). Within that succession of aggregates, some day, according to the law of kamma (kamma-niyāma), the results will emerge.

Since such a situation exists in the world, we must be especially mindful of it. In this degenerate age, the understanding, conviction, and faith (saddhā) regarding kamma of many people tend to disappear. It is often forgotten. That is how dangerous the condition of this world is.

That is why there is a valuable discourse expounded by the Buddha to constantly remind us of the law of kamma: the "Thāna Sutta". In that sutta, the Buddha points out five facts. We are specifically taking up the last fact mentioned there. To help one remember this kamma, to turn one's mind away from misconduct and direct it towards good conduct, he points out a practice called "abhiṇhaṃ paccavekkhitabbaṃ", as something to be constantly reflected upon. Whether lay or ordained, female or male, this passage is presented as something to be reflected upon daily by everyone:

"Kammasakomhi kammaḍāyādo kammayoni kammabandhu kammaṇisaṇaṇo. Yaṃ kammaṃ karissāmi kalyāṇaṃ vā pāpakaṃ vā tassa dāyādo bhavissāmīti abhiṇhaṃ paccavekkhitabbaṃ."

This is how one should contemplate. "Kammasakomhi" means – there too, if there is anything that can be taken as "self" or "mine," it is kamma alone. "Sako" means "one's own". Therefore, the general meaning is "I am the owner of my kamma." "Kammaḍāyādo" – "I am the heir to my kamma." "Kammayoni" – my place of origin, my source; I have originated from this kamma. When we say "I am everything," it is also intention. Taking everything as "I". That is what is meant by "kammayoni" – kamma also arises from the feeling of "I" and "self". "Kammabandhu" – kamma itself is my kinsman. What we call a support for a person is also this kamma. "Kammaṇisaṇaṇo" – kamma is my refuge, my support. "Yaṃ kammaṃ karissāmi kalyāṇaṃ vā pāpakaṃ vā tassa dāyādo bhavissāmīti" – "Whatever kamma I shall do, whether good or bad, of that I shall be the heir." It is stated that this fact must be constantly reflected upon daily by everyone, whether lay or ordained, female or male.

As its result and benefit, it is stated that in the person who constantly contemplates in this manner, misconduct of body, speech, and mind – misconduct performed through body, speech, and mind – either completely disappears or becomes thin. That means the best way to abstain from such misconduct is to daily apply the law of kamma to one's own mind. "Mine" is kamma alone. When thinking in this way, one realizes that the things one grasps as "I" in various hurried situations in society, out of sudden ideas or impatience, are not what the Buddha has pointed out. It is the karmic momentum generated from within one's own mind that ultimately remains with oneself. It is that which brings happiness or suffering to oneself.

Accordingly, we must contemplate that the Buddha has shown the danger of this entanglement of kamma on many occasions in this manner. That is, usually, when we experience the result of a kamma, we do not realize that it is a karmic result, even though it is visible to the Buddha-eye. We think it is something done by others. Even the lay disciple Mahākāla, perhaps – we are not given the details, but since he was a lay disciple, he might have tried to calm his mind – but when the householders came and beat him to death in that manner, he might have felt some hatred, thinking, "Oh, they are killing me, an innocent man." Mahākāla too must have thought that he was innocent. There is room for even such an unwholesome thought to arise. But if we contemplate this deeply – according to that passage – whatever disaster or enemy hostility comes to someone, one should think, "This is something I have done to myself." Now, who was the executioner of the lay disciple Mahākāla? It was himself. If we contemplate in accordance with the Dhamma, according to the principles of Dhamma, the cause of everyone's death is an unwholesome act of taking life performed by themselves in the past. That is how we must think. The proximate cause of everyone's death, the cause of death – here we are not talking about the mind at the moment of death – the cause of death is an unwholesome act of taking life performed by oneself in the past. Now this is clear here. The death of this lay disciple Mahākāla occurred due to a taking of life performed by himself. He himself was the executioner. It was not others. He himself was the executioner.

If we train ourselves to think in that way, we can easily bring the mind to equanimity in such situations, in accordance with the word of the Buddha. It may not be directly apparent to us. Because we do not have the power to see through ignorance, we do not see that "because of this kamma, these things are happening to me." But if we train ourselves to contemplate it as a general law – the word of the Buddha is true. The Buddha has declared it in this way. "This kamma is my inheritance. Kamma is my kinsman." Kinsman or enemy. Here, we must contemplate that wholesome kamma is one's kinsman, while unwholesome kamma is one's enemy. The Buddha has shown this too, when speaking about kamma:

Caranti bālā dummedhā

amittenev' attanā

karontā pāpakam kammaṃ

yaṃ hoti kaṭukapphalam

Thus the Buddha has declared. Fools of poor wisdom wander about, acting as enemies to themselves. They behave as enemies to themselves. "Amittenev' attanā" – behaving as enemies to themselves. Why? "Karontā pāpakam kammaṃ yaṃ hoti kaṭukapphalam" – performing evil kamma that bears bitter fruit, these foolish people live as enemies to themselves. Thus, while kammabandhu means kinsman, they can also become enemies if we contemplate in that way – in terms of unwholesomeness.

Therefore, contemplating that this law of kamma – the Dhamma of kamma – is operating in every event that happens to us often helps us to suppress sudden reactions, impatience, and anger, in accordance with the word of the Buddha. This is something that must be contemplated practically and constantly.

Likewise, through this story, another important matter is revealed to us: the importance of the five precepts. This five precepts (pañca-sīla) taught by the Buddha is not a trivial thing. Within this virtue (sīla), all the instances in this long saṃsāra where the mind of a being is inclined toward unwholesomeness are included in brief – in a simple way. The unwholesome kamma performed by us, taken generally, in one way or another, falls under either the first precept – the unwholesome act of taking life – or stealing (adinnādāna), or sexual misconduct (kāmesu micchācāra), or false speech (musāvāda), or taking intoxicants (surāpāna) – principally. One can speak of various other branches of these, but these can be considered the main ones. Thus, it is the results of the evil deeds related to the five sins committed by us in past saṃsāra that we experience daily in various ways. Not only death as mentioned earlier, but illnesses, various disasters, destruction of wealth and crops, and various other daily troubles – the cause for every single one of these is the dangerous unwholesome kamma performed by oneself in the past. Yet, the danger of kamma does not end there. As mentioned just now, because of not knowing the true nature of kamma, one entangles the ball of karmic threads.

Indeed, the Buddha compares this saṃsāra to a tangled ball of thread. How does it become a tangled ball of thread? A certain result comes to us according to the kamma we have performed. When that result comes, we do not know how it happened. We entangle it further. We entangle it by generating more kamma through it. By harboring hatred towards the persons who became instrumental in bringing about that result – and not only that, but by succumbing to various other defilements (kilesa) arising from it, we entangle kamma. We accumulate more and more kamma. Thus, there is such a dangerous situation in the entanglement of kamma. It is not only oneself who falls into this entanglement. When performing a kamma, and when experiencing its results, there are others who join in. There are also people who rejoice in it (anumodana). Now, we know that after giving alms or performing some other valuable meritorious deed, we share those merits with others. On such occasions, there is an opportunity for those departed ones to rejoice in that merit and generate some wholesome state so that they do not go to woeful states but to happy realms. That is the good side. We usually use the word anumodanā (rejoicing/sharing merit) in relation to wholesomeness. But, devotees, we frequently see in society that there are also occasions where unwholesomeness is rejoiced in.

Especially in this day and age, you know very well: when one's friends obtain some gain, even in an indirect manner, one rejoices over it. If that is an unwholesome act, if that person accomplished that deed in a wrong way, what we are doing there is rejoicing in that unwholesomeness. Or else, especially if a friend of ours has committed some grave act – let us say, wrong view (micchā-diṭṭhi), stealing, or various other corrupt acts – we either help them through body or speech, or rejoice in mind, saying, "Oh, that is very good." To say nothing of other things, if one's enemy dies, there is a habit among beings, deluded by kamma, to rejoice in it by saying "Sādhū! Sādhū!". What does one do by that? Taking upon oneself something that was passing by – or something that did not belong to oneself – one binds oneself to that unwholesome kamma. Thus, although the word anumodanā is used in relation to wholesomeness, we unknowingly rejoice in unwholesomeness as well. This happens because of that very ignorance. That rejoicing (anumodanā) is also a kamma. Even if it was done by someone else in the past, when one rejoices in mind, one's own Vedanā (Feeling) is defiled by it. Through that, one accumulates unwholesome kamma for oneself. One must be careful of such situations.

Now, there are various kinds of parties and sides in the world. But the Dhamma mentions two sides that exist eternally in the world: Sura and Asura (gods and titans). There is always a battle between these two sides. The Buddha declares that at a time when Tathāgatas arise in the world, at that time the side of the Suras – that is, the devas – grows strong, while the side of the Asuras – that is, the yakkhas – becomes weak, feeble, and their numbers decrease. What does this mean? When beings incline toward wholesomeness, more devas arise in the world. Next, as they incline more and more toward unwholesomeness, those who are born in lower realms like yakkhas and pretas increase. There is such a competition in the world. This can be shown as dark and bright (black and white). When we contemplate in terms of Dhamma, the conflict between wholesome and unwholesome can be taken as white and black – the white side is wholesomeness, the black side is unwholesomeness. These are the two sides that exist eternally in the world, not the other parties we think of. Therefore, we must contemplate which side we belong to, and which side we are supporting (voting for) – the black side or the white side. Voting for the white side is called kusala-chanda (wholesome desire) in the Dhamma – kusala-chanda. One votes for wholesomeness. There is also a bad side of voting (desire), which is called chanda-rāga (lustful desire). That goes toward unwholesomeness. If one develops an attachment that inclines toward the lust of chanda-rāga, it goes to the bad side. Kusala-chanda is a good thing because it is a certain noble aspiration or a desire for the Dhamma that ends in Nibbāna. We must contemplate that there are two such forces in the world. If we do not properly shape our lives in this manner according to the Buddha's Dhamma, we cannot say in what abyss this journey of ours will end. Such is the situation.

Therefore, we must especially contemplate the observation of virtue (sīla). Even on this occasion, you have observed virtue – the Ājīva-aṭṭhamaka-sīla (eight precepts with livelihood as the eighth), or the Uposatha eight precepts, or some have observed the ten precepts. In this manner, a certain virtue has been observed. The Buddha has briefly explained the concept of wholesome and unwholesome to the Venerable Rāhula: unwholesome (akusala) means those actions done through mind, body, or speech that lead to one's own harm and the harm of others. That is what unwholesome means. Wholesome (kusala) means those actions done through mind, body, and speech that lead to one's own well-being and the well-being of others. Thus, when one understands it in this way, this is not a short-term view that the Buddha is presenting. One might think, "I am getting a profit at this moment." But when contemplating in accordance with kamma, one should not adopt such a short-term view.

Now, someone might commit theft or some such deed, thinking, "This is beneficial to me." But in truth, it causes harm to others. Not only that, one's own mind is defiled. We must contemplate with wisdom in this manner. We have a power within us to think in this way, which is called reflection (paccavekkhaṇā). We must bring that forward. Likewise, by instilling that wisdom and a certain power of determination into the mind, what closely follows is called reviewing (āvajjanā) – reviewing one's virtue (sīla-āvajjanā).

We must think about its value. What a valuable thing the Buddha has declared as virtue (sīla). In this path of Dhamma, virtue is only the first step. Yet, how valuable is even that which is contained within it? This training of body and speech is also something that must be done systematically.

Virtue (sīla) means "tamed-ness" (hīlāṅkama), if we translate it into Sinhala. We see the value of this tamed-ness when we look at the value of a disciplined elephant. The mahout, taming that huge beast, makes it perform various tasks. Similarly, one rides on the back of a fast-running horse, having tamed it, and works in that manner. In this way, when even a wild animal is systematically tamed, what wondrous tasks can it be made to perform! How much benefit can one derive from it!

In that way, if we train our body and speech according to this virtue (sīla) declared by the Buddha – next, what is contained in it is not merely body and speech. Our bodies are not machines. The mind is what helps to activate these things called body and speech, in accordance with the phrase "Manopubbaṅgamā dhammā" ("Mind precedes all mental states"). The primary cause for this is the mind. Indeed, what is contained in this virtue – as the Sangha expresses it, referring to the saying "like the village headman observing precepts" – is not a mindless taking of precepts without understanding. One must take it to heart. Even though we say it in Pāli to be more dharmic and respectful, we must understand its meaning. This precept regarding killing animals, or rather, abstaining from killing animals – veramaṇī means abstaining – here "veramaṇī" or "virati" means abstaining. That is the difficult part. Doing is easy; abstaining is difficult. To say "I undertake and observe" that precept of abstaining, that rule of self-discipline, means to voluntarily – not because someone else said so – make a resolution in one's mind to keep it. It is like giving a command to one's own wisdom. In our behavior, there are things done habitually/capriciously, and there are things done with wisdom. There is a great difference between these two. Each of us has a certain power within us, a thing called "wisdom" – what we call conscious wisdom – the ability to do something mindfully. But that is something that must be brought out with effort. Why? The nature of saṃsāra is to flow downwards towards unwholesomeness, like a stream of water. Therefore, wisdom remains suppressed. Usually, we act according to our whims, according to the mind, and that mind which is on the surface is mostly inclined towards unwholesomeness. But there is a thing called wisdom, a certain strength, a wisdom (paññā) within us. There is an understanding within us. That is the very concept of reflection (paccavekkhaṇā). If we look deeply at the word reflection – it is like someone going in front of a mirror and looking at himself. It is to pause and think about something.

The Buddha has briefly explained the concept of wholesome and unwholesome to Venerable Rāhula: unwholesome means those actions done through mind, body, or speech that lead to one's own harm and the harm of others. Thus, when one understands it in this way, this is not a short-term view that the Buddha is presenting. There is a certain power within us called reflection (paccavekkhaṇā). We must bring that forward. Likewise, by instilling that wisdom and a certain power of determination into the mind, what closely follows is called reviewing – reviewing one's virtue (sīla-āvajjanā).

Reviewing (āvajjanā) means examining one's virtue again: "I have observed such and such a virtue. Is my behavior in accordance with this virtue?" At this moment, to remind oneself that one has observed the precepts, some even make a change in their clothing. What all of this does is to signal to oneself that one is established in virtue. Next, taking that into the heart, one tries to live in a manner corresponding to that behavior. It is through this that one is able to discipline the mind. First, one disciplines body and speech. The Buddha has pointed out that through this itself, one experiences great happiness in daily life.

That is called the happiness of blamelessness (anavajja-sukha) – blamelessness. The peace of knowing that we live without doing wrong. Now, how many people today live with regret? The benefit of virtue is to live daily with peaceful Dhamma, free from regret – what is called the state of being free from remorse (avippatisāra). To the person who commits unwholesome deeds, during daily life activities, it may not come to mind, but perhaps when going to sleep, he remembers, "Did I do such things?" Especially in old age, or at the moment of death, that unwholesome deed comes to mind. At the moment of death, if a grave unwholesome kamma comes to mind, one goes straight to woeful states. There is such a dangerous situation in saṃsāra. This is why the Buddha ultimately declares to escape from this entire great saṃsāra. Escaping from saṃsāra means completely freeing oneself from that entanglement of kamma mentioned earlier. One cannot escape from it by some ordinary means. It is like an incredibly wondrous tangled ball of thread. That is why a Buddha is necessary to escape from this entanglement of kamma – or rather, to escape from saṃsāra.

A Buddha is one who, having escaped himself, explains to beings the Dhamma that helps them also to escape. That method is supramundane liberation (lokuttara-vimutti) – the transcendental liberation shown by the Buddhas, which is crossing over the world. It is through this that this entanglement of kamma can be untangled. The primary cause for all of this is pointed out as Saṅkhāra (Formations). It is said that these things happen because of saṅkhāra. Some of you may have heard that a Sotāpanna – that is, one who, based on virtue, has stilled the mind with concentration (samādhi), and through wisdom (paññā), which is the realization of the truth: that existence in the world is Dukkha (Suffering), the cause for this is Taṇhā (Craving), the stilling of this taṇhā is Nibbāna, and the path to it is the Noble Eightfold Path – must realize these four facts to a certain extent. In other words, one must realize the three characteristics of this entire existence: Anicca (Impermanent), Dukkha (Suffering), and Anattā (Not-self). Having realized them in this way, a dispassion, a weariness toward this saṃsāric existence must arise in the mind. As long as there is no weariness toward this, one cannot escape from saṃsāra. When various disasters and calamities occur in daily life, everyone feels for a moment in their mind: "Oh, there is no substance in this saṃsāric existence." But because ignorance and taṇhā operate in the mind in a dangerous manner, that is forgotten. Such is the situation. Therefore, the Buddha declares that by systematically developing virtue, concentration, and wisdom, and by correctly contemplating with wisdom to develop wisdom, if at some point the mind reaches the state of a Sotāpanna, through that path-knowledge, those four truths are directly realized.

It is said that because of ignorance, Saṅkhāra (Formations) arise. Thus, due to that feeling of "I" and "mine" which is taken as "self," numerous mental preparations occur. Briefly, it can be called Vedanā (Feeling), aspirations, hopes, which are a succession of thoughts. There is a mental activity. That activity takes us into a state like that great tangled ball of thread in saṃsāra. It is the wholesome and unwholesome kamma performed by us that keeps us alive for a long time.

Therefore, in order to escape from this, one must still this force of Vedanā (Feeling), this force of kamma, or rather this momentum of Saṅkhāra (Formations). It must be calmed, it must be extinguished. It is such a thing that the Buddhas present as supramundane liberation. Through the penetration of the path and fruit, through path-knowledges, through the four path-fruits of Sotāpanna, Sakadāgāmi, Anāgāmi, and Arahant, the Buddhas solve this entire great problem of saṃsāra – this entanglement of kamma. In brief, we can think of it in this way:

Everyone has heard that a Sotāpanna – who, based on virtue, has stilled the mind with concentration, and through wisdom, which is the realization of the truth: that existence in the world is Dukkha (Suffering), the cause for this is Taṇhā (Craving), the stilling of this taṇhā is Nibbāna, and the path to it is the Noble Eightfold Path – must realize these four facts to a certain extent. In other words, a Sotāpanna lay disciple who has understood the three characteristics of this entire existence: Anicca (Impermanent), Dukkha (Suffering), and Anattā (Not-self) – that is, one who has stilled the mind with concentration based on virtue – such a person, through that path-knowledge, limits future lifetimes to a maximum of seven, destroying all other karmic forces. Especially, kamma leading to lower realms is eradicated. That is why the Buddha has declared that even the liberation obtained through the first path-knowledge, called Sotāpanna, is greater than universal monarchy. We must contemplate in this manner. That is the first level.

Next, the second level is shown as the state of Sakadāgāmi (Once-returner). Sakadāgāmi means that at this second level, the person's wisdom exhausts other karmas, leaving only what is required for one more existence in the deva world and one in the human world. Indeed, Sakadāgāmi means returning to this world only once more. It is possible to be born once in the deva world and then return to the human world. Next, in the one who has reached the state of Anāgāmi (Non-returner), the mind breaks many of those fetters (saṃyojana) bound to Bhava (Becoming), and takes birth in the Brahma realms called the Suddhāvāsa (Pure Abodes), attaining Parinibbāna right there. Then, only the subtle kamma to be experienced in the Suddhāvāsa remains. Next, at the stage of Arahantship, if there are any karmas that give results as diṭṭhadhammavedanīya (to be experienced in this life), those alone are left, and all other karmic forces are stilled. The mind is brought to a state where it does not bring about another birth – through the power of wisdom. That is what is called the stilling of preparations (saṅkhāra) – "Sabba-saṅkhāra-samatho". A name for Nibbāna itself is the calming of all preparations (saṅkhāra). Thus, through this array of words: calming, stilling, tranquilizing, extinguishing, what is shown is how the Buddhas solved this problem of saṃsāra – through understanding, through wisdom, through purification.

In that way, the Buddhas have shown this path of Dhamma. Accordingly, we must contemplate how we should spend our lives. Now, in a few days, you are preparing to step into a new year, a new century. We must think a little about what this past century was. Materially speaking, it was a century that progressed toward development through wondrous productions. But spiritually speaking, it was an era that faced a dangerous decline. The reason for this might be having a wrong understanding of that material progress – of its value. Through that very material progress, they must have accumulated causes for their spiritual decline. Because, you know that in daily life people say they have no opportunity to practice meditation, that there is no time in the day. The reason for this can be guessed from the situation in households. Thus, the very thing we call material progress has become the cause of our decline.

Therefore, we must strive to gain a correct understanding of the value of life, what we call our core virtues, by examining them with wisdom, and by reflecting on Dhamma stories of this kind. This is not something of today or yesterday, nor is it confined to that time, or to the lay disciple Mahākāla alone; these are things that happen to all of us. Contemplating the law contained in these according to the word of the Buddha, we must strive to develop the path that helps us escape from saṃsāra: the Noble Eightfold Path, and the threefold training – even amidst obstacles. For this can only be done during the period of a Buddha's dispensation (buddhotpāda-kāla). In a period when no Buddha arises, we would not even hear the word "Nibbāna". Even if we heard it, we would not understand it. It is such a rare opportunity. Therefore, in whatever way we contemplate a century, in truth we live only for this single moment. We live only for this moment. Everything we call life and existence lasts only for an extremely brief instant. The moment that instant breaks, it is finished right there. But we entangle ourselves through ignorance and Taṇhā (Craving). This is the truth that one must directly realize through meditation. We must directly realize this truth of Anicca (Impermanent) declared by the Buddha in our own minds. We must see this. It is through that seeing that the entangling stops. Upādāna (grasping/holding/fuel) means holding on. The mind is always holding onto something, extremely rapidly. Like a monkey jumping from tree to tree in a forest, this mind goes on holding. Thus, seeing this activity of the mind is what is called contemplation in insight (vipassanā). We must train ourselves to see how this mind operates with a concentrated mind. We must control our lives through the three doors of body, speech, and mind – using the precepts declared by the Buddha. Next, also regarding the six doors of the eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind – because it is through these doors that unwholesomeness flows in. Turning the mind away from these, next, by keeping the mind on a wholesome sign (kusala-nimitta) through some pure meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna) for a long time, one must experience the power of concentration – the strength of one's mind. It is with such a concentrated mind that one can see the true nature of one's five aggregates (pañcakkhandha) and the true nature of the world. That is the supramundane liberation declared by the Buddha. Indeed, escaping from this entanglement of kamma is possible only through the Dhamma. The powerful force of this law of kamma can be broken only by the wheel of Dhamma.

Therefore, this pious congregation must contemplate: we must strive to make a significant correction to our daily lifestyle. If you think of a new beginning, or if you think that according to some worldly convention we are facing a new century, instead of thinking about those other useless things, you should think about the core virtues of life, and shape your daily lifestyle accordingly. Shape your daily routine. Shape your timetable. Also, an important thing is one's livelihood (ājīva) – one's way of living. This is an era where livelihoods are turning towards unrighteousness in a dangerous way, an era that allows unrighteous livelihoods from every side. But you must contemplate: are you going to shorten saṃsāra, or are you going to go on and on in saṃsāra, in the midst of such a mass of Dukkha (Suffering)? If we dislike Dukkha (Suffering), we must not do the things that cause Dukkha (Suffering). We do not knowingly drink poison. We do not knowingly put poison into the well from which we drink water. If that is the case, we must contemplate not to become an enemy to ourselves. We must rise up through that very path of Dhamma declared by the Buddha.

Now we hear some people say these days – some theorists and sophists – that even by performing wholesome deeds, Bhava (Becoming) increases. Therefore, they say one should not do them either. That is a wrong view. What is here is the Middle Path (majjhimā paṭipadā). We use the wholesome to escape from the unwholesome. Through that wholesomeness, we develop good conduct – it is through this that concentration arises. By removing regrets from the mind, concentration arises. Therefore, according to the Middle Path, everything like giving alms and performing meritorious deeds is useful. However, one does not stop there. Once the mind is prepared, what does one do next? One develops insight meditation (vipassanā-bhāvanā) which aids wisdom. That is the situation. Without getting entangled in myths, without catching the snake by its tail, like crossing over a flood, we must use all of these as aids and strive to direct our mind toward Nibbāna.

Then, if we contemplate a next century or a next year, we must develop enough strength to advise, speak to, and teach the Dhamma we know to our children and everyone else so that their lives are shaped accordingly, acting as spiritual friends (kalyāṇa-mitta). That strength can be developed only by engaging in the Dhamma oneself. If one observes the precepts in this manner and meditates oneself, when facing a crisis in life, or when someone comes with a problem as if asking for a loan, if that person has fallen into a dangerous life, one will have the verbal power to prevent them in accordance with the Dhamma. Such spiritual friends are sometimes found among those who have turned to this path of Dhamma.

Therefore, we hope that this pious congregation, walking on this path of Dhamma, in this era which is heading towards a dangerous abyss, will save themselves at least through others (by following others) – saving themselves from this abyss – turning to the path of Dhamma, realizing the dangerous nature of saṃsāra mentioned here. Through that, no matter how many duties and chores you have in your daily routine, you must make a beginning, even for a short time. Sometimes people complain, saying, "We have to spend the early part of the day on these activities." Such people should gain time anew, at least by waking up 10 or 15 minutes earlier. If such a beginning is made, there is room for the benefit of that wholesome desire (kusala-chanda); even if one performs a brief meditation, through the benefits arising from it, one's energy will grow. It will grow rapidly. Furthermore, the association of spiritual friends (kalyāṇa-mitta) is essential. According to the declaration made by the Buddha, this entire dispensation (sāsana) is spiritual friendship. Therefore, while striving to be a spiritual friend oneself, one must make use of other spiritual friends. Even with difficulty, one must meet them, take their advice, and strive to carry on these activities.

Now, if you contemplate in that manner and train yourselves to perform your daily activities and direct your thoughts while reflecting on the danger of kamma, that will help you abstain from misconduct and incline toward good conduct. Thinking in this way, today, on this valuable Uposatha day – the Uposatha day that ends the year – it is a good opportunity to make certain special determinations. Thus, having observed a valuable virtue on this occasion, disciplining mind, body, and speech, and conducting your mind, body, and speech in a manner that generates and develops the spiritual faculties (indriya) and powers (bala) – namely, faith (saddhā), energy (viriya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā) – you have listened to the Dhamma during this hour. As the benefit of these, without postponing them to a distant future, you must resolve to obtain the full fruits and benefits of these in these very moments and escape from this extremely dangerous saṃsāra. For this purpose, you must pray: "May this store of merit accumulated today through the disciplining of mind, body, and speech, and by listening to the Dhamma, definitely be a supportive cause for us to escape from the Dukkha (Suffering) of saṃsāra!" Likewise, may whatever group of devas and Brahmas there are in this universe who protect the Dispensation rejoice with happy minds in the store of merit accumulated by us through listening to the Dhamma and preaching the Dhamma! May they have the strength and power to protect the world and the Dispensation, fulfilling their spiritual perfections (pāramīs)! May all of them realize the supreme, deathless, great Nibbāna through a bodhi of their aspiration! We must share merits with those devas in this manner. Likewise, whatever departed relatives of ours there may be, and all beings from Avīci up to Akaniṭṭha, including them, may they rejoice in this merit of listening to and preaching the Dhamma! May this merit be a cause for them to escape from the dukkha of saṃsāra consisting of the extremely dangerous Jāti (Birth), jarāmaraṇa (decay and death/aging and death), sickness, and to be pacified by the supreme, deathless, great Nibbāna! Share merits in this manner by reciting these stanzas:

Verse 281 from the Maggavagga (Chapter on the Path) of the Dhammapada

Dear Listeners,

This Duruthu Poya day is significant to us Buddhists because of a historical event—namely, the visit of our Leader of Peace, the Teacher of the Three Worlds, the Buddha, to Kelaniya. However, for many who think and contemplate according to the conventional calendar of the world, this Duruthu Poya in particular may also be significant as the first Poya day of a new year—and a new century.

Like in this country, many in the world look at this calendar, look at the numbers on the calendar, and anticipate a new era—a new dawn. Expecting a new dawn through the calendar itself, without any regard for one's philosophy of life, and without making an effort to rectify the shortcomings of one's philosophy of life, is a great delusion. Indeed, if one expects a new dawn, a new era in one's life, one must examine one's philosophy of life, steer away from the path of decline, and enter the Path of Dhamma (dhamma-magga) trodden by the Buddhas, Paccekabuddhas, and Great Arahants. One must step into it. The verse we have chosen as our theme today is one that presents that Path of Dhamma in an extremely concise and simple manner. What is also evident from the background story of this verse is the fate that befell a monk who set out on an unrighteous path (adhamma-magga) in expectation of a new dawn—a new era.

At one time, while the Buddha was residing at the Veluvana Monastery in Rājagaha, one day the highly faithful Great Arahant Moggallāna and Venerable Lakkhaṇa were descending from the Gijjhakūṭa (Vulture's Peak) mountain. At one point, the Great Arahant Moggallāna smiled slightly. Seeing this, Venerable Lakkhaṇa asked for the reason. The Great Arahant Moggallāna said, "Friend, I will not speak of this matter here. Ask me in the presence of the Buddha."

So, both of these elders, after collecting alms in the city of Rājagaha, approached the Buddha. Having arrived at the Veluvana Monastery, Venerable Lakkhaṇa then asked in the presence of the Buddha, "Why, friend, did you smile in that manner?" At that moment, the Great Arahant Moggallāna declared: "At that moment, I saw a certain massive preta (hungry ghost) form. The body was like that of a human, but the head was like that of a pig. Close to it, there was a pig's tail in its mouth. Worms were oozing from its mouth. Seeing this, a thought arose in me: 'What an extraordinarily strange form! I have never seen such a form before.'" Hearing this, the Buddha expressed his approval: "It is clear that my disciples live with eyes that see. I, too, saw this creature. I saw this creature at the very moment I attained Buddhahood at the foot of the Bodhi tree. However, I did not declare it until now because, if many did not believe what I said and thought it to be a lie, they might bind themselves to unwholesome deeds (akusala) and be reborn in hell. Now that Moggallāna has spoken of this matter as a witness, I also endorse it. What Moggallāna said is true."

Then, on that occasion, the Sangha asked: "Blessed One, what was the past unwholesome deed (akusala) committed by this person to receive such a preta rebirth?" It was on this occasion that the Buddha brought forth the past account.

During the time of Kassapa Buddha—when speaking of the time of Kassapa Buddha, these devotees must bear in mind that the maximum lifespan of humans was twenty-thousand years. It is worth keeping this in mind first. It is mentioned in this Dhamma. Lifespans as long as twenty-thousand years. Not only that, during the times of other Buddhas, lifespans were forty-thousand, sixty-thousand, eighty-thousand years, and even longer periods. Thinking about this, these devotees can now realize: we—who jump up and down, dance, and enjoy ourselves because a century has passed—when we think about the lifespans of those long-lived humans, aren't our lives like those of ephemerals? Well, anyway, the Buddha now directs the minds of the Sangha to the time of Kassapa Buddha. At that time, two monks of the Sangha lived together in great harmony in a village monastery. The senior monk had sixty Rains Retreats (vassa) since his higher ordination (upasampadā). The second monk had fifty-nine Rains Retreats. Although there was a difference of one year, that second monk was extremely humble, carrying the bowl and robes of the senior monk like a novice monk (sāmaṇera). He performed all the duties and services. Like two children of the same mother—like two born of the same womb—they spent their time in great harmony.

While they were living in this manner, a Dhamma-preaching (dhamma-kathika) monk arrived at that place. It was a day for listening to the Dhamma. Since these monks were accustomed to listening to the Dhamma on such days, they invited this Dhamma-preaching monk to deliver some Dhamma. When he preached the Dhamma, these two monks expressed great joy.

The next day, they went to the village for alms together with this monk. After the alms-round, the senior monk invited this Dhamma-preaching monk to preach the Dhamma to the laypeople. When he preached the Dhamma, the people were highly pleased and invited him for the next day as well. In this way, this monk became very popular. He went on alms-round to the surrounding villages together with those two monks.

Meanwhile, a thought occurred to this monk—a sinful, evil thought: "Alas! These are two weak monks, two foolish monks. I must see to it that I drive these two away from here and take over this place." Thinking thus, he devised a scheme. What was the scheme? Going to the senior monk—the elder monk—one day, pretending to share a great secret out of friendship, he said, "Venerable sir, I have one thing to tell you." When asked, "What is it? Tell me, tell me," he sighed heavily and said, "Alas! Speaking of this matter might cause great harm," and left it at that. He did not say it. Likewise, he went to the second monk and started by saying, "I have something to tell you," and then withdrew without saying it.

Was the second monk highly trustful? "Alas, yes! We are very harmonious, like children born of the same womb. I have not seen any fault in that venerable one all this time," he declared. "If that is so, venerable sir, from the day I arrived, that monk has been saying to associate with the senior monk with caution, to be careful." Then, that senior monk developed great anger towards the second monk. A hatred (dosa) arose, thinking, "Alas, did he say such a thing to a visiting monk?" Next, going to the second monk as well, that monk told a similar slanderous tale. "It wasn't even slander—it was an outright lie." When he said it, that monk too was estranged; they were split apart.

These two, who used to go on alms-round together in harmony, went on alms-round separately the next day. After the alms-round, the second monk arrived at the alms-hall first. Seeing the senior monk coming, he thought whether to go forward to take his bowl and robes as was his usual habit. Thinking, "No matter, let me perform the duty that is mine," he went forward. As he approached, the senior monk drove him away, saying, "Undisciplined monk, you are not worthy of holding my bowl and robes." Then, both of them spoke out: "Do you think I am holding on to this monastery?" The senior monk also spoke in that manner—one can imagine what kind of dispute it was. Having disputed in this manner, what was the result? These two—one went out through the front door, and the other went out through the back door. They departed. Then, that cunning Dhamma-preacher monk came forward pretendingly, saying, "No, no, do not go, do not go!" acting as if to settle the matter. When those monks said, "You may stay here," he remained there.

The next day, when that Dhamma-preacher monk went to the village for alms, the people asked, "Where are our two monks?" When he replied, "Those two clan-monks of yours quarreled and disputed, and have departed," the foolish people also thought this to be true. The wise ones, however, realized: "Undoubtedly, it is this monk who must have arranged matters for those two to depart." In any case, those two monks went separately to distant areas. Because of this matter, the hatred (dosa) and other defilements (kilesa) that arose in their minds were so intense that they could not concentrate their minds. They could not meditate. In this way, a long period of time passed.

When we say "a long period of time," what is the event described next? The Buddha declares that after 100 years—and "one hundred years" must be understood in relation to the twenty-thousand-year lifespan—after one hundred years, by chance, both of these monks arrived as guests at a certain hermitage (senāsana) in a distant province. At that place, the Sangha offered the exact same hermitage to both of these monks. So, first, the elder monk arrived and just as he sat on the bed in the lodging, the second monk also arrived. This was an event like a strange, wondrous convergence. Then, just as he entered, recognizing him, tears began to flow from the eyes of this senior monk. With great sorrow, his eyes filled with tears, thinking whether to speak or not, the second monk asked, "Venerable sir, during all the time I associated with you, did you see any fault in me, in body or speech?" "No, no, I saw no such thing." "Then why did you say such a thing to that newly arrived monk, telling him not to trust me?" "Alas, I said no such thing!" "I too was told such a thing about you."

Then they realized that it was because of the words of that cunning monk that they had been estranged. Immediately, both of them reconciled after confessing their offenses (āpatti-desanā). Then they talked to each other: "We must now go to search for that cunning monk." Having traveled there, when they approached that monastery, the Dhamma-preacher monk, seeing them coming, came forward to take their bowls and robes. This senior monk, then—perhaps due to the majesty of the Dhamma (dhamma-teja)—snapped his fingers and said, "People like you do not deserve to stay here," speaking words of banishment. Unable to bear it, that monk left, abandoning that place. That was the event.

In connection with that, the Buddha then declares: due to that grave unwholesome deed (akusala) committed by that Dhamma-preacher monk, for a long period—for an entire interval between two Buddhas (buddhāntara), from the time of Kassapa Buddha to this Buddha-era—he boiled in the Avīci hell. As the residual result (vipāka) of that bad karma (kamma)—as the tail-end or the conclusion of that sinful deed—he has now received this preta existence (preta-ātma-bhāva). This is the event.

Having declared so, and explaining that this is the consequence of being unrestrained in mind, body, and speech and converting them to evil in this manner—that this is the state of affairs—using that event as a background and foundation, the Buddha, as an instruction to the world, uttered that verse of Dhamma (dhamma-gāthā) which we mentioned earlier:

Vācānurakkhī manasā susaṁvuto

Kāyena ca akusalam na kayirā

Ete tayo kammapathe visodhaye

Ārādhaye maggam isippaveditam

"Vācānurakkhī" means being guarded in speech. "Manasā susaṁvuto"—well-restrained in mind, in thought. "Kāyena ca akusalam na kayirā"—doing no unwholesome deed with the body either. This means guarding all the three doors (of action). "Ete tayo kammapathe visodhaye"—"Purify all these three pathways of action (kammapatha). Because of these three doors, various actions (kamma) arise. Purify those pathways of action." By purifying them in this manner, "ārādhaye maggam isippaveditam"—"One accomplishes the path proclaimed and taught by the supreme sages, the Buddhas and others; one conducts oneself according to that path." This is the instruction.

Now, first, let us look at the themes we can extract as instructions for ourselves from the story related to this verse. We see from that story how two monks who were living in harmony, combining lying and slandering, with the painful desire of adinnādāna (taking what is not given) to acquire what did not belong to them, and adopting such a course of speech and action, consequently ended up in that terrible state.

Therefore, let us look especially at the "pig-mouthed preta" (sūkara-preta) mentioned in this current story—it is called sūkara-preta because of its pig-like mouth. Today, there is a great interest in this story of the sūkara-preta and about the "unseen world" among many people. A certain interest in these ghost existences (bhūta-ātma) and preta existences has arisen in this era. What we see from this present event is that there are indeed those with eyes that can see this unseen world. The Great Arahant Moggallāna saw it with his divine eye (dibba-cakkhu). However, since it was not visible to Venerable Lakkhaṇa, Moggallāna remained silent without mentioning it, thinking that Venerable Lakkhaṇa might accumulate unwholesome karma (akusala) by doubting or speaking against it. Likewise, the Buddha too, though he had seen it, did not declare it until he had a witness. Therefore, the eye that sees this unseen world is the divine eye (dibba-cakkhu). It has the power to see not only ghost existences and preta worlds, but also other worlds—hell (niraya), the asura world, and even the deva worlds and brahma worlds.

Thus, we must contemplate that there is such evidence here. The Dhamma mentions three kinds of eyes: the physical eye (maṁsa-cakkhu), the divine eye (dibba-cakkhu), and the wisdom eye (paññā-cakkhu). In Sinhala, we can call them mamsa, divya, and paññasa. Paññasa means the eye of wisdom (paññā-cakkhu). These three types of eyes are mentioned. Here, it is the divine eye (dibba-cakkhu) that is being spoken of. When the Buddha declared here, "My disciples live with eyes," he said so with this divine eye in mind. Now, in this day and age, some people—perhaps some skeptical relatives—might say, "We do not get to see such beings. There is no such thing." It is mentioned in the Dhamma that for those who cannot develop the divine eye to say there is no divine eye is just like blind people saying there is no sun, moon, or stars.

On the other hand, since there is an interest in this unseen world as mentioned, we can also say something about it. Today, many people—especially Western psychologists—using various terms like "hyper-mental" or "extrasensory"—using beautiful words—try to demonstrate various things about these three-fold worlds through certain experiments. This is like children's play. For those parapsychological investigations, they mostly employ hypnotism, mesmerism, and other such techniques. Through these, they attempt to uncover certain things about these three-fold worlds. However, according to the Dhamma, in the proper way—since many might doubt those methods—to realize it for oneself, that very divine eye (dibba-cakkhu) is necessary. It is by cultivating virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā), or specifically by attaining the meditative absorptions (jhāna-samāpatti) and generating that special power within the mind called direct knowledge (abhiññā), that one can bring forth the divine eye based on this physical eye. Then, those who possess that divine eye see such worlds. It is with the help of that eye that the Buddha, as well as the Great Arahant Moggallāna, on many occasions demonstrated how beings in the world reach various states in accordance with their actions (kamma).

Now, if we contemplate a little further on this preta existence—that a body usually arises in exact accordance with one's karma—here too, when we think of that monk, he has a large body fitting the greatness he aspired to. Also, because of the impure words he used, his head was like that of a pig. Furthermore, the cunning trap he set to acquire that monastery is that pig's tail in his mouth. Also, worms were oozing from his body. Such was his state. It is mentioned that as a result of using harsh words to split and estrange people, one receives such hungry ghost existences (preta-ātma) with highly bizarre forms.

Not only that. There are many other parallel discourses (sutta) mentioned in the division of the Dhamma called the Lakkhaṇa Saṃyutta. Written in the form of dialogues between the Great Arahant Moggallāna and Venerable Lakkhaṇa—or rather, regarding the instruction given to those who ordained as disciples—many other matters are presented in the Dhamma. If we were to mention several of those terrifying preta forms—on every occasion those preta forms were seen, on every such occasion, as mentioned before, it was in the presence of the Buddha that the Great Arahant Moggallāna revealed the details. On those occasions, the Buddha also briefly pointed out the past history of each preta. There is a whole series of such discourses. Since they are similar, we shall mention them. On one occasion, it is mentioned that he saw a skeleton flying through the air. A skeleton was traveling through the air. Hawks, vultures, and crows were attacking and pecking between the ribs of that skeleton from time to time. That skeleton was flying through the air uttering wails. That form was of a cattle-butcher—one who slaughtered cattle—who lived in that very city of Rājagaha. Next, likewise, a piece of meat was flying through the air. Vultures were pecking at that piece of meat in the same manner. The piece of meat was screaming—a form in the shape of a piece of meat is described there. A preta existence with such a form. The karma for that is shown as a bird-hunter who lived in that very city of Rājagaha. Next, a human form without skin is mentioned. It too was flying through the air. Animals were pecking at it in the same manner. There, a sheep-hunter is indicated. Next, another preta existence is described, seen by the Great Arahant Moggallāna, with hairs like swords. Those swords, jumping up and down, fell back onto the body and cut it. That is shown as a pig-hunter. A pig-hunter who lived in that very city of Rājagaha received that state due to his karma. Next, another state of existence is shown: a preta is flying without a head. A headless preta form. Its eyes and mouth were located on its chest. Animals were pecking at it in the same manner. It was flying while uttering wails. In that case, the Buddha explains: this was a robber-executioner who lived in that very city of Rājagaha. An executioner. What we call a hangman today. A man who kills captured thieves by cutting off their heads. The Buddha mentions this with his name, "Hārīka the robber-executioner." Next, another such is shown. Another preta is immersed up to his head in a pit of feces. That person was one who committed adultery (paradāra-sevana). Next, on another occasion, the Great Arahant Moggallāna saw a skinless woman flying through the air—not by the force of wind. That too was a preta existence. Animals were pecking her in the same manner. She was a woman who committed adultery (parapuruṣa-sevana).

There is a large number of such existences. Next, what is even more important to remember in this day and age is that the Great Arahant Moggallāna saw a monk-form flying through the air—not by the force of wind. All the robes (double-layered robes) of that monk-form were on fire. The waistband was on fire. The bowl was on fire. It was flying through the air while burning. That was a sinful monk (pāpa-bhikkhu), from the time of Kassapa Buddha. Likewise, a sinful nun (pāpa-bhikkhunī), a sinful novice monk (pāpa-sāmaṇera), and a novice nun (sāmaṇerī) were flying through the air, burning in flames. So, these are things we must keep in mind.

We think of this as a great suffering. In almost every case, the Buddha points out that having first paid the major portion of this sinful karma (pāpa-kamma) in hell—having boiled in hell, having boiled in the great Avīci hell—they have received these preta existences as the residual portion of that bad karma. Thus, there are many instances in the discourses where the Buddha points out the results of karma (kamma-vipāka).

Based on this, even without being told anew, these devotees can understand the point we mentioned—how to bring about a new era. Now, let us also direct our minds to that verse. If we take the words of this verse in more detail: "Vācānurakkhī"—"one should guard one's speech." Generally, these devotees have heard of the ten unwholesome courses of action (dasa-akusala). They are the three bodily offenses: killing (prāṇātipāta), taking what is not given (adinnādāna), and sexual misconduct (kāmesu-micchācāra). Next, by speech: lying (musāvāda), slandering (pisuṇāvācā), harsh speech (pharusiṇāvācā), and frivolous talk (samphappalāpa). Now, in the Ājīva-Aṭṭhamaka-Sīla (Eight Precepts with Pure Livelihood as the Eighth) observed today, these are described as offenses committed by speech. The offenses committed by the mind are described as abhidhyā—which is covetousness or intense greed—abhidhyā is the intense greed to possess what belongs to others. Next, vyāpāda, which is hatred or ill-will. Next, "micchā-ditṭhi", wrong view. These are the unwholesome deeds (akusala) committed by the mind, by thought. Here, it says "vācānurakkhī"—here, speech has been given the primary place. This is because the unwholesome deed in this story is regarding speech. "Vācānurakkhī manasā susaṁvuto"—being well-restrained in mind means abstaining from those offenses committed by the mind. "Kāyena ca akusalaṃ na kayirā" means abstaining from those three offenses committed by the body. So, guarding these three doors is what should be done by anyone born in this human world who expects progress. As stated in the Parābhava Sutta, "One who loves the Dhamma prospers, one who hates the Dhamma declines" (Dhammakāmo bhavaṃ hoti, dhammadeṣi parābhavo). A person who loves the Dhamma is indeed the one who succeeds in the world. The person who hates the Dhamma meets with decline, which is destruction; he falls into ruin.

In the world today, however, people often argue for the opposite. Some say there is "no place" (no standing/prosperity) for a person who lives according to the Dhamma. What they call "place" or standing belongs to those who turn their backs on the Dhamma and live according to wrong livelihood (micchā-ājīva), employing various other tricks and legal loopholes. By whatever legal loophole one makes another's property one's own, that very loophole can come back to one's own mouth—directly to one's own mouth. There is such a dangerous situation. Then, what is the "standing" that those people have? According to the Buddha's words, based on the matters discussed, one can understand. It is hell, the animal realm, the preta world, and the asura realm. That is where it is. Therefore, for a person who seeks "such a place" (the secure path), they can shape their philosophy of life according to such a practice (paṭipadā).

So, based on this, we can understand: to live in such a way that we do not fall into those terrible states from this highly rare human existence (manussa-atta-bhāva) we have obtained, we must pay close attention to what the Buddha and other noble ones have taught regarding this mind, body, and speech. "Vācānurakkhī" means one must engage in guarding one's speech. Sometimes, without even realizing it, a lie slips out, or slander, or harsh speech. Next, various other frivolous words. Therefore, one must develop a guard over speech. There must be restraint over the mind. Otherwise, without even realizing it, one adopts wrong views—due to associating with bad friends, one adopts wrong views. Or else, one generates thoughts of hatred. Or else, one generates intense greed. Now, in the monk mentioned here, there was abhidhyā—the intense greed, the corrupt greed to make what belongs to others one's own. Slander, lying, and then theft—all of these were present in that monk's course of action. The consequences of these are shown in that story.

Therefore, if we always practice this guard in our day-to-day lives, the Buddha has shown its result in this world—these devotees may have heard of it—if a lay devotee lives a highly virtuous life, he receives a valuable happiness that others do not get. This is called "the happiness of blamelessness" (anavajja-sukha). From the feeling that "I have done no wrong," a person experiences great relief. The opposite of that is regret. Now, in the Dhamma too, the Buddha shows in one discourse the difference between the fool (bāla) and the wise (paṇḍita). The monk in this story might have thought that because he was a Dhamma-preaching monk and those other monks behaved in a very simple/weak manner, "I am the wise one." That so-called wisdom of his resulted in that very consequence. That is how the ordinary world thinks. If someone lives humbly according to the Dhamma, they are considered a fool. In this day and age, wisdom is recognized by the letters at the end of one's name, or else by the prefix before it. That is not how the Buddha showed the difference between the fool and the wise.

The fool is described as follows: "dubbhita-cintī, dubbhāsita-bhāsī, dukkata-kammakārī"—if someone thinks bad thoughts, speaks bad words, and takes bad courses of action, performs bad deeds, that person indeed is the fool. Next, the wise person is described as: "suciñcita-cintī, subhāsita-bhāsī, sukata-kammakārī"—if someone thinks good thoughts, speaks good words, and performs good deeds, that person indeed is the wise one. Showing the difference between these two, the Buddha demonstrates on that occasion how the fool, due to that foolishness—no matter how much he stands out in the world—suffers internal pain and regret. That is why the Dhamma describes four kinds of fear that a person who leads a wrong life must experience: the fear of self-reproach (attānuvāda-bhaya), the fear of others' reproach (parānuvāda-bhaya), the fear of punishment (daṇḍa-bhaya), and the fear of an unhappy destination (duggati-bhaya). One's own mind blames oneself. One has to hear the blame of others—the blame of wise people, not of just anyone. Next, one has to undergo punishment according to the laws of the land. Even if one escapes all of those, in the end, one goes to a bad destination (duggati).

Here, the Buddha explains further that very "fear of self-reproach" (attānuvāda-bhaya), where one's own mind blames oneself. He shows it as occurring on three occasions. Now, when a fool who has committed those wrongs such as killing, taking what is not given, and sexual misconduct, walks through the village, or through the town, or sits in an assembly, or stands at a crossroads, he hears others talking about those very sinful deeds (pāpa-kamma). It may not be about this person. But when they speak of killing, of theft, or of wrong deeds, that person's mind whispers from within, "I too have done such things, haven't I?" and his mind blames him. Those thoughts come to his mind. So, he feels regret: "I too have done these harsh things that they speak of." That is the first occasion. The second occasion is shown: this person receives punishment, or hears about it—as described in those days—a king captures those who committed such wrongs and punishes them. Seeing this, or hearing about it, this person also experiences a shock in his heart: "Alas! I too have done these things, haven't I? If I am caught by the king's men, I too will have to suffer such torture." Thus, he feels regret in his mind, suffers, and repents. Next, this very regret is shown in the story—this person is either sitting on a chair, or lying on a bed, or lying on the ground. While remaining in this way, there comes to his mind the shadow, the image, of his past karma. The Buddha has given a simile to show this: just as in the evening, the shadow of a mountain stretches out gradually—just as that shadow hangs over the mountain, in the same way, the shadow, the image of the sinful karma he committed in the past, hangs over and overwhelms the mind of that fool, of that foolish person.

Some people, based on this simile, think that sinful karma is something that floats around in the sky, and that this is a simile for seeing that. That is not what is being said here. These devotees know that when describing wholesome (kusala) and unwholesome (akusala) qualities (dhamma), the simile of the shadow is given in the Dhamma. Likewise, what is spoken of here is this shadow. This shadow is something that brings sorrow to oneself, not something that brings joy. It is for one's regret. When we say "evening time," we know that as the sun goes down, that shadow lengthens. In the same way, the past sinful deeds affect the mind of this person. These must be experienced in this world—within this very life. It is said that from the very moment a sinful deed is committed, these results (vipāka) flow in. If "result" (vipāka) means a ripening, this is not something that ripens all of a sudden. It is not something that plunges one into hell all of a sudden after death. It "brews" (ripens) within the mind. It ripens within the mind in the manner described, in the form of regrets. Having ripened and ripened in this way, some people—as we often hear—suffer at the moment of death. We often hear of this in this day and age as well, not only in the Buddha's time.

These devotees must have heard of many such striking events from the Buddha's time. The pig-killer named Cunda lived right behind the Veluvana Monastery. He was highly skilled. What is done today with state aid—Cunda the pig-killer did that very work alone. Catching pigs, killing them, he carried on that livelihood. But at the moment of death, running here and there like a pig, uttering loud wails, and experiencing a mountain of great suffering, he was born in the Avīci hell. Similarly, we get to hear of other such events in the future. We might hear even more of them in the future as our economy develops—through the aforementioned wrong livelihood (micchā-ājīva). Therefore, it is not very necessary to give textual evidence for them. A time will come in the future when they can be seen in daily life. The consequences of spending life as human pretas—as human yakṣas—will be demonstrated in this very world. That is highly important. Now, then, there will be plenty of work for those paranormal researchers, the Western scientists, to come, conduct research, and obtain degrees. But many who follow them make this a form of intellectualism, always "studying" these, writing books, and obtaining degrees, instead of learning the lesson from these and being eager to adjust their own lives—their philosophy of life. It is not for such a purpose that we showed these examples. It is not for these devotees to write books and get degrees, but to adjust their own lives and make that aforementioned deathless century—the new year—truly a new dawn, a new era.

Therefore, we must contemplate—in this world—whether we will become a fool or a wise person as shown by the Buddha. According to the Buddha's words, to become a wise person, one does not need to pass any examinations. Nowadays, the very word "wise" (pañḍita) has a meaning associated with learning. But the Buddha gives a different meaning to it. Because wisdom means far-sightedness. If a course of action is short-sighted, no matter how many clever tricks one has, that person is not a wise person. Thinking and contemplating on this, it becomes clear. The Buddha—who is called the Knower of the Worlds (lokavidū)—is the supreme individual who knew everything that should be known about this world. The Buddha does not need clever tricks. Within that aforementioned quality of the Tathāgata lies the marvelous nature of the Buddha.

Thus, the Buddha, having known with his Buddha-knowledge, has shown in this very simple manner how one becomes a wise person in the world, and how one becomes a fool—along with its dangers (ādīnava) and benefits (ānīśamsa). Therefore, we must contemplate: to adjust our lives, there is not much to do. These three doors we have—these three doors are open to society, to the external society. Thus, we must properly open and close these three doors. Guarding the three doors means: let us say a state of bias or greed (agati) came to us. At that moment, if a neighbor's bunch of bananas is nearby, or hanging into our garden, or if there is some property that no one is watching, with no owner to be seen, then we take it with a thieving mind. Next, regarding food—if it is tasty food, we kill an animal. In this way, our mind tells us to do various things. If we open the door in that direction according to those thoughts, harm is done to others.

Now, it is shown in the Dhamma, in the analysis of wholesome (kusala) and unwholesome (akusala) states—if we actually contemplate on the word "kusala"—nowadays, "kusalatā" means "skill/ability." If kusalatā is skill, then kusala actually means being skilled. It is not the analysis of skill and lack of skill done in this day and age that the Buddha has shown; who is the truly skilled one? What is recognized as true kusala is non-greed (alobha), non-hatred (adosa), and non-delusion (amoha). Let us first speak of the unwholesome (akusala). What are shown as the roots of the unwholesome are greed (lobha), hatred (dosa), and delusion (moha)—the three roots of defilement (kilesa-mūla) that have existed for a long time in the mental stream of beings. Those courses of action that spring from body, speech, and mind due to these three roots are what are shown as akusala, on the one hand—taking them as the roots. Next, those very thoughts that help to steer away from that greed, hatred, and delusion—generating such concepts of non-greed, non-hatred, and non-delusion, and the actions performed, words used, and thoughts thought in accordance with them—are what can be shown as kusala.

To put another way, this human being does not live only with humans. In terms of saṃsāric connection, we may regard past beings as our parents and children; looking at the relationships in this Dhamma, in this long saṃsāra, we have taken birth even in those animal existences. One's parents, having passed away, might sometimes be born as dogs or cats in one's own home. Therefore, when we contemplate in this manner, this entire vast universe is a society. It is towards that society that the three doors are open. Thus, if someone, overcome by those aforementioned unwholesome roots, commits those bodily wrongs such as killing, taking what is not given, and sexual misconduct, or uses those words such as lying, slandering, harsh speech, and frivolous talk—regarding the door of speech—and regarding the mind, if one generates that intense, corrupt greed (abhidhyā) in the mind, generates hatred, and takes into the mind those wrong views called micchā-diṭṭhi, then that person falls into that aforementioned state of a fool. Especially, he will have to suffer their consequences at that very moment. Thus, one must contemplate. That is what is called akusala—being unskilled. What is that lack of skill? For what reason does the Buddha call it unskilled? This saṃsāric journey is an extremely dangerous journey. If one does not go carefully, one will get into trouble. One will fall into great abysses. That very abyss is described by those words: "apāyaṃ duggatīṃ vinipātāṃ nirayaṃ upapajjati" (he is reborn in the state of deprivation, the bad destination, the abyss, the hell).

"Apāya" means, when a vehicle is traveling, deviating from that road. Suppose a vehicle went off the road. Next, "duggati" means like traveling through a wasteland. Then, running along the flat wasteland for a while. "Vinipāta" means then falling down a cliff. "Niraya" means being shattered to pieces. Think of it in that way. This might be a simile not found in the books, but it is mentioned because it helps to direct the mind. These four words are used: "apāyaṃ duggatīṃ vinipātāṃ nirayaṃ upapajjati". These four words are used regarding a person who has committed sins. In that manner, he went off the road to the bad side. Next, going along that wasteland, in the end, he falls down the cliff and is destroyed. In that way, he falls into the state of hell. Thus, living in such a way that this does not happen is skill, kusala. Similarly, just as avoiding going to those bad places like hell—that bad side—next, one draws close to Nibbāna. What is Nibbāna? Nowadays, we hear some people arguing: "If you do meritorious deeds (puñña-dhamma) and the like, samsāra increases. Therefore, those are not necessary." On the other hand, there comes an opinion that meditation is not necessary either. However, in whatever way it is said, what we have to understand here is that the skill shown by the Buddha is to escape from that path to hell and draw close to Nibbāna as quickly as possible. What is Nibbāna? Nibbāna is the peacefulness, the supreme peace, the coolness of freeing the mind from greed, hatred, and delusion. If greed, hatred, and delusion are a fire, it is a certain "coolness"—a cool state—that one generates in one's own mental stream by extinguishing that fire. It is an extremely subtle, peaceful happiness. That is what is called Nibbāna, supreme peace. It is not something hanging in another world, or floating in the sky in that manner. Often, even Buddhist thinkers who follow scientists have become accustomed to thinking of all of this as something separate from themselves. Now, these devotees might often see in books, when they speak of this karma, rebirth, and all of that, they speak of them as if they were not something belonging to oneself, but as things that should be known by conducting scientific research in this world. Whether they affect oneself or not is understood at the moment of death—even on the deathbed.

Therefore, if one does not put all this knowledge into use, it is useless. No matter how much knowledge one has, that person is a fool, a bāla. If one is a wise person, one must be, as mentioned, "suciñcita-cintī, subhāsita-bhāsī, sukata-kammakārī". Through one's thoughts, one's words, and one's course of action, one must be aligned with the Dhamma. Turning away from greed towards non-greed. Drawing close to non-greed means drawing close to Nibbāna. Drawing close to non-hatred means drawing close to Nibbāna. Drawing close to non-delusion means drawing close to Nibbāna. Because Nibbāna is described as the end of the journey of non-greed, non-hatred, and non-delusion. Now, if we think of this for a moment as a journey, everyone of these devotees has heard that the samsāric journey is made based on greed, hatred, and delusion. Let us think of a race—or even if we think of a journey—we go from one place to another. Then, abandoning those three samsāric targets of greed, hatred, and delusion present in the samsāric being—turning one's back on them—seeking that peace called Nibbāna, escaping from those three fires and going towards coolness is what is called non-greed, non-hatred, and non-delusion. Every thought that helps in that is a help to Nibbāna. Something that helps towards Nibbāna. Then, when performing acts of charity and merit, a certain number of wholesome feelings arise in that person's mind. When giving alms, within that feeling of letting go, the mental factor of non-greed (alobha-cetasika) is present. Compassion is there. Faith is there. Next, there is a moment when the feeling of "I" and "mine" disappears—when parting with something belonging to oneself, when giving it into the hand of another. Then, why would that not be a help to Nibbāna? Those do help towards Nibbāna. It is those very things, accumulated in that manner, that in the end, at some moment, bring about the fruit in that mental stream—the fruit of Nibbāna. If one aspires to Nibbāna, they bring about the fruit of Nibbāna. In addition, by weakening the unwholesome deeds that lead to hell, those places born as results of the wholesome side—such as the deva worlds and brahma worlds—are the places of birth. Those too are visible to the aforementioned divine eye (dibba-cakkhu). It may not be possible to find out much more about them through paranormal research. What is mostly found—what those researchers might find even more of in the future—are examples regarding the aforementioned preta worlds and ghost worlds. This is because those who go to that side are the majority.

Be that as it may, this group of devotees must contemplate: if we are indeed making a beginning of a century in that manner, what is this century? When we contemplate the long lifespans during the times of Kassapa Buddha—and even before him, Kakusandha, Koṇāgama, and other Buddhas—to us, a single year is like the blink of an eye. Contemplate, devotees, on how time passes. When directing the mind to the moment we thought of as the beginning of a century—it feels like it was just yesterday. Yet, it is within this that the world makes a great deal of merrymaking. What happens in the meantime? Our lives are spent. Our lives are spent. What is meant by a valuable life? A body obtained during the time of a Buddha's appearance, which can be directed towards the Dhamma, which can practice according to the Dhamma, without any physical disability. Now, those who received those preta existences as mentioned before are the ones who, when they finally receive human existence, suffer the consequences by being born with various kinds of physical disabilities. If this group of devotees is free from such physical disabilities, and possesses the power of understanding to comprehend the Dhamma, then this lifetime becomes a valuable one. Short, but a valuable thing. One must think of it as a valuable thing like a gem. Why? Because there are still things to be done for oneself. This is a highly valuable opportunity to bring this saṃsāric journey to an end. Thus, what helps towards that is the accumulation of virtuous qualities (guṇa-dhamma).

Thus, the brief statement here about training and purifying this mind, body, and speech can be described in various ways. It can be described as giving (dāna), virtue (sīla), and meditation (bhāvanā). It belongs to the threefold mass of merit (puñña-kkhandha). Next, if we look at it in another way, as directly helping Nibbāna: virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). It is about virtue (sīla) that was spoken here especially. Virtue—next, it is through virtue that one develops concentration. Some think of virtue as something unnecessary. The Buddha has declared: if someone performs "heavy work" that requires strength, if someone does heavy work, they must do so standing on a firm ground. One cannot lift a heavy load while standing in a mud pit. These devotees know this. Can one lift a heavy sack of grain while standing in a mud pit? Then, one would also sink. That is why these devotees observe this five-fold virtue (pañca-sīla), the eight-fold virtue with pure livelihood (ājīva-aṭṭhamaka-sīla), the eight poya-day precepts, the ten precepts, etc. It is based on that virtue that one concentrates the mind. This is because it becomes difficult to concentrate the mind if those regrets—which were mentioned in the story of the fool and the wise—if those regrets flow into the mind. To prevent those regrets, one must first discipline the body and speech. That is what is called virtue (sīla). One might have committed many sins in saṃsāra—but today, at this moment, these devotees who have observed these precepts can think, "No matter how it is on other days, today, on this day, I stand upon the principles of this virtue." Then, standing upon those principles of virtue, with the help of that strength, one can calm the mind and attain concentration (samādhi).

Concentration (samādhi) means removing those hindrances (nīvaraṇa-dhamma) that obstruct the oneness of the mind—such as sensual thoughts, thoughts of hatred, sloth and torpor, restlessness and worry, and skeptical doubt—and placing the mind on a certain wholesome object. Having concentrated the mind in that manner, next, one directs that concentrated mind to comprehend the true state of affairs shown by the Buddhas—the nature of impermanence (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and non-self (anattā). It is insight meditation (vipassanā) that helps in that comprehension. As insight, this is something that must be seen within one's own mental stream. This is not something that can be obtained from books. This is not something that can be obtained by conducting "research" in that manner. That research must be conducted internally. This is called "the noble quest" (ariya-pariyesana). What the Buddha did was also that noble quest. Therefore, on this highly valuable day, these devotees too must make a determination to conduct that noble quest. The beginning of making such a determination is what was expressed here—to be as diligent as possible in guarding these three doors of mind, body, and speech. No matter what kind of problems arise in day-to-day life, no matter what kind of difficulties come, if one does not guard these three doors, the Buddha has shown what will happen to oneself. He has declared, "Kammasakā kammadāyādā" (beings are owners of their actions, heirs to their actions); what one carries with oneself, what truly belongs to oneself, is the good or bad one has done. Next, that indeed is one's inheritance in saṃsāra.

Contemplating on that, then, on this valuable Poya day, these devotees listened to many matters of the Dhamma of the Buddhas, which are helpful to one's life, which help to create a well-adjusted philosophy of life, and which help to bring about a true dawn. Bearing in mind that Buddha who preached this—we said these few matters not as something preached by us, but in connection with the teaching of the Buddha—one must generate the strength of faith (saddhā) towards the Triple Gem, firmly determine upon one's permanent virtue (nicca-sīla)—whether the five precepts (pañca-sīla) or the eight precepts with pure livelihood (ājīva-aṭṭhamaka-sīla)—and additionally, as a way of utilizing it, turn towards meditation and make a strong determination to spend this year in that manner.

During all this time, having restrained mind, body, and speech, and having observed a certain virtue, you listened to the Dhamma in a manner that well develops faith (saddhā), energy (vīriya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). This mass of merit (kusala-sambhāra) accumulated through this, and the mass of merit we have accumulated through preaching the Dhamma—we must contemplate: no matter what obstacles there are to this Dispensation (sāsana), to weaken this speed of decline, there exists a certain protective assembly of devas of right view (sammā-diṭṭhika-deva-maṇḍala), including those Deva and Brahma kings who associated with the Buddhas, who protect the Dispensation. Whether these devotees have seen them or not—may they also rejoice in these merits! May they provide further protection to this Dispensation! Likewise, we must transfer these merits to our departed relatives. May our lives also be directed towards the state of Nibbāna through this path of virtue, concentration, and wisdom (sīla-samādhi-paññā-magga), and by realizing the paths and fruits (magga-phala-paṭivedha) of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti), Once-returning (Sakadāgāmī), Non-returning (Anāgāmī), and Arahantship (Arahatta), may we realize the supreme, noble, great deathless Nibbāna! Aspiring thus, you must now share these merits by reciting the verses.

Verse 178 from the Lokavagga (Chapter on the World) of the Dhammapada

Dear Listeners,

Today, on this Vap Full Moon Poya day, despite the inclement weather, you have gathered here to listen to some word of the Dhamma—a section of the Dhamma—of the Blessed One. Buddhist devotees expect to listen to the Dhamma in order to obtain some light for their lives, to mold their lives. This human life we have obtained has been introduced by the Blessed One as something extremely rare. Human life is rare; likewise, it is a valuable life. But the value of this humanity is not received automatically. The worth or worthlessness of a life is determined, or decided, by the lifestyle we lead. Even if one lives for a hundred years, if that person spent their life with worthless things, with essence-less things, then that life is entirely fruitless and barren.

Therefore, it is the duty of a Buddhist devotee to live having understood the true values, the true virtues—the real value in a life. Generally, in the world, money, gold, silver, pearls, and gems are considered valuable. But the Blessed One introduced far nobler things to the world through the Dhamma. To understand those values introduced in accordance with the Dhamma and to live accordingly—to mold one's life accordingly—a Poya day is a wonderful, valuable day. It is revealed in the Dhamma stories that even during the time of the Buddha, great lay devotees used this Poya day to make their children understand and realize the true value of life. Especially at this moment, the background story, the origin story, which led to the preaching of the Dhamma verse we have taken as our topic, is something similar to this.

You have heard about the great treasurer, Anāthapiṇḍika. In this Dispensation, during the time the Blessed One was residing, among the great Buddhist lay disciples, Anāthapiṇḍika the great treasurer was the foremost—worthy of being placed at the very top. He was rich not only in millions of wealth but also in Dhamma-knowledge, and he was a great lay disciple who had also realized the fruit of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala), which is considered a noble supramundane state. The mansion of that treasurer Anāthapiṇḍika was entirely an alms-hall. That is, it is mentioned in the Dhamma that it was a mansion that constantly ministered to the Blessed One and the Great Saṅgha, or rather to hundreds of monks daily with alms and other provisions.

Fearing that if his son Kāla spent his time in this manner he would become a wretched person (kālakaṇṇi), the treasurer Anāthapiṇḍika thought of a device, thinking, "I must introduce this child to the Triple Gem." One Poya day, the treasurer Anāthapiṇḍika called his son and said, "Son, if you go to the monastery, observe the precepts, listen to the Dhamma from the Blessed One, and return, I will give you a hundred gold coins (masuran—kahāpaṇas)." Then this child made his father promise three times, asking, "Will you definitely give it, Father? Will you definitely give it, Father? Will you definitely give it, Father?" Having made him agree, he then went to Jetavana monastery and observed the precepts. But he had no desire to listen to the sermon. He slept in a corner and returned to the mansion the next morning. As soon as he arrived, the treasurer ordered the servants, "My son has returned after observing the precepts, give him good food and drink." But this child, just as some young children say, declared, "I will not eat until I am given the promised money." Therefore, the treasurer had to give the money first. Taking that bag of gold coins in one hand—holding it with one hand—only then did this child even take his food.

Then, when another Poya day arrived, the treasurer Anāthapiṇḍika thought—by way of adding another part to this strategy: "Son, if you go to the monastery, observe the precepts, listen to the Dhamma from the Blessed One, learn a word of Dhamma and return, I will give you a thousand gold coins." This child, because of his desire for this money, went to the monastery, observed the precepts, and went and sat right in front of where the Blessed One was preaching the Dhamma. He prepared to listen to the Dhamma with the intention of somehow learning just one word of Dhamma and running back to get the money.

The Blessed One saw the mind of this child. Moreover, the Blessed One must have seen that despite leading such a life, there was some power of merit within this child. Whatever the case may be, the Blessed One also employed a certain device—a skillful means, a strategy. What was it? He began to preach the Dhamma in such a way that the child could not grasp the word of the Dhamma. This child was hoping to somehow learn a word of Dhamma, go back, and get the money from his father. But the Blessed One was preaching the Dhamma. This child could not grasp even a single word of the Dhamma; somehow, it kept slipping away. In this manner, the Buddha began to preach. The child was listening with great attention. Why? Because of his desire for the money. However, he could not grasp even a single word of the Dhamma. He failed to grasp the first word of Dhamma. The next one, the next one, and so on, until finally, he had to sit and listen until the entire sermon was finished. But how wonderful was this Dhamma sermon of the Blessed One! By the time it ended, this child had attained that noble supramundane state called Stream-entry, attaining the state of an Ariya (noble one).

But no one else knew about this. The next day, when the Blessed One and the Saṅgha walked to the mansion of the treasurer Anāthapiṇḍika for the alms-giving, this boy followed behind very calmly. Upon arriving at the house, the great treasurer Anāthapiṇḍika offered alms to the Blessed One and the Saṅgha, and prepared to give food to the boy at a seat to the side. The treasurer was astonished to see this child being so calm. The child who on other days said, "I will not eat until you give me the money, the kahāpaṇas," was now eating very calmly. This child also thought, "It would be better if my father did not speak about this money in front of the Blessed One." He felt that embarrassed. He felt embarrassed for having listened to the Dhamma out of greed for money. But the treasurer did not know about this. Therefore, he prepared to bring and give the money next. The child rejected it. He said he did not want it. Because of this, the treasurer said to the Blessed One, "Venerable Sir, my son's appearance—his behavior—is very different today. On previous days, he promised in this way and would not eat until he was given the money. Today, even when urged, he did not wish to take the money." At that moment, the Buddha declared: "O Treasurer, today your son has obtained something far more valuable than this money—indeed, far more valuable than even the empire of a wheel-turning monarch over the whole earth, more valuable than going to heaven, more valuable than lordship over the entire world. That is why he is not interested in that money."

Declaring thus, he uttered the Dhamma verse we mentioned earlier:

Pathabyā ekarajjena

Saggassa gamanena vā

Sabbalokādhīpaccena

Sotāpattiphalam varam

"Pathabyā ekarajjena"—more than ruling this great earth as a wheel-turning monarch, "saggassa gamanena vā"—more than going to heaven, "sabbalokādhīpaccena"—more than lordship over the entire world, "sotāpattiphalam varam"—the fruit of Stream-entry is superior, that supramundane state is superior, declared the Blessed One on that occasion.

Thus, from this, we can understand that due to the efforts of the treasurer Anāthapiṇḍika, the child obtained that state of Stream-entry, which is considered the highest state in the world. This fruit of Stream-entry, this state, is a great change that occurs in the mind. It is called attaining the state of an Ariya (noble one). The freedom one gains by obtaining this state is such that one will never again go to the lower realms in this saṃsāra. The mind never falls to a state low enough to lead to the lower realms. That is the most special strength seen in becoming a Stream-enterer. Thus, if one is to be reborn in saṃsāra, it is at most seven times. If one has obtained the fruit of Stream-entry in this way—to obtain the fruit of Stream-entry means to understand the Four Noble Truths deeply and precisely. Likewise, it means to deeply understand the Three Characteristics in this world—namely, Impermanent (anicca), Suffering (dukkha), and Not-self (anattā). The change that occurs within the mind through that understanding is so great that such a person will never again be born in the lower realms. Furthermore, they will be born at most seven more times in saṃsāra. After being reborn in that manner, they will somehow, in one way or another, attain Arahantship and pass away into final extinguishment (parinibbāna). Such a wonderful change occurs in a person's mind through the state of Stream-entry. Therefore, such a massive transformation, a change, occurred in that child named Kāla due to listening to the Dhamma on that day.

What the Blessed One declared regarding the fruit of Stream-entry—its value—as expressed here: being a wheel-turning monarch is a great thing expected by the world, but why is this fruit said to be superior to all of them? Even if one rules the great earth as a wheel-turning monarch, there is still the possibility of going to the lower realms due to the bad kamma one has done in saṃsāra. But the Stream-enterer never goes to the lower realms. That is why it was declared that the fruit of Stream-entry is superior to everything else. The Blessed One has shown the value of this fruit of Stream-entry on many occasions. On one occasion, taking a little soil on his fingernail, he asked the monks, "Is the soil on this fingernail greater, or is the soil of the entire great earth greater?" Then the monks declared, "Venerable Sir, Blessed One, the soil on your fingernail is very little. The soil of the great earth is far greater." In accordance with that simile, the Blessed One declared: "Even so, monks, for the Stream-enterer, the amount of Suffering (dukkha) they have freed themselves from in this saṃsāra is like the soil of the great earth. The amount of Suffering (dukkha) remaining, the amount of Suffering (dukkha) left to be spent, is extremely small, like the soil on this fingernail." The Stream-enterer receives such a vast freedom. This fruit of Stream-entry is the first of the supramundane states. In this Dispensation of the Buddha, there are four paths and fruits: Stream-entry, Once-returning, Non-returning, and Arahantship. It is through these that one realizes Nibbāna. Finally, through the state of Arahantship, one is completely pacified by the supreme Nibbāna, bringing an end to the Suffering (dukkha) of saṃsāra. Thus, the Blessed One declared that even the fruit of Stream-entry is such a noble thing.

Now, it might occur to you: how did this young child obtain such a great thing? One might wonder how he obtained such a noble supramundane state. How did this child, who did not minister to the Saṅgha in that manner and did not even want to see the Blessed One, achieve such a great victory—such a high state—just by listening to a single Dhamma sermon of the Blessed One? This is a good opportunity for us to think deeply. Generally, to obtain such great states—as you, lay devotees, know—one has to practice a lot of meditation. How then did this child obtain it? One might ask, "Was it without meditation?" But, virtuous friends, without meditation, Nibbāna is not found. Now let us examine a little what kind of meditation was present in this child.

Although it is not detailed in this story, we can infer, through certain hints within it, what the meditation in this child's mind was. Regarding everything in this world and this life, there are Three Characteristics that the Blessed One declared. Everything is Impermanent (anicca). Everything is, when viewed ultimately, Suffering (dukkha). Likewise, everything cannot be taken as "myself" or "mine"—it is Not-self (anattā). This is the profound Dhamma that lies here. That is what is called the "Three Characteristics" (ti-lakkhaṇa)—the three marks present in the entire world. These three marks do not appear to ordinary understanding. They do not appear to the ordinary worldly person. This appears only to deep insight (vipassanā)—to the wisdom that has gone deep. How then did that child obtain this understanding? Generally, this is obtained by meditating according to a subject of meditation (kammaṭṭhāna). Now, what was Kāla's subject of meditation? Let us think about it. Kāla's subject of meditation was the words of the treasurer Anāthapiṇḍika: "Son, if you go and learn a word of the Dhamma and return, I will give you a thousand gold coins."

Thus, this child must have gone to the monastery with this bag of gold coins in mind, with the idea, "I will somehow listen to a word of the Dhamma and obtain these gold coins." With a certain calmness of mind born of that, he prepared to listen to the Dhamma. But how did the Blessed One clean up this subject of meditation—arrange it—and bring it close to Nibbāna? Knowing this matter, the Blessed One began to preach the Dhamma in such a way that the boy could not grasp even a single word. Then this child tried to grasp the first word of Dhamma. To him, every word of Dhamma the Blessed One uttered must have appeared as a bag of gold coins. Even to anyone, sometimes what they desire very much appears as if in a dream, doesn't it? If there is a strong desire for something, that is what appears to the mind. Similarly, now, due to his desire for this bag of gold coins, when he sat in front of the Blessed One and listened to the Dhamma, every word of Dhamma appeared to this child as a bag of gold coins. So, he tried to grasp that first bag of gold coins. At the same time, it somehow slipped away. He tried to grasp the next one: "Ah, I missed that one too." He tried to grasp the next. Thinking in this manner, this child listened to the Dhamma preached by the Blessed One, word by word. At that moment, as he went a bit further, when each bag of gold coins kept slipping away, it must have occurred to him: "Not even one of these can be grasped. All of these are passing away. Everything here is Impermanent (anicca). Not a single one can be grasped. They come and go. There is only the preparation to grasp a word of Dhamma here."

Now, you might occasionally see banners of white cloth hung in front of funeral houses on the road, with words written on them: "Sabbē saṅkhārā aniccā." Such a word of the Dhamma is written. What is the meaning of this? "Sabbē saṅkhārā aniccā"—"All Formations are Impermanent." "Aniccā vata saṅkhārā"—"Formations (saṅkhāra) are indeed Impermanent (anicca)." What are these things called Formations (saṅkhāra)? In words we can understand: preparations, designs, or constructions. Now let us think about "preparation." After a person dies, if we think of "Aniccā vata saṅkhārā" in a way we can understand: what did this human being do while alive? Everything they did was a pile of preparations. What this person did as their entire life was a pile of preparations and designs. If they did anything called merit or demerit, if they did various things through body, speech, and mind—all of those, when viewed from one perspective, are a vast number of preparations and designs. When reflecting on life, all the activities done from morning till night, when examined, are nothing but a pile of preparations. It is like preparing to go on a journey. Even this inhalation and exhalation, breathing itself—all of this is a pile of preparations. Thus, the only work that deceased person did throughout their entire life—without fail—was breathing. When even this breathing came to an end, all the preparations and designs that this person made to live came to an end there. They are Impermanent (anicca); there is no permanent state. It is so regarding everything.

So, if we consider this child, he was hoping to grasp a word of Dhamma. Later, when he looked, there was only the preparation to grasp the word of Dhamma. He prepared, but it did not succeed. He looked at the next; there too, it was a preparation. In this way, it must have occurred to this child: "This is what is called Formations (saṅkhāra). Here there is only a pile of preparations. All of these are Impermanent (anicca). These preparations, constructions—all of these are Impermanent (anicca)." Because he could not grasp even a single word of Dhamma. It kept slipping away. This was due to a certain device employed by the Blessed One. Through this, then, this child looked at his own mind. What is happening inside this mind? Inside the mind, bags of gold coins are arising very rapidly—thoughts like bags of gold coins. In that manner, the bag of gold coins comes and goes, arises and ceases. When reflecting deeply on Impermanence (aniccata), here there is only arising and ceasing, coming and going. Seeing this state, it must have occurred to this child: "These are Formations (saṅkhāra)—all of these are just a pile of preparations and designs. They come and go, come and go." Thus, next, the effort to grasp these Formations (saṅkhāra) which have the nature of coming and going is that very effort to grasp the word of Dhamma.

After a while, this child must have felt a weariness in this. This effort was proving futile. Not a single one succeeded. Then, after a while, to the point of becoming disgusted with it, to the point where the thought of the bag of gold coins vanished, this appeared as a great trouble. He tried to "grasp" every word of Dhamma, but none was caught. So, as this went on, the child must have understood the second characteristic declared by the Blessed One: "All of these are Suffering (dukkha). All these Formations (saṅkhāra) are Impermanent (anicca). Whatever is Impermanent (anicca) is Suffering (dukkha)." "Yadaniccam taṃ dukkham"—"Whatever is Impermanent (anicca), that is Suffering (dukkha)," declared the Blessed One. Then, next, the Blessed One declared another thing: "Yaṃ dukkham tadanattā"—"Whatever is Suffering (dukkha), that is Not-self (anattā)." It cannot be taken as "myself" or "mine." Perhaps this too became clear to this child. Now, minds like those bags of gold coins arise and slip away. Not even one remains. That nothing remains, that there is no essence or core in any of them, is what is called Not-self (anattā). There is nothing to be taken as "myself" or "mine"—nothing to "grasp." There is no core. All thoughts arise and are swept away. Next, the nature of these thoughts was deeply reflected upon by this child. "Here there is entirely a pile of thoughts. They arise and cease. There is no core. There is nothing to grasp here as 'myself' or 'mine'; nothing to be caught."

The simile the Blessed One has given for this word 'Formations' (saṅkhāra) is a very wonderful one. We can easily understand this. The Blessed One declared: "Saṅkhārā kadalūpamā"—"Formations (saṅkhāra) are like a banana trunk." You all know what a banana trunk is. Now the Blessed One shows it like a good story. Suppose there is someone who has never seen a banana tree. When they go to a forest, they see a banana tree for the first time. Looking at it, this banana trunk is very straight. They think there is a core inside it. They cut it at the top and bottom and carry it home on their shoulder, thinking, "I can make a wardrobe or a chair out of the core of this." Having brought it home—the Blessed One gives this simile, not us; we are only adding other details to explain it a bit more—he first peels off a sheath of this banana trunk, expecting there to be a core. Next, he sees there is another sheath. There is yet another sheath. One by one, he peels off the sheaths. Finally, he reaches the innermost core. There is only a pile of sheaths. Looking at it in that way, that person realizes for the first time by themselves that there is absolutely no core in a banana tree.

That is the kind of simile the Blessed One gives for this word 'Formations'

(saṅkhāra). Now we have expressed this in a word we can understand:

"preparation," "designing," or "construction." Thus, when reflecting on the things done throughout this entire life, there is such a nature in every single one of them—one thing for the sake of another, one thing for the sake of another, and as you go on looking at each of them, there is no core in any of them. All of them are Impermanent (anicca). Because of that impermanent nature itself—now, in the life of a young child, there are wishes and expectations. Whether those expectations are fulfilled or not, in a few days they become a youth. The youth also has various expectations—even before they are fulfilled, they are either destroyed, or, without even knowing it, old age arrives. The old person also has various expectations. Even before they can fulfill them, sometimes, they die. In this manner, the entire life consists of a pile of preparations and designs.

In this manner, that there is no core here, that it cannot be maintained under one's control, must have been understood by that child named Kāla too, through his own subject of meditation—his meditation topic. What was the meditation? This bag of gold coins. Through the bag of gold coins itself, this child must have understood: "Now, other things are just like this too." It is said in this Dispensation that seven-year-old children attained Arahantship. Not by reading books or possessing great scholarly cleverness or degrees. What happens? It is the change that occurs within the mind. This child reflects. If there is a power of merit, they understand a profound Dhamma through a small incident. This is what must have happened to Kāla too. Through this meditation on the bag of gold coins, because of the method, the manner in which the Blessed One preached the Dhamma, the things relevant to meditation must have gradually emerged for this child through that bag of gold coins.

A point mentioned in this Dhamma regarding meditators is that one must contemplate these things called Formations (saṅkhāra) as Impermanent (anicca), Suffering (dukkha), and Not-self (anattā). When speaking of these Formations (saṅkhāra)—even though we have given various names to all of these, the meditator reflects on them as Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). When we say Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa), we can understand that here there is only a pile of names and a pile of forms. Even though we have placed names in the world calling them such-and-such things, when looking at them from within, when looking at them as they appear to the mind, the Blessed One has shown the phenomena present here in this way: here there is—Feeling (vedanā)—there is something called Feeling (vedanā), there is perception (saññā), there is volition (cetanā), there is Contact (phassa), and there is attention (manasikāra), which is reflection.

Feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), volition (cetanā), Contact (phassa), and attention (manasikāra)—these five phenomena are introduced as mental phenomena (nāma). Now, in the world, we have given names to various things like 'table' and 'chair'. Now we say 'gold coins' (masuran). But here, it is not gold coins; rather, ultimately, this is all that is understood by the mind. When reflecting deeply, that child also must have understood: "Even though a name is given in the world, even though they say these are gold, what is present here inside this mind is only this much. There is some Feeling (vedanā). Because of the hope of obtaining this, there is a pleasant Feeling (sukha-vedanā). Correspondingly, there is a certain perception—that gold, that gold coins are something very valuable. There is a volition—a hope—to obtain them: that thought. When that word of Dhamma is heard, there is a certain impact, a Contact (phassa) in the mind. According to that Contact (phassa), there is attention—the mind directing itself towards it. Only this much occurs inside the mind." Thus, while the Blessed One was preaching the Dhamma in this way, that child understood, with every word of Dhamma spoken: "This is all that is happening in my mind. There is no gold coin received. There is nothing valuable or extraordinary here. This is all there is." That is the understanding of mental phenomena (nāma-dhamma).

Next, what are called physical phenomena (rūpa-dhamma)—even though all the things present in the world are decorated with various colors and have shapes and sizes, all of these are constructed and made of the four great elements, which are introduced in the Dhamma as earth (paṭhavī), water (āpo), fire (tejo), and wind (vāyo). Earth (paṭhavī) is the element of hardness present in this great earth, in trees, rocks, and so on. Likewise, water (āpo)—it is raining at this moment—is the water element. We recognize the water element in relation to the great ocean and water reservoirs. Likewise, the fire element (tejo-dhātu)—warmth; the wind element (vāyo-dhātu)—air. In this way, this body of ours and other things are things constructed by earth, water, fire, and wind. This is all there is to it. Even if we call it kahāpaṇas or gold, whether it is melted, whether it is red gold or raw gold, in all of these, there are only these four elements. When reflecting on everything in this way, one recognizes: "Here there is only a pile of Feelings (vedanā), a pile of perceptions (saññā), a pile of volitions—a pile of thoughts and expectations—a Contact (phassa), and a reflection by the mind." Next, regarding all other things in the world—valuable or worthless—there are no such stories. It is through the realization that "within everything, there are only these four elements" that one can attain deep states in this Dhamma. This is called contemplating them as Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). Perhaps, in that way, Kāla's warm expectations regarding the bag of gold coins vanished: "This is a futile task." Next, when looking: "What am I doing? While listening to the Dhamma of the Blessed One, I am thinking about these bags of gold coins." Then, gradually, Kāla's desire for that gold disappeared. A weariness, a disillusionment towards these arose. Indeed, what helps one to obtain these supramundane states is disillusionment with saṃsāra. It is mentioned in the Dhamma regarding some who obtained these noble states—like Paṭācārā, Kisāgotamī, and others—that when some terrible disaster occurred in their lives, they then reflected, "This is the nature of the world." Similarly, now, because of this matter, Kāla too understood that these are futile tasks. Understanding this Impermanence (aniccata), the nature of Suffering (dukkha), and the nature of Not-self (anattā), he abandoned his desires for the bag of gold coins.

When he abandoned that desire, then he began to grasp the word of Dhamma preached by the Blessed One. Virtuous friends, there is a great miracle, a great wonder in this Dhamma of the Blessed One. What is it? "The more you try to grasp this Dhamma, the more it slips away; the more you let go, the more it is grasped." Now, this child was trying to grasp the Dhamma; he hoped to grasp a word of Dhamma, go home, and get that gold. But when he tried to 'grasp' the word of Dhamma, the Dhamma slipped away. Now, as he let this go—as he let go of the desire for the gold—then he began to grasp the word of Dhamma. From this, we can understand that what helps us to understand this entire Dhamma is letting go. What is done through all things, such as giving alms (dāna) and keeping precepts (sīla), is letting go. As you let go and let go, the Dhamma is grasped. That is what ultimately, through such a great revolution of the mind, contributed to Kāla obtaining such a supramundane state—the state of Stream-entry. He might also be someone who had practiced meditation in past lives. Even though he lived in that manner during the early part of this life due to some unfortunate cause, we can understand that through the Blessed One's skillful strategy, those insight-knowledges (vipassanā-ñāṇa) emerged within this child, and he obtained the noble fruit of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala).

Now, from this story, we can bring out several very valuable points. Firstly, when reflecting on the strategy used by the treasurer Anāthapiṇḍika, it is a good example for parents of this era too. On a Poya day, he used a certain strategy to bring his child closer to the Triple Gem. Indeed, the inheritance one must give to one's children is the inheritance of faith (saddhā) and the inheritance of Dhamma. In that way, the treasurer Anāthapiṇḍika tried to bring his child close to the Triple Gem, even by putting money on the line—by giving a promise of money. That is also a good example.

Likewise, there is also an example here that we can take into our lives. What is it? We can extract Nibbāna from the very life problems presented to us. The problem present before Kāla's life was to somehow grasp a word of Dhamma and obtain that gold. Through that very problem, that child extracted Nibbāna. To do that, some transformation must occur within the mind. Life problems exist for everyone—for every person. They face various disasters and adversities. But the world does not know how to obtain those noble states through them. For that, some special transformation must occur. Firstly, a change must occur in the way we look at the world. That is called attitude. The Blessed One has shown that way of looking. How does the ordinary worldly person look at the world? "Anicce nicca-saññā"—there is a nature in the world of considering the impermanent as permanent, of recognizing the impermanent as permanent. Likewise, "Dukkhe sukha-saññā"—thinking that what is full of Suffering (dukkha) is pleasure—such an understanding, such a feeling exists in the world. "Asubhe subha-saññā"—that is, even though there is nothing that can be taken as beautiful, or as good and pure, they appear as beautiful. Likewise, "Anatte atta-saññā"—even what cannot be taken as self, as "myself" or "mine," is taken as "myself" and "mine." The Blessed One declared that there are four such wrong understandings in the world. They are called the "perversions of perception" (vipallāsa-dhamma)—distorted ideas. Distorted ideas mean entirely wrong ideas, as if turned upside down. Therefore, in place of that, what Buddhists must do is always strive to develop that correct attitude. How is that correct way? One must practice contemplating the impermanent as Impermanent (anicca). One must practice contemplating the foul as foul. One must train the mind to think that what is Not-self (anattā)—what cannot be taken as "myself" or "mine"—is not mine.

Now, that is exactly what happened within that child. While listening to the Dhamma, he first thought this was a permanent thing, a pleasant thing; thinking in that way, he began to listen to the Dhamma with a great desire and expectation for that bag of gold coins. But later, due to the Blessed One's strategy, that understanding gradually came: "There is nothing to be taken here. This is Impermanent (anicca), full of Suffering (dukkha), there is nothing beautiful. There is nothing here to be taken as mine." Thus, a change occurred in the way he looked at the world. Next, something similar—in order to extract the Dhamma from our life problems—is what is called reflection. We direct our mind to all these things and try to obtain an understanding of them—reflection. This reflection too is often done in a wrong way in the world. The Blessed One refers to this as unwise attention (ayoniso manasikāra). Unwise attention (ayoniso manasikāra), if we express it in a commonly understood word, is improper reflection, improper—or inappropriate—reflecting in a way that is not correct. The illustration for that is: here, when the Blessed One was preaching the Dhamma, this child first began to reflect on the word of Dhamma keeping the bag of gold coins in mind. In the depths of his mind—at the back of his mind—is the thought of the bag of gold coins. When reflecting on the word of Dhamma with the intention of obtaining the bag of gold coins in this way, the word of Dhamma is not caught correctly. That is wrong reflection. Most people in the world reflect in a wrong way when they reflect on various things. But proper reflection is Wise attention (yoniso manasikāra). Thinking that all of these are things that arise from within, that "here there is only a pile of Feeling (vedanā) experiences, a pile of perceptions, a pile of expectations, a pile of impacts, a pile of reflections"—that "here there is only earth, water, fire, and wind, which are these four elements." In this way, reflecting on their true nature, on things as they really are. That is what needs to be developed. This reflection, gradually developed, helps one to realize Nibbāna. We must abandon our wrong reflection and practice reflecting in the correct manner.

Likewise, there is another thing—something connected to this very reflection. Generally, when people of the world reflect on various things, they try to grasp them tightly—this is called misapprehension (parāmāsa). During the time of the Blessed One, there were also some people who believed that by living as cattle, by keeping precepts in that way, they could realize Nibbāna, or escape from saṃsāra. This is called misapprehension (parāmāsa). But in this Dhamma, the correct way of directing the mind to various things is shown as comprehension (sammasana). In meditation, that reflection is done by the mind—like "touching" with the mind, like "feeling" with the mind. To understand this, let us return to the simile of the banana trunk. That person mentioned earlier—the person who saw the banana trunk for the first time—carried the banana tree on his shoulder, embracing it, thinking, "There is a core in this." This embracing, grasping in this way, is called misapprehension (parāmāsa). Doing it in that way, one can never see Nibbāna. One cannot be freed from this Suffering (dukkha). What is there to do instead? It is when, after peeling off one sheath of that banana trunk, one feels it subtly, that one finds there is a next sheath. Grasping one sheath, next one feels gently. As that sheath ends, another sheath, and beneath that, another sheath. In this way, one feels subtly. This is comprehension (sammasana). This is not physical touching, but rather, what the meditator does is touching with the mind, contacting with the mind. Gold, silver, pearls, gems, trees, stones, beds, chairs, tables, and so on—regarding all of these, understanding first comes in accordance with the names given to them in the world, in accordance with the values given to them: "A very valuable thing that must be in every home." In this way, as desire grows in the world, one grasps it with the mind. But when reflecting slowly, what is present here? The understanding comes that "this is an empty thing, a hollow thing." One realizes, in the end, that it is only something created from within the mind, only something embraced by the mind. Just as when one feels that banana trunk slowly, sheath by sheath, one understands in the end that there is no core, similarly, here there is only a pile of thoughts, a pile of thoughts. There is nothing to be taken as "myself" or "mine." A multitude of thoughts arise and cease.

It is when one thinks and reflects in that way that this Dhamma is understood most deeply. The Blessed One has declared the Four Noble Truths—the entire saṃsāric existence, this five-aggregate bundle of form, Feeling (vedanā), perception, Formations (saṅkhāra), and Consciousness (viññāṇa), is Impermanent (anicca), Suffering (dukkha), and Not-self (anattā). All of these are full of Suffering (dukkha). The Truth of Suffering (dukkha-sacca). The truth regarding Suffering (dukkha) in the world. This Suffering (dukkha) arises because of the Craving (taṇhā) that the world has towards this. It was because of the Craving (taṇhā) that child had towards that bag of gold coins that such a Suffering (dukkha) arose, when he went to listen to that word of Dhamma. Then, the understanding of that Suffering (dukkha) arose. Beneath that Suffering (dukkha) is Craving (taṇhā). The state where this Craving (taṇhā) is destroyed, where it is appeased, is Nibbāna. When that child abandoned the desire for the bag of gold coins and then the Dhamma began to be understood, Nibbāna was realized. What helps in that is what is called the Noble Eightfold Path: right view (sammā-diṭṭhi), right intention (sammā-saṅkappa), right speech (sammā-vācā), right action (sammā-kammanta), right livelihood (sammā-ājīva), right effort (sammā-vāyāma), right mindfulness (sammā-sati), and right concentration (sammā-samādhi). That is, this right view, right thoughts and intentions that go in accordance with right view, right action that goes in accordance with right thoughts, right livelihood that goes in accordance with right action, right effort—striving—the effort to purify the mind in accordance with right livelihood, and the right mindfulness—called sati—that arises through that, and the right concentration (samyak-samādhi)—the right one-pointedness of mind, composure—that arises based on that mindfulness. In this way, the Eightfold Path is that fourth truth. It is through the understanding of these Four Noble Truths that anyone—be they great or small, be they a seven-year-old child or a sixty- or seventy-year-old person—attains the paths and fruits. Through deeply understanding such profound Dhamma in this way. This is not something expressed in words, but a Dhamma to be understood entirely within. When reflecting accordingly on the benefits that can be taken into life from this Dhamma, if they have understood them correctly, anyone can raise all of them into meditation and attention (manasikāra) in their daily lives, within their everyday life problems. They can include a multitude of virtues that help towards Nibbāna—a multitude of meritorious phenomena born of meditation—within their mental continuum. Thus, this is the example to be taken from the Dhamma story of the young child named Kāla.

Even though many things in this world appear dark, they can be made white if one abandons that wrong understanding in this Dhamma—abandoning the wrong reflection called unwise attention (ayoniso manasikāra)—and trains in the direction of correct understanding, called Wise attention (yoniso manasikāra). If one abandons that attitude of looking at the world in a wrong way and trains in looking at the world in the correct way, then that person can, perhaps even in the midst of their daily activities, extract subjects of meditation (kammaṭṭhāna) from within them and obtain the realization of the paths and fruits. In various stories of the Buddha's time, it is mentioned that some elders (theras and therīs), some members of the Saṅgha, attained Arahantship upon seeing a lamp being extinguished—when they went to sleep and tried to reduce and extinguish the flame of a lamp. Some saw a forest fire, some saw a mass of foam floating on water, and seeing various such things, they realized Nibbāna through them. Through every single one of them, they developed a deep understanding of the world. Using one example present in the world, when the ability to wisely think, "other things are just like this too," arises, then that person can obtain the realization of the supramundane paths and fruits. At this time, just as during the Buddha's time, or perhaps even more, various kinds of Suffering (dukkha), hardships, and disasters are heard of in this world and society. One can extract Nibbāna through them.

Likewise, regarding the bag of gold coins mentioned about Kāla—just like that bag of gold coins, in this era too, one hears so much along the roads about 'jackpots' (jaya-malu) and 'fortune bags' (vāsana-malu). There must be thousands, lakhs of people who buy tickets hoping for these jackpots and fortune bags. Not everyone wins these jackpots and fortune bags. It does not matter if they are not obtained. Through them, just as that child Kāla did, one must try to draw closer to the Dhamma. What is present here? Whether this jackpot, this fortune bag is obtained or not, this is the nature of this life. Everything is Impermanent (anicca). Every effort made in pursuit of impermanent things is full of Suffering (dukkha). If the truth in the world is such, there is nothing here to be taken as "myself" or "mine." There is no essence, no core. All of these must be abandoned at the moment of death. All those collections of wealth, relatives, and friends, which were taken as "myself" and "mine," must be abandoned and left behind. In the end, the relatives gather and hang a banner: "Aniccā vata saṅkhārā" or "Sabbē saṅkhārā aniccā." When they hang them, that person has already died. There is no time to make an effort towards those supramundane states. Everything—the entire life—is a series of designs, a series of preparations, as we said. It is just like some people who are preparing to go on a journey and sometimes see a dream. Just like preparing to go on a great journey, a pilgrimage or a pleasure trip. They prepare, but something is missing. They run back and complete that too—regarding clothes and ornaments. While doing so, suddenly they wake up, and they do not even get to go on the journey. Such is the thing done throughout the entire life. From young child to old man, the entire life is a series of designs and preparations. But the nature of Suffering (dukkha) within this is not understood. Just like the person who carried the banana trunk, the pile of sheaths present there is not seen. To see that pile of sheaths is why we meditate. As the mind becomes calmer and calmer, it is seen: "Here there are only these phenomena—Feeling (vedanā), perception, volition, Contact (phassa), and attention—only this much is present." What are called earth, water, fire, and wind—both external things in this world and our bodies—all of these are only the four elements of which they are constructed. There is nothing beyond this. "For an infinite time in saṃsāra, we have run in pursuit of these. Here there is only running, only Craving (taṇhā), only thirst." Such an understanding arises to one.

It is when that understanding has arisen that, as the Blessed One declared, one can obtain that state of Stream-entry, which is superior to even the empire of a wheel-turning monarch, superior to going to heaven, superior to lordship over the entire world. If one has obtained that state, one will be reborn at most seven times. Developing further the Noble Eightfold Path one has entered, and meditating even deeper, that person can obtain the second path and fruit, called Once-returning (Sakadāgāmi), leaving only one more return to this world, escaping from the rest of saṃsāric Suffering (dukkha). If they develop meditation even deeper beyond that, by turning once again that Wheel of Dhamma they set in motion, they arrive at the state of Non-returning (Anāgāmi), and without returning to this world, they can realize Nibbāna in the Brahma world itself. Striving even further beyond that, meditating deeply, one can completely destroy these defilements and free oneself from the entire saṃsāric Suffering (dukkha) of Birth (jāti), Aging and Death (jarāmaṇa), and disease, finding peace in the noble and supreme Nibbāna.

Thus, through the story of this treasurer's son named Kāla, we were able to establish our minds on the path to Nibbāna. We can say without fear that if one goes very deep into even a single word of Dhamma preached by the Blessed One, Nibbāna is present there. If we take one drop from this ocean of Dhamma of the Blessed One, in every single one of them there is the taste of liberation (vimutti-rasa), the taste of Nibbāna. Just as a drop of water taken from anywhere in the great ocean has the taste of salt, even if we take one small word of Dhamma from the ocean of Dhamma, through it we can direct our minds all the way to Nibbāna. For someone who has developed the objects of meditation in saṃsāra, they can realize Nibbāna even at the moment of listening to the Dhamma.

The Blessed One has declared that the realization of the paths and fruits can be obtained not only on the meditation seat, but at five places. They are called the "bases of liberation" (vimuttāyatana). Liberation (vimukti) means freedom—freedom from saṃsāra. Bases (āyatana) mean a certain center, a place where one can obtain that freedom. Five such places are shown. What are those five places? One can realize liberation when listening to the Dhamma. It was when listening to the Dhamma that this child named Kāla realized Nibbāna. When listening to the Dhamma, directing the mind well to it, when the moment of deep reflection arrives, one can obtain that supramundane state. Another can do so when preaching the Dhamma—while preaching the Dhamma, when maintaining the mind on the Dhamma... Just as when preparing food for guests, it is not only the guests who can partake, but others too can satisfy their hunger; in the same way, it is shown that some members of the Saṅgha obtained realization at the moment of preaching the Dhamma. Likewise, when reflecting on the Dhamma—when reflecting on a deep point of the Dhamma in solitude, suddenly a correct and deep understanding arrives, and one can realize Nibbāna through such a realization of the paths and fruits. For some others, when reciting the Dhamma—when reciting the Dhamma with the mind well-directed, then too, the mind becomes calm and concentrated, a deep understanding of it arrives, and they can obtain those fruits like Stream-entry. They can also become Arahants. Finally, what is shown is taking some sign of concentration (samādhi-nimitta)—which is what is generally considered as meditation in the world—and by developing meditation systematically based on some sign of concentration, one can also realize liberation. In this way, if one engages in activities like listening to the Dhamma, preaching the Dhamma, and reflecting on the Dhamma in daily life, one can realize those paths and fruits. Accordingly, we must strive in our daily lives to take the benefits that can be obtained from this Dhamma into our own lives, in light of this story.

Today, then, this virtuous gathering has accumulated a vast amount of merit (kusala) on this occasion by listening to this Dhamma. Listening to the Dhamma is not merely an ordinary custom; if one listens to the Dhamma directing the mind to Nibbāna, it becomes a strong supportive condition (upanissaya) for Nibbāna. That we obtained this human existence, and developed a fondness and inclination for the Dhamma, is because we developed these as habits over a long period of time.

Therefore, even for saṃsāra, listening to this Dhamma is helpful. On those various occasions, if someone strives, they can, like that child Kāla, obtain the noble realization of the paths and fruits through a single word of Dhamma. Therefore, on this occasion, you have observed the precepts and listened to the Dhamma. You have generated a vast accumulation of meritorious thoughts. You have accumulated a great deal of merit. Strive to make this merit of listening to the Dhamma, this merit, this wholesome condition, a support to realize the supreme bliss of Nibbāna, by gradually attaining the paths and fruits beginning with Stream-entry (Sotāpatti) in this very life.

Likewise, may you share this accumulated mass of merit with the guardian deities of the Dispensation, and whatever deities, spirits, and other beings reside in this place, so that they all may rejoice in it and find peace in the supreme, noble Nibbāna, which is free from decay and death (ajarāmarā).

Similarly, if there are any departed relatives, friends, and others who have passed away, and whatever beings in this world-system, from Avīci hell up to the Akanitha heaven, who are hoping for Nibbāna—may they all rejoice in this noble merit and, being freed from all saṃsāric Suffering (dukkha) of Birth (jāti), Aging and Death (jarāmarāṇa), and disease, find peace in the supreme, noble Nibbāna, which is free from decay and death (ajarāmarā). Wishing thus, now recite these verses and share the merit.

From:

Verse 136 from the Daṇḍavagga (Chapter on Punishment) of the Dhammapada

Dear Listeners,

On many occasions, the Supreme Buddha showed, with supporting evidence, how beings in this saṃsāra meet with ruin, burning, and torment due to not understanding the gravity of the results of kamma—as if they had no comprehension of it whatsoever. In this Dispensation, the word used for an ignorant person is 'bāla' (the fool). In ordinary usage, 'bāla' refers to a young child. Yet, even if it is a young child, if they go to touch a flame out of ignorance, they are bound to be burned and tormented. What is the reason for this? It is the nature of fire to burn. Similarly, there is a law known as the law of kamma (kamma-niyāmatā). It is a universal, impartial law. There is a certain law in nature itself, impartial even to Buddhas and Arahants, called the law of kamma. According to this law of kamma, if anyone commits an unwholesome kamma, even if done out of ignorance, even if done without any faith or belief in the results of kamma, they will have to undergo severe consequences. The background story relevant to this verse we have taken as our theme is also a story that reveals the terrifying nature of the results of kamma.

Once, while the Supreme Buddha was residing at the Veḷuvana monastery, the Venerable Mahā Moggallāna, along with the Venerable Lakkhaṇa, was descending from the Gijjhakūṭa (Vulture's Peak) mountain. On the way, Venerable Mahā Moggallāna, with his divine eye, saw a peta (hungry ghost) with the form of a python, about twenty-five yojanas long. He was a peta named Ajagara. Flames of fire arose from the head of this peta and went down to the tip of his body. Then, flames arose from the tip of his body and went up to his head. Flames flared up from both sides of his body and descended in the middle. Having seen this kind of sight, Venerable Mahā Moggallāna smiled slightly. Seeing this smile, Venerable Lakkhaṇa asked, "Why did you smile, Venerable Sir?" Venerable Mahā Moggallāna replied, "I will not answer that question now. Please ask this question in the presence of the Supreme Buddha."

Later, on another occasion, when Venerable Mahā Moggallāna, Venerable Lakkhaṇa, and the community of monks were seated in the Dhamma assembly hall in the presence of the Supreme Buddha, Venerable Lakkhaṇa asked Venerable Mahā Moggallāna that question: "Why did you smile?" Venerable Mahā Moggallāna replied: "I saw such a sight. Such a massive peta body burning with flames in this manner. Seeing this, I thought that I had never seen such a being before, and due to the extraordinary nature of it, a smile arose in me." Then the Supreme Buddha declared: "Monks, my disciples live with eyes, with wisdom. I too saw that very sight at the foot of the Bodhi tree. Right at the moment I attained Buddhahood, I saw it. However, I did not declare it because, due to the extraordinary nature of this sight, ordinary people might not believe it, and by doubting me, they would accumulate demerit. They would generate unwholesome states. That is why I did not declare it. Now, since this monk Moggallāna stands as a witness to this matter, I shall now declare this. I shall speak about this," the Supreme Buddha said.

"I saw that sight indeed when descending from the Gijjhakūṭa rock. But the reason I did not declare having seen it was that if someone among the ordinary people disbelieved it, they would say it was a lie about me and it would be a cause for them to generate unwholesome states. Therefore, I did not declare it. Now, since the Supreme Buddha [relying on Moggallāna's testimony] stands as a witness to this matter, I now declare this," the Supreme Buddha said.

At that moment, the monks asked, "Venerable Sir, Blessed One, what was the unwholesome kamma committed by this peta in the past?" The Supreme Buddha brought forth the story of the past. During the time of Kassapa Buddha, there was a very wealthy treasurer named Sumangala. To prepare a gandhakuṭi (perfumed chamber)—that is, a monastery, a place of residence—for Kassapa Buddha, he spent a massive sum of money, laying gold bricks on the ground to build a chamber over a large area. Next, he also spent a massive amount of money on the offering ceremony of that monastery. In this way, just as Anāthapiṇḍika the treasurer built the Jetavana monastery for our Buddha, this treasurer built this monastery. One day, while the treasurer was going in the morning to see the Buddha, he saw a certain man sleeping in a hall near the city gate. That man was a thief. Although the thief was asleep, he had walked all night and his feet were covered in mud. Seeing this, the treasurer told those who were with him, "This man must have walked all night and is now sleeping during the day." The treasurer said this casually. The thief heard this. The thief had his head covered with a yellow cloth. He was sleeping with his head covered with a yellow cloth. He pulled back the cloth, looked, recognized the treasurer, and conceived a deep hatred and anger, thinking, "Fine, I know what to do to you."

Next, in revenge for those words, what did this thief do? He set fire to the treasurer's ripe crop field seven times. He also cut off the legs of the oxen in the treasurer's cattle-shed. Next, he set fire to the treasurer's mansion seven times. Even after doing all this, unable to quench his anger, this man then befriended an associate of the treasurer and asked what was most dear to the treasurer. The servant replied that there was nothing the treasurer loved as much as the monastery—the gandhakuṭi—he had built for the Supreme Buddha. Then this thief thought, "Very well, I will set fire to the Supreme Buddha's perfumed chamber and quench my anger." While Kassapa Buddha had entered the town for alms, the thief broke all the water vessels near the chamber and set fire to it. The treasurer heard that the chamber was on fire. By the time the treasurer arrived there, the chamber was completely burnt down. The treasurer did not feel any grief or sadness about it. Instead, he clapped his hands loudly. Those nearby asked, "Venerable Sir, why do you clap your hands like this when the chamber you built at such a huge expense has burnt down?" Then the treasurer declared, "I deposited my wealth in a place that cannot be destroyed by fire, thieves, enemies, or water. That is, in the Buddha's Dispensation. It was not lost. Now I have been given another opportunity to deposit an equal amount of wealth in the same way—to make a treasury of merit. Therefore, out of that joy, I clapped my hands."

Having said this, and just as he had said, the treasurer again spent a vast sum of money, laying gold bricks, and built a monastery for the Supreme Buddha, Kassapa

Buddha. Having built it, he spent a huge amount on the dedication ceremony of the monastery, offering alms for seven days to twenty thousand monks, including Kassapa Buddha. Meanwhile, this thief thought, "Even after doing all this, I could not make this treasurer back down. Now, there is nothing else to do. I must kill this treasurer." Concealing a knife in his waist, he frequented the monastery, intending to kill the treasurer during those seven days. However, he did not get an opportunity. Then, on the seventh day, when the treasurer offered alms to the community of monks led by the Supreme Buddha and invited them for the post-meal appreciation (anumodanā), he declared: "Blessed One, a certain man, harboring hatred towards me, set fire to my fields seven times. He also cut the legs of the cattle in my shed seven times. He set fire to my house seven times. I think it must have been this same man who set fire to the perfumed chamber of the Supreme Buddha as well. Nevertheless, I share the first portion of merit from this meritorious deed with that man."

Hearing this, the thief felt a great sense of spiritual urgency (saṁvega). "Alas, is it to such a person, someone who forgives like this, such an extraordinary person, that I caused such ruin? Now, if I do not ask for forgiveness, a thunderbolt might fall upon my head." So saying, he ran quickly, fell at the feet of the treasurer, and said, "Forgive me, master." The treasurer asked, "Why, what is this?" The thief replied, "I have caused such destruction to you. I did several harms." Hearing those matters, the treasurer then asked, "What is the reason for doing such a thing? I have never seen you before. Why did you harbor such things towards me?" The thief then reminded him: "On such-and-such a day, while I was sleeping in that hall, you said these words. I felt an intense anger because of that." At that moment, the treasurer asked for forgiveness from the thief, saying, "Forgive me for saying such a thing." The thief felt even greater remorse. Then the thief said, "Master, if you forgive me, please take me, along with my wife and children, into slavery." The treasurer replied, "Because I said those few words, you caused me so much harm. Now, if I keep you in my house, how can I even speak to you? I have no need for your slavery. Now I have forgiven you. Rise and go."

Thus, in a most wonderful way, the thief received forgiveness from the treasurer. But although he received forgiveness from the treasurer, he did not receive forgiveness from kamma. Therefore, the Supreme Buddha—our Supreme Buddha—declared: "After his death, that thief was reborn in the Avīci hell, and having burned and boiled there for an extremely long period, now, as the remaining portion of those kammās, he has been reborn as a peta with the form of a python and is burning with flames." Having declared that matter, the Supreme Buddha then stated: "In this way, those fools, foolish people, the ignorant ones, commit unwholesome deeds, and as a consequence, without proper understanding, they burn as if burning in a forest fire." Saying this, he uttered the verse we mentioned earlier:

Atha pāpāni kammāni – karaṁ bālo na bujjhati

Sehi kammehi dummedho – aggidaḍḍhova tappati

The term 'bāla' (fool)—as we said before, in the Dhamma, the character of a fool is not presented in the sense of a small child, but rather as: meaning: one who thinks bad thoughts, speaks bad words, and does bad deeds. Their intention is very bad. Likewise, their words are bad, and their actions are bad. It is such a person who is called a fool. Thus, such a fool, while committing unwholesome deeds, does not know the side of fruition. They do not know the gravity of those results. Committing unwholesome deeds in that manner, they are tormented by their own kammās, just as if they were burning in a fire. This verse was spoken to convey this meaning. It is recorded that upon hearing this, many people realized the paths and fruits (maggaphala).

Duccintitacintī, dubbhāsitaḥhāsī, dukkatakammakārī

Therefore, through this story, there are two sides of the narrative we can take as examples to consider and reflect upon. When we think about the conduct of the thief in this story, one is astounded. Is it possible for anger and hatred to go to such lengths? Although it was not a phrase that warranted such anger, having heard the treasurer's words, this thief conceived such hatred, and then, to quench his hatred, he set fire. Just like one trying to extinguish fire with fire, he set fire to the treasurer's field. He set fire to the house. He set fire to the perfumed chamber of the Supreme Buddha as well. It is in this way that worldly people try to quench hatred. There are many such examples even in this present era. They set fire to extinguish fire. Having set fire in that manner, in the end, the result is exactly the same.

The Supreme Buddha has declared that often, the result of a kamma bears the very form of the kamma itself. This law of kamma is a natural law operating in the world. The Supreme Buddha often shows the law of seeds (bīja-niyāma) as an illustration for this:

Kalyāṇakārī kalyāṇaṃ – pāpakārī ca pāpakaṃ

The Supreme Buddha has declared that in whatever manner one sows a seed, in that very manner does one harvest its fruit. Accordingly, the analysis of kamma is presented as: "Kalyāṇakārī kalyāṇaṃ"—one who does good kamma receives a good, pleasant result. "Pāpakārī ca pāpakaṃ"—if one does an unwholesome kamma, one receives bad results. Just as when a mango seed or grape seed is planted, a sweet fruit is produced, while from neem or bitter gourd, a bitter fruit is produced. Such is the natural law. Thus, in the same way, the burning with fire—having given fire to others, he received fire himself. In this way, one has to suffer severe consequences. There are countless such examples in the Dhamma.

Now, this was just one sight seen by Venerable Mahā Moggallāna while descending from the Gijjhakūṭa mountain. A number of such sights are mentioned. In one place it is shown that while Venerable Mahā Moggallāna was descending from the Gijjhakūṭa rock, he saw a skeleton flying through the air. A skeleton was flying. It was a peta in the form of a skeleton. While flying, hawks, crows, and vultures were pecking and tearing between the ribs of that skeleton. This skeleton was flying while wailing in pain. The reason shown by the Supreme Buddha for this was that in this very city of Rājagaha, that peta had been a cattle butcher. A person who slaughtered cattle. Similarly, another is shown—another peta body was going. It was going through the air. On that body, there were hairs as sharp as swords. While flying, those sword-like sharp hairs would bounce up and fall back onto the body, piercing it. Meanwhile, that peta was wailing. He was screaming. In this manner, many astonishing sights regarding those peta realms are shown.

Even more terrifying than that are the sufferings in hells such as Avīci. To show how extreme they are, the Supreme Buddha declared that there is no simile to describe them. Hell is a vast ocean of terrifying sufferings that cannot be fully described even by a Buddha's mouth. The hells, the peta worlds, and then the animal realm—the animal realm visible to us. Regarding that too, the Supreme Buddha declared that the sufferings in the animal world cannot be fully described. Furthermore, not only that, but even after coming to this human world, they undergo the results of those karmas. Yet they do not know the fact that these are the results of karmas committed in the past. Without knowing this, they commit more and more unwholesome deeds. Such is the terrifying situation in the world regarding these karmas. Therefore, when we reflect on these results of karma, we must take lessons from these accounts to shape our lives—not merely as ordinary stories.

The Supreme Buddha has declared this natural law of karma in its true form. Other teachers of that time saw it to some extent. But the Supreme Buddha understood karma and the results of karma in the deepest manner. Let alone that, the Supreme Buddha even showed the path to escape from this saṃsāra where this karma operates. The Supreme Buddha has presented a certain passage as a meditation subject:

yaṃ kammaṃ karissāmi kalyāṇaṃ vā pāpakaṃ vā tassa dāyādo bhaviissāmi

The Supreme Buddha has presented this as a meditation subject, instructing us to reflect constantly on this natural law of karma. "Abhiṇhaṃ paccavekkhitabbaṃ"—reflect on it constantly, contemplate it frequently as a meditation subject. Its meaning is: "I am the owner of my karma, karma is my property."

"Kammassakomhi – kammaḍāyādo"—I am the heir to my karma. Karma is my origin. Karma is my kinsman. Karma is my refuge. What exists as my support is karma. Whatever karma I shall do, whether good or bad, of that I shall be the heir."

When this is said, one might think, when it says "karma is my inheritance," "karma is mine," that I can do as I please. However, within this lies a deeply terrifying and sobering reality. For it does not mean doing whatever actions one wants. Karma has two sides, good and bad. Because of ignorance and craving, the being in saṃsāra is inclined towards the bad side rather than the good side. Therefore, there is a terrifying responsibility, a powerful responsibility regarding this kamma. When it is said "kamma is mine," "kamma is my inheritance," it is the bad side we have to think about more. No matter how many pleasant results can be obtained from these—by doing meritorious deeds—beings are bent towards unwholesomeness in a far more dangerous way, and thus it is unwholesome kamma that is accumulated more in saṃsāra. Because such a situation exists, the Supreme Buddha says that through contemplating kamma in this way constantly, one can even develop a fundamental, great disillusionment regarding saṃsāra. This is a terrifying responsibility, to say "kamma is mine." I cannot do as I please. It is subject to that natural law, subject to the natural law operating in the world.

Next, the Supreme Buddha declares more deeply regarding this kamma:

"Cetanāhaṃ bhikkhave kammaṃ vadāmi. Cetayitvā kammaṃ karoti kāyena vācāya manasā."* How does one recognize this kamma? How one gets caught up in kamma can be a question for someone. Kamma is also generally applied to action. Some refer to even casual work as kamma. But in this Buddha's Dispensation, the word kamma is used precisely for intention. "It is intention itself, monks, that I call kamma," the Supreme Buddha declares. Therefore, one is caught in kamma according to this intention. "Cetanāhaṃ bhikkhave kammaṃ vadāmi"—Monks, I say that intention is kamma. What is the reason for that? "Cetayitvā kammaṃ karoti kāyena vācāya manasā"—having formed an intention, one performs kamma through body, speech, and mind. Otherwise, there is no responsibility for actions that occur involuntarily. This responsibility—because one takes responsibility. There is a very wonderful situation here. One takes responsibility for kamma. How does one take responsibility? Based on the feeling of 'I' and 'mine' due to ignorance. That is why, when considering the Dhamma deeply, everything is done because of ignorance. Ignorance means the notion of 'I' and 'mine'—egoism, selfishness. 'I' and 'mine'. "Because of anger towards me, I kill." "Because I want to eat, I kill animals." "Because I do not have wealth, I steal the things of another." "I do other things for my amusement." In this way, centering around the ego, the being is inclined towards these unwholesome deeds. Therefore, because of ignorance, there are formations (saṅkhāra). Due to this ignorance, formations accumulate. A part of these formations is what is called kamma. The formations of merit (puññābhisāṅkhāra), the formations of demerit (apuññābhisāṅkhāra), and the imperturbable formations (āneñjābhisāṅkhāra)—these formations are indeed kamma itself. When contemplated deeply, it is a very subtle aspect of kamma itself.

In that manner, it is because of ignorance that kamma also accumulates. Since one is responsible for it—if one is responsible for kamma, one must also be responsible for its result. That is why, even if unwilling, one has to receive the terrifying results of those unwholesome kammās. Knowing about those results, avoiding such unwholesome kammās is what should be done by a wise person. The word 'bāla' is used for an ignorant person. The word 'paṇḍita' is used in the Dhamma for a wise person. A wise person, having developed faith in the Supreme Buddha, having established right view, understanding good and bad, understanding merit and demerit, understanding wholesome and unwholesome, tries to live accordingly. An ordinary intellectual who is not like this, being subject to intellectualism, doubting, "Can this be possible?", sometimes turns to unwholesome deeds to satisfy their daily needs. Such a person is referred to in the Dhamma as a fool, a stupid person, an ignorant person.

For that reason, the Supreme Buddha next shows, as an aid for someone to distinguish kamma, that there are causes for this kamma. They are called causes (hetu) or origins (nidāna). The causes for unwholesome kammās are greed, hatred, and delusion. These do not need to be introduced anew to human beings, to saṃsāric beings. When saṃsāric beings look back at their own minds, they can easily recognize these three defilements, which are like a triangle: greed, hatred, and delusion. Delusion is, as we said before, ignorance—that feeling of 'I' and 'mine'. "Even if the other person is struck by lightning, I must live"—selfishness, egoism, indeed, that strong feeling of 'I' and 'mine' is delusion. That is why, towards what I like, there is greed. Towards what I oppose, or what I dislike, there is hatred. When contemplated with wisdom in this way, it is because of greed, hatred, and delusion that all unwholesome kammās in the world occur. Many other defilements can be added to these, but fundamentally, it is greed, hatred, and delusion. Next, wholesome states—those are unwholesome.

Then, what can be taken on the wholesome side? They are shown as non-greed (alobha), non-hatred (adosa), and non-delusion (amoha). Non-greed, non-hatred, and non-delusion mean that if one frees the mind from greed even for a moment, just for a single moment, that occasion is wholesome. It is a wholesome mind. If one removes the mind from hatred even for a moment—now, in the conduct of that treasurer, we see that there were wholesome roots of non-hatred (adosa) within him. In that thief, there were unwholesome roots. In this way, we can understand it. If one thinks a thought, utters a word, or performs an action while being free from delusion, from the feeling of 'I' and 'mine' even for a moment, those go to the wholesome side. Reflecting in this way, the Supreme Buddha has deeply analyzed and presented this kamma to us, along with its side of results and the way to recognize it. Next, the Supreme Buddha has shown several other special factors that assist in putting these into practice.

What is meant by virtue (sīla)? When contemplating this well with wisdom, these training rules—especially the five basic training rules in the Dhamma—are the Five Precepts. These Five Precepts are just like the road signs you see when traveling on a road. In some places, it says 'Drive slowly', 'Curves ahead', 'Steep descent ahead'—making some indication to the driver. If the driver does not have this indication, what will they do? They will go at the highest speed the vehicle can manage and fall into terrifying abysses. Such indeed is the journey in saṃsāra. The Supreme Buddha has presented these Five Precepts as road signs for the being traveling on this journey of saṃsāra. Because, among unwholesome kammās, five are shown as extremely grave. The things that bring about terrifying results in saṃsāra are what are included in the Five Precepts: killing living beings, stealing, sexual misconduct, lying, and taking intoxicants like alcohol. Through these, one meets with severe oppression, burning, and torment in saṃsāra. Therefore, to all beings traveling on this journey of saṃsāra, the Supreme Buddha first of all reminds them of these Five Precepts.

Now, if one drives a vehicle disregarding those road signs, what happens? First, the vehicle veers off the road. Next, it goes down the ditch, falls into the abyss, and is smashed to pieces. In the same way, a group of terms representing that state regarding hell are mentioned in this Dhamma. Four terms are shown in the Dhamma: 'apāya', 'duggati', 'vinipāta', and 'niraya'. 'Apāya' means turning away from the correct path. 'Duggati' means going on a wrong path, like going down a ditch. 'Vinipāta' means falling headlong down an abyss. 'Niraya' means being crushed to pieces, reaching a state where nothing can be recovered. One falls into such a state due to unwholesome karmas, if one does not protect the Five Precepts. Virtue (sīla) means training rules. Why does one undertake and protect these training rules oneself? By recalling this daily, this person gives some advice to their own mind: "Today, I must conduct myself within these Five Precepts." Just as a vehicle driver, upon seeing a road sign, reduces the speed of the vehicle if it is running fast, or reduces speed if there are curves, in the same way, these Five Precepts are shown as things that help and support one in shaping one's way of life. Generally, someone thinks of this as a great nuisance. However, those who think so do not say such things about the road signs on the road. If those signs are not there, they blame the government: "They should have placed a road sign there saying there is a steep descent." But without reflecting on such things in this journey of saṃsāra, they blame the Buddhas, the Arahants, and the Saṅgha, saying they are telling us to keep these precepts. When they begin to burn and torment because of those very things, only at that moment do they understand the foolishness they committed. That is why the fool is called an ignorant person.

In that way, one must reflect deeply based on the evidence available to oneself. Just like the Five Precepts, the next things related to them—belonging to the ten unwholesome courses of action—especially in the ājīva-aṭṭhamaka-sīla (virtue with livelihood as the eighth), factors regarding speech were mentioned. Regarding speech, too, we generally consider a lie as a minor thing. Slandering, too, we consider as minor things. But there are grave consequences of these. That is why the Supreme Buddha laid down training rules to abstain from lying, slandering, harsh speech, and frivolous talk. Because of these, one ruins the gift of speech—this rare gift—that one has received. Likewise, there is wrong livelihood (micchā-ājīva). Wrong ways of living. In this era, such things have come to the fore through the economy—since this is an era where righteousness is forgotten. But having met with ruin through such wrong livelihood—we spoke about a cattle butcher—many others are like that. It is not only during the Buddha's time that beings exist in such peta states. In this era, because those who possess higher knowledges (abhiññā) are scarce, there is no one to declare such matters. Even if there were, even the Supreme Buddha did not declare that matter until he received witness from Venerable Mahā Moggallāna. Why did he not declare it? Lest they say, "The Supreme Buddha is lying to deceive us; he is making up these stories to deceive us as if we were little children." The Supreme Buddha did not declare it lest they, by saying so, go to hell. He did not declare those things until the time came when Venerable Mahā Moggallāna stood in the position of a witness to that matter. It is the same in this era too. Even if someone rarely sees these things in this era, even if they say so, people do not believe it. But those humans who do not believe these things, who discard the things in these Dhamma books saying they are old stories, are ready to accept them with the utmost reverence if Western scientists declare something about them.

Actually, although the word of the Buddha does not need external support, in this era, even Western scientists have had their eyes opened regarding this kamma. You must be hearing about such matters frequently through various means. Some people develop the recollection of past lives (jātissaraṇa-ñāṇa) in their childhood. It is such things that become famous in the world as stories of rebirth. Because, in early childhood, some young children remember past lives—mostly how they lived in their past life, how they died, and not only that, but those kammas they committed. Very wonderful details about them. Likewise, through hypnosis, by putting someone into a hypnotic sleep, bringing out their past memories, the places they lived in the past, the things they did and said—methods for bringing these out have been discovered in the West. These are sometimes like the deeds of early children, when we consider the Buddhas and Venerable Mahā Moggallāna. But even such things in this era are good evidence to think that one can believe this with confidence. Moreover, about a century ago in America—when speaking of America, at that time they knew next to nothing about Buddhism, kamma, or the law of kamma. It was such a dark age. But in such a country, there was a Catholic gentleman named Edgar Cayce. That gentleman had not even heard the word kamma in his daily life. But after falling into a hypnotic sleep himself, he had the ability to state his own past lives, the kammas that caused them, and the karmic results that caused the illnesses of the patients who came to him. The descriptions of illnesses he declared regarding the patients who came to him are still stored in a separate library, and even professors conduct various researches on them and write books. Mentioning one or two of them as examples: a man came with an eye disease that was close to causing blindness. At that moment, Edgar Cayce stated the cause for it. Although the disease could be cured to a large extent through medicine and various social welfare activities and meritorious deeds, it could not be cured beyond that. Because the cause was: "Thousands of years ago, you were born in an uncivilized tribe. What was the job you had? It was to blind the enemies captured by those tribesmen. Since you performed that duty of blinding very well, your eyes cannot be cured beyond this; you cannot be freed from that blindness," Edgar Cayce determined.

According to that, we can realize that the results of kamma exist in the world not only during the Buddha's time, but even in this present era. Those who can see them, who can present the facts with reasons, are scarce. Such is the situation. Therefore, next, one must reflect: how do we escape from this kamma? Having turned away from these unwholesome kammās, having turned away from unwholesome deeds, to travel as far as possible on the path of the Dhamma—now, mostly, one turns to these unwholesome kammās because that intention operates very rapidly in the mental stream. Now, everyone is able to understand whether their intention is pure or impure, good or bad—an intention arose in someone—whether it is a good one or a bad one. Even if it is a bad one, some people, knowing that the bad intention is bad, still encourage it further and act according to it. They use words. What is the cause for such inclination? It is the lack of development of the mind. That is why the Supreme Buddha declares that, without stopping at virtue alone, without stopping at merely giving those road signs—the Supreme Buddha next shows a more systematic, more beneficial, and excellent path to escape from this terrifying nature of suffering in saṃsāra. The Supreme Buddha brings out for beings a power to escape from this law of kamma, from the results of kamma, entirely from kamma. What assists in that is concentration (samādhi) and wisdom (paññā). Having prepared the mind through virtue, next, one calms the mind by way of concentration. One develops the power to keep the mind on a single object. To such a person, indeed, more than the person mentioned before, when the intention goes towards the bad side, the power to stop it immediately comes because of concentration. Even more deeply, the power to escape from these karmic forces arises through wisdom. Realizing the true nature of the world directly, there is nothing to be taken as 'I' or 'mine'. What exists here is the state of anattā (not-self). This very existence of saṃsāra is dukkha (suffering); its cause is taṇhā (craving). The place where this craving is destroyed is Nibbāna. The path that assists in this is the Noble Eightfold Path—this is the understanding of the Four Noble Truths. That indeed is what is called wisdom.

If someone has developed that wisdom supramundane-ly, if that person has understood the Four Noble Truths at the first stage, the stage of Stream-entry (Sotāpanna)—a special change occurs in their intention. To what extent does that change occur? Unwholesome deeds that lead to states of deprivation (apāya) are not committed by them. Now, generally, due to a grave unwholesome thought arising in a single short moment, one can even go to hell. Such is the terrifying nature of the mental process—this mind operates so rapidly that it cannot be compared to any vehicle or machine in the world. If a mind operating with such speed turns to the bad side even for a single moment—if some wrong thought, wrong word, or wrong action is done towards a Buddha or an Arahant, that is enough to boil in hell for many aeons. Seeing a vehicle traveling very fast, many people are very pleased. But the driver of that vehicle has a massive responsibility. If the machinery to stop that vehicle as one wishes is not proper, if there are various deficiencies, during that fast travel, terrifying accidents to lives occur. In the same way, regarding this mind, the Supreme Buddha shows that due to its rapid nature, if it turns to the bad, one will have to undergo grave consequences. But the Stream-enterer has stopped the mind to some extent. Due to that power of stopping the mind, and due to that realization of truth—wisdom—the Stream-enterer limits the entire saṃsāric existence to a maximum of seven lives and escapes from it. It means they are born only seven more times. Moreover, to what extent does the change in that mind occur?—the sakkāya-diṭṭhi (view of existing group/body) called the soul-perception, the feeling that there is a soul, that wrong thought, is removed from them. The Stream-enterer, the person who has attained the stage of Stream-entry, not only receives the solace of being born only seven more times in saṃsāra, but that person cannot commit unwholesome kammās that lead to hell. What is the cause? It is the change that occurs in the mind. Through that power of stopping the mind, and also through that wisdom, the binding of the kammās they perform is reduced. The responsibility for those kammās is reduced. We said before that according to the responsibility one takes for performing a kamma, one has to take responsibility for undergoing its result. Thus, due to that view of tightly grasping 'I' and 'mine', for whatever long period one had to undergo results in hell and other places, that situation is reduced for the Stream-enterer because of that realization.

Next, it is the same when becoming a Once-returner (Sakadāgāmi) and Non-returner (Anāgāmi); the Once-returner comes to this world only once more. The Non-returner does not return to this world again. Having been reborn in the Brahma world, they attain Nibbāna right there. For the Arahant, there is no rebirth after this. But the influence of kamma is so powerful that they have to undergo some result in this very life as diṭṭhadhamma-vedanīya (to be experienced in this life). From past kammās or from certain kammās done in this very life, they have to undergo those results that are to be experienced only in this very life, called diṭṭhadhamma-vedanīya. From this we see, on one hand, how powerful kamma is. Even the Buddha and Arahants had to undergo their results, as results of past kammās. You must have heard about Venerable Mahā Moggallāna, a monk of such great psychic power, yet in the end, five hundred bandits crushed his bones, and finally, he had to attain Nibbāna. Because in the very distant past, he had harassed and killed his parents. According to that, on one hand, one can realize the terrifying nature of this kamma. On the other hand, what is to be thought of is this wonderful path shown by the Supreme Buddha to escape from that kamma. There are two wheels in this world: the wheel of kamma (kamma-cakka) and the wheel of Dhamma (Dhamma-cakka). This wheel of kamma operates in the most terrifying manner in the world. No being caught in it can escape from that law of kamma. In whatever manner they commit kamma, in that very manner they have to undergo terrifying results. But the Supreme Buddha shows the wheel of Dhamma. If, in the way we expressed before, traveling on this Noble Eightfold Path, turning away from unwholesome states, traveling on the path of wholesomeness, next, preparing body and speech through virtue, and the mind through concentration, if one then saw the true nature of the world through insight-wisdom—if someone realized the three characteristics called anicca (impermanent), dukkha (suffering), and anattā (not-self)—at the first level of a Stream-enterer—that person escapes from those unwholesome kammās that lead to hell, and is born only seven more times. Next, going gradually in that way, in the end, the Arahant brings the entire saṃsāric existence to an end and realizes that noble Nibbāna.

According to that, you must reflect. Therefore, this kamma should not be thought of as stories in ancient books, as false things or things created with exaggeration. These are highly extraordinary, yet true. Because the natural laws existing in this universe, the things visible to us, sometimes appear very small. When looking at this sky, the stars appear small... small specks of stars. When scientists tell us their true size, we see stars [for what they really are]. Such wonderful things are around us. The size of a star, this moon seen in the sky, the size of the moon, the size of the sun—when scientists tell us, we believe them, because they are scientists. In that way, how large are the things that appear small to us in reality? When reflecting on those matters declared by the Supreme Buddha regarding time and space, a great sense of spiritual urgency arises in one. For such a long time, in such a vast space, we have traveled in saṃsāra as beings, haven't we? The Supreme Buddha has declared that the beginning of this saṃsāra is not apparent. Due to not knowing the Four Noble Truths, covered by ignorance and bound by craving, the time a being travels in this saṃsāra cannot be fully described even by a Buddha. He declared that there is no such end, that it cannot be fully described. The Supreme Buddha brings out such a situation that causes a great sense of spiritual urgency to arise. Even if one does not believe those, we speak highly of what scientists and astronomers say, as most wonderful things. Far more wonderful things has the Supreme Buddha declared regarding this saṃsāra. Actually, that understanding of external things, the things revealed about them, are mostly used by the worldly people on the unwholesome side. Bent more and more towards the five cords of sensual pleasure, to cultivate this world.

The Supreme Buddha has declared: "Na siyā lokavaḍḍhano"—one should not be a cultivator of the world. What is to be done is not the cultivation of the world, but escaping from the world, escaping from this saṃsāra. It is the portion that assists in escaping from that saṃsāra that the Buddhas have declared in this Dhamma. That indeed is what is called the wheel of Dhamma. The power of this wheel of kamma can be broken by the wheel of Dhamma. Therefore, we must reflect—actually we must question ourselves—whether we are going to keep running the wheel of kamma in this saṃsāra for an infinite time, or whether we are going to make an effort to turn the wheel of Dhamma declared by the Supreme Buddha within our own mental stream. Turning the wheel of Dhamma means, as said before, for the purpose of calming one's mental stream, training body and speech by way of virtue—as a beginning, undertaking and trying to properly protect daily some virtue, whether it is the Five Precepts, these Uposatha eight precepts, or the ten precepts. Through the leisure received by calming body and speech through that, next, concentration—through some meditation subject, a thought of loving-kindness, or mindfulness of breathing (ānāpānasati) that applies the mind to inhalation and exhalation, the meditation on foulness (asubha), the recollection of death (maranasati), or some such meditation subject—one must make an effort to keep this running mind on a single thought. The concentration received through that gives one an understanding of the entire power of the mind. "There is such power in my mind, isn't there? I did not understand this for so long; I made use of only a very small part of it"—such understanding comes, if one could somehow bring out concentration.

Next, it does not stop there. Why does one calm this mind? It is to understand the true nature of my life, of the world. It is to escape from this saṃsāra. The basic factor that assists in that is what the Supreme Buddha has shown as the Four Noble Truths. This entire saṃsāra, including those beings who are said to enjoy pleasure, including devas and Brahmas, is dukkha (suffering). Why is it suffering? All these things are anicca (impermanent). Nothing can be kept permanently. Whatever is impermanent, because of that very thing, because of that changing nature, brings suffering. It is suffering. There is a situation in the world where that changing thing of the nature of suffering cannot be kept as 'I' or 'mine' under one's control, which cannot be governed by oneself. Therefore, the Supreme Buddha showed three characteristics: anicca (impermanent), dukkha (suffering), and anattā (not-self). When reflecting with wisdom, these characteristics can be seen in everything in the world. One must make an effort to develop an eye that can see those characteristics. That eye is called the 'insight-eye' (vipassanā-cakkhu). Insight (vipassanā) means seeing through, penetrative seeing. In this era, various instruments have been manufactured in the world for that seeing. There are microscopes that can enlarge and show very small things. Microscopes, and then there are other instruments like telescopes. All these are things done through some external instruments. But this insight means seeing the true nature of this world by purifying one's own mental stream in the manner shown by the Supreme Buddha. What assists in that is constantly contemplating the side of arising and passing away in the world. Everyone can do this according to their own capacity. Our inhalation and exhalation, the way the parts of our body arise and pass away. The fate of the things we take as food and drink. The fate of the valuable clothes and other things we go to various shops to buy. In everything—the fate of our young children, the children we fondle so much. Next, they gradually grow up, reach old age, go with walking sticks, and in the end, just like carrying a young child, when they reach old age, those grandfathers and grandmothers have to be carried.

There is such a situation in the world. One must constantly reflect on them. Through that, one sees the true nature of this world, a certain disillusionment regarding this saṃsāra—many people do not like the word 'disillusionment'—but to the extent that a certain disillusionment arises regarding this saṃsāra, to that extent, all that insight-wisdom—that wisdom—develops. The power to escape from saṃsāra is sharpened within oneself. Developing insight in that manner, in the past, those lay devotees (upāsaka and upāsikā), no matter how poor their livelihood was, no matter how uneducated they were, contemplating in accordance with the Dhamma, developing virtue, concentration, and wisdom according to their capacity, let alone other things, even attained supramundane path-stages—right in their own homes—such as Stream-entry, Once-returning, Non-returning, and Arahantship, as mentioned in the Dhamma.

Therefore, why did you listen to so much about kamma? It is to escape from this kamma. Remembering that what assists in escaping from this kamma is the Dhamma, then, on this Uposatha day, you, having undertaken a valuable virtue called the ājīva-aṭṭhamaka-sīla, have applied your minds to this Dhamma and listened to the Dhamma for so long. The merit of listening to the Dhamma (dhamma-savanamaya-kusala) is a certain growth that occurs within our minds. If we express this growth in words, it can be shown as: the mind grew with faith (saddhā). You came to this place with great faith to listen to the Dhamma. Next, according to that faith, for so long—sitting on the bare floor like this requires a certain effort—with the understanding that "somehow I must listen to this Dhamma," you developed effort (viriya). That too was a state that arose in the mind. Faith, effort, and next, while listening to the Dhamma, you applied a certain mindfulness (sati) to listen to every word. Next, when that mindfulness was applied for a long time, for about an hour, a certain degree of concentration (samādhi), one-pointedness of mind, arose in you. Through that one-pointedness, even if you hear again and again the things you heard and read, deep understandings of them arise. That indeed is what is called wisdom (paññā). In this way, you must be pleased that you received an opportunity to deposit within your own mental streams, to some extent, the spiritual faculties—power-factors—that assist in Nibbāna, namely faith (saddhā), effort (viriya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā).

Therefore, today, without postponing to a future time the power you developed through turning to this Dhamma, you must bring the Dhamma closer to your daily life as a sharpening of it within this very life. Although Western countries have developed these other external, economic matters and become prosperous, they have realized the value of the Dhamma. No matter how much wealth humans have accumulated in those external countries, they have become like insane persons, turning to drugs and meeting with various other terrifying disasters, and now they are coming in search of the Dhamma. Instead, the people of our country, casting this Dhamma of ours aside, search for those situations coming from the West and move towards the path of ruin. In such an era, you wise, meritorious people spent this hour today to nourish your mental streams with the Dhamma to escape from the suffering of saṃsāra, and you should be pleased, thinking, "This is to develop within myself the power to realize the noble Dhamma of Nibbāna."

Now you must resolve: "Through this benefit of listening to the Dhamma, may I have the power and strength to develop virtue, concentration, and wisdom not in a future life but in this very life, and to be comforted by the noble, great, deathless Nibbāna as quickly as possible through the penetration of the paths and fruits of Stream-entry, Once-returning, Non-returning, and Arahantship." You must make that aspiration. Similarly, we now share with the world this mass of merit we accumulated by way of preaching the Dhamma and listening to the Dhamma. There are those who know the value of these merits, even if our ordinary world does not know. May all those devas and Brahmas, including the devas and Brahmas who protect the Dispensation, who are presiding over this place, rejoice in this merit of preaching the Dhamma and listening to the Dhamma we accumulated during this hour. Having rejoiced, may they be comforted by the noble, great, deathless Nibbāna through whatever Bodhi they have aspired to! May they also provide protection to us and to the Dispensation! You must make that aspiration. Similarly, may all beings, from Avīci up to Akaniṭṭha, including our departed relatives, rejoice in this merit of preaching the Dhamma and listening to the Dhamma, and if they are in any states of deprivation, may they be released from them, reach happy states, travel on the path of the Dhamma, and through the penetration of the paths and fruits of Stream-entry, Once-returning, Non-returning, and Arahantship, or through a Bodhi of their own aspiration, escape from this terrifying suffering of saṃsāra and be comforted by the noble, great, deathless Nibbāna! Having made such an aspiration, now recite those verses and share the merits.

Verse 2 from the Yamakavagga (Chapter of Pairs) of the Dhammapada

Dear Listeners,

The very appearance of a Buddha in the world is an event that demonstrates the miraculous power within the mind. The supreme level of development, purity, and clarity of the mind can be witnessed by us in a Tathāgata, a fully Awakened One. Moreover, such a Buddha appears in the world and expounds the Dhamma to show us the path to develop, purify, and clarify our minds. In this liberation from Saṃsāra, this grave task of freeing ourselves from the Dukkha (suffering) of Saṃsāra, in this great undertaking, it is our mind that is fundamental. It is by utilizing this mind—and not by any other scientific methods—that we can escape from Samsāra. This mind of ours contracts or expands, becomes small or large; these changes occur according to the object the mind takes. The Buddha has demonstrated this with examples on many occasions. If our mind takes a small object, the mind becomes small; if it takes a large object, it becomes large. Now, from the background story of the verse we have chosen as our theme, we can gain a good understanding of the functioning of this mind.

There lived in Sāvattihī a very wealthy but extremely miserly Brahmin. Since this Brahmin had never given anything to anyone, based on that behavior, society gave him a nickname, branding him "Adinnapubbaka" (Never-giver). The Sinhala meaning of the word Adinnapubbaka is "one who has never given before." He got the name "Never-giver"—this Brahmin. This was probably because people in those days, just like today, were very clever at giving nicknames. Now, this Brahmin had an only son, who was very pleasant and dear. He loved his son very much, as he was his only child. But he loved his wealth even more. Therefore, when it came to making ear-ornaments for his son according to the custom of that society, this Brahmin thought, "If I summon a goldsmith now, my wealth will be destroyed for this task. Therefore, I must make the ear-ornaments myself." He flattened two small pieces of gold and hung them on the child's ears. Thus, the child was also given a nickname by society according to the ornament hung on his ears: "Maṭṭakuṇḍalī" (Polished Earring), because he wore ear-ornaments made of flattened, plain gold.

And so, perhaps because this child lived his life in such a miserable manner, by the time he was about sixteen years old, he contracted jaundice—a severe case of jaundice. The mother Brahmin lady told the Brahmin to go and bring a physician. The Brahmin replied, "Can't you see how my wealth will be ruined if I bring a physician?" Saying so, what he did instead was go to physicians and, by speaking in a beating-around-the-bush manner, tried to find out the prescriptions from them. He asked, "What is the medicine given for such-and-such an illness?" Those who are physicians also often give casual remedies to casual inquiries. Thus, the physicians casually told him that the bark of such-and-such trees is good for this kind of disease. This Brahmin came home, gathered those barks, and tried to perform home remedies. These home remedies did not succeed. The child's condition became critical, worsened, and reached a state where it seemed incurable. Finally, when there was absolutely no other way, the Brahmin went and brought a physician. The moment the physician looked at him, he realized, "If I undertake to treat this patient, my reputation will be ruined." Therefore, saying, "I have other work to attend to, call another physician," he quietly slipped away.

Then the Brahmin understood that the child was now on the verge of death. Next, he thought, "When this son dies, those who come to the funeral house will see the wealth inside my home." Thinking so, he laid the dying child on the outer veranda, the porch. On that very day, the Buddha, as was his daily custom, arose in the early dawn and entered the attainment of great compassion (mahākaruṇā-samāpatti) to survey the world, and Maṭṭakuṇḍalī appeared in his Buddha-eye. That knowledge of the attainment of great compassion is a wonderful, sublime knowledge unique only to a Buddha. It is a wondrous kind of attainment that arises in a Buddha, supported by the wisdom and great compassion developed throughout the entire saṃsāric journey. When the Buddha arises from that attainment and surveys the world, what usually appears are those who have performed various meritorious deeds under past Buddhas, which have now ripened. Thus, Maṭṭakuṇḍalī, who was preparing to end his life in this miserable manner, appeared in the Buddha's eye.

So, out of great compassion, the Buddha walked for alms that day to the street where the Brahmin's house was located, accompanied by the community of bhikkhus. When he arrived exactly in front of the house, the Buddha saw the child lying down, facing the interior of the house—that is, facing the wall. Seeing this, the Buddha, in order to draw the child's attention, emitted a ray of Buddha-light, a single Buddha-ray, in that direction. When the light fell upon the wall, the child turned and looked. Looking, and upon seeing the physical form of the Buddha, he felt a great joyous confidence and faith (saddhā), thinking, "Alas! Because of my foolish father, I never got the opportunity to see such a Buddha, to attend on him, to listen to the Dhamma, or to offer alms." Then he tried to raise his two hands to worship with palms joined over his head. However, due to his weak state, he could only bring his fingers together. Next, he thought, "All I can do now is clarify my mind," and with his entire heart, without any ordinary doubts, dedicating his whole mind, he clarified his mind towards the Buddha. As he lay there gazing at the Buddha, the Buddha thought, "This merit is sufficient for him," and departed from there. Just as the Buddha went out of sight—beyond the range of visibility—this child Maṭṭakuṇḍalī passed away. Having died with that very clarified mind, he was reborn as a devaputta (divine son) adorned with golden ornaments in a thirty-league golden mansion in the Tāvātimsa heaven.

Having been born thus, he then looked to see, "How did I obtain this celestial fortune?" All such deities contemplate in this manner, reflecting on how they attained their present state. Then he saw the condition of his father, the Brahmin. After cremating the corpse, the Brahmin went to the cemetery every day and wept, crying, "Where is my only son? Where is my only son?" The devaputta Maṭṭakuṇḍalī saw this behavior of the Brahmin. Seeing this, he thought of teaching him a lesson. He went to the cemetery appearing in the form of Maṭṭakuṇḍalī, but as a youth adorned with golden ornaments, and began to weep. When the Brahmin saw this devaputta—perhaps because he had the likeness of his own child, feeling a certain special affection—he asked, "Why are you crying?" The youth replied, "I have obtained a golden carriage frame. But because I cannot find suitable wheels for it, I am planning to die of grief," implying he would commit suicide. Then the Brahmin said, "If you want, I will have wheels made for you from gold, silver, or brass, just as you wish." When he said this, the devaputta said, "I have no use for other wheels; I want the sun and the moon." Then the Brahmin said, "You foolish boy, why do you wish for something that cannot be obtained in this way?" Then the devaputta replied, "I am wishing for the sun and the moon, which are visible. You are wishing for a deceased son, wishing for someone who can no longer be seen. Out of the two of us, who is the bigger fool?" When he asked this, the Brahmin's wisdom dawned. He dispelled his grief. Dispelling it, and thanking the devaputta Maṭṭakuṇḍalī, he declared, "I have quenched my grief." He then asked, "Who are you?" The devaputta replied, "I am your son. By clarifying my mind in this manner in my final moment, as the result of a certain wholesome thought, I have attained such a birth."

Then the Brahmin said, "I never saw you giving alms, keeping precepts, or listening to the Dhamma, nor performing any meritorious deeds. How did you obtain this state?" Then the devaputta Maṭṭakuṇḍalī declared, "When the Buddha arrived here, I clarified my mind. As a result of that serene mind, that clarified mind, I received this kind of state." Then he advised the Brahmin, "You too, go for refuge to the Triple Gem and undertake the five precepts. See the Buddha, give alms, listen to the Dhamma, and accumulate merit in that way." Having said this, the devaputta Maṭṭakuṇḍalī vanished.

The Brahmin too went to see the Buddha, invited him for an almsgiving, and prepared alms at his home. The Buddha and the community of bhikkhus arrived for the alms. Even those with wrong views assembled in large numbers at the Brahmin's house. On this occasion, after presenting the alms and after the meal was finished, the Brahmin questioned the Buddha, "Without giving alms, keeping precepts, or listening to the Dhamma, is it possible to obtain celestial fortune merely by clarifying the mind towards you?" Then the Buddha declared, "Why, Brahmin, did your own son not tell you this very thing?" When the Buddha expressed it in this way, some in the crowd developed doubts. "How can one obtain such great fortune merely by clarifying the mind?" The Buddha then willed that the devaputta Maṭṭakuṇḍalī arrive there along with his celestial mansion. Accordingly, the devaputta arrived at that place together with his mansion, descended from it, paid homage to the Buddha, and stood to one side. Then, the Buddha removed the doubts of the crowd by asking the devaputta himself about the deed he had performed, posing questions and receiving answers. At that point, the crowd developed great clarity of mind. "How miraculous are the qualities of the Buddha! Merely by clarifying the mind towards a Buddha, such great fortune can be obtained!"—thus they developed immense joyous confidence and faith (saddhā). In that manner, the Buddha, to clarify this matter, delivered a highly valuable Dhamma message to the world based on this incident, using the verse we mentioned earlier:

Manasā ce pasannena — bhāsati vā karoti vā

Tato naṃ sukham-anveti — chāyā va anapāyini'

That means, "Mano pubbaṅgamā dhammā — manoseṭṭhā manomayā." Now, the word dhammā here is generally explained as the mental phenomena that arise in the mind, such as vedanā (feeling), perception, and intention. Mind precedes all of them; the mind is prior to them, and the mind is supreme to them. The mind is supreme to them. They are made of mind, fashioned by mind. Because this is so, "manasā ce pasannena — bhāsati vā karoti vā," if with a highly clarified mind, with a certain clarified mind, one speaks or acts, "tato nam sukham-anveti — chāyā va anapāyini," then, behind that person—the person who did that deed—its results, its pleasant results, follow him like his own shadow that never departs; thus the Buddha declared. The meaning within this verse is so deep that it is said that upon hearing this verse, not only the devaputta Maṭṭakunḍalī but even the Brahmin Adinnapubbaka attained the fruit of Stream-entry (sotāpatti-phala). That is to say, perhaps their past matured merits surfaced upon hearing that verse. Not only that, it is said that eighty-four thousand living beings realized the Dhamma. Those thousands mentioned there include deities as well. When we preach a sermon, it is not only these visible humans, but various classes of deities, non-human spirits (bhūtas), and other beings who wish to escape the Dukkha of Saṃsāra and have faith in the Triple Gem, who listen to it. Especially when the Buddha preaches the Dhamma, everyone listens to it. That is why those thousands are mentioned as those who reaped the benefits.

Therefore, we must reflect on this verse. Moreover, we must bring close to our lives the example that can be taken from the background story of this verse. From every Dhamma talk, from every verse, we must gather some example, some Dhamma message for our lives. Listening to the Dhamma is not something where merit is accumulated merely by the act of hearing. Therefore, we can understand this story as an extremely good illustration of how the mind is chief in everything. When we look at the life led by Adinnapubbaka, that fact becomes clear to us. No matter how much wealth this Brahmin had, he was poor in mind. From this we can see that being rich or poor is not something that happens through wealth alone. Even if one has vast wealth, if one is miserly, that person is always poor in mind. "This is not enough," or "I am still poor, I have not yet become truly rich," is what he thinks due to his miserliness. Thus, because of this, although the Brahmin Adinnapubbaka had so much wealth, he was poor in mind—a very destitute person. Furthermore, the darkness and narrowness of a miserly mind was visible in what the Brahmin did and said. From this we see that this mind itself is chief in everything. Next, it is the same with the darkening of a mind and then its illumination. This is something that must be contemplated very deeply. The Buddha has declared that there is a class of dark phenomena, and likewise, there is a class of light phenomena, illuminating phenomena.

"Kaṇham dhammaṃ vippahāya, sukkaṃ bhāvētha paṇḍito," the Buddha has declared. 'The wise person, abandoning dark phenomena, should develop bright phenomena.' Dark phenomena, meaning greed, hatred, and delusion—these are black/dark phenomena. Non-greed, non-hatred, and non-delusion are white/bright phenomena. These are illuminating phenomena, called sukka-dhamma. In this way, we see that the Brahmin had his mind darkened due to dark phenomena. Next, when we think of the other side, the young child Maṭṭakuṇḍalī was not as rich as the Brahmin. At the moment of death, he was extremely poor and helpless, possessing only the two pieces of gold hanging from his ears. But how did he obtain such a celestial rebirth? He became rich in mind. He made his mind rich. How did he make his mind rich? We must contemplate this matter well. He made his mind rich by taking as his mind's object the most sublime, supreme gem in the world. The Buddha himself has declared that among all the gems in the world, the Buddha-gem is supreme and foremost. This is mentioned in the Ratana Sutta:

'Yaṅkiñci vittaṃ idha vā huraṃ vā,

Saggesu vā yaṃ ratanaṃ paṇītaṃ,

Na no samaṃ atthi Tathāgatenā...'

Thus it is mentioned. Whatever wealth or gem there is in the world—in this world or in another world, or even in the celestial realms—none of those gems is as valuable as the Buddha-gem, the Tathāgata. Likewise:

'Yaṅkiñci ratanaṃ loke,

Vijjati vividhā puthu,

Ratanaṃ Buddhasamaṃ natthi,

Tasmā sotthī bhavantu te.'

There are such verses of blessing. Whatever diverse gems exist in the world, there is no gem equal to the Buddha-gem. Not only that, the Buddha himself had to declare—since the world did not recognize the Tathāgata—that a Tathāgata, fully Awakened One, is the foremost individual in the world. In the Aggappasāda Sutta, the Buddha declared:

'Yāvatā, bhikkhave, sattā apadā vā dvipadā vā catuppadā vā bahuppadā vā rūpino vā arūpino vā saññino vā asaññino vā nevasaññināsaññino vā, Tathāgato tesāṃ aggaṃ akkhāyati arahāṃ sammāsambuddho. Ye, bhikkhave, Budde pasannā, agge te pasannā; agge kho pana pasannānaṃ aggo vipāko hoti.'

"Bhikkhus, to whatever extent there are beings—whether footless, two-footed, four-footed, many-footed, with form, formless, percipient, non-percipient, or neither-percipient-nor-non-percipient—the Tathāgata, the Arahant, the fully Awakened One, is declared to be the foremost among them. Bhikkhus, those who have clarified confidence in the Buddha, have clarified confidence in the foremost; and for those who have clarified confidence in the foremost, the result is foremost." In this manner, the Buddha declared in the Aggappasāda Sutta. From this, we see how rich in benefits is the act of clarifying the mind toward the Buddha.

Sometimes we might wonder, "How can one obtain such vast fortune merely by clarifying the mind for a single moment?" Especially in this era, this is a time when the mind goes more towards external things. The world speaks highly of their bigness, vastness, and wondrous nature. People harbor doubts about the power of this invisible mind, the power that can be generated in the mind even in a single moment. They ask, "How can one obtain such a great fortune by doing just this much?" But we must consider that the activity of this mind is extremely instantaneous, extremely rapid. Within this rapidly functioning mind, a power that brings massive benefits can be generated in a single moment. Now here, Maṭṭakuṇḍali clarified his mind towards the Buddha for just a brief moment, or a short period of time. Even that much is not required. If, for a very brief moment, like a split second, a snap of the fingers, some clarity, an opening occurs in the mind, from that itself, an immensely valuable benefit can be reaped. Now, you all know—let us think of a dark night of dense darkness. Let us think of a night with heavy rain and storms, like we have these days, a night with darkness so thick it cannot be pierced. If lightning flashes for a single moment on such a night, in that extremely brief instant, everything around becomes clearly visible. In the same way, an opening occurs in the mind based on the object of clarity it takes, based on the object of clarifying the mind. In such a dark night, much work can be accomplished by the flash of lightning that appears for a brief moment. There are those in the past who have worked in this manner. There are stories from the past (it is mentioned like this) where archers in those days, like marksmen today, in order to show their skill and win prizes, or to set records, would stand ready with their arrow on a dark night, waiting for the moment of a lightning flash. Far away, an extremely fine hair taken from a horse's tail is hung. Now, what is the feat to be performed? This horsehair must be split with that arrow. He stands ready for this. The moment the lightning flashes, he shoots. If this is done correctly, then that person is a skilled archer. This is told as a metaphor—he performed such a feat within a single instant.

Now, you have heard how our Buddhist poets have declared:

"To shoot a horsehair from afar in the dark,

If the lightning's flash is missed, one fails the mark;

When this body, like lightning, is obtained here,

If one does not secure heaven and release, future failure is near."

— Lōvāda Saṅgarāva, verse 25.

In that moment of shooting a horsehair in the dark, if it is done correctly, then one can reap its benefits. Now, many people these days talk about "the moment." They say we must work instantaneously in this life. We are talking about the moments within this life. But the Buddha declares that this entire human existence of ours is but a single instant, a single moment. He declares this with supporting reasons. To us, this seems like a long time. But when this human life, a lifespan of less than a hundred years, is compared and contrasted with the Brahma existences that last for aeons, this is like a single instant. This life, which we think of as so large, spending a few years in this immensely long saṃsāric journey, is in reality a single instant. Therefore, the Buddha refers to this entire human life as a single instant.

Now, the Buddha specifically demonstrates that the human existence obtained during the period of a Buddha's appearance is not merely an instant, but an opportune moment (kṣaṇa-sampatti). He describes it as a highly rare opportunity, a rare instant—an opportune moment. If, during the period of a Buddha's appearance, someone is born in a region where they can hear the Dhamma with the capacity of understanding and wisdom to practice the Dhamma, that is called the opportune moment (kṣaṇa-sampatti). An extremely valuable instant. It is that very instant the poet has used as a metaphor. When he says, "When this body, like lightning, is obtained here," he is referring to this human existence. This human body itself is just like a flash of lightning. This body exists, this existence lasts, for such a brief moment, like a flash of lightning. Therefore, as Buddhists, we must understand this instant as the entirety of human life.

If we reflect in this way, generating wholesome thoughts and performing meritorious deeds is not something to be put off until the final moment, as Maṭṭakuṇḍalī did. One should not harbor such wrong views as thinking, "We can go to heaven if we do this only at the moment of death." Nowadays, some people think in that manner. They accumulate wealth through unlawful means, committing various crimes, and then expect to invite a member of the Saṅgha at the last moment to listen to a little Dhamma and go to heaven. Although Maṭṭakuṇḍalī was able to do so because he was one who had developed and fulfilled the paramis under past Buddhas, everything does not succeed by that alone. Indeed, the devaputta Maṭṭakuṇḍalī obtained such a state due to a certain natural law, a deep aspect regarding kamma. For, beings are born in various places according to their kamma. However, the kamma generated according to the sign (nimitta) that appears at the moment of death, called the āsanna-kamma (near-death kamma), is highly powerful. That is why the Buddha walked there to give Maṭṭakuṇḍalī an opportunity to purify his near-death mind and perform a wholesome deed. But not everyone can perform that feat. Sometimes, due to the sins committed during one's lifetime, a different sign appears, and one is forced to take birth in a bad destination. That archer split the horsehair in that manner because he had put in effort and training for a long time. It is not something that can be done all of a sudden.

So, what we have to understand here is that we must not wait until the near-death moment or old age. Thinking of the entirety of life as a single instant, we must constantly strive to generate within ourselves this very mind—a serene mind, a clarified mind, a pure mind, an illuminated mind. For, if those dark phenomena present themselves, we fall into darkness. If we bring forward bright phenomena, we take birth in a good destination. Not only that, we can gradually draw closer to Nibbāna (extinguishment). Nibbāna means freeing the mind from these dark phenomena of greed, hatred, and delusion.

From this, we can understand the value of this instant and that this is something that must be constantly practiced and trained. Just as that archer exerts effort, a Buddhist must always keep watch over the mind. One must examine whether the phenomena arising in this mind are things that lead to the mind's clarity or things that agitate it. Now, regarding the word clarity—here, pasanna means clarified. What is mentioned here regarding the devaputta Maṭṭakuṇḍali is the benefit of that clarified mind. The value of clarity can be understood: when water flows after a rain, filled with mud and flowing in an extremely unpleasant manner, what is the state of our mind when we see it? Next, when we look at beautifully clear water, clarified water, our mind becomes clear and peaceful. In the same way, when we bring a sublime object, a supreme object like the Buddha, into our mind, when we bring it close to our mind, our mind becomes clarified. Therefore, the word pasāda (clarity/joyous confidence) goes hand-in-hand with faith (saddhā). It is said, saddhā-pasāda (faith and clarity). With faith, clarity follows. From this, we see that faith (saddhā) in the Triple Gem is an extremely important thing. A mind without faith in the Triple Gem remains darkened by skeptical doubt (vicikicchā), hesitation, and uncertainty. Their minds are just like agitated water, like muddy water. But if someone develops faith in the Buddha, a great clarity arises in the mind along with it. This is realized by you, devout friends, even in your day-to-day lives.

That devaputta Maṭṭakuṇḍali clarified his mind by seeing the physical form, the body, of the Buddha. Although we do not get to see that physical body of the Buddha now, we can see the Dhamma-body (Dhammakāya). We can see the body of the Buddha's virtues. Therefore, from this, what we must specifically consider is the value of the meditation on the recollection of the Buddha (Buddhānussati bhāvanā). Contemplating the virtues of the Buddha. Through the virtues of the Buddha, we can see the Buddha. If we contemplate the nine-fold virtues of the Buddha, direct our mind to those virtues like Arahaṃ, bring to the surface a virtue that suits our mind, and train ourselves to constantly bring to the mind a phrase like "Arahaṃ, Arahaṃ, Arahaṃ" or "Buddho," "Sammā Sambuddho," like a meditation, then through that, we can obtain great joyous confidence and an illumination for our daily activities. Now, as expressed in that verse, if with a clarified mind, a serene mind, "bhāsati vā karoti vā," someone utters a word or performs an action, its pleasant results follow behind him like his shadow. It is this mind of ours that provides illumination to the words we use and the actions we perform. When this mind is clarified, a great light arises in the mind, like a flash of lightning on a pitch-black night.

Therefore, to constantly bring to the mind the clarity towards the Triple Gem, one must train in contemplating the Buddha's virtues as Buddhānussati meditation. While traveling in a vehicle, while in a city—now there is no telling when the time will come. We must think of every moment now as the near-death moment. Especially when thinking about the present times, some people think of the near-death moment as being eighty or ninety years old, surrounded by children and grandchildren; that is how they imagine the near-death moment. Today, we must step onto the road thinking we are in a near-death situation. Such is the state of affairs. Because of that, we must be much more watchful over the mind. If, in a bad moment, when the mind is spoiled, darkened, or muddled, we pass away—if we die suddenly—where will we go and be born? In a dark place. Either in hell, or in the realm of hungry ghosts (petas), or the demon realm. We said, didn't we, that there are two groups called dark phenomena and bright phenomena. There are two factions in this mind. Whatever factions exist in the world, we must be concerned about the factions in this mind, because it is our mind that we carry wherever we go. Therefore, the dark faction in this mind consists of greed, hatred, and delusion. These are the three that appear prominently in this dark faction: greed, hatred, and delusion. There are many auxiliary phenomena related to them. Next, the bright phenomena that aid in reaching Nibbāna are non-greed, non-hatred, and non-delusion. At first glance, there seems to be nothing here when we say "non-greed"; what is this non-greed? It is sometimes difficult to conceptualize. Non-greed means abstaining from greed. Abstaining from greed might sometimes be thought of as a trivial thing. This is not a trivial thing. This is called a virati-cetasika (mental factor of abstinence), the thought of abstaining.

This thought regarding abstinence is a very powerful thing. Now, something that mainly supports this is virtue (sīla), the undertaking of precepts. Taking precepts. At this moment, when you all, to abstain from killing living beings—veramaṇī—indeed, when taking precepts, the word veramaṇī must be pronounced well. "Pāṇātipātā veramaṇī sikkhāpadaṃ samādiyāmi," I undertake the training rule to abstain from taking life, from killing living beings. This is a certain promise made to oneself, accepting and putting it into practice. Even though it is uttered in front of the Saṅgha, this is in fact a promise made to oneself. Or rather, one instills in one's mind, "I will spend this day in this manner, based on the practice." Then, for a person who has made up their mind thus, let us say next, an opportunity arises—either for food, for pleasure, or to settle a grudge—where they feel like killing someone or an animal. The moment that thought arises, one is able to push it aside through this very non-hatred (adosa). One brings up loving-kindness, compassion, kindness, non-harming, and recalling the virtue one has undertaken, one abstains from it. To take this as an example: that moment is an extremely valuable moment. The power of being able to detach the mind. That is what is called a virati-cetasika. It is called sampatta-virati (abstinence upon encountering an opportunity). That means the opportunity to commit a sinful act has come. But one does not do it. One withdraws one's hand. Now, to commit a theft—one knows it is a highly valuable object belonging to another. It lies in front, there is no one around. All one has to do is look around, and then slowly stretch out the hand in that direction. But the mind says at that moment, "Do not do that." Why does it think so? Precisely because of having undertaken that virtue: "Adinnādānā veramaṇī sikkhāpadaṃ samādiyāmi." Following this, we see that taking precepts is not a trivial matter. It is not just a mere ritual—nowadays, at every meeting or festival, a taking of precepts is recited to show that one is Buddhist. But when one reflects on its depth, how powerful and important is it! It is the first step in our life. In this manner—it is called "by way of substitution of opposites" (tadaṅga-vasena)—the mind is distanced from the defilements. Inserting a wholesome thought for that particular moment, the unwholesome thought is pushed away. For this, one must also accumulate wholesome thoughts within oneself. Loving-kindness must be developed to abandon hatred. To abandon greed, generosity—giving, charity, the quality of renunciation—must be developed. To abandon delusion, understanding, wisdom, thinking, thinking wisely, contemplation—wise contemplation to understand the true nature of things—must be used as aids. Therefore, the moment non-greed, non-hatred, and non-delusion are mentioned, it seems as if there is nothing there. But if we analyze and contemplate, what is being spoken of here is the power to subdue and drive back those unwholesome phenomena that come from outside, arriving as guests, arriving as enemies. This is what is meant by abstinence (virati).

This is not a feat that can be done all of a sudden. Therefore, we must constantly develop that mind by way of meditation. The Buddha too, when speaking of meditation, mentions three words: "āsevati, bhāveti, bahulīkaroti." Frequently associating with some wholesome object. Let us say, if it is Buddhānussati, one frequently associates with a word like "Arahāṃ, Arahāṃ, Arahāṃ" or "Buddho" like a friend in one's home, constantly bringing it up and living with it—this is āsevati (associating). Bhāveti means developing it. Saying it a second time, a greater strength comes to the mind than the first time. Saying that word 'Buddha' ten times, a thousand times, millions and billions of times, the faith (saddhā) towards the Triple Gem develops more and more. This is not merely reciting it as a mantra. The heart must also function alongside it. A clarity must arise in the heart. It is the same with other meditations: if one is developing loving-kindness, words like 'may all beings be well and happy'—in that manner, depending on the meditation object one has chosen, one must constantly associate with it. One must strive to develop the mind through that—meditation (bhāvanā).

Next, there is the word bahulī-kamma — bahulīkaroti, making much of it, doing it abundantly. That means not just for a day or two, or for an hour or half an hour, but abundantly. One must exert effort oneself. No matter how much work one has in daily life, if someone has understood the value of their mind—we labor so much for this body. To nourish this body, to bathe and wash it, to adorn it, all of this. This 'vile, decaying body that will be left behind.' How much do we care for it? Yet, we do not think about the value of the mind even for a very brief moment of the day. It is this mind that assists us in escaping from Saṃsāra, and also in securing a happy destination. If one thinks in this way, then one becomes interested in meditation. In the manner described as āsevati, bhāveti, bahulīkaroti, one must constantly bring some wholesome object to the mind and live with it. Even though it might seem difficult and troublesome at the beginning, once it becomes a habit, one can do it effortlessly, without exertion—almost automatically. Now, when wearing a pair of spectacles for the first time, it is a great nuisance. But after a few days, one can work very easily with those spectacles. After some time, one might even look for the spectacles while wearing them on one's face. Why is this? Because to that extent, those spectacles have become a part of one's body.

The meditation object is also like that. Then, for the person who has developed Buddhānussati, when a danger arises—nowadays, people sometimes say "Budu Amme" (Oh, Buddha Mother). According to past custom, the word 'Budu' (Buddha) has become part of our society. But that is not just an automatic exclamation when pain arises. With the entire mind—Maṭṭakuṇḍalī obtained that state by clarifying his mind with his entire mind, not by saying it merely as a custom or a mantra. We must contemplate in that manner. One must think of the maximum benefit one can extract from every story and strive to reap it. One must strive to reap the maximum benefit. Now, according to the things stated in this verse, we see that our mind is chief in the words we use and the actions we perform, in everything. That is the uniqueness of the Buddha's Dhamma. In this era, there are various scientific ways of thinking. They are mostly structured according to wrong views. This is because they give priority to physical things, to external things. Because they are clearly visible and possess beautiful colors, we are deceived by them. But the Buddha has demonstrated the truth. In this long saṃsāric journey of ours, what is chief, what precedes—what assists our actions in becoming good or bad—is this mind that arises within us.

"Mano pubbaṅgamā dhammā — manoseṭṭhā manomayā." Not only that, they are created by that very mind. Now, according to this story, this becomes extremely clear. Maṭṭakuṇḍalī's celestial body was created by the mind itself. It was visible to humans. It became apparent to the beings present at that time that in his final moments, the Brahmin's son had obtained such a celestial existence with golden ornaments merely by clarifying his mind towards the Buddha. That is why, through that very faith (saddhā), other necessary Dhamma qualities accumulated in his mind, and he obtained the realization of the stages of awakening. Therefore, within this narrative, which we might think of as simple, extremely valuable and deep Dhamma is contained.

Thus, creating an opening in the mind at each moment. This is what is done through the practice of virtues such as sīla. Purifying the mind by way of substitution of opposites (tadaṅga), or in other words, clarifying it. There are three stages of effort in developing this. It is mentioned in the Dhamma as tadaṅga (substitution of opposites), vikkhambhana (suppression), and samuccheda (eradication). Now, what is done through virtue—in observing those training rules—is that at each moment, one presents a wholesome thought and drives away the unwholesome. Next, a slightly more established and even more developed stage than that is concentration (samādhi). This too, in this manner, if one develops meditation through Buddhānussati etc., and controls the wandering mind, the mind that runs after various objects, through a suitable meditation subject—such as the phrase "may all beings be well and happy" or through a meditation subject like "Buddho" or "Arahaṃ"—after some time, the mind settles down. This settling down is called concentration (samādhi). The phenomena that darken the mind are referred to in the Dhamma as hindrances (nīvaraṇas). Sensual thoughts, angry thoughts, sloth and torpor, and various other regrets, restlessness, and doubt—when all these are suppressed, just as mud settles and the water in a lake becomes clear, a clarified state of mind arises. That is called concentration (samādhi). This too is a state one can experience through a meditation subject; it is a very special state where the mind's clarity is far greater than before.

Next, finally, the stage that goes even deeper is called eradication (samuccheda). Deep within the mind lie the grave defilements known as anusaya (underlying tendencies) carried along throughout Samsāra. They remain suppressed. To dry them up, to eliminate them, one must develop wisdom (paññā). Contemplating this entire body, this life, in terms of anicca (impermanent), dukkha (suffering), and anattā (not-self), and developing insight (vipassanā), at a certain point the mind becomes illuminated. It is illuminated by wisdom. The phenomena that support this, as stated in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, are mindfulness and clear comprehension (satisampajañña), the development of mindfulness, and yoniso manasikāra (wise attention). Contemplating in that manner and developing meditation so that wisdom grows, developing the three characteristics of anicca, dukkha, and anattā, then at the moment of realizing the stages of awakening, through insight-wisdom, one is able to generate from within the mind itself the power to destroy even the bottom-most layer of those unwholesome defilements that we have carried along throughout Samsāra.

Therefore, sīla, samādhi, and paññā (virtue, concentration, and wisdom) are indeed the Dispensation (Sāsana); this is what belongs to us. Many people explain the Buddha Dispensation in various ways. But the Buddha Dispensation is in fact the cultivation of sīla, samādhi, and paññā within one's own mind-stream. What supports this, the first necessary factor, is our understanding of the value of this mind of ours—that the mind precedes everything, that the mind is supreme, and that these are created by the mind. Regarding those celestial existences, it is extremely obvious how they are created by the mind itself. Let alone that, though we do not think about it daily, let us consider a potter who makes something like a pot; he molds the pot from that lump of clay according to a certain mental image or plan of the pot. Likewise, if someone has manufactured anything that lies before us, the perception regarding that manufacturing arises first in the mind. A plan arises. It is the same when building a building. Where did this plan arise? In the mind. After it emerges as a form supported by the four great elements (cattāro mahābhūtā)—earth, water, fire, and wind—then people are deceived by it. Humans think, "This is the great thing." But many do not contemplate the plan underlying it. What the Buddha did was remind the world of this very fact. It is through that itself that one can escape from Samsāra. Therefore, one must contemplate with wisdom. This is what is called right view (sammā-diṭṭhi). Wrong view (micchā-diṭṭhi) means giving priority to unsuitable things, inappropriate things, or incorrect things. Right view, the correct vision, means bringing to the surface those Dhamma qualities that help us escape from the Dukkha of Samsāra, in the manner declared by the Buddha.

Therefore, we must reflect according to this Dhamma verse. We must reflect on our own lives—regardless of age. "How am I leading my life? Is it according to what the world says, in the way society goes, or is it in the way shown by the Buddha?" Reflecting in this manner, one must prepare a plan necessary for daily life. Within this plan, there must be a place for virtue (sīla). There must be a place for concentration (samādhi). There must be a place for wisdom (paññā). A 'place' means understanding their values and spending one's daily life in a manner that brings them to the surface. Just now, you undertook the ājīva-aṭṭhamaka-sīla (precepts with livelihood as the eighth). Through that, you, devout friends, can free the mind by way of substitution of opposites (tadaṅga). Like the archer splitting the horsehair by the flash of lightning, during those small, brief moments when unwholesome thoughts arise—when thoughts of committing a sin occur—you bring forward your virtue and drive them away. Next, if someone has developed the power of concentration, they can experience the clarity, serenity, and light of their mind for an even longer period. Then, through the realization of the stages of awakening—the realization of Stream-entry, Once-returning, Non-returning, and Arahantship—if someone develops wisdom and insight-knowledges (vipassanā-ñāṇa) and obtains liberation from Samsāra, they are able to experience the most valuable state in the world, the most purified state of their mind.

Therefore, you must think of utilizing this Dispensation of the fully Awakened One, utilizing the human existence we have obtained. This is something extremely rare; even deities sometimes say that this human existence, this human world, is the best place to realize Nibbāna. Though it is a brief, short period of time, if we utilize this period correctly, this human mind can be elevated to the highest state. That is why Buddhas are born only in the human world. That is why a Buddha appears only in the human world. Thinking in that manner, one must utilize the opportunity obtained. From every Dhamma sermon, one must extract some example for one's life. Regarding the defilements, the kilesas that arise in the mind, one must consider them as dark and, in order to banish them, develop those wholesome phenomena called sukka-dhamma within the mind—generosity, loving-kindness, wisdom, and the realization of the Dhamma. At this moment, even through listening to the Dhamma, one can clarify the mind. For, through the Dhamma we see the Buddha; when listening to the Dhamma, the doubts and anxieties in one's mind are removed, hesitations disappear, and a clarity of mind arises. Clarity of mind is extremely necessary. It is through that alone that the true nature of the world is seen. When the mind is darkened, when it is darkened by delusion, the true nature is not visible. Consequently, one's words become wrong, and both words and actions incline towards the unwholesome, towards sin. Therefore, this Samsāra is generally a journey heavily inclined towards defilements, heavily inclined towards darkness. To step away from this, one must generate a great power.

In fact, when we consider the meanings of the two words kusala and akusala: kusala means being skillful, and akusala means being unskillful. In this saṃsāric journey, inclining towards hell is unskillfulness, while inclining towards happy destinations is skillfulness. Furthermore, having to continue in this Saṃsāra is unskillfulness, while quickly putting an end to saṃsāric Dukkha is skillfulness. When we contemplate in this way, what we call mundane and supramundane kusala—this kusala means skillfulness, skillfulness. This skillfulness is not something that can be achieved all at once like that archer. This must be developed over a long period. Therefore, from today itself, one must strive at every moment, without thinking "there is no time." In daily life, people say they have no time. But there is a lot of time that everyone wastes. This can be clearly recognized—though perhaps not heard in Dhamma sermons, there is a word often heard in society: "rastiyādu venavā" (loitering or wasting time / being held up). Wasting time in this way is a moment when rust accumulates on the mind, a moment when the mind becomes dark. In daily life, we often hear of such moments of being held up: "I went to such-and-such an office and got held up there." Being held up on the road. This is an extremely good opportunity to bring forward one's accustomed meditation subject. Let us think of the Buddha-gem—like taking out a gem from one's pocket and looking at it with joy—in such moments, taking out that Buddha-gem, the supreme gem in the world spoken of here, in a way invisible to others (not because they will steal it, as it is of no use to them anyway), but bringing up that Buddha-gem: "Buddho, Buddho, Buddho" or "Arahāṃ, Arahāṃ, Arahāṃ." Then, they have utilized that time spent waiting. Or else, "may all beings be well and happy"—some meditation subject they have taken up. Or else, focusing on one's inhalation and exhalation, which is called mindfulness of breathing (ānāpānasati). If those moments of being held up or wasted time are utilized, that person, without even realizing it, becomes a meditator. In the end, almost without realizing it—we say "without even realizing it" because the way this mind functions is so wondrous—if the mind has matured, even in unexpected moments, they might even realize the stages of awakening.

Sometimes, the saying that in the past, while the Buddha was preaching the Dhamma, someone became an Arahant or a Stream-enterer right during the sermon, is misunderstood by intellectualized scholars of this era. They think, "We can also do it that way." It was only those minds that had practiced and trained in those virtues under Buddhas or within Dispensations for a long period in Saṃsāra, elevating them to a high level so that only a tiny spark was needed, that were able to realize the stages of awakening so quickly. One must not think that everyone is like that. But the lesson we must draw from it is: if someone wishes to obtain such a state in a brief moment, it must be practiced over a long period. It must be trained. One must strive to create opportunities for that within one's own life.

Today, on this valuable Uposatha day, you, devout friends, undertook the valuable ājīva-aṭṭhamaka-sīla. If it is not treated as a mere ritual, but by reflecting on each precept—this virtue (sīla) is a certain code of conduct regarding the control of body and speech. To protect it, the mind must assist. The mind assists precisely through that mind of abstinence, described as the virati-cetasika. One must bring forward the thought of abstaining from the things mentioned. Saying "do not do these things" is easier. That is why the Buddha has used the word veramaṇī (abstaining) in these virtues. Scholars sometimes think there is nothing in this. This is precisely where something exists. Therefore, regarding this ājīva-aṭṭhamaka-sīla—if one directs the mind well at the moment of undertaking this virtue, that moment too is an instance where a great opening occurs in the mind. One establishes a determination in the mind: "I have done such-and-such things. Hereafter, I will not do them." This is a great thing. If that determination is made in the morning, and if one is able to protect it throughout the day, that person will experience a clarity, peacefulness, and joy in the mind by evening. Such is virtue. Next, likewise, if in daily life one has practiced some meditation subject—without saying it is difficult or there is no time—utilizing free moments, moments of relaxation, bringing up that meditation subject and developing the mind, then that person, without even realizing it, grows in concentration (samādhi). At some point, the mind might even enter absorption (jhāna). After working hard, when one lies down contemplating that meditation subject on the bed, sometimes absorption (jhāna) can be attained.

That was how lay disciples in the past, like Nakulamātā, Nakulapitā, Citta the householder, Anāthapiṇḍika, and others, obtained such high states. The Buddhist laymen and laywomen of the Buddha's time did not lead lives completely immersed and drowned in matters of money. Being inclined towards the Dhamma, and somehow finding time for the Dhamma, they were able to develop concentration in that manner. Next, what is even more valuable is using that concentration as an aid to understand the true nature of the world—anicca (impermanent), dukkha (suffering), and anattā (not-self)—through the very events that happen in daily life. Indeed, every event that occurs in the world can be placed within these three aspects of anicca, dukkha, and anattā. These are the three characteristics. These three characteristics can be seen everywhere, wherever one looks. But proper contemplation must be present. There must be right vision, which is called yoniso manasikāra. For a person with right vision, the streams, brooks, and rivers flowing in this world, the fruits and flowers falling from these trees—through all these things, they can develop insight (vipassanā). They can see the three characteristics of anicca, dukkha, and anattā. In that manner, one must contemplate well on how to direct one's mind in daily life. Without putting this off saying "I cannot do it," if one plans to clarify the mind only in old age or at the near-death moment to go to a celestial world like Maṭṭakuṇālī, then this Dhamma sermon has been misunderstood. It has been understood in a distorted way. That is not how one should think. There is a saying in the world: "If so much can be gained from that, how much more can be gained from this?" In that manner, if so much can be achieved through the mind in a brief moment, what cannot be accomplished once it is well developed?—thus one must contemplate.

Contemplating thus, today, through the undertaking of precepts, and then through clarifying the mind towards the Triple Gem by listening to this Dhamma, you have made a beginning in walking upon the path of Dhamma expressed in this verse. You must make the aspiration: "May this store of merit generated through this, by cultivating and developing within our mind-stream those spiritual faculties (indriya) and powers (bala) of saddhā (faith), viriya (energy), sati (mindfulness), samādhi (concentration), and paññā (wisdom) that aid in reaching Nibbāna, enable us to realize this sublime Dhamma of Nibbāna, if possible in this very life, through the realization of the stages of awakening—Stream-entry, Once-returning, Non-returning, and Arahantship—and being freed from all saṃsāric Dukkha of jāti (birth), jarāmaraṇa (aging and death), sickness, and the like, may we be peaceful in the deathless, great Nibbāna—may we obtain the ability, strength, and power for this."

Likewise, to whatever extent there is a host of right-viewed deities and Brahmas who protect the Dispensation, and similarly, whatever deities and spirits who reside in this sacred place who desire merit and desire Nibbāna—may all of them rejoice in this merit of our Dhamma preaching and Dhamma listening, and rejoicing, may they all realize the sublime, deathless, great Nibbāna through a Bodhi of their aspiration. Furthermore, whatever departed relatives there may be who have passed away, and not only them, but from the Avīci hell to the Akanisṭha heaven, whatever beings there are who desire merit and desire Nibbāna—may all of them rejoice in our merit of Dhamma preaching and Dhamma listening, and being freed from their respective miserable states, and walking on the path of Dhamma, may they be peaceful in the sublime, deathless, great Nibbāna as quickly as possible. Now, let us transfer merit by reciting the verses in this manner.

Verses 197-199 from the Sukhavagga (Chapter on Happiness) of the Dhammapada

Dear Listeners,

Wishing for happiness is a common phenomenon of all beings in the entire world. The whole world is engaged in a journey in search of happiness. However, this journey in search of happiness often ends in Suffering (Dukkha). The reason for this is that ordinary worldlings—those worldlings whose eyes are covered by ignorance and who are bound by Craving (Taṇhā)—seek happiness through the wrong path. It is because they do not correctly know true happiness and the path to it that they have fallen into this state. Having fulfilled the perfections for four incalculable aeons and a hundred thousand aeons, our Buddha, the Teacher of the Three Worlds, attained Supreme Enlightenment on a Vesak full-moon day like today, in order to introduce the true path to happiness and true happiness to the worldly beings who are running in search of happiness. The Buddha, with the help of His great wisdom and great compassion, came forward on many occasions and preached the Dhamma to steer worldly beings away from seeking happiness through that wrong path, and to introduce them to true happiness. Now, these three verses we have taken as our theme, along with the story related to them, demonstrate to us how the Buddha, by virtue of His quality as the incomparable charioteer of men to be tamed (anuttaro purisadamma-sārathi), employing skillful means out of great compassion, and clarifying the true nature of the Dhamma with great wisdom, brought peace to the world.

Between the city of Kapilavastu, belonging to the Sakyan clan, and the city of Koliya, belonging to the Koliyan clan, flows a river called Rohini. Constructing a dam across that river and utilizing its water, the farmers of both these cities—of both these kingdoms—engage in cultivation. During a certain drought, both parties realized that as the water was running scarce, "We cannot both carry out this cultivation; this water is sufficient for only one group." Thereupon, the two parties gathered and began to argue and dispute in order to secure the water for themselves. Having exchanged harsh words, quarreling, and hurling insults about each other's lineage, this commotion eventually reached the ears of the royal clans and the royal courts of both sides. Finally, matters escalated to the point of a great war. The kings of both sides set out for war, shouting battle cries. Precisely at dawn on that day, when the Buddha surveyed the world through the attainment of great compassion, He saw that if He did not intervene and go there, His two relative royal clans would destroy one another, resulting in a great bloodbath. Having seen this, the Buddha traveled through the air alone and sat cross-legged, suspended in mid-air above the middle of the Rohini River.

As soon as the Buddha arrived there and they saw Him, the kings of both the Sakyan and Koliyan clans cast down their weapons and paid homage to Him. The Buddha asked, "O great kings, what is the cause of this dispute?" Those kings were unable to declare with one voice what the primary cause of this war was. Because, in reality, they had been dragged into this war due to the hatred that arose after they had insulted each other's caste and lineage. Even the kings themselves did not know the underlying cause of this. Next, they stated to the Buddha, "We do not know. Perhaps the commander-in-chief might know." Then they summoned the commander-in-chief and asked him, but he too said he did not know. "Perhaps the sub-king might know," he said. Questioning in this manner, it was eventually revealed that this war was brought about by the dispute initiated by the assembly of farmers. Then the Buddha asked both parties, "O great kings, how much is this water worth?" "Venerable Sir, water is worth but little. Water is something of trifling value." "And how much are these Khattiya kings worth?" "Their value, Venerable Sir, is beyond measure; they are priceless." "Then, O great kings, why do you destroy priceless human lives for the sake of something so worthless?" When the Buddha questioned them thus, the kings had no answer to give. Thereupon, the Buddha expounded the Dhamma using the verses we have taken as our theme. Conveying the message, "All of you have made your minds extremely restless with hatred, defilements, and the search for the fivefold sensual pleasures; yet, among such worldly people, I dwell experiencing true happiness in this manner," He uttered those verses.

*'How happily indeed we live, free from hatred among those who hate!'

*'Among hostile men, we dwell free from hatred.'

"How happily indeed we live, free from hatred among those who hate"—among hostile human beings, among the hateful beings of the world, we (meaning the Buddha and those noble ones who have calmed their defilements) dwell free from hatred. "How happily indeed we live"—extremely happily. "Sukha" means happiness. "Susukham" means extreme happiness. Experiencing happiness of the highest order, let us dwell free from hatred among a hateful world. "Among hostile men, we dwell free from hatred"—among hostile beings, we dwell free from hatred. In the same way, "How happily indeed we live, free from disease among the diseased"—among beings who are afflicted and diseased with defilements, we live extremely happily, free from disease—without that affliction of defilements. "Among diseased men, we dwell free from disease"—among such defilement-afflicted beings, we dwell free from affliction. Similarly, "How happily indeed we live, free from striving among those who strive"—among restless beings who are constantly and anxiously striving to seek the fivefold sensual pleasures, we dwell happily, free from such anxious seeking. Basing Himself on the happiness of Nibbāna that He had attained, the Buddha uttered these three verses. Having heard this, many reached the fruit of stream-entry. Moreover, that war came to an end right there.

Now, let us turn our attention to this peaceful message of solace given to us by the Buddha. Particularly, with reference to this event, we can understand how anger, rage, and hatred arise in the world. Whatever wars occur in the world, the beginning of every single one of them is the human mind. Hatred, which arises as a seed in the human mind, matures little by little. Once this becomes resentment, and finally turns into a deep-seated grudge, that defilement burns oneself while also burning others, leading beings towards destruction for a long period of time. Likewise, you, devout lay devotees, have heard the past stories regarding Ven. Devadatta. For how many aeons did that hatred, which Devadatta conceived towards the Bodhisatta in the past, persist into the future? In that manner, we must first reflect on the Impermanent (Anicca) nature of things in the world. Particularly this era, in this country and indeed in the entire world, is an era in which this fire of hatred, this fire of anger, is spreading everywhere. Thus, the worldly think of winning through fighting as happiness. There is a concept called "drinking the cup of victory" (celebrating triumph). Many people fight and, failing to recognize their own internal restlessness, expect calm and peace only by crushing or killing their opponent, and then drinking to victory. But the Buddha has declared:

'Victory breeds hatred, the defeated dwells in pain;

The peaceful one dwells happily, giving up both victory and defeat.'

If someone wins a victory, it only breeds further hatred. The peaceful person dwells happily, having abandoned both victory and defeat. It is also the word of the Buddha that hatred is never appeased by hatred. This is when we understand how much destruction this thought of hatred causes throughout the world. If this is not properly treated with medicine at the very beginning, it is just like a pathogen. In a place where pathogens spread, some form of vaccination or immunization is required. Where there is no immunization, pathogens multiply dangerously and make a person sick. It is the same with this hatred. When some people lack proper loving-kindness meditation and the like to counteract this, it becomes a character trait. They always have a nature of irritability, hatred, and anger overflowing. Such a person is described in the Dhamma as "arukūpama puggala" (one like an open sore). "Aruka" means a wound or sore. When a person with an open sore goes into a crowd, whenever the crowd rubs against him slightly here and there, he gets angry because his sore gets irritated. A person with intense hatred is compared to such a wounded person. Due to that hatred, a friction-prone nature arises. He collides everywhere. He constantly collides with people and even with things. With every such collision, what is the transformation that occurs within this person's mind? Not only does that dangerous defilement of hatred manifest at that moment, but in accordance with that karma, it sends him to realms of yakkhas, ghosts, or hells for a long time in saṃsāra, bringing long-term Suffering (Dukkha). Furthermore, once that thought grows, it manifests verbally as harsh speech. It does not stop there. After verbal disputes, it translates into physical action, leading one even to grave unwholesome deeds like killing. In this manner, one must contemplate the disadvantageous side of hatred beforehand.

Next, the Buddha has declared five methods to appease deep-seated hatred—called āghāta (grudge or malice)—to dismantle resentment (āghāta-paṭivinaya). One, which goes without saying, is loving-kindness itself: developing the meditation on loving-kindness. Secondly, compassion is mentioned. In certain instances, compassion also helps to understand the weaknesses of one's opponent, treating it as a sāmsāric weakness, as an illness. The person who has harbored a grudge or hatred should be looked upon as a sick person, as a wounded person. Thus, by using compassion as a path and a medium, one can appease a deep-seated grudge or intense hatred that has arisen within oneself. In other instances, equanimity. Equanimity means looking with neutrality. "This person's body and my body are both composed of these elements: earth, water, fire, and wind (pathavī, āpo, tejo, vāyo). Toward which part of this person am I maintaining hatred?" In that way, one endeavors to cultivate equanimity. The Buddha has declared that equanimity as well is a factor that helps to appease hatred. Also, non-attention and non-contemplation (asati-amanasikāra). Hatred grows because it keeps resurfacing in the mind. To eliminate this resurfacing nature, one must try not to attend to it. One must direct the mind to ignore it. It is because of the intention of revenge for the wrong done to oneself that it keeps resurfacing. Instead, one should try to forget it. Likewise, another method is shown: reflecting in accordance with the Dhamma that all beings are owners of their karma. That is, thinking of the natural law that, in accordance with karma, each person will reap the fruits and results of what they do. Now, for many, hatred arises—what they call "justified anger"—in order to "teach a lesson" to others. Thinking, "I must teach them a lesson." But they do not see the hatred within themselves; it remains hidden as a deceitful state (vañcaka-dhamma). Therefore, one must think: "This is a natural law of the world. If someone does wrong in accordance with karma, they will have to suffer the consequences. We should not become the instruments of that retribution." If we become the instruments of punishing them, we too will have to experience the consequences of that unwholesome deed. In this way, the Buddha has shown five ways to appease deep-seated hatred.

This is something one can experience and utilize in one's daily life. Furthermore, a monastic who was highly renowned in this dispensation for qualities like loving-kindness and compassion was the Chief Disciple, Ven. Sāriputta. On one occasion, he expounded five methods to the Sangha to appease deep-seated hatred (āghāta-paṭivinaya). The similes he presented are truly remarkable. He points out: suppose hatred or resentment arises in someone towards another person. That person's bodily behavior is impure—meaning his bodily behavior is very bad—but his verbal behavior is very pleasant and good, or there is no fault in his verbal behavior. Ven. Sāriputta demonstrates with a simile how one should behave when resentment arises towards such a person. Just like a monastic who wears rag-robles, while walking on a path or street, upon finding a piece of dirty cloth, presses down one end of the cloth with his foot, tears off the clean part with his hand, takes it, and goes away—in the same way, on that occasion, one should not contemplate that person's bad bodily behavior. Without thinking about the bad bodily behavior, one thinks only of the good side. One brings to the forefront the fact that his verbal behavior is good and thereby appeases one's own hatred. This is the simile given. This is not just for monastics; everyone should understand it for themselves through this simile. This means there is a person who has both a good side and a bad side. For instance, the bad side is his bodily behavior, and the good side is his verbal behavior. If one wishes to increase one's own hatred and resentment, one is inclined to think only of that bad side. Sometimes, a minor defect as tiny as a hair can erase a virtue as grand as a mountain. One enjoys a kind of misplaced pleasure, a misplaced delight, in that thought of hatred. But it does not benefit oneself; rather, one burns. This happens because of contemplating what should not be contemplated. Thus, Ven. Sāriputta declares that, keeping that simile in mind—just as monastics who wear rag-robles do not simply discard a dirty piece of cloth but extract only what is usable from it—one should recall the good side of that person and incline one's mind toward loving-kindness and compassion. Thereby, one appeases that deep-seated hatred which yields dangerous consequences.

In the next simile, there is a person whose bodily behavior is pure, but whose verbal behavior is impure. That is, his physical deeds are good, but his speech is bad. What is the simile Ven. Sāriputta gives to appease the deep-seated hatred towards such a person? Suppose during a great drought, in the hot season, someone comes searching for water with intense thirst. There is a pond, but its water is covered with moss and water weeds. Since he must drink water, he somehow pushes aside the moss and weeds with both hands, drinks as much water as he needs, and goes on his way. Similarly, the moss there is compared to the shortcomings in that person's speech. What is shown here is that without contemplating those verbal flaws, one should take only what is good. In this manner, according to the diversity of each individual, Ven. Sāriputta has shown there a method to discipline one's feelings—a proper method of contemplation.

Thirdly, he points out: there may be a person whose bodily behavior is extremely bad and whose verbal behavior is also extremely bad. However, occasionally, from time to time, a pure and clear state of mind arises, albeit very rarely. The simile Ven. Sāriputta gives to appease hatred towards such a person is truly wondrous. Suppose during a drought, someone who is extremely thirsty goes in search of water. Along the way, there is no water anywhere except a tiny puddle of water in a cow's footprint. Seeing this, the person does not think, "Now I must bring a bucket to drink this water," or "I must scoop it up with my hands and drink it." Because doing so would stir up the mud, making it impossible to drink. Therefore, according to the situation, what does he do? He gets down on all fours like a cow and laps up that water with his tongue. This is because of his severe thirst during the drought. What does Ven. Sāriputta demonstrate through this simile? No matter how bad that person's traits are—with nothing of value in his bodily behavior and nothing of value in his verbal behavior—yet, occasionally, like a small flash of lightning in a pitch-black night, a tiny opening of goodness appears in his mind. That is enough for one to develop loving-kindness and arouse compassion towards him. This is the lesson Ven. Sāriputta teaches. Forgetting the undesirable side, one reflects: "Ah, despite being like this, there is still this little bit of good to be taken from this person," and thereby appeases one's own hatred. All of this is done for one's own benefit. If that fire of hatred grows in one's mind, one will have to suffer grave consequences even saṃsāric-wise. Not only that, but even in this very life, it can escalate and eventually lead to quarrels, conflicts, and even murder. That, then, is the third simile.

Next, Ven. Sāriputta points out: there can be a person whose bodily behavior is extremely bad—nothing of value there. His verbal behavior is also bad—nothing of value there. Furthermore, not even occasionally, like a flash of lightning, does any goodness or clarity arise in his mind. In short, he is someone from whom "absolutely nothing of value can be taken." Yet, the attitude to be adopted even towards such a person is shown next. Suppose someone sees an extremely poor, sick, and helpless person traveling along a desert path. That person has no food to carry, no water to drink, no guide to show the way, no medicine. In that state, he travels along the path in a most miserable and helpless manner. How does a wise person reflect upon seeing this? "Ah, if only someone would help this helpless person and show him the way! If only someone would give him some food, some medicine, so that he would not perish but somehow survive!" In this way, he arouses a thought of compassion. Generally, when seeing such a person, those whose minds are inclined toward compassion will have such thoughts. Based on that simile, we must reflect that even if there is absolutely nothing of value to be found in the person who did wrong to us, we must still show compassion to that person. What we demonstrate through all these similes is how to apply one's mind to the simile and, through it, extract what is useful for one's own life. That is regarding the fourth type of person.

Next, fifthly, he shows: sometimes such things also happen in society. A person's bodily behavior is extremely good, and his verbal behavior is extremely good. There seems to be no fault whatsoever. Yet, for some reason, perhaps due to a personal matter, hatred arises towards him. When such hatred arises, it is very easy to appease. For this too, Ven. Sāriputta provides a simile. Just like a thirsty person searching for water during a drought who comes across a full, beautiful lake or pond, with cool shade, clear water, and shady trees all around. Just as that person, without any trouble, drinks and bathes as he wishes and rests peacefully and happily under a tree, in the same way, one should contemplate the good side of that person. Thinking, "Even though hatred has arisen in me towards this person, he possesses such excellent virtues," one should bathe in those virtues—bathe in that river of virtues—and appease one's own fire of hatred. This is what Ven. Sāriputta demonstrates.

In this manner, we have to reflect. What do we see through this? Underlying our life's path and every action we perform is the attitude we adopt toward things. "Attitude" means the way we look at something. This is something we can change; it is not permanent. We can change it. The Buddha declares that this change must be done in accordance with the Dhamma. In the Dhamma, there are two modes of contemplation: wise contemplation and unwise contemplation—or proper reflection and improper reflection. Improper contemplation is referred to in the Dhamma as ayoniso manasikāra (unwise attention). All defilements, and things related to them, arise because of that unwise attention (ayoniso manasikāra). Therefore, to be freed from them, one must practice contemplating properly. Here, what Ven. Sāriputta has shown through these similes is precisely that proper contemplation: Wise Attention (yoniso manasikāra). The Buddha, in short, has given permission that if a certain way of contemplating suppresses unwholesome states and arouses wholesome states, then one must contemplate in that very manner. Employing any simile or utilizing any method, one must contemplate in such a way that unwholesome states—namely greed, hatred, and delusion—and things associated with them are suppressed and eliminated, rather than allowing them to grow. For that, indeed, one has the full right to steer the mind using any simile, mental image, or wholesome thought. It is through such systematic cultivation that what we call "attitude" is formed. Now, suppose a person who does not even know what loving-kindness (mettā) or loving-kindness meditation is looks at the world. His perspective, his way of looking at the world, is such that he collides everywhere. He makes his entire life a mess, destroying himself and destroying others.

On the other hand, if someone begins, even gradually, to instill in their mind the truth we mentioned at the beginning of this sermon—that the desire for happiness is a natural law inherent in all living beings. Loving-kindness (mettā) means digesting this idea of the desire for happiness in the world into one's own mind. This mind is constantly scattered and fails to settle on a single object because of the arising of these defilements: greed, hatred, and delusion. Therefore, if we feed our mind with this universal law of the world—that everyone desires happiness—we can settle our mind within it. Thus, by framing it into a single phrase like "May they be well" or "May all beings be happy," and constantly bringing it to mind, repeatedly raising it in the mind, one's attitude is transformed. Furthermore, concentration (samādhi) and many other virtues develop as a result.

The Buddha has expounded many benefits of these practices. You, devout lay devotees, may have heard of the benefits experienced in daily life through loving-kindness meditation, as described in the Mettānisamsa Sutta. If one's mind is liberated through that loving-kindness meditation—what does it mean for the mind to be liberated? When we say "deep-seated hatred" (resentment), the very term implies a bond—a bondage; the mind is bound. Due to some sign of irritation (paṭigha-nimitta) or because of a wrong done to oneself, based on the intention of revenge, the mind is constantly colliding day and night. It is like a bond—a serious bond, the bond of hatred. That is why, in samsāra, some go on taking revenge on each other continuously. Therefore, in place of that, we bring forward the liberation of the mind. This is called the "mind-deliverance of loving-kindness" (mettā-cetovimutti). When the meditation on loving-kindness is thoroughly digested in the mind, the state of having that pure mind of loving-kindness spread toward the entire world is described as the mind-deliverance of loving-kindness (mettā-cetovimutti). In a mind that has reached such a state of deliverance—the mind-deliverance of loving-kindness—the peace that arises yields eleven benefits in daily life, as expounded by the Buddha. One sleeps happily—attaining peaceful sleep in daily life. One wakes happily. One dreams no evil dreams. One is dear to human beings, dear to non-human beings. Even deities protect one. Also, any dangers that might come to one—dangers from poison, fire, or weapons—are often averted by the very power of that mind of loving-kindness. Furthermore, the mind quickly becomes concentrated, settled. The complexion of one's face becomes clear and serene. One dies unconfused. If one has not attained any paths and fruits, or has not realized Nibbāna, at the very least, one will be reborn in the Brahma realms. In this way, the Buddha has declared a multitude of benefits for a person who has developed that loving-kindness meditation to the level of mind-deliverance (cetovimutti).

Therefore, on a noble Vesak full-moon day like this, we must make a determination: to lead our lives on the right path, not much is required. Only a very slight change needs to be made. We know that even to operate a massive machine, or to get a stalled machine running, sometimes only a small pin or bolt is needed to correct the defect. Similarly, it is not a massive undertaking that helps to change one's attitude here. Sometimes it is just a single word. Installing the thought and the phrase "May they be well" into one's mind as a meditation. Meditation is not some strange thing. It is a special strength gained by repeatedly bringing to mind a wholesome thought, a wholesome object. This strength is called repetition or cultivation (āsevana). This means that through repeated association, one can cultivate a massive strength in one's mind. That is why, when speaking of meditation, the terms used are āsevitā, bhāvitā, bahulikatā—frequented, developed, and practiced abundantly. Frequently associating with the thought of loving-kindness means repeatedly raising it in the mind.

In that way, within that thought, there is a nature that liberates the mind. For the mind has been narrowed and cornered. Within the fence and gate of selfishness, the minds of worldly beings are narrowed and cornered. It is only by freeing oneself from that selfishness that one can maintain the thought: "May others be happy." That wishing of happiness often begins with those around oneself—one's relatives, parents, children, and so forth. But one should not stop there. Next are neighbors, then neutral people, and finally even enemies—everyone. Conquering enemies in the true sense is not done through wars as mentioned earlier. Conquering the enemy is something done by appeasing that thought of hatred. The enemy is inside the mind, not the external enemy. It is the same person, but once anger arises, they become the enemy. The difference between an enemy and a friend is nothing other than one's attitude toward that person. Therefore, the moment that attitude changes, that enemy becomes a friend. That is why Buddhist scholars have stated—as a simile—if we want to walk on the ground and think of clearing all the thorns on the earth before we start walking, that will never be accomplished. Instead, when one puts on leather shoes, those thorns can do no harm to oneself. Similarly, if one thinks, "I will sleep peacefully after killing all the enemies in the world," one can never finish doing so. Killing all enemies in the world to leave only those whom one likes is something that can never succeed. Instead, what must be done is represented by the simile of putting on shoes—which stands for one's own mind. When the enemy inside one's mind is killed—for it is within one's own mind that this enemy is born—if that enemy is killed, it is as if all external enemies have been killed. In that manner, Buddhist philosophers have expounded various principles and hypotheses. It is by developing one's own mind in terms of meditation based on these that those benefits can be realized.

So it is with regard to hatred. Concerning other defilements too, we must constantly reflect in accordance with the natural law of Wise Attention (yoniso manasikāra) and unwise attention (ayoniso manasikāra). What leads us for a long time through this saṃsāra are these three root defilements: greed, hatred, and delusion. Now, greed is what the Buddha represented there as "ailment" (disease). The worldly are constantly sick. Afflicted with defilements—a state of defilement-affliction. To be freed from this defilement-affliction, one has to appease those defilements of Craving (Taṇhā), desire, and greed. Similarly, the worldly are in a state of striving, always restless. Due to that endless seeking, the fivefold sensual pleasures, and the intense greed for them. We can see how much destruction and how much Suffering (Dukkha) the worldly accumulate by running around seeking various fashions, trends, or useless things in the world. Sometimes getting into debt, they accumulate a mass of suffering simply because they have no understanding of true peace, the happiness of solace. Therefore, in accordance with the Buddha's word, we must constantly reflect, especially with loving-kindness. This era is one where the entire world is being destroyed by hatred. Hence, in daily life, one must regard a certain meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna) as one's true "workplace." To carry out daily life, we engage in various industries and works. But all of these help only to sustain the physical body—to sustain that body which we think experiences happiness. It is this mind that carries us through the entirety of saṃsāra. We leave this bodily cage behind here. But as a payment of debts for the defilements cultivated and the karma performed in the mind, beings travel in saṃsāra for a long duration.

Therefore, far greater care must be paid to our mind than the care paid to this body. This mind can be soiled very easily. Various objects in the world flow in, and there is a tendency for the mind to be disturbed either by hatred, lust, or delusion. To prevent this, some method must be employed to concentrate the mind. Now, if someone instills the thought "May they be well" into the mind the moment they wake up in the morning, and practices maintaining the mind within that thought with determination for even a few minutes, they will gradually be able to recall that thought from time to time, as the Buddha taught, in all four postures, even while engaging in other activities. Furthermore, that person will develop the power to project that thought of loving-kindness—that stream of loving-kindness thoughts—toward everyone who comes before him. A person who has attained such mind-deliverance of loving-kindness (mettā-cetovimutti) is indeed the one who experiences the numerous benefits of loving-kindness, just as the Buddha expounded.

Next, another helpful quality is compassion (karuṇā). Loving-kindness is generally directed toward beings who are like oneself. Compassion, on the other hand, is mostly for those who are suffering. Suffering can mean those who are not physically before us, or when we see someone who is injured, compassion may arise in us. But like the great compassion of the Buddha, we must reflect that all beings in this saṃsāra should be objects of compassion. Every being fallen into the suffering of saṃsāra can be an object of compassion. Thinking thus, we utilize compassion to eliminate that thought of hatred. Similarly, in daily life, to dwell happily as the Buddha taught—to dwell in extreme happiness (susukham)—the quality of sympathetic joy (muditā) is of help. These are known as the Sublime Abodes (brahmavihāra). Often in society, envy is prevalent. If someone appears higher than oneself, or uses more luxurious things, envy arises toward that person. There too, what exists is irritability and resentment. Instead, the entire world of beings desires happiness—everyone. One should regard their happiness as one's own happiness. That is what sympathetic joy (muditā) means. Even for oneself. Now, parents rejoice when their own children grow and prosper. But those same parents may harbor envy when their neighbors achieve some progress. This reveals that it occurs because of a certain defect, a flaw in the mind. Instead, one must think, just as one thinks of one's own children, that the entire world of beings desires happiness. Thinking, "The well-being of everyone is indeed my own well-being," one cultivates the quality of sympathetic joy (muditā). Sympathetic joy is an extremely rare quality in society, and that is why envy and the like spread more.

Next, the same applies to equanimity (upekkhā). There are many things in the world that we cannot change. They are just as they are. If we try to collide with them, instead of just observing them with equanimity, it will lead to our own ruin. Why? Because each individual's lifespan and daily actions are things that have come in accordance with karma. If we can help that person to some extent through wise courses of action such as loving-kindness and compassion, we should do so. If somehow that is impossible, equanimity is what must be brought forward—neutrality. "It is that person's karma; it is something that has arisen in accordance with karma. There is nothing for me to worry about, and no way for me to interfere." Thus, one must develop equanimity toward it.

In this way, when qualities like loving-kindness, compassion, sympathetic joy, and equanimity increase in society, one can experience that noble happiness called "extreme happiness" (susukham) declared by the Buddha. Therefore, if we make no effort to shape our lives, our lives will be destroyed, caught up in the dangerous fires of hatred and anger spreading through society. Today, through various media, all day long we hear objects that provoke hatred, anger, and resentment. When hearing and seeing these, if one can develop a certain attitude, a strength of attitude, such that ignorance does not arise within the mind, then that person can live safely in society, just like walking with shoes on in an extremely thorny region. Therefore, what helps in all of this is the development of our mind. If one disregards the mind and its power, engaging only in jobs and other mundane activities of daily life, and thinks that is sufficient, one's destruction is very near.

A Buddha appears in the world precisely to show the noble nature of this human mind—to show to what an exalted state it can be elevated. In this dispensation, those who attained Arahantship and were worshipped even by deities and Brahmas were sometimes those marginalized in society, considered to be of the lowest caste, or those who had lived as extremely violent bandits like Angulimala, or those who had been engaged in various kinds of misconduct. All of them became recipients of the Buddha's great compassion. Through the help of His great compassion, and by virtue of the skillful means He employed based on His great wisdom, the defilements in their minds were removed—those temporarily obscuring defilements were discarded, and the strength of their saṃsāric training emerged, allowing them to attain that state of Arahantship. The Buddha cannot bestow Nibbāna upon someone who does not possess the capacity for it. It is by bringing to light, training, and bringing to maturity the strength that the person has developed throughout saṃsāra that He elevates someone to noble states such as Arahantship.

Therefore, each of us must reflect: in this saṃsāra, there may be countless meritorious deeds and good things we have performed. They remain buried, like glowing embers beneath ashes. They do not emerge on their own. The method of bringing them to light is indeed meditation—accustoming the mind to meditation. Therefore, on such a valuable full-moon day, we must make a determination. It is not correct to regard these subtle things as something that most people in the world seek and see. Some people think that meditation, or taking an interest in these sermons and meditation, is only for those who have reached old age and are contemplating the next life. This is a mistaken view. A concentrated mind provides the strength to find solutions to a multitude of problems that arise in daily life—even in a very short time. Especially in a mind prepared by the Sublime Abodes (brahmavihāra) of loving-kindness, compassion, sympathetic joy, and equanimity, the power of decision-making is extremely strong. Such a mind is essential for making pure, clear decisions. The reason for the occurrence of wars and conflicts throughout the world today is indeed that undeveloped mind. What the worldly do in the name of "developing the mind" is either learning and studying, or applying the mind to machines, technology, and science. Through those, the mind acquires a certain expertise in mundane science, but a true systematic cultivation of the mind—the real "development" called meditation—does not occur. Instead, complex traits in the mind, like cunningness and deceit, grow in a scattered manner. This thing called the mind goes hand in hand with the heart. No mind arises free from the thoughts generated in this heart. Therefore, some purification of that heart must be done through these meditation methods of loving-kindness and the like. Otherwise, that person becomes subjected to intellectualism, cunningness, and deceitful states (vañcaka-dhamma), and instead of developing his mind, he drives it to extremist conditions. Under the guise of cleverness, various unwholesome and sinful deeds are presented as good things.

You, devout lay devotees, are well aware of the various types of wrong livelihood (micchā-ājīva) that have emerged on the stage of society today. Now, if we consider why people are unable to protect the precept of livelihood (ājīva) they have undertaken at this moment, it is because they have abandoned righteous ways in various manners and are exerting themselves excessively over the economy. Due to those unwholesome thoughts (aniṭṭha-vitakka), they forget the unwholesome aspect of sinful deeds, and instead, regard happiness in daily life as economic progress. This is what has come to the forefront of society today. The Buddha has spoken of the "happiness of blamelessness" (anavajja-sukha)—the daily happiness one derives from a blameless life, where one's own mind does not blame oneself. The Buddha has pointed out four fears: the fear of self-reproach (attāṇvāda-bhaya), the fear of reproach by others (parānuvāda-bhaya), the fear of punishment (daṇḍa-bhaya), and the fear of a bad destination (duggati-bhaya). These fears represent dangers—there are four dangers for worldly beings. The fear of self-reproach means one's own mind blames oneself. No matter how secretly from the world one performs sinful deeds, like murder or theft, one's own mind knows it. That person cannot sleep properly. If someone shouts "Thief! Thief!" he turns around and looks. If someone shouts "Murderer!" he turns around to look in terror. Why? Because he thinks they are referring to him. To that extent, one's own mind blames oneself. Similarly, the fear of reproach by others means that once others find out about it, one has to hear insults and accusations from them. Furthermore, if caught in the web of the law, one has to undergo punishment. Even if one escapes all of these, in the end, one will have to experience those terrifying consequences called the bad destination—being born in hell and other places, being born in the four planes of misery. The Buddha's word is indeed true. All of this happens because of neglecting the mind—the true value of the mind.

Therefore, reflecting on these matters, you, devout lay devotees, must accord a major place to the meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna) in your daily life on this precious Vesak full-moon day. As a start, in the morning, before setting out for your works and duties, you should think, "This meditation is my true work," and train yourself to steer your mind for at least a brief period in some meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna). This is especially so with loving-kindness (mettā), which is highly beneficial when interacting with society. Alternatively, you could practice the recollection of the Buddha (buddhānussati) to increase your conviction, or meditation on foulness (asubha) to suppress defilements, or mindfulness of death (maraṇasati) which demonstrates the value of this spiritual life and trains one to act with diligence. One should start the day's activities after tranquilizing the mind for a short while in such a meditation subject. Similarly, at the end of the day, before going to bed—which is a time when the mind naturally calms down—if one generates a meditative state of mind before falling asleep, one will not suffer from troubles like dreaming evil dreams, as declared by the Buddha. One can attain great peace. In that way, for someone who begins and ends the day by placing the mind in meditation, gradually, even while maintaining the four postures of daily life, whenever the mind gets scattered, the meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna) will spontaneously come to mind. Such a person will gain the ability, during travels and daily chores, to develop the mind through that meditation subject even during those wasted moments commonly called "idle time." What we mean by developing ourselves through this Dhamma of the Buddha is not to adopt modern intellectualism, to learn and memorize what is in books, or to use them for some mundane benefit like passing exams. As the Buddha taught, we must make an effort through this meditative mind to eliminate the three root defilements—greed, hatred, and delusion—which subject beings to Suffering (Dukkha) in saṃsāra for a long duration.

Therefore, one must approach those who can provide such meditation subjects, receive those instructions with respect, and by steering one's mind within them, strive to attain in this very life that supreme happiness called "extreme happiness" (susukham) declared by the Buddha. The Buddha declares that all the happiness obtained even by deities is defeated by this nectar of Nibbāna, the happiness of Extinguishment. The happiness of Nibbāna is not a happiness obtained in some strange world or through some strange drink. It is the happiness of solace present in this mind—the solace and cooling that can be brought forth from within the mind itself. The Buddha declared that the entire world, existence (Becoming / Bhava), is burning. "Sabbam ādittam"—everything is burning. The worldly do not understand this burning. When we see moths falling into a lamp, it is clear to us that they are burning. But they do not understand it; those creatures do not realize it. Similarly, what the worldly constantly do is leap into these three fires: greed, hatred, and delusion. Due to the attractive nature of that fire, they do not realize it is a fire. Just as the entire world is burning with greed, hatred, and delusion, the Buddha declares that everything associated with our senses—the six sense bases—is burning. The eye is burning; forms are burning. The ear is burning; sounds are burning. In this manner, the Buddha has shown how every single sense organ, indeed the entire world, is burning with the fires of greed, hatred, and delusion. Thus, the place where those burnings are extinguished is what is called Nibbāna—the cooling. For that purpose, having settled the mind through a meditation such as loving-kindness, and by developing insight meditation (vipassanā-bhāvanā), one comprehends the three characteristics of existence declared by the Buddha—namely, Impermanent (Anicca), Suffering (Dukkha), and Not-self (Anattā). Consequently, through the penetration of the paths and fruits of stream-entry, once-returning, non-returning, and Arahantship, one can realize the supreme, deathless state of Nibbāna.

Therefore, Buddhas, Paccekabuddhas, and Great Arahants appear in the world precisely to introduce that happiness of appeasement—the happiness of cooling—to the world after realizing it themselves. That is the goal. That must be the goal of every Buddhist. With that goal in mind, making a firm determination today, declaring: "From this moment, I shall lead a meditative life," you, devout lay devotees, have listened to the Dhamma for about an hour—some of you having undertaken the noble eight precepts on this precious full-moon day, and others having established themselves in the precept of livelihood-as-the-eighth. Listening to the Dhamma means lending one's ear during this time with the conviction (saddhā) one has developed toward the Triple Gem. Driven by that conviction, you engage in this task by arousing energy (virīya) that follows conviction. Conviction, energy, and along with that energy, you cultivate a certain mindfulness—the quality of sati—in your mind. By maintaining that very mindfulness for a considerable time, one can experience a certain concentration (samādhi). It is to such a concentrated mind that deep understandings of the Dhamma come in the form of wisdom (paññā). Therefore, we should rejoice that today we have used this opportunity to cultivate those wholesome qualities described in the Dhamma as conviction, energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom (saddhā, virīya, sati, samādhi, paññā), which at a certain stage serve as spiritual faculties and spiritual powers to aid the realization of Nibbāna. Make a wish that the mental strength generated from this accumulated mass of merit may assist you in realizing Nibbāna through the penetration of the noble paths and fruits in this very life.

Furthermore, may the store of merit we have accumulated through both expounding and listening to the Dhamma be shared by all world beings—from the lowest Avīci hell to the highest Akanitṭha heaven—including the protective deities and Brahmas, as well as our deceased relatives who desire merit and long for Nibbāna. Having rejoiced in these merits, may they be liberated from this terrifying saṃsāric Suffering (Dukkha), and may they all attain solace in the supreme, deathless Nibbāna, free from all saṃsāric sufferings such as Birth (Jāti), aging, sickness, and death. Wishing thus, let us now share the merits by reciting these verses.

Verse 110 from the Sahassavagga (Chapter of Thousands) of the Dhammapada

Dear Listeners,

A complete transformation in a human being's life does not require a long time. Sometimes, even through a brief mental revolution occurring in a split second, a great transformation of life, a complete reshaping of one's lifestyle, can take place. In this way, for some, a mental revolution occurs upon witnessing some sort of miracle. Indeed, what is called a miracle is a wondrous event capable of causing a special mental revolution in the mind of an individual or a group. It is concerning a bhikkhu who, through such a wondrous event, turned a band of thieves into a virtuous group, that the Buddha preached this stanza which we have taken as our theme.

There was a bhikkhu named Koṇḍañña who came to the Buddha and was ordained. That bhikkhu, having obtained meditation subjects (kammaṭṭhāna) from the Buddha, went to a distant forest, meditated, and attained Arahātship. Having attained Arahātship, while traveling back to see the Buddha to inform Him of the truth he had realized, he stepped slightly off the path due to the fatigue of the journey, sat down on a flat rock near the path, and entered into jhana. That very same evening, a band of five hundred thieves who had plundered a village and were carrying their bundles of loot on their heads, came to that same flat rock to spend the night while traveling along that path. Those thieves saw this bhikkhu. However, in the darkness, this seated bhikkhu appeared like a post. They thought, "This is a post." Thinking so, one thief placed his bundle of goods on top of the bhikkhu's head. Another thief leaned his bundle against the bhikkhu's body. Then, all of these people lay down around the bhikkhu and fell asleep.

Waking up at the break of dawn and searching for their respective bundles, they saw this bhikkhu, got frightened, and thinking "It's a demon!" they all started running. Seeing this bhikkhu still holding the bundle on his head, they got frightened, cried "It's a demon!" and started running. The bhikkhu called out to them, saying, "Lay devotees (upāsakas), do not be afraid; I am an ordained monk." Thus, due to this incident, a great mental revolution occurred within this group. They begged for forgiveness, saying, "Venerable sir, please forgive us; we thought you were a post." Then, the leader of that band of thieves, due to the sense of urgency (saṃvega) that arose, decided to ordain. He requested of the bhikkhu, "Please ordain me." Thereupon, the others in that band of thieves also decided, in accordance with the decision made by their leader, "We too must ordain." All five hundred of them requested ordination from the bhikkhu. The bhikkhu also ordained them. Now, ordaining five hundred people is a grand task. Having ordained them in that manner and trained them, this bhikkhu traveled to see the Buddha. At the same time, a nickname was attached to this bhikkhu: "Khāṇu Koṇḍañña". He was originally known by the name Koṇḍañña, and khāṇu means a post, due to this incident of the post. Because news spread about the fact that he was mistaken for a post, the nickname "Khāṇu Koṇḍañña" was attached to that bhikkhu. In this Dispensation (Sāsana), this bhikkhu is known by the name Khāṇu Koṇḍañña. This is because the name "Khāṇu Koṇḍañña" is used to distinguish him from the more famous bhikkhu, Añña Koṇḍañña.

Then, after Venerable Khāṇu Koṇḍañña arrived, the Buddha asked, "Well, Koṇḍañña, how is it that you have also acquired a group of disciples?" Thereupon, that bhikkhu related the news. The Buddha inquired of that group, "Is this matter true, monks?" Then this group declared, "We have never seen such psychic power (iddhi) or wondrous miracle, or the majesty of psychic power in anyone else. Because of that, we felt like ordaining." It was at that moment that the Buddha uttered the stanza we mentioned earlier:

Yo ca vassasataṃ jīve, duppañño asamāhito;

Ekāhaṃ jīvitam seyyo, paññāvantassa jhāyino.

(Though one should live a hundred years, foolish and uncontrolled, yet better is a single day's life of one who is wise and meditative.)

The Buddha tells this group: "Your previous way of life—that foolish, sinful life devoid of wisdom—abandoning that and turning toward a good life of this nature, practicing jhana with wisdom, that is indeed what is valuable." This is the meaning expressed by this stanza. The Buddha declared that even if one lives a hundred years without wisdom and without concentration (samādhi), a single day of life spent practicing jhana with wisdom is far more valuable. It is mentioned that upon hearing this stanza and this discourse, all five hundred of them attained Arahatsip.

Now let us try to extract some points useful for our lives based on this stanza and this story. Here, through this stanza, the Buddha highlighted a comparison between spiritual values—that is, Dhammic values—and worldly values. Looking at worldly values, society considers it a great thing to live for a hundred years in whatever manner—even unrighteously—without thinking about wisdom, knowledge, jhana, or concentration (samādhi). They say of such a person, "He enjoyed a long life." However, rather than enjoying such a long life, the Buddha declares that a single day spent practicing wisdom and jhana in this Dispensation is far more valuable. Rather than living a hundred years without wisdom and concentration, if one lives for just a single day with wisdom, practicing jhana, that single day of life is far more valuable. The Buddha declared this because, generally, in the world, people often consider only the matter of their unrighteous livelihood, thinking that as long as one lives somehow or other, that is all that is necessary. But, faithful devotees, we must contemplate with wise attention (yoniso manasikāra). Generally speaking, when we talk about this human life, the great and valuable privilege that comes naturally to a human being, along with humanity itself, is this human mind. The greatest work that can be done with this human mind is to develop the wisdom that helps end the suffering (dukkha) of saṃsāra and realize Nibbāna, and to practice meditation and jhana which support that wisdom. This human existence is especially a human existence obtained during a time when a Buddha has arisen (Buddhotpāda kāla). A time when a Buddha has arisen means a period in which one gets to hear the Dhamma, has the opportunity to realize Nibbāna, and has the opportunity to end the suffering (dukkha) of saṃsāra. In a human existence obtained during such a period, one must use the human mind—which is the greatest privilege we have received—in a way that develops this wisdom, and in a way that develops concentration (samādhi), jhana, and so forth. However, most people in the ordinary world spend their lives without any awareness of these things.

Now, we also get a good example from this story through the course of action taken by this band of thieves. In this story, we can actually consider that there is not just one miracle, but two. One miracle is the miracle concerning that bhikkhu—the miracle shown by being endowed with wisdom and jhana, as the Buddha described. That is, sitting in concentration (samādhi) all night like a post is one kind of miracle. But the next miracle is the miracle shown by this leader of the thieves. Now, when there is a group, a group of five hundred people, there are great problems in deciding on a course of action to take, in making a wise decision. Yet, what was the courageous decision made by this leader of the thieves? If there had been something like a vote on separating himself from this wrong livelihood (micchā-ājīva)—this wrong way of living—which he had carried on for a long time, and ordaining in the Dispensation, it would have been a massive, tangled mess. But this individual also possessed a strong aspiration (chanda). Now, when we call this a psychic power (iddhi), four factors that support the performance of psychic miracles are mentioned in the Dhamma: chanda (aspiration), viriya (effort), citta (mind/determination), and vīmaṃsā (investigation). Chanda means the desire or the will. Viriya means the effort applied in accordance with that desire. Citta means the strength of determination applied to complete that effort, to make it successful. Next, vīmaṃsā means the examining wisdom, the investigative intellect, which helps to do and succeed in all of these. It is by depending on these four that one is able to show miracles—psychic miracles and so on. Thus, iddhipāda—iddhi meaning success—are the four factors that lead to success. Now, within this leader of the thieves, there was a firm determination. Accordingly, having fulfilled the required conditions, that leader of the thieves first stepped forward and said, "I must ordain." Following that, the other followers also decided to change their way of life. We can consider that to be a miracle as well.

Now this Dispensation is known as the Buddha's Dispensation, a Dispensation of Compassion. Due to the Buddha's great wisdom and great compassion, this Dispensation is known as a Dispensation of Compassion. Why? Because among those who ordained and became Arahats in this Dispensation, there are great murderers, notorious thieves, and women who led various kinds of bad lives. Many such people are found in the history of this Dispensation. It is said that they ordained under the Buddha in this Dispensation, attained the noble state of Arahatsip, and were worshiped and revered even by devas and Brahmas. Therefore, especially the story of Angulimala can create great courage in someone who is leading a wrong way of life to reshape their path of life. Angulimala is such a person. Just like this story of the notorious thieves here, his story is very well known among many. That Angulimala was a person who had killed thousands of people and was famous as a terrifying murderer. After ordaining in this Buddha's Dispensation and becoming an Arahāt as Venerable Angulimala, many people—sometimes even the bhikkhus—were talking about it as a highly wondrous thing. At that moment, the Buddha arrived there and preached a stanza. It is a stanza of the kind that creates great courage in anyone to correct their way of life. That stanza is:

Yassa pāpaṃ kataṃ kammaṃ

Kusalena pithīyati

So imaṃ lokam pabhāseti

Abbhā mutto va candimā

(He whose evil deed is covered by a wholesome deed, illuminates this world like the moon freed from a cloud.)

The Buddha declared this. Now, when looking at the moon on a full-moon day, the moon is very glorious, very beautiful. It is even more beautiful when the moon emerges from a dark cloud; it has a special splendor. In the same way, when those who have lived a wrong life, darkened in that manner, and spent a life of dark deeds, lean toward the bright side, it stands out to the world. It is very beautiful. Just as a bright white spot on a black velvet background stands out clearly, in the same way, when a person who has led a bad life turns toward the good side, it is a great example to the world. It becomes a good proof showing the power of this Dispensation—this Dispensation of Compassion—and the power of the Buddha's Dhamma. If a person who led a wrong life, like that leader of the thieves did, carries out a transformation of life with a firm determination, it is like a psychic miracle.

Thus, we can see from everyone, when we contemplate how various individuals ordained in this Dispensation according to the Buddha's Dhamma and attained noble states, we cannot dismiss anyone. In general society, we marginalize people, saying so-and-so has no education, or is an extremely poor, destitute person, or is a low-caste person, a low person; some people marginalize others in this way. But if we contemplate in the correct manner, saṃsāric intelligence cannot be measured by greatness or smallness, nor can it be measured by social differences of high and low, educated and uneducated, or rich and poor. Those whose saṃsāric intelligence has matured, whose wisdom is close to dawning, can sometimes be found among very young children—among seven-year-old children, not only among adults. Likewise, they can be among uneducated people, among many who are illiterate, and also among poor people of castes considered to be the lowest. In this way, they can be among the destitute, among the outcasts (caṇḍālas). When contemplating in this manner, fortune lies hidden within all of us. In the Dhamma, it is described as being like a lamp burning inside a clay pot. Wisdom—the light of wisdom—is not visible to the world. It must be brought out in the proper manner. It does not emerge on its own. For this, one must make an effort oneself. There may be some good wholesome actions (kusala kamma) lying underneath. One must make an effort oneself to bring them out. Now, no matter how majestic or skilled a lion is, if the lion is sleeping, prey will not enter its mouth on its own—some effort must be made. In the same way, it is only for the energetic person, the effortful person, that the miracle of merit, the fortune, that lies hidden within themselves can be brought to light.

What we should identify as fortune in this Dispensation, or what we should call spiritual fortune, is the bringing to light of this supramundane Dhamma wisdom, jhana, and so forth. Attaining those noble supramundane states—Sotāpanna (Stream-entry), Sakadāgāmi (Once-return), Anāgāmi (Non-return), and Arahāt—is what we should consider as fortune in this Dispensation. Now, in this society, we see people working hard to bring about financial fortune. We hear about so many opportunities to bring about this fortune through loudspeakers in society. We also constantly see people who tire themselves out to bring about this financial fortune. But only a very few are interested in bringing about spiritual (Dhammic) fortune. Now, we can say that a good day for those who want to bring about spiritual fortune is the Poya day. Therefore, we can call it 'Poya-day fortune'. It is only a very few who are interested in bringing about this 'Poya-day fortune'. It is not like other fortunes. However, if some person thinks about Poya-day fortune and, on that day, takes interest in observing precepts, listening to sermons, and shaping their life by contemplating in accordance with the Dhamma, then the light of wisdom that lies hidden within them, as mentioned before, can be brought to light. They can develop the mental strength to change their lifestyle. In that manner, we must be keen to shape our lives righteously.

From this story, we can obtain a great example to shape our lives and bring about a mental revolution. Even if one does not go deep into the Dhamma—the Dhamma preached by the Buddha—when contemplating its basic points, one can develop a great sense of urgency (saṃvega) regarding this condition of saṃsāra. Now, animal beings do not have the capacity to develop such wisdom or jhana. How miserable is the life that animal beings live? Next, those who have fallen into the states of yakkhas, pretas (ghosts), and so forth—the suffering of the hells—the Buddha has described these. None of us has been given this human existence as an absolute freehold. This is an extremely valuable opportunity obtained through some merit performed in the past. If we degrade this, if we do not make use of this, we do not know where we will go next. Unless one attains a state like Sotāpanna and escapes from the four lower realms, no matter how good, beautiful, luxurious, and showy a life one leads, if one is engaged in evil deeds, if one is inclined toward wrong livelihood (micchā-ājīva)—wrong ways of living as mentioned before—then due to the sins such people commit, they will ultimately go and be born in places like the worlds of yakkhas and pretas. Then, they will have to come to their relatives and trouble them. It is on that day that they will understand merit and demerit, wholesome and unwholesome. Some people adopt intellectualism and remain engaged in various arguments and debates. It is after they die and go to the next world that they will understand. It is by merit and demerit, wholesome and unwholesome, that the true wealth in the world is measured. It is the currency that does not change. Other coins and other notes may be valid here. But it is according to this law of nature (dhammatā) shown by the Buddha, in the form of merit and demerit, wholesome and unwholesome, that the high and low differences in one's saṃsāric life are measured. It is through this that one goes to high states or low states. Therefore, lay devotees who have understood this matter in advance must kindly look closely at their own lifestyles. Now, the ājīva-aṭṭhamaka-sīla (Eight Precepts with Livelihood as the Eighth) that we have observed here—here, wrong livelihood (micchā-ājīva) is shown as trading in weapons, breeding animals for meat, trading in meat, trading in intoxicants, and trading in poisons. If we look at these according to ordinary social conventions, they are things through which one can get rich very quickly. However, because one's mind becomes defiled due to these, the Buddha has declared that one should separate oneself from these livelihoods and shape a good way of life. Wise devotees must contemplate this.

Next, what is the specific wisdom spoken of in this stanza? This wisdom is described in the Dhamma as a gem. The Buddha declared, "Paññā narānaṃ ratanaṃ" (Wisdom is the gem of human beings). The gem that humans possess is this wisdom. Now, among gems, there is the diamond, the vajra-gem. It is an extremely powerful gem that can cut other gems. This wisdom is like that vajra-gem. Why? Because this wisdom is described as "nibbedhikā paññā"—penetrating wisdom. Wherever we look in the world, what appears to us are permanent things. It is this wisdom that helps us see the impermanent (anicca) nature of these supposedly permanent things. Everything appears as permanent, as a solid—due to the perception of compactness (ghana-saññā). Yet, these things are changing extremely rapidly. Because this change is not seen, people form a wrong understanding of them as permanent, and due to that very reason, they develop intense craving (taṇhā) toward them, turn to various crimes and evil deeds, and travel in this saṃsāra for a long time. Therefore, if one is to realize Nibbāna, the impermanent (anicca) nature of these things taken as permanent must be directly realized by oneself. This is not done through spells or charms, nor by inference, but is directly realized through this wisdom—the light of wisdom. This is a penetrating light. This is a certain understanding arising within the mind itself. That understanding does not occur on its own. It is for this that jhāna and meditation are helpful.

Now, what is done in that meditation as insight (vipassanā) which supports wisdom? In this world, one begins to look at the impermanence (anicca), the arising and passing away of everything. Now, in the method of establishing mindfulness known as the Four Establishments of Mindfulness (Satipaṭṭhāna), the arising and passing away of this body, then of feelings (vedanā), of the mind, and of thoughts (mental objects) that come to the mind are shown. These arise and then they pass away. For a person who constantly contemplates this arising and passing away, a person who constantly contemplates these with good mindfulness and clear comprehension, very deep understandings arise. They are not deluded by that externally visible permanent nature. Now, a person seeing a banana trunk might think that this is wood with a good, solid core. But a person who has a correct understanding of it knows that this is just a bunch of fibrous layers. In the same way, the perception of permanence (nicca-saññā) regarding everything or all things is shattered; it loosens.

If one constantly looks at the arising and passing away of everything—regarding this body, and also our postures, our coming and going, if one looks at the arising and passing away of all of these—it is mentioned in the Dhamma as "samudaya-dhammānupassī vā, vaya-dhammānupassī vā, samudayavaya-dhammānupassī vā" and so on. That means one dwells contemplating the nature of arising in this. Next, one dwells contemplating the nature of passing away in this. Next, one dwells contemplating both the nature of arising and passing away in this. It is by dwelling in this manner, by developing this meditation in this manner, that gradually the impermanent (anicca) nature of these things begins to be understood by oneself. Now, when sharpening a razor, one draws the razor upward, then downward, then rapidly upward and downward from both sides, and that is how one sharpens the razor well. In the same way, in developing this insight wisdom—at times one dwells looking at the nature of arising in this manner, next at the nature of passing away, and next at both the extremely rapid arising and passing away, sharpening and developing it so that one sees both of these combined in a subtle manner. It is by doing so that this becomes a penetrating wisdom. A person who has developed it in this manner does not wait until it passes away; even as they look, they see that whatever has arisen is of a nature to pass away. A prior understanding of the impermanent (anicca) nature of everything comes to them. This is what is called wisdom. It is only a person who sees in this manner who can let go of the five aggregates. At some point, by developing that wisdom and looking at the arising and passing away of the body, of feelings (vedanā), of the mind, and of thoughts that come to the mind, and gradually developing that wisdom, one realizes the Four Noble Truths—namely, suffering (dukkha), its origin (samudaya), its cessation (nirodha), and the path (magga). This entire existence is suffering (dukkha). The cause for it is craving (taṇhā). One understands that it is because of this underlying craving (taṇhā) that one takes this as permanent through the perception of permanence. Next, when this craving (taṇhā) is absent, the state where that thirst of craving is quenched, that extinguishment—that is indeed Nibbāna. And what supports this is the Noble Eightfold Path. One realizes it in this manner—that it is by following the Noble Eightfold Path, namely, right view (sammā-diṭṭhi), right intention (sammā-saṅkappa), right speech (sammā-vācā), right action (sammā-kammanta), right livelihood (sammā-ājīva), right effort (sammā-vāyāma), right mindfulness (sammā-sati), and right concentration (sammā-samādhi), that one is able to realize Nibbāna. Thus, the Buddha has described that wisdom as a light.

On one occasion, the Buddha declared four lights that exist in the world: the light of the moon, next the light of the sun, next the light of fire, and next the light of wisdom. The light of wisdom is considered supreme and foremost among all lights. Even in the things seen by moonlight, there are their shadows. The light of the sun—even in those, there are shadows. Those thought of as lamplight or electric light—it is through those that we think we see someone exactly—but actually, the true seeing occurs through wisdom, through a certain understanding that comes from within. What is seen through that is what can be taken as the truth. Sometimes, one cannot see properly even with those lights like the sun's light or the moon's light. So much for that wisdom.

The Buddha declared in the same way regarding jhana. jhana means one-pointedness of mind, making the mind concentrated. Generally, the mind mostly exists in a scattered state. There are five hindrances (nīvaraṇa) known as sensual desire (kāmacchanda), ill-will (vyāpāda), sloth and torpor (thīna-middha), restlessness and worry (uddhacca-kukkucca), and doubt (vicikicchā). The mind is disturbed either by sensual thoughts or by angry thoughts. The mind is inactive due to sensual thoughts, angry thoughts, or due to sleepiness and laziness. Or, due to restless states, worry, and so forth, or due to doubts and hesitation, the Buddha has declared the occasions when the concentrated state of the mind is suppressed.

To withdraw the mind from those hindrances, the Buddha even declared similes on one occasion. That disturbance of the mind by sensual thoughts—the simile the Buddha gave for that is dye. Suppose there is a vessel of water. If a yellow, red, or blue dye is mixed into this vessel of water, one's face is not seen properly; the true state is not seen. In the same way, if the mind is disturbed by sensual lust and so forth, such a person does not see their own welfare, does not see the welfare of others, nor does he see the welfare of both. Next, in the same way, anger—the disturbance of the mind by ill-will. The Buddha describes that as like boiling water in a vessel, water boiling over a fire; a person cannot see their face properly in it. In the same way, when boiling with anger, the true state of things is not understood. Next, if the mind becomes inactive and loses its functionality due to sleepiness and laziness, such states are shown as being like a water vessel covered with moss; in a water vessel covered with moss, one's face is not seen properly. Next, if restless states and worry—or regret over what one has done or not done—come to the mind, in those states too, the true state of things is not seen. The simile shown for that is a vessel of water where the water is rippled by the wind—by a blowing wind—or shaken—if a vessel of water is shaken—due to that rippling water, the face is not seen properly. Next, the hesitation called doubt. That too is something that destroys the mind's capacity to see the true state of things. When the mind is disturbed by doubts and hesitation, it is shown as being like looking at one's face in a vessel of water muddied with clay.

According to the similes shown by the Buddha in this manner, we can understand the things that obstruct concentration. It is when those are removed that jhana and concentration (samādhī) arise. Therefore, devotees who actually try to develop their mental power must be interested in developing this wisdom and jhāna in the manner declared by the Buddha. Poya day is the occasion to make a good start on these. That is why we called it "Poya-day fortune". One must try to bring about some reshaping of one's own life. If that is not done, sometimes one will have great regret at the final moment. Therefore, one must form a firm determination to walk on this path to Nibbāna. The practice that shapes the path of life which supports this is what the Buddha declared as the Noble Eightfold Path. That is actually not something that exists merely in books, but a practice that must be developed by oneself, within one's own heart.

Right view (sammā-diṭṭhi) means correct vision. Now, before going on any journey, one must develop some understanding of where one is going. Sometimes, what we call far-sightedness is the understanding regarding the place we are going—whether it is a place with thorns and bushes, or whether going on this road will bring welfare to oneself. It is in that manner that right view (sammā-diṭṭhi) has been introduced. One completely instills into one's mind an understanding of the Four Noble Truths to a certain extent, the entire plan of this Dispensation. Right view (sammā-diṭṭhi) introduces this entire saṃsāric existence as suffering (dukkha). This may not have been fully understood by oneself yet, but the target is here. When traveling on this path, one understands that this very five aggregates are of the nature of suffering—this is suffering (dukkha). Next, the cause for this is craving (taṇhā). The peace obtained when this craving (taṇhā) is stilled at some point is Nibbāna. Next, what supports this is also this Noble Eightfold Path. This starts with right view (sammā-diṭṭhi). Therefore, one must obtain a correct vision, a basic understanding of the Buddha's Dhamma message—regarding that plan. One must be able to experience that plan in daily life, through the incidents that happen to oneself. Suppose one's friend passed away, or some wealth was lost; on such occasions, one can think, 'Look, I have received a part of the suffering (dukkha) declared by the Buddha. So, it is regarding this that this suffering (dukkha) has arisen in me. The cause for this is the craving (taṇhā) within me. It is because of the craving (taṇhā) for this man, this woman, or these things, that this suffering (dukkha) arose in me.' Next, if I stilled this craving (taṇhā) in some way, even for this moment, by contemplating in accordance with the Dhamma—at that moment, a great peace comes to me. Now, one does not cry and lament over the death of one's neighbors, but when a friend, a relative, or a beloved person is lost, why does one grieve? We think we are crying for that person, but we are not crying for them. We are crying for ourselves who have lost that person. 'Here am I without so-and-so. I lived with so-and-so, and I am the person who is without them'—thus, one is crying about oneself. One does not understand this. Therefore, at some point, one must contemplate this with wise attention (yoniso manasikāra), realizing that 'what lies underneath this is craving (taṇhā)—not because of that person's goodness, but because of the attachment toward that person'—and still it. For that, one must practice the Four Noble Truths to a certain extent in daily life. It is by doing so and gradually developing through meditation that one is ultimately able to attain the realization of the paths and fruits (magga-phala). Thus, right view (sammā-ditṭhi) means correct vision.

If one has obtained such an understanding, next, the gradual transformation that occurs within that person is what is called right intention (sammā-saṅkappa)—correct thoughts and aspirations. It is according to the view, or the philosophy of life, that one has adopted that thoughts and aspirations are shaped. Now, to a person who steals, the thought of stealing comes wherever he looks. To a person who kills, the thought of killing. In that manner, it is according to the view one has adopted that those thoughts arise. So, the Buddha declares that right intention (sammā-saṅkappa) means correct thoughts and aspirations. Now, right view (sammā-ditṭhi) means correct vision. A person who has developed correct vision regarding the Four Noble Truths in that manner, next takes interest in right intention (sammā-saṅkappa), which is correct thoughts and aspirations. The Buddha shows these as the intention of renunciation (nekkhamma-saṅkappa), the intention of non-ill-will (avyāpāda-saṅkappa), and the intention of harmlessness (avihiṃsā-saṅkappa). The intention of renunciation (nekkhamma-saṅkappa) means leaving this household life, or departing from these fivefold sensual pleasures, and one must constantly bring up this thought—that this is the true peace. Even if one cannot free oneself from them, when these thoughts arise constantly in daily life, whether upon seeing the Sangha, or when reading books, or when listening to the Dhamma, thinking 'How good it would be if I could lead such a life,' along with that, the intention develops. The intention of non-ill-will (avyāpāda-saṅkappa) means thoughts of loving-kindness (mettā). One develops thoughts of loving-kindness which suppress anger. The intention of harmlessness (avihiṃsā-saṅkappa) means developing compassionate thoughts to avoid harming. In this way, good thoughts and aspirations develop.

Next, the words used in accordance with these thoughts and aspirations must also be shaped. Regarding those words, it is through lying, slander, harsh speech, and foolish babble—it is through these that one defiles speech. This gift of speech we have received is a rare gift. How many people are mute and unable to speak due to their kamma? Then, we must think of this also as a power received due to merit. Therefore, by lying, slandering, harsh speech, and talking about useless stories that are of no benefit to either world—if we degrade this power of speech through these, we lose this privilege we have received. That is why the Buddha declared instead that we should use good words, such as truthful speech, gentle speech, speech that unites others, and speech in accordance with the Dhamma.

A person who shapes speech in that manner also takes interest in acting in accordance with those words. That acting means determining to abstain from wrong actions, namely, killing living beings, stealing, and sexual misconduct. This is known as right action (sammā-kammanta). Next, another step from that is not merely to live in that manner occasionally, but to contemplate one's job, one's livelihood, and to live more righteously. One tries to avoid those things we mentioned earlier—trading in weapons, breeding animals for meat, trading in meat, trading in poisons, and trading in intoxicants—and to live by a righteous livelihood. That is what is called right livelihood (sammā-ājīva).

In the effort made for this, a certain meditative power that arises within the mind, called right effort (sammā-vāyāma), appears on its own. That right effort (sammā-vāyāma) means the constant effort made to remove unwholesome states and increase wholesome states, by carefully contemplating the wholesome and unwholesome states arising in one's mind. One has to make and apply a certain strong effort, energy, to prevent unarisen unwholesome states from entering the mind—that is what is meant by unarisen unwholesome states waiting to stream in. That is called the effort—the exertion—to prevent unarisen unwholesome states from arising. Next, to abandon arisen unwholesome states—if there are wrong unwholesome states within oneself, one must apply a similarly strong effort to remove them. Next, one must also apply a special effort to bring about unarisen wholesome states. One must make a great effort, contemplating and thinking, 'These good virtues are not yet within me, I must develop them.' Next, if there are good wholesome states within oneself, one must also make an effort to establish and increase them, without letting them be destroyed.

To show how valuable that effort is, the Buddha has used a series of terms for that effort: "chandaṃ janeti, vāyamati, viriyaṃ ārabhati, cittaṃ paggaṇhāti, padahati". "Chandaṃ janeti" means, as we said earlier—the word chanda here does not have the meaning it has in these times. It is a much deeper meaning. Chanda means the desire to bring about wholesome states, the will to do something, the desire. One generates that chanda. Next, having generated that chanda, "vāyamati"—one makes an endeavor for that. Next, one does not stop the endeavor after doing it for a little while. One turns it into energy (viriya) and carries on that effort more and more intensely. Next, when carrying on that energy, when various obstacles present themselves—without letting the mind hesitate in their face, "cittaṃ paggaṇhāti" means to bring out a strong willpower—one brings out a strength of determination. Next, the word "padahati" is used to mean that, ultimately, even with the sacrifice of one's life, one performs that task with a firm determination: "I must do this somehow."

If someone applies energy in this fourfold manner within the mind, having separated themselves from their wrong ways of living—let's say a person who drinks alcohol, a person who kills animals, a person who steals, a person who murders—this person, having separated himself at least on the Poya day as mentioned before, and thinking about "Poya-day fortune," contemplates this a little by himself. He thinks how to do this. He contemplates the benefits of doing this, and the dangers of those wrong ways. Contemplating not just about this life but in accordance with the Dhamma declared by the Buddha regarding the entire saṃsāra, and thinking about the benefits, he thinks: 'If I degrade the capacity to bring to light this wisdom and jhāna—the greatest privilege I have received from this human existence—will I also not fall to the level of an animal? Will I not fall to the state of a preta, to the state of a yakkha?' Contemplating thus, he directs his mind to bring about a complete transformation in his lifestyle. Through the effort made in that manner to remove unwholesome states and raise wholesome states, without even knowing it, he becomes a practitioner of yoga (yogāvacara), a meditator. That person is a most valuable individual.

What is the next result of the effort made in that manner? Due to that effort, right mindfulness (sammā-sati), which is good attention, is established within oneself. Now, what is called the "Four Establishments of Mindfulness" (Satipaṭṭhāna) is establishing mindfulness regarding this body—one's own body or others' bodies—regarding feelings (vedanā), regarding the mind, and regarding the things (mental objects) that come to the mind. It is the person who has established that mindfulness who next sees their arising, passing away, and so forth, and brings to light wisdom. Therefore, this right effort (sammā-vāyāma) leans toward these Four Establishments of Mindfulness.

Next, the person who develops that mindfulness is able to practice concentration (samādhi) on some wholesome object of meditation (kammaṭṭhāna) by retaining mindfulness for a long time, such as for five minutes, ten minutes, an hour, or two hours. Therefore, next, the devotee who wants to bring to light 'Poya-day fortune' must take interest in a meditation. For meditation, the Buddha has presented various meditation subjects (kammaṭṭhāna), meditation themes. The Buddha has highlighted meditation subjects that can be practiced in a simple manner in daily life, through which one can reap their benefits on a daily basis: the four meditation subjects declared by the Buddha for both laypersons and ordained monks—namely, recollection of the Buddha (Buddhānussati), loving-kindness (mettā), foulness (asubha), and recollection of death (maraṇassati). Now, recollection of the Buddha (Buddhānussati) means keeping the mind on the virtues of the Buddha. The virtues of the Buddha are like a great ocean—if one brings out even a single word from the text of the nine virtues and contemplates the Buddha constantly through the word 'Arahant', 'Arahant', 'Arahant', or 'Buddho', or 'Bhagavā', and constantly recalls the Buddha with faith (saddhā) associated with some word, at that moment, that scattered nature of the mind disappears. Actually, what is done through a meditation subject? Suppose we have scattered water, or water flowing here and there; if we build a dam, collect it, and make a reservoir, we can get work out of that water. In the same way, keeping this running mind on one wholesome object is what is called meditation. In that manner, one constantly brings out from the mind a single virtue of the Buddha, or a short phrase in loving-kindness meditation like 'May they be well—may all beings be well and happy.' No one else needs to be told. When the mind goes astray, running to sinful states, to unwholesome states, one brings it back here. Thus, for the person who is keen and tries to tame this mind with the rope of mindfulness, a great number of benefits are received in daily life. Through the benefits of loving-kindness meditation, suppressing that angry mind, one can obtain great peace. Next, the same applies to the meditation on foulness (asubha). One receives the power to free the mind from the defilements (kilesas) that oppress the mind. Next, the meditation on recollection of death (maraṇassati)—developing a sense of urgency (saṃvega) and wanting to end this suffering (dukkha) of saṃsāra quickly, without postponing these, one is motivated to walk on the path of Dhamma diligently. For the person who practices recollection of death, impermanence (anicca) is also understood in the same way.

In that manner, if some person takes interest in this meditation, then even if they do not have a miracle as great as that bhikkhu's in their daily life, they can experience for themselves the peace that can be obtained from within by practicing jhāna, by practicing meditation. We must contemplate the lessons we can take for our lives from such a story—the lessons we can take for our lives even from this one short stanza of the Buddha, a stanza of four lines—and take interest in these. Now, these devotees have observed the ājīva-aṭṭhamaka-sīla on this valuable Poya day, and also, through this valuable Dhamma story, a valuable Dhamma story from which one can take an example, listened to several Dhamma points. At this moment, one must contemplate the transformation that has occurred within one's own mind.

It is with faith (saddhā) in the Triple Gem that you came to such a sacred place. Likewise, you sat down to listen to this Dhamma. The mind was brightened by that faith (saddhā). A certain brightness of the mind occurred. Next, in accordance with that faith (saddhā), a certain effort (virīya) must be applied to sit comfortably during this sermon, to lend an ear to it; one must apply a certain effort for that too. Faith (saddhā), next effort (virīya), next, being mindful in accordance with that effort—mindfulness (sati). One listens to this with good mindfulness and wisdom. Next, when listening to it for a long time, some concentration (samādhi) is established—contemplating in accordance with the Dhamma as recollection of the Dhamma (Dhammānussati), understanding the value of the Dhamma—recollection of the Buddha (Buddhānussati)—when the Buddha is mentioned, as recollection of the Buddha, in various ways, one even gets an opportunity to develop some concentration. It is with that concentrated mind that next, the specific deep understandings called wisdom (paññā) arise. Those penetrating deep understandings mentioned before arise. Contemplating in this manner, it is by developing the faculties (indriya) of faith (saddhā), effort (virīya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā) that one is able to realize Nibbāna at some point. One must be happy, contemplating that this opportunity supported the development of those faculties, those faculties shown in the Dispensation.

This life is passing away extremely rapidly. Sometimes, seventy or eighty years, which we think of as a long time, pass away without us even knowing it. Through that, ultimately, when contemplating as death approaches, what did one do in this life? An emptiness is seen in it at the end. Sometimes, having spent unrighteous lives, in a sinful way, lives spent in drunkenness, one gets to see a series of painful scenes like a film on one's deathbed. Therefore, one must contemplate spending a life in accordance with the Dhamma before that. If one can contemplate calmly and be happy even for a single moment in daily life, such a person is the wise person, the fortunate person.

Therefore, contemplating with wise attention, now one must contemplate how we share this mass of merit—this mass of merit accumulated in one's mind at this moment through listening to the Dhamma. Actually, in this universe, there are those who rejoice in merit and try to escape from their miserable states through it. Likewise, there are also those in this universe who use that merit to make their future aspirations successful. Contemplating thus, now may the guardian deities of the Dispensation, including the deities who preside over this place, rejoice in this mass of merit accumulated by both of us through preaching the Dhamma and listening to the Dhamma! May they realize the noble and supreme Nibbāna through a Bodhi of their aspiration! Contemplating thus, one must share merit with the deities. Likewise, may one's deceased relatives, and whatever beings from Avīci hell up to the Akaniṭṭha heaven who desire merit, rejoice in this merit of preaching the Dhamma and listening to the Dhamma! Having rejoiced, may they be comforted by the noble and supreme Nibbāna through a Bodhi of their aspiration! Thus one must wish. Likewise, depending on this noble mass of merit accumulated so far through observing precepts, listening to the Dhamma, sharing merit, and so forth, may these devotees, in this very life, as quickly as possible, through the realization of the paths and fruits of Sotāpanna, Sakadāgāmi, Anāgāmi, and Arahant, gain the strength and power to escape from that terrifying suffering (dukkha) of saṃsāra and be comforted by the noble and supreme Nibbāna! Wishing thus, now recite the stanzas and transfer merit in this manner.

Verses 296-301 from the Bhikkhuvagga (Chapter on the Monk) of the Dhammapada

Dear Listeners,

On this Esala Full Moon Poya day, what is recalled to us is the correct view, the Right View (Sammā-diṭṭhi), regarding life, which the Buddha placed before gods and humans. On that day, in the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta, the very first step of the Noble Eightfold Path—the Middle Path placed before the world by the Buddha—was Right View (Sammā-diṭṭhi). Today, we have chosen as our theme a few verses that demonstrate and express the relief, happiness, solace, and protection that one can obtain in daily life through life-practices arising from that Right View and aligned with it.

These verses were preached by the Buddha during the time he was residing at the Veluvana Monastery in the city of Rājagaha. The background story that led to this is presented in the following manner:

In the city of Rājagaha, a child from a family of Right View and a child from a family of wrong view got together and regularly played a game of marbles. "Marbles game" (guḷa-krīḍā) refers to a certain ball game that existed in those days. While playing this game, every time the child of Right View threw the ball, he would say "Namo Buddhassa" (Homage to the Buddha). The child of the wrong-view family would throw the ball saying "Namo arahantānam" (Homage to the Arahants), which meant paying homage to the heretics. When playing like this, the wrong-view child won, and the other one lost. The other child (the wrong-view one) thought, "Now, my friend wins because he recollects the Buddha," and so he himself began to practice the recollection of the Buddha (Buddhānussati).

While this child was practicing the recollection of the Buddha (Buddhānussati), one day, the child's father took the child, yoked the cart, and went to the forest to gather firewood. Having loaded the wood onto the cart in the morning, around noon, near a cemetery outside the city, he unyoked the cart and had some food. Meanwhile, the two oxen joined other cattle heading towards the city and entered inside. After finishing his meal, when the cart-driver looked around, the oxen were gone. Therefore, he entered the city to search for them. By the time he found the two oxen and started to return, it was evening and the city gates had closed. Because of this, the man was unable to come back out. Thus, the little child fell asleep under the cart.

Since it was near the cemetery, there were many non-human beings (amanussa). There were two yakkhas—one yakkha of right view, meaning he was devoted to the Triple Gem, and the other yakkha of wrong view. The two of them saw this child. The wrong-view yakkha said, "Here is a good meal, let us eat." The other one tried to prevent him. However, he pulled the child by the leg. As soon as he pulled, the child cried, "Namo Buddhassa!" Immediately upon hearing this, the yakkha was frightened and froze. Then, the other yakkha said, "We have committed a great wrong. Therefore, we must undergo punishment for this." The two of them together guarded the child throughout the night and provided protection. Moreover, the wrong-view yakkha went to the royal palace and brought back food in a golden vessel. Arriving in the night, they disguised themselves as the child's parents, fed him, and kept watch. After the child ate, the yakkha used his psychic power to engrave some letters on the vessel, stating: "May only the King see this"—explaining how this vessel came to be here. Having done this, they placed the vessel in the cart and vanished.

Then, in the morning, the palace staff, finding the vessel missing, searched around. Having checked inside the city, they came outside, and upon spotting the cart, they searched it and saw the golden vessel. Seeing it, they arrested the child, thinking he was the thief. Subsequently, when he was brought before the King along with the vessel, the King saw the lettering and asked, "What is the story behind this?" The child replied, "I do not know. Throughout the night, my mother and father came, gave me food, and protected me. That is all I know." At that moment, the child's actual parents also arrived. The King, together with the child and his parents, went to the Buddha. They went and related this news. Then, the King asked the Buddha: "Is it only through this recollection of the Buddha (Buddhānussati) that one truly receives protection, or are there other things as well?" It was on that occasion that the Buddha preached these six verses, showing that if one directs one's mind in these six ways within one's life, and maintains such thoughts, that person requires no special protections, nor any mantras. This itself is a great protection; it was to demonstrate this point that those verses were uttered. Let us next consider the general meaning of those verses.

The meaning of this verse is that the disciples of Gotama who constantly, both day and night, develop the recollection of the Buddha (Buddhānussati) and recollect the qualities of the Buddha, always awaken in the morning fully refreshed and joyful. It is in the exact same manner that the subsequent verses speak: "Suppabuddham pabujjhanti..."* Those who develop the recollection of the Dhamma (Dhammānussati), who contemplate the Dhamma, likewise awaken in the morning fully refreshed and joyful. The next verse deals with the recollection of the Saṅgha (Saṅghānussati). Those who develop the recollection of the Saṅgha also awaken fully refreshed and joyful.

Next, it is said that those who develop mindfulness directed to the body (kāyagatā-sati)—mindfulness that follows the body—also awaken in the morning fully refreshed and joyful. The next verse states:

"Suppabuddham pabujjhanti, sadā gotamasāvakā; yesam divā ca ratto ca, ahimsāya rato mano."*

If any disciples of Gotama, throughout day and night, delight in non-violence (ahimsā) and maintain thoughts accustomed to harmlessness, they awaken fully refreshed and joyful.

Next, it is stated:

"Suppabuddham pabujjhanti, sadā gotamasāvakā; yesam divā ca ratto ca, bhāvanāya rato mano."*

If any disciples of Gotama live delighting in meditation (bhāvanā) both day and night, they awaken fully refreshed and joyful.

Here, there is a small point to be made. Now, in the commentaries, regarding the interpretation of those last-mentioned verses, the books state that "delighting in non-violence" (ahimsāya rato mano) refers to the meditation on compassion (karuṇā-bhāvanā), and "delighting in meditation" (bhāvanāya rato) refers to the meditation on loving-kindness (mettā-bhāvanā). In this way, they restrict the meaning. However, we think it is more reasonable to take "delighting in non-violence" (ahimsāya rato mano) as maintaining thoughts accustomed to harmlessness, such as loving-kindness and compassion, rather than as a specific, separate meditation on compassion. Next, we think that "delighting in meditation" (bhāvanāya rato mano) can be more meaningful if taken generally as having a mind inclined toward meditation. Why? Because the standard sequence mentioned is loving-kindness (mettā), compassion (karuṇā), appreciative joy (muditā), and equanimity (upekkhā). It is difficult to think that compassion would be mentioned first here, followed by loving-kindness. It is far more meaningful and broader in scope to understand "delighting in non-violence" (ahimsāya rato mano) as conducting one's thoughts in accordance with non-violence, and "delighting in meditation" as spending one's daily life with a mind inclined toward meditation.

In any case, through these six verses, the Buddha placed before the world the way to awaken refreshed and joyful, so as to spend the day in an excellent manner. What is demonstrated by this story is the protection obtained through the recollection of the Buddha (Buddhānussati) and its immensely powerful nature. Every single person in this merit-seeking gathering knows that the Triple Gem—namely, the Buddha-gem, the Dhamma-gem, and the Saṅgha-gem—indeed exists as a protective mantra for everyone. What is the reason for this? The quality of the Buddha-gem is suffused throughout the universe. Through the power of the Buddha's perfections (pāramīs), the Buddha-quality has been infused into the universe. Because of this, there is a natural law (dhammatā) whereby some protection is provided through contemplating the qualities of the Buddha. This is clearly visible to us from the Buddha's own words. In the Dhajagga Sutta—which is also known as the Dhajagga Paritta—the Buddha directly declares: "Monks, when you go into forests, to the roots of trees, or to empty dwellings to practice meditation, if any fear, terror, or hair-standing-on-end should arise, at that moment, contemplate the Tathāgata—that is, recollect me. Recall me with this passage: 'Itipi so bhagavā araham sammāsambuddho...' When you do so, whatever fear, terror, or hair-standing-on-end there was will disappear. If you do not contemplate me, if you do not recall me, then contemplate the Dhamma with the passage starting with 'Svākkhāto...' Even then, that fear will disappear. If not even that, then recall the Saṅgha with 'Supaṭipanno...'." In this way, the Buddha himself declares in the Dhajagga Sutta.

You have all heard of the Ratana Sutta, where, based on the power of the Triple Gem, the three great fears (including the fear of non-humans) in the city of Visālā were dispelled by chanting as a paritta—which means protection—declaring the qualities of the Buddha, the qualities of the Dhamma, and the qualities of the Saṅgha. From this, we can clearly see that recollection of the Buddha (Buddhānussati), recollection of the Dhamma (Dhammānussati), and recollection of the Saṅgha (Saṅghānussati) can be regarded not only as meditations but also as protective chants (paritta). As a paritta, it yields protection for oneself. This is exactly what is shown in this story as well. Though he was a child of a wrong-view family, having seen a child of Right View practicing recollection of the Buddha and gaining its benefits, he became accustomed to Buddhānussati. From then on, the benefit came naturally; almost spontaneously, when a disaster strikes, there is a tendency for the accustomed meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna) to be uttered. Even nowadays, perhaps because the Buddhist imprint is deeply embedded in our nation, when a mishap occurs, people cry out "Budu Amme" (O Buddha Mother!). Generally, they do not just say "Amme" (Mother), they say "Budu Amme". The Buddha is remembered. Similarly, here, as soon as the child recalled the Buddha saying "Namo Buddhassa", the yakkha became terrified of the Buddha-quality, the Buddha-majesty. Thus, we can see the power within the recollection of the Buddha—its power as a protection. Furthermore, here, the Buddha states by the term suppabuddham that it helps one to awaken refreshed and joyful. That is to say, if one lives through the day with a mind well-directed towards the Buddha-qualities, one receives immense solace.

From this series of verses, we must primarily focus our attention on the recollection of the Buddha (Buddhānussati), which almost everyone knows and practices. There is something special to be said about it. The other subjects we will also have to mention briefly according to the available time. If we consider the meditation on the recollection of the Buddha, everyone knows the nine qualities of the Buddha. It is on the basis of the text of these nine qualities that one develops the recollection of the Buddha. Either one recites the entire passage of the nine qualities, or there is also a method of expressing each quality in detail, with expositions. Such a method of developing Buddhānussati has existed for a long time. However, it seems to us that when one tries to analyze each word in that manner, the mind tends to get scattered. Now, the nine qualities of the Buddha in the kammaṭṭhāna portion for Buddhānussati are presented like this:

"Itipi so bhagavā araham sammāsambuddho vijjācaraṇasampanno sugato lokavidū anuttaro purisadammasārathi satthā devamanussānam buddho bhagavā."

Here, nine qualities are mentioned. There is a habit of taking each of these and explaining them in various scholarly ways. Some people even consider going through their etymologies, explaining them, and repeatedly reciting them as the actual meditation. However, one must consider that there must be a specific distinction, a difference, between reading a book written about the Buddha's qualities and meditating on those qualities. If it is a book written on the Buddha's qualities, then yes, by reading detailed and very beautiful passages, there is an opportunity to develop a wholesome mind. However, a deep concentration (samādhi) is not obtained; the mind becomes scattered therein. Instead, what is expected in the recollection of the Buddha is indeed to plunge into each term and, through it, accustom oneself to seeing the Buddha. Nowadays, scholars often analyze the word Araham academically and, dragging in a multitude of indirect, far-fetched meanings beyond its primary sense, hand them over to the meditator, telling them to list them numerically as meaning this and that. Through this, the mind actually becomes scattered, and it is difficult to think that the mind becomes unified. The mind does not become concentrated (samādhi-mat). The purpose of meditation must be the concentration of the mind, its one-pointedness. A vast crowd of words, passages, and praises is not very relevant to that one-pointedness.

Instead, what should be done is to consider the simple, general meaning of each term and draw as close to it with one's heart as possible. Just as the young Prince Rāhula approached the Buddha and said, "Ascetic, even your shadow is pleasant to me," one must accustom oneself to seeing the Buddha through each of these terms, plunging deep into that very word. In that regard, only a basic understanding of the meanings of those words is necessary. To put it briefly, as appropriate to the context, the primary meaning of the word Araham is "worthy of offerings." By virtue of the greatness of the Buddha's qualities, because of his state of being worshipful, he is worthy of offerings. If one wishes, it is sufficient to think of him as a noble being worthy of being honored with both material offerings (āmisa-pūjā) and the offering of practice (paṭipatti-pūjā). Beyond that, various other meanings and additional commentaries are not relevant here.

Next, it is the same with Sammāsambuddho. "Fully Self-Enlightened" means that he himself—it is called knowledge (ñāṇa)—by his own Buddha-knowledge, thoroughly unraveled the secret regarding saṃsāra and life, the Four Noble Truths. He himself fully understood those Noble Truths without the guidance or advice of any other teacher or person. It is that special characteristic that is contained within the word Sammāsambuddho.

Vijjācaraṇasampanno. Likewise, within the two words vijjā and caraṇa, there are two sides of the Buddha's vast store of qualities. Here, vijjā refers to the cognitive aspect consisting of insight-knowledges (vipassanā-ñāṇa), etc. The knowledge, the understanding in one's life, is one side. Next, conduct (caraṇa) is the other side. Here, the Buddha is complete in both of these aspects. There are some people in society who have great knowledge, but their conduct is worthless. Some conduct themselves well, but are weak in their capacity for understanding. Unlike them, the Buddha is complete in both. If vijjā is compared to the two eyes, and caraṇa—the caraṇa-dhamma—is compared to the two feet, he is complete in both of these limbs: both eyes and feet. He is complete in both of these foundational requirements for traversing this path of practice. Thus, through the quality Vijjācaraṇasampanno, one can understand that the Buddha is endowed with both of these dimensions.

Next, Sugato is also interpreted in various ways, such as "having an excellent gait" or "having good qualities," and so on. However, we should understand Sugato meaningfully: he went well along the path of practice, the path that must be traversed for the sake of Nibbāna. He brought that journey to an end; he reached the end of that journey. Precisely because he was endowed with those two aforementioned qualities of vijjā and caraṇa, the Buddha reached the end of that path of practice in the correct manner.

Furthermore, having reached there, his understanding of everything that ought to be known about the world is what is shown by the quality Lokavidū. This quality too can be interpreted in various ways, such as having understood everything that should be known about the world systems (loka-dhātu). However, it can be understood more clearly in this way: nowadays, many people understand the external world scientifically. But the Buddha did not merely understand the world in that manner; he understood the interior of each individual. He understood the individual's world. He also understood the external world that exists as the environment for the individual. Because the Buddha understood everything that needs to be known regarding this, he is called Lokavidū (Knower of the World).

Anuttaro purisadammasārathi. Then, relying on that very quality of Lokavidū, the Buddha, in taming individuals who are fit to be tamed, was like a charioteer—like an extremely skilled driver. The Buddha had the ability to discipline anyone using both his wisdom (paññā) and the skillful means called compassion (karuṇā). This is that power of disciplining. To whom, where, in what manner, and by what kind of discourse one can be disciplined, became clearly apparent to the Buddha's Buddha-knowledge. Therefore, utilizing that Lokavidū quality, the Buddha possessed the capability to tame various beings, which is why he is called Anuttaro purisadammasārathi (Incomparable Charioteer of tameable men).

So likewise, Satthā devamanussānam means he is the teacher not only of humans but of gods as well. Next, Buddho means, when considered generally, he is complete in all the aforementioned Buddha-qualities; just as he attained Buddhahood through his self-awakened knowledge (sayambhū-ñāṇa), he also possesses the power to make others understand. In the term Bhagavā, there is the meaning of "Blessed One," "Fortunate One." Within it lies the quality of fortune, the blessing, the majesty of fortune, which is seen in the Buddhahood attained through the Buddha's power of perfections (pāramīs), and in his store of qualities and wisdom.

When the nine qualities of the Buddha are briefly considered in that way, what is next to be done is to recite those nine qualities in sequence for a considerable time: "Itipi so bhagavā araham sammāsambuddho vijjācaraṇasampanno..." and so on. While reciting in this manner, one can choose for oneself the word that appeals most to one's heart, the one that one prefers. In making that choice, if one selects a particular word, one does not need to struggle to explain the reasons for it. Actually speaking, if one directs one's mind to those nine qualities for a reasonable time and, discarding those that do not appeal as much to the heart, reduces the nine to eight, eight to seven, seven to six, and so on, and selects a certain quality because it appeals to one's heart, one does not need to labor to explain why it appeals. It is just like when, in a very natural way, someone develops an affection due to a connection in past lives (saṃsāric connection); sometimes one thinks, "Oh, I do not know why, but this is the person who appeals to my heart, this is how it is for me." Even saying that is enough. If one can say, "I do not know why, but out of these nine qualities, this is the one that appeals to my heart," that is indeed the most natural selection. Through that, some aspect of the Buddha-qualities deposited in one's mind during past associations with Buddhas, seeing Buddhas, and hearing the Dhamma, is activated. That selection is based on that. That is why we say it is natural. It is when one chooses in this manner that it becomes like Prince Rāhula approaching the Buddha and saying, "Ascetic, even your shadow is pleasant to me." If one can see the Buddha through this single word—saying "This word is enough for me"—there is no need to weave further concepts around it. One does not need to keep describing it, reciting various beautiful words and beautiful passages. Doing so only scatters the mind.

Just like dropping an anchor to keep a boat in a reservoir from drifting here and there or rocking from side to side, this mind must plunge into that quality. Having plunged in, one must accustom oneself to seeing the Blessed One through that quality. Once accustomed in this way, many words are not needed. If one has chosen Bhagavā, then while saying "Bhagavā, Bhagavā," or if it is Araham, while saying "Araham, Araham, Araham," one can arrive at concentration (samādhi) through it. One does not need to think about it in detail. Through that word, one sees the Buddha. Now, that child said "Namo Buddhassa". That was an era when the Buddha was alive. Now, even though the Buddha is no longer living, these devout Buddhists can see his vast store of qualities with their mind. For the faithful one, the one possessing Right View (Sammā-diṭṭhi), the Buddha can be seen with the mind. Therefore, even a single word that helps in seeing him with the mind is sufficient.

Meditating on that word continuously, without letting the mind wander elsewhere, is indeed the meditation on the recollection of the Buddha (Buddhānussati-bhāvanā).

We spoke specifically about the recollection of the Buddha (Buddhānussati) because so many people practice and train in it. If there are any shortcomings in one's practice, and if one feels that what we have said is correct, one can adjust one's practice accordingly.

Now, we will mention the other meditations very briefly, according to the available time. As for the recollection of the Dhamma (Dhammānussati), you have also heard of it many times, although it is not as popular:

"Svākkhāto bhagavatā dhammo sandiṭṭhiko akāliko ehipassiko opanayiko paccattaṃ veditabbo viññūhīti."*

Six qualities are mentioned here. The quality of Svākkhāto means that this Dhamma preached by the Buddha was well-preached, excellently preached. Here, "excellently preached" does not refer to the tone of the Buddha's voice, nor to the linguistic style of the preached words. If the Buddha preached targeting a certain goal, a certain supreme purpose, it was preached with a beautiful beginning, middle, and end so as to lead to that purpose. This is not something meaningless or without sense. This Dhamma yields results. Svākkhāto means it is well-preached: the practice leads appropriately to the result, and the practice is perfectly suited to the result. That it is preached well in its beginning, middle, and end is what is to be understood by the word Svākkhāto.

Next, Sandiṭṭhiko means that its results can be seen by oneself right here in this world, in this very life. Why? Because within this Dhamma of the Buddha is the path to eliminate the defilements of greed, hatred, and delusion (lobha, dosa, moha) existing in our mental continuum. Thus, if some portion of these is removed, to that extent, one can experience it for oneself right in this life. It is not something to be received only in a future world. The paths, fruits, and Nibbāna can be attained in this very life; it is not a Nibbāna to be attained only in the next life. For that reason, it is the quality of Sandiṭṭhiko (visible here and now).

Akāliko means yielding immediate results, without delay. This is also connected to the previous quality. If someone has a certain degree of greed, hatred, or delusion, that person suffers from a corresponding degree of heavy grief or mental defilement. If these are removed to some extent with the help of the Dhamma, the very moment they are removed, there is solace. That is Akāliko. Deeply, this is shown in the realization of the supramundane Dhamma regarding the supramundane path. There, path (magga) and fruit (phala) are spoken of as two things, yet one falls into the fruit immediately along with the supramundane path. The supramundane path refers to an extremely subtle state of concentration (samādhi) attained by proceeding through insight-knowledge (vipassanā-ñāṇa). Simultaneously with it, one falls into the fruit. That is the quality of Akāliko—the nature of yielding results without delay.

Ehipassiko means "come and see." Within "come and see" lies the idea that this Dhamma is something inviting one to put it into action. It demonstrates its practical nature. The Dhamma itself says, "Come and see; put me into practice and see." To such an extent, there is an amazing practicality in the Dhamma. It is according to this that it is called Ehipassiko.

Opanayiko is a somewhat deep word. There too, it should be understood as leading onward, as drawing someone in. There is such a quality in the Dhamma: a nature of leading one from one stage to another, where one thing is connected to the next. For example, when developing Right View (Sammā-diṭṭhi), almost without one's realizing it, right thought, wholesome thought arises. When that is developed, in accordance with it, wholesome speech is uttered. In that way, if one lives in a certain manner, if one lives in accordance with the Dhamma, there is a nature of automatically leading one to those respective states. That is what is meant by Opanayiko (leading onward). One is drawn forward, led onward, by the Dhamma. Such a quality exists in this Dhamma.

Paccattam veditabbo viññūhīti means this is a Dhamma of such a nature that it can be personally realized by the wise within their own mental continuums, within their own minds. Ultimately, it is realized by oneself. It is such a store of qualities—six qualities—that are presented as the qualities of the Dhamma.

Next, as for the qualities of the Saṅgha, you have also heard them frequently:

"Supaṭipanno bhagavato sāvakasaṅgho, ujupaṭipanno bhagavato sāvakasaṅgho, ñāyapaṭipanno bhagavato sāvakasaṅgho, sāmīcipaṭipanno bhagavato sāvakasaṅgho, yadidaṃ cattāri purisayugāni aṭṭha purisapuggalā, esa bhagavato sāvakasaṅgho, āhuneyyo pāhuneyyo dakkhiṇeyyo añjalikaraṇīyo anuttaram puññakkhettaṃ lokassāti."*

Such is the passage.

Within this too, there are nine qualities. Thus, primarily, Supaṭipanno means that the Saṅgha-gem of the eight noble individuals has entered correctly and well upon the path of practice leading to Nibbāna, and is engaged in that practice. Next, to emphasize this even more strongly, they are called Ujupaṭipanno. The Noble Eightfold Path is a straight path. It means they have plunged straight, directly, and honestly into that path and are acting accordingly. Next, Ñāyapaṭipanno means they have systematically entered upon that path of practice, logically from one stage to another. Likewise, Sāmīcipaṭipanno means they are walking correctly, slanting towards Nibbāna. All of these refer to their practice.

Next, yadidaṃ cattāri purisayugāni aṭṭha purisapuggalā esa bhagavato sāvakasaṅgho refers to the eight individuals—the eight noble ones (ariyas) who have reached the four paths and four fruits (magga-phala).

By virtue of that very store of qualities, the worshipful nature of those Saṅgha members is spoken of next. Āhuneyyo means being worthy of having the four requisites brought from afar to be offered. Pāhuneyyo means that if one has prepared food in one's home for relatives or guests, when they arrive on their alms-round, that food is fit to be offered to them because of their vast store of qualities. Likewise, Dakkhiṇeyyo means they are worthy of receiving even special offerings made out of belief in the fruits of kamma. Añjalikaraṇīyo means they are worthy of being worshiped with palms together, raised to the forehead.

Next, Anuttaram puññakkhettaṃ lokassa means they are like an incomparable field of merit for the world; by virtue of that store of qualities, they are a field of merit capable of yielding the highest benefits to the merit-seeking donors.

In that manner, a multitude of matters are spoken of there as the qualities of the Saṅgha. Thus, through this, the Buddha shows that even contemplating the Saṅgha through any of these words as the recollection of the Saṅgha (Saṅghānussati) serves as a protection for one's life and, as stated in those verses, becomes a cause for awakening refreshed and joyful. In short, the person who contemplates the Triple Gem is able to spend his daily life in a refreshed and joyful manner.

The next one mentioned there is mindfulness directed to the body (kāyagatā-sati). Kāyagatā-sati means recollecting the true nature of this body of ours. This too is presented in three ways. You have mostly heard about kāyagatā-sati. The Buddha compares this bodily cage to a bag open at both ends, filled with grains. Inside this, there are thirty-two impure body parts (kuṇapa-kotṭhāsa). What is spoken of here is contemplating those impure parts. In short, it is seeing the various parts of this body, from the hair of the head down to the soles of the feet, as impure and repulsive. It is called manasikāra—contemplating them under the aspect of repulsiveness (paṭikūla-manasikāra).

Next, closely related to this, something included within kāyagatā-sati itself, is the meditation on repulsiveness (asubha-bhāvanā). Ten types of repulsiveness (dasa-asubha) are mentioned. As soon as one dies, according to the ancient custom in India, the body was taken and cast into a cemetery. After being cast into the cemetery, ten different stages of the decay of that bodily cage are presented as subjects of meditation on repulsiveness (asubha-kammaṭṭhāna). The state of this body before many days pass—bloated, discolored, then infested with worms, filled with pus, and finally reduced to a skeleton—is shown in ten stages as the "tenfold repulsiveness." Contemplating these is what is meant. What is expected from all of these is the development of disenchantment (nibbidā) towards this body.

The attachment towards this body which exists powerfully within the saṃsāric being—this lust (rāga), this attachment towards one's own body as well as the bodies of others—is precisely what causes one to go on and on in saṃsāra. As long as there is attachment to this bodily cage, even if this bird departs from here, it willingly enters another cage once again. It departs from here having already conjured up a cage in accordance with its kamma. It is not exactly as one wishes; rather, a cage is conjured up in accordance with the kamma one has performed. Once it is created, what follows next is birth (jāti) along with decay (jarā), disease (vyādhī), and the fear of death (maraṇa-bhaya). Such is the saṃsāric condition.

Therefore, the Buddha shows that without developing disenchantment (nibbidā) towards this bodily cage, one cannot escape from this saṃsāra. One cannot realize Nibbāna while maintaining attachment to it. Thus, whether we like it or not, whether lay or ordained, anyone who hopes to realize Nibbāna must, to some extent, develop mindfulness directed to the body (kāyagatā-sati). Kāyagatā-sati is not something strange. We do not like to exhibit the real, true condition of our body externally. However, we must contemplate it in our mind. The Buddha has shown not only the things inside the body but also everything external as repulsive. Indeed, there is a repulsive nature. Yet, we cover them up. The world has no understanding of them due to defilements. The repulsive nature of this body endowed with consciousness (viññāṇa) is what is found in the aforementioned meditation on repulsiveness. It is contemplating what is inside this living body, like in a bag open at both ends. Next, similarly, there is the state that comes after it dies; that is the future. Contemplating that "this body too is subject to that same natural law, this body is of such a nature," attributing it and comparing it to oneself—through that too, one becomes disenchanted with the body. The understanding arises that "if this is something that rots, then maintaining pride (māna) regarding it as something superior, as we tend to think, is sheer foolishness." Such is the meditation on repulsiveness (asubha-bhāvanā).

In the exact same manner, another subject that comes up is what is called the "meditation on the elements" (dhātu-kammaṭṭhāna). This also helps in developing equanimity (upekkhā) regarding this body, establishing a certain equanimity free from attraction and aversion. That is, thinking of this body as something composed of four elements. There is no difference between our bodies and those of others when considered as elements. These bodily cages of ours, every single one of them, are things made of what we generally take as examples: the great earth, water, fire, and wind—namely, paṭhavī, āpo, tejo, vāyo. Contemplating in this way in terms of elements, the Buddha shows, helps particularly the wise to quickly develop equanimity towards the body. In short, for the realization of Nibbāna, through this meditation on the elements, a disenchantment with all four elements must arise in the mind at some point. The mind must be liberated from these four elements.

Why? Because that aforementioned cage is created out of these four elements. It is from these four elements—earth, water, fire, and wind (paṭhavī, āpo, tejo, vāyo)—that this bodily cage is created, just like kneading clay to build a house. It is created because of the attachment one has towards them. Within us, there is a subtle form of attachment toward these four elements. It was in order to eliminate this that the Buddha taught the elements. There are two ways of doing this.

One considers this living body itself. Hard things like hair, body hair, nails, teeth, etc., represent the earth element (paṭhavī-dhātu). Proof of the earth element exists in my body: in the form of hair, body hair, nails, teeth, and so on. The water element (āpo-dhātu) comprises things of a liquid, watery nature, such as phlegm, mucus, blood, pus, urine, and so forth; these too exist in my body as parts belonging to that element. Similarly, the fire element (tejo-dhātu) is in this body. Through the occurrence of fevers, the digestion of food in the body, the body's warmth, heat, and so on, the fire element is also within. Likewise, what is called the wind element (vāyo-dhātu)—this breathing-in and breathing-out of ours, the air that moves here and there within the body—all of these belong to the wind element. These are the four elements.

Next, one contemplates: "These four elements inside and the four elements outside are one and the same." Whether they are inside or outside, when viewed as elements, they are identical. Then, gradually, this also helps in eradicating the conceit (māna) of "I" and "mine." Empty pride and the like disappear when one contemplates: "Is it not these very same four elements that exist in everyone's body?" In this manner, the Buddha presents this mindfulness directed to the body (kāyagatā-sati). When this is contemplated, it brings great solace in daily life. The agitations arising from life's problems can be largely eliminated. What is done through this kāyagatā-sati is seeing the reality of life. If one sees the reality of life, one is not tempted to commit suicide. One understands the brevity of one's life according to the nature of this body. Such are the benefits of kāyagatā-sati.

Likewise, ahimsāya rato mano refers to non-violence (ahimsā). The commentary interprets this by restricting it solely to the meditation on compassion (karuṇā-bhāvanā). However, we can understand that non-violence is spoken of here directly as an attitude: delighting in non-violence, being inclined to non-violence, loving non-violence. The Buddha shows that delighting in non-violence is something extremely valuable. Mostly, what exists in the world is delighting in violence. The world always seeks to satisfy its own needs by harming others. If someone builds an inner attitude of not harming any being, therein lies both loving-kindness and compassion—not compassion alone. Looking at things with an attitude of loving-kindness and compassion is what is meant here by "delighting in non-violence." If one practices that in daily life, one can awaken refreshed and joyful. A strength comes to awaken refreshed and joyful, without regrets, if thoughts of non-violence, loving-kindness, and compassion are maintained in daily life.

Next, bhāvanāya rato is mentioned, which we took generally as an inclination toward meditation. An inclination toward meditation is also a valuable thing. What is called meditation (bhāvanā)? It is the true development of the mind. In this day and age, various kinds of development of the mind are spoken of—certain developments through science, technology, etc. Development through education is spoken of. However, the development achieved through meditation as shown by the Buddha is something far more special. It is the path leading to Nibbāna. If there is any meditation that must be done to cross over this saṃsāra, it is being inclined to that very meditation. There, generally, meditation (bhāvanā) means the development of the mind—developing the mind as an inclination. Understanding its value and spending the day giving priority to it is a valuable thing.

So, from that, we can see that the Buddha has highlighted six life-values through these six verses: recollection of the Buddha (Buddhānussati), recollection of the Dhamma (Dhammānussati), recollection of the Saṅgha (Saṅghānussati), mindfulness directed to the body (kāyagatā-sati), non-violence (ahiṃsā), and lastly, a general inclination towards meditation, a love for meditation. That is to shape our lives. In short, we know that in this day and age, particularly, the majority of people in this society fall asleep in distress, awaken in distress, and live their lives in distress. That distressing condition arises because daily thoughts are maintained in an incorrect manner. Now, there is no need to tell you, who direct your minds through various media, how daily life is spent, how day and night are spent. Especially, how the night is spent. There is no need to tell you with what kind of things, with what kind of thoughts and wishes, it is spent. You can obtain proof for yourselves as to whether one can truly awaken refreshed and joyful through those, and whether one can spend the day mindfully (satimant) and happily. However, if one chooses one of these six channels based on the six values and six themes shown by the Buddha, and conducts one's thoughts and wishes accordingly, then just as the Buddha promises here, one can awaken in the morning suppabuddham—highly refreshed and joyful—spend the day joyfully, and spend the day peacefully. Along with that, a development of the mind occurs at the same time.

Therefore, from this, we can understand this multitude of values shown here by the Buddha. We must bring these close to our lives. More and more, we go towards the mouth of ruin because we have no correct understanding of the true core virtues and values of life. Why? Because the Buddha shows that this human mind we have received is extremely rare. In this mind, there is a capability, a strength, that can be developed towards Buddhahood. But what do we do? In an extremely dangerous manner, enticed and dragged away by the values presented through various modern pomps and modern science, we destroy our lives through them. We spend the day through media that defiles our thoughts and wishes. Instead, the Buddha indicates that, without any extra expense, without any cost at all, to shape one's own life, to awaken refreshed and joyful in the aforementioned manner, and thereby to spend the entire day peacefully, one should make an effort to generate those very series of thoughts within one's own mental continuum.

Now, usually, a person thinks of meditation as something done only when sitting cross-legged. However, here, the Buddha specifically highlights Anussati—which means recollection. Now, from that story too, it is seen that the child did not know anything about the quality of Arahaṃ, etc., in depth, as stated in books. But he might have seen the Buddha. In any case, having generated a feeling and faith toward the Buddha, the moment he said "Namo Buddhassa", the yakkha became terrified. We must think in that manner. We must draw close to this Buddha-quality just as Prince Rāhula drew close. Not through scholarly academic learning, with a multitude of long words and passages—even a single one is sufficient. What is the reason for this? We cannot develop it regularly in our daily lives as if we are reading a book. Now, it is said here: "yesaṃ divā ca ratto ca, niccaṃ buddhagatā sati." That disciple of Gotama develops the recollection of the Buddha constantly, both day and night. So, to develop recollection of the Buddha constantly, how can one develop it with such a vast collection of passages, alongside the duties of daily life? But if someone considers these briefly—let us say, as mentioned, the quality of Araham is highly pleasing to someone, or the quality of Bhagavā is highly pleasing to someone, having chosen it well by directing the mind for a considerable time, orienting the mind to the nine qualities.

Why do we call that a natural law (dhammatā)? Now, if we take an example: Anuttaro purisadammasārathi means "like an extremely skilled charioteer in taming beings." That word might appear very long. Yet, it can appeal to some people. Why? There could be a saṃsāric reason for it. In the past, during the time of the Buddha, when the Buddha was performing the taming of Aṅgulimāla, demonstrating his Buddha-power, it might be due to the faith one generated upon seeing that. In that manner, if some quality naturally appeals to our heart, recollecting that quality briefly is indeed what is called the recollection of the Buddha (Buddhānussati). That can indeed be done in that manner, not only during the leisure moments of daily travel, but even during the wasted times of wandering around; by inclining the mind to that Buddha-quality, there is an opportunity to develop the meditation subject (kammatṭhāna) one has been bringing along.

It is the same regarding the recollection of the Dhamma (Dhammānussati). Consider the nature of this Dhamma briefly. If we do not describe it in detail, understanding this general meaning is sufficient for someone. What is called sati here is mindfulness. It is recollecting the Buddha, recollecting the Dhamma, recollecting the Saṅgha.

It is exactly the same with mindfulness directed to the body (kāyagatā-sati). This too is not something done specifically by sitting on a meditation seat. Let us say we spat or vomited. Daily bodily functions and related activities take place. On those occasions, one should not let them simply go to waste. One should not simply throw them away, calling them "waste products." One must see a Dhamma in them. One must see a Dhamma in them. Some people throw these away, calling them waste products, without deriving any benefit from them. Now, we can see in this modern scientific world that much work is done with waste products. Things we discard are sometimes taken abroad, manufactured into special products, brought back, and sold at high prices.

Then, one must think in the exact same way. We must derive benefit even from the waste products discarded from this body of ours, in accordance with the Dhamma. How do we derive benefit? We apply them to mindfulness directed to the body (kāyagatā-sati). Spit too is applied to kāyagatā-sati; feces and urine too are applied to kāyagatā-sati. Even at that moment, our mind is developed; it is developed through that meditation. Through that, one draws closer to Nibbāna. The attachment to saṃsāra decreases. The attachment to creating more and more bodily cages in this saṃsāra disappears. Thus, it is precisely for this reason that the Buddha has declared: "This is a Dhamma of dispassion (virāga-dhamma)." Within this Dhamma of the Four Noble Truths lies the departure from this saṃsāra. This is a journey for that purpose. Therefore, one cannot go on this journey along with attachment to it. Gradually, one must develop disenchantment (nibbidā) towards it. "Knowledge and vision of things as they really are" (yathābhūta-ñāḍassana) means seeing the truth as it is. The Buddha has shown that disenchantment comes precisely along with seeing the truth as it is. Having seen the truth as it is, one cannot help but become disenchanted. If one sees the truth as it is to some extent, to that extent one becomes disenchanted with saṃsāra, disenchanted with existence (bhava). It is through that disenchantment that one is able to realize Nibbāna, that the door to Nibbāna opens.

Therefore, one should not be afraid of these. Whether lay or ordained, our ultimate goal is to escape from this terrifying saṃsāra as quickly as possible. Therefore, whatever may be the case with those household affairs, we must contemplate: "We are born alone, and we die alone." In this saṃsāra, we walk alone. Family relations are temporary. Therefore, our liberation belongs to us. The Buddha declares: "Not even I can liberate another; that is up to you alone." The Tathāgatas are merely teachers. Thus, this is indeed ours—this mind of ours. In this era of a Buddha's appearance (buddhōtpāda), in this extremely rare opportunity of a human existence, that human mind must be applied to something highly productive. Generally, there can be many things in the world, such as profitable occupations, and so on. But those are not it. The maximum benefit to be derived from a human existence is precisely what the Buddha has shown here: he has presented them as six core virtues to be developed. Therefore, you must contemplate wisely. Many of you have a daily routine in your lifestyle. You must make an effort to add these to that daily routine. If not all six, at least a few of them. If you direct your thoughts and wishes through these channels, you will be able to awaken refreshed and joyful. You can escape from those aforementioned distressing conditions. You can draw closer to Nibbāna even faster than you thought, once these genuine inclinations are established. The Buddha has shown that there is a leading-onward nature in this Dhamma. When one engages with the Dhamma, the Dhamma itself leads one further and further forward. Why? Because the Dhamma yields benefits quickly. When one sees the benefits of the Dhamma, one is drawn further and further toward that path.

So, what we must do is recognize the true core virtues and enter upon that true path. Through that, just as the Buddha promises, we can avert the terrifying ruins in our lives and obtain a certain solace. These cannot be done with money. The secret lies right within us. Contemplating this, on a valuable day like today—this Esala Full Moon Poya day, which is an occasion when the Buddha-quality, Dhamma-quality, and Saṅgha-quality were broadcast to the entire universe, having a Dhamma-power extending from Avīci to Akaniṭṭha. Therefore, while a Buddha-power, Dhamma-power, and Saṅgha-power exist spread throughout the universe, if we spend this life dedicating our lives to trivial things, to worthless things, we alone will have to regret it.

Therefore, contemplating wisely, this merit-seeking gathering has, on this valuable day, observed a certain precept according to their respective levels, drawn close to the aforementioned path of practice, and disciplined body and speech. You have spent this time calming the mind with some such meditation. We believe that at this moment, through hearing the Dhamma (dhamma-savana), the factors necessary for developing the Dhamma-powers—the spiritual powers of faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom (saddhā, viriya, sati, samādhi, paññā)—within your mental continuum must have been established in your mind. Likewise, through this determination you have made, may you illuminate your lives further and, through the association with noble friends (kalyāṇa-mitta), may this accumulated store of merit surely become a supportive condition for realizing the supreme, deathless, great Nibbāna as quickly as possible, through the penetration of the paths and fruits of Stream-entry, Once-returning, Non-returning, and Arahantship (Sotāpanna, Sakadāgāmi, Anāgāmi, Arahatta) as declared by the Buddha!

Likewise, may all beings, whoever they may be, from Avīci to Akaniṭṭha, including the guardian deities and Brahmās of the Sāsana, and our departed relatives, rejoice in this accumulated store of merit acquired through the preaching of the Dhamma and the hearing of the Dhamma! Having rejoiced, may they all attain peace through the supreme, deathless, great Nibbāna as quickly as possible, through whichever Bodhi they have aspired to! Please share the merits with these verses.

Verses 11-12 from the Yamakavagga (Chapter of Pairs) of the Dhammapada

Dear Listeners,

A person can achieve real progress and development only if they possess enough inner strength to abandon what is essence-less and accept what is essential. The life of a person who has the attitude of seeing the essence-less as essential and the essential as essence-less is completely unsuccessful. It is because our ancient Sri Lankan ancestors possessed the noble principle of abandoning the essence-less the moment they saw the essential that the Dispensation of the Buddha (Sambuḍu Sāsana), brought to this island of Lanka by the Great Arahant Mahinda on a Posen Full Moon day like today, took deep root in this country. The two verses we have taken as our theme today express this valuable principle, which is also vital for the future of this Dispensation.

The occasion for preaching these two verses arose in connection with certain events in the lives of the chief disciples of this Dispensation, the Venerable Sāriputta and Moggallāna. After the two Venerables Sāriputta and Moggallāna joined this Buddha-dispensation, entered the community, and attained Arahantship, the Buddha gathered the assembly and conferred the positions of Chief Disciples upon these two Venerables. At that moment, a certain critical whispering and murmuring arose among the monks regarding how the Buddha conferred these positions. They muttered that the Buddha had acted partially, like one who distributes food by looking at faces. If the positions of Chief Disciples were to be given, they should have been given to the Group of Five Monks (Pañcavaggiya) who were ordained first. Or else, they should have been chosen from the fifty-five monks led by Yasa, the clansman. Or else, from the thirty youths of the Bhaddavaggiya group. Or else, from the thousand monks led by Uruvela Kassapa. In this manner, when the monks were engaged in such talk about the Buddha, the Buddha asked, "What are you discussing, monks?" When the matter was explained, he said, "Monks, I do not confer positions by looking at faces. I confer positions based on the past aspirations and the strength of the perfections (pāramī) of each individual." He then described in great detail the past meritorious deeds and the past assurances (vivaraṇa) received by Venerable Añña Koṇḍañña, Yasa the clansman, and others individually. Finally, he declared how the two Venerables Sāriputta and Moggallāna received the definite assurance to attain the position of Chief Disciples from the Buddha Anomadassī.

After all these accounts had been declared, the two Venerables Sāriputta and Moggallāna came before the Buddha, paid homage, and declared before the assembly how they had engaged in their quest for truth before coming to the Buddha. If we briefly mention that account, it is as follows. Most of you may have heard the valuable life story of these two. There were two Brahmin clans in Rajagaha called Upatissa and Kolita. In those prominent families, two meritorious youths, two young Brahmins, were born. They received the names Upatissa and Kolita. These families had been friends for a long time. Likewise, these two also became very close friends and began to do everything together. After completing their education in their youth, just as young people usually do, they also turned to amusements. They were accustomed to going annually to watch a certain public festival called the Giragga Samajja (the Mountain-Top Festival) held in Rajagaha. Just as today we have various shows, musical nights, and so forth, it must have been something like that—a festival held on a mountain peak.

Although this was a custom, one year, on one occasion, while watching the Giragga Samajja festival, their wisdom accumulated through saṃsāric journeys had matured and ripened. Because of this, they did not laugh at places where they usually laughed. They did not show excitement where they usually showed excitement. They did not give gifts where they usually gave gifts. They looked on as if disillusioned. When the two spoke to each other, they realized they shared the same thoughts. What was the thought? "There is nothing of value here. There is no essence (sāra). This is essence-less. These people who are dancing, playing music, and singing here will all face death (marana) before a hundred years have passed. It is far more valuable for us to go in search of the path of liberation (vimukti) from this saṃsāra." Thus, they both agreed and discussed what to do next.

"Now, if we expect liberation, we must obtain ordination. Under whom shall we obtain ordination?" At that time in Rajagaha, a wanderer named Sañjaya was famous, having a large following. They decided they must go there and ordain. Sending back their carriages and special retinues, they, along with five hundred companions, received ordination under the wanderer Sañjaya. Because these two possessed extremely sharp wisdom, within a few days they mastered everything Sañjaya knew, everything he taught. Then they asked their teacher, "Venerable Sir, do you know anything beyond this?" When he replied, "No, this is all I know. I cannot tell you anything beyond this," they thought, "Then staying here is essence-less. We must search for the truth individually." They made an agreement: "If either of us discovers the path to liberation, or Nibbāna, he must inform the other." They then went to various places, met teachers, and began to discuss and ask questions. Not a single teacher was able to answer their questions, whereas these two were capable of answering those teachers' questions.

While some time passed in this way, the Buddha was residing in Rajagaha, having accepted the Veluvana monastery. One day, Venerable Assaji, one of the Group of Five Monks, was walking for alms. On that day, the wanderer Upatissa—whom we now know as Venerable Sāriputta—after having his meal at home, was setting out to go to the wanderer's monastery when he saw this Venerable monk. He thought, "I have never seen anyone like this before. I have never seen anyone with such peaceful faculties and such calm deportment. He must be an Arahant or one who has entered the path to Arahantship. It is not proper to speak to him right now while he is walking for alms." Following behind him, after the Venerable monk finished his alms-round and prepared to eat his meal, Upatissa prepared a suitable seat for him, offered water from his own water vessel, performed all the duties, and attended to him. After the monk had finished his meal, Upatissa asked, "Friend, who is your teacher? What is the Dhamma you follow? Your deportment is very pleasant. Your complexion and skin are extremely radiant." He then requested, "Please tell me that Dhamma."

Then Venerable Assaji very humbly expressed, "I am a newly ordained monk, one who has recently entered the order. I cannot preach a long sermon or explain it in detail." Then the wanderer Upatissa said, "My name is Upatissa. Even a little is enough for me. You do not need to say many words. I only want the meaning, the core essence. If you say just that much, I will understand." Thus, he made his request. It was on that occasion that Venerable Assaji recited a highly profound verse—a valuable verse that presents the complete core, the fundamental doctrinal principle of the Dhamma of Dependent Arising (Paṭiccasamuppāda).

Ye dhammā hetuppabhavā,

tesaṃ hetuṃ tathāgato āha, tesañca yo nirodho,

evamvādī mahāsamaṇo.

"Of those phenomena that arise from a cause, the Tathāgata has declared their cause; and also their cessation. Such is the doctrine of the Great Ascetic." This is the meaning of that verse.

This verse is so deep, and the wanderer's store of merit and wisdom so sharp, that upon hearing just the first two lines of the verse, he attained the fruit of Stream-entry (sotāpatti-phala). The moment he heard that whatever phenomena arise from a cause, their cause has been declared by the Tathāgata, he attained Stream-entry. Then, after the verse was completed, the wanderer Upatissa asked the Venerable monk, "Where does our Teacher reside?" When told it was at Veluvana monastery, he asked for the way there and said, "I have one more task to do. I have a friend, and we have promised each other that if we find the truth, the deathless, or Nibbāna, we would inform each other. I will fulfill that promise and come. You may proceed ahead, Venerable Sir." Sending Venerable Assaji ahead, the wanderer Upatissa went back to the wanderer's monastery. As he was going, his friend Kolita saw him from afar. Seeing him, Kolita thought, "Today, my friend has an unusually radiant appearance. He looks so joyful. Surely, he must have attained Nibbāna." When he asked for details, the wanderer Upatissa recited the verse in full, explaining, "I met such a Venerable monk." Upon the completion of that verse, the wanderer Kolita also was established in the fruit of Stream-entry.

Then the wanderer Kolita said, "Let us now go to meet the Buddha." However, because Upatissa was always someone who respected teachers, he thought of their teacher, Sañjaya the wanderer, under whom they had studied for a short time, and said, "Let us also go and tell this new news to our teacher. Perhaps upon hearing this verse, he might understand the Dhamma. If he cannot, at least he might go to see the Buddha." So they went in search of him.

Seeing them, the wanderer Sañjaya asked, "Well, my children, did you find the truth?" When they told him the news, he did not show much faith. After they had explained everything, he said, "Then you two go. I cannot go." When asked, "Why?" he replied, "Having been a teacher for so long, I cannot now become a disciple, a pupil. To use a simile, it is like having been a water-jar and then becoming a ladle or a spoon." You all know that a water-jar gives water to others. But a spoon or a ladle merely takes water from it. That was the simile he used. "Having been like a water-jar before, how can I now become like a spoon? That would be a loss of face for me, so I cannot go." When they entreated him again, saying, "Do not say so, teacher! Such a supreme person, a Buddha, has now been born in the world; the Dhamma has arisen, the Sangha has arisen. This is a great opportunity," he asked again, "My children, are there more fools or wise people in this world?" Upatissa and Kolita replied, "Fools are indeed in the majority." "Then it does not matter. The fools will come to me, and the wise will go to the wise Ascetic Gotama," he said, rejecting their invitation.

After he said this, as these two were departing, a large portion of the wanderer Sañjaya's followers set out to go with them. Seeing this, it is recorded that Sañjaya, out of distress, vomited blood from his mouth. He felt such great grief.

So, that is the account we mentioned. However, the two Venerables Sāriputta and Moggallāna recounted this entire event to the Buddha in front of the Sangha on that occasion. Finally, they said, "Even though we made such an effort, our teacher, the wanderer Sañjaya, did not come."

Hearing this, the Buddha declared, "Such is the nature of the world. Because of his wrong view (micchā-diṭṭhi), because of his wrong ideas, that Sañjaya regarded the essence-less as essential and the essential as essence-less. Because of your wisdom and intelligence, you two understood the true core and attained the essence."

Praising them, he uttered the two verses we mentioned earlier:

Asāre sāramatino,

sāre ca asāradassino,

te sāraṃ nādhigacchanti,

micchāsāṅkappagocarā.

Those who take the essence-less to be essential, and see the essential as essence-less, they never attain the true essence, being in the pasture of wrong intention. Thus he expressed one side, and then he expressed the other side:

Sārañca sārato ñatvā, asārañca asārato,

te sāraṃ adhigacchanti,

sammāsaṅkappagocarā.

But those who understand the essential as essential, and the essence-less as essence-less, they, conducting their thoughts according to right intention, attain the true essence. This is the meaning of that verse.

These are two valuable verses containing extremely profound thoughts. From this story and these two verses, on a day like today, we can draw out many points regarding the Buddha's Dispensation and our own lives. Now, if we look particularly at the first verse, the best illustration is contained in the very story we told—the character of the wanderer Saṅjaya. His character is revealed by that first verse. Why? Asāre sāramatino—he took what was essence-less as essential. Next, he took what was essential as essence-less. Consequently, a valuable opportunity slipped away. What is said there is that he did not have the strength to see the Buddha because of being prey to wrong intentions. To explain this in more detail along with the meaning of the verse, when we think about why the wanderer Saṅjaya was reluctant to go to the Buddha, we can see what those essence-less things were.

He had the power of a following, he had gains and hospitality (lābha-sakkāra), he had fame and praise. These were the things that the wanderer Saṅjaya regarded as great. All of these are essence-less things. Yet, he took those essence-less things as essential. Although they were fools, he had a large following. He possessed the power of a great crowd. Furthermore, due to pride (māna), he thought, "I am a teacher; I cannot become a disciple now." These are foolish thoughts. Accordingly, wrong intentions, if we speak in terms of the Noble Eightfold Path, are thoughts of sensual desire (kāma-vitakka), thoughts of ill-will (byāpāda-vitakka), and thoughts of cruelty (vihiṃsā-vitakka), which you all must have read about many times. Feelings regarding sensual desires, then feelings of anger, feelings of harming. Once one submits to such thoughts, one is continuously dragged in that direction.

Thus, it is that view (diṭṭhi), that vision, and that attitude which is expressed in the first verse. Saṅjaya is a good illustration of this. If we think accordingly, this fact is true not only for that time but also for the present day. The majority of the world belongs to the group described above. Also, many people are easily dragged towards wrong view (micchā-diṭṭhi). They are very easily dragged towards wrong views. What is called essence-less is, in short, that which belongs to the side of wrong views. Indeed, although we call it wrong view, sometimes what appears most dangerous is the type of truth called "half-truth." Half-truth, dear devotees, is an incomplete truth that appears true at first glance. But when looked at from within, it contains empty things, false and hollow things. There are various shortcomings in them.

There is an ancient term used in this Dispensation for that "half-truth": mugga-sūpatā (resembling mung-bean soup). Mugga means mung beans, and sūpatā means soup-like. You can imagine—when eating rice with mung-bean gravy, occasionally unboiled, hard beans are chewed. Sometimes it is mostly these unboiled beans that are present. It is just like that. That is to say, they are only half-cooked. The category of half-truth is also like that. Just as in those days, today too, "mung-bean soup" is very popular. A large number of people are attracted to mung-bean soup. If you look at society, you will see this. Such is the state of society.

Next, when thinking about wrong view (micchā-diṭṭhi), the Buddha has declared that of all the wrongs in this world, the greatest wrong, the supreme blame (parama-vajja), is wrong view (micchā-diṭṭhi). Why is that? He says this with reasons. A person might think, "Why, we have freedom of thought. What does it matter to others if we hold whatever view we want?" One can ask in this way. But the primary cause for the ruin of a person's life is wrong view (micchā-diṭṭhi). The Buddha demonstrated the danger of wrong view (micchā-diṭṭhi) to the monks on that occasion with a good illustration and a good simile.

First, he states the matter: "Monks, all the bodily actions, verbal actions, and mental actions of a person of wrong view conform to the very wrong view they have adopted. Whatever intention (cetanā), aspiration, goal, or activity they initiate, it all conforms to that wrong view. Next, what is their kammic result (vipāka) and danger (ādinava)? Because of this, they will have to experience severe unwholesome results, undergo suffering and hardships, and experience unpleasant, disagreeable results." Then comes the simile: "Monks, just as when a seed of neem (margosa), a bitter melon seed, or a bitter gourd seed is planted in moist soil, all the earth-nutrients and water-moisture it draws in work only to produce a bitter fruit; it yields only a bitter fruit. In the same way, the entire course of action of a person who has adopted wrong view leads to bad results, undesirable results, unpleasant and disagreeable results."

He declares the opposite side: "Similarly, monks, all the bodily, verbal, and mental actions of a person of right view (sammā-diṭṭhi) are nourished according to that right view. Likewise, their intentions, aspirations, expectations, goals, and activities are all shaped according to that right view and ultimately yield good results and good benefits (ānisaṃsa)." The simile for this can be understood accordingly: "Monks, just as when a grape seed, a seed of hill paddy, or a sugarcane seed is planted in moist soil, all the earth-nutrients and water-moisture it draws in yield only a sweet fruit. Just so is right view (sammā-diṭṭhi)." Thus, he pointed out the difference between the two.

So, according to this, we can understand that the majority of people in the world today are those who follow the "mung-bean gravy," or in other words, who are dragged along by wrong views. Next is the second verse. The best illustration for this—even if not specifically mentioned—you can easily think of: the lives of the two Venerables Sāriputta and Moggallāna. Their lives demonstrate this to us. Indeed, when speaking of the Chief Disciples of this Dispensation, we must all consider that, next to the Buddha, our examples to follow are the Chief Disciples. Indeed, they are exemplary. When looking at it from another angle, they possessed the strength to discard the essence-less and humbly accept the essential. Even during their lay life, this is shown to us on several occasions. The first occasion was mentioned in this very story. In youth, the occasions when anyone goes to enjoy themselves are those various shows, musical nights, and so forth. But once saṃsāric wisdom matures, there comes a time when one gets weary of them. We have stated in previous Dhamma sermons that this entire world is like a school with eight grades. The majority of the world stays on the side of gratification (assāda). The crowd running after the five cords of sensual pleasure is the largest. Then, at some point, through the maturing of wisdom and through experience, the danger (ādīnava)—the defective side in them—begins to appear. Once that is seen, one passes to the class of escape (nissaraṇa) by ordaining. Here too, after their wisdom matured, the things they previously thought were essential appeared as essence-less to both of them. There was no laughter as before, no joy. They sat looking downcast, disillusioned. While everyone else was dancing and enjoying themselves, because their wisdom had matured, this appeared to them as essence-less.

Likewise, the next step they took was to abandon all those resources and enter ordination. Even that ordination was not at the right place; it was under the wanderer named Saṇḍhaya. Even there, they did not just linger thinking, "This is my teacher." After learning whatever was to be learned there, they understood that there was no essence here, and they abandoned that as well. Next, they began to search for the truth. In their search, the best illustration of being drawn to the truly essential is seen when they met the Venerable monk and requested him: "I do not need many words. Tell me the real essence." When requested thus, the Venerable monk recited a verse that, though seemingly simple, showed the core meaning of the entire True Dhamma—the essence of the profound Dhamma of Dependent Arising (paṭiccasamuppāda). The wanderer Upatissa understood the truth from the first two lines of that verse, and the wanderer Kolita also understood it by hearing the same verse. Here we understand that even if we do not analyze that verse in detail, in brief—as the elder devotees among you must know—there is a doctrine called Dependent Arising (paṭiccasamuppāda). Many people, when they observe precepts, keep reciting the twelve factors like avijjā-paccayā saṅkhārā, saṅkhāra-paccayā viññāṇaṃ. But, dear devotees, this is not the core of Dependent Arising (paṭiccasamuppāda). The real core is what is said in that verse. What is it? "Whatever phenomena arise from a cause, their cause the Buddha has shown, and also their cessation." If we briefly state the fundamental principle shown there, it is mentioned elsewhere in the Dhamma:

Imasmim sati idaṃ hoti, imassuppādā idaṃ uppajjati.

Imasmim asati idam na hoti, imassa nirodhā idam nirujjhati.

"When this is, that is; with the arising of this, that arises. When this is not, that is not; with the cessation of this, that ceases."

That is a core principle, a thesis. Within it lies the essence of the entire Dhamma of Dependent Arising (paṭiccasamuppāda). Regarding the things that the world considers as a self, as eternal and permanent, the wonderful reality that the Buddhas bring to light is always hidden in the world due to the darkness of ignorance (avijjā). That is this wonderful causal relationship between one and another, which is called Dependent Arising (paṭiccasamuppāda). This is what is revealed by this verse.

Therefore, due to the sharp wisdom of the wanderer Upatissa, upon hearing just the first two lines, he realized the fruit of Stream-entry (sotāpatti-phala) through the path-knowledge of Stream-entry (sotāpatti-magga-ñāṇa). There too, we see the appreciation of the essential. From this, we can see that no matter how many essence-less things there are in the world that attract people, our effort should be to gradually abandon the essence-less within us and acquire the essential. There is no use in clinging to essence-less things for a long time. You all must have heard a saying in society about "the tradition of the bundle of hemp (haṇamiṭṭi sampradāya)"—being like the man who clung to the bundle of hemp.

There is a long story behind that too. Briefly, it is like this. The story underlying this proverb is somewhat humorous. Two friends left their village to travel from village to village in search of wealth. On their way, they first came to a village where hemp was easily available, so abundant that it was discarded. So both of them bound two bundles of hemp and went to the next village carrying them. When they arrived there, hemp thread was available in plenty. Then one friend said to the other, "Now, we are carrying this hemp to make hemp thread. Let us discard this hemp and take the hemp thread instead." The other friend said, "No, no, I have bound this bundle of hemp very well. I cannot throw it away. You do what you want." So, one friend took the hemp thread, while the other carried the same old bundle of hemp. When they went to the next village, hemp cloth was available. There too, the wise friend said, "Now, we are carrying this hemp thread to make cloth. Let us discard this thread and take the hemp cloth instead." "No, I don't want that either. I will carry this which I have brought with such difficulty," said the other and carried it on.

In this way, they went from village to village. To make it short, in the next village there was cotton cloth. In the next village, iron. In the next, brass. In the next, silver. In the next, gold—discarded in plenty. So, of these two, the wise friend discarded his previous bundle of silver and tied up a bundle of gold. The other friend was still carrying the bundle of hemp. Clinging to the bundle of hemp, he was unwilling to let it go. Then these two returned to their village. When they returned, the family of the hemp-carrier grieved and lamented greatly, saying, "After all this time, is this what you carried and brought?" Whereas at the house of the one who brought the bundle of gold, all the children and family were highly pleased and rejoiced.

That is the story. I told it because you devotees like to hear stories. This proverb is very common in society, but some may not understand its meaning, so it is good to know. Why? Because the majority of people go in that direction. They grasp tightly onto essence-less things for the sake of the temporary comfort they offer. Now, why did the wanderer Sañjaya follow those things containing half-truths? Because the majority of people are attracted to them. If one can gather a following, if one can obtain gains and hospitality (lābha-sakkāra), that was regarded as the great thing. He did not attempt to realize the supreme essence of escape from this saṃsāric cycle, which is liberation, the primary purpose of the entire life, of ordination, or of renunciation (nekkhamma).

Thus, according to this, even when we think about the future of this Dispensation, we can understand that to preserve this Buddha-dispensation, we must understand its true essence, highlight that essence, and lead our lives accordingly. Indeed, the Buddha once declared to the Great Arahant Mahā Kassapa one reason that leads to the decline of the Dispensation. Indeed, after the passing away of the Buddha, it was Venerable Mahā Kassapa who was most enthusiastic about preserving the Dispensation. Perhaps as a reason for this, on one occasion the Buddha said to Venerable Mahā Kassapa: "Kassapa, this True Dhamma (Saddhamma) does not disappear until a counterfeit Dhamma (Saddhamma-paṭirūpaka) arises in the world." A counterfeit thing. The simile used is gold. When we speak of gold, we often use the word ran (gold). In ancient books, two terms are used: ratran (refined gold) and amuran (natural gold). Gold that is refined, processed, and prepared is called ratran. Natural gold is gold in its natural state. It is called jātarūpa. Even that natural gold disappears from the world not due to anything else, but due to the arising of a counterfeit natural gold. To use a modern term, when an "imitation" of a certain kind arises, natural gold disappears from the world. People are deceived, thinking it is natural gold. The Buddha declared that a similar thing happens to the True Dhamma.

Therefore, it is not through other religions of wrong view (micchā-diṭṭhi) that this Dispensation can be destroyed; it can be destroyed from within. Why? What are called "counterfeits of the True Dhamma" (Saddhamma-paṭirūpaka) are things that merely look like the True Dhamma. They are also just like that mung-bean soup. Many people are likely to be attracted to them. You devotees must be mindful of this when thinking about the future.

One must understand the true essence of the True Dhamma. What is the essence? A Buddha arises in the world to provide the solution through the path of liberation (vimukti-magga) to this saṃsāric problem, which no other teacher could resolve. It is to bring to light this saṃsāric liberation. In short, Nibbāna is the ultimate goal and the essence. This is shown in the Dhamma by the Buddha on one occasion in the Mahāsāropama Sutta using the simile of a Sal tree. Now, some people go and break off the leaves, twigs, and branches of a Sal tree, taking them as valuable things. Another takes the bark. Another takes the sapwood. But only a rare person takes the heartwood (sāra), the truly valuable thing. Similarly, in this Dispensation too, there is a distinction between the valuable and the valueless. Suppose someone becomes ordained, or turns to these activities. Then, gains and hospitality (lābha-sakkāra) flow in. These are like the leaves and branches. Next, like the bark, is virtue (sīla). That too is a great thing, better than the former. But that itself is not the essence. Beyond that is concentration (samādhi). Passing all these, next is the fruit of Arahantship (arahatta-phala), or Nibbāna—that liberation obtained through the realization of the paths and fruits (magga-phala). That alone is the core, the essence of this Dispensation.

Therefore, if any Dhamma sermon forgets that Nibbāna, puts Nibbāna aside, and emphasizes mundane goals that provide temporary relief... In the past, Dhamma preachers concluded all Dhamma sermons by pointing towards Nibbāna. But now, Dhamma sermons often end not with that, but with common, mundane goals. Many people also like that. Why? Because they think it is a great thing if they can resolve the temporary problems of daily life. But being satisfied with such temporary relief is like regarding the essence-less as essential. It is like completely wasting this extremely rare human existence (manussa-attabhāva). Likewise, in these Dhamma sermons, we must realize that whether lay or ordained, if one is engaged in this path of practice (paṭipadā), one can achieve saṃsāric liberation through the realization of the paths and fruits (magga-phala). A certain Brahmin asked the Buddha: "Venerable Sir, is it the layman or the ordained one who attains these supramundane states in this Dispensation?" The Buddha declared: "That question should not be asked in that way. It is a question that must be answered with a division. For, whether one is a layman or an ordained person, if they follow the path of practice, they can realize the paths and fruits." He answered in that manner. Accordingly, we must consider that the essence to be taken from a Dhamma sermon is to achieve a peace that has not been received in our lives throughout this long saṃsāra. Why? In the Dhamma stories, we read, hear, and see the Buddha declaring that, in short, even the Bodhisatta himself, through his store of merit and the power of his perfections (pāramī), had attained the status of a Wheel-Turning Monarch (Cakkavatti) countless times.

Reading about the luxuries and wealth of a Wheel-Turning Monarch in those discourses (sutta) fills one with wonder. They describe such a vast amount of amazing pleasure and wealth in terms of the five cords of sensual pleasure (pañcā-kāma), seemingly without end. Yet, those discourses end by showing even those to be essence-less. "All these formations (saṅkhāra / preparations) are impermanent (anicca / inconstant), monks. All of them—that Wheel-Turning Monarch is no more, his kingdoms are no more, all of them are now destroyed, subject to that impermanence (anicca)." In this way, the Buddha describes even things like the empire of a Wheel-Turning Monarch to show their essence-less nature. But, dear devotees, the common pattern nowadays is to preach the Dhamma by highlighting ordinary day-to-day progress—which cannot even come close to that Wheel-Turning empire—as the essence, thereby attracting a large crowd to it. This becomes something like the practice of Sañjaya. The True Dhamma will quickly disappear, and the Dispensation will quickly decline.

Therefore, on a day like today, wise devotees must reflect on such things. For, the tendency to run because others are running is always present among crowds. When there is a large crowd, when one runs, the others also run. They do not even know the reason. Later, when they look, there is nothing to be gained; it is an empty thing. All turn back. Next, they see people running to another place, and they run there too. Running and running, they go there, spending all their resources. When they go and look, there is nothing to be gained there either. Thus, they run here and there throughout their lives, as if chasing a mirage. You can know the illustrations for these stories from the things you see, hear, and read in daily life. What we are saying is just a general statement.

From all of this, we must understand something. We must have firm faith that we have the ability to highlight the essence of the Buddha's Dispensation and go a considerable distance along this path of liberation (vimukti-magga) in our daily lives. Whether lay or ordained, if we apply ourselves, we can reap its results even today. But we must understand that it is not something easily obtained. What is good and essential cannot be obtained easily. Growing grass is easy, but the yield is low. Farming is difficult, done with much toil, but the yield is great. We must think in this way. What do we plant in our mind-stream (citta-santāna)? Is it a work like growing grass? Or is it the cultivation of virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā) carried out with great effort? This is what the Buddha has said: it is like farming. He has urged us to cultivate virtues like sīla quickly, just as a farmer quickly does his farming when it rains.

Why does he say so? This is an extremely rare opportunity. That is why the Buddha has pointed out the word "diligence" (appamāda) as the most important keyword of the entire True Dhamma. Walk diligently (appamāda) on this path of liberation (vimukti-magga) and secure your release from saṃsāra. For saṃsāra is dangerous. Saṃsāra is fearful. If you do not secure a certain destiny (niyata-gatika) at least through a path or fruit like Stream-entry (sotāpatti), then, though you are living good lives now, we cannot say when our lives will end. If life is lost at some point, despite having lived well, because the store of merit that gave us this human life is exhausted, some past unwholesome kamma might surface, causing birth in an animal state, a hungry ghost (peta) state, or a demon state. It is because of such a dangerous saṃsāra that the Buddha regarded this obtained human existence—which even the deities hold in high esteem—as something precious and urged us to make every effort to derive the full benefit from it.

Now, in this Dhamma, physical or material goals are indeed mentioned to a certain extent. Some of you might think, "Why, in our Maṅgala Sutta, aren't thirty-eight blessings mentioned? Thirty-eight blessings are mentioned, aren't they? To support one's wife and children—all of these are mentioned, aren't they?" But, dear devotees, all those blessings culminate in the blessing of Nibbāna. The thirty-eighth blessing is the blessing of Nibbāna. That is why, perhaps, Nibbāna is taught as the "supreme blessing" (paramaṃ maṅgalaṃ) at the end. Indeed, that is the supreme blessing. Therefore, if one's wisdom is to develop, one must not just linger there, clinging to the bundle of hemp, but must make use of this human existence. Indeed, the human mind is a mind possessing an unimaginably wonderful power in this entire universe. You will easily understand this now from the feats scientists perform by developing the mind through science. But far more wonderful feats were performed in the past by the Buddhas, Paccekabuddhas, and Great Arahants who developed the power of their perfections (pāramī). Because those are difficult and perhaps because their results are not glaringly visible to ordinary people, humans do not show interest in them. But we must reflect on the danger of saṃsāra. Therefore, in a Dhamma sermon, we must always remind ourselves of that word appamāda (diligence). Next are the objects of urgency (saṃvega-vatthu)—things that help to arouse energy: the danger of saṃsāra, the dangerous nature of life, birth (jāti), aging (jarā), sickness (vyādhī), death (maraṇa), and the fear of the four lower realms (apāya-bhaya). We must constantly contemplate these. Contemplation of death (maraṇānussati), and so forth. When we contemplate these, our effort increases further.

These are what we must take as the essence of this Dhamma. Through them, without falling into negligence, without being dragged into saṃsāra, and without making existence (bhava) something great, we aim for the cessation of existence instead of its continuation. We have run an essence-less race in this saṃsāra for so long; we have run after it. Understanding that we must bring this to an end now, we must enter the path of practice (paṭipadā) pointing to the heartwood shown by the Buddha, namely virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). The true heartwood is the state of liberation (vimukti), which is free and detached from all. The Buddhas, entering the attainment of fruition (phala-samāpatti), personally experience that supreme blessing, that moment, and its real power. The greatest relief obtained from this is release from this saṃsāra. To reach that point, we must walk on the path of virtue, concentration, and wisdom; we must engage in meditation (bhāvanā). Generally, some people think of meditation merely as something done to cure their physical ailments, or as something done just for the sake of doing it. Today, it has become a fashion, a trend, to say, "We also meditate." But it is not something done just for the sake of saying so. Meditation means the true development of the mind. It must be done systematically. Having developed a certain concentration (samādhi) through tranquility (samatha), one must then apply one's attention—insight attention (vipassanā-manasikāra)—in a way that realizes the three characteristics of impermanence (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and non-self (anattā) in this world. Through this, when one recognizes the essence, it is natural for essence-less things to be discarded. This cannot be prevented. We know that as a tree grows, the mature and dry leaves fall. As new shoots appear at the top, leaves fall at the bottom. This cannot be prevented; it is natural. In the same way, as you devotees grow in Dhamma-knowledge, the things you previously regarded as high—those musical nights, various shows—might appear as essence-less, as mere theatrical plays (nāḍagam). But one should not think badly of this, wondering, "If we go on like this, won't we lose our ways of entertainment? Won't we lose our sources of income? Won't the world become a joyless place?" Some might argue in this way. It is to such people that we sometimes refer as "promoters of the world" (lokavaddhana). The Buddha has urged us not to be promoters of the world. What was done for so long was the promotion of the world and the promotion of cemeteries. What remains to be done now, in this period of the arising of a Buddha (buddhotpāda-kāla), is to escape from this world, to escape from this entire saṃsāra.

We have the power within us to achieve that liberation. The power of perfections (pāramī) might be hidden. The human mind has the capacity to bring them out, even in a young child. When we say that in this Dispensation a seven-year-old child could become an Arahant, what an amazing power is demonstrated! We must constantly reflect on the timeless quality (akālika-guṇa) of this Dispensation—that its fruit can be reaped right here on this earth, at this very moment. Thus, when reflecting on the qualities of the Dhamma shown as visible here and now (sanditṭhika), timeless (akālika), inviting to come and see (ehi-passika), and so forth, one develops a greater enthusiasm to walk this path. For, we are not on a fruitless journey. To whatever extent this Dhamma grows in one's mind, the results and benefits (ānisaṃsa) are present right there. Seeing those benefits, one is further encouraged to walk this path.

Likewise, the other side is that from those objects of urgency (saṃvega-vatthu), from the things happening in society, from all of them, one must draw illustrations of the painful nature of saṃsāra. Many scenes are hidden in society. It is like the setting of snares by Māra, like Māra's trap. Things that cause disillusionment with society, disillusionment with the world and society, are kept hidden. There is an attitude in the world that we should not even look at them. But the Buddha brings them to light through meditations such as the meditation on foulness (asubha-bhāvanā). The things shown by the Buddha may sometimes be unpleasant. Indeed, we sometimes compare them to the myrobalan fruit (nelli). When you first bite into a myrobalan fruit, it is indeed bitter. But it has a sweet aftertaste. That is why it is called "deathless" (amata / āmalka). Similarly, this Dhamma also has a certain bitterness at first glance. But when one practices it, the practitioner finds a wonderful taste in it. We must think in this way. One should not measure something merely because the majority of people are attracted to external polish, show, and appearance. What Saṅjaya said is true: the wise in the world are few; the fools are many. But we should not merely accept that statement and remain in the same place. Even in a school, although there are various grades, everyone expects to pass. One does not remain in the same class just because one is there. Why do we sit for exams? To pass to the next class. Once there, one does not linger saying, "This is my class." Next, one sits for another exam and goes to a higher class. It is just like that here. We need progress in this saṃsāra. Lingering in the same place—that lingering in the same place is what is called "the tradition of the bundle of hemp."

Therefore, recall these matters well with wisdom on a valuable day like today. Preserving a Dispensation is not something done through external things, buildings, or golden fences. Those too are necessary to arouse faith (saddhā) in this Dispensation. But indeed, this is like a message that goes from heart to heart. Therefore, the more we purify our hearts... Let us say the parents' hearts are pure. They walk on the path of Dhamma. They cultivate giving (dāna), virtue (sīla), meditation (bhāvanā), virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). That message is then received by the child. That child, in turn, gives it to their child. In that way, the lay lineage continues. It is the same among the Sangha. When teachers and preceptors grow in these among the Sangha, it is passed on to their pupils. In that way, a Dispensation... When we speak of "this Dispensation," nowadays people think of it as if it has been deeded solely to the Sangha. But the Buddha spoke of this as something standing on four pillars, referring to the fourfold assembly of bhikkhus, bhikkhunīs, laymen (upāsaka), and laywomen (upāsikā). Thus, from the side of the devotees, our task is not to obtain wealth by hook or by crook, righteously or unrighteously, and then offer a portion of it to the Sangha to gain heavenly rebirth. What we must consider is that we too must walk on that path of Dhamma. Now, this is not something to be said at length. When we look closely at the Maṅgala Sutta mentioned earlier, we can see this. The lay Buddhist, starting their lay life in that manner, born in a good environment, gradually draws close to the Sangha, discusses the Dhamma, and ultimately reaches Nibbāna. Even the Maṅgala Sutta, which lay devotees use most, contains such a progression. From this, we can see that our life must be one that gradually moves towards progress, not one of lingering in the same place.

So, I believe these few points will be sufficient for this meritorious assembly. You must reflect on this and decide on the path of action you should take. Indeed, what can be easily said about everyone in daily life in these times, according to their lifestyle and social conditions, is that this journey of Dhamma is not an easy one. Finding time to listen to Dhamma and practice meditation... Daily life passes through various severe economic and social pressures. But, as we said on previous occasions, we must make all of them a support to escape from this saṃsāra, to hasten this work. That is what we called "blessings in disguise." Indeed, if not for such things, some would be tempted only by luxury, lean towards unrighteousness, and end their lives without deriving any benefit from this Dhamma. But if someone understands the suffering of life, understands the suffering of saṃsāra, and realizes through the hardships they face in this life: "We must have undergone such suffering for countless times, so we must find a solution to this," if one thinks so, then, even with difficulty, one will incline towards the practice of virtue, concentration, and wisdom declared by the Buddha. Once inclined, if they can open up even a small gap—spending five or ten minutes a day on meditation—as their taste, desire (chanda), and earnestness increase, they will realize that they have more time than before. In that way, one must make a certain sacrifice. What is called sacrifice is not wealth and resources, but time.

Indeed, what people are most hesitant to sacrifice nowadays is time. They have that much work, that much work. Likewise, there is another side—trying to do everything easily. This is due to modern science. Doing easily what we used to do with much effort. It is true that we too sometimes benefit from this indirectly. Just by turning a small key, what we previously did with great difficulty is done easily. But we must not think that the Dhamma is also like that. Often, those who had fulfilled their perfections (pāramī) over a very long period, like Venerable Sāriputta, understood the Dhamma in a very short time upon hearing a single verse. We should not think from this that if everyone does not attain a path or fruit from a single line of a verse, then this Dhamma is of no use. How long must those Venerable ones like Sāriputta have striven and fulfilled their perfections (pāramī) to attain Stream-entry from just two lines of a verse! Thinking in this way, we must realize that if we do not possess such a store of merit, we must build up that store of merit by engaging in these practices. That is why it is called a sacrifice. That time and effort—the time and effort spent on other things—must be spent on this Dhamma. For, the opportunity to do this will not be available forever. The path to Nibbāna opens up only during the period of the arising of a Buddha (buddhotpāda-kāla). Thinking thus, you devotees must preserve the Dispensation for yourselves. The Dispensation we must preserve is for ourselves. We say "this Dispensation preserved our nation." We express it in that way only if the Dispensation grows within each individual in that manner. Otherwise, it is merely a Dispensation brought by foreigners, existing for show, to be seen by visiting various places. That is not true progress; it is an empty, hollow thing. Therefore, as each individual walks on the path of Dhamma, if they become a noble friend (kalyāṇa-mitta), through that power of noble friendship, this Dispensation will grow. That is why the Buddha declared to Venerable Ānanda—as we have often reminded you—when Venerable Ānanda once stated that half of this Dispensation consists of noble friendship: "No, no, Ānanda, do not say so. The entire Dispensation is noble friendship." Therefore, everyone's goal should be to develop the store of virtues corresponding to that noble friendship and, at their own level, to treat their children at home, relatives, friends, and others in institutions with the Dhamma as far as they know, explaining it as far as they know. If you know correctly that this is good, and not wrong views, you must explain it. By encouraging them in that way, through the journey so made, the welfare of the Dispensation is secured.

Therefore, I believe that with these few words, something necessary to remember and practice on a Poson day like today has been expressed to this meritorious assembly. You devotees have observed a certain virtue (sīla) according to your capacity. Virtue (sīla) is something highly necessary for this society—this discipline. Even looking from that perspective, we see a society where unvirtuous, dangerous crimes are committed. Having observed a valuable virtue (sīla) and turned to meditation, you have listened to a Dhamma sermon for about an hour at this moment. If some faith (saddhā), energy (vīriya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhī), and wisdom (paññā) arose in you through this, that itself will at some point become a faculty (indriya) and a power (bala) giving you the strength to realize the supramundane paths and fruits and find peace in the noble, supreme Nibbāna. May you aspire that, through this hearing of the Dhamma, this supportive condition (upanissaya-sampatti) will help you not merely in the future but in this very life, and through the association with noble friends (kalyāṇamitta), give you the strength and power to walk along the paths of Stream-entry, Once-returning, Non-returning, all the way to Arahantship. Likewise, may all beings from Avīci hell to Akanitṭha heaven, including the guardian deities and brahma kings, who wish to rejoice in these merits... and including our departed relatives, may they all rejoice in this store of merit accumulated today through this preaching and hearing of the Dhamma, and realize the supreme, noble Nibbāna through their aspired Bodhi! Let us aspire thus and transfer merits by reciting these verses.

Pali Stanza:

Sahassamapi ce gāthā, anattapadasaṃhitā; Ekam gāthāpadaṃ seyyo, yaṃ sutvā upasammati.

From:

Verse 100 from the Sahassavagga (Chapter of Thousands) of the Dhammapada

Dear Listeners,

During the time the Buddha was residing at the Jetavana monastery, a certain large group of people set sail in a ship from a region in India (Jambudīpa). Out at sea, the ship broke apart, and almost all of those people drowned. Only one person, named Bāhiya, managed to grasp a wooden plank, swam with great difficulty, and landed at the port of Suppāraka. At this moment, this man did not even have proper clothing. He gathered pieces of wood, bound tree bark together with small pieces of wood, and made a garment for himself. Next, he went for alms in the villages around the Suppāraka port. Due to his unusual attire, the people took him to be an Arahant and treated him with great respect, offering him gifts and services. In the course of time, this person came to be known as 'Bāhiya Dārucīriya'. He was called 'Dārucīriya' because he wore a garment made of bark or tree bark. Thus, he spent his time living as an ascetic. Since everyone called him an Arahant, it occurred to him, "Perhaps I too am an Arahant." No sooner did this thought occur to him than a deity, who had been a relative of his in a past life, appeared and said, "Bāhiya, you are neither an Arahant nor have you entered the path to Arahantship." "Then who in this world is an Arahant?" he asked. The deity replied, "Far to the north, in the city of Sāvattthī, there resides the fully enlightened Buddha. It is he who has attained this state."

Immediately, a great faith and a strong desire arose in him to see the Buddha. It was a very long journey, a distance of many leagues (yojanas). Staying only one night at each place, traversing that long road, he went in search of the Buddha. He arrived at the Jetavana monastery in Sāvattthī early one morning. At the time of his arrival, the monks were walking up and down in the open air. He ran up to them and asked, "Where is the Blessed One, the Arahant, the Fully Self-Enlightened One? I have come in great haste just to see Him." The monks replied, "Bāhiya, the Buddha has entered the city for alms." Bāhiya did not stop there. He immediately ran after Him. As soon as he saw the Buddha walking for alms in Sāvattthī, a great faith arose in him. Seeing the Buddha, who was extremely peaceful and of serene senses, he prostrated at His feet and begged, "O Blessed One, please preach the Dhamma to me." For some reason, the Buddha said, "Bāhiya, this is not the time to preach the Dhamma. It is our time for alms-round." When this was said, Bāhiya pleaded, "O Blessed One, I do not know when the Blessed One's life might end, or when my own life might end. Therefore, please teach me at least a little Dhamma." Again the Buddha said, "No, Bāhiya, this is not the time to preach the Dhamma; it is the time of our alms-round." For the third time, he pleaded again, "O Blessed One, I do not know when the Blessed One's life might end, or when my own life might end. Therefore, please quickly preach even a little Dhamma." At that moment, the Buddha delivered a very brief sermon. Though it seemed simple, it was a sermon of deep meaning. Its meaning can be understood as follows:

"Therefore, Bāhiya, you should train yourself thus." Tasmātiha Bāhiya evaṃ sikkhitabbaṃ. "Therefore, Bāhiya, you should train yourself thus." In what way?

"Diṭṭhe diṭṭhamattaṃ bhavissati, sute sutamattaṃ bhavissati, mute mutamattaṃ bhavissati, viññāte viññātamattaṃ bhavissati." "In the seen, there will be only the seen." This means let what is seen be merely what is seen. "In the heard, there will be only the heard." "Mute bhavissati"—muta refers to what is sensed. This is a term applied to what is sensed by the nose, the tongue, and the body. We can take it as sensing. The sensation of the nose, tongue, and body is a special kind of sensing, called muta. Thus, in the sensed, there will be only the sensed. "Viññāte bhavissati"—consciousness (viññāṇa) is the mind, is it not? In what is cognized by consciousness (viññāṇa), in what is known, or rather in what is thought—we can say in the known or the cognized, there will be only the cognized. *"Evam hi te Bāhiya"*—Bāhiya, this is how you should train yourself.

Now, what was said earlier about training oneself in this way sounds like a very simple task. To let the seen be merely the seen, the heard be merely the heard, the sensed be merely the sensed, and the cognized by consciousness (viññāṇa) be merely the cognized. When you have trained yourself in this manner, Bāhiya, when for you in the seen there is only the seen, in the heard only the heard, in the sensed only the sensed, and in the cognized only the cognized, then, Bāhiya, you are 'not by that' (or 'not thereof'). We will try to explain this later. You do not take that seen or heard thing as a 'thing' and grasp it. When you do not take it 'thereof' (as being made up of it), then you are 'not therein' (or 'not in there'). To be 'not therein' means you do not creep inside it. You do not enter into it.

*"Yato kho te Bāhiya na tattha, tato tvaṃ Bāhiya nevidha na huraṃ na ubhayamantare."*

"When you are not therein, then, Bāhiya, you are neither here, nor there, nor in between the two."

*"Esevvanto dukkhassa."* "This alone is the end of suffering (dukkha)." At first glance, it seems very easy to realize Nibbāna. This single passage is a meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna) leading all the way to Arahantship. A truly marvelous sermon. Even today, many scholars often bring up this Sutta discourse to showcase the essence of the Buddha's teaching. We do not know how many actually understand it. Nevertheless, for a meditative mind, even without much scholarly learning, these things can be understood, though they may be difficult for ordinary scholars. Thus, the Buddha gave Bāhiya a meditation subject that leads directly to the ultimate goal of Nibbāna—to the fruit of Arahantship. How effective was it? It is mentioned in the Sutta that immediately, as soon as the Buddha finished preaching this sermon, the bark-clad ascetic Bāhiya attained Arahantship right then and there. What a wonder! He became an Arahant; suffering (dukkha) ended right there. We will try to explain this slowly later on. But the story does not end there. We will explain certain things using the story, as it helps in understanding and is easier to keep in mind.

Next, the event is described as follows. Having delivered this sermon, the Buddha went for alms. Having finished his alms-round and consumed his meal, as he was leaving the city with the monks, he saw—what did he see? Arahant Bāhiya had not gone very far when a fierce cow with a young calf gored him to death. The ascetic Bāhiya was lying there dead—now Arahant Bāhiya. Only the Buddha knew his state. Seeing the body of this Arahant lying there, the Buddha said to the monks, "Monks, this is Bāhiya's body. Take it on a cot, cremate it, and build a stupa over his relics." The monks went to perform this task. They carried the body, cremated it, built a stupa, and returned to the Buddha to report what they had done. They said, "O Blessed One, we have cremated the body of that ascetic, as directed by the Blessed

One. Where is he reborn?" Then the Buddha declared, "Monks, Bāhiya was very wise, highly intelligent, of great wisdom. He did not trouble me much. He did not even trouble me to explain this in detail. Bāhiya attained Arahantship and attained parinibbāna (final extinguishment/extinction)." That was a truly wondrous event. Then the monks asked, "O Blessed One, when and by listening to what sermon did he attain Arahantship so quickly?" According to the Dhamma, it was then that this particular verse was spoken. Although there are other verses related to it, this one can be taken as a simple summary:

Sahassamapi ce gāthā, anattapadasaṃhitā,

Ekaṃ gāthāpadaṃ seyyo, yaṃ sutvā upasammati.

Better than a thousand verses comprised of meaningless words, is one word of a verse, hearing which one is stilled/pacified. The meaning of this verse is that a single word of a verse that leads to calming and tranquility upon hearing is far superior to a thousand meaningless verses. Now let us reflect a bit more on this story.

Furthermore, it is mentioned in the Dhamma that on various occasions, the Buddha appointed different monks to the chief positions in various fields. Many of you may have heard of this. Ven. Sāriputta was chief among those of great wisdom, Ven.

Moggallāna was chief among those with psychic powers. Thus the Buddha bestowed chief positions. Similarly, although the ascetic Bāhiya passed away shortly after, the Buddha declared to the monks, "He is your fellow companion in the holy life (sābrahmacārī)." The term sābrahmacārī is used for a monk. But even though he attained Arahantship while dressed in those clothes, the Buddha referred to him as a fellow companion in the holy life. Moreover, the Buddha declared, "In my dispensation, among those of swift intuition (khippābhiññā)—those who can comprehend the Dhamma very quickly—Bāhiya Dārucīriya is the chief."

A person with such great meritorious power had to undergo great suffering, swimming through the sea after the shipwreck, due to some karmic force. Then, shortly after becoming an Arahant, he had to pass away. However, there is a past-life story mentioned as to why he was able to understand the Dhamma so quickly. This is especially important for our times. What is it? During the time of Kassapa Buddha, Bāhiya Dārucīriya was one of a group of seven monks. These seven monks gathered and discussed among themselves during the period when the dispensation of Kassapa Buddha was declining. We can think about our own era too in this light; it must have been an era like this. This is what is called the 'period of decline', and as it was declining, these seven monks felt great urgency (saṃvega) and resolved, "Before this dispensation is destroyed, let us make an effort, sacrificing our lives, to realize Nibbāna." Having made this agreement and paying their final respects to the golden shrine of Kassapa Buddha, they entered the forest and saw a large mountain. Before climbing this mountain, all seven agreed, "If there is anyone who still has a desire for life, let him turn back. If there is anyone who wishes to strive for Nibbāna, abandoning the desire for life, let him join." They built a ladder, climbed that great mountain, and then threw the ladder down.

How was the situation now? Now these venerable ones were on top of the rock. What was there left to do? There was only one thing to do: to meditate for the sake of escaping saṃsāra. The entire time, since there was no other way out—there was no ladder even to climb down—they began to meditate intensely. By the dawn of the next day, the senior monk, the chief Elder, became an Arahant possessed of direct knowledges (abhiññā). Having become an Arahant, it is mentioned that he walked through the air to Uttarakuru to obtain alms, and brought the food back. Perhaps out of custom, he invited the other monks to partake of the food. The other monks asked, "Venerable Sir, did we make such an agreement, that if one of us becomes an Arahant, we would eat the alms-food he brings?" "No, friends." "If so, Venerable Sir, you may partake of it. We will do what we can through our own strength." They again began to meditate intensely. On the second day, the second monk attained the state of Non-returning (Anāgāmī). That monk also flew through the air, brought alms-food, and made a similar invitation to the others. On that occasion too, they said, "Venerable Sir, did we make an agreement to reject the food brought by the chief Elder but accept the food brought by the second monk, and then meditate?" "Did we make such an agreement?" "No, friends." "Then we do not need that either. Somehow, by our own strength, if we are able, we will go and obtain alms." Saying this, the remaining five monks began to meditate intensely. After seven days, not only did their bodies become completely emaciated, but they strove in meditation until their last breath and died on that rock as worldlings (puthujjana).

Thus, the Arahant passed away into parinibbāna. The second monk, as an Anāgāmī, was reborn in the Brahma realm. These five monks—one of them was this ascetic Bāhiya Dārucīriya. The Dhamma also mentions the others. By the power of their intense effort, keeping the precepts (sīla), and meditation up to their last breath, they were reborn in the celestial realms and then took birth in various places during this era of our Buddha. One was born as King Pukkusāti. Another as Kumāra Kassapa, who later became a great Arahant; another as the wanderer Sabhiya; and another as Ven. Dabba Mallaputta, who attained Arahantship at the age of seven. They were born as outstanding individuals in this Buddha's dispensation. The fifth of them was Bāhiya Dārucīriya. Thus, the result of the life-sacrificing effort made by those five monks at the end of Kassapa Buddha's dispensation was their 'swift intuition' (khippābhiññā)—the ability to realize the Dhamma extremely fast in this dispensation. Thus, even in this era of the decline of the Buddha's dispensation, this past event gives us great courage and inspiration from the example of these monks to meditate without giving up our efforts. We must reflect on this.

In the same way, let us look at the path to Nibbāna preached by the Buddha in relation to this verse. As we said at the beginning, this is something connected to the mind. Escaping from saṃsāra is a truly marvelous thing. Ultimately, one escapes by relying on wisdom (paññā). The Buddha's dispensation consists in developing virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). We have stated on many occasions: virtue is undertaken to discipline the body and speech. Having disciplined body and speech, the mind is then stilled through concentration. To the stilled mind, the true nature of the world becomes clear. The true nature of the world is not discovered by running after what is seen by the eye and heard by the ear, like chasing a mirage, and analyzing everything through science. Ultimately, the root of all this is the mind—thought itself. It is the understanding of thought. The day one understands thought, the net of Māra is broken. Why? Because thought itself is the bondage of Māra, whether for good or for bad, even though we cannot do without it. We are compelled to think. There are thoughts. That is why we mentioned at the very beginning: we use thought to understand everything. But the question is, how do we understand thought? It is to this that the Buddhas provide the answer through this Dhamma.

Now, let us try to unpack this brief sermon, analyze it, present it step-by-step, and bring it to a level where each of you can practice it. Here it was said: "in the seen, merely the seen." Here is another point to consider. One might wonder why the Buddha, who is so compassionate, rejected the request of an ascetic who had come from such a distance, traversing many yojanas, not just once but twice, saying, "This is not the time to preach, it is the time of our alms-round." We must understand that this was done with a very deep purpose. We can think of several reasons. First, when someone arrives completely exhausted and panting after a long journey, they are not ready to listen to the Dhamma. Only when they have rested a bit and calmed down can they focus their mind. Secondly, we can discern a skillful means (upāya) used by the Buddha. If the Buddha had said, "Very well, I will go for alms later. Sit down properly and take the five precepts," and started like that, the man's intense eagerness to receive the Dhamma would have diminished. Instead of that intense effort, he would have thought of it as a slow, leisurely journey. To prevent both of these, the Buddha acted as if he were in a great hurry. This prompted the thought, "Oh, please tell me just a little before you go." "Even a little is enough for me. If you are going for alms, I do not need a long sermon. Just tell me a tiny bit, and I will understand it." It is with this attitude that one listens. Thus, we can see two sides to this. On one hand, it allowed the person's exhaustion to subside. On the other hand, due to the skillful means of the Buddha, the man became receptive to even a short sermon, ready to derive the maximum benefit from it, focusing his entire attention on listening. This is how, through such a short sermon, he understood the essence within the Buddha's Dhamma, as we mentioned earlier.

This Dhamma is something that gives a certain clue or skillful means to a person. Because understanding the nature of thought is something one must do for oneself. No one else can do it. Not even the Buddha can do it. He only shows the path, gives the skillful means, and directs one to it. Apart from that, nothing else can be done. This is something that belongs to each of you. With such a background, let us reflect on this. Diṭṭhe diṭṭhamattam bhavissati. Though we use the Pali words, there is no need to get flustered. In Sinhala, diṭṭha means "what is seen". Why do we say "what is seen"? Generally, we use the expression "the seen thing". By saying "the seen thing", we are already caught. If we think of it as a "seen thing"... now, when it is about to rain, a rainbow appears. Everyone likes it. Is this rainbow a "thing"? Think about it. Is a rainbow a thing? A small child, seeing its beautiful colors, might think, "Oh, there is a rainbow! Dear mother, dear father, can you get that for me?" Someone could think like that. Is this something that can be grasped? How does this rainbow arise? At a time when it is about to rain, water vapor in the sky reflects the light from the setting sun. The sun is on one side. The color combination of the sun's light is what we call a rainbow. How many things have combined to form this? Just as the rainbow appeared, it disappears. The entire world is just like this rainbow. Yet we extract 'things' from these. Just as we make the rainbow into a 'thing', we make other things into 'things' as well. That is why we say "what is seen".

Let us think about it in another way. Looking from here—or rather, looking from one mountaintop towards another—it is a beautiful view. A perfect view to capture on camera. But if someone goes to that mountain to see that view up close, what do they see? The view they saw from afar is no longer there. Now this side looks beautiful from there. It is a mirage. This is what is called a mirage. It is just like that.

Therefore, the Buddha declared: stop at the seen in the seen. It is not about chasing the rainbow in an airplane or trying to catch it in some other way. It is a mirage-like thing that should be left right there and seen for what it is. It is the same with a mirage. This is why it is said: diṭṭhe diṭṭhamattaṃ bhavissati—"in the seen, there will be only the seen." Do not go beyond that. Do not start thinking about it. This is the meaning here. If we contemplate this mirage analogy more deeply: you have heard that during the dry season, deer see the shimmering heat rising from the ground and run after it thinking it is water. Let us think for a moment. Generally, as the deer runs and runs, the mirage recedes. Suppose the deer runs some distance, stops, and looks back. What then? The mirage is right where it started. Thus, if the deer looks back, it has to run back to where it came from. Having run there, when it looks back again, it has to run back. If you think about this, it might seem laughable. But this is exactly what we all do. Why? Because the truth is hidden from the deer. It ran after the mirage. Having run, if it looks back at some point, the mirage is on this side. So it runs all the way back. And goes again. This analogy will help us when we come to a certain point in this sermon.

Alright, keep that in mind. Next, let us see. "In the seen, there will be only the seen." Likewise, sute sutamattaṃ bhavissati—"in the heard, there will be only the heard." This is the path of training the Buddha gave to Bāhiya. This is how one should train. A deep training is found here. Let there be only the heard in the heard. Bāhiya, regarding what is heard, let there be only the state of being heard. This is just like the seen. If we think about hearing, we do hear what is being spoken now. Not only that, you hear songs, hymns, and so on. To make them audible, many rhythms are joined together to create music. It is not the musician who made the music; it is you. You construct it yourselves. There is no need to go that far. Place a vessel where water is dripping. What do you hear? "Tick-tick-tick." Through that, you will hear a song. If your mind is inclined towards songs, if that is your preference, you will hear a song at that moment. If it is night, perhaps fear will arise. Who then constructs the songs out of that? We are all musicians. We construct songs. We construct rhythms. Where do these occur? On the eardrum. We are pleased by the sounds striking the eardrum—especially if they are praising us. If we perceive it as someone insulting us, we get agitated. These are all just sounds striking a drum. Through this, you can understand the deep insight (vipassanā) meaning of the advice the Buddha gave to Bāhiya. In the heard, let there be only the heard.

Next, in the sensed, there will be only the sensed. By "sensed" we mean what is experienced by the tongue, nose, and body. These are extremely subtle sensations. You know how dangerous the tongue is; the moment something touches the tongue, either the entire body is thrilled with pleasure, or the face contorts in distaste, finding it sour or bitter. Such a thing happens due to the sensitivity and power of the tongue. But even here, it is our mind that gathers them together in an extremely subtle manner. Think about it. We say sugar is sweet like honey. What taste is honey? It tastes like sugar. This too is like the deer running after the mirage. We say sugar is sweet by comparing it with honey. Because we have tasted honey, we say it tastes like honey. Next, when we take honey, we have to say it tastes like sugar. This is the trick played by the tongue. In the same way, let us think about touch. Something touches our body. At night, while we are sitting, something very soft brushes against our body. We think, "Oh, this is something very soft," and we touch it. The moment we touch it—it's a cobra! The cobra bites. There is that touch. In this way, first came the feeling, not the sensation of danger, but the moment it is seen as something dangerous, everything changes. The Buddha presents through this the wonderful deception that occurs through our sense faculties. Therefore, if you want wisdom (paññā), if you want to escape from saṃsāra, if you want to break the net of Māra, if you want to be free from the mirage, do this. If you want to live in the world, if you want to cultivate saṃsāra, if you want to go further in saṃsāra, none of this is necessary. Remain subject to thought just as before. That is all there is to the Dhamma.

Thus, the "sensed" can be understood in that way. Viññāte viññātamattam means in the cognized, only the cognized. Generally, let us think about this mass of knowledge in the world—books in libraries, the forces of what is called the wonderful science in the world. Through all of these, with a certain pride, we think, "I know." This is taken as knowledge, as knowing. To distinguish one thing from another is the primary function of consciousness (viññāṇa). To distinguish between the bitter taste and the sweet taste is a function of consciousness (viññāṇa). Distinguishing feelings (vedanā) as pleasant, painful, or neutral is also consciousness (viññāṇa). Through consciousness (viññāṇa), we distinguish and know. We separate one thing from another. We taste it and separate: "this is bitter, this is sweet." Similarly, is this pleasant or painful? What is felt as pleasant is realized to be painful after a while. The state where both are absent is distinguished as neutral. In this way, there is an extremely subtle tendency to analyze in our consciousness (viññāṇa). We understand by dividing and presenting. There is a nature in consciousness (viññāṇa) to separate things as "this is this, and the other is that." Whichever it may be, the Buddha says here: if there is something cognized in that way, consider it merely as something cognized. Do not go beyond that. Do not build further upon it. This is what viññātamattam bhavissati means. Now let us come to the deeper part.

First, Bāhiya was given the path of training. "Train yourself in this way." For you, we gave a simpler thing: we started by giving only the Ajīvattthamakāsīla (eight precepts with livelihood as the eighth) to restrain body and speech. But for Bāhiya Dārūcīriya, the Buddha first gives this deep restraint of the senses (indriya-saṃvara-sīla).

What is found here is the restraint of the senses, not ordinary virtue. Here lies a deep virtue of restraint and self-control, which is helpful for anyone wishing to attain Arahantship. Thus, if one has developed such discipline, restraint, and training regarding everything seen, heard, sensed, and thought, so that one stops at that measure and does not go beyond—then, Bāhiya—as is said next—what happens then? The Buddha declares: "Then, Bāhiya, you are not by that (or not thereof)." That is a deep idea. What is meant by "not by that"? As said before, making it a "thing". Let us go back to the rainbow. The child who made the rainbow into a "thing" cries to his mother, "I will not sleep until you give me that rainbow. Somehow give me that rainbow." That child thinks of it by making it a "rainbow", not as a mere seen thing. It is a real thing, something that can be obtained. In the same way, the child then lives in the rainbow, inside the rainbow. He will even see it in his dreams. This is a small analogy used according to the occasion. This can be understood.

"Na tena"—Then, Bāhiya, when you are "not by that" (or "not thereof")—"not thereof" meaning you do not go on to think in terms of the seen, the heard, the sensed, the thought, or the conceptualized—then, Bāhiya, you are "not therein" (or "not in there"). You are not in the diṭṭha (seen). Let us give an illustration for this too. When a man builds a fine bungalow, what does he do out of great pride? He stands in front of it and has a photographer take a picture. What does this show? The bungalow and the gentleman. When looking at that picture, the person is inside the picture.

In the same way, using this analogy, think: if at any moment you do not give rise to pride regarding that, if there is no grasping through craving (taṇhā), conceit (māna), and views (diṭṭhi)—these words can be understood in this context—if you do not generate defilements in that way, then you are "not therein". You are not inside that diṭṭha (seen). You are not inside that music. That delusion is not there. In the same way, you are not inside what is sensed. They are just as they are, in their respective places. What we expect from the Dhamma preached by the Buddha is the knowledge and vision of things as they really are (yathā-bhūta-ñāṇa-dassana). The Buddha shows the truth as it is. He does not show what is non-existent as existent. The Buddhas appear in the world to show what is non-existent as non-existent, and what is existent as existent. This is exactly what is said here. In the seen there should be only the seen; do not grow anything further upon it. Do not allow its branches and leaves to grow. If you allow them, it will drag you, due to defilements, either to lust, hatred, or delusion, and to various other defilements. Therefore, the Buddha gives a strict training here. Let there be only the measure of the seen in the seen. What happens when it is like that? Then, you are "not thereof". When you are "not thereof", you are also "not therein". When you are "not therein"—here comes the deepest part: yato kho te Bāhiya na tattha, tato tvam Bāhiya nevidha na huram na ubhayamantare, esevvanto dukkhassa. If so, Bāhiya, you are neither here, nor there, nor in between the two. This alone is the end of suffering (dukkha). This is Nibbāna.

Now let us reflect on this—we have to bring the story of the deer in here too. When we reach the state of being trained in that manner, how does the mind understand it? "You are not here." Even the feeling "I am here" disappears. Why? Because the very premise, the concept of "myself" and "others", of "myself" and the "world", which has been carried throughout saṃsāra, is erased by vipassanā wisdom (paññā). Then you are neither here, nor there, nor in between. Now, we said about the deer that it ran a long distance after seeing the mirage and then looked back. Looking back, the mirage was right here. It ran back. When it looked back from here, it was over there. In this way, the deer collapses in exhaustion from running after the mirage. We can state this in two ways. If it goes on running without looking back, it will eventually collapse and die. If it runs back and forth between here and there, it will collapse and die of exhaustion.

Now, dear devotees, think about this. What is being done in this saṃsāra? Most of the time, you perform meritorious deeds not only for this world but for the next world. There is "this world" and "the other world". You perform meritorious deeds to secure something for the next world. That is not bad; it is good. Through merit and wholesome deeds, the mind is purified. But suppose we distribute one oil cake (kāvum) to the monks for the Alms-round. And we wish: "May I receive a thousand oil cakes like this." Well, let us suppose that as a result, we receive ten thousand oil cakes. After that is over, or let us say we are born in a celestial world by the power of that merit. After that merit is exhausted, we have to come back to the human world, cook oil cakes, and give them in charity again. There too, it is just like the work of that deer. There is no satisfaction, no contentment. Here, satisfaction or contentment would mean what is necessary to quench the deer's thirst. What is that? Water. That shimmering heat in the distance looks like water. Therefore, it goes in search of water. It does not get water. It has to come back, because water is seen. Similarly, the saṃsāric being enjoys fivefold sensual pleasures as much as possible in this world. Eating, drinking, dancing, doing everything with the wealth received due to past merit. Yet, one is not satisfied. Therefore, what does one do? Somehow, one distributes at least one oil cake and wishes for ten-million-fold results. But whether that is received or not, one comes back to this very same place. One is running after a mirage.

Now, one should not misunderstand this as a statement against performing meritorious deeds. But there is such a wondrous thing in this Middle Path, the Dhamma of the Buddha. That is why this Dhamma is called a diamond (Vajra-maṇi).

You know what a diamond is. It is a gem that can cut other gems. The Buddha's Dhamma is like that. It cuts through everything. Even the things we hold on to, like meritorious deeds, a time comes when we have to let go of them too. That is what the Buddha deeply declares: do not grasp anything. But this is not something that can be done all at once. First, through virtue (sīla) and other wholesome qualities, one achieves calming to some level. Then, by developing concentration (samādhi) and meditation, the mind is stilled. One does not remain stuck in any of these. One is not satisfied with them. One does not stop, thinking, "Now I am a very virtuous person." One does not stop, thinking, "Now I have attained great concentration and jhānas, I can fly through the air." What is the ultimate thing? Liberation from saṃsāra lies in wisdom (paññā). Therefore, wisdom is compared to a diamond. It cuts through every other gem. It is truly wonderful. It penetrates through everything.

Here too, what was done was a penetration. Why is it said to stop at the seen in the seen—merely the seen? What usually happens? One goes into the seen and gets entangled. We have seen this many times—for instance, a dog on a footbridge—or you might have heard the story of a jackal carrying a piece of meat across a footbridge. Seeing his reflection in the water, he thought another jackal was carrying a piece of meat, let go of his own piece, and jumped in to snatch it. In the same way, being deceived by this diṭṭha (the seen), how much does the saṃsāric being suffer? Because of the wrong understanding and the wrong path of thought generated through this, day and night, based on some sight seen, a person dedicates and sacrifices their entire life, falling into delusion. But they do not understand the true situation. Without making this a riddle, let us say: suppose a person, whether a man or a woman, sees someone they desire. Through the thought generated by this, they lose sleep, and then, even killing others, they try to win that person, and finally fall into the states of deprivation (apāya). Why does all this happen? Because they did not stop at the seen in the seen. They took it to be a "person". They took it to be an "individual". They thought, "This is someone who can be with me forever." But the Arahants of the past, like Bāhiya Dārucīriya, sacrificed their lives for something else. But today, people throw down ladders and do everything for the sake of this saṃsāra. Therefore, we must understand such matters: to "be merely the seen in the seen" means to develop a state of mind that is not deceived by that mirage. In terms of worldly convention (sammuti), we have to use terms like 'things' for our daily activities. But we must penetrate them with wisdom (paññā).

You know what it means to penetrate something. If someone looks at something with a power that penetrates it, even after removing it, it appears just as it is. In this way, it is said that one attains mental liberation (cetto-vimutti) through the power of wisdom (paññā). Therefore, the person who has attained vipassanā wisdom can see that true nature. But they do not end their life on that account; they carry on with other activities. The experience gained through that wisdom is embedded within them. It is embedded inside the mind. So much so, that at the moment of final passing away, like Arahant Bāhiya Dārucīriya, they do not take birth again, having escaped from saṃsāra. They have escaped from those saṃsāric thoughts. Arahant

Bāhiya Dārucīriya broke those thoughts. That is why it is said he attained parinibbāna. Arahants do not die. The word 'die' can be used in the world. But along with the word 'die' goes its counterpart, 'is born'. These go in pairs, in couples. That is what we meant by 'here' and 'there'. There is a 'there' and a 'here'. We have built fences and barriers. When we build them, there is also a 'middle'. That is why it was said, "You are not in the middle either." One might ask, "If I am not here, and if I am not there, I must be in the middle." That is the logic of the world. You know there are parties in the world. Even when thinking about them, it is like that. Either you must be here, or you must be there, or you must be in the middle. Here we have a truly wonderful thing. Bāhiya, you are neither here, nor there, nor in the middle between the two. Why? Because ultimately, even this usage of 'exists' and 'does not exist' comes to an end. Ultimately, in the Buddha's Dhamma, this existence (bhava), which is held in high esteem by every religious teacher in the entire world, is not a real existence, but merely a conceit of existence. It is only an illusion, a delusion, a deception created by the mind.

It is upon this delusion that one runs—between there and here, between the next world and this world, between the human world and the heaven world. In this way, there is no end to this running journey. There is no end to those aspirations. This is what a Buddha introduces to the world. It is for this that Buddhas fulfill the paramis (perfections) for four incalculable aeons and a hundred thousand cosmic cycles. Not to teach some social or political philosophy. Although they spoke of those things in passing, this is the core of the Buddha's teaching.

The secret of escaping from this entire saṃsāra is preached by the Buddha as a skillful means, according to the character and capacity of each individual. If someone understood that skillful means at that moment, through a single verse, they realized Nibbāna. Therefore, you can understand that there is a very great depth in this sermon. It appears deep, in fact, to a person who has not developed the mind through meditation. Bāhiya Dārucīriya might not have been a person with academic degrees. He was a person who lived a hard life after his ship was wrecked in the sea. But relying on the power of the paramis (perfections) accumulated in the past, he attained Arahantship extremely fast through such a short sermon. Therefore, we must understand that worldly knowledge is something that piles up. Subject to it, many people are crushed—living their lives crushed by knowledge. Sometimes, because of knowledge itself, they engage in various cunning deeds and ultimately go to the states of deprivation. It is not knowledge that is truly needed, but wisdom (paññā). Wisdom is a capacity of understanding, something that penetrates. It is like the diamond. It cannot be bought with books, money, or academic degrees. The path to it is virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā).

Now, on this valuable Full Moon Poya day, you have undertaken virtue (sīla)—I believe most of you have. Others too should strive. Meditation means developing the mind. It is not something that belongs only to the monks. Now, this Bāhiya Dārucīriya was wearing bark-garments, he did not even have a robe, yet he attained

Arahantship. In the same way, you must reflect: even though we are in lay life, what we must do is walk on this path of training. Therefore, based on virtue (sīla), having restrained body and speech, we must then still the mind. Primarily, first, a concentration (samādhi), some meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna). For that, sometimes big words are not needed. A single phrase like "May all beings be well and happy" or "Arahant"—stilling one's mind on a wholesome object using such a phrase is what is called concentration (samādhi). If you still the mind in that way, to a great extent, the running of the mind stops. But it is not finished. Going deeper than that is vipassanā wisdom.

Thus, the essence of that is what was contained in the sermon we delivered. In truth, the Buddha has presented the threefold training of virtue, concentration, and wisdom in this sermon in a way that suited Bāhiya's capacity of understanding. We too must gather from this at our own level, in a way that helps our lives. We must think of this entire saṃsāra as a dream. Sometimes, one might feel afraid of this. But think about your own dreams. A dream is real at the time you are dreaming it. Finally, when you wake up, the things that appeared as real in the dream are completely different. Sometimes, what you ate thinking it was delicious food was actually your pillow. It is the same with other things. Those are the dreams seen at night. In truth, think about your entire past. Looking back at the entire past from your childhood, your childhood, youth, achievements—when these elderly gentlemen think about them, aren't they like a dream? The past is like the dream you saw yesterday. Next, let us think about the future, for which we have created these great aspirations. Think of some situation as a dream you will see tonight—that it will appear tonight. Then, what about the little we do today? The word to describe it might be something laughable—like a daydream. Such is this existence (bhava). That is why the Buddha declared the entire saṃsāric existence to be an illusion, a magic trick. The Buddha compared consciousness (viññāṇa) to a mirage or a magician's trick, which shows what is non-existent as existent.

Therefore, according to this Bāhiya Sutta, why do we stop at the seen in the seen? There is nothing to be taken as a 'seen thing'. There is nothing to be taken as a 'heard thing'. Just like what we said about the rainbow, music, and the mirage. But we imagine them. There is a lot of imagining in the world. Without it, according to our conventions (sammuti), we cannot speak. We cannot talk to others in our language of vipassanā. Therefore, conventionally, we have to say "a rainbow is rising" or "it is raining". Think about whether the rain is separate from the raining. "It is raining." Here, the rain is the raining thing. The action is raining. Can we separate these two? We cannot, can we? In the same way, there is only a heap of preparations (saṅkhāra) here. A heap of formations (saṅkhāra). Out of this, we construct a world. Having constructed and fashioned it, we divide it, build fences, and say 'there' and 'here'—this saṃsāric journey is what we do as 'the other world' and 'this world'. This entire saṃsāric existence (bhava) is something that belongs neither to the other world nor to this world. That is why the Buddha preached stopping instead of continuing. Nibbāna means stopping, extinguishment. This is not something pleasing to the ordinary world. The world likes burning and running. To the world that likes burning and running, the invitation to extinguishment and stopping might sometimes be unpleasing. But the Buddhas say only this. The Buddha's teaching is just this. Therefore, stop, be extinguished—it is for this that the Buddha preached such sermons. Those who have stopped and are extinguished in this way are called Arahants.

Thinking in this way, on this valuable Poya day, you listened to a sermon that the ordinary world dismisses as too deep, thinking it cannot be understood in this day and age. But we believe that even though you are village devotees, if you have directed your mind towards meditation, you possess the capacity, at least to some extent, to understand even such sermons. To develop this capacity further in the future, go to those from whom you can get advice, develop all your mental powers as serenity (samatha) and insight (vipassanā). Strive to further develop the faculties (indriya) and powers (bala) of faith (saddhā), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā) generated during this sermon. May you derive the strength and power to escape from this dangerous saṃsāra, to be freed from those thoughts, and to find peace in the supreme deathless Nibbāna in this very life by realizing the paths and fruits of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti), Once-returning (Sakadāgāmi), Non-returning (Anāgāmi), and Arahantship.

Likewise, may the merit we have accumulated today through this Dhamma sermon, and the merit accumulated through listening to the Dhamma, be shared with the guardian deities and Brahmas of the Dispensation, and with all beings from the Avīci hell up to the Akaniṭṭha heaven, including our departed relatives. May they all rejoice in this merit, and by rejoicing, may they all realize peace in the supreme deathless Nibbāna through their aspired mode of enlightenment (bodhi). Dedicate the merits by reciting the verses in this manner.

From:

Verse 126 from the Pāpavagga (Chapter on Evil) of the Dhammapada

Dear Listeners,

Between kamma and rebirth, there exists a kind of circular relationship. A sentient being who obtains birth (jāti) as a turn of result (vipāka) submits to and is governed by that very momentum of kamma when accumulating kamma once again, and by acting accordingly, prolongs saṃsāra. It is only by relying on the power of the Dhamma that one can appease the force of kamma and escape from saṃsāra. The Teacher of the Three Worlds, the Buddha, explained to the world that however powerful the wheel of kamma (kamma-cakka) may be, in the end, the wheel of Dhamma (Dhamma-cakka) triumphs. Today, these meritorious devotees will get to hear certain facts relevant to this matter from both the verse we have chosen as our theme and its background story (nidāna-kathā).

It is said that an Arahant Thero residing in Jetavana monastery went for alms (piṇḍapāta) to the house of a certain jeweler for twelve long years. That jeweler and his wife, placing this venerable monk in the position of their own parents, attended to all his needs and made offerings in this manner. One day, when this venerable monk arrived at the jeweler's house, the jeweler was slicing meat. At that very moment, while this venerable monk was looking on, a messenger arrived from King Kosala carrying a gem, saying, "The King has ordered to clean, pierce, and send this gem back." Since the jeweler was slicing meat, he took the gem with his blood-stained hands, placed it on top of a box, and went to wash his hands. There was a pet crane kept in this house. Attracted by the smell of blood, this bird, thinking the gem was a piece of meat, swallowed it while the Thero was watching.

When the jeweler returned from inside the house and looked, the gem was missing. Then he asked his wife and children if they had taken the gem. After they said they had not taken it, he went inside the house and discussed with them: "Without a doubt, it must be this monk who took it." His wife said, "Oh, do not say such a thing. For all this time, over twelve years, we have never seen any fault in this venerable monk." But the jeweler did not listen to this. He came out and asked the Arahant, "Now, who took the gem that was here? Did you take it, Venerable Sir?" "No, I did not take it," replied the monk. "No one else was here. It must have been you, Venerable Sir, who took it. Give me that gem," he said.

The venerable monk was helpless. Then, the jeweler went inside the house again and discussed with his wife: "Undoubtedly, it is this monk himself who took it. I must torture him if necessary to find out." "Oh, please do not do that! We will be destroyed if you do. It would be better for our entire family to become slaves to the King instead," she said. Then the jeweler said, "Even if we all became slaves, it would not cover the value of this gem." Persisting in his view, he went out and bound the head of the venerable monk with a cord. Having bound it, he tightened it using a wooden stick like a tourniquet. Gradually inflicting pain, he then asked him if he took the gem. As he tightened it more and more, blood began to flow from the venerable monk's nose and ears—and also from his mouth—and unable to bear the pain, the venerable monk collapsed to the ground. When the pet crane came near, drawn by the smell of blood, and prepared to drink the blood, the jeweler, in his intense rage towards the venerable monk, shouted, “What are you doing here?” and kicked the crane. The animal died on the spot and fell flat on its back. The venerable monk saw this. Seeing it, he said, “Lay devotee, please loosen this binding a little. Loosen it and see if that bird is dead.” “May you die just like it!” said the jeweler. Then the venerable monk understood that the animal was indeed dead. Thereupon he said, “Lay devotee, this bird swallowed the gem. I did not say so because it would cause the death of this animal. Even if I were to die, I would not have said it. But now that this animal is dead, I am telling you.”

Thereupon, when the jeweler slit open the bird's belly and looked, there was the gem. Instantly, a great sense of spiritual urgency (saṃvega) arose in him. He came and fell prostrate at the feet of the venerable monk, pleading, “Oh, please forgive me for what I have done out of ignorance.” Then the venerable monk said, “Lay devotee, this is neither your fault nor my fault. This is a flaw of saṃsāra, a flaw of saṃsāra, a fault of saṃsāra. Therefore, I forgive you.” Then the lay devotee said, “Venerable Sir, if you forgive me, please accept alms at this house as before.” Then the monk replied, “No, lay devotee. I understand the disadvantage (ādīnava) of this—this happened because of entering inside houses, of going under the roof of a house. This kind of thing. Therefore, as long as there is strength in my legs, I will walk for alms (piṇḍapāta.)” Saying this, he undertook a dhutaṅga (ascetic practice) at that very moment, reciting a certain verse related to that dhutaṅga practice:

“Pavattati munino bhattaṃ, thoka-thokaṃ kule kule, piṇḍikāya carissāmi, atthi jaṅghābalaṃ mama.”

“For the silent sage who goes on alms-round, rice is cooked little by little in various houses. As long as I still have strength in my legs, I will walk for alms.” He expressed it in this manner. Even though he said so, not long after, the venerable monk attained final passing away / extinguishment (Nibbāna*) due to the injuries he had sustained. Furthermore, it is said that after some time, the jeweler and his wife also passed away. After they had died in this manner, the bhikkhus asked the Buddha where the people involved in this incident were reborn. It was on that occasion that the Buddha uttered the verse we have chosen as our theme. Here it is said that the crane—perhaps because it was associated with the household—was reborn in the womb of the jeweler's wife. Then, when they had all died, the question arose; after her death, the jeweler's wife was reborn in a heavenly world. The jeweler was reborn in hell (niraya), because he had inflicted fatal torture upon an Arahant, leading to the venerable monk's final passing away. The verse revealing this very fact is what we have placed as our theme:

“Gabbhameke uppajjanti, nirayaṃ pāpakammino,

Saggaṃ sugatino yanti, parinibbanti anāsavā.”

“Some are born in a mother's womb; evil-doers are born in hell (niraya); those of good conduct, who tread the good path, go to heaven, born in the celestial world; the anāsavā—the taints-free ones, the Arahants who are freed from taints—attain final passing away.” This is all that is expressed in this verse. So this is the story. What this verse actually demonstrates is how various individuals obtain birth (jāti) according to their respective kamma. Now, as we usually do, let us try to extract the advice, Dhamma-teachings, and Dhamma principles that can be drawn from this story and this verse.

This story is indeed a very moving one, a story that evokes a sense of spiritual urgency (saṃvega). On one hand, it is a story about a jeweler who did not recognize the true gem. On the other hand, it is a story about an Arahant who, for twelve years, went to the very same house to undergo the kamma-result of a grave kamma he had committed in the past. Thus, this story is about a monk who had become intimately associated (the word kulūpaga is used here, meaning “intimately associated with a family”) with the jeweler's household, coming there for twelve years. Such was his close association. Yet, because of a suspicion that arose in a single moment, the jeweler acted in such a way as to subject the Arahant to severe torture and bring about his death. From this too, we can reflect on something. When this venerable monk arrived, the jeweler was slicing meat. Based on this, we can understand how extremely easy it is to transition from one blood-dripping task to another blood-dripping task. The jeweler's inclination to inflict such severe torture did not appear to him as something very grave. The gem was far greater to him. He did not understand the value of the Saṅgha. He failed to recognize the highly virtuous venerable monk, the Arahant, who had been visiting him for twelve years. The gem sent by the King was far more important to him. So, we can reflect on one aspect of it from that.

Next, at the same time, we understand that there was a certain grave kamma destined to ripen for this venerable monk. When we look at it, there is a series of dramatic events here. Often, when the results of kamma have to be experienced, even in modern times we see how a multitude of events align in a strange manner. Now, here, when the venerable monk arrived on that day, the jeweler was slicing meat. Then came this message from the King, the story of the gem. Then the pet crane was also there. All of these came together, and in the end, the Arahant suffered that fatal injury—or rather, had to attain final passing away—due to his own kamma. It was for this very reason, understanding this, that when the jeweler begged for forgiveness, the Arahant, while forgiving him in an extremely virtuous manner, said, “This is neither your fault, nor is it my fault; it is the fault of saṃsāra (saṃsāra-dosa)." The “fault of saṃsāra” means that one must experience the results of the kamma one has committed. Kamma-results must be paid off. That is the lesson we must draw from this. Along with that, the vast store of virtues of this venerable monk also becomes clear to us. What existed as a minor defect was, as mentioned before, being intimately associated (kulūpaga). The meaning within the term “close association” (kulūpaga)—now, in the lay world, close association is considered a good term. But for the Saṅgha, close association is a fault. Therefore, it was indeed because of this that the venerable monk, realizing his error and understanding the disadvantage (ādīnava) of close association, resolved to go for alms, to go from house to house for alms.

In any case, we can see the noble qualities of this venerable monk. Even though he was in such fatal pain, he did not give evidence against the pet crane. Not out of fear of anyone, but because it would violate his precept. Knowing that it would result in the decay and death (jarāmaraṇa) of a living being, he did not offer evidence in that way. At the risk of his own life, out of compassion for that animal, he remained silent about the truth. There is a precious virtue there. Similarly, he did not harbor any ill-will (dosa / anger) toward the jeweler who tortured him. Such a valuable treasure of virtues is made clear through the life of that monk. Next, if we examine this even more mindfully, what we see through this is kamma and its result (vipāka). This is also what is expressed in the verse. Some are born in a mother's womb. Some, in that manner, in hell (niraya). Now, here, hell became the destiny of the jeweler. We can also see the difference between the two; of the two, because the wife had deep faith (saddhā), she did not condone his actions. Due to her faith in the venerable monk, she did not approve of what her husband was going to do. It is said that because of that abundance of virtue and the service she had rendered, she obtained birth (jāti) in a heavenly world. Next, as for the Arahant, we all know that whatever happens, his final passing away is what takes place. After that, there is no birth (jāti). But through this story, we can see the relationship between kamma and its result, or rather, between kamma and becoming (bhava) or rebirth.

This law of kamma is an astonishingly powerful cosmic order (niyāma), so powerful that not even Buddhas and Arahants can bypass it. It is a natural law operating in this world. Therefore, one must actually accept this saṃsāric truth and strive to live accordingly. During the time of the Buddha, there were various teachers who did not believe in kamma, who did not believe in the results of kamma. Even in modern times, there might be people with such opinions and views. Therefore, especially in these times, this is a matter we must repeatedly remind ourselves of during these Dhamma sermons. There are various ideologies in the world that do not care about this world or the next. But if we reflect according to the Dhamma of the Buddha, depending on our conduct, according to the good or bad nature of the kamma we perform, we will obtain another becoming (bhava) or birth (jāti). Whether we experience pleasure or suffering (dukkha) in that rebirth is decided by the wholesome (kusala) or unwholesome (akusala) nature of that kamma.

Thus, we must also contemplate this matter: in what way is the mind tempted to perform an evil action when we act? Now, we all know that there are three trainings (sikkhā) in this Dispensation: Virtue (sīla), Concentration (samādhi), and Wisdom (paññā). Let us reflect on what the ultimate purpose of these is. Now, when an action has to be performed at any given moment, that very present moment is of utmost importance because, as we said at the very beginning, we carry certain habits from our saṃsāric past. Due to repeatedly performing the same kamma, there are times when a person who has done evil deeds is compelled to submit and act in the very same way again. These can be subdued only by being mindful of the present moment. To put it briefly, the reason why the Buddha declared, “Cetanāhaṃ bhikkhave kammaṃ vadāmi” (“Intention, O monks, is what I call kamma”), is because it is in that brief moment of intention (cetanā) that we can do something about the activity of this kamma. This is an extremely important thing—this present moment. What was done in the past is done. Its result (vipāka) will come. Even when that result arrives, if at the moment of its arrival our stance, our determination, is inclined toward a good direction, then at that moment we can act with clarity and understanding. We can act with responsibility. We can act in a way that directs our saṃsāric journey toward a good path. Now, seeing the very same event, the jeweler acted in one way. His wife acted in another way. The monk, the Arahant, acted in yet another way—in an extremely noble and sublime manner. It was a difficult situation. But such things can be triumphed over only if one is established in a firm stance. Only if one has cultivated a certain attitude beforehand. Meritorious friends, it is precisely for this purpose that there is such a thing called Virtue (sīla).

Now, some people say that this virtue, meditation, and other such practices are unnecessary. When we examine this deeply, what is actually taking place here? In our day-to-day lives, when various situations arise, we can make the right decision at that moment only if we possess a good stance, such as a strong determination or a resolution of virtue (sīla). A scattered mind is easily dragged into the kamma of others. That is something we must keep in mind. A person with a scattered mind, who has no stance and no wholesome attitude, is easily dragged into the kamma of others and goes to places like hell (niraya). Why? Because this society, this world, is a place where each individual operates according to the momentum of the kamma they have brought with them. When you look at it, this is exactly like a puppet show. To a Buddha, to an Arahant, to those who have attained higher psychic knowledges (abhiññā), this appears just like a puppet show. Various things happen in accordance with past kamma, according to those results. But in the face of those, if we control that brief moment of intention (cetanā), that present moment, then we have won. What helps us in this is Virtue (sīla). Even on this occasion, these meritorious devotees undertook a set of precepts (sikkhāpada). What is achieved by that? A certain command was given to the mind, to wisdom (paññā), to intellect. A determination was made: “I will protect this precept.” With that, one can act with a principle, keeping that principle in mind. These meritorious devotees may have heard of sāmpaṭṭa-virati (abstinence when opportunity arises) as one of the benefits of virtue (sīla). When the moment to commit a wrong deed arrives, one receives the strength to abstain from it through the determination of virtue (sīla). “I have undertaken such a precept, haven't I? If I am to protect it, acting in this way is not right.” Thus, on one hand, virtue (sīla) helps us in such situations, preventing us from getting entangled in the kamma of others, and protecting us by prioritizing our noble practice. Even more, it assists at a higher level in what is called Concentration (samādhi). Concentration means the stilling of the mind. Making the mind concentrated means obtaining a certain tranquility. It means removing the scattered nature of the mind, which is called the hindrances (nīvaraṇa-dhamma). It is easy for a one-pointed mind to make a decision. It can make a wholesome decision. Likewise, for one who has reached a state like equanimity (upekkhā) in concentration, they can respond to the questions that arise in a way that fits their lifestyle even more highly, in accordance with the Dhamma.

Next, the level higher than that is Wisdom (paññā). Virtue, Concentration, Wisdom. It is this Wisdom (paññā) that is demonstrated and polished in the life of that Arahant Thero. Through that insight wisdom (vipassanā-paññā), or rather, the wisdom obtained through Path-knowledge (magga-ñāṇa), one receives a special strength to protect oneself when these situations of kamma occur. The highest state is found there. Guided by the equanimity (upekkhā) that exists in the minds of the Arahants, they are able to triumph over such situations. So that is what Virtue, Concentration, and Wisdom are. It is worth reminding those who present such false views (micchā-diṭṭhi) that these are practically helpful to us in our daily lives.

Now, to explain this so that we can understand it even more practically in our daily lives: let us assume that you, meritorious devotees, bought a new car—a vehicle. Somehow or other, you also learned to drive it to some extent. Even if you have practiced, if you take it out onto the road and drive while ignoring the vehicles driven by others and ignoring the rules of the road, where will you end up? Even if you barely escape with your life, you might have to go to court and pay compensation for damaging other people's vehicles. You will have to face a multitude of such troubles. Therefore, you must keep the rules of the road. Next, you must drive this vehicle not while drunk, but with good mindfulness and clear comprehension, with very clear thinking. You must also drive this vehicle with a certain concentration (samādhi). Furthermore, in sudden emergencies, such as when others are about to crash into your vehicle, you must also have developed the wisdom (paññā), the intelligence, to think quickly and act in an instant. Thus, even for something like driving a vehicle in daily life, a certain level of Virtue, Concentration, and Wisdom is required. Do not misunderstand this. I am not over-simplifying this profound Dhamma; I mentioned this merely as an ordinary illustration. In daily life, it is by being established in a certain virtue that one goes onto the road. One must know the side of the road that belongs to oneself. It is just like what was said about the bad destination (duggati) and the good destination (sugati). If you steer your vehicle into the wrong lane, that is the end of it right there. It will plunge down a precipice and ultimately be destroyed. Likewise, you might crash into other vehicles and get into various conflicts. Such is the nature of a single second in this world.

What we have here is a society complicated by the kamma-momentums brought by each individual. It is not the society that appears on the surface. At any given moment, each individual behaves in ways we do not expect. It is like the puppet show mentioned earlier. Now, that jeweler who, for twelve long years, had placed himself in the position of a parent and attended to that monk, went to hell because of a grave kamma committed in a brief moment, which bound him to a deadly kamma (ānantarika-kamma) that blocked all his wholesome merits. We can realize that no matter how good or decent we may be, if we do not possess these virtues like Virtue, Concentration, and Wisdom within us, we will have to reap terrible consequences from an unwholesome act (akusala) committed in a single brief moment, just like what happened to the jeweler. This is the very essence of the Dhamma taught by the Buddha. Virtue, Concentration, and Wisdom mean: the initial step of taming body and speech, stilling the mind, and then, Wisdom means the correct understanding of the world and life—by properly comprehending the Three Characteristics of Impermanent (Anicca), suffering (dukkha), and Not-self (Anattā), one appeases all these kamma-momentums at various levels, and finally, through the wheel of Dhamma, breaks the wheel of kamma, triumphs over the wheel of kamma, and brings this saṃsāric journey to an end; this is what is called attaining Arahantship, when viewed from the perspective of wisdom and the Paths and Fruits (magga-phala).

Now, if we think further about this, the Buddha himself has declared a certain analysis concerning kamma. Since it is also relevant to this story, let us present it on this occasion. The Buddha presented various analyses of kamma on different occasions. In one place, he shows, “Monks, there are four kinds of kamma.” If we express them in simple terms, they are easy to understand:

1. There is dark kamma with dark results.
2. There is bright kamma with bright results.
3. There is dark-and-bright kamma with dark-and-bright results.
4. There is neither-dark-nor-bright kamma with neither-dark-nor-bright results.

In this way, four kinds of kamma are shown. The Buddha explains each one of them in the following manner.

“Dark kamma with dark results” refers especially to the five heinous deeds (ānantarika-kamma). These meritorious devotees may have heard of them: killing one's mother, killing one's father, killing an Arahant, drawing the blood of a Tathāgata with a malicious mind, and causing a schism in the Saṅgha. If one commits these five heinous deeds, one is definitely reborn in hell (niraya). Therefore, what is meant here by “dark kamma” is that if someone performs bodily, verbal, or mental actions of an oppressive nature, they obtain birth (jāti) in an oppressive place. Here, hell (niraya) is specifically referred to. It is purely full of suffering (dukkha). That is why it is dark. The kamma is dark, and the kamma-result is also dark. When one is born in such a place, it is said that oppressive contacts (phassa) contact that person. When we look at this, a wonderful phrasing is used. All of this is done by the machinery of kamma. And due to those oppressive contacts (phassa), that person is caught in a multitude of absolute painful feelings (vedanā). It is in this way that the Blessed One demonstrates the meaning of the phrase, ‘‘Kammadāyādā sattā’’ (‘‘Beings are heirs to their kamma’’). By that statement, it is shown that to everyone, to every being, kamma is their inheritance. That is to say, if someone commits a dark kamma that brings dark results, they obtain birth (jāti) in places like hell (niraya). Once reborn, they must, in whatever way, experience contacts (phassa) that correspond to it—oppressive contacts that bring painful feelings (vedanā). That is dark kamma.

Next, ‘‘bright kamma that brings bright results.’’ What are those? They are explained—and demonstrated there—as the ten wholesome courses of action (dasa-kusala-kamma). Abstaining from the ten unwholesome actions: killing living beings, stealing, sexual misconduct; and regarding speech, which is relevant to the virtue (sīla) undertaken on this occasion: lying, slandering, harsh speech, and frivolous talk; next, abandoning the unwholesome states of covetousness, ill-will, and wrong view (micchā-diṭṭhi), and cultivating wholesome minds—this is what is called bright kamma. In that very same way, one who has performed bright kamma goes and obtains birth (jāti) in a place of absolute happiness, such as the Subhakiṇha Brahma world—speaking of the highest level there. Thus, by performing bright kamma, one is reborn in a place that brings bright results.

Next, ‘‘dark-and-bright kamma’’ refers to a mixture of those; that is, performing bad kamma of that kind, and at the same time, performing wholesome deeds (kusala) occasionally. The places where those who have acted in this mixed manner are reborn are mentioned as the human world, certain heavenly worlds, and also certain lower realms where there is not pure suffering (dukkha), but occasionally some happiness as well—pleasant feelings (vedanā) that can be called happy. In that way, the Buddha shows the third category there. It is mixed: dark-and-bright kamma with dark-and-bright results.

Fourthly, he shows—and this is the deepest one—neither-dark-nor-bright kamma with neither-dark-nor-bright results. This is special. These are identified as those which help to destroy all kamma. That kamma—neither-dark-nor-bright kamma—helps to conquer all kamma. This is explained as follows: if someone, in accordance with the Dhamma, arouses an intention (cetanā) to abandon the dark kamma with dark results, to abandon the bright kamma with bright results, and to abandon the dark-and-bright kamma with dark-and-bright results—briefly, the intention aroused to destroy all kamma—that is what is known there as neither-dark-nor-bright kamma. That is to say, to identify it briefly, it is the Noble Eightfold Path, the Middle Way. It is the Middle Path (majjhimā paṭipadā) that leads to Nibbāna which the Buddha shows there.

In another place, this very same concept of the Eightfold Path is explained as the seven factors of enlightenment (satta bojjhaṅga). Whether one cultivates these enlightenment factors called the satta bojjhaṅga, or cultivates the Eightfold Path at a supramundane (lokuttara) level, what ultimately happens? One is able to escape from the entire wheel of kamma consisting of merit and demerit, wholesomeness and unwholesomeness, through four stages: Stream-entry (Sotāpanna), Once-returning (Sakadāgāmi), Non-returning (Anāgāmi), and Arahantship—which these meritorious devotees have heard of. To put it briefly, the power of the wheel of kamma is broken by destroying its cause. As for formations (saṅkhāra), in the Dhamma of Dependent Co-arising (paṭicca-samuppāda), it is said, “avijjā-paccayā saṅkhārā” (“with ignorance as condition, formations arise”). It is due to ignorance (avijjā) that these formations (saṅkhāra) arise. The very word ‘kamma’ is expressed here in a subtle way as these formations (saṅkhāra). If we consider ignorance (avijjā), it is based on the notion of “I” and “mine” that all wholesomeness or unwholesomeness, merit or demerit, takes place. Therefore, if we are to eliminate them, we must eliminate that ignorance (avijjā). What helps us in this is the Middle Path, the Noble Eightfold Path. Or, from another perspective, the cultivation of the seven factors of enlightenment (bojjhaṅga): mindfulness (sati), investigation of states (dhamma-vicaya), energy (viriya), joy (pīti), tranquility (passaddhi), concentration (samādhi), and equanimity (upekkhā). That is the special message that a Buddha gives to the world. There are various opinions among different teachers in the world regarding whether a Buddha is born or not. Only a Buddha declares the path that can break this cycle. That is why the fourth category mentioned here is of paramount importance: neither-dark-nor-bright kamma with neither-dark-nor-bright results. It conquers both wholesomeness and unwholesomeness.

Now, when this is said, some people might misunderstand it. They might think: “In that case, meritorious deeds are not necessary. We do not need to think about wholesomeness or unwholesomeness.” But one cannot escape like that. This is an extremely subtle point. Many people get confused here too. That is why, when declaring the Dhamma, the Buddha reminded us that some people grasp wrong views (micchā-diṭṭhi) as if they were grasping a snake by its tail. What we have here is a middle way. There is a certain sutta discourse where the Buddha has presented this middle way most beautifully. On one occasion, a certain deity came and asked the Buddha, “Venerable Sir, how did you cross over the flood?” By “flood,” the deity used a term that these meritorious devotees might have heard of in Dhamma analyses: the word ogha (flood). There are four such floods that sweep beings away in saṃsāra: the flood of sensuality (kāmogha), the flood of becoming / existence (bhavogha), the flood of views (diṭṭhogha), and the flood of ignorance (avijjāgha). That is to say, sensual thoughts flow like a great torrent and sweep beings away. Next, the desire for existence in becoming (bhava), craving for becoming (bhava)—craving (taṇhā) for becoming (bhava). Beings get caught in various views and are swept away. Lastly, ignorance (avijjā)—unknowing. All of these are shown as floods—the four saṃsāric floods that sweep beings away.

While being swept away by these four floods, the deity asked the Buddha how he crossed over them. The Buddha gave an extremely brief answer: “Friend, I crossed over the flood by not halting and by not straining.” “By not halting, and by not straining, I crossed over the flood,” he replied. When asked for further details on how that was, he said, “Friend, when I halted, I sank; when I strained, I was swept away. Therefore, it was by not halting and by not straining that I crossed over the flood.” This, meritorious friends, is that middle path. Now, think of a situation where one is being swept toward a sluice gate, or caught in a whirlpool. If you just let yourself go, one of those things will happen. If you struggle frantically without trying to escape in the proper way, you will still be swept away. You either go under, or you get carried away. Such is the situation regarding this kamma. That is to say, regarding these questions about kamma, one must look at it this way: those unwholesome evil deeds indeed yield results for the saṃsāric being. We cannot say they do not exist. Therefore, they must be conquered through wholesome deeds (kusala). This is the middle path. In place of the unwholesome (akusala), the wholesome (kusala) must be cultivated. In place of demerit, merit must be made. By doing so, one must arrive at a certain firm stance. A certain concentration (samādhi)—briefly, a concentrated mind—can be obtained only if one protects those virtues like Virtue (sīla). What is found in virtues like Virtue (sīla) is precisely this: distinguishing and understanding wholesome and unwholesome, understanding merit and demerit, and treading that path of wholesomeness. Therefore, these cannot be cast aside. If one breaks, shatters, and destroys the raft before crossing over, there is no crossing over for that person.

Therefore, what is called the middle path here involves neither halting nor going to one extreme. If one does that, one might go to that extreme called kāmasukhallikānuyoga (indulgence in sensual pleasures), thinking, “We can live however we want and enjoy ourselves.” Otherwise, if one goes to the opposite side, one begins to strain frantically, like attakilamathānuyoga (self-mortification). There are people who go to such an extreme that, like the Nigaṇṭhas (Jains) who believed all knots must be untied, they even untie the knots of their clothes and go naked. Those are the two extremes that the Buddha has pointed out. Halting is kāmasukhallikānuyoga—indulging in the five cords of sensual pleasure as one pleases, without any regard for wholesomeness, unwholesomeness, or virtues. The other extreme is... these meritorious devotees may have heard of those who lived in the past, close to the practice of the Nigaṇṭhas, living like dogs (canine vow) or living like cattle (bovine vow). Undertaking various vows, they believed they would find liberation through them. Those who live by adopting various such false views and vows of virtue (sīlabbata) are at that other extreme. Instead of those, what the Buddha points out is that, with the help of Virtue (sīla), one cultivates Concentration (samādhi). Without halting there either, with the help of Concentration, one next mindfully sees the Three Characteristics of Impermanent (Anicca), suffering (dukkha), and Not-self (Anattā), thereby raising Wisdom (paññā). Meritorious friends, to raise Wisdom simply means the destruction of that ignorance (avijjā). If indeed it is because of ignorance (avijjā) that all these formations (saṅkhāra), regarded as wholesome and unwholesome, arise in this mind-stream, then the path to the stilling of those formations (saṅkhāra) is actually the special message that the Buddha introduced to the world. That is why this path is called the path of stilling these formations (saṅkhāra).

Now, there are two aspects to what is called Right View (sammā-diṭṭhi). Many people speak about it without proper understanding. One aspect of this Right View is kammassakkatā sammā-diṭṭhi (Right View of the ownership of kamma). Standing on that firm ground that “kamma is one's own,” one acts in a way that allows them to face it. Therefore, one must live with a correct understanding of merit and demerit, wholesomeness and unwholesomeness, living with eyes wide open. Why? Because otherwise, one will fall into those terrible bad destinations (duggati) and saṃsāra will be prolonged, and one will become unable to raise one's head again. That is why it is called kammassakkatā—the feeling that “it is mine.” Why is it said that “kamma is one's own”? One cannot escape by simply saying “there is no self/person.” Because it is with the feeling of “I” that those actions are committed. Its result (vipāka) will definitely come. And the turn of its result also comes based on that very “I”. It is like a kind of “responsibility.” Responsibility is something one has taken upon oneself. It is by taking responsibility as “I” that a person engages in those evil deeds. Correspondingly, that kamma flows back to that person. That is why kamma is said to be “one's own,” “one's kinsman, one's refuge.” One must not misunderstand by bringing Not-self (Anattā) close to this level. That is one level. To put it briefly, that is the side of arising (samudaya-pakkha) of the saṃsāric being. Now, there are two things: arising and ceasing. Out of these, the saṃsāric being is always on the side of arising (samudaya). Arising means coming into being. They are always trying to produce, to acquire, to renew. The entire saṃsāric existence, instead of acknowledging impermanence—forgetting impermanence—is an effort to create the notion that the world is permanent. The perception of permanence (nicca-saññā). What must be done to generate the feeling that the world is permanent? One must forget that these things are decaying and passing away, and instead, by renewing them, bring up the notion that “each of these is eternal.” The sense of “I-ness” also runs on that. Consequently, one is bound to experience the results of the kamma performed accordingly. That is inevitable.

Thus, the other side is the supramundane (lokuttara) side. What is that side? That side looks toward cessation (nirodha). The noble disciple (āriya-sāvaka) faces the side of cessation (nirodha). The ordinary worldling (puthujjana), on the other hand, faces the side of arising (samudaya). To put it another way, no matter how much suffering (dukkha) they experience today, everyone is living as if they think: “Tomorrow morning will be better.” Even if this life is spent, they wish for another life: “I could not fulfill my hopes in this life, but in the next life I will be able to.”

Saṃsāra is precisely this kind of journey driven by ignorance (avijjā) and craving (taṇhā). That is living on the side of arising (samudaya). The law of kamma affects such a person. Therefore, one must accept it and try to live according to it. Otherwise, one will have to experience results in a much more dangerous state. Next, escaping from this—the way to escape is not by committing extreme attempts like those Nigaṇṭhas, who subjected their bodies to various tortures, thinking, “I will wear out past kamma by this suffering, and I will perform no more kamma,” wearing muzzles, or even discarding their clothes and acting in that manner.

The Buddha has shown that these momentums of kamma can be appeased only through Wisdom (paññā), only by destroying ignorance (avijjā). It cannot be done by other methods. Nor can all this kamma be completely worn out by experiencing it. This destruction of kamma is said to be accomplished by that fourth, neither-dark-nor-bright kamma mentioned here. The “destruction of kamma” is like... now, these meritorious devotees have heard that a person [a Stream-enterer] is reborn at most seven times. How does that happen? Based on the power obtained through that Path-knowledge of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-magga-ñāṇa), due to the force of the defilements (kilesa) cut off by it, and by that power, the person who has become a Stream-enterer becomes incapable of performing kamma that could lead to the lower realms (apāya). Rebirth in the lower realms is caused by kamma performed with view of existing group/body (Sakkāya-diṭṭhi). Now, view of existing group/body (Sakkāya-diṭṭhi) is the most gross, coarse aspect of the notions of “I” and “mine.” That layer of ignorance (avijjā) is shattered by Path-knowledge (magga-ñāṇa). That is why that person cannot go to the lower realms. To put it briefly, they are freed from the lower realms. Next, as a direct result of the reduction of that sense of “I-ness,” their rebirths are limited to at most seven times. In that way, the Buddha solves this problem. This is the middle path. That is why it was said, “by not halting and by not straining.” These questions are solved through Wisdom (paññā), not through other artificial methods. For, the wheel of kamma in this saṃsāra is that dangerous. Even to Arahants and Buddhas, this kamma yields results. But that is only regarding the body they have brought with them; even those noble ones whom we call Arahants and Buddhas arose in this world due to a certain force of kamma. Correspondingly, they have to experience those results. But it ends right there. After that, they do not obtain birth (jāti) again. It is to solve that problem that the Buddha has pointed out the Paths and Fruits (magga-phala). That is: Stream-entry with at most seven rebirths; next, Once-returning, coming back to this world only once; then, Non-returning, being born in the Brahma world, staying there for a certain period, and attaining Arahantship and final passing away. Those Arahants, Buddhas, and Paccekabuddhas who attained it in this very world do not obtain birth (jāti) again. Saying “they do not obtain rebirth again” means that they have destroyed that accumulated mass of kamma.

So that is the solution presented by the Buddha. We must contemplate these matters with wisdom and understand them. Otherwise, those wrong views (micchā-diṭṭhi) mentioned will arise—that is, “saṃsāra grows through both merit and demerit; through both merit and demerit, or rather, through every wholesome and unwholesome deed, saṃsāra is prolonged.” “Therefore, we do not need to be keen on merit. As for demerit—there is no question about it anyway. It happens naturally. But the difficult thing is making merit and doing wholesome deeds; we do not need to trouble ourselves about them. If we do, saṃsāra will be prolonged.” Look, that is a wrong grasp. It is like grasping the snake by its tail. The Buddha has shown the way it should be done. As mentioned earlier, through Virtue (sīla), one tames body and speech at a practical level. What is the result obtained from that? It is the blameless happiness (anavajja-sukha), the absence of remorse. With the help of that, one next cultivates Concentration (samādhi). One does not linger in that Concentration either. That, too, is something that prolongs becoming (bhava). The Buddha does not grasp onto that either. Instead, with the help of Concentration, using that stilled, one-pointed mind, one sees through the Three Characteristics. The special vision that a Buddha presents to the world is Insight (vipassanā): the Three Characteristics of Impermanent (Anicca), suffering (dukkha), and Not-self (Anattā). That too can be understood through insight if there is a good concentration. It is through that level of insight, after insight has been significantly developed, and through the penetration of the Paths and Fruits (magga-phala), through that seeing through, that one understands: “There is no entity called ‘I’. There is nothing here to grasp as ‘I-ness’.” Once that understanding is attained, or rather, once the Dhamma of Dependent Co-arising (paṭicca-samuppāda) is fully understood, then from that person, no unwholesome or wholesome deeds driven by that view of existing group/body (Sakkāya-diṭṭhi) are performed. That is the solution the Buddha points out.

Here we have placed as our theme a verse that speaks briefly about becoming (bhava). But we must realize that this saṃsāric being obtains various rebirths based on that distinction between wholesomeness and unwholesomeness, based on merit and demerit. It is an eternal natural law (dhamma-tā). Furthermore, one is easily tempted precisely toward those evil deeds. Because one is easily tempted, we must establish a certain stance, we must make a firm determination. Otherwise, one will automatically be dragged into them. One will be dragged into the kamma of others. By being dragged in that way, one will have to suffer in terrible realms like the lower worlds (apāya). Therefore, a certain level of Virtue (sīla) is necessary. Even in Virtue, a virtue cultivated over a long period is much stronger. A virtue practiced for a short time has less strength. That is why you, meritorious devotees, say you “undertake precepts” (sīla), or rather, say you “protect the Five Precepts (pañcasīla)” that belong to you. Undertaking them, you make a determination. Having determined, you reflect upon them. Having reflected, when the time comes to face situations that challenge them, you bring forward the mental factor of abstinence (virati-cetasika) as sampatta-virati (abstinence when opportunity arises) to avoid the situation. The mind of detachment. That mind of detachment is extremely helpful to escape from such dangerous situations. Next, it is through the strength built by that Virtue (sīla) that one is able to develop Concentration (samādhi).

When you contemplate in this manner, these meritorious devotees will be able to understand the true meaning of the middle path pointed out by the Buddha. Next, through all of this, we must contemplate the nature of these formations (saṅkhāra). This existence created by the very mind called formations (saṅkhāra)—correspondingly, those worlds exist. The Buddha has shown that sometimes separate worlds arise accordingly. It is said that at the end of an aeon (kappa), separate Brahma mansions arise for certain individuals. From this, we can see how powerful this mind is—this accumulation of kamma performed by our mind. And underlying this is that very ignorance (avijjā) mentioned earlier. Like a darkness, that ignorance (avijjā), by creating the delusion of “I” and “mine” due to its dark nature, tempts the world into this kind of activity. If one is to escape from it, one must gradually, in the manner mentioned, utilize these—Virtue, Concentration, and Wisdom—neither casting them aside nor clinging to them, but with a balanced attitude. In certain places, this is compared to a journey by seven chariots. In those days, unlike today, if there was an urgent journey, several horse chariots were stationed at various points. One travels in one chariot and gets into the next when the horses of the first get tired. From that, one gets into another. Changing through seven horse chariots in this manner, the simile is given of King Pasenadi of Kosala traveling in an emergency from Sāvatthī to Sāketa. In that very same way, the Buddha has shown each stage of purification (visuddhi) here. With the help of Virtue (sīla), one develops purification of mind (citta-visuddhi). With the help of purification of mind, one develops purification of view (diṭṭhi-visuddhi). Passing through a sequence of seven stages of purification in this manner, one is finally able to attain the states of the Paths and Fruits (magga-phala).

From this, we can reflect on how wonderful the middle path shown by the Buddha is. The ordinary world cannot find a way to escape from this saṃsāra. Why? Because they either sink by halting, or they are swept away by straining in this torrent. Now, through every kamma we perform, there is a portion that sinks down into the mind-stream (citta-santāna). In this Dhamma, the portion that sinks into the mind-stream is called underlying tendency (Anusaya). Just as a heavy object sinks to the bottom, during our long journey in saṃsāra, there is a portion that comes and deposits itself in our mind-stream as underlying tendency (Anusaya). Similarly, there is something called āśava (cankers / taints / influxes). Āśava means that which flows, carrying the idea of an influx. Next, there is another portion that sweeps beings away, which is called ogha (flood)—what we have been referring to as the torrents. What are these? They are saṃsāric habits. Through every kamma we perform, a habit is formed. That is why we referred to it earlier as a wheel—the wheel of kamma. To put it briefly, in the Dhamma, this is sometimes shown as the round of kamma (kamma-vaṭṭa), the round of result (vipāka-vaṭṭa), and the round of defilements (kilesa-vaṭṭa). This word vaṭṭa (round) is frequently used. Vaṭṭa means going in a circle, or rather, a wheel. How does each of these turn into a wheel?

They become habits. Breaking those saṃsāric habits is not easy. It can be broken only through Wisdom (paññā). Those habits accumulate. When one performs a single kamma—just as we said about the jeweler who was slicing meat, it became extremely easy for him to transition to another blood-stained kamma. In that manner, each kamma we perform assists another as a habit, whether it is good or bad. Thus proceeding, the portion that simultaneously sinks into the mind-stream is what is called the underlying tendency (Anusaya). Those cannot be easily removed. Similarly, the taints (āśava) are the portion that flows in. Therefore, meritorious friends, a mind that removes those sinking portions called underlying tendency (Anusaya), taints (āśava), and floods (ogha); that destroys those flowing taint-forces called sensuality, becoming (bhava), views, and so on; and next, that possesses the strength to escape from those torrents called floods (ogha)—such a mind is called the mind of an Arahant, the mind of a Buddha. It is for this purpose that a Buddhist fulfills all the practices. It is not for some minor thing as the ordinary world thinks. It is not merely to protect some social ethics. It is not just for the small purpose of maintaining society well. There is a much deeper meaning. One's saṃsāric liberation belongs to oneself. When it is said, “kammaḍāyāda” (heir to kamma), one must take responsibility for the store of kamma one has brought along. One must take responsibility for the store of kamma one performs in this saṃsāra. The path to escape from it was ultimately declared by the Buddha as that neither-dark-nor-bright kamma. That is, the cultivation of the Noble Eightfold Path.

The actions performed with a general understanding of good and bad while looking toward the side of arising (samudaya) are called “sāsavaṃ puññabhāgiyā upadhivepakka” (accompanied by taints, siding with merit, ripening in assets). They are accompanied by taints (āśava). That is accepted. Accompanied by taints, accumulating assets (upadhi) on the side of merit—assets meaning those which provide various saṃsāric becoming (bhava), enjoyments, and wealth. There is that kind of Right View. Similarly, what is the deep Right View (sammā-diṭṭhi)? It is the Right View regarding the Four Noble Truths: “This entire existence is suffering (dukkha). craving (taṇhā) is its cause. The calming of this craving (taṇhā) is Nibbāna. The path to it is the Noble Eightfold Path.” It is this understanding of the Four Noble Truths that is called Supramundane Right View (lokuttara sammā-diṭṭhi). Thus, the understanding of good and bad of beings at a mundane or saṃsāric level is that lower-level view. That is what is called kammaśāśakatā sammā-diṭṭhi—the understanding of merit and demerit, good and bad. Everything is not accomplished by that alone. Standing on that, having fulfilled those requirements, ultimately the final goal must be the deep realization of the Four Noble Truths. Saying “the entire existence is suffering (dukkha)” means that there is no “self” (attā) or “I” here. The method of treading toward that realization is what the Buddha has pointed out in the deep aspect of the Noble Eightfold Path. In a supramundane mind, all these eight factors arise together. Ordinary people, when cultivating the Noble Eightfold Path, take each factor separately and develop them in a piecemeal manner. But it is in the meditative mind that the Noble Eightfold Path arises supramundanelly. It is said that all eight factors arise simultaneously in a single mind. That means all eight factors have become straight. Now let us imagine: those eight factors are crooked. The eight factors are crooked in various ways. At the very moment when all eight factors, from Right View (sammā-ditṭhi) to Right Concentration (sammā-samādhi), become straight, that is when the realization of the Paths and Fruits (magga-phala) takes place—viewed from the deepest sense. Therefore, there is a profound depth to the supramundane compared to the way ordinary people cultivate Right View (sammā-ditṭhi), Right Intention (sammā-sānpa), and so on.

Therefore, through this, these meritorious devotees must contemplate: we have raised many points that go deeper and deeper concerning kamma and becoming (bhava) or rebirth, drawing from this story and verse. On this valuable day, bringing what has been gathered close to your own lives, without neglecting these qualities like Virtue (sīla), through them—through the restraint thus cultivated—next developing Concentration (samādhi), and through that Concentration, obtaining that insight wisdom (vipassanā-paññā), you must resolve to escape from this dangerous saṃsāra. Make a wish that the store of merit we accumulated today through this Dhamma preaching and Dhamma hearing, as well as all the mental strengths of faith (saddhā), energy (viriya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā) that these meritorious devotees developed through hearing the Dhamma at this moment, may definitely become a strong support (upanissaya) for crossing over the saṃsāric flood—for crossing over this torrential flood by not halting and by not straining.

Also, for this meritorious gathering, today is an occasion where our small hall has become a bit larger. For this too, these faithful lay devotees must have helped and supported in various ways. Similarly, a seat has been offered as a Dhamma-seat (dhammāsana). Although we do not expect much, a Dhamma-seat has been offered out of respect for the Dhamma. Recalling that merit, all these meritorious devotees who have supported according to their capacity, and with the help of this store of merit accumulated especially through hearing the Dhamma, may all those states that obstruct one's journey to Nibbāna in this world be removed through the power of this merit! May supportive states be attained! With Dhamma-induced peace, having appeased those kamma-momentums, may this wholesome merit definitely become a supportive condition to finally conquer the entire wheel of kamma through the wheel of Dhamma, by the power of Dhamma! Make that aspiration. Likewise, may the Sasana-protecting deities and Brahma kings, as well as the departed relatives who have passed away in your respective names, and all beings from the Avīci hell up to the Akanitha heaven, rejoice in this merit of Dhamma preaching and Dhamma hearing! Having rejoiced, making the aspiration, “May they attain the supreme deathless Nibbāna through a preferred Bodhi as quickly as possible,” recite these verses and share the merit.

Verse 46 from the Pupphavagga (Chapter on Flowers) of the Dhammapada

Dear Listeners,

The great deathless Nibbāna is the highest aspiration and ultimate goal of every Buddhist. Why is this word 'deathless' (amṛta) so dear to everyone when it falls upon their ears? It is because they see and feel a solution in this word 'deathless' to the grave problem of death, which everyone born in this world must face. Not only for humans, but even for devas and brahmas, 'deathless' is a beloved word. That is because, even if they live for aeons, they must someday pass away and die. Therefore, this word 'deathless' is extremely pleasing and agreeable.

Why, then, do we pay such great homage to our Supreme Buddha, the Father? It is because the Buddha stepped forward to address this very problem of death, which the world, including devas and humans, was looking at in despair. That is what is called the great, deathless Nibbāna.

We know that the Buddha defeated Māra. What is the meaning of defeating Māra? The Buddha discovered a place invisible to Māra, a place beyond the grasp of Māra. That is what is called the Nibbāna-dhātu* (the element of Nibbāna, the great deathless Nibbāna). It is described by terms such as the Asaṅkhata-dhātu (the Unconditioned / Unprepared / Uncompounded element). It is by directing the mind to a certain state that is invisible to Māra, which Māra cannot see, that one conquers death. The Buddha did not merely realize that deathless state, that great deathless Nibbāna, for himself; he has also presented in this Dhamma the relevant, helpful instructions for the world to reach that state, to defeat Māra within their own mental continuums, and to realize that deathless state. In the verse we have chosen as our topic today, what is shown very briefly is an instruction on insight (vipassanā) that helps direct the mind to this deathless state.

This Dhamma verse was preached to a certain monk who, having taken a meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna) from the Buddha, went to a distant forest to practice insight meditation. Although that Venerable Sir went to such a forest with a meditation subject obtained from the Buddha and meditated with great effort, he was unable to attain Arahantship. Later, he thought, "I must meet the Buddha again to purify my meditation subject and receive special instructions." While traveling a long distance with this intention, he saw a mirage. During the summer, especially in dry seasons like this, a mirage is something one can easily see.

That sight of vapor rising from the ground, appearing like flowing water. Seeing this, the monk reflected, "My individual existence and this body are also like a mirage." A mirage appears from afar as if it is something real, something that can be grasped. However, when you go close to it, its nature is such that it is not there. In the same way, just as the Buddha declared, it appeared to this monk that this body is a mirage. What actually exists is not the way this body appears; it is the nature of arising and passing away. When you go closer to see where it arises, it vanishes from there. While walking and reflecting on the mirage in this manner, he reached the bank of the Aciravati River. To soothe his bodily fatigue and rest, he bathed, and then sat serenely under a tree where the river water flowed very rapidly, watching how foam-bubbles formed and dissolved in the swift current of the river. This too became a meditation subject for that monk. He reflected, "This form of mine, this body, this physical frame, this individual existence, is also like a lump of foam." While he was reflecting on this, the Buddha—who usually watches with his Buddha-knowledge the mental behavior and the way the minds of the monks to whom he gave meditation subjects are working—saw that this monk's mind had now matured.

At that moment, the Buddha appeared—having seen the thought that arose in this monk, the Buddha appeared before him and spoke the Dhamma verse we mentioned earlier:

"Knowing this body to be comparable to a lump of foam, understanding through wisdom its mirage-like nature, cutting off the flower-tipped arrows of Māra, one should go to a place beyond the sight of the King of Death."

Confirming the thought of insight (vipassanā) that arose in that monk, giving him the assurance that it is true, and further encouraging him, the Buddha declared:

Phenūpamaṃ kāyaṃ imaṃ — Knowing this body to be comparable to a lump of foam,

Marīcidhammaṃ abhisambudhāno — Understanding through wisdom the mirage-like nature of this body, comprehending it thoroughly,

Chetvāna mārassa papupphakāni — Cutting off the flower-tipped arrows, or the flower-decorated arrows, shot by Māra of defilements (kilesa-māra), Adassanaṃ [maccurājassa gacche] — Go to a place beyond the range of Māra's sight.

In this way, the Buddha gave the instruction. It is recorded that upon hearing this instruction, that Venerable Sir's insight knowledge matured, and he attained Arahantship with the four analytical knowledges (paṭisambhidā).

Let us, therefore, try to understand the Dhamma points contained in this verse with reference to this context. Comparing this body to a lump of foam—the Buddha has compared form (rūpa) to a lump of foam. Let us contemplate for a moment how reasonable—how well-reasoned—this is. The Buddha compared form to a lump of foam because the more one thinks about it, the deeper one contemplates it, the closer one gets to the truth. Now, a lump of foam is something that arises when something, like a log of wood or some debris, gets stuck in a rapidly flowing stream of water, and as they are carried away by the water, foam rises from them.

From afar, that foam appears solid, as if it is something substantial, something nicca (permanent/constant), something of essence. But when one looks closely, it is devoid of essence; it is empty. Moreover, this lump of foam has a nature that exists for only a very brief moment. If we look at a lump of foam in an extremely subtle manner, it is like a collection of bubbles rapidly arising and passing away. This body is also like that. Yet, when we look at it as form (rūpa), what we see is like what we said about that foam. What is its mirage-like nature? From afar, it appears as an extremely pleasant, permanent (nicca) thing. But this body is built up just like that lump of foam. We know that all kinds of food and drink enter this body.

Milk, gruel, rice—these are boiled and frothed up in the kitchen before they enter this body. After entering the body, they boil and froth up even further. It is through the boiling and overflowing of this foam that blood, flesh, bones, and sinews are formed. Once these are formed and the foam overflows, we become deeply attached to the portion of the body we wish to keep, thinking "this is mine, this is I," and with great pride, we decorate, adorn, feed, and pamper this body, maintaining it. The leftover part of that foam, the part that overflows to the outside as feces, urine, sweat, etc., we wash away as waste. When we contemplate, this is the nature of the lump of foam regarding this body.

As the Buddha declared, these thirty-two impure parts of the body are brought together in this very manner. Due to the boiling nature within this body, based on the primary elements of paṭhavī (earth), āpo (water), tejo (fire), and vāyo (air), this body continues to grow for many years, constantly frothing. It is a lump of foam. Therefore, fully understanding the nature of this body as a lump of foam—pheṇūpamaṃ kāyaṃ imaṃ.

Similarly, its mirage-like nature means that from afar, if we do not look with the eye of wisdom, it appears as something good and pleasant. Now, whether we take a photograph or look in a mirror, when we look with the ordinary physical eye—what we call the natural eye, our normal eye—it appears to us as a very pleasant form (rūpa), both our own form and the forms of others. In the world, there are instruments to see things invisible to the physical eye, such as microscopes. What do they do? They magnify subtle things. Magnifying subtle things is a form of distortion. Yet, we are satisfied with it, thinking, "Look, I am seeing a subtle thing." However, wisdom (paññā) or insight (vipassanā) does not see in that way. It sees the subtle thing exactly as a subtle thing. That is a direct realization. It is confirmed by directly realizing the subtle thing as a subtle thing. Otherwise, we only see it as long as the instrument is there. Once the instrument is removed, it is gone. There is such a difference in the world regarding seeing, and insight (vipassanā) is a special kind of seeing—the seeing of the practitioner of insight.

To understand that form is a lump of foam in this manner, there is no need to labor to place parts of it under a microscope. There is no need to spend money. By constantly contemplating any part of this form, such as hair of the head, hair of the body, nails, teeth, etc., from among the thirty-two impure parts of the body—whichever part strikes one as most repulsive—as a meditation subject in the manner of tranquility (samatha), by anchoring the mind therein through one-pointedness, and by seeing it deeply, then it is understood. Consequently, an opportunity arises to see its elemental nature (dhātu) in the manner of insight (vipassanā). As insight knows mature, one can remove the attachment to this body by viewing it as repulsive (asubha) or as elements (dhātu), and comprehend its true nature. There is a word, nibbedhikā paññā. Meritorious friends, nibbedhikā paññā means penetrative wisdom. Wisdom is something that penetrates.

Now, when we think of this body, we often use the term 'bodily cage'. Indeed, it is a cage. Inside this bodily cage, the mind is trapped. This cage is a cage made by Māra, a cage created by Māra. Inside this bodily cage created by Māra, the mind is imprisoned. It is to attain the liberation of the mind, to realize Nibbāna, that a person strives, that a wise person strives. What is this realization of Nibbāna? It is the penetrating vision of this cage. It is through penetrating this cage that the mind is liberated. That penetrative seeing is precisely what is accomplished by insight (vipassanā).

This wisdom is so powerful that it has been compared to a diamond gem (vajra-māṇikya). Now, a diamond is something that can cut other gems. A diamond has the strength and sharpness to cut through any other gem. This insight knowledge (vipassanā-ñāṇa) is like a diamond; it penetrates. It sees through. Seeing through means—now, when we say seeing aniccatā (impermanence/inconstancy), there are two sides, two aspects to impermanence: arising and passing away. It begins with contemplating the nature of its arising and passing away. As one goes deeper, through that one penetrates and sees that there is nothing real here. The nature of Anicca (Impermanent), Dukkha (Suffering), Anattā (Not-self), and emptiness of essence can be seen through this as one goes deeper and deeper. Thus, seeing this arising and passing away is the initial function of this diamond gem—insight wisdom. By seeing in this way, one is able to understand this body as a lump of foam, not through any artificial instruments or artificial means. However, we attain this state through the path of insight (vipassanā).

In the past, during the time of the Buddha, it was these similes shown by the Buddha that the monks took with them to the forest when they went to meditate. They did not carry other books with them. They did not shoulder other volumes. Those very similes were sufficient. This is because a simile contains a vast multitude of deep meanings. However, it is grasped and understood only as one goes deeper and deeper. Simply mentioning a 'lump of foam' is something one can see anywhere, or even looking at a tree. If one just glances at it and looks away, it goes no further. But it is not just the simile, but the object of comparison (upameya). According to that simile, what has the Buddha compared it to? This body. At first glance, this seems hard to accept. Yet, one must direct the mind deeply into this, apply contemplation, and reflect on it. When one constantly directs the mind to this, one realizes how true indeed are the words spoken by the Buddha.

In this way, then, one who aspires for the knowledge of insight (vipassanā-ñāṇa) and wishes to go to that deathless state, to the place invisible to Māra, must sharpen those insight knowledges. "Phenūpamaṃ kāyaṃ imaṃ veditvā". Moreover, if we contemplate the mirage-like nature in this, we spoke earlier about the characteristic of a mirage. The deer is deceived by it. The deer, being largely an ignorant animal, runs towards it because from afar during the summer it appears like water. When it goes there, it is not there. Yet, based on the view (diṭṭhi) it has taken, it appears even further away. Thus, it keeps running continuously, and does not realize until it collapses from exhaustion. It is exactly the same regarding this form (rūpa). The world's attachment to this form is the work of Māra—the work of Māra of defilements (kilesa-māra). It is always presented as something beautiful (subha). That is why the Buddha pointed out that the world is trapped within four distorted views, known as vipallāsa (perversions/distortions). They regard the Anicca (Impermanent) as permanent; they regard the asubha (foul/repulsive) as beautiful; they regard what is bound up with Dukkha (Suffering) as pleasant; and they regard what is Anattā (Not-self) as one's self. There are such perverted views, vipallāsa, in the world. Accordingly, that lump of foam also appears as something permanent, extremely beautiful, something to be acquired, and full of essence. A mirage is just like that.

Thinking thus, the thirsty deer, driven by the desire to drink water, goes far. Because of the very thirst which is Taṇhā (Craving), that animal often takes the distant sight as a view (diṭṭhi), believing "this is definitely water and nothing else." Due to that view (diṭṭhi) it has grasped, and the subsequent thoughts built upon it, that deer runs.

In this way, the Buddha has declared that these distorted ideas, the vipallāsa, operate on three levels: saññā-vipallāsa (distortion of perception), citta-vipallāsa (distortion of thought), and diṭṭhi-vipallāsa (distortion of view). Saññā-vipallāsa refers to perception/recognition. The deer perceives the distant mirage as water. Then, based on that perception, it constructs a multitude of thoughts: "If I go there, I will be able to drink some water." Because of those thoughts, expectations, and wishes, the deer runs. Based on what is seen far away, it forms a view (diṭṭhi): "This is definitely water; even if it is not here, it is visible over there. Because it is visible, it can definitely be obtained." Indeed, this is the nature of the mirage regarding this body, and it is the same with other things that support the body.

In our day-to-day life, we know how these three factors operate. Sometimes, one's neighbor brings a brand new luxury item to their house. Seeing this, one thinks, "Somehow, I must acquire this too." This is indeed the mirage. One thinks, "On the day I acquire this, I too will be someone of status." Thinking thus, one goes into debt for it. Getting into debt, working hard, one somehow acquires that item—the item that was in the neighbor's living room. But by the time one acquires it, the neighbor's item has been moved to the kitchen, and a new item has arrived. Then, one tries to acquire that new one. This is the track on which the world runs. Just like regarding this body, the world spends its entire life with such a Taṇhā (Craving), a severe craving, for luxury items that support the body. Such is the situation. This happens because of Māra. That is the part mentioned next in the verse.

"Chetvāna mārassa papupphakāni" — Cutting off Māra's flower-arrows, or the arrows with flower-tips. A deep meaning is expressed here. What are these arrows? Māra of defilements shoots these arrows at our six senses. What is shown here are the objects coming to the eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind—the defiled sense objects. Since these defiled sense objects come with a pleasant appearance, they are shown as flower-arrows. If one cannot cut off these flower-arrows properly—one looks at the arrow because there is a flower at its tip. But even though one looks at the flower, it comes and pierces the eye. That is the kind of thing happening here. So, what is used to help cut down this nature of defilements? It is that same diamond gem (vajra-māṇikya) we mentioned earlier—insight wisdom (vipassanā-paññā). This is called 'insight attention' (vipassanā-manasikāra), a form of contemplation. It is through insight attention that one can cut off these defiled sense objects.

Generally, through contemplation, if one contemplates like the ordinary world—that is, foolishly—or if one contemplates while being overwhelmed by defilements, what happens is that one takes up various signs (nimitta) based on that object. An object does not come alone; it comes with signs. Defilements give various signs to the mind: "This is beautiful (subha), this is permanent (nicca), this is pleasant (sukha), it brings pleasure, it is a good thing, this is mine"—it gives such feelings. Moreover, it has an attractive appearance. Accordingly, there is a nature in these sense objects that increases desire. It is through insight wisdom (vipassanā-paññā) that one can cut off this stickiness, this state of attachment, this state of bondage to the object, and see through the objects. That is how one cuts off these defiling arrows, these defiling objects shot by Māra. In that way, one contemplates the object extremely rapidly, not to succumb to those signs, but to use these objects to see the three characteristics—Anicca (Impermanent), Dukkha (Suffering), and Anattā (Not-self)—declared by the Buddha. "There, it came; here, it remained; lo, it has gone."

The object came, remained, and went. What is understood through this? How true indeed is the nature of anicca declared by the Buddha! Next, through that very contemplation, one sees that if one develops attachment to it, along with that comes the grief, fear, and torment born of separation from it.

Now, within those insight knowledges (vipassanā-ñāṇa) declared by the Buddha lies the entire sum of experiences we have gathered over an infinite time in this saṃsāra. It is by applying this vast store of experiences in an extremely brief moment and turning it into a state that cuts through like a diamond that one can be liberated from this saṃsāra, liberated from Bhava (Becoming). What is the solution given by the Buddha? It is not the solution the ordinary world thinks of. The ordinary world sees in everything Taṇhā (Craving) and holding on, which is called taṇhā-upādāna (craving and grasping/holding). They grasp with craving. It is through this grasping (upādāna) that the ordinary world expects security. We know that when a small child feels fear, they cling to their mother. The mother might cling to her husband. If a thief comes, or if someone comes to kill them, they might cling to security guards. You, meritorious friends, know very well these days that none of these clings or holdings are permanent. One can never conquer Māra or death through this nature of grasping and holding.

Instead, the Buddha gives a highly marvelous solution, one that is unimaginable to an ordinary person. The Buddha declares: "When Māra pulls, let go!" One must let go of Māra. Why? Because within the momentum of Māra's pull, there is a mental state that brings grief, fear, torment, and lamentation. If someone firmly grasps or holds onto something, when that grasped object is pulled, it gives rise to fear, torment, and grief. Let us suppose someone clings to a thorny branch. When that thorny branch is pulled, this person's hand is also wounded. Similarly, regarding the upādāna (grasping/holding/fuel) in this world, the Buddha declared: "I do not see any single thing in this Bhava (Becoming) which, when grasped, can bring safety." It is difficult for someone to comprehend this. At various levels, a person decides: "I will grasp only this much." But the Buddha declares that as long as one grasps, through every single thing one becomes prey to Māra.

To what extent, meritorious friends? The Buddha has declared—and as Buddhists we have often heard—that what we call 'I' and 'mine' are just five heaps: rūpa (form), Vedanā (Feeling), saññā (perception), Saṅkhāra (Formations), and viññāṇa (consciousness). The Buddha has identified every single one of these heaps as Māra. Form is Māra, feeling is Māra, perception is Māra, formations are Māra, and consciousness is Māra. Since all of these belong to Māra, what is it that does not belong to Māra? Right there lies the bliss of liberation. This is not something obtained by grasping (upādāna).

Let us take a simple analogy for this. Let us contemplate a game of tug-of-war. What happens in a tug-of-war? At the beginning, we know that the two teams on either side grab the rope with all their might. If needed, they even wrap it around their hands. With a firm determination not to let it budge even a bit, they cling to the rope.

Then, suppose one side, which we think can win, pulls it. As they pull, if the others keep clinging to it, some fall to the ground, get scraped, and suffer injuries. This is a very obvious fact to us. But regarding that victory, there too is a mirage. Because of the mirage, they grasp it firmly. They think they have won. Amidst great panting, they express joy. Such is the situation according to the world. What the Buddha points out is not that kind of thing. It is letting go of Māra. If one lets go when Māra pulls with all his momentum, what happens? Then the strain is on Māra. The strain is on Māra. Oneself is free. For oneself, there is no fear, grief, torment, or lamentation. Letting go. This is something one can realize in day-to-day life.

Let us suppose we are very proud of our set of teeth. A front tooth begins to ache. A toothache arises. We somehow bear the toothache. "If this tooth is lost, it will be a major flaw on our face." But the dentist says, "This is a decayed tooth. If it is not removed somehow, it will harm the other teeth as well." Then, on that day, putting aside the attachment to that tooth, one allows it to be extracted. Once it is extracted, there is relief. That is the matter concerning the tooth that must be understood. Such is the situation in the world. Although this is mentioned as a simple illustration from daily life, it is not understood immediately. However, those who walked on the path of Dhamma shown by the Buddha have realized this. They let go of things that seemed impossible to let go. Why? Because they saw that each of these is like a subtle arrow of Māra—each is an invitation from Māra. He gives it to be grasped: "Here, grasp this!" And then he pulls. The moment it is grasped, he pulls.

Through this grasping, let us try to reveal a deeper Dhamma using this very simile. Now, we spoke about grasping the rope. In a tug-of-war, when grasping the rope, how much effort, exertion, energy, or resistance (orottu-vīma) is applied? What an endeavor is made to grasp and hug this rope! In the same way, regarding everything in this world, there is a nature of clinging through mind, speech, and body in the form of intentions, aspirations, and expectations. Or, to put it another way, there are many "preparations" (ara-ændīm). You, meritorious friends, know the word ara-ændīma (preparations/arrangements). It is a preparation, a grand preparation, when we contemplate our entire life. Life in its entirety is a preparation, an endeavor, to live, to stay alive, to avoid dying. A series of preparations (saṅkhāra / formations / volitional activities). Even before these preparations are completed, before these arrangements are fully finished, Māra pulls it away. At that moment, as we mentioned earlier, one falls into fear, torment, and lamentation. One thinks, "I have died." Thinking so, owing to the defilements, due to Māra of defilements, one somehow takes another Jāti (Birth) in another place according to kamma. Then, one settles down there. One takes root there. Māra pulls towards the next world, while the dying person pulls towards this world. In the end, the Buddha declared this to be a pulling that leaves one with neither world. Once this pulling is over, one goes and settles there, taking root.

Suppose one has a human form and then goes and is born in the womb of an animal. Next, due to avijjā (ignorance), one clings to that bodily cage. One clings to what pertains to that body, thinking, "this is I, this is mine." This is how it is. This is what is called the journey of saṃsāra. This journey is not one that can be measured in miles or meters. That journey of saṃsāra exists between these two: 'this world' and 'the next world,' the place one grasps in this manner. Or, as we say, between 'there' and 'here.' Now, in the case of the mirage, the deer is here and sees the water over there, and what does it use to connect 'there' and 'here'? Conceit (māna). If we say Taṇhā (Craving) is the thought the deer develops from here—it develops the thought based on craving. It supports the sight seen over there. It connects the two through conceit (māna): "If I go there, I can drink that water."

In this way, according to the three defilements of Taṇhā (Craving), māna (conceit), and diṭṭhi (views), worldly beings travel this long journey of saṃsāra. Although we call it a long journey, it is like spinning in one place. It is highly astonishing how it is just a spinning in the selfsame place. If it is such a cycle, one cannot escape by running. It is because of this that the liberated Buddha declared: "Within this fathom-long body, I declare the arising of the world, the cessation of the world, and the path leading to it." To do this, as we mentioned earlier, one must see through this bodily cage. One must see through every single one of these. The Buddha has shown only two similes here. In the Dhamma, similes are shown for all the five aggregates (pañcupādānakkhandha). You, meritorious friends, must have heard many times that form (rūpa) is compared to a lump of foam, feeling (vedanā) to water bubbles—like bubbles that rapidly arise and burst when rain falls on water.

Next, saññā (perception) was said to be a mirage. Saṅkhāra (Formations)—we understood saṅkhāra as all those various intentions, aspirations, expectations, preparations, and arrangements. We do this through mind, body, and speech. Even in the tug-of-war we mentioned, those words are used—body, speech, and mind. A massive effort—a multitude of efforts—is made through all these in a tug-of-war. A series of preparations and arrangements, just like this heap of saṅkhāra. There is no essence in these; they are devoid of essence. Formations (saṅkhāra) are compared to a banana trunk. One goes in search of the heartwood of a banana trunk. Because of the initial appearance of the banana tree, a person seeing it for the first time might think, "This is a wood with good heartwood." But when one starts peeling it, touching it very closely, lo! it is just a sheath. What appeared so good was just a sheath, not heartwood. One discards it. "Now, here is the heartwood," one thinks. That too is just a sheath. One discards it too. "Ah, that too is just a sheath." Finally, one reaches the core. Even there, there is nothing. Even there, there is no essence. Within it, there are only many sheaths.

In this way, throughout the entirety of saṃsāra, meritorious friends, what we have been doing is merely peeling sheaths. We have found no heartwood. Searching for heartwood, we have gone on peeling sheaths. That is why the Buddha declared: "Saṅkhārā paramā dukkhā" (formations are the ultimate suffering). The subtlest Dukkha (Suffering) in the world is the suffering of formations (saṅkhāradukkha). Generally, what we call suffering is when we lose a loved one, fall sick, get ill, or have nothing to eat or drink—these are what we call suffering. But the Buddha declared that the subtlest level of suffering is formations (saṅkhāra). This is understood only by the practitioner of insight (vipassanā). Gradually, the suffering in this is understood. To cure a disease, what does a doctor do? First, they alleviate the externally visible symptoms, like a fever or pain. But the disease is not cured thereby. One must treat the root cause itself. Similarly, the Buddha discovered the very source of this disease and removed that cause. That source is Taṇhā (Craving). The Buddha pointed out craving. It is because of craving that we grasp (upādāna). Why do all these five heaps become suffering? Because we grasp them, because we hold onto them. As long as we hold onto them, they are suffering. Once let go, there is no suffering. But the way of the world is to grasp each of these, saying, "this is I, this is mine." Grasping means the unwillingness to let go. Holding on means the unwillingness to let go.

To reveal this, the ordinary world takes up views (diṭṭhi) regarding each of these. Regarding form, they say: "Form is mine." If someone asks what the relationship is between form and you, they say, "This form is mine." If you logically show them that it cannot be so, they say, "No, no, I made a small mistake; I am one who possesses form." Or, "Form is in me." Or, "I am in form." In this manner. What does this show? They are unwilling to let go of form. They cling to it somehow in those four ways. Clinging in this manner in twenty ways is what is called Sakkāya-diṭṭhi (View of existing group/body). That is what is called view (diṭṭhi).

This unwillingness to let go is something caused by Taṇhā (Craving). Due to craving comes upādāna (grasping/holding/fuel). Once grasped, that tug-of-war is what takes place. Why, then, are formations (saṅkhāra) compared to a banana trunk in this manner? If someone thinks, "The Buddha compared formations to a banana tree. We have plenty of banana trees in our garden. Therefore, it is very easy for me to understand formations," they are mistaken. One must consider this deeply. That is how formations are. Consciousness (viññāṇa) is something far subtler. Consciousness is compared to an illusion (māyā). An illusion, in modern terms, is a magic trick. People go to watch magic shows with great interest. Why do they go? To be deceived. Not for free, but by paying money to be deceived! But this deception has always been going on in saṃsāra, even without paying money. This deception is what is called consciousness (viññāṇa). Because the nature of consciousness is to show something non-existent as existing. The Buddha illustrated this with a simile of a magician performing a trick at a four-way crossroads, creating illusions. He shows non-existent things as existing. Those who are deluded see it and rejoice, saying, "Ah! Oh! Wow!" But there is nothing real there. It is devoid of essence.

This understanding that there is no essence, no heartwood, is what the Buddha ultimately presents to a person as Nibbāna. The ordinary world thinks of Nibbāna as some kind of strange world. That is the place invisible to Māra. What is called the place invisible to Māra is that state of mind. That is to say, if someone has attained that supramundane state declared by the Buddha through Arahantship in this very life, at the moment of their death, when Māra pulls, they do not pull back towards this side. Instead, if Māra pulls, they let go, as if saying, "If this is yours, take it." When they let go, there is no grief, torment, or lamentation. That is where the secret lies. What a wonderful solution the Buddha declared: letting go when pulled.

This letting go must first be realized in this very world. The path to that realization is called the insight knowledges (vipassanā-ñāṇa). It is seen through that aniccatā (impermanence/inconstancy). There is great depth in the word aniccatā. When we say aniccatā, we think it exists for a little while—not a year, but a month; not a month, but a day. Ultimately, when one looks at it in this way, one has to see through this as well. How does it come to realization through both arising and passing away? To one who is watching both, they see these breaking down faster than they arise. Now, why did that Venerable Sir, upon seeing that lump of foam, compare it to this body? It appeared to him that this body breaks down even faster than it arises. To that extent, this is something that constantly breaks down. This breaking-down nature is not visible to the ordinary physical eye. As we mentioned earlier, even if one sees it through microscopes, that is not direct knowledge (paccakkha-ñāṇa). Even if seen in a laboratory, one forgets it upon returning home. Therefore, for it to be realized, it must be a direct realization. It is visible only to a mind prepared with samādhi (concentration), upekkhā (equanimity), and ekaggatā (one-pointedness). This is also what is meant by cutting off Māra's flower-arrows. Within that contemplation, these two are present: equanimity (upekkhā) and one-pointedness (ekaggatā). One-pointedness is obtained through samādhi. Through that, the mind becomes strong and sharp. Even with a knife, one cannot cut with a blunt knife. It must be sharpened well. Having sharpened it, next is equanimity. Equanimity has a way of aiming it correctly, keeping it steady and undistracted there. It is through these two that insight wisdom (vipassanā-paññā) is brought forth.

Through that wisdom, systematically, first those two: arising and passing away. Next, through that, one sees it breaking down, rapidly breaking down. As it breaks down continuously, one understands: "Why should I grasp this thing which is breaking down?" If we grasp something that is breaking down—say, a rotten fence—after grasping it, we fall along with the fence. Similarly, grasping something that is shaking or trembling brings suffering. In the same way, the Buddha declared that in each of these—rūpa, vedanā, saññā, saṅkhāra, viññāṇa—there is a multitude of vibrations. Formations (saṅkhāra) can be regarded as vibrations. It is precisely due to that multitude of grasped preparations, arrangements, expectations, intentions, and aspirations that those vibrations arise. Liberation is freedom from that mental conflict. This is why we say Nibbāna is right close to us. This is something that must be directly realized, through comprehension and wisdom. This is not just any wisdom; it is systematically and directly realized through a certain meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna). Suppose, to develop disenchantment towards this body, one constantly directs one's meditation attention (manasikāra) to some part like hair of the head, hair of the body, nails, teeth, etc., and thereby attains a level of concentration (samādhi). By that, those distorted ideas called vipallāsa we mentioned earlier are removed. The perception of beauty (subha-saññā) is removed, and attachment to it ceases. Instead, one begins to understand its true nature. In that way, one contemplates it as repulsive (asubha).

Or else, as elements (dhātu)—all these things contained in this bodily cage, as well as things around us—we see certain characteristics of paṭhavī (earth), āpo (water), tejo (fire), and vāyo (air) in this great earth, in water, in fire, and in air. This too is only a grasping. We identify these just as a blind person feels around and learns. We know this is the paṭhavī-dhātu (earth element) because of its hardness. This too is felt by the body. It is through the body that we understand, "this is a hard thing." Is this a flowing thing? Is this a hot, warm thing? Is this a moving, expanding thing? These four elements exist within our body. If we consider parts where the earth element is predominant, they are hair of the head, hair of the body, nails, teeth, etc. These are things through which the sensation of hardness can be brought out; when we touch them, there is hardness, stiffness, softness, and so on. Similarly, the flowing nature, the liquid nature—in saliva, phlegm, mucus, urine, etc., we feel the water element (āpo-dhātu) within this body. Next, through hunger, fevers, etc., we know the fire element (tejo-dhātu). Likewise, the wind element (vāyo-dhātu) through this in-breathing and out-breathing. Thus, it is through these that the Buddha showed the way to bring forth Nibbāna. There is no need to go anywhere else. It is within this very body.

Along with the body, the trees around us also preach the Dhamma. Although they do not speak in this decorated manner, these trees, leaves, flowers, and fruits—all of them preach the Dhamma. But people do not listen to them. In the Buddha's time, however, they listened to them. That is how, in the past, when the monks went to a forest, they read the books available in their solitude. The book of Dhamma is found in the trees. The Dhamma is found in the rivers. Those are the very things shown here. That monk read a book of Dhamma flowing in that river. That is the true nature of this world declared by the Buddha. The three characteristics of Anicca (Impermanent), Dukkha (Suffering), and Anattā (Not-self) are seen everywhere. Bringing these out from within them belongs to insight wisdom (vipassanā-paññā). For that, one must walk on the path declared by the Buddha.

When we contemplate this, all of these are formations (saṅkhāra). It is by removing the attachment to this bodily cage, by seeing through it, that one can realize that noble, supreme state of Nibbāna, that liberation, which is described as the place invisible to Māra. If one makes the mind liberated in this very world, that person is said to be stilled. That is extinguishment. Until then, there is a burning. Realizing that extinguishment is the ultimate purpose of this Dhamma. Therefore, you, meritorious friends, must also reflect in your daily life, without postponing these matters, that they exist right inside this bodily cage, this cage we constantly carry around. Let alone other things, if we contemplate for a moment on this ānāpānasati (mindfulness of breathing) meditation which helped every Buddha to attain Buddhahood, what is present there is the activity of the wind element (vāyo-dhātu). If we reflect a little on this phenomenon of in-breathing and out-breathing, we can understand this. These in-breaths and out-breaths are like the panting (hatiya) that arises from running this futile, long journey of saṃsāra. Truly, meritorious friends, ānāpānasati does not mean panting; do not misunderstand. Sati means mindfulness. But the in-breath and out-breath, called ānāpāna, is indeed like a representation of the momentum, the panting, that has arisen within this running of saṃsāra. Contained within this is the message of this suffering of saṃsāra. That is why it is said that one attains Buddhahood through ānāpānasati.

Within this in-breathing and out-breathing, there is also kāyānupassanā (contemplation of the body), which is the foundation of mindfulness in observing the body. The capacity to comprehend feeling, which is vedanānupassanā (contemplation of feeling/sensation), is also present within this very in-breathing and out-breathing. The secret to understanding the mind, the mental behavior, and the way the mind conducts itself is also contained within this ānāpāna—within the in-breath and out-breath. Next, the capacity to comprehend the true nature of the objects that come to the mind, which is dhammānupassanā (contemplation of phenomena/mind-objects), is also present. Accordingly, when we contemplate, these in-breaths and out-breaths are like the 'panting' of this saṃsāric momentum. Quieting this—stopping the running and sitting in one place, directing the mind to this in-breath and out-breath, meritorious friends, is the settling of this 'panting' that we have brought along through our saṃsāric momentum. This panting is settled by making this in-breath and out-breath subtle. Not by forcing it, but by sitting serenely and directing the mind to it.

This breathing becomes agitated due to thoughts (vitakka) and ideas. The mind runs. The mind keeps running toward those defiled objects it had grasped earlier. To someone who has just sat down for ānāpānasati meditation, these networks of thoughts stream in so much that they might feel discouraged. But systematically, by developing the four protective meditations (caturārakkhā)—namely, recollection of the Buddha (buddhānussati), loving-kindness (mettā), repulsiveness (asubha), and mindfulness of death (maraṇassati)—which are shown as helpful preliminary meditation subjects (kammaṭṭhāna), and practicing them systematically, what does a person who sits for ānāpānasati do? By contemplating the breath, contemplating it subtly, or by establishing mindfulness (sati) on it, anchoring mindfulness therein, leaving no room for thoughts, and cutting off the arrows of Māra, one gradually quiets that in-breathing and out-breathing.

Along with this quieting, the understanding, the wisdom (paññā), becomes sharp. Like a diamond, like a diamond gem, like a beryl, that wisdom systematically grows through contemplating arising and passing away (udayabbaya), dissolution (bhaṅga), and so on, until at some point, comprehending the true nature of these formations (saṅkhāra)—this resistance in taking these in-breaths and out-breaths, this preparation, and the subtle saṃsāric bondage within it—one is able, at some moment, through the penetration (paṭivedha) of the paths known as Sotāpanna (Stream-enterer), Sakadāgāmi (Once-returner), Anāgāmi (Non-returner), and Arahant, to be liberated from this bodily cage and attain that liberated mind.

If one has attained that liberated mind, even though from that point on they spend their remaining lifespan according to the momentum of past kamma gathered in the past, at the moment of death, when Māra pulls, no vibration occurs. When speaking of the final passing away (pariNibbāna) of the Buddha, some might misunderstand, thinking that the Buddha passed away because Māra came and invited him to do so. However, at the moment of the Buddha's final passing away, because his mind was entirely a liberated mind, he passed away peacefully, having attained that sublime peace. That peace is not present among ordinary worldly beings.

When an ordinary person dies, they lament amidst a multitude of torments and pains, take up thoughts regarding their relatives, die, and are born again in another place according to kamma. Thus, it continues continuously in this saṃsāra. This is what is described as the cycle of kamma (kamma-vaṭṭa), the cycle of defilements (kilesa-vaṭṭa), and the cycle of results (vipāka-vaṭṭa). Falling prey to those arrows, the flower-arrows shot by Māra, they accumulate various kinds of kamma. As a result of those kammas, subsequently, bodily cages arise—those bodily cages formed due to avijjā (ignorance) and Taṇhā (Craving). With every bodily cage that arises, Māra has great amusement. Māra pulls. Consequently, when pulled, they die lamenting amidst torment, fear, and terror.

That is what is called Dukkha (Suffering). Why is this word 'Māra' used? It is to represent the unrecognised avijjā (ignorance) and Taṇhā (Craving) inherent in worldly beings, making them understandable to the mind, so that one can carry out this journey to Nibbāna. That is why the Buddha has used the word 'Māra' on many occasions. There is indeed a class of beings called Māra-devaputta (Māra the deity). But here, what is mostly referred to as Māra is kilesa-māra (Māra of defilements), used in a way that is comprehensible to the mind. Because if it is not made into a clear Dhamma object (dhamma-ārammaṇa) in this manner, one will not make the necessary effort.

The Middle Path (majjhimā paṭipadā) is a middle way. Standing still does not work, and struggling does not work either. On a certain occasion, a deity came and asked the Buddha, "O painless one, how did you cross over the flood?" By 'flood' (ogha), what is meant is this saṃsāric flood of defilements. "How did you cross over this flood?" The Buddha declared: "By not halting and by not struggling, I crossed over the flood." If one halts—now, if a person caught in a swift current suddenly stops, thinking there is nothing to be done, that is death. If one struggles frantically, that too is death. Instead, to escape from that flood, one systematically makes a wise effort. It is such a path that the Buddha pointed out as insight attention (vipassanā-manasikāra).

Therefore, on this valuable Poya day, you, meritorious friends, have listened to an analysis and exposition based on a word of Dhamma spoken by the Buddha, which helps to end this suffering of saṃsāra. Each of you must contemplate this. Do not stop merely at 'listening to Dhamma' as an ordinary custom; you must put it into practice in your daily life as much as possible, without delay. The Buddha declared these teachings in a way that they can be realized in daily life. It is mentioned in the Dhamma stories that not only the monks, but also lay devotees, both men and women, during the time of the Buddha and thereafter, leaned toward this path of Dhamma, systematically practiced meditation, and realized these truths, sometimes even before the monks.

Therefore, making an effort, we hope that you, meritorious friends, will use these Dhamma points discussed today, not merely to store them up as a heap of intellectual knowledge, but as an aid to sharpen your own diamond gem through insight, to develop your insight wisdom (vipassanā-paññā), and that you will extract the essence from this by reflecting on its practical value.

Thus, on a day like today, even though it was for a short time, you, meritorious friends, listened to the Dhamma. Within that lies faith (saddhā), the energy (vīriya) that followed that faith, the mindfulness (sati) brought forth through that energy, the concentration (samādhi) established through that mindfulness, and if any understanding arose through that concentration, the wisdom (paññā)—meaning, you were able to gain some sense of these valuable spiritual faculties (indriya) and powers (bala), which are parts of this Dhamma that can be directly realized by oneself. Today, therefore, you, meritorious friends, must rejoice, knowing that it is through the effort exerted in this manner that we will someday be able to escape from this fearful saṃsāra, from all of these—Jāti (Birth), jarā (decay/aging), disease, maraṇa (death), grief, and torment—and realize the great, supreme deathless Nibbāna. You must firmly resolve: "May you, meritorious friends, also have the strength and power to attain that peace in this very life without delay!"

Likewise, may the Sasana-protecting assembly of Devas and Brahmas, including the Deva and Brahma kings who, though unseen to us, constantly assist in these Sasana activities, rejoice in this merit of preaching and listening to the Dhamma! Having rejoiced, and providing protection to the Sasana and to us, may they realize the great, supreme Nibbāna through whichever Bodhi (enlightenment) they aspire for! Similarly, from the Avīci hell up to the Akaniṭṭha heaven, may all those who desire merit and Nibbāna, including our deceased relatives, rejoice in this merit of listening to the Dhamma, escape from this fearful saṃsāra, and be comforted by the great, supreme Nibbāna! Making this aspiration, recite these verses and share the merits.

From:

Verse 204 from the Sukhavagga (Chapter on Happiness) of the Dhammapada

Dear Listeners,

Every person strives throughout their entire life to attain happiness, relief, and peace. However, through the very efforts they make, it is frequently seen that they only acquire suffering (dukkha), unease, and ruin. This happens because of following wrong principles and courses of action. If one correctly understands the values highlighted by the Blessed One, one will be able to attain happiness, relief, and peace. Today, the stanza (gāthā) we have chosen as our theme mentions four such values. This stanza was preached to King Pasenadi of Kosala.

This King of Kosala was accustomed to eating a large quantity of food daily. A droṇa is said to be a large measure of grain used in those days. It is recorded that he consumed boiled rice prepared from a droṇa of raw rice for a single meal. One morning, having consumed such a vast amount of food, he came to the Blessed One, and being unable even to sit up straight, rolling from side to side, and nodding off in a stupor from a food-coma, he sat there. Then the Blessed One asked him, "Why, Great King? Did you not come after taking some rest?" The King replied, "Venerable Sir, I came immediately after having my meal. Ever since I took food, my body has felt very heavy." Then the Blessed One stated, "Yes, Great King, by consuming food beyond measure, suffering (dukkha) arises in this manner," and as a slightly humorous or sarcastic advice to the King, he uttered a certain stanza of Dhamma:

Yadā hotī mahagghaso niddāyitā mahāvarāho va nivāpapuṭṭho, punappunaṃ gabbhamupeti mando.

The meaning of that stanza is: The foolish person who eats excessively and sleeps, rolling from side to side in drowsiness, is just like a pig fattened on various foods for slaughter, returning again and again to a mother's womb. Having uttered this stanza, the Blessed One further stated, "Great King, food is something that must be eaten knowing the proper measure. Only when one eats knowing the proper measure does the body feel comfortable." Then, to help him remember this advice, He uttered another stanza:

Manujassa sadā satīmato, mattaṃ jānato laddhabhojane, tanu tassa bhavanti vedanā, saṇikaṃ jīrati āyupālayaṃ.

The meaning of that stanza is: For a human who is always mindful, knowing the proper measure in the food obtained, his feelings (vedanā) become mild; he ages slowly, preserving his life-span. Thus, He declared the benefit of eating less food.

But even though this stanza was proclaimed, the King could not memorize it. He was that drowsy. So, the King said to the young man named Sudassana, his nephew who had accompanied him, "Memorize this on my behalf." The youth Sudassana memorized the stanza and asked the Blessed One, "Venerable Sir, what should be done with this stanza?" The Blessed One instructed him: "When this King is taking his meals, stand nearby, and just as he is about to put the very last morsel of rice into his mouth, recite this stanza. Then, considering the meaning of the stanza, the King will put that morsel of rice aside. The next day, prepare the meal by reducing the amount of raw rice by the number of rice grains in that discarded morsel. In this manner, gradually accustom the King to the practice of reducing his food intake."

So, the youth Sudassana acted in that very manner. Not only that, but whenever the stanza was recited, the King even gave a gift of a thousand coins to the youth Sudassana. As this went on for several days, the King reached a state where he could subsist on just one nāli (a much smaller measure) of food. Along with this, as a benefit of that practice, the King experienced great physical comfort, lightness, and strength.

Seeing these benefits, one day the King came to the Blessed One in great joy and declared: "Venerable Sir, now my body has so much strength that I can chase and catch a deer or a horse. My body is now very light, and that obesity I had earlier is gone. I feel very healthy. This has been a source of great happiness to me." At that moment, he also expressed several other matters that had brought him happiness: "In recent days, I had battles with my nephew, King Ajātasattu. Now, I have settled those battles by giving my daughter, Princess Vajirā, in marriage to that king. Furthermore, the battle had arisen over the ownership of the village of Kāsi. I have gifted that village of Kāsi to my daughter as bath-powder money—which we could call a soap allowance in modern terms—this was a custom among kings. Since I handed over that village as a dowry to my daughter, the conflict has ceased, and that is also a source of great joy to me." He mentioned another reason for his joy:

"Recently, a family heirloom gem in our palace was lost and could not be found. That too was suddenly recovered. That is also a cause of happiness for me." Then, fourthly, he presented another matter: "To make myself more trustworthy and pleasing to the Blessed One's disciples, and considering it a significant matter, I have taken a relative-daughter of the Blessed One in marriage"—here he was referring to Princess Vāsabhakhattiyā of the Sakyan clan. "I have wedded this relative-daughter. Thus, in these several ways, I now possess great happiness and joy." When the King declared this, it was in relation to these statements that the Blessed One uttered this stanza:

Indeed, Great King, among gains, health is the greatest gain. Among riches, contentment with what one has is the greatest wealth, the ultimate wealth. Among relatives, trust is the supreme relative. And when considering happiness, the ultimate happiness is Nibbāna. Giving this meaning, He uttered this stanza—the one we mentioned earlier:

Ārogāparamā lābhā, santuṭṭhiparamam dhanam, vissāsaparamā ñātī, nibbānaparamam sukham.

Now, this stanza, as well as the stories surrounding it, provide us with wonderful examples. The first point is clearly visible to us. Health was declared in relation to the King's situation, which was the issue of eating food. When we contemplate this, we see what a valuable Dhamma the Blessed One brought to light through the King's eating habits. First of all, let alone other things, even the simile used—the simile of the pig in that stanza—shows this. The Blessed One was not afraid to speak in a sarcastic manner even to a king. To that extent, the King also had immense respect for the Blessed One. Now, you all know that a pig is an animal with a mouth made for eating, a large mouth, and a large belly that drags along the ground. In houses, they feed it all kinds of waste at the back of the house, not out of love for the pig, nor to get milk from it—you know this very well. In the end, the fatter it gets, the quicker its death approaches. That was an excellent simile for the King to keep in mind.

Therefore, if we think of the result of over-eating in terms of the Dhamma, because of drowsiness, laziness, and physical inactivity, one's inclination toward the Dhamma decreases. Consequently, saṃsāra is prolonged further and further. That is to say, one falls prey to Māra and undergoes death again and again by consuming excessive food in that manner. Thus, in addition to that simile, the practical method the Blessed One gave to the King to reduce his food intake is of extraordinary practical value. What is it? It is the practice of knowing the proper measure in consuming food (bhojane mattaññutā). Whose measure is it? It is the measure of the person who eats. Therefore, only the person who eats knows their own measure; no one else can measure it for them. Thus, fittingly, the Blessed One next uttered a stanza that serves like a reflection (paccavekkhaṇā) for the King. We have already explained its meaning.

When the youth Sudassana recited that stanza, the King remembered the beneficial aspect of eating less food: that feelings (vedanā) decrease when food is consumed in moderation. Just as the last morsel of rice was about to go in, he would discard it. By letting go in this manner, he gradually understood the precise amount necessary for his sustenance. The King, who used to eat a huge quantity of food amounting to a droṇa, was eventually able to be satisfied with a single nāli. Here too, we can see the wonderful quality of the Blessed One as the "incomparable leader of persons to be tamed" (purisadamma sārathi). He showed a method suited to taming a person.

Next, when we think generally, we see that this weakness regarding food is also present among lay devotees, who over-eat at banquets and feasts. In an era where food is often used as an ostentatious display of status and wealth on the dining table, it shows us that we must be careful with food. Just like lay devotees, the Saṅgha also has to be careful regarding this matter at saṅghika dānas (almsgivings to the community). Because if one does not eat in moderation, not only do various diseases arise, but the body also becomes sluggish. Drowsiness and laziness set in. Consequently, many disadvantages arise, and the body decays rapidly.

"Slowly he ages, preserving his life-span" (saṅikam jīrati āyupālayam). Why is it said that one ages slowly when food is reduced? It is because undigested food is often what hastens decay, speeds up old age, and multiplies diseases. Thus, this point is also worth remembering. This is actually in agreement with medical science. In medical science, too, there are two important principles regarding food: hita-bhuk (eating what is beneficial) and mita-bhuk (eating in moderation). Hita-bhuk, dear devotees, means eating wholesome food—nutritious food that is beneficial to one's health. Next, mita-bhuk means knowing the measure of that food.

If we express this in dispensation (sāsana) terms, this hita-bhuk principle itself is denoted by the words sappāya (suitable) and asappāya (unsuitable). Sappāya refers to consuming wholesome, nutritious food. By discarding what is unwholesome and knowing what is suitable for oneself, one removes the unsuitable and takes the suitable. Then, corresponding to mita-bhuk is "moderation in eating" (bhojane mattaññutā). The Blessed One has pointed out to the Saṅgha, and particularly to yogis—not only to monastics but also to lay practitioners—to eat knowing the proper measure. It is through this that one can successfully practice Dhamma and meditation. By removing drowsiness and laziness, it helps to keep the body and mind active and awake, without succumbing to craving (taṇhā) for taste.

For the Saṅgha, this principle regarding food is even stricter. That is what is called reflection (paccavekkhaṇā). There is an old phrase, "consuming by reflecting" (pasvikā vaḷandanavā), used in reference to monastics. It does not carry the colloquial meaning used nowadays; "consuming by reflecting" means eating with wise consideration and reflection. The Blessed One has even laid down a specific passage for monastics to recite when eating, just as He gave that special stanza to King Kosala. It reminds them that this food is not taken for physical strength or beautification of the body like laypeople do. It is taken solely—and the word "solely" is specifically used—for the maintenance of this body, for keeping it going, and for leading this noble holy life (brahmacariya). Furthermore, it is to appease the old feeling (vedanā of hunger) and to prevent new feeling (vedanā of over-eating) from arising, so that one can practice Dhamma and meditation in comfort. In this way, the Blessed One has prescribed that they consume food by turning the act itself into a meditation.

Thus, through this principle concerning food, whether lay or ordained, everyone can attain that health, the blessing of physical well-being. Indeed, why was health declared as the ultimate gain? Because no matter what other gains one has, no matter what wealth or grain one possesses, if one is sick, one cannot enjoy them. It is said of certain multi-millionaires in this world that sometimes they were in a state where they could not even subsist on a single slice of bread, perhaps due to diseases born of karma. Even today, lay devotees living urban lives, sometimes due to karma created in this very life—not some ancient karma—eat inappropriately at banquets just like King Kosala did in his early days, and in their final years, they are forced to subsist on a slice of bread, perhaps even stale bread. They fall into such a state. That becomes the cause of their illness. The Blessed One has stated that various diseases arise from over-eating.

Therefore, this is an extremely valuable message for the world. Not only for ordinary devotees living their day-to-day lives, but also for everyone practicing Dhamma and meditation, striving for Nibbāna. If this principle is broken, what happens is exactly what happened to that pig. Although they may look stout externally, they not only meet an early death but also pave the way for numerous deaths throughout saṃsāra due to greed for food and taste. Because of this, the Blessed One has presented the principle of food to the Saṅgha using most extraordinary similes, instructing them to consume food as if it were medicine for an illness. What is the illness? They are told to treat food as a medicine for this self-groaning disease of hunger that everyone has. Not as a form of entertainment, but in a way that sometimes evokes a sense of urgency (saṃvega), the Blessed One has described food to practitioners so that it directly aids in attaining Nibbāna.

Next, He gives another simile: just as oil is applied to the axle of a moving cart to make it run, so should food be regarded. Maintaining this body in the four postures is like driving this vehicle of the body. Food is like the lubricating oil that assists this. They are told to think in that manner. There are other even more striking, urgency-inducing (saṃvega) similes. You might even feel frightened upon hearing them. The Blessed One describes the consuming of food—which is unavoidable if one is to cross over the desert of saṃsāra—through a unique allegorical story.

Parents who set out with their only child to cross a desert ran out of food midway. Having no other alternative, they killed and ate their own child. However the child died—various details are given by different commentators—let us understand that it was done for nothing other than to keep themselves alive. When they ate that food, eating their own child's flesh, they did not do so for entertainment. Beating their breasts, crying, "Alas, our only child!", they ate it simply to cross over the desert. The Blessed One presented such a perspective on food, urging one to view food in that heart-rending, urgency-evoking manner, so that it leads directly to Nibbāna.

Through these various similes, the Blessed One showed that food is indeed necessary for life. One cannot live without eating and drinking like the Nigaṇṭhas. According to the Middle Path, it is something to be used as an aid for one's Dhamma practice, for maintaining this life, and for realizing Nibbāna. So, even from that perspective, this mita-bhuk principle regarding food—eating while knowing one's measure—is a highly valuable practice.

Next, if we contemplate the phrase "contentment is the greatest wealth" (santutṭhiparamam dhanam), being content with what one has, we see that it is also an extremely valuable virtue in society. The reason is that no matter how much of a millionaire someone is, if they are miserly, envious, and not satisfied with what they have, they are always mentally poor. They are not rich in mind, but poor in mind. That is why contentment with what one has is considered the greatest wealth. "Contentment is the greatest wealth"—a person who lacks the virtue of being content with what they have is poor and destitute, no matter how much wealth they possess. To put it briefly, this also has a connection to the story of King Kosala. Why is that? We must relate the account of the battle with King Ajātasattu, which corresponds to the brief statement made by the King.

What was this issue regarding the village of Kāsi? These matters are shown by piecing together facts mentioned in various places in the Sutta discourses. First, it must be said that King Mahā Kosala—that is, the father of King Pasenadi of Kosala—gave his daughter in marriage to King Bimbisāra. That daughter was King Pasenadi's sister, and she was known as Queen Kosala Devī. Her son was Ajātasattu. Ajātasattu killed his father while still a prince and usurped the throne. After Bimbisāra was killed, King Pasenadi of Kosala, out of the grief he felt over this, decided that this patricide did not deserve a land belonging to their clan, and took back the village of Kāsi. In fact, that village of Kāsi had been given by King Mahā Kosala as a dowry—as mentioned, like a soap allowance—but King Kosala repossessed it. It was on this account that King Ajātasattu went to war with King Pasenadi of Kosala.

In that war, King Kosala was defeated the first time. The second time, King Kosala captured King Ajātasattu alive, caught him red-handed, and took possession of his fourfold army, taking them into custody. When the Blessed One came to know of this, He uttered a series of stanzas. Those stanzas did not convey praise for King Kosala. Rather, they showed how disadvantageous plunder is. The general idea of those stanzas is: some people plunder others at will, but they only understand when others come forward and plunder them in turn. Several other valuable, instructive points are mentioned in that series of stanzas:

"The slayer gets a slayer; the conqueror gets a conqueror; the abuser gets abused; the annoyer gets annoyed; the plunderer gets plundered."

This means that if someone kills, they too will meet death—either by that person or by someone else. You can understand the other points mentioned as well; they are the results of action. Once that karma rotates back to the plunderer, he himself becomes subject to having his own property plundered. Even though it was not said directly to King Kosala, he must have heard about this instructive stanza uttered by the Blessed One. Having heard it, King Kosala must have abandoned his earlier stance. Previously, when he captured King Ajātasattu, he had let him go simply out of familial consideration because he was his nephew, but he had confiscated his fourfold army. What did he do this time? He handed all of that back, gave his daughter in marriage to him, making him his son-in-law for the second time, and donated that village of Kāsi as bath-powder money. Thus, King Kosala adopted a very generous and valuable course of action there, instead of plundering. Within that lies "contentment is the greatest wealth" (santuṭṭhiparamam dhanam)—not expanding one's wealth by grabbing other people's possessions. Based on this, we can understand that King Kosala had received some guidance from the Blessed One, and that this principle of contentment was connected to the King's life.

Next, let us come to the third line: "Trust is the supreme relative" (vissāsaparamā ñātī). When you first think about it, it might not be immediately clear. What does this mean? Even when we think of relatives, our parents are the first who come to mind. But if there is no trust, if there is distrust, then there is no real relationship. Conversely, even if there is no blood relationship or any other kinship, if there is trust in someone, if there is mutual trust, that person is the true relative. That is what the Blessed One highlights. This fits here as well. King Ajātasattu was already a relative, a nephew. But despite being a relative, because there was no mutual trust, they went to war. Furthermore, that trust would have been further eroded if King Kosala had kept the fourfold army in his custody. Instead, understanding this, King Kosala handed all of that back, gave his daughter in marriage, and established trust in the truest sense. That trust is the true relationship. This holds true from that perspective. Next, the King stated another additional point. Thinking of making himself more trustworthy to the Saṅgha—believing that the monastics would respect him even more—what did he do? He wedded Princess Vāsabhakhattiyā of the Sakyan clan. Now, looking at this realistically, it is not that the Blessed One approved of this; whether he married her or not, the truth is that mutual trust itself is the real relative, the greatest relative. We can understand that this is something applicable to the life of King Kosala as well as to the lives of every one of you, dear devotees.

So now, in this way, we have three points that are useful even for our daily lives—when people speak of "daily life," they mostly think of the worldly side. First is the valuable principle of health. The food we consume, which we take to live, should not be used to aid death. It should not be used to bring death closer. But nowadays in society, a person is often measured by the food they eat. Such a concept has developed. Or they are measured by the number of stars of the place where they eat. Due to such hollow values, people die untimely deaths. They bring diseases upon their bodies prematurely. Consuming food and drink without any regard for what is suitable (sappāya) or unsuitable (asappāya), or for the beneficial or harmful quantity, they turn what should be a medicine into a poison. They make it a toxic poison. Such is the era we live in. Therefore, what the Blessed One presented through "health is the ultimate gain" is helpful not only to King Kosala but to us as well.

Next, if we briefly consider these few points, even the principle of being content with what one has applies to daily life. Looking around nowadays, we see a custom in society where people measure their wealth by looking at the appliances and items used by their neighbors. They do not follow the concept of "simple living and high thinking" that we frequently mention. Instead, they think, "If I do not have the latest luxury item that my neighbor uses, I am poor," and they fall into disastrous situations such as getting into debt to acquire it. Today's society is in such a plight.

Thus, everyone lives their daily lives mentally poor, no matter how many millions they possess in terms of money. This is because they lack contentment with what they have. On the other hand, there may be someone with little wealth, perhaps considered poor by society. If they possess this virtue of being content with what they have—and being content with what one has does not mean one stops earning and just remains satisfied with that—they live in a way that fits what they currently have. If one tries to live today according to a plan targeted for several years in the future, what happens? One gets into debt. One should live with the wealth one has today. When it increases slightly, one adjusts accordingly, but one must still practice saving and living within one's means. Even if we do not speak of these things, you, dear devotees, will contemplate them. You surely get to hear many sermons on these matters. However, what we have to say in connection with this is about those very values. Often, these are confused because of a wrong understanding of life values. If we remember this principle highlighted by the Blessed One, "contentment is the greatest wealth" (santutṭhiparamam dhanam), in our daily households, then without sighing in regret like those people, we can live happily with our children, subsisting on what we have, thinking, "Let us subsist on what is available; this is enough for us." One can lean toward such a practice.

Similarly, regarding relatives—many people make various efforts to build connections and establish relationships with influential people in order to gain high status in society. No matter how many relationships they build, whether blood relations or any other connections, if that trust is absent, if there is no trust, if there are grievances such that they cannot even look at each other's faces, if there is distrust, suspicion, and envy, then there is no real relationship. Therefore, the true relationship is that trust. If one has a good friend, that person is the best relative; no other relationship is needed. This too is an extremely valuable principle for society.

Now we come to the deepest part of the Dhamma. Do not let the word "deepest" frighten you. Although we cannot do so to the extent of the Blessed One, we always try to present this Dhamma in simple ways so that you can approach that depth. Why is it said, "Extinguishment is the ultimate happiness" (nibbānaparamam sukham)? Why is Nibbāna called the greatest happiness? Let us consider that for a moment.

Generally, we all associate happiness with pleasant feeling (vedanā). But the Blessed One declared something very extraordinary: yaṃ kiñci vedayitaṃ taṃ dukkhasmiṃ—that is, "whatever is felt is in suffering (dukkha)." The Blessed One realized and declared that whatever can be taken as a feeling (vedanā) is all suffering (dukkha). When we speak of feelings (vedanā), there are three kinds of feelings, which you may have heard of: pleasant feeling, painful feeling, and neutral feeling. In the Dhamma, they are termed sukha, dukkha, and adukkhamasukha. If we translate them into Sinhala, painful feeling, pleasant feeling, and neutral feeling can be described as "neither-painful-nor-pleasant feeling." "Neither-painful-nor-pleasant"—that is the dispensation term. It is neutral feeling (vedanā).

An ordinary person has no awareness of this neutral feeling (vedanā). In fact, the Blessed One states: What is the nature of a worldling (puthujjana) in this world? When afflicted by painful feeling, the worldling, hoping for pleasant feeling, inclines toward pleasant feeling, because the worldling knows no other way to escape painful feeling. As soon as painful feeling arises, the worldling grasps at pleasant feeling, because he has no clear understanding of neutral feeling. The teachers of old explain this through a simile. When a deer walks over a rocky mountain, the path by which the deer approached the mountain is visible, and the path by which it descended is also visible, but the footprints left on top of the rock are not visible. Similarly, an ordinary person generally does not perceive neutral feeling; it is a subtle thing. That subtle feeling (vedanā) is felt only by a meditative mind, by those who develop absorption (jhāna) meditation. Thus, here we have the "neither-painful-nor-pleasant" situated right between pain and pleasure.

If we direct our attention a bit more to this point, let us bring in a small simile. In villages, children play a small game called riding on coconut petioles. They sit on a coconut petiole and swing this way and that. For this same game, they sometimes construct a small plaything. They place a plank over a wooden log or some pivot, and two children sit on either end and swing up and down, back and forth. This is a small game called "seesaw, seesaw, seesaw." In fact, "seesaw" is the foreign name for this play equipment. This may also have come into common use now. They make a seesaw. Now, what happens on a seesaw is a continuous swinging. In truth, existence is also just like this. This saṃsāric existence is exactly like this. It is a swinging between suffering (dukkha) and pleasure. Like swinging on a swing, it is a kind of oscillation. It is between these two extremes that this entire saṃsāric existence lies. They go on swinging, saying "seesaw, seesaw." But the Blessed One saw the risk and danger inherent in this. This never comes to an end. Within this, one only falls into suffering (dukkha). Thinking of escaping painful feeling, one goes to pleasant feeling; but when one gets there and looks, it is not permanent (anicca). When it ends there, this side sinks down again. That is how it is.

That is precisely what the Blessed One points out regarding the three feelings (vedanā). The nature of painful feeling is that it is painful as long as it lasts, and pleasant when it changes. The nature of pleasant feeling is that it is pleasant while it lasts, and painful when it changes. But the neutral feeling—the feeling in the middle—is a subtle thing. It is painful as long as it is not understood; it is pleasant when it is understood. This is expressed as aññānadukkhā, ñāṇasukhā. Aññāṇa means not understanding. As long as one does not understand neutral feeling, it is suffering (dukkha). But if at some point wisdom, understanding, and comprehension reach it, it can be turned into happiness. Based on this very Dhamma principle, even before the time of the Buddha, those who strived to escape this saṃsāra detached themselves from the five cords of sensual pleasure in which the ordinary worldlings are mired, developed absorption (jhāna) meditation, and gradually brought their minds to that third level—the neutral state.

If we look at this in terms of formations (saṅkhāra), there is something in the Dhamma we must recollect: the Blessed One described Nibbāna as the stilling of all formations (sabba-saṅkhārasamatha). Let us define formations (saṅkhāra) as "constructs" or "fabrications." This word saṅkhāra is an extremely deep term. It is stated: "all formations are impermanent" (sabbe saṅkhārā aniccā). Throughout this entire saṃsāric existence, there is only an accumulation of formations (saṅkhāra). But because of the impermanent (anicca) nature of these formations, the Blessed One declared that this entire saṃsāra is suffering (dukkha). That is why the Blessed One declared: "formations are the ultimate suffering" (saṅkhārā paramā dukkhā). Even if we eliminate and escape all those gross, coarse forms of suffering that we usually think of, in the end, this very nature of formations is suffering (dukkha). Formations (saṅkhāra) are the greatest suffering (dukkha).

There are three subtle levels of these formations (saṅkhāra). To a practitioner (yogāvacara) developing absorption, the out-breath becomes perceptible. The troubles and distresses of other external activities are indeed suffering (dukkha), but when viewed at the minimum level, even this in-breath and out-breath possess the nature of suffering (dukkha), though the ordinary world does not understand this. In short, this in-breath and out-breath are identified as bodily formations (kāya-saṅkhāra), the subtlest level of bodily formations. Next, verbal formations (vacī-saṅkhāra) are the formations of speech; at the minimum level, these fabrications of speech are described as vitakka (thought-conception) and vicāra (discursive thinking)—thoughts within the mind, various kinds of thoughts. When a problem arises, say, on a sleepless night, one can clearly understand what a suffering (dukkha) this vitakka and vicāra can be. One cannot sleep; thoughts keep coming, one after another, and one cannot escape them. It is like being dragged by both hands toward a pit of embers. That is vitakka and vicāra. As the mind becomes subtler and subtler, moving toward levels of absorption, one realizes that this verbal formation (vacī-saṅkhāra) is also suffering (dukkha). Then, beyond that, there is mental formation (citta-saṅkhāra).

That is directly connected to the mind itself. There, perception (saññā) and feeling (vedanā) are indicated. Perception (saññā) means recognition. In our minds, there is a certain capacity—a capacity to recognize things, as well as a capacity to experience. This is what we started with when we spoke of pleasure and pain. These two, perception (saññā) and feeling (vedanā), are extremely subtle formations (saṅkhāra). They are called mental formations (citta-saṅkhāra). It was to escape from this level of formations (saṅkhāra) that the yogis of old strived. By the time the Buddha appeared, they had reached the utmost limit of their efforts. One such person who had gone to that limit was Uddaka Rāmaputta. You have heard that when the Blessed One went in search of teachers, He approached two teachers: Āḷāra Kālāma and Uddaka Rāmaputta. The teacher Āḷāra Kālāma had attained an extremely high state of absorption called the sphere of nothingness (ākāṅkhaṇāyatana). Even higher than that, the teacher Uddaka Rāmaputta had attained the state known as the sphere of neither-perception-nor-non-perception (nevasaññānāsaññāyatana).

If we are to understand this sphere of neither-perception-nor-non-perception, we must look at it like this: "perception is neither present nor absent." Now we return to our seesaw. In nevasaññānāsaññāyatana, perception is neither absent nor present. Within it, there is a hesitation, a state of double-mindedness, a perturbation, like standing on top of a fence. The yogis of that era, when the Blessed One appeared, had reached such a state. Thus, Uddaka Rāmaputta was the final teacher He approached. When asked, "What do you teach?", he replied, "The sphere of neither-perception-nor-non-perception." Even before that teacher had finished speaking, the Blessed One had already attained it, having realized such states on countless occasions throughout past saṃsāra. However, the Blessed One was not satisfied with it. Why? Because there was still hesitation. Even if one stands at the center of the seesaw, it still oscillates. There is no true peace there. It is impermanent (anicca).

That is why the Blessed One declared that painful feeling (vedanā) needs no further explanation; it is like a thorn, a great suffering (dukkha). As for pleasant feeling (vedanā), while it is present, it is pleasant, but when it undergoes change (vipariṇāma), its painful nature is realized. Therefore, it too is suffering (dukkha). So, painful feeling (vedanā) needs no further explanation; it is entirely suffering (dukkha), like an embedded thorn. Pleasant feeling (vedanā) is suffering (dukkha) when it changes. Hence, a wise person knows beforehand: "Here comes a pleasant feeling, and along with its change, I will now have to face suffering (dukkha)." Next, there is neither-painful-nor-pleasant (adukkhamasukha), which we called the neutral middle ground. That is what those past teachers grasped onto as a great refuge. But the Blessed One pointed out that it too is impermanent (anicca). Why? Because even if one attains such absorption states and is reborn in the Brahma worlds, remaining there for eons, one still rotates back.

Such is the situation. That is why the Blessed One presented the stilling of all formations (saṅkhāra) as the greatest attainment. The Blessed One declared that whatever feelings (vedanā) exist, whether pleasant, painful, or neither-painful-nor-pleasant, every feeling (vedanā) is suffering (dukkha). Thus, on one occasion, the Blessed One stated to the Venerable Ānanda that some ascetics of other sects might raise this debate: "This Ascetic Gotama speaks of a unique meditative state, a unique state of concentration called the 'cessation of perception and feeling' (saññā-vedayita-nirodha). What is that? What kind of thing is it?" They would then say: "They declare this special absorption state, this state of attainment called 'cessation of perception and feeling' as happiness. How can it be happiness if there is no perception, feeling, or anything else present? How can there be happiness if there is no feeling (vedanā)?" Foreseeing that they might raise this argument, the Blessed One told Venerable Ānanda beforehand: "To those who raise such arguments, explain it in this way: The Blessed One does not describe happiness solely in terms of pleasant feeling (vedanā). Wherever happiness is found, the Blessed One designates that very place as happiness." What this points to is not worldly happiness, but supramundane happiness. In supramundane happiness, one has escaped even from the level of feeling (vedanā). Because all levels of worldly happiness are impermanent (anicca). Painful feeling (vedanā) needs no further elaboration. Pleasant feeling (vedanā) is suffering (dukkha) when it changes. And neutral feeling (vedanā) is the subtlest form of suffering (dukkha) within formations (saṅkhāra).

If we analyze this further, another valuable concept is shown in the Dhamma. It is deep, but we will mention it briefly for you, wise devotees, to contemplate. The levels of suffering are presented in three modes: dukkha-dukkhatā (suffering as pain), vipariṇāma-dukkhatā (suffering due to change), and saṅkhāra-dukkhatā (suffering due to formations). Dukkha-dukkhatā refers to painful feeling (vedanā)—sheer suffering (dukkha) when viewed coarsely, which anyone can recognize. Vipariṇāma-dukkhatā refers to pleasant feelings (vedanā); because it leads to suffering (dukkha) when it changes, pleasant feeling (vedanā) is termed suffering due to change. And saṅkhāra-dukkhatā refers to that neutral state we mentioned. The mode of suffering due to formations (saṅkhāra-dukkhatā) is the last one shown. It is experienced only by those who have developed their minds in the manner described. Only they truly understand the danger of this saṃsāra—that not a single one of these feelings (vedanā) can be grasped, and that this seesaw-swinging must be brought to an end. It is that cessation of existence, rather than existence itself, which is needed. It is for this purpose—for this realization—that the Blessed One preached this supramundane Dhamma.

Thus, what we have here is this: beneath that "neither-painful-nor-pleasant" neutral feeling lies ignorance, lack of knowledge, and lack of comprehension. The moment it is turned into comprehension, there is happiness. That becomes a peaceful, exquisite happiness. That is precisely what the Blessed One ultimately presented as Nibbāna. This "cessation of perception and feeling" (saññā-vedayita-nirodha) is a state where both perceptions and feelings are ceased. The Blessed One revealed this; no other teacher was able to do so. It is the highest state of concentration, a state of attainment, having freed oneself from both perception and feeling. Emerging from it, one stands in Nibbāna. That is to say, one has completely escaped from formations (saṅkhāra). Escaping from formations (saṅkhāra) is indeed the highest happiness. That is supramundane happiness, which is designated as Nibbāna.

So, what did the Blessed One present as that realization? Let us return to our seesaw. What is the cause of this seesaw's swinging? It is that pivot placed in the middle, isn't it? It is over that pivot in the middle that the plank is placed. The Blessed One removed that very pivot. What is this pivot? In the Dhamma, it is called the conceit "I am" (asmimāna)—the conceit of "I am." Its coarse aspect is what you have heard of as the view of existing group/body (sakkāya-diṭṭhi), which thinks in terms of "I" and "mine." Today, we hear everyone talking about the view of existing group/body (sakkāya-diṭṭhi): "form is self, feeling is self"—that coarse concept of self. The subtlest level of that is "I am"—the conceit "I am." It exists at an extremely subtle level, remaining all the way up to the stage of the non-returner (anāgāmi). As long as it is present, that swinging continues; becoming (bhava) remains, existence remains. But the Buddha-eye saw that this is suffering (dukkha). Because, driven by the force of karma within that existence, one falls into various states of becoming (bhava), wandering in saṃsāra for a long time through miserable realms and happy realms. The only solution is to escape from this becoming (bhava). That is called the cessation of becoming (bhava-nirodha), the stopping of that swinging. What is required for this is to realize the true nature of feelings (vedanā), and to see that underlying all these feelings is the conceit "I am" (asmimāna), which lies even deeper than the concepts of "I" and "mine." This is not something to be acquired merely through words; it can only be realized by walking this path of Dhamma.

That is what this is about. This is discussed in various ways, and we have illustrated it here using a small simile. Now, we must contemplate why it is said, "Extinguishment is the ultimate happiness" (nibbānaparamam sukham). We brought this up because it is relevant to our theme. Why is Nibbāna called the ultimate happiness? King Pasenadi of Kosala presented those four worldly matters as happiness. But the Blessed One did not stop there. He did not say, "Yes, yes, Great King, that is indeed the greatest happiness; and becoming related to us is also the greatest thing." He did not say, "Very well, we too are now relatives." He did not leave it at the worldly level. He took it all the way to Nibbāna. He gave a hint: "These are not the true happiness." Even health is not permanent (anicca). Rogantaṃ hi ārogyaṃ—health ends in illness. Therefore, although "health is the ultimate gain" (ārogāparamā lābhā) holds true as a gain, and health is the highest among gains, it is not the ultimate happiness. "Contentment is the greatest wealth" (santutṭhiparamam dhaṇaṃ), being content with what one has; or other kinds of wealth—they are indeed wealth, but ultimate happiness is not found there. "Trust is the supreme relative" (vissāsaparamā ñātī)—even if one establishes relationships and maintains trust among relatives, there is no true happiness in any of that. All of these are merely a pile of formations (saṅkhāra). Every single one of them is a formation (saṅkhāra). Therefore, escaping from formations—which is called the stilling of all formations (sabbasankhārasamatha)—is indeed the highest happiness. That is what the Blessed One highlighted here. Nibbāna is defined as sabbasankhārasamatha—the stilling of all formations (saṅkhāra).

We have briefly mentioned what formations (saṅkhāra) are. Indeed, the coarse part of formations exists as karma. You may have heard of this: if one performs unwholesome karma, as everyone knows, one has to suffer in the realms of misery. If one performs unwholesome deeds, one is first of all afraid of that. Then, because of that, we think, "Let us instead perform meritorious deeds and go to the heavenly worlds." But even if we go there, at the moment of passing away (cuti), there is great suffering (dukkha). After passing away from there, there is no telling where one will fall next. That is why the Blessed One declared that not only the heavenly worlds but even the Brahma worlds are impermanent (anicca). It is said that when the Blessed One preached the Dhamma, even the Brahmas were shaken: "We too are impermanent! All this time we thought we were permanent, but now we see that we too are impermanent," and they became afraid. That is the Lion's Roar (sīhanāda). The Buddha roared his Lion's Roar. It is recorded that when He declared sabbe saṅkhārā aniccā—"all formations are impermanent"—even the Brahmas were shaken. Such is the status of worldly things. Therefore, the Blessed One points out that one must escape from all of them, escaping from the state of formations (saṅkhāra) to attain Nibbāna, which is unformed (visankhāra / Unconditioned). That is to say, since formations (saṅkhāra) arise due to ignorance (avijjā), all merit and demerit that cause pleasure and pain are performed based on the ignorance of "I" and "mine." One cannot escape this merely by thinking about it. It must be realized by gradually developing meditation. However, as we have stated on previous occasions, one first turns away from unwholesome actions and sins, inclining the mind toward merit. Then, without stopping there, one gradually engages in meditation to transcend both merit and demerit, gradually practicing insight (vipassanā) to see things as impermanent (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and not-self (anattā). Seeing the impermanent (anicca) nature of these formations (saṅkhāra), one develops disenchantment with saṃsāra, and only then can one escape this cycle. Only then can one directly realize that noble state of Nibbāna in this very life. That state is the end of that seesaw-swinging. In other words, the path leading to that is this entire Buddhist practice.

This is what we frequently remind you, dear devotees. What is the meaning of the practice by which a Buddhist tames himself—whether we look at it briefly as the Noble Eightfold Path or through various other frameworks like the four foundations of mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna)? It is to bring the mind to that state. It is to remove that conceit "I am" (asmimāna)—even that underlying conceit of "I am"—so that one's life is lived just like the trees and plants around us. Since trees and plants do not possess consciousness (viññāṇa), there is no such thing as suffering (dukkha) for them. When a rubber tree is tapped, latex flows, but we do not think it experiences painful feeling (vedanā). Trees and plants do not have that kind of problem. But it is for a conscious being—one endowed with consciousness (viññāṇa)—that this suffering (dukkha) exists. Furthermore, existence does not end here. This was seen not only by the Blessed One, but also by others who could perceive the sequence of past aggregates. Before the Blessed One, there were yogis who could see hundreds of thousands of past births (jāti). They too saw this problem of saṃsāra. They saw the problem, but they could not find the answer. Only the Blessed One was able to find the true answer.

Thus, what we call accumulating karma is that very coarse level of formations (saṅkhāra). We generate two types of karma: merit and demerit. We are responsible for them, because we perform merit and demerit based on the premise of "I" and "mine." We emphasize this because many people have confused these matters today. There is a concept called "the right view of ownership of karma" (kammāsakatā sammādiṭṭhi). Based on that, we turn away from sinful, unwholesome actions and direct the mind toward wholesome karma. Then we perform wholesome actions, thereby securing good states of rebirth in happy realms. But even though that arrangement is made, one does not stop there. When we look at it according to the Middle Path of the Blessed One, we do not grasp onto any of these; we use them all as aids. It is just as we said about food. Everything is used as an aid, even the states of absorption (jhāna).

Therefore, using merit and wholesome actions as aids, we can practice meditation. We obtain lives endowed with various blessings of birth (upadhi-sampatti) and strong intellectual capacities. But we do not stop there. If we remain satisfied with that, our past bad karma can surface, and without making any further progress, we can fall back into the realms of misery. Instead, we use those assets; having calmed and concentrated the mind through serenity (samatha) meditation, and based on that, we contemplate the three characteristics pointed out by the Blessed One: impermanence (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and not-self (anattā). Taking up specific subjects of meditation (kammaṭṭhāna), we must practice meditation and see this within ourselves. Because the Blessed One pointed out that this Dhamma is to be directly realized by oneself. This is not something to be acquired externally from someone else's explanation; it must be seen within one's own five aggregates (pañcakkhandha).

First, we must understand this aggregate of form (rūpakkhandha), this aggregate of feeling (vedanākkhandha)—this heap of form, heap of feelings, heap of perceptions, heap of formations (saṅkhāras), and heap of consciousnesses—as just heaps. Although we refer to them as the five aggregates (pañcakkhandha), meaning "heaps," an ordinary person does not perceive them as heaps. There is a natural tendency to take them as a single, solid unit. It is only the meditating yogi who can see this. As the mind gradually becomes concentrated and wise attention (yoniso manasikāra) is directed toward this, one sees: "Here is a heap of form, here is a heap of feelings." If it is a heap, each component arises and passes away. What is present here is a vast heap of arisings and passings-away. In the end, as one looks closely, it is not even a heap of things arising and a heap of things passing away; it is simply a vast heap of passing away. In this manner, it begins to appear in a deep way. Then, one's attachment to this fades. "This is something that decays, something that breaks down. If I grasp onto this, will I not perish along with it?" It is then that the inclination to let go arises; letting go occurs. The primary sign of liberation through letting go appears.

Gradually letting go in this manner—now, what was the mistake made by Āḷāra Kālāma, Uddaka Rāmaputta, and others? As soon as they attained those states of absorption, they immersed themselves in that pleasure and grasped it as self. It was because they took it as self that they were unable to cross over. The Blessed One showed that this existence is something that arises due to a network of causes and conditions. When one correctly sees that network of causes and conditions, the perception of self—the feeling of "I" and "mine"—is gradually removed. The more one sees this, the deeper one sees it, and that is what the three characteristics are about. Whatever is impermanent (anicca) is suffering (dukkha), because one constantly has to keep constructing what is impermanent.

Formations (saṅkhāra) are a heap of fabrications. We frequently remind you of the simile of the wild banana trunk. Why did the Blessed One compare formations (saṅkhāra) to a banana trunk? There is no core, no heartwood. What exists here is merely a network of causes and conditions. A foolish person mistakes it for a tree trunk with a solid core of wood. In the same way, we take this aggregate of form (rūpakkhandha), give it a name, and take it as "I am so-and-so." The same applies to other things, and ultimately to the mind. That is extremely subtle. The mind grasps it as "I" and "mine." Those past yogis and wrong-view holders ultimately grasped this mind, this consciousness (viññāṇa), taking it as self. But the Blessed One pointed out that all of this is a heap of formations (saṅkhāra). It is upon a heap of formations (saṅkhāra) that this mind called consciousness (viññāṇa) exists. Therefore, to put it briefly, the Blessed One revealed all of this as suffering (dukkha). The five aggregates (pañcakkhandha) are entirely suffering (dukkha) as long as one remains in becoming (bhava). Contemplating this at the subtlest level, the entirety of becoming (bhava) is suffering (dukkha).

Now, this is difficult for someone to comprehend. That is why we illustrate it with the medical simile. When presenting the Blessed One as the incomparable physician, the true nature of the illness must be stated. If this illness is to be cured completely, one must escape from the entire heap of formations (saṅkhāra). By gradually stilling those formations (saṅkhāra) at their subtlest levels—moving from the in-breath and out-breath, to vitakka and vicāra, and then to perception and feeling—one ultimately escapes from all feelings (vedanā). That is why Nibbāna is called an unfelt happiness (avedayita-sukha). You may have heard that everything in this world is the happiness of experiencing (vedayita-sukha), whereas Nibbāna is the happiness of stilling (upasama-sukha). Everything else is the happiness of experiencing; Nibbāna is the happiness of stilling. Therefore, the journey toward that stilling, that tranquility, is this path to Nibbāna. It was in reference to this that the

Therefore, we should consider that on this valuable day, this meritorious gathering of people, having contemplated from a worldly perspective on what we call daily worldly life, has received many Dhamma points that will help them live with more peace, happiness, relief, and comfort than before. Furthermore, without stopping there, they have gained some understanding through this short Dhamma sermon regarding Nibbāna, which assists in bringing to an end this entire saṃsāric existence—a task we have been unable to accomplish for so long. You should understand that this has been a wonderful opportunity to develop the spiritual faculties and powers of conviction (saddhā), energy (viriya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samadhi), and wisdom (paññā) that aid in attaining Nibbāna. May you make the aspiration: "By developing these strengths, associating with noble friends (kalyāṇamittas), and without any other worldly aspirations, may we practice well within this Buddha's dispensation, developing virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā), and by realizing the paths and fruits of Stream-entry (Sotāpanna), Once-returning (Sakadāgāmi), Non-returning (Anāgāmi), and Arahantship, may this meritorious acquisition of hearing the Dhamma surely lead us to escape all saṃsāric suffering (dukkha) and realize that happiness of stilling, the ultimate happiness!"

In the same way, may you share these merits by reciting stanzas, wishing that all living beings from the lowest hell (Avīci) to the highest heaven (Akaniṭṭha), including your own deceased relatives who desire merit and seek Nibbāna, may rejoice in this meritorious deed of delivering and hearing the Dhamma, and through one of the three forms of enlightenment they aspire to, may they bring this saṃsāric suffering (dukkha) to an end as quickly as possible, freeing themselves from all suffering (dukkha) such as birth (jāti), aging and death (jarāmaraṇa), and sickness, and find peace in the supreme, deathless, great Nibbāna.

From:

Verses 51-52 from the Pupphavagga (Chapter on Flowers) of the Dhammapada

Dear Listeners,

It was on a full-moon day of Esala, just like today, that our Buddha, the Teacher of the Three Worlds, having attained Supreme Enlightenment, delivered His first Dhamma sermon, the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta, to the world of devas and humans. Even today, we conduct these Dhamma sermons by the power and efficacy of that Wheel of Dhamma set in motion for the first time on that day. The True Dhamma, the word of the Buddha, is entirely "well-spoken" (subhāsita). Today, we have selected as our theme two stanzas which declare that this well-spoken word of the Buddha is as useless as a colorful but scentless flower to one who does not practice it, whereas it becomes a flower that is both colorful and fragrant to the one who puts it into practice.

These two stanzas were preached in connection with an incident concerning the lay disciple Chattapāni. In the texts, it is recorded as follows: There lived in Sāvattthī a lay disciple who was an Anāgāmi (Non-Returner) with a highly advanced knowledge of the Dhamma. One day, early in the morning, this lay disciple came to see the Buddha. While he was seated listening attentively to a Dhamma discussion, King Pasenadi of Kosala arrived there. Seeing this, the lay disciple thought: "Now, if I rise upon seeing the king according to normal custom, it would be a mark of disrespect to the Teacher. For it would be like rising up upon seeing a regional ruler while in the presence of the Supreme King of Kings. I know that if I do not rise, the king will get angry with me. But that does not matter; let him be angry," he thought, and remained seated. Indeed, seeing this, the king felt some resentment and anger. Reading the king's mind, the Buddha began to praise the virtues of that lay disciple to the king. He did not explicitly state that Chattapāni Upāsaka was an Anāgāmi, but He gave the king the impression that he was a noble disciple (Ariya), a person of great value. Thus, the king's heart softened somewhat.

On a later day, while the king was on the upper terrace of his palace, he saw Chattapāni Upāsaka passing through the palace courtyard holding an umbrella and wearing sandals. Seeing him, the king sent a messenger to call him. As soon as he received the message, Chattapāni Upāsaka put aside his umbrella and sandals and came to see the king. When he arrived and stood to one side, the king asked: "Why did you put aside your umbrella and sandals?" Then the lay disciple replied: "I did so because I was told that Your Majesty had summoned me." "Did you only realize today that I am the king?" asked the king. "No, we have always known that Your Majesty is the king." "Then why did you not rise when you saw me that day?" At that, he replied: "Thinking that rising upon seeing a regional ruler in the presence of the Supreme King of Kings would be disrespectful to that Supreme Ruler, I did not rise out of respect for the Teacher."

Thereupon, the king reconciled his mind and said: "Very well, let that matter be. I have heard that you, lay devotee, are very learned in the Dhamma and know what is right and wrong. Therefore, could you not teach the Dhamma to the queens of our harem?" He replied that he could not do so. When asked why, he said that the royal household is a place fraught with complications, where right and wrong are difficult to navigate, and one could easily get entangled in serious accusations and faults. Then the king said: "Do not say so. Do not harbor any hesitation or apprehension thinking about how you did not rise upon seeing me that day." But the lay disciple replied: "It is not because of that. When a lay person engages in such a task, various issues and suspicions arise. Please arrange for an ordained monk, a member of the Sangha, to come for that purpose." The king agreed, saying, "Very well, you may go now, lay disciple," and thereafter went to see the Buddha and invited Him to come regularly with the Sangha to preach the Dhamma to the queens. For Queen Mallikā and Queen Vāsabhakhattiyā were constantly requesting and pleading to hear the Dhamma. The Buddha replied that Buddhas do not go to one and the same place continuously. "Then please assign one monk to us," the king requested. Thereupon, the Buddha entrusted this task to Ven. Ānanda.

Thus, Ven. Ānanda regularly went to the palace and taught and explained the Dhamma to Queen Mallikā and Queen Vāsabhakhattiyā. One day, the Buddha asked: "How is it, Ānanda, are the female lay disciples learning the Dhamma?" "Yes, Bhante." "Who is learning better?" "Queen Mallikā learns very well, but Vāsabhakhattiyā, the Blessed One's kinswoman, does not learn properly," he said. It was on that occasion that the Buddha preached the two stanzas we took as our theme. He uttered those two stanzas giving the idea that this Dhamma becomes truly meaningful only to the one who learns it properly, retains it, and puts it into practice. Let us look at their meaning.

Yathāpi ruciraṃ pupphaṃ, vaṇṇavantaṃ agandhakaṃ,

Evaṃ subhāsitaṃ vācā, aphalā hoti akubbato.

"Just as a beautiful flower, colorful but scentless, so is a well-spoken word fruitless for one who does not act upon it."

Then the other stanza:

Yathāpi ruciraṃ pupphaṃ, vaṇṇavantaṃ sagandhakaṃ,

Evaṃ subhāsitaṃ vācā, saphalā hoti pakkubbato.

"Just as a beautiful flower, colorful and full of scent, so is a well-spoken word fruitful for one who acts upon it." In this manner, those two stanzas were delivered.

That is the background story of those stanzas. Now, before we delve into the meaning of the stanzas themselves, there are certain lessons we can take as examples from the background story we have related so far. Indeed, this lay disciple Chattapāṇi is a worthy character of that nature. Through the incident described, we can understand that he was someone who lived according to the values and virtues developed in accordance with the Buddha's teachings, like a fragrant flower—a person possessing the power of the Dhamma. His way of acting with a certain strength of Dhamma, giving precedence to respect for the Teacher over royal respect without being subservient to titles and positions, is evident in his remaining seated when he saw the king in the presence of the Buddha. That is indeed a great example for the people of today as well. For it is to the Dhamma that the primary place must be given. Cowering and being subservient before such worldly state power is an insult to the Dhamma.

Likewise is the other point. When the king, pleased with him, invited him to preach the Dhamma to the queens, an ordinary person would have seen it as a great opportunity to gain royal favor, wealth, and honor, thinking, "This is excellent, Your Majesty, I shall come tomorrow, or even today," and would have highly welcomed and accepted the task of preaching to the queens. But this lay disciple thought far-sightedly about the danger involved. Understanding that various complications could arise from this, his ability even at that moment to decline the king's request was a highly valuable quality. We must understand through this that, like a colorful and fragrant flower, a profound spiritual integrity lies behind the character of Chattapāṇi Upāsaka.

Now, the news about the queens is not so important there. The main point the Buddha showed us by using that incident as a basis is that this Dhamma is not something to be confined only to learning. Only when it is put into practice can the true power and benefit of this Dhamma be obtained. No matter how beautiful a flower is, if it has no scent, it is just like a paper flower. There is no real benefit in a paper flower. That is the point shown here. Therefore, in connection with this, let us now reflect on this True Dhamma.

When we speak of this True Dhamma, you can bring to mind the six qualities of the Dhamma. Everyone knows these six qualities: Svākkhāta (well-expounded), Sandiṭṭhika (directly visible), Akālika (immediate/timeless), Ehipassika (inviting one to come and see), Opanayika (leading inwards/progressive), and Paccattaṃ veditabbo viññūhi (to be personally realized by the wise). From the way these six qualities are explained, we can understand that this True Dhamma is indeed like a challenge for practice. In short, the Buddha explained the word Svākkhāta in this manner: "Monks, in a poorly-expounded (durakkhāta) Dhamma and Vinaya... Now, Svākkhāta means well-expounded, beautifully taught; whereas Durakkhāta means badly expounded, wrongly expounded." If you understand those two words in that way, then you can understand the passage declared by the Buddha: "Monks, in a poorly-expounded Dhamma and Vinaya, the lazy person (kusīta) dwells in comfort." That is to say, in a Dhamma that is taught wrongly or not properly, in that Dhamma-Vinaya—meaning in that dispensation—the lazy, indolent man lives comfortably and happily. "But in a well-expounded Dhamma and Vinaya, it is the energetic person (vīriyavanta) who dwells in comfort." In a dispensation of well-expounded Dhamma, it is the energetic one who lives happily. A very profound matter is expressed here. Why was it said that the lazy person lives in comfort in that Dhamma-Vinaya? Through that, we can also grasp the meaning of that word. We said that the term implies a wrongly or badly expounded Dhamma. What is the idea there? If a Dhamma sets forth a certain goal, but that goal cannot be achieved by practicing that Dhamma, then it is a poorly-expounded Dhamma-Vinaya (durakkhāta). A well-expounded Dhamma-Vinaya (svākkhāta) is one where whatever it promises to deliver is properly accomplished. Therefore, if one exerts effort in a poorly-expounded Dhamma-Vinaya, it is useless; it is a wasted effort. It is of no use. That is why it was said that the lazy person dwells in comfort. Since the well-expounded Dhamma-Vinaya is fruitful and fulfills the desired goal, in that dispensation, it is indeed the energetic one who achieves those results, rejoices, and dwells in comfort. That is the idea behind the term Svākkhāta.

Let us understand the other terms based on that as well. You all may have heard about them to some extent. Next, the specialty of this Dhamma lies there. A very profound idea is expressed there. This Dhamma is not something where you do it now and get the results only hereafter. It is Sandiṭṭhika—its results can be seen right here and now, before one's very eyes; that is its specialty. Sandiṭṭhika means, just like saying "sandiṭṭhiko dhammo", it can be experienced in this very world, in this very life. Next, Akālika (immediate/timeless) means without delay, meaning there is no gap of time between the effort made and the result. In short, there is no gap between the Path and its Fruit. If one is engaged in the path of practice, that path culminates immediately in the Fruit. Since there is no interval in between, it is Akālika—there is no time gap there. Sandiṭṭhika, Akālika. Ehipassika means that within this Dhamma itself, there is a challenging power that says, "Come and see!" That is to say, it is as if the Dhamma itself is crying out, saying: "Put this Dhamma into practice and see!" Next, Opanayika means: if it said "Come and see," the next step is leading, drawing close; upanayati means bringing close. Where does it lead? Not to any external place, but within, into the heart. That is Opanayika. Since the results of this practice must be experienced from within, this Dhamma must be brought right inside. Next, that is exactly why it is finally said: Paccattaṃ veditabbo viññūhi—it is a Dhamma to be personally realized by the wise. It cannot be shown to another. It is a Dhamma that each individual must realize for themselves by walking along this path of practice.

Now, based on that, we can see that on one hand, this Dhamma is for the energetic—inviting them to put this Dhamma into practice and obtain its fruits. Thus, a very valuable idea is expressed there. Next, let us see: we mentioned at the very beginning that the Buddha commenced His Dhamma sermons with the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta. In short, the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta is presented as the very first sermon in our dispensation. Indeed, its core and essence is the question of the path of practice (paṭipadā). In that sermon, the Buddha showed the world a certain Middle Path, going between two extremes. What are the two extremes? One extreme is indulgence in sensual pleasures (kāmasukhallikānuyoga). The other extreme is self-mortification (attakilamathānuyoga), which was shown by various teachers of that time like the Nigaṇṭhas and other sectarians—the attempt to achieve liberation by severely tormenting the body. Rejecting both, the Buddha revealed an entirely new path of practice called the Middle Way. It is known in brief as the Noble Eightfold Path. You all have understood this to some extent. The path that is capable of bringing about a complete transformation of a person's life, consisting of eight steps or eight factors, is called the Noble Eightfold Path: Right View, Right Thought, Right Speech, Right Action, Right Livelihood, Right Effort, Right Mindfulness, and Right Concentration. Thus, this Noble Eightfold Path is introduced as the Middle Path. That brings us next to the subject of this Middle Path.

What is present within this Middle Path (majjhimā paṭipadā) is the very same energy (vīriya) we mentioned earlier. There is a way of applying this energy in a moderate measure; in other words, it is a path of practice that shows a certain balance of energy. So, in this regard, we should reflect as follows: The Buddha has pointed out "Right Effort" (Sammā Vāyāma) within this Noble Eightfold Path itself. Sammā Vāyāma means right effort. Correct exertion means the way energy must be applied in the proper manner. This is also called the Great Efforts (Sammappadhāna). This word padhāna also means supreme effort or exertion. The words vāyāma, vīriya, and padhāna are largely synonymous. Thus, this energy, known as the Four Great Efforts (Sammappadhāna) or Right Effort (Sammā Vāyāma), has been shown by the Buddha in four ways. They are briefly known by these words: saṃvara (restraint), pahāna (abandoning), bhāvanā (developing), and anurakkhaṇa (protecting/maintaining). Saṃvara means closing or preventing, if we take its simple meaning. Pahāna means removing or discarding. Bhāvanā means developing or cultivating, and anurakkhaṇa means guarding or maintaining. Next, let us consider why this energy was shown in four ways. The Buddha has explained that this stream of consciousness (citta-santāna) is like a flowing river. Thus, the Buddha analyzed this mind as having the characteristic of movement—meaning in the sense of moving and flowing—or as something possessing a dynamic nature like a flowing river. Therefore, this energy is something that must be applied with great care, systematically. Indeed, it becomes fourfold.

As an analogy, you all know that if a dam is to be built across a swiftly flowing river, a fourfold effort is required. Before building the dam, the incoming unwanted water must be blocked; it must be closed off (saṃvara). Next, the unwanted water already remaining there must be removed (pahāna). Meanwhile, in the sense of bhāvanā (development), one must begin the preliminary work of building the dam, gathering the necessary materials, and starting to construct the dam. Then, in keeping with the word anurakkhaṇa (maintenance), one must engage in guarding it; it must be protected and reinforced so that it is not swept away again. Indeed, those four points are expressed in the Buddha's analysis of the Four Great Efforts (Sammappadhāna). Why do we explain this in such detail? Because nowadays, various people have opinions regarding the work of the mind, saying: "This is not something where energy, exertion, effort, or striving should be applied. One should just watch the mind as it goes of its own accord." In truth, because they do not understand the fundamental principles of the Middle Path which the Buddha presented as so supreme, many people these days have turned this practice into mere "doing nothing" (idleness). Following the views put forward by certain philosophers who have no correct understanding of this Dhamma, and lacking proper comprehension of the path of practice in this dispensation, they interpret it as just sitting idle. But if you just let the mind wander as it likes and simply watch it, the task will not be accomplished. One has to keep in mind the analogy of building the dam.

If we are to condense this Noble Eightfold Path, it consists of Sīla (Morality), Samādhi (Concentration), and Paññā (Wisdom). It is the Threefold Training of Morality, Concentration, and Wisdom that is contained within this Noble Eightfold Path. Morality (Sīla) means the restraint and discipline of body and speech. Concentration (Samādhi) means the one-pointedness of mind. Wisdom (Paññā) means seeing in terms of Anicca (Impermanent), Dukkha (Suffering), and Anattā (Not-self) through insight (vipassanā). There is a very ancient stanza that encapsulates this, which you all often use even as a protective chant (paritta):

Sabba pāpassa akaraṇaṃ, kusalassa upasampadā,

Sacitta pariyodapanaṃ, etaṃ buddhāna sāsanaṃ.

We have translated it into Sinhala, and you may have heard it: "Refraining from all evil, the attainment of the wholesome, purifying one's own mind—this is the message of all Buddhas." This is an eternal truth. It is not just the advice of one Buddha, but buddhānaṃ sāsanaṃ—the message of all Buddhas. Within it are Morality, Concentration, and Wisdom. "Refraining from evil" is Morality (Sīla). "The attainment of the wholesome" (kusalassa upasampadā) refers to Concentration (Samādhi). It means entering and dwelling in the jhānas. When considered as one-pointedness of the wholesome mind, the concentrated mind is expressed within this attainment of the wholesome. Next, there is a Dhamma passage, a word of the Buddha: "One is purified through wisdom" (paññāya parisujjhati). Based on that, we can understand that ultimate purification is attained through Wisdom (Paññā). The purification of the mind at the highest level is accomplished by Wisdom. Therefore, to fulfill this Threefold Training, energy is required; exertion is required. It does not happen just like that. It does not happen automatically. It does not happen by merely watching the mind. That energy must be applied carefully, systematically, and progressively. That is why the Buddha points out: "Just as the great ocean slopes gradually, deepens gradually, even so in my dispensation there is a gradual training." Anupubbakiriya, anupubbapaṭipadā—a gradual training, a gradual performance, and a gradual path of practice. It is through such a wonderful process, bound by an amazing relationship of causes and conditions, that this liberation can be attained.

And that becomes further clear to us through what is known as the Four Great Efforts (Sammappadhāna). It is an extremely profound matter, and at the same time, highly practical. For those rationalists—indeed, those who give primary place only to intellect—the true taste of this Dhamma cannot be enjoyed; its true fragrance cannot be obtained. But through this gradual path, it can be attained. Thus, the Four Great Efforts are described in this way. Although we state the Pali passages, we will apply the Sinhala explanation. Keep them in mind so that if any issues arise regarding these, they can be resolved; we shall state the Pali passage first. It is as follows: Anuppannānaṃ pāpakānaṃ akusalānaṃ dhammānaṃ anuppādāya chandaṃ janeti vāyamati viriyaṃ ārabhati cittaṃ paggaṇhāti padahati. Once the meaning of this passage is explained, the others will be easy to understand. For the non-arising of unarisen unwholesome states: chandaṃ janeti means one generates desire, an earnest wish. Vāyamati means one makes an effort or exertion. Viriyaṃ ārabhati means one arouses or initiates energy. Cittaṃ paggaṇhāti means one upholds the mind, makes a firm determination. Next, padahati means applying the supreme effort—an outstanding exertion made even at the risk of one's life. Thus, this series of terms is applied to the Four Great Efforts.

The first one, as we said, is for the non-arising of unarisen unwholesome states. That is exactly what is meant by restraint (saṃvara). Next, for the discarding of arisen unwholesome states: uppannānaṃ pāpakānaṃ akusalānaṃ dhammānaṃ pahānāya. For the abandoning of arisen unwholesome states, one must apply the same desire (chanda), etc., in the same manner. Next, what we mentioned as belonging to the aspect of development (bhāvanā) is: Anuppannānaṃ kusalānaṃ dhammānaṃ uppādāya—for the arising of unarisen wholesome states, one must make a similar effort. Next, finally it says: uppannānaṃ kusalānaṃ dhammānaṃ ṭhitiyā asammosāya bhiyyobhāvāya vepullāya bhāvanāya pāripūriyā chandaṃ janeti, vāyamati viriyaṃ ārabhati cittaṃ paggaṇhāti padahati. Strengthening that dam is no easy task either. That must be why so many words are used there. For the maintenance (ṭhitiyā) of arisen wholesome states, for their non-confusion (asammosāya), for their further growth (bhiyyobhāvāya), for their plenitude (vepullāya), and for their fulfillment by development (bhāvanāya pāripūriyā), one must similarly generate desire, make an effort, arouse energy, uphold the mind, and apply supreme exertion.

Look then, in what a wonderful manner the Buddha has shown these Four Great Efforts in accordance with the nature of this mind. A mind that flows like a river as mentioned before—constructing this dam is something that must be done with extreme care. Similarly, the person who aspires for liberation must apply those four types of energy according to the occasion. Next, this goes even further. If we reflect further, why did the Buddha use so many words regarding energy? There, too, lies a wonderful ascending sequence. The Buddha has described in a few words the mental sequence through which our mind directs itself towards something and proceeds up to supreme energy. Chandaṃ janeti means generating an interest or intent. First, there must be an interest, a desire. That is the beginning, that is the direction. Next, one makes an effort (vāyamati). Within the word "effort" is a certain testing of "can I do this?"—a preliminary attempt, an exertion. Next, viriyaṃ—here, one truly gets down to the work, initiates the task. While proceeding in this way, obstacles arise. It is at that moment that one must firmly uphold the mind, as expressed by cittaṃ paggaṇhāti; one must bring forth the power of determination. Having established that power of determination, understanding that this task—which seemed impossible—is something that must absolutely be done, and putting one's life at stake, one accomplishes the task through supreme exertion. That is represented by the word padahati. In this series of terms applied to energy, the highest word is padhāna. This does not mean "chief" or "main" (pradhāna) as in our ordinary Sinhala language. In the Pali language, padhāna is used in the sense of supreme, ultimate energy. Thus, the matter regarding chanda, etc., has been briefly mentioned to you.

Next, among the Bodhipakkhiya Dhammas (Factors of Enlightenment) shown by the Buddha, some of you might have heard that, regarding energy, there is another matter just as important as the Four Great Efforts. For those who are keen on the path of practice, there is mention of the Four Bases of Success (Iddhipāda). Iddhipāda—when we say iddhi (psychic power/success), we immediately think of someone flying through the air. But, devotees, iddhi is a word that means accomplishment, fulfillment, or making something successful. Even in daily life, the things required to achieve success and accomplishment in any endeavor are called Iddhipāda. The word pāda (base/foot) is used there to mean the factors that help in achieving success. The Buddha highlights four such factors in this manner: chanda (desire/intention), viriya (energy), citta (mind/determination), and vīmaṃsā (investigation/wisdom). Indeed, these have been mentioned here in some way or another. The very essence of that energy which was expressed through words like chandaṃ janeti, vāyamati, etc., is what is presented here as the Iddhipāda. In fact, as shown by the Buddha, the practitioner, the yogi who engages in the Four Great Efforts in the manner described, reaches a point where they can understand the secret of success regarding their own endeavor, in accordance with their temperament. The secret of the success of one's energy can vary according to each individual's temperament. Some people achieve their aspirations by putting forward chanda (intention/desire). Chanda means interest or desire. Those are the temperaments of whom we hear in the world: "If I set my mind to something, or if I develop an interest in it, I will do it and will not look back." Next are the energetic (viriya) temperaments. It is through that very effort of chandaṃ janeti, vāyamati, etc., that they understand the secret of success within themselves. The second is energy (virīya). There are some who say: "If I put energy into something, I will see it through to the end. I will not back down." Next, there are others for whom citta (mind/determination) is the base of success: "If I make a determination regarding something, I will abide by that determination. I will accomplish it somehow." For such a person, citta is the base of success. Vīmaṃsā means investigative wisdom. That was not directly mentioned earlier, but through it, we can understand Wisdom (Paññā). The one who relies on this base of success, vīmaṃsā, is of a wise temperament. That is, investigative wisdom: "I must do this and see how it works. I am curious to see if what is said is true." There are those who engage in this effort by bringing forward such an attitude.

To help an ordinary person, who may not have much interest in such doctrinal matters, understand this point, we can give a helpful analogy. Let us assume there is a boulder that is a nuisance to our work. We feel like pushing it aside. First, the interest, the desire, arises for it (chanda). Since the boulder does not budge merely because one has the desire, what does one do next? One makes a certain effort (vāyāma). One makes a small exertion to see: "Can I lift this or push it aside?" That exertion is, in fact, a testing of one's strength. Inserting something underneath it, like a crowbar, one tries to see if it can be moved—that is vāyamati. Thus, chandam janeti, vāyamati. Next, virīyaṃ ārabhati. Once it is understood that it is possible, one arouses energy. Slowly, one begins to lift it. As one gets close to lifting it and pushing it over, one realizes that this is no easy task. Perhaps it might fall back on oneself. The mind might also start to waver. At that very moment, one makes a firm determination: "Even if I die, I will not abandon this task I have started," and pushes it all the way over. That is what is represented by the word padahati—the supreme energy (padhāna virīya). Next, through engaging in this very exertion, the power of wisdom arises naturally within oneself. From those experiences, investigative wisdom arises. Today, we say of such a person: "He is an experienced person." That is the wisdom, the investigative insight, gained from the wealth of experience acquired through such work. Thus, through this, we can understand the value of those Iddhipādas.

These days, these matters seem as if they are hidden within the Dhamma. But if we bring them to light, they are extremely important, especially for those devotees who wish to experience this Dhamma practically. Sometimes, the rationalists may not like these things very much. Now, there is a certain trend going on. You all must understand this. According to this intellectual and rationalist attitude, they expect instantaneous realization of the truth. There are indeed certain discourses where, as the Buddha preached to people of immense paramis like Bāhiya Dārucīriya, they attained Arahant hood almost instantly. Certain scholars who have studied those discourses twenty or thirty times imagine themselves to be wise, belonging to that special category, even though no internal transformation has taken place within them. They underestimate the fundamental virtues such as faith (saddhā) and morality (sīla). Showing no interest in them, they expect instantaneous liberation merely by listening to the Dhamma. That is entirely a delusion. For the Buddha has pointed out five "liberating occasions" (vimuttāyatana) that help in attaining Nibbāna—not just one. A person can attain realization of the Path and Fruits: while listening to the Dhamma, while teaching the Dhamma, while reciting the Dhamma, while reflecting on the Dhamma, and finally, it is shown, while systematically developing a certain theme of concentration (samādhi-nimitta). Yet, out of those five, some people think that everything can be accomplished merely by listening. That is possible only for those highly exceptional individuals. It happens very rarely. Especially in this era, we can assume that it is extremely rare. It was in an era when beings of great merit lived, and when those possessing higher knowledges (abhiññā) like the Buddha—who could read the mental capacity of others—were present to guide them, that someone could realize Arahant hood instantly through a brief sermon. Therefore, one should not think that just because one holds a long list of academic degrees, one also belongs to that rare category.

Indeed, there is another similar analysis shown in the Dhamma. The Buddha points out a certain fourfold classification based on the capacity of individuals for realization: Dukkhā paṭipadā dandhābhiññā (painful progress with slow realization), Dukkhā paṭipadā khippābhiññā (painful progress with swift realization), Sukhā paṭipadā dandhābhiññā (pleasant progress with slow realization), and Sukhā paṭipadā khippābhiññā (pleasant progress with swift realization). If we put it in Sinhala, here paṭipadā refers to the course of action including the effort, etc., mentioned earlier. Thus, the first category is: progress is painful and realization is slow. Next, the second category: progress is painful but realization is swift. Then the third category: progress is pleasant but realization is slow. And the fourth is: progress is pleasant and realization is swift. It is to this fourth category that individuals like Bāhiya Dārucīriya, who possessed a highly supreme power of paramis, belong. So, that capacity is not present in everyone. One must understand this for oneself. The Dhamma mentions those suttas upon hearing which people attained Arahant hood instantly, or which caused Arahant hood. Certain scholars study them with great enthusiasm and keen interest. But they do not put them into practice. The attitude mostly prevalent today is that these stages of realization can be attained merely by studying the Dhamma. That is entirely wrong. If those virtues such as faith and morality are lacking—in short, if faith (saddhā) is absent... Faith is shown as the seed of all virtues in this dispensation. A heart without faith is a dry heart. No virtues can grow there. Therefore, if one studies the Dhamma with a rationalistic attitude, without faith, doubting, and subjecting it to constant criticism and speculation, even if one studies it, no Path or Fruit will be attained. Except, perhaps, for imagining that one has attained them. Thus, we must realize that no matter what we expect, this task is not that easy. If it were so easy, there would be no need for a Buddha for this task. A Buddha appears in the world to present a certain unique matter which no other teacher could discover, even by practicing those extremely difficult disciplines. The fundamental principle of that is the Middle Path, the Middle Way (majjhimā paṭipadā). Within that Middle Way lies that very effort which must be applied with great care, as shown by the Buddha in His explanation of the fourfold energy. One cannot be in a hurry for this either. Just letting the mind wander as it likes and watching it is an extreme akin to indulgence in sensual pleasures (kāmasukhallikānuyoga). That is, letting it drift as it pleases. That way will not work either. Nor can one do it by struggling and agitating.

In this connection, the Buddha has preached a valuable discourse that brings us closer to this point. It is known as the Oghatarāṇa Sutta. That analogy will be highly useful to you in understanding this fundamental principle. On one occasion, a deva came and asked the Buddha: "O sorrowless One, how did you cross over the flood?" Here, what was called the "flood" refers, in the doctrinal sense, to the four floods: sensual desire (kāma), Becoming / Existence (bhava), views (diṭṭhi), and ignorance (avijjā). You have heard of the flood of sensuality (kāmogha). The flood of sensuality means the torrent of sensual desire, which flows all over the world. The flood of sensual desire is flowing. This life is a matter of these four floods: sensual desire (kāma), Becoming / Existence (bhava), views (diṭṭhi), and ignorance (avijjā). All of these are like torrential floods. Thus, within this existence, existence is a dynamic, moving thing in that very manner. What the Buddha is showing here is a massive, flowing flood. How does one cross over this flood then? This is no easy task. There are four floods: the flood of sensuality (kāmogha), the flood of Becoming / Existence (bhavogha), the flood of views (diṭṭhogha), and the flood of ignorance (avijjogha). The deva is asking how He crossed over these. The Buddha's reply is: appatitṭhaṃ anāyūhaṃ—"Without halting, without straining/struggling." "Without standing still, and without struggling, did I cross over the flood." Here, standing still (appatitṭhaṃ) refers to indulgence in sensual pleasures (kāmasukhallikānuyoga). Next, struggling (anāyūhaṃ) refers to self-mortification (attakilamathānuyoga). You can understand this with reference to the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta. Then the deva asks further details: "How did you do that?" To that, the Buddha replies: "Friend—āvuso means friend—friend, when I stood still, I sank; when I struggled, I was swept away by the flood." Those are the two extremes. It is by avoiding those two extremes that one must travel on this path of Dhamma. It is there that the Middle Way lies; it is there that the Middle Path is found.

Therefore, this is not something that happens of its own accord or merely by wishing, by completely abandoning energy and just watching the mind wander. Why are people inclined towards such an attitude? You all know the social environment of today. Due to the advancement of science and technology, in your daily lives at home as well as in your office work, you do things almost instantaneously. Everything is instant. Science and technology provide facilities to get everything done instantly. Now, many people expect to find that same instantaneous nature in this Dhamma and in the realization of the Dhamma as well. That is a mirage. That is a wrong idea. Because the environment in the past was one that truly supported spiritual development. But you can imagine how the environment of today is, judging by the way daily life is spent. How complex it has become due to this material progress! On one hand, it seems like a great advancement, but humans are deteriorating terribly, falling into animalistic states. These minds have fallen to the levels of demons, hell-beings, and hungry ghosts (peta). In such an era, it is difficult to find a proper, quiet environment—not only in noisy cities or villages but even in a forest, it is extremely difficult to find a secluded place. In such an age, you must think for yourselves: is this something that can be achieved by doing nothing, when it actually requires one to exert much greater effort, increasing one's energy hundreds and thousands of times? According to that, we should realize the value of the Middle Path shown by the Buddha.

To explain it a bit more deeply, we can speak about the extreme we mentioned. The difference between the practice followed by the Nigaṇṭhas and the practice prescribed by the Buddha for the Sangha helps us understand this. Let us bring this out briefly to suit the occasion. Now, you may have heard that what belongs to the monks is the four requisites (cattāro paccayā): robes (cīvara), almsfood (piṇḍapāta), lodging (senāsana), and medicinal requisites (gilānapaccayabhajja)—the things necessary to sustain life. The Buddha has pointed out the course of practice to be adopted when using them, which is to reflect upon them (paccavekkhaṇa). This reflection is briefly introduced as restraint by knowledge (ñāṇa-saṃvara), a restraint accomplished through wisdom and knowledge. First, let us take the practice of the Nigaṇṭhas. What was it? The Nigaṇṭhas saw that things like food and clothing are what draw worldly people towards sensuality. That is obvious even when one goes to a city. Due to fashions regarding these, worldly people are drawn to sensuality. Therefore, what was the extreme practice adopted by the Nigaṇṭhas? Discarding clothing entirely (practicing nudity), and regarding food, you might have heard that there were even those who ate excrement in those times. In that way, they turned that effort into an extreme distortion; they struggled.

But the Buddha showed a different path instead. These four requisites are things we can neither do with completely (in an attached way) nor do without. What is this Becoming / Existence (bhava)? It is a flowing stream. Now, you know that in a place where a strong current is flowing, if one wants to go from here to the opposite bank, one cannot go in a straight line as if drawing a straight line. After entering the water, one has to go to the opposite bank while yielding somewhat to the flowing current. Suppose you are caught in a current while swimming. What happens? You cannot just fight it head-on. Nor can you do nothing. One must escape and save oneself carefully, wisely, and gradually. That is the kind of path of practice the Buddha points out. Therefore, what is to be done is not the discarding of robes, nor resorting to distorted foods like excrement. Rather, the Buddha prescribed the manner of using them with restraint of knowledge (ñāṇa-saṃvara), with wisdom, turning it into a meditation, by way of reflection (paccavekkhaṇa).

If we mention briefly, taking just one or two examples—regarding almsfood, it is said: Let the monks reflect in this manner before consuming almsfood. That is indeed like a meditation: "I do not take this food for amusement, for intoxication, for physical beauty, or for brawn, as laymen do. But solely for the maintenance of this holy life (brahmacariya), for the realization of Nibbāna." First, that purpose is considered. Next, secondly, also related to it is the meditative attitude regarding food and this body. It is developed as meditation, and also as the repulsiveness of food. There is a meditation called the analysis of elements (dhātu-manasikāra): this food is made up of earth (pathavī), fire (tejo), wind (vāyo), and water (āpo) elements. Likewise is this body. Next, one reflects that this food, made of earth, water, fire, and wind elements, which was clean, becomes dirty, impure, unappealing, and repulsive once it enters this dirty, impure body of mine. See then how the Buddha solved the problem of food—which the Nigaṇṭhas feared and discarded—through the Middle Path. He made that very food an aid to Nibbāna. The purpose of this is: this body is maintained for Nibbāna, merely for sustenance. This is not like the fashion with which the ordinary people of today, who strive to remain in Becoming / Existence (bhava), treat food. It is not that running after food that is mentioned here. Merely, a certain control is exercised over it. Looking at them from a balanced perspective, it is then turned into a meditation. That shows the Middle Way pointed out by the Buddha. Giving one example is sufficient. Thus, there are such passages of reflection regarding all four requisites.

Through these, we must understand that nowadays, large crowds are drawn to the idea that the task is easy. It appears easy, but through that, a serious wrong view (micchā-diṭṭhi) is spreading, which is contrary to this Middle Path. Doing nothing is indeed something pleasing to many. If all of this can be achieved by doing nothing, why exert oneself? Why keep precepts? Why meditate? Some even say that meditation is unnecessary. "There is no need to control the mind in the name of meditation. Let it go where it wants and just watch." If those people were to enter the water, and if they were to just watch while crossing a torrential flood, they would be seen acting contrary to their own words. To satisfy their material needs in daily life, they are compelled to act in a way that is close to those very Sammappadhāna and Iddhipāda mentioned earlier. This shows us that the Buddha has brought to light a wonderful natural law (dhammatā) regarding our stream of consciousness (citta-santāna). He saw this properly; He saw its true reality. Having seen that, He said that the human mind functions in these four ways. Likewise, the Buddha pointed out a balanced path of practice to be followed with great care. Therefore, we must highlight these points. Especially since this is an era when various wrong views are spreading, some people—especially those we call rationalists (not that we say this as an insult, but such an attitude is prevalent nowadays)—study the Dhamma and possess some understanding of it. Through that scholarship, from the knowledge they have gained, some believe they have complete comprehension of this dispensation. No, devotees, this dispensation is threefold: Pariyatti (learning), Paṭipatti (practice), and Paṭivedha (realization). If only learning (pariyatti) existed, then the view held by those scholars would be correct. But here, it is not limited to learning alone. It must be put into practice—Paṭipatti. Next, the culmination of practice is realization (Paṭivedha)—one must penetrate it with insight wisdom (vipassanā-paññā), in its supreme form through meditation. That is why the motto of the Buddhists in the past—which is rarely heard nowadays—was: Suṇātha, dhāretha, carātha dhamme—"Listen, retain, and practice the Dhamma." "Listen, retain, and walk in the Dhamma."

"Listen, retain, and practice the Dhamma; listen, retain, and walk in the Dhamma." This point is further clarified by the passages shown by the Buddha regarding the listening to the Dhamma, showing that this was preached for a practical purpose. Regarding the proper listening to the Dhamma, it is mentioned as follows: Or, regarding a person who has a correct understanding of the Dhamma, these words are mentioned. Such a person—let us say, in modern terms, such a scholar or such a disciple—has the Dhamma... and many words are used for this: sutā, dhatā, vacasā paricitā, diṭṭhiyā suppaṭividdhā. That person has heard the Dhamma (sutā), and retains it (dhatā)—not having heard it through one ear and let it out through the other. Next, they have not stored it in computers and set it aside. In those devotees who have stored the Tipitaka in computers, the Dhamma may not be present within. That is just an action. They did not take it within. That is why in the past, they spoke of the lineage of reciters (bhāṇaka); in those times, there were individuals of single-minded listening (ekasuta). They retained what they heard upon merely hearing it once. Next, sutā, dhatā—they retained the Dhamma. "There is a great book at home, but its name is not remembered"—our ancestors began to say this only after the custom of memorizing the Dhamma was lost. Nowadays, this is considered unnecessary, and sometimes even laughable. But the one who wishes to make use of it retains that Dhamma in the mind, like storing lion's fat in a golden casket. Having retained it through sutā, dhatā, they do not stop there. Vacasā paricitā—they must master it verbally. They must recall and memorize it from time to time. Next, it is not reciting it like a parrot. Those words—the things spoken of—must be turned over in the mind, investigated, and examined. Investigating in this manner, diṭṭhiyā suppaṭividdhā—when examining it thus, one obtains the ability to penetrate it through right view. Through those words, then, it is shown that the Dhamma is a practical thing. Dhamma-listening must be done in that manner, with a practical purpose and attitude.

The same is shown in another way. The manner in which a noble disciple (ariyasāvaka) listens to the Dhamma is described as follows: It is shown how a noble disciple listens to the Dhamma, in short, in a way that leads to the realization of the Path and Fruits. A noble disciple listens in this manner: aṭṭhikatvā manasikatvā sabbacetaso samannāharitvā ohitasoto dhammaṃ suṇāti. At some point, a noble disciple, having paid attention (aṭṭhikatvā), listens with the primary thought: "This Dhamma is of benefit to me." Not with the purpose of analyzing this, writing a book about it, or obtaining a degree. He listens to the Dhamma with the thought: "This is of use to me. There is a benefit in this for me." Next, manasikatvā—reflecting upon what is heard, contemplating word by word at the very moment of listening. Without going into thoughts and speculations like: "I already know what is being said. What is there to explain about that?"—he contemplates it word by word. Sabbacetaso—not with half the mind here and the other half at home. Sabbacetaso, samannāharitvā—directing the entire mind to it, focusing attention, applying complete attention. Ohitasoto dhammaṃ suṇāti—he listens with inclined ears. This is an ancient expression: listening with inclined ears. We see certain animals inclining their ears. We cannot tell from the outside whether humans are inclining their ears or not. But listening with inclined ears means full attention. It means directing one's attention completely to it. Nowadays, since we have various scientific ears (recorders and devices) instead of our own ears, we leave them to listen, and when the Dhamma is preached, we step aside. This is just like saying, "There is a great book at home, but its name is not remembered." Those words can be applied today to modern machines like computers and cassette recorders. "There are many cassette tapes of the most talented monks in our house. But we have no time to listen." It is just like that.

Such is the attitude prevalent today. Nevertheless, there is that intellectual attitude: "If we can produce light whenever we want by pressing a button, why can't we produce the light of wisdom merely by listening to a short sermon?" Some people raise such arguments nowadays. "This is an extremely advanced era. In such an era, if they could achieve these in the past, in an era of bullock carts, why can't we do so now?" People who ask such questions have indeed come and questioned us. We have to remind them of the difference between the environment of those times and that of today. The spiritual environment in those days was truly wonderful. Everyone was a seeker of truth. Among the brahmins as well as others, there was indeed a massive effort made for liberation. Even if they sometimes went astray. Today, in which direction are people running? Towards material progress. Everyone is running after that, caught up in that current, chasing a mirage. Among those who are running, even if you do turn towards the Dhamma, you have to operate amidst a massive array of obstacles. Devotees living in household life come and tell us: "We would like to meditate. But the children do such things all night... we don't need to describe it—they are in front of this or that machine. Or our lives are spent in the midst of a massive din." There is a great sense of frustration in them.

Through that, we can understand that in this day and age, that state can be achieved only by putting in double, triple, or even a hundredfold energy. Holding degrees and being learned alone will not bring about the Paths and Fruits. You do not belong to the category of swift realization (khippābhiññā) just because you think you do. That is a point we must retain well in our minds. Reflecting in this way, today this group of devotees, practicing a simple life, a large number of you have observed the eight precepts for this Uposatha day, and others have established themselves in higher virtues. That is the importance of morality (sīla). Without taking the first step properly, the final result alone cannot be achieved. These factors of Morality, Concentration, and Wisdom are interconnected. This is something bound by causal relationships. Just as we often remind you regarding Sammā Diṭṭhi, Sammā Saṅkappa, etc., there is a wonderful relationship of cause and effect between each and every step in the Dhamma. That is why it was said that there is a gradual sequence. That sequence cannot be broken. Therefore, one must start from the very alphabet. One must go down to zero. One must start with Morality (Sīla). One must start with Faith (Saddhā). Fundamentally, Faith. Faith is the seed in this dispensation. No virtues accumulate in a heart devoid of faith. It is with faith aroused that one next approaches a teacher. Saddhājāto upasaṅkamati—"One with faith approaches," as pointed out by the Buddha. Having approached, one listens to the Dhamma, retains it, and reflects on it in that manner. In that way, systematically embarking on the practice, generating great desire and energy, and getting down to the practice, one can accomplish this ultimate goal.

Thus, although the Buddha set the Wheel of Dhamma in motion on a day like today, the power of that Wheel of Dhamma seems to be fast fading away from this society due to the spread of such wrong views. Therefore, wise devotees must reflect. What must be done first cannot be put off for later. Nor can what must be done first be completely discarded. Therefore, those virtues of Faith (Saddhā) and Morality (Sīla) must be completed first. It is upon those virtues that the mind can next be composed in Concentration (Samādhi). It is to a concentrated mind that impermanence (anicca) and unsubstantiality (anattā) are understood by way of Wisdom (Paññā) and Insight (vipassanā). The supreme, peaceful, and sublime Deathless Nibbāna, which is free from all samsaric suffering such as aging (jarā), illness, and death (maraṇa) shown by the Buddha, can be attained through the realization of the Paths and Fruits of Sotāpanna, Sakadāgāmī, Anāgāmī, and Arahant. Thus, you must understand that within this brief period of time, we have briefly touched upon many facts. This is for you to reflect upon further. These points were mentioned not merely for you to stop at reflecting, but to adjust your lives in accordance with their practical value.

Thus, in connection with this, you have established yourselves in morality, disciplined your body and speech, and listened to the Dhamma with focused attention for about an hour. Listening to the Dhamma is said to be a meritorious deed, a wholesome act (kusala), because it is something that aids your Nibbāna. That listening to the Dhamma is highly beneficial. It even provides the strong supportive condition (upaniṣṛaya-sampatti). By the blessings of that listening—if we look at these blessings in this very world, in a directly visible (sanditṭhika) and immediate (akālika) manner—let us resolve that we have used this brief time to develop within ourselves the faculties (indriya) and powers (bala) of Faith (Saddhā), Energy (Viriya), Mindfulness (Sati), Concentration (Samādhi), and Wisdom (Paññā). Through that Dhamma power, may you find the rare association of admirable friends (kalyāṇa-mitta), even with difficulty or by making your way through thick forests, and before this lamp of the dispensation is extinguished, may this serve as a strong supportive condition (upaniṣṛaya-sampatti) for you to escape this perilous saṃsāra and attain sublime Nibbāna through the realization of the Paths and Fruits of Sakadāgāmī, Anāgāmī, and Arahant. Likewise, make a wish that if there be any beings in this universe, from the lowest Avīci hell to the highest Akanitṭha heaven, who wish to rejoice in this wholesome deed of Dhamma preaching and Dhamma listening, may they all rejoice in this merit and find peace in sublime, deathless Nibbāna through the Bodhi of their aspiration. With that aspiration in mind, recite these verses:

“Ettāvatā ca amhehi.....”

Verses 9-10 from the Yamakavagga (Chapter of Pairs) of the Dhammapada

Dear Listeners,

The supreme inheritance that the world receives from a Fully Enlightened Buddha is the Dispensation of the Buddha (Sambuddha Sāsana). We consider that safeguarding this Sambuddha Sāsana for a long time for the welfare and happiness of gods and humans is the duty of every Buddhist. If we are to fulfill that duty properly, we must possess a correct understanding of its spiritual and dispensational values. That is why on this Vesak Full Moon Day, we chose these two verses as our theme.

The Buddha preached these two verses at the Jetavana monastery, focusing on a certain incident concerning Ven. Devadatta. On one occasion, the two chief disciples, Ven. Sāriputta and Ven. Moggallāna, having obtained permission from the Buddha, journeyed from Sāvattthī to Rājagaha with their respective entourages of five hundred monks each. The residents of Rājagaha, coming together collectively—in groups of two or three, or fifteen—began to offer alms and engage in works of charity for the chief disciples and their retinues. One day, when Ven. Sāriputta was organizing a meritorious deed, he declared:

"O lay devotees, if someone gives alms himself but does not encourage others to establish themselves in the practice of giving—meaning, he does not inspire others to give alms—such a person will obtain wealth and material resources in whatever future births (jāti / arising) they are born, but will not obtain the wealth of having a retinue of followers. Another person does not give alms himself but encourages others to do so. In the future, that person will not receive wealth and material resources, but will only receive the wealth of a retinue of followers. Yet another person neither gives alms himself nor encourages others to do so. Such a person will obtain neither wealth nor a retinue in their future births (jāti / arising). Fourthly, it is shown that another person gives alms himself and also encourages others to establish themselves in that practice of giving. (What we now call collecting donations is 'establishing others in practice'.) Such a person, in future births (jāti / arising), will receive both wealth and a retinue," so he declared.

A certain wise man who was listening to this thought: "I must act in a way that I obtain both of these blessings." After the crowd departed, he approached Ven. Sāriputta and said, "Venerable Sir, I invite you and the Sangha to alms tomorrow." Ven. Sāriputta asked how many monks were in his retinue, and when he was told there were about a thousand, the man declared, "I hope to offer alms to all those thousand monks tomorrow." Ven. Sāriputta consented by silence.

Now, even though this man said this, he made the invitation without any prior preparation. Walking through the streets of the city, he rallied the people, crying out: "Mothers and fathers, I have invited a thousand monks for tomorrow. Bring whatever alms-materials you can, according to your means. Let us gather in one place and prepare the alms!" Thus he encouraged the people. Accordingly, a large number of people took responsibility for ten, twenty, or even a hundred monks, and brought alms-materials to the venue. A certain wealthy devotee brought a saffron robe worth a hundred thousand coins and gave it to the organizer of the alms—the lay devotee—saying, "If there is any shortage of alms-materials, sell this robe and settle the expenses. If there is no such shortage, offer this robe to any monk of your choice."

So, the alms-giving went very well the next day. There was no shortage of anything. This robe, this saffron robe, remained. The alms-organizer said to the gathering, "A certain person offered me this highly valuable robe. All the alms-giving activities are now finished. To whom shall we offer this robe?" Then someone said, "Let us offer it to Ven. Sāriputta, the Chief Disciple, the Arahant." Another group said, "This Ven. Sāriputta only comes and goes during the harvest season. But Ven. Devadatta is not like that. He is like the water kept in our homes. He is there for all our auspicious and inauspicious occasions. Therefore, let us give it to Ven. Devadatta." Since there were two factions, the alms-organizer held a small vote at the alms-hall. Here is the result of the vote: Ven. Devadatta won by a majority of four votes as the person worthy of receiving that robe worth a hundred thousand. The faction of the Chief Disciple Ven. Sāriputta, the General of the Dhamma, lost.

Somehow or other, they gave that robe to Ven. Devadatta. When Ven. Devadatta cut it, dyed it, and wore it, walking about in the city, the people felt a certain displeasure at his behavior. Perhaps he walked about in an arrogant manner, wandering here and there. People began to say, "This robe is suitable for Ven. Sāriputta, but certainly not for Devadatta." Sometime after this incident, a certain monk came from Rājagaha to Sāvattthī to see the Buddha. When the Buddha was inquiring about the health and welfare of the two chief disciples from that monk, that monk related this incident. Then the Buddha said, "Monk, not only in this life, but in the past too, Devadatta wore a robe unsuitable for him and was reviled by others," and he related a certain Jātaka story.

In the past, there was an elephant hunter in Benares who killed elephants. He lived by going into the forests, killing elephants, and selling their tusks, claws, meat, and so on. In some forests, there were large herds of elephants. In one forest, the elephants had a custom: whenever they saw the Paccekabuddhas living in the forest, before going to find food, they would bow down at the knees of the Paccekabuddhas and then depart. One day, this elephant hunter saw this incident. He fell into reflection: "Why do these elephants bow down to these Paccekabuddhas? It must be because of the robe. If I too can get a robe, I can carry out this elephant hunting very well." Having thought thus, what did he do next? When a Paccekabuddha had entered a pond to bathe, the hunter stole the robe left on the bank. Wearing it, what was his next trick? Wrapping the robe from his head downwards, he hid his elephant-killing weapon, his tool.

Thinking it was a Paccekabuddha, the elephant herd would bow as they went past. After the herd had passed, the elephant hunter would strike and kill the very last elephant with his weapon, sell its tusks and so on, and throw the remaining flesh in the forest.

While this was going on for some time, the Bodhisatta became the leader of that elephant herd. The Bodhisatta realized that his herd was diminishing. Reflecting on the cause, he suspected, "This danger must be coming from that particular person." Letting the other elephants go ahead, he walked last, at the very end, one day. When the Bodhisatta, the elephant king, approached after the other elephants had gone, the elephant hunter cast aside the robe and struck with his weapon. Since the Bodhisatta elephant king was alert, he jumped back, avoided the weapon, and then leapt forward to catch the man, saying, "Was it not you who destroyed my herd?" What did the hunter do then? Shielding himself behind a tree, he held the robe out in front of him. When he held the robe in front, the Bodhisatta elephant king thought: "If I destroy this man who is now holding this robe, it would be an insult to hundreds of thousands of Buddhas, Paccekabuddhas, and Arahants. It would mean erasing that respectful fear from my mind." Therefore, without killing him, he spared him, but admonished and condemned him: "You are wearing a garment suitable only for those who are free from passions!" and disgraced that man.

Having related that past event, the Buddha said to that monk: "That elephant hunter was indeed Devadatta. In the past, too, he did such a thing." And then he uttered those two verses we took as our theme:

"Whoever, not having cast out the stains of defilements, devoid of self-control and truthfulness, wears the saffron robe, is not worthy of the saffron robe."

"But whoever has cast out the stains of defilements, is well-established in moral virtue, endowed with self-control and truthfulness, is indeed worthy of the saffron robe." This is the meaning contained in those verses.

Now let us consider what lessons we can learn both from this primary incident and from the Jātaka story. When we think of the lighter side of this story, even the exemplary action of that alms-organizer can be taken as a lesson for us. Even in these times, regarding meritorious deeds such as alms-givings, there is a practice called sammādam kirīma (collecting donations). Indeed, this word sammādam is mentioned in the Dhamma as samādāna (encouraging or taking upon oneself). Now, you are very familiar with the term sīla-samādāna (undertaking moral virtue). You are not so familiar with the term dāna-samādāna (undertaking giving), but instead, there is the term sammādam for alms. That too expresses the same idea: making others accept the practice of giving. It was because they accepted it that those people contributed according to their ability. This is indeed in accordance with the Dhamma declared by the Buddha, which Ven. Sāriputta pointed out here. It is something that leads to obtaining the wealth of a retinue of followers. Why? When one encourages others in giving, acting as a spiritual friend (kalyāṇa-mitta), that too is a wholesome act—inclining others toward the wholesome. So, to cultivate both these types of wealth, we see that the wise man organized that alms-giving with great honesty and fairness. He started without any prior preparation for a thousand monks. Not only did he complete everything in a single night and finish the alms-giving, but he also did not use the extra robe in an inappropriate way. According to the intention of the person who offered it, he held a vote and gave it to the one chosen by the vote, regardless of whether that person was truly suitable.

Next, we must also reflect a little on what was expressed there regarding Ven. Devadatta. Popularity is not a yardstick for virtue. In terms of popularity, the Chief Disciple Ven. Sāriputta lost to Ven. Devadatta. Yet, Devadatta did not practice in a manner suitable for that robe. It was because of this that he became the target of public blame. Moreover, Ven. Devadatta did not stop there. Having obtained a robe that even the Chief Disciples did not receive, he was driven further by the pride that arose within him. The Buddha has declared: "Dāruṇo lābhasakkāro"—"Gain, honor, and renown are dreadful, bitter, and harsh." Why? Because through them, some people use their popularity in a dangerous manner, attempting to live their lives in an unrighteous way. This is exactly what happened to Ven. Devadatta. What did Ven. Devadatta do next? He thought, "If I am to obtain gain, honor, fame, and praise, I must secure the royal patronage of some king." Thus, Prince Ajātasattu, who had a claim to the kingdom of Magadha, came to his mind. He used a certain tactic to win over Prince Ajātasattu. Ven. Devadatta possessed supernormal knowledges (abhiññā) and the power to perform psychic wonders (iddhi). So, by psychic power, he manifested a body wrapped in terrifying snakes to frighten Prince Ajātasattu, appearing on his lap. After the prince was frightened, he transformed back to his normal form and won him over. Prince Ajātasattu was won over by those psychic powers. From then on, Prince Ajātasattu went to see Ven. Devadatta twice a day, morning and evening, with five hundred chariots. He also sent five hundred dishes of highly delicious food to Ven. Devadatta. When the monks reported this matter to the Buddha, the Buddha declared: "Monks, do not be envious of the gain, honor, fame, and praise of Ven. Devadatta. The acquisition of these gains and honors will lead only to the decline and ruin of Ven. Devadatta. Just as when a fierce dog gets a sniff of bile on its nose, it becomes even more fierce and violent, so does Ven. Devadatta behave." Thus he made a prediction about the future.

Likewise, Ven. Devadatta then persuaded Prince Ajātasattu, telling him to kill his father, King Bimbisāra, and quickly become king, saying, "I will kill the Buddha and take over the empire of the Dhamma." Actually, the root cause for this was an earlier incident when Ven. Devadatta stood up while the Buddha was preaching the Dhamma to a gathering and requested, "Venerable Sir, the Blessed One is now old and advanced in years. Hand over the congregation of monks to me. Let the Blessed One retire and dwell in quiet ease." The Buddha censured him. "I would not hand over the leadership of the Sangha even to the Chief Disciples; how then should I hand it over to one like you?" he rebuked. Angered by this, Ven. Devadatta, with the assistance of Prince Ajātasattu, plotted to assassinate the Buddha. Prince Ajātasattu tortured his father to death in a horrific manner, committing a grave karma of immediate retribution (ānantariya-kamma). After securing the kingdom of Magadha, Devadatta came and said, "Now you have accomplished your task; now help me with mine." Then he devised schemes to assassinate the Buddha.

The first scheme he employed was sending archers when the Buddha was dwelling quietly in the forest. He assigned one archer to shoot the Buddha. To ensure this archer was killed on his return, he stationed two other archers on that path. To kill those two on their way back, he stationed four others on another path. To kill those four, eight others. To kill those eight, sixteen others. Ven. Devadatta planned this assassination of the Buddha through such an extraordinary, cunning, and conspiratorial plot to keep it an absolute secret. However, when the man who went to shoot the Buddha approached, his body became stiff due to the Buddha's spiritual majesty, and unable to do it, he confessed his mission. The Buddha preached the Dhamma to him and sent him back by another path. Likewise, through the power of the Dhamma, all those other men stationed on the path—in groups of two, four, eight, and sixteen—came to see the Buddha, listened to the Dhamma, became faithful, and did not carry out the intended task.

When Ven. Devadatta came to know of this, he thought, "Now I must kill the Buddha myself." He climbed the Gijjhakūṭa (Vulture Peak) mountain and, while the Buddha was walking up and down below, hurled down a massive boulder. While the boulder was falling, two other rocks emerged through the Buddha's spiritual majesty and stopped the boulder. However, a splinter of stone struck the sole of the Buddha's foot, causing a severe and painful wound. The physician Jīvaka had to treat it. By this act, Devadatta fell into the grave ānantariya-kamma of shedding the blood of a Buddha with malicious intent.

Since he still could not assassinate the Buddha, what did Ven. Devadatta do next? He bribed the elephant keepers and arranged to release the elephant Nālāgiri, having fed it alcohol, onto the path where the Buddha and the Sangha were walking. As the elephant Nālāgiri came charging in a terrifying manner, kicking up dust, the Buddha directed a mind of loving-kindness (mettā) and subdued the elephant, making it kneel down. When all three attempts failed, a huge public protest arose among the citizens and residents of the city, saying that King Ajātasattu was helping such a sinful person. King Ajātasattu was forced to withdraw all the support he had been giving to Devadatta. At this point, Ven. Devadatta thought: "How can I regain gain and honor?" Then a sinful thought occurred to him: to create a schism in the Sangha (saṅgha-bheda)—to split the monks and take a group of the harmonious Sangha with him to start a separate dispensation. Along with the arising of this sinful thought, his previously held psychic powers vanished. Later, Ven. Ānanda informed the Buddha of this news. The Buddha declared: "Behold, then, Devadatta is going to bind himself to another extremely grave ānantariya-kamma." Paying no heed to any advice or admonition, Ven. Devadatta presented five special demands—the five precepts (pañca-vara)—to the Buddha, things that ordinary people would easily find appealing. When the Buddha rejected these five demands, he won over five hundred newly ordained monks to his faction and went to Gayāsīsa—the noble place we now call Bodh Gaya—and started a separate dispensation. Placing two disciples, Kokālika and Kaṭamorakatissa, on either side as his chief disciples, he started a dispensation with the demeanor of a Buddha. This continued for a short time. Meanwhile, on one occasion, the Buddha sent the two chief disciples, Ven. Sāriputta and Ven. Moggallāna, to bring this group back. When they arrived, Ven. Devadatta was preaching the Dhamma in the manner of a Buddha. He was deceived into thinking that the two chief disciples had also joined his side. Having preached the Dhamma to some extent, he delegated the preaching of the Dhamma to them in his place and went to sleep. In the meantime, the two chief disciples presented the Dhamma correctly, turned the minds of all of Devadatta's followers back, and returned through the air with that group to see the Buddha.

Kokālika, Ven. Devadatta's chief disciple, woke Devadatta up—it is said he kicked him in the chest to wake him—and told him what had happened. Due to the intense shock and grief, Ven. Devadatta began to vomit blood. It is said he vomited warm blood. Because of that mental shock and vomiting of blood, Ven. Devadatta suffered terrible physical pain for nine months. In his final moments, hoping to see the Buddha, he told his followers, "Take me to Jetavana." When this news arrived, the monks told the Buddha, "Ven. Devadatta is coming." But the Buddha declared, "In this life, Devadatta will not get to see me again. In whatever manner he comes to Jetavana, he will not see me." Initially, his followers were reluctant to carry him, saying, "When you were healthy, you harbored such hatred toward the Buddha, and now you ask us to carry you?" Then Devadatta said, "Even so, the Blessed One has no hatred toward me." Somehow he persuaded them. So, the followers placed Ven. Devadatta on a litter and carried him near Jetavana. Placing the litter by the side of the pond near Jetavana, those who brought him went down to the pond to bathe. Meanwhile, Devadatta, sitting on the litter, put his feet on the ground. As his feet touched the ground, the earth split open, flames emerged from the Avīci hell, and it is recorded that he went down to the Avīci hell. It is said that at that final moment, Ven. Devadatta uttered a certain verse taking refuge in the Buddha.

So, that was the fate of Ven. Devadatta. In the beginning, the Buddha pointed out that the cause for this was gain and honor. Gain and honor are extremely dreadful things. It was because of the pride of obtaining the robe that should have rightfully gone to the Chief Disciple Ven. Sāriputta, as mentioned at the beginning of this story, that he went on to seek further popularity, gain, and honor, and got entangled in such a multitude of sinful deeds. Accordingly, we can understand that, as the Buddha also declared, gain and honor are extremely dangerous. The Buddha explained the misfortune that befell Ven. Devadatta to the monks through four similes: "Monks, a banana tree bears fruit only for its own destruction. So too does a bamboo tree; if it flowers, the bamboo tree is destroyed. If a reed flowers, the reed is destroyed. If a she-mule becomes pregnant, she dies because of that pregnancy. In the very same way, gain, honor, and renown have arisen only for the destruction of Devadatta." Thus he declared. Accordingly, we can understand that popularity, gain, and honor often lead human beings toward dangerous, unwholesome actions.

Furthermore, when we reflect on this Jātaka story, we can extract certain advices of contemporary relevance. In this Jātaka story, it was mentioned first of all: what did the elephant hunter use for his elephant hunting? A robe stolen from the Paccekabuddhas. Devout lay devotees, in our Dhamma books, this robe is described as the "banner of the Arahants" (arahaddhaja). What is meant by the "banner of Arahants"? Now, let us imagine a pageant (perahera) coming. We understand who is in the pageant by the flag carried at the front. Similarly, when one sees the robe, what is the thought that arises? It is the thought: "This is either an Arahant or a group of people practicing the path to Arahantship, striving for Arahantship." That is the thought that arises when a group of people wearing this robe approaches. That is why it is called the banner of Arahants. But if this banner of Arahants is put forward for other purposes, for other fronts, it is just like the elephant hunter using the robe stolen from the Buddha for elephant hunting.

Therefore, the most valuable thing is to protect the banner of Arahants as a banner that represents that journey toward Nibbāna, that aim, that objective, the journey toward Arahantship. We mentioned earlier about protecting a dispensation. We can draw that idea from this Jātaka story. Furthermore, in some other places, this robe is also referred to as a suit of armor. Now, King Dhammāsoka had a brother named Prince Tissa, who had obtained the position of sub-king. However, Prince Tissa, having developed a strong aspiration for Nibbāna, was ordained in the dispensation. He was so fond of solitude that in the Dhamma texts, he is referred to as Ven. Ekavihāriya. This royal prince became a monk who loved to live alone. After ordination, so strong was his aspiration for Nibbāna that he uttered a certain verse to reveal his hope for Nibbāna. The idea expressed in that verse is this: "I am entering the forest wearing this armor. I will not come out of the forest without ending the battle against defilements and becoming an Arahant." Thus, it is clear that armor—devout lay devotees, armor is a garment used in war, in battle, to protect against arrows. So, using the robe as armor for the battle against defilements, as a protection for the battle against defilements, is appropriate. But presenting the robe to escape the consequences of committing other wrongs and bad actions is not in accordance with the dispensation. It is not something aligned with the dispensation. It would be just like the elephant hunter who, when punishment drew near for the crime of killing elephants, took off the robe and held it out in front of him. Thus, we can understand various matters and advices through the medium of this Jātaka story.

So, from all this, we see that dispensational values can be overshadowed by gain, honor, fame, and praise. That is why the Buddha constantly highlighted their danger. On certain occasions, the Buddha compared this to a dung beetle. When a dung beetle gets a pile of dung, a ball of dung, it rolls it along, full of pride. The Buddha gave this simile, saying that when a monk says very proudly, "I have invitations from such and such places; I have no shortage of the four requisites," if he speaks like this, he is just like that dung beetle. The Buddha has shown this in a way that conveys censure. Moreover, we now know that once caught in the wave of gain and honor, the valuable virtues that are considered the eternal values of the Sangha are lost. What are those virtues? Fewness of wishes (appicchatā), contentment (santutṭhitā), and ease of maintenance (subharatā). Fewness of wishes means having few desires, being satisfied with little. If one gets caught in the wave of luxury and extreme luxury coming from lay society, one is swept away. Just like a sandcastle on the beach being washed away and destroyed by wave after wave during the monsoon season, that virtue of fewness of wishes is destroyed by luxurious and extremely luxurious invitations. Everyone can understand something from this. Likewise, contentment—the virtue of being content with what one receives. That too belongs to the monks. Contentment with the four requisites. Contentment with the eight requisites (atṭha-parikkhāra). The monks who were content with the eight requisites. Eight requisites. Now, I do not know if we can even count how many they are. The things considered essential as requisites are increasing day by day. Similarly, ease of maintenance—meaning being easy to support. As monks gradually lean toward a luxurious life, the responsibility falling on the lay followers to support them becomes heavier and heavier.

Likewise, an important point is that the Buddha has shown that a true monk should not maintain improper relationships with laypeople. Now, at the alms-hall, the Devadatta faction praised Devadatta by saying, "Ven. Sāriputta only comes during the harvest season. But Ven. Devadatta helps us in all matters, weddings and funerals, just like a water vessel kept at home." Like a vessel of water: anything, anytime, you can take it, drink it, use it. If a monk falls to that level, there is a risk of him going down the path of Devadatta's objectives. Such a dangerous thing is popularity. As soon as popularity arises, next comes the expectation of office—gaining positions. Through that, without even realizing it, one is directed toward an undisciplined path contrary to the dispensation. Instead, what the Buddha points out is that monks should remove improper lay associations and lead their lives in a manner that accords with their ultimate goal, the path to Nibbāna. Leave alone other things, even treating laypeople in an improper way is called "corrupting families" (kula-dūsana). Why is the word kula-dūsana—corrupting families—used? Because it corrupts their faith. It is with great faith, deep faith, immense faith, that lay devotees offer the four requisites to the Sangha. Maintaining relationships with laypeople in an irregular, improper manner causes that faith to be corrupted. We see this from the actions of Ven. Devadatta.

Yet, in society generally, it is those with such attitudes who are respected, who become popular, and to whom most people give their votes. We must bear in mind that if the dispensation is to last for a long time, we must give our vote to the wholesome desire—to the wholesome side. To that side. Thus, we were able to extract a large number of such matters from this story.

The Buddhas introduce a Sambuddha Sāsana to this world having truly understood the nature of this saṃsāra (round of rebirths). The Buddha has declared in various sutta discourses that whatever one receives, whether it is kingship, the status of a treasurer, or the status of a wheel-turning monarch, all of it is impermanent (anicca). Sometimes, in these times, some people read with great desire the parts in those sutta discourses concerning the wealth of wheel-turning monarchs. But they ignore the ending of the suttas: "Monks, all this is impermanent (anicca). Those wheel-turning monarchs are no more, those queens are no more, those princes are no more. All that wealth is now destroyed. Therefore, be disillusioned with formations / preparations / volitional activity (saṅkhāras). All these formations / preparations / volitional activity (saṅkhāras) are impermanent (anicca)." It is in this manner that the Buddha brings forward past stories, stories of wheel-turning monarchs, and so on. Accordingly, what is shown is the nature of suffering / unsatisfactoriness / stress (dukkha) in this saṃsāric life. It is true that by putting patches on these, lay life is maintained to a certain extent. But it is from among the lay devotees that a monk is born into the world at some point. In situations like this, whatever lifestyles you may have, whatever clothes and ornaments you may have at home, putting them aside, removing them, and turning to a simple life for this one day, you get an opportunity to reflect deeply on your life and the world, away from your homes. Through such a beginning, if someone reflects deeply on their life, on their saṃsāric becoming / existence (bhava), and at some point develops disillusionment—disillusionment with saṃsāra—it is at that moment that they enter the monastic life.

What, then, is the purpose of ordination? Pabbajjā means crossing over from this suffering (dukkha) of saṃsāra. A person enters ordination with the primary objective: sabbadukkhaniassaraṇa nibbāna sacchikaraṇatthāya—for the sake of release from all suffering (dukkha) and the realization of Nibbāna. Even today, when the monastic robe is tied around the neck, that phrase is recited. This ordination is for the sake of realizing Nibbāna, which is the departure from all suffering (dukkha). Then, what is meant by the preservation of the dispensation? When we think of the Sangha in the dispensation, you have heard the term "the Great Sangha of the Eight Noble Individuals" (aṭṭha-purisa-puggala). Why is this Great Sangha of the Eight Noble Individuals a special concept for the lay devotee? Because, when viewed from the perspective of lay life, Nibbāna is a very distant thing, a very remote path. But these Eight Noble Individuals are those who give us the understanding that people like us have also traveled this path on various occasions and have put an end to the suffering (dukkha) of saṃsāra. Those eight individuals who are walking on that path and who have reached the fruits of that path—namely, Sotāpanna, Sakadāgāmi, Anāgāmi, and Arahant—are like a lamp-post, a row of lamps on the path to Nibbāna. Through them, we receive a certain light, knowing: "We too can walk on this path." That is the value within the Sangha Sāsana, the dispensation. As long as these monks practice on that path to Nibbāna, so long—as the Buddha also declared on his deathbed—as long as they fulfill those thirty-seven factors of enlightenment (bodhipakkhiya-dhamma), this world will not be empty of Arahants. Because, if one understands the practical aspect of the Dhamma shown by the Buddha and acts accordingly, practices accordingly, one can attain these even today. If we do not properly understand the values of such a salvific Sambuddha Sāsana, and instead use the robe merely as a flag or a suit of armor, the dispensation will decline rather than endure for a long time for the welfare and happiness of gods and humans.

This is indeed the lesson we can draw from this story. We must reflect: how do we enter this path? Through virtues such as moral virtue (sīla). The Buddha has shown that concentration (samādhi) is built on the foundation of moral virtue (sīla). It is based on that concentration (samādhi), which is one-pointedness of mind, that one can understand deeply the three characteristics—impermanent (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and not-self (anattā)—according to reality (yathābhūta-ñāṇa), whether one is a layperson or a monk. Therefore, taking the lives of the monks and Arahants as an example, today a large number of lay devotees have abandoned their luxurious lifestyles and, with the understanding of practicing like an Arahant for this one day, have undertaken the eight precepts of the Uposatha. Thus, the very practice of such a path shows that even within you, the lay devotees, there is a deep goal. We think: "Someday, we must escape all this saṃsāric suffering." Not only the trials and tribulations of this lay life, but if the word of the Buddha is true, we have suffered in this saṃsāra for a long time not only as humans, but also as animals, demons (yakṣas), hungry ghosts (pretas), and hell-beings. If a Buddha Sāsana has arisen, that Buddha Sāsana can be considered the greatest inheritance received from a Buddha only because of the Sangha who are dedicated to realizing the path to Nibbāna. As long as the Sambuddha Sāsana is protected, lay devotees can feel that even the practice they carry out, even the practice of moral virtue (sīla) they perform, is meaningful. If there is no such thing, if there is no goal, no lamp or light ahead, then lay devotees too will remain submerged in that very luxurious life, dragging the Sangha into that same life, and wandering in saṃsāra for another long period of time.

Therefore, we must always reflect upon and bring to light the Dhamma. That Nibbāna which the Buddhas have brought to light. Even though we consider it as just a word, Nibbāna is the cooling, the extinguishment, obtained by crossing over from the suffering (dukkha) of saṃsāra—or rather, that peace realized in this very life. This goal, then, is the objective of every Buddhist. Whatever meritorious deeds they perform, such as giving alms, or offering a flower or a lamp, these devotees pray: "By the merit and benefit of offering these flowers, may I attain Nibbāna." In every act, they make the aspiration: "Nibbāna-paccayo hotu*"—may this be a condition for Nibbāna. Instead of keeping it merely as an aspiration, if we are to put it into practice, we must walk on the path of moral virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). The values belonging to that path are those we mentioned: fewness of wishes (appicchatā), contentment (santuṭṭhitā), and ease of maintenance (subharatā). Those qualities.

Furthermore, you know that in the Karaṇīyametta Sutta, which is frequently used and recited with great devotion by both laity and clergy, it is mentioned: "kulesu ananugiddho"—not being greedily attached to families. That is how one practices the path to Nibbāna. As mentioned earlier, the brother of King Dhammāsoka was a sub-king. But after becoming a monk, he went into the forest as an ekavihāriya (solitary dweller) and, with strong determination, resolved not to lay down his armor until he became an Arahant. Why did he act with such firm resolve? Because he understood the dispensational values correctly. Why? Because it is only during the appearance of a Buddha (buddhōtpāda) that one gets the opportunity to escape from saṃsāra. Someone might say: "Even before a Buddha arises, Paccekabuddhas also arise and attain Nibbāna, do they not?" But what is the limitation of Paccekabuddhas? Although they are considered superior to Arahants, they cannot make others understand the path to Nibbāna. By their presence, one can collect great merit by offering alms and so on, but they cannot point out the path to Nibbāna. That can be done only by a Fully Enlightened Buddha (Sammā Sambuddha). Therefore, if such a path has been shown, and if such a Dhamma exists, living in accordance with that Dhamma is indeed what is meant by preserving the Sambuddha Sāsana.

Someone might say: "In the past, when the Dhamma was recorded in palm-leaf manuscripts, there was a risk of it being destroyed by mold and termites. But now we have various modern devices." (Referring to whatever names you call them by). We see that the words we speak are also being recorded somewhere. But will a dispensation recorded in such a way be preserved? We must consider that even if these are written in gold and preserved, if they are not deposited in our hearts, they are of no use. In the future, when people look at them, they will just be like illegible stone inscriptions—just a pile of incomprehensible words. That is the state it has reached today. This is why those great scholars, who are called learned, fall into trouble when they try to understand this Dhamma. They cannot understand it. Why? Because they do not practically walk on this path. It is only by walking on the path of moral virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā) that this Dhamma can be understood.

What is even more important is this: now, to someone training on the path to Nibbāna, instructions related to completing their meditation activities on a daily basis can be given only by those who themselves practice them—only by those who have practically realized them. No matter how many carpentry tools are piled up, if there is no carpenter to teach how to use them, one cannot engage in that craft. Similarly, even if parts of this Dhamma are preserved in books and various other media, if there are no people walking on that path, or who have walked on that path, capable of giving advice on the problems that arise when practicing it, the dispensation can be said to end right there. Such a situation might indeed arise. If, instead of bringing this Dhamma close to our lives, we keep it at a distance, analyzing it, engaging in more and more conceptualization (vitakka / reasoning), with the motive of earning money, then the dispensation will not be preserved. Instead, if one knows even a little and puts it into practice, training in moral virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā), and can realize for oneself those states shown by the Buddha, it is through that that the dispensation is preserved.

Regarding the dispensation, a threefold dispensation is mentioned: learning (pariyatti), practice (paṭipatti), and penetration (paṭivedha). Learning (pariyatti) means studying and memorizing the Dhamma. No matter how much of that exists, if it is not put into practice, it is entirely a pile of words, a pile of mantras—just a pile of useless mantras. Next, penetration (paṭivedha) refers to the realization achieved by putting it into practice. Penetration (paṭivedha) means seeing through. At some point, one must see through the three characteristics—impermanent (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and not-self (anattā)—with wisdom (paññā). One must realize it. As the Buddha has shown: "paccattaṃ veditabbo"—this Dhamma is "paccattaṃ veditabbo viññūhi"—to be realized by the wise, each for themselves. If we are to realize it, we must walk on that path we mentioned.

So, you have made a good start: this undertaking of moral virtue (sīla). Along with that, we can think that today you also got an opportunity to practice your meditation subjects to some extent according to the path of meditation. At the same time, if someone, reflecting deeply and from the perspective of insight (vipassanā), has deeply understood the impermanence (anicca) of this life, of this body, according to the principles shown by the Buddha, it is at that moment that wisdom (paññā) is said to have emerged through insight. This reality must be seen through within this very five aggregates (pañcakkhandha / name-and-form) at some point through meditation. Everything we think is permanent is impermanent (anicca). Everything we think is pleasant is suffering (dukkha). Everything we think is beautiful, or think of as "self" or "mine"—we must understand the true nature of these things which the world perceives in a perverted, distorted way (vipallāsa). The path leading to that understanding is the path of meditation.

Therefore, these wise lay devotees must reflect: on a Vesak day like today, we must protect these dispensational values, without any distinction between laity and clergy. If we are to protect them, we must understand them correctly. We must understand them according to the word of the Buddha. What do we have to protect? Is it those factors that help us practice this path of Nibbāna, which supports the dispensational survival shown by the Buddha? Or is it those various goals brought by the world from the West? If we shape our lives according to those competitive invitations coming from lay life, turning toward that lifestyle, then just as it becomes difficult to protect those virtues shown by the Buddha, such as fewness of wishes (appicchatā), contentment (santutṭhitā), and ease of maintenance (subharatā), the dispensation will become completely corrupted and degraded through improper lay relationships.

It becomes corrupted. Lay devotees develop a certain respect for the monks, thinking: "These monks are carrying out something that we cannot do in the lay life. Supporting them with the four requisites is our duty as good people." Thus, with great faith, even while depriving themselves of food and drink, they offer food, drink, clothing, and the four requisites to the monks. Therefore, a great responsibility lies on the monks: if they, walking on the path shown by the Buddha, realize that Dhamma of Nibbāna brought to light by the Buddha, the lay devotees will accumulate a vast mass of merit. It is with this intention that the Buddha declared: "Anuttaraṃ puññakkhettaṃ lokassa"—they become an incomparable field of merit for the world. But if one acts in that practice like Ven. Devadatta, merely fulfilling the wishes of the lay devotees who look upon them as a field of merit, regardless of popularity, it only paves the way for the decline of the dispensation.

We place these few points in your minds out of concern for the long endurance of this dispensation. So, today you have listened to the Dhamma for about an hour. Likewise, at your own level, you have undertaken a certain moral virtue (sīla) and disciplined your body and speech through virtues like moral virtue (sīla). Everyone should resolve: "Understanding the nature of this saṃsāra, whether as a layperson or a monk, walking on this path of meditation, and as quickly as possible through the association of spiritual friends (kalyāṇa-mitta), by penetrating the paths and fruits of Sotāpanna, Sakadāgāmi, Anāgāmi, and Arahant, may this listening to the Dhamma definitely be a supportive condition, a strong dependency, for escaping all this saṃsāric suffering and realizing the noble, deathless, great Nibbāna!" Likewise, may all beings, including our departed relatives from the Avīci hell up to the Akaniṭṭha heaven, rejoice in this merit of listening to and teaching the Dhamma! Having rejoiced, may they realize the noble, deathless, great Nibbāna through their aspired Bodhi (Enlightenment)!

Verses 404 from the Brāhmaṇavagga (Chapter on the Brahmin) of the Dhammapada

Dear Listeners,

Today is Posa Full Moon Poya Day, the day on which we commemorate the historic event of the establishment of the Buddha Sāsana in this country under the leadership of Arahata Mahinda Thero. Although this Buddha Sāsana has survived for many centuries amidst various timely calamities and social upheavals, many people nowadays are not clear even about what its signs of decline are and what its signs of progress are. Therefore, for today's sermon, we have selected a verse and a story that would help us understand this matter at least to some extent.

The Buddha, the Teacher of the Three Worlds, preached this verse at Jetavanarama in connection with a certain monk named Tissa. This Venerable Tissa, having obtained a meditation topic from the Buddha, entered a forest in search of a suitable place to meditate. As he was walking, he came across a cave situated on a mountain slope, and his mind became very calm and attained concentration (samādhi). That monk thought, “This cave is very suitable and congenial (sappāya) for me. Perhaps, dwelling here, I will be able to bring an end to the Dukkha (Suffering) of saṃsāra. He formed this thought. The deity who resided in that cave, seeing this monk approaching, first looked with divine eye at the monk's virtue (sīla). Upon looking, the deity saw that he was a monk who had kept his virtue extremely pure from the very day of his higher ordination (upasampadā). So the deity thought, “Now, with such a virtuous person, with a monk, I cannot live together. Deities cannot dwell on a higher level [above a virtuous monk], so this will be troublesome. Yet, the deity thought, “Perhaps this monk will stay only for today and leave tomorrow. Thus, the deity left the cave.

Then on the second day, Venerable Tissa went to the village for alms. Seeing him, a certain lay woman (upāsikā) became very pleased and invited him, offering him almsfood at her house. She requested, “Venerable Sir, please reside here for these three months of the rainy season (vassāna); reside in that cave, and we will look after your needs.” The monk accepted this. Thus he returned to the cave. The deity waited for several days, thinking, “He will leave today, he will leave tomorrow.” After about two weeks, the deity realized that this monk had come indeed to spend the rainy season retreat. Then the deity thought, “Now, how can I arrange a way to make this monk leave this place?” Since the monk was pure, there was no way to make any false accusation against him. “However, through some strategy, I must create a blemish in this monk's virtue, create disrepute for him.” Thinking thus, the deity possessed the eldest son of that lay woman. Having possessed him, the deity twisted the child's head, made his eyes roll back, and made him fall down foaming at the mouth.

When the lay woman screamed in fear, the deity, speaking through the possessed child, said, “It is I who have possessed this child. I do not want any animal sacrifices or offerings. Go to that monk whom you look after, get a piece of a dry vine of wild ginger (dambuvāl) and a wild beehive, boil some oil, and apply it as nasal drops (nasya) to this child; then he will be cured. I will then leave.” This lay woman replied, “Even if my child dies, I cannot do that [ask the monk to do medical work].” Then the deity said, “If you cannot do that, then tell that monk to put some asafoetida powder into this child's nose.” She said, “I cannot do that either.” “Well, if that too is impossible, sprinkle the water used to wash that monk's feet on this child's head.” “Ah, that indeed I can do,” said the lay woman. That day, when Venerable Tissa came for alms, after offering the almsfood, she made him wash his feet and asked, “Venerable Sir, is it wrong if we sprinkle this water on this child's head?” “Very well, it is alright,” he replied. As soon as that water was sprinkled, the deity left the possessed child and returned to the cave. The child was then cured.

The monk knew nothing of this detail. As usual, after finishing his almsmeal, reflecting on his meditation topic and remaining in meditation, he walked back to the cave. As he was arriving, the deity standing near the door of the cave said, “Great physician, do not enter here.” Then the monk asked, “Who is speaking?” “It is I, the deity residing in this cave,” the deity replied. Then the monk thought, “Have I practiced medicine? Have I practiced medicine for laypeople since the day of my higher ordination? I have not done so. My virtue (sīla) is extremely pure.” Seeing this, he asked the deity, “Why do you accuse me like this? Have I done such a thing?” Then the deity said, “Why talk about the past? Did you not do such a thing today itself? Did you not sprinkle water on the head of the child of such-and-such lay woman?” Then the monk realized, “This deity is making a baseless accusation.” At the same time, he thought, “Since the deity cannot find any defect in my virtue, he is making this false accusation.” Then he reflected on his own virtue. The joy and rapture (pīti, pāmojja) that arose within him through this reflection was so immense that, subduing it and establishing concentration (samādhi)—according to the text, before he could even take another step forward—he attained the supreme fruit of Arahatsip right there, having become concentrated through that. After becoming an Arahāt, he told the deity, “It is not suitable for you to remain here after accusing a pure monk like me.” When he said this, the deity departed.

That monk resided there for those three months of the rainy season. Having lived in that cave, after the rainy season retreat, he went to see the Buddha. On that occasion, the other monks asked him, “Friend, did you fulfill your ultimate goal?” meaning, did you become an Arahāt. He did not say it directly. Instead, the monk narrated the entire event that had occurred. Then those monks asked, “Venerable Sir, when the deity made that baseless accusation, did you not get angry? Did ill-will (dosa) not arise in you?” He replied, “No such change occurred in me.” Perceiving through this that he had indeed become an Arahāt, those monks went and told the Buddha, “Venerable Sir, such-and-such monk says this. He claims to be an Arahāt.” Then the Buddha, in a manner of endorsing it, said, “My son's virtue is like this, extremely pure. My son is such a person,” and expressing this idea, he uttered the verse we cited at the beginning:

“Asamsaṭṭhaṃ gahaṭṭhehi, anāgārehi cūbhayaṃ,

Anokasāriṃ appicchaṃ, tam ahaṃ brūmi brāhmaṇaṃ.”

“Not associating with householders and the homeless alike, wandering without a home, with few desires—him I call a Brahmin.”

In this dispensation, the term 'Brahmin'—meaning the noble Brahmin—is used for an Arahāt. The Buddha praised such an Arahāt in this manner. That is the story. Now, let us see if there is anything in this verse and story related to what we said about the Sāsana.

First of all, when speaking of the story, we get an excellent example from the lay side through the conduct of that lay woman. Because she was a lay woman who had some understanding of the disciplinary rules (vinaya) and virtues of the Sangha, she did not tempt the monk to practice medicine—which is considered a wrong livelihood (micchā-ājīva) for monks—even if her child's life was at stake. Through this, we can see that the lay devotees of that time had an understanding of what is allowable (kappa) and what is not allowable (akappa) for monks. Likewise, there was a nature in that society that supported the preservation of the virtues, such as sīla, of the Sangha. In truth, many people in this day and age have no understanding of the virtues, such as sīla, of the Sangha. Consequently, they conduct lay-monk relationships based on various other principles. There is a fourfold purification of virtue belonging to monks, known as Catu-pārisiddhi-sīla. This is a virtue of four parts. Briefly mentioned:

1. Pātimokkha-saṁvara-sīla (Virtue of restraint according to the Disciplinary Code)
2. Indriya-saṁvara-sīla (Virtue of restraint of the sense faculties)
3. Ājīva-pārisiddhi-sīla (Virtue of purification of livelihood)
4. Paccaya-sannissita-sīla (Virtue connected with the use of requisites)

Among these, first, the virtue of restraint (saṁvara-sīla) means training oneself in accordance with the code of disciplinary rules laid down by the Buddha for the Sangha. The virtue of restraint of the sense faculties (indriya-saṁvara-sīla) means guarding the six sense doors—eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind—against defilements (kilesa) that flow in, closing and restraining these doors. The virtue of purification of livelihood (ājīva-pārisiddhi-sīla) means the pure livelihood proper to monks, especially maintaining correct conduct without forming inappropriate, worldly relationships with lay devotees—it is the virtue regarding the purification of livelihood. Fourthly, the virtue connected with requisites (paccaya-sannissita-sīla) means, when using the four requisites—robes, almsfood, lodging, and medicine—reflecting on their true purpose, that is, for the sake of Nibbāna, for attaining Nibbāna, and not using them with greed, but rather turning them into meditation, such as meditating on them as elements (dhātu-manasikāra) or as foul (asubha-manasikāra).

It must be because the lay devotees of that time had some understanding of this fourfold pure virtue that, considering the livelihood [of monks] and having respect for the Sangha, she said, “Even if my child dies, I will not ask such a thing from the monk.” Now, in this day and age, this can sometimes be a problem. Why? Because the lay-monk relationship, its value, its suitability or unsuitability, is measured according to principles such as altruistic service, social service, and economics. However, the Buddha has shown that since the ultimate goal of monks is Nibbāna, and since their life is sustained by consuming food given in faith by laypeople, the Buddha allows only what is relevant to the purpose for which they went forth (ordained). Furthermore, practicing medicine for laypeople is a wrong livelihood, an incorrect livelihood, a corruption of families (kula-dūsana). That is, the Buddha has shown it as something that corrupts and soils the faith of laypeople. Why? Because being overly intimate leads to the decline of monks. On one hand, monks come forward to fulfill the mundane needs of laypeople, breaking disciplinary rules to please them, and are thus tempted to obtain the four requisites. On the other hand, lay devotees also look to use monks for everything to fulfill their own needs.

Now, these devotees know that lay life is very complex, lived amidst a great multitude of problems. Often laypeople have to “hit the nail according to the place” (improvise for convenience). When they have no other tool, they turn the monk into a tool. Making an intimate monk a tool, they fulfill their own needs. What happens through this is that the monk deviates from discipline, from the aforementioned purification of livelihood (ājīva-pārisiddhi), and not only falls away from his virtue but ultimately even disrobes from the saffron robe. Monks fall into such a state of great decline. They fall into ruin. Along with that, the respect that laypeople had for monks is also lost. You have heard the old saying in this country, “The comb of the cock seen morning and night looks white.” In the same way, they even forget the robe that the monk is wearing. The monk falls to the level of someone just wearing a white dress. The simile of the cock fits perfectly here. They forget that the monk is wearing a robe. Treating him as one of their own, they try to carry on their life by utilizing monks for all their weddings, functions, and every other activity. Although from the perspective of social service, altruism, etc., this might seem like a good thing, because it does not agree with the true purpose of monks, the Buddha declared these to be wrong livelihoods. Thus, such a situation exists.

At the same time, another important matter is revealed to us by this story through the baseless accusation made by the deity. Hearing that baseless accusation, that monk did not get angry. Instead, what did he do? He reflected on his own virtue (sīla). How instantaneous was the result of that reflection! Why? Because he had arrived at that cave while reflecting on his meditation topic. Now, it is shown in the Dhamma that this reflection on one's virtue (sīlānussati) is extremely powerful. The rapture (pāmojja) that arises through reflecting on virtue is immense. Without shouting and boasting about that rapture to others, one calms it down and pacifies it, and through that joy (pīti), both mind and body are tranquilized. Through that tranquility, concentration (samādhi) arises. Such is the functioning of the mind. This monk experienced this instantly because he was an extremely virtuous monk who loved solitude. At the same time, drawing upon his past merit (puñña-sakti), he instantly attained the fruit of Arahatsip. Through this, the benefit of keeping the virtue of purification of livelihood (ājīva-pārisiddhi-sīla) perfectly was realized right there by Venerable Tissa. This is a great example when we think of it from the side of the Sangha.

So, when we reflect on this lay-monk relationship on a day like today, let us turn our attention to the group that came to Mihintale to establish the Buddha Sāsana. History records that this group included Arahats Mahinda Thero, four higher-ordained Arahats monks named Itthiya, Uttiya, Sambala, and Bhaddasāla, the Arahats novice monk Sumana, and the non-returner lay disciple Bhanduka who had attained direct knowledges (abhiññā). When we think of how this group was composed, we can understand that this missionary group was sent in a manner perfectly suited to explain the lay-monk relationship to a new country and a new people. Why? Because, looking at it from one side, a minimum of five higher-ordained monks is required for the noble vinaya act of conferring higher ordination (upasampadā). Thus, there were at least five higher-ordained monks there. What did the novice monk and the lay disciple do? They must have explained the principles of the lay-monk relationship to this new population. They must have explained, “These are the things that are allowable for monks, and these are the things that are not allowable.” We can understand that this group was formed in a way that helped to coordinate and create awareness. This, too, was done with a deep purpose. It was not because there were no other Arahats or other monks. Bringing a lay disciple along was done so that the gradual transition in this dispensation from layperson to monk, as well as the principles of the lay-monk relationship, could be explained to a new people in an understandable manner.

However, in the course of time, as we mentioned earlier, while this Sāsana progressed amidst various timely calamities and social upheavals, these noble goals, ideas, and the purpose of going forth began to be forgotten by both monks and laypeople. What ultimately happened through this? The going forth (ordination), which should take place with a deep purpose, finally became a mere nominal going forth. That is, ordination is something that must happen with a deep understanding. Externally, the Buddha has declared that a person does not become a monk merely by wearing robes or shaving the head. Many accept that while ordaining the body is easy, ordaining the mind is difficult. Thus, while ordaining the body can be done in a short time, it takes a considerable amount of time to ordain the mind. There have been rare instances where some people who had developed their perfections (pāramī) instantly became Arahats even in lay clothing. But one should not generalize based on that. In this dispensation, this practice (paṭipadā) is extremely difficult. The Buddha has declared: “Dullabhā pabbajjā”—going forth is rare. It is also difficult. Genuine going forth is a rare and difficult thing. However, in this way, when we gradually think about these social transitions and upheavals, it becomes a very common and very easy thing. That is the level to which it falls. Then, as methods of making this going forth easy develop in various ways, finally, this ordaining becomes a fashion. In this day and age, everything becomes a fashion. Devotees might see the final end of this fashion in the near future.

Just as these devotees observe the precepts and then relinquish them, going forth might be transformed into a mere “change of clothes” where one ordains in the morning reciting, “Sabba-dukkha-nissaraṇa-nibbāna-sacchikaraṇatthāya” (for the sake of release from all suffering and realizing Nibbāna) and removes the robe in the evening. Such things are possible.

Yet, the Buddha has shown through a wonderful and valuable code of practice how these external changes made during ordination—such as wearing the robe and shaving the head—can be taken deeper and deeper by considering their profound meaning, helping one even to attain Arahatsip. This is found in a valuable discourse called the Dasa Dhamma Sutta. Although this Dasa Dhamma Sutta was preached especially for monks, these devotees' understanding of the ten matters included in this Dasa Dhamma Sutta will help establish a proper lay-monk relationship. Even if we cannot completely stop the aforementioned decline of the Sāsana, if lay devotees also become aware of this, it will help to at least arrest the speed of that decline to some extent. That is why we are attempting at this moment to briefly explain, within the available time, the ten matters mentioned in the Dasa Dhamma Sutta.

In that Dasa Dhamma Sutta, it is stated as follows: “Monks, there are ten dhammas (matters) that should be constantly, daily reflected upon by one who has gone forth.”

“Reflecting” (paccavekkhaṇa) means considering, or looking back to examine. It is looking to see: Is something good? Is it bad? Was it done correctly? Was it not? The Buddha once explained this word “reflection” to Rahula Thero using a beautiful simile, just like explaining to a small child. When a person is about to go somewhere, they look into a mirror to adjust their hair, face, and clothing. They look into the mirror to see what the defects are and to correct them. The word “reflection” (paccavekkhaṇa) is used for looking into that mirror. A mirror is used in a house for reflection. That is, looking back. You are ready to go, but you look back to see, “Are my adjustments and clothing proper?” A similar idea is present here. There are ten matters to reflect upon. When looked at, they are like ten mirrors. What is each of these? Let us try to understand them next.

First, monks must daily reflect on this: “I have entered upon a state of altered appearance (vevaṇṇiyam upagato).” “I have entered upon a state of altered appearance.” Though mentioned briefly, if explained, it must be taken like this: First, let us think of the lay devotee. The nature of a layperson is not one of altered appearance (vevaṇṇiya). They do not like colorless or dull things. The lay devotee likes colorful and beautiful things. But the Buddha tells monks to enter upon a state of altered appearance (vevaṇṇiya). How does one enter upon a state of altered appearance? It is explained in two ways: kāya-vevaṇṇiyam (altered appearance of the body) and parikkhāra-vevaṇṇiyam (altered appearance of requisites). The altered appearance of the body is explained like this: Devotees in this society know how many fashions are made from time to time regarding hair and beard. The torture given to them! Young men and women, seeing how these change from time to time, lean towards that side, spending any amount of money to follow the new fashion. They do that. They strive to do that. But for those gone forth, there is no such problem. Why? Because at the very moment of ordination, hair and beard are shaved off. There is the altered appearance of the body. So, the altered appearance of the body should be understood in that way.

The altered appearance of requisites is: lay devotees have various colorful clothes. Even if these devotees appear in white clothes at this moment, when going out onto the streets, they might wear colorful clothes that make them unrecognizable. That is the normal nature of a layperson. But regarding monks, the Buddha has declared: wear a robe made of cut pieces, discolored and dyed with paste-dye. Use an almsbowl, a blackened almsbowl. Likewise, the other requisites are things that show fewness of desires (appicchatā). They are not luxury goods that are to be used, but what is suitable for fewness of desires. The Buddha has even told some monks, when they were using things suitable for pleasure-seeking laypeople, to break them and throw them away. That shows altered appearance. That is something that monks must constantly bear in mind. “Not colorfulness like a layperson, but altered appearance is what belongs to us.” That is the first one.

The meaning of the next one in Sinhala is: “My livelihood is bound up with others.” The word parapaṭibaddhā is mentioned there. That means, “My livelihood is dependent on others, connected with others. I do not live on my own money, from my own bank account.” They survive on the food offered with faith by lay devotees—going from house to house for alms if they wish—and on other requisites like robes offered by lay devotees. They reside in a hut built by lay devotees. Constantly reflect on that matter. Why reflect on it thus? Through that reflection, the purpose of going forth is automatically remembered. “Why, when I was such a millionaire, did I abandon all that? Why did I come to this poor state?” In truth, the basic meaning of the word bhikkhu is a mendicant who lives on alms, like a beggar when looked at. In terms of the word, it is like a beggar, but the difference is that they do not harass people like beggars do. They just go and stand in front of a house for a moment. Whether they receive something or not, it is the same. Furthermore, it is not given in the sense of giving to a beggar; these devotees, thinking of them as a field of merit (puññakkhetta) for their own merit on this path to Nibbāna, offer something to the Sangha with faith. Then, through that, the purpose of going forth is remembered. Whenever a monk did wrong, the Buddha would always remind him, “Why, monk, do you not depend on the food given with faith by lay devotees?” Through that, we see the correct lay-monk relationship.

What is there, within that transaction, is the fulfillment of those virtues. But in this day and age, some people distort the word parapaṭibaddhā to an extraordinary degree and explain that for those gone forth, it means fulfilling transactions with lay devotees in a lay manner. That is not it. If one is truly to pay back that debt, one must attain what Venerable Tissa attained. It is through that that the offering becomes of great fruit and great benefit. Along with that Arahantship, how great a merit must have accrued to that lay woman! Otherwise, if that monk had taken up practicing medicine, the alms offered would have been of no use. Such is the situation. To understand this, to remember this, the Buddha has declared to monks:

*“Parapaṭibaddhā me jīvikā” — My livelihood is bound up with others. That, then, is the second one.

Next, the third one: “A different behavior/manner must be maintained by me.” This needs to be explained. In ordinary, understandable language: “I must deport my physical postures in a manner different from a layperson. My behavior must be different from a layperson.” What does that mean? The word “manner” (ākalla) used there refers especially to the way one deports postures like walking, standing, sitting, etc. Regarding the deportment of postures, there is a difference between the way monks deport their postures and the way laypeople do. What belongs to monks is performing activities like walking and going in a calm manner. In short, at the end of the disciplinary rules, the Buddha says: “Monks, you must behave for the clarity of the unclarified, and for the increase of the clarified (appasannānaṃ vā prasādaya, pasannānaṃ vā bhiyyobhāvāya.)” It is in accordance with these purposes that the Buddha laid down various disciplinary rules and training precepts (sikkhāpada). Especially, there are many training rules called Sekhiya regarding how a monk should behave in a village: “One should behave in this manner. One should wrap the robe in this manner. One should walk calmly in this manner. One should eat in this manner.” All of these show that seeing this becomes a cause for the layperson's mind to become serene and pleased. That is why monks have a different deportment. If they keep doing what laypeople do, they can never develop that aforementioned calmness and restraint.

So, regarding the value of this, some might think, “What is the use of doing these things in this modern world?” Modern or not, if we turn our attention to history, the best example of the value of this deportment of postures (ākappasampatti) is found in history when we think of how a certain violent and ruthless king named Caṇḍāśoka was transformed. It is a historical story. Seeing the calm manner in which a seven-year-old small Arahāt novice monk named Nigrodha was walking across the courtyard of King Caṇḍāśoka's palace, the king became serene, invited him in, listened to the Dhamma from Venerable Nigrodha, and became a changed man. Through this, we see the importance of that deportment of postures. Likewise, we know that according to the Buddha's teaching, this deportment of postures is shown with a beautiful simile. There is a simile expressed by the monks of the past according to the Buddha's teaching:

“Siniddhā tela dhārāva ahosi iriyāpatho”

A beautiful simile is given for the deportment of the postures of monks: like a smooth stream of oil. Try pouring ghee or coconut oil from a bottle. It does not pour out with a splashing sound like water does. In a wonderful pattern, it flows smoothly, softly, evenly, without turbulence. The Buddha has declared to monks that their postures should be deported in that manner. That is one characteristic of that deportment of postures—like a stream of oil. Thus, monks are told to constantly reflect on this deportment of postures. Just as a layperson looks into a mirror to see if their clothes and ornaments are in place, a monk must constantly reflect on their deportment of postures and correct any defects.

The fourth matter is regarding one's own virtue (sīla). “When reflecting on my virtue, when looking back and considering it, does my own mind blame me?” To explain “does my own mind blame me”: Is there any blemish or defect in my virtue? That is what that monk did too. As soon as the deity accused him, he thought, reflected, and looked into this mirror of his own virtue to see if there was any defect in it. When he looked, there was none. It was through that that he ultimately became an Arahāt. Thus, the Buddha has declared that if a person is to improve, they must have what we normally call self-respect in the world. Similarly, it is a cause for oneself to be happy: “I am keeping these virtues such as sīla,” and one's mind does not blame oneself. “The mind does not blame” means there is no remorse. “No remorse” means the mind is unified, calm, concentrated, and not scattered. Through this, we see how these are integrated into the practice (paṭipadā).

The next matter—the fifth matter—is: “When my fellow monks (sābrahmacārī) whom I associate with, the wise monks, not foolish people, but the wise monks, examine my virtue, is there any cause for them to blame me?” One reflects on that too. In this regard, the Buddha points out a principle called lokādhīpateyya (governed by the world). Just as one thinks of oneself and is happy, if there is a reasonable blame from the world, monks must behave in such a way that there is no room for it. Thus, they reflect whether there is any room for others to blame them regarding their virtue. Reflecting on this is how it became clear to Venerable Tissa that the deity had made a baseless accusation. No one else, no one at all, could accuse him; his virtue was extremely pure. He realized this through that reflection, the fifth reflection. It was because of this that he went and narrated the complete detail of his life in the cave to the monks without any fear. Let us think of the other side. If that monk had gone to those houses and started practicing medicine, could he have gone and spoken before the Buddha or the other monks? He would have been in a position where he could not speak. Instead, because Venerable Tissa was pure regarding this fifth matter, he spoke without fear, saying, “I spent the time in this and this manner.”

Now, the sixth matter mentioned is: “There is separation, departure, and dissociation for me from all that is dear and appealing.” We will have to separate from everything. Either by death or through other causes, we will have to separate from everything we consider dear and appealing. What this shows is what belongs to the monk. The verse also says there: “Gahaṭṭhehi anāgārehi cūbhayaṃ” — there is no clinging or attachment to householders, nor is there any clinging or attachment to those gone forth. Why do they do this? Because of the Dhamma nature that we will have to separate from all of this. They reflect on this daily. “There is separation from things dear and appealing to me, from people dear and appealing to me; such is the nature of saṃsāra.” They instill this in their minds. That is the sixth matter.

Next, the seventh matter: they reflect on karma, the law of karma. “Karma is my own property.” If looked at in the true sense, karma is the only thing that belongs to us. Karma is my inheritance, my birthright. Karma is the cause of my birth. Karma is my true kinsman. Karma is my true refuge. Whatever karma I do, whether good or bad, I must expect its result. I am the heir to my karma. I must experience the result of my karma. Thus, they bring close to their lives that wonderful Dhamma nature existing in the world regarding karma, from which not even Buddhas or Arahats can escape. Looking through that mirror of karma, they understand: “This is the nature of our everything, of every single thing. There is nothing to be proud of in these. Our pleasure and pain are due to some past karma. All these good things we experience are due to some past good karma. These difficulties and sufferings are due to various unwholesome (akusala) karmas. It is the same for the future.” Living with this principle of karma is what is meant there.

Next, the eighth matter shown is somewhat unique. “How do my days and nights pass for me?” That is, “How do my nights and days pass? In what manner do my nights and days pass? While doing what?” What this indicates is that every moment of living the life of one gone forth, one must think: “Today I spent a day. Is this day I spent one that helps me fulfill the purpose of my going forth? Or is it one that causes its decline? In what manner do my nights and days pass?” The meaning of that statement is: “How do I spend my time? In a useless manner? Or in a successful manner?” One constantly reflects on this.

Next, the ninth matter: “Do I delight in empty places, empty houses suitable for meditation? Or do I have a delight in peaceful dwelling in them?” That is a difficult thing. A lay devotee, who lives with a crowd, cannot live alone and secluded in an empty house, a forest, or a cave like that. That is a special strength that helps towards Nibbāna. That is why the Buddha points this out here. What is asked here is about being devoted to meditation, loving solitude. Thus, a monk must ask himself: “Am I truly fond of solitude? Can I live in an empty house? Do I have the strength within me to step away from human society and go to an empty house for the sake of Dhamma and meditation?” They are told to think of this constantly. For one who lives closely associated with and surrounded by laypeople, let alone an empty house, even a forest is something that brings fear. They are afraid even to think of it. “Alas, how can I live alone?” Such is the situation here. That is why the Buddha has shown this as the ninth matter, as a reflection relevant to meditation, to think and consider about oneself.

Now, next is the tenth one. It is for the sake of this tenth one that all of these exist. When the Buddha summarizes matters of Dhamma, the final thing is often the crowning point of the Dhamma. Likewise, one must think especially about this; these devotees must instill this in their minds. What is the tenth one? A monk must reflect on this daily: “In my final moments, at the moment of death, if my fellow monks whom I associate with come and ask me: ‘Venerable Sir, you have lived this life of one gone forth for so long; have you attained any superhuman state (uttari-manussa-dhamma), such as the jhānas, paths, and fruits?’ when they ask thus, will I be free from embarrassment, not having to look down at the ground with a frowning face in regret? Have I attained any noble, spiritual state of the Sāsana so that I do not have to be in such a state?” If one has attained some noble state, when that question is asked, even if one is reluctant to say it directly due to fewness of desires (appicchatā), at least one can adorn one's face with a gentle smile at that moment of death. “Let them think I did not attain it.” In that way, at that moment of death, when looking back and reflecting on one's life without regret: “My going forth, the purpose of my going forth, has been fulfilled. I have no fear. I have no fear of the lower realms (apāya). If Arahātship is attained, there is no more Jāti (Birth) or Jarāmarāṇa (Decay and Death), sickness, or death in saṃsāra. It is that peace, like a flame gone out Nibbāna.” That is the ultimate goal. The final goal of going forth, the ultimate consummation. Even the robe-belt is tied for this purpose, not for anything else. The robe-belt is not tied so that lay society can tie it and drag the monk along, like a cow is tied and dragged. It is bad to drag that robe-belt to fulfill the mundane needs of laypeople. Tying that robe-belt is a certain symbol. After removing the lay clothes, they put on the robes. What is the meaning of that? “Sabba-dukkha-nissaraṇa-nibbāna-sacchikaraṇatthāya” — for the sake of realizing Nibbāna, which brings an end to all suffering of saṃsāra.

Therefore, right from the beginning, it is connected to that ultimate goal. If these devotees think back on the deep meaning of each of these matters, they can understand from this final matter, even if more details are not said. In the final moments, at the moment of death, if one has attained that noble supramundane state through this rare going forth within this rare Buddha Sāsana—even amidst eating little or nothing, even amidst various illnesses and obstacles—then there is great peace at the final moment. Otherwise, crying out in fear of death, no matter what titles, honors, offices, or degrees one possessed, crying out in terrible lamentation at the final moment, the life of one gone forth ends right there. And then, there is no knowing where one will go. That is why the Buddha highlights this through the final matter of this Dasa Dhamma Sutta.

Now, sometimes someone might say these are outdated things nowadays. We have not yet heard of the Dasa Dhamma Sutta being made into a “Nava Dhamma Sutta” (Nine Dhamma Sutta). Monks still use it. What is told to us at the end of this is the consummation of the life of one gone forth, its ultimate purpose. It is that which crowns the life of one gone forth. This is not a common thing. This cannot be made common. Likewise, this is not easy. Now, the life of crows is very easy. The Buddha has shown that for a monk who does not keep the training rules such as the vinaya, it is very easy to live like a crow. But the Buddha has shown that for a genuine monk, life is difficult, hard. Sometimes they do not even receive almsfood properly. Yet, they do not try to please laypeople in inappropriate ways to obtain the four requisites through wrong livelihood. That is the practice. Why? Because that is a great betrayal. On one hand, it is a betrayal of the Sāsana; on the other, it is a betrayal of the rarest purpose in this rare time—crossing over the suffering of saṃsāra, which has not been done before. Through that, the going forth becomes entirely useless. It does not bear fruit; it becomes useless and in vain.

Through this, we can understand the value of this Dasa Dhamma Sutta. In truth, this should not be thought of as something that monks keep hidden and use only for themselves. By lay devotees becoming aware of this, they can protect themselves. They can avoid misleading the intimate monks they associate with by making inappropriate requests. This decline of the Sāsana is an open secret nowadays. There are some things in society known as “open secrets.” One should not be afraid to speak of them. Thus, the cause of this decline of the Sāsana, which exists as an open secret, is not only the negligence of monks. It is also because lay devotees use their positions and power to hold onto that robe-belt, as mentioned before, to fulfill their own needs, or to turn the monk into a tool to “hit the nail according to the place” (improvise for convenience). That is how this decline of the Sāsana occurs. Therefore, our lay devotees must be wise. They must be aware, like that lay woman of the past. In the past, when the Sāsana was shining, when many Arahats resided in this country, the cause of that state of the Sāsana was that lay devotees acted with some understanding of the fourfold pure virtue of the Sangha. Even if they lost their own lives, or the lives of their children, they did not go to have monks do inappropriate, worldly things for them. It is through such actions that the destruction of the Sāsana, the decline of the Sāsana, is brought about. Thus, several highly valuable matters have been revealed to these devotees through this.

We must reflect on what this Buddha Sāsana is. It is also explained in various ways, such as being threefold: Pariyatti (learning/scripture), Paṭipatti (practice), and Paṭivedha (penetration/realization). When speaking of the Buddha Sāsana, when we say “we have received the Buddha Sāsana,” someone might recall: we received the Dhamma preached by the Buddha. Because Arahāt Mahinda came, we received the Tipiṭaka. That is what is called Pariyatti. We received the portions of the Dhamma necessary for learning. Likewise, Paṭipatti means that this Dhamma in this Sāsana is something to be put into practice. These are not things to be limited to books. Every Dhamma is of a nature that says, “Come and see” (ehi-passiko), challenging us: “Put me into practice and see.” It is a Dhamma that takes one step by step. Therefore, whether lay or ordained, engaging in that practice is called the Paṭipatti Sāsana (the Sāsana of practice). Evidence that this Paṭipatti Sāsana shone in those early stages is that when Arahāt Mahinda and his group arrived, they ordained even from royal families, even royal queens, entering a vast number of people into the Sāsana; establishing the Sāsana in the proper manner means entering into the practice.

Next, Paṭivedha (penetration/realization) means developing meditation through that practice, developing wisdom—insight wisdom (vipassanā-paññā)—and through that, penetrating the paths and fruits of Stream-entry, Once-returning, Non-returning, and Arahātship. “Penetrating” means seeing through this true state, the Four Noble Truths, with the eye of wisdom. Through this, this state which is covered, covered by ignorance (avijjā), must be realized by each person for themselves. That is how it can be seen. Another person cannot come and show it, no matter how many researches are done. Now, what is often heard in this day and age is that some might think the Sāsana nowadays is much more developed than during the Buddha's time, or even than in Sri Lanka in the recent past. Why? Because there are so many books. There are various methods regarding learning through different media. Now one can carry the entire Tipiṭaka in one's pocket. The entire Tipiṭaka in the pocket! In the past, they memorized these with great difficulty, chanted them, and bore them in mind. Through that, some change occurred in that person. To avoid forgetting, they chanted them constantly, and without even knowing it, they lived in accordance with the Dhamma. But now, because of all these modern scientific methods—please do not misunderstand our saying this; we have to point out both the benefits and the drawbacks of these—some people become proud. “I have the entire Tipiṭaka with me, in my pocket, in the newest way.” But that is not a genuine learning (pariyatti) of the Dhamma. Be that as it may, let us say there is a bit more Pariyatti now. However, the practice (paṭipatti) becomes weaker and weaker in that manner. Why? Because many people now think this Dhamma, like other things, is something to be understood through research done in various laboratories. Or, like various scientific researches done now, they treat internal things as external and conduct research. That is not the kind of research to be done here. This noble quest (ariyapariyesana) is not such a thing. It is only by cultivating virtues such as sīla within oneself that the truth of this Dhamma can be tested. Not by things done externally, not by such external research. For that, one must descend into the practice. Right from the beginning, one must descend into the practice, starting from the Five Precepts. So, that is what is called the Paṭipatti Sāsana. Looking at it from that perspective, the Paṭipatti Sāsana is very weak. Next, even weaker than that is the Paṭivedha Sāsana (the Sāsana of realization). Now, some people in this day and age say, “These things cannot be done nowadays. Supramundane states do not belong to this era. Nibbāna does not belong to this era. For those, we must wait until another Buddha comes. Otherwise, it does not suit today's society at all.” Thinking thus, there is a tendency to invalidate it entirely. But we must reflect that according to the Buddha's word, the Buddha has declared: “As long as these thirty-seven aids to enlightenment (bodhipakkhiya-dhamma) are developed in one's mind, for so long the world will not be empty of Arahats.”

We must walk this path of the Dhamma having developed that perception of capability. We must strive to protect the Sāsana. Otherwise, only one-third of the Sāsana will be protected. Only the side regarding the aforementioned learning (pariyatti) will develop. There is no use in that developing alone. Books will lie moldering in libraries, but in society, people will ultimately end up tearing each other apart like wild beasts—such a state of criminality. On the other hand, regarding the Sāsana of monks too, such a state of decline is likely to occur if the other factors, namely paṭipatti and paṭivedha, are neglected. In this Buddha Sāsana, the deepest thing, the most noble thing we expect from a Buddha, is bringing an end to the Dukkha (Suffering) of saṃsāra. Only a Fully Enlightened One (Sammā Sambuddha) can show the Dhamma necessary to end this suffering of saṃsāra. Not even a Silent Buddha (Pacceka-buddha) can do that. Although they realize Nibbāna, they cannot explain it to others. Thus, the Buddha declares when preaching deep Dhammas like dependent co-arising (paṭicca-samuppāda): “Monks, I have well divided, analyzed, dissected, and brought this Dhamma down to a level where anyone can understand it, and I have laid it open for you to 'see'.” There is an ancient saying, an ancient usage, about “the teacher's closed fist” (ācariya-mutthi). That is, some jealous teachers in the past did not give everything to their disciples; they hid a little. The Buddha declares that there is no such thing with Him. “I have not hidden a portion in that manner. Whatever there is relevant to Nibbāna—not to other things, but whatever there is relevant to Nibbāna—within my Buddha-knowledge, I have taught all of it to you.” Therefore, if this Dhamma is put into practice, it is not impossible for someone to realize it. It is in this way that the Fully Enlightened Sāsana can be uplifted, and in this era of decline of the Sāsana, the speed of decline can at least be reduced.

That is why we directed today's sermon in this direction. In truth, this was not directed at any single individual. There must be proper coordination and awareness within both parties—lay and ordained—about what this true lay-monk relationship is. Nowadays, signs of decline are often highlighted and shown as signs of progress. There is such a tendency. Signs of decline are brought forward as signs of progress. Why? Because the world runs along the economic principles coming from the West. They run along those goals such as altruistic services and social services. It is according to those that they observe and make decisions about the values of this Fully Enlightened Sāsana. That is wrong. We must bring out the values shown in discourses such as this Dasa Dhamma Sutta declared by the Buddha. It is according to those that the lay-monk relationship has to be fashioned.

So, this pious gathering must take these few matters to heart on this valuable day. We all commemorate Poson Poya Day in various ways. We respect Arahāt Mahinda Thero as the “Anubuddha” (the Deputy Buddha). The greatest respect we can pay him is to preserve for a long time the Buddha Sāsana he established, by maintaining that aforementioned threefold Sāsana—pariyatti, paṭipatti, and paṭivedha. Learning (pariyatti) exists for the sake of practice (paṭipatti), and practice exists for the sake of realization (paṭivedha). They cannot be separated. True learning is bringing that Noble Dhamma properly into one's own mind, and living in accordance with it. Next, finally, the Buddha has declared: “Paccattam veditabbo viññūhi” — this Dhamma is to be personally realized by the wise. It is in that manner that realization (paṭivedha) can be achieved. Realizing those supramundane states, one can be released from all the suffering of saṃsāra and realize the supreme deathless Nibbāna.

Therefore, today, these pious devotees must reflect: stepping away from your homes and leaning towards a certain level of practice of virtues such as sīla, you must have practiced some meditation to the extent you could today. It is in that manner, in our own small way, that we must protect this threefold Sāsana. We must think that in accordance with that memorable occasion, we have paid our tribute to Arahāt Mahinda Thero. Likewise, through that, bringing close to our lives the purpose of deriving the true benefit of this Fully Enlightened Sāsana, striving individually, cultivating virtues such as sīla and meditation, and obtaining proper guidance through association with good friends (kalyāṇa-mitta), let us strive as quickly as possible in this very life—since the time of a Buddha's arising is rare, and the Buddha Sāsana is also declining. According to the speed of this decline, we might not get another opportunity to protect these virtues if we are born again. Therefore, in this very life, if possible, through the realization of the paths and fruits of Stream-entry, Once-returning, Non-returning, and Arahātship, may this mass of merit accumulated today be a strong supportive condition (upanissaya) for realizing the supreme, deathless Nibbāna.

Likewise, if any living beings—including one's own relatives—from the Avīci hell up to the Akanitṭha heaven, wish to rejoice in this wholesome deed of hearing and sharing the Dhamma, through that rejoicing, may they be released from states of misery and reach states of happiness. And through association with good friends (kalyāṇa-mitta), may they as quickly as possible be released from all the suffering of saṃsāra such as Jāti (Birth), Jarāmaṇa (Decay and Death), sickness, and death, and realize the supreme, deathless Nibbāna through a noble path of awakening they aspire to. Aspiring thus, recite these verses:

“Ettāvatā ca amhehi.....”

Verses 412 from the Brāhmaṇavagga (Chapter on the Brahmin) of the Dhammapada

Dear Listeners,

It is only to the extent that one's understanding of the aspect of danger (ādīnava) in the world deepens that one's thoughts and concepts come to maturity. It is in proportion to the maturity of one's thoughts that the ultimate goal of the monastic life can be realized. If the difference between lay pleasure and monastic happiness is not understood correctly, monastic life is liable to become monotonous or tasteless. It is because of this that the ancient teachers employed various skillful means to strengthen the mind of an aspirant for ordination. An illustration of this will also be found in the story we hope to present today.

At the time when the Great Arahant Mahā Kaccāna was residing in the region of Kuraraghara in the Avanti country, there was a lay disciple named Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa who served as his attendant. This lay disciple Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa was the son of a very wealthy and faithful female lay disciple named Kālī in that Kuraraghara area. One day, while this lay disciple Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa was engaged in meditation in seclusion, the following thought occurred to him: "As the Venerable Mahā Kaccāna preaches the Dhamma, it is difficult to lead this pure holy life (brahmacariya) while living in the household. It is extremely hard. Therefore, I should shave off my hair and beard, don the saffron robes, and go forth from the home life into homelessness." After having this thought, he went to the Venerable Kaccāna, expressed that such an idea had occurred to him, and requested, "Venerable Sir, please ordain me." Then the Venerable Mahā Kaccāna said: "Soṇa, it is difficult to protect the holy life in this Dispensation for life, subsisting on a single meal a day and sleeping on a solitary bed. It is hard. Therefore, remaining in that very lay life, practice that method of the holy life, that practice, by occasionally keeping the eight-fold Uposatha precepts as taught by the Buddha, subsisting on a single meal a day and sleeping on a solitary bed." After hearing this, the lay disciple Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa's enthusiasm for ordination subsided. Having gone back, while meditating once again, the thought came strongly to his mind once more: "It is difficult to practice the pure holy life in this lay life; I must ordain." He went back to Venerable Mahā Kaccāna and requested permission just as before. Venerable Mahā Kaccāna again reiterated that this task is difficult. "Therefore, remaining in that lay life, strive to observe the holy life periodically, not lifelong, in that manner." On that occasion too, that thought subsided, and he returned. But when this thought arose very strongly for the third time during meditation, he came and requested Venerable Mahā Kaccāna once again. It was on that occasion that Venerable Mahā Kaccāna ordained the lay disciple Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa.

Three years after ordaining him, with great difficulty, they managed to gather ten bhikkhus from here and there for his higher ordination (upasampadā). The reason was that monks were very scarce in the Avanti country. Therefore, it was with great difficulty that they found ten bhikkhus to fulfill the quorum of the Sangha for higher ordination, and thus conferred higher ordination. Now, after Venerable Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa had received higher ordination and spent the rains retreat (vassa), the following thought occurred to him: "I have only heard of the Blessed One, the Buddha, but I have not yet been able to see Him with my own eyes. It would be a great thing for me if I could get to see the Blessed One. Therefore, if my preceptor (upajjhāya) permits, I should go on a journey to see the Blessed One." Thereupon, Venerable Kuṭikaṇṇa went to Venerable Mahā Kaccāna, mentioned his intention, and requested permission. Then the Venerable Mahā Kaccāna expressed great joy, saying, "Sādhu, sādhu!" and said, "Go, Soṇa. Go and see the Blessed One, who is inspiring in appearance and possesses an exceptionally peaceful and tamed mind. Having seen Him, pay homage on my behalf and inquire after His health. Tell Him: 'My preceptor bows at the feet of the Blessed One.' " In this manner, he approved of it with his blessings.

So, Venerable Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa, having paid homage to his teacher and circumambulated him, packed away his lodgings, took his bowl and robes, and set out on the long journey from Avanti country towards Jētavanārāma. Wandering by stages, he eventually arrived at Jētavanārāma. Having seen the Buddha, he paid homage to Him exactly as his teacher had instructed. The Blessed One also engaged in the usual friendly conversation that is customary when a visiting monk arrives: "How was your journey? Did you obtain alms-food easily? Did you arrive safely without any trouble?" When he replied, "Yes, Venerable Sir," the Blessed One said to Venerable Ānanda, "Ānanda, prepare a lodging for this visiting monk." Venerable Ānanda, who knew the thoughts and wishes of the Blessed One very well, understood: "The Blessed One must be giving this special instruction to prepare a lodging because He wishes this monk to spend the night in His own fragrant chamber (gandhakuṭi)." Understanding this, he prepared a lodging for Venerable Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa in the Blessed One's fragrant chamber itself.

That night, the Blessed One spent most of the time meditating in the open air, and then, having washed His feet, entered the chamber. Venerable Soṇa too spent most of the night meditating in the open air and then entered his lodging. Next, we hear that the Blessed One, having awoken in the early hours of the morning, said to Venerable Soṇa, "Bhikkhu, may you be inspired to preach the Dhamma!" Thereupon, Venerable Soṇa recited from memory, in a very beautiful voice and with a suitable, appropriate tone, all sixteen deep and meaningful verses of the Aṭṭhaka Vagga (Octet Chapter), which are included in the collection of discourses known as the Sutta Nipāta. Having heard this, the Blessed One expressed great delight: "Very good, bhikkhu! You have recited these discourses in an excellent voice that is very clear, flawless, fluent, and illuminating the meaning." Then the Buddha asked, "Monk, how many rains (vassa) do you have?" Then Venerable Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa said, "Venerable Sir, I have one rains retreat." The age of monastics is counted according to the number of rains retreats they have spent. So he said, "I have only one rains"—one rains since higher ordination. Then the Buddha asked, "Monk, what have you been doing all this time? What were you doing all this time?" Then Venerable Soṇa replied, "Venerable Sir, I did indeed see the aspect of danger in sensual pleasures. Yet, due to the various chores, troubles, and duties of household life, my ordination was delayed in this manner." It was on that occasion that the Buddha uttered the verse we mentioned as our theme. That verse is actually recorded in the Pali texts (specifically the Udāna). In that book, it is presented as an utterance of joy (udāna). The verse uttered by the Buddha as a statement of joy is what we recited at the beginning:

"Ādīnavaṃ loke disvā, dhammaṃ ñatvā nirūpadhiṃ, na ramati pāpe, pāpe na ramatī suci."

"Having seen the danger in the world, and knowing the Dhamma free from acquisitions (nirūpadhi)—which is Nibbāna: consisting in the relinquishment of all acquisitions—the noble person, the pure one, does not delight in evil; the pure one does not delight in evil." That is the brief meaning there.

Accounts regarding Venerable Soṇa are found in many other places in the Sutta Piṭaka and the Vinaya Piṭaka. Here, since we have prioritized this utterance of joy, this portion is discussed. Taking this as our primary subject and integrating other relevant details as appropriate, let us now attempt to make some commentary on this. Our aim in this is to bring out the valuable ideas contained within this story and the verse. First, as we direct our minds to this, since there are matters here that might raise doubts in your minds, let us look at them one by one to clarify them.

Now, this Venerable Mahā Kaccāna was no ordinary person. He was one who received the distinguished title of "foremost" (etadagga) as an honor from the Buddha in this Dispensation. Meritorious people, this title of "foremost" refers to a custom of the Buddha—indeed, a custom of all Buddhas—to declare to the Sangha those who possess exceptional abilities in various fields among the fourfold assembly of bhikkhus, bhikkhunis, laymen, and laywomen, using the phrase: "Etadaggaṃ mama sāvakānaṃ..." "Among my disciples, this person (he or she) is chief, preeminent," and then that specific quality is mentioned. In that manner, Venerable Mahā Kaccāna received the chief, foremost position among those bhikkhus who are capable of explaining in detail what was preached in brief by the Buddha. That special capability was found in Venerable Mahā Kaccāna—that is, the analytical exposition of a brief statement uttered by the Buddha, explaining it at length. He was indeed such a valuable monk.

Furthermore, it was mentioned in this story that the Sangha of bhikkhus in the Avanti country was extremely scarce. In such a situation, a doubt might arise in our minds: why did Venerable Mahā Kaccāna refuse the lay disciple Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa twice when he requested ordination? We might expect that he should have said something like this: "Our region is very short of Sangha strength. It is excellent, get ordained quickly! If possible, bring another ten or fifteen people with you. We can find requisites, and we can hold a grand ordination ceremony." Instead of encouraging him in that way, he pointed out the difficulty of ordination. The words with which he expressed that difficulty are also very significant. We bring up this matter because it is timely and relevant. There, Venerable Mahā Kaccāna showed the difficulty of ordination in this way:

The word "lifelong" (yāvajīvaṃ) is mentioned. The meaning of this ordination is to observe the holy life (brahmacariya) for life, lifelong, subsisting on a single meal a day, and sleeping on a solitary bed. It is a difficult thing. From this, we can see that in those days, ordination was not a "temporary" concept but a "lifelong" concept, regarded as something highly serious. It is not something to be taken lightly. Ordination is a decisive step regarding one's life, taken with firm determination. Great renunciation is not something done casually. It is not like going away on a holiday for a week or two and coming back. What we see from this is that in the Buddha's time, ordination was a decisive step that had to be taken with deep understanding and a profound concept of renunciation (nekkhamma). That is why Venerable Mahā Kaccāna refused him twice, knowing that the lay disciple did not yet possess the suitability or sufficient maturity for it. However, at the same time, he showed an alternative course of action instead. What should be done then? If one does not have the strength to take that step with such a lifelong, intense commitment as ordination, what one should do is to remain in lay life and strive periodically (kālayuttaṃ) toward the holy life by occasionally giving up a meal for the day, relinquishing lay pleasures, and safeguarding the holy life. Venerable Mahā Kaccāna pointed out that alternative path as well.

Through this, we can gain some insight into ordination in the past. Thus, they did not ordain an aspirant just because he came or requested it, with a desire to increase numbers. The progress of the Dispensation cannot be measured by counting heads. Therefore, even if they are few, it is only when they are prepared to fulfill the requirements of monastic life with a genuine, deep understanding and with the aforementioned commitment—only at that mature stage—that permission is granted. That is why it was only on the third request that Venerable Mahā Kaccāna gave his permission. This shows that he allowed the thought of renunciation (nekkhamma) to mature within his mind. Even today, as a general custom, ordination is requested three times. However, it is repeated one after another in rapid succession. But what is the deep meaning behind this? When requested the first time, if perchance the mind changed, it would stop there. Today, of course, it has turned into a mere ritual. But here, we can clearly see: he came and requested the first time, and was sent back. He requested the second time, and was sent back again. When he requested the third time, realizing that he was requesting for the third time with a deep intention, permission was granted. From this, we can see that the teachers of the past trained their aspirants for ordination in a manner that preserved the dignity of ordination. Likewise, it might have been difficult for Venerable Soṇa to keep those practices because he was a lay disciple from a very wealthy family, and probably had various business affairs and other such engagements. It was due to all of this that Venerable Mahā Kaccāna did not grant permission initially, but did so later, once that intention had matured in his mind.

That is how that matter stands. Next, let us look at another aspect. After Venerable Soṇa arrived to see the Buddha, the Buddha granted him a special privilege. What was this privilege? He was permitted to spend the night in the Buddha's own chamber. For an ordinary disciple, to get to spend a night in the Buddha's fragrant chamber (gandhakuṭi) is a very rare privilege. We must also consider what the reason for this was. This Venerable Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa was also no ordinary person. Just as Venerable Mahā Kaccāna attained that status—the chief position (etadagga) we mentioned—because he had received a definite declaration from the Buddha Padumuttara that he would receive the foremost position among those bhikkhus who analyze and expound in detail what was preached in brief in the Dispensation of the Gautama Buddha. Similarly, it is recorded that Venerable Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa had also received a definite declaration from the Buddha Padumuttara regarding a certain special quality. What was that? It is mentioned there as kalyāṇavākkaraṇānaṃ.

Kalyāṇavākkaraṇa means having a beautiful or pleasant voice. Venerable Kuṭikaṇṇa received the foremost position among the bhikkhus who could preach the Dhamma with a beautiful voice. Although it is not detailed in this short story, it is mentioned in places like the Vinaya Piṭaka that the Buddha not only approved and expressed appreciation for Venerable Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa's recital, but specifically praised his sarabhañña recital. Sarabhañña recital refers to the skill of chanting the Dhamma in a well-attuned, melodious tone, in a flawless and fluent manner that makes the meaning clear. Therefore, the Buddha bestowed on Venerable Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa the foremost position, that honor, among the bhikkhus who possess a beautiful voice (kalyāṇavākkaraṇa). From this, we can understand that the special privilege was given because the Buddha wished to hear a recital from this pupil. It was only after listening to his recital properly in the morning that He conferred the honor. Thus, we can understand that the Buddha allowed the visiting monk, Venerable Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa, to spend the night there in order to facilitate this opportunity.

Moreover, we can see that this accommodation was not provided so that He could chat with the monk about worldly affairs. This is clear from the fact that the Blessed One spent most of the night meditating in the open air. The visiting monk, Venerable Soṇa, also spent most of the night meditating in the open air, and it was only in the middle watch of the night that they went to sleep. This shows that the Blessed One did not grant this privilege to this visiting monk just to talk about local news, but to hear his recital upon waking up in the morning and to give due recognition to one who deserved it. We can understand this point in that way.

Along with this, it must be mentioned how Venerable Soṇa's beautiful manner of speaking is described in the discourse. The primary word kalyāṇiyā (beautiful) is mentioned there. Beautiful words. The words vissatṭhāya, anelagalāya, atthassa viññāpaniyā are used. This means speaking with very clear words—words that flow clearly and flawlessly, and in a manner that conveys, clarifies, and reveals the meaning. In the Dhamma, this method of chanting is called sarabhañña—the sarabhañña method of recital. However, it must be noted that the Buddha has stated in the Vinaya Piṭaka that preaching the Dhamma in a singing voice (gītassara) is an offense, a mistake. The Buddha established a disciplinary rule stating that the Dhamma should not be preached in a drawn-out, singing manner, and pointed out its dangers (ādīnava)—the undesirable consequences. What are these undesirable consequences? They are listed as five: "Monks, there are these five dangers in preaching the Dhamma in a drawn-out, singing voice. What is the first danger? One is himself attached to his own voice—the preacher becomes attached to his own singing voice. Others, too, become attached to that singing voice; those who listen get attached to that singing voice. What is the third undesirable consequence? Lay people criticize, saying: 'Just like we hold musical performances and sing songs, these Sakyaputtian ascetics are also singing songs.' The fourth point is that by paying more attention to the rhythm of the music or song, and by being attached to it, concentration (samādhi) is broken; whatever concentration one had developed is shattered because the mind wanders to the singing voice. The fifth point is that future generations—for which the term pascimā janatā is used, those who come later—will take a wrong example from this, and based on what they see, they will follow and imitate it, thinking: 'This is the correct way.' Thus, it sets a bad example for future generations." Because of these reasons, the Buddha declared that the Dhamma should not be preached in a singing voice.

Indeed, the discourses in the Aṭṭhaka Vagga that we mentioned are verse discourses. Yet, even though they were verse discourses, Venerable Soṇa did not recite them as music. He chanted them by pronouncing each word very clearly, in a melodious way, and in a manner suited to them. Now, we know that if the meaning is to be preserved correctly—as it is said, sāttamaṃ sabyañjanaṃ (with meaning and with phrasing)—the Buddha's Dhamma can only be maintained if attention is paid to both the aspect of meaning (attha) and the aspect of phrasing/letters (byañjana). You know that meaning refers to the sense. Phrasing/letters (byañjana) refers to the letters/syllables. In any discourse, there is an aspect called meaning, and then there are the letters—the arrangement of syllables and words appropriate to it. The Buddha pointed out that if letters are used incorrectly, the meaning also becomes distorted. Therefore, for instance, as grammarians often point out in the Sinhala language, if instead of saying "a cobra in the hole" (benēka nayek), one says "a blind one in the hole" (benē kanayek), it gives two completely different meanings. If one errs in the division of words and terms, the meaning becomes distorted. Thus, to preserve the Buddha's word over thousands of years, it is absolutely essential to protect both the aspect of meaning and the aspect of letters/phrasing. If one allows that singing voice, what happens? The meaning gets erased. The meaning gets erased and only the music remains. Ultimately, only the tones remain. In the end, the entire Dhamma would be reduced to a collection of tones or a set of pleasant rhythms. But in the past, with those verse teachings—now, here we have a collection of deep verse discourses—we can imagine that Venerable Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa must have pronounced them very well, dividing those words correctly. In the Pali language, there is a distinction between unaspirated (appaprāṇa) and aspirated (mahāprāṇa) sounds. If one pronounces an aspirated word as unaspirated, it can convey a different meaning. He must have divided the words properly, without confusing them in that manner. Thus, without giving way to a singing voice, sarabhañña means chanting in a way that preserves the meaning, highlights the meaning, and brings out the meaning. Now, we know there is a difference between prose and verse. There is indeed a difference between prose and verse. But what is the purpose of verse? The rhythm and meter found there are used to highlight the meaning, to make the meaning more manifest, and to impress it more deeply on the mind—not to erase the meaning. However, if music is allowed, over time, one would not even know what is being said. One gets attached to the sound, and the listener also gets attached to it. In the end, only the sensory pleasure of sound, which is common to animals, remains.

So, this is how it is regarding the Dhamma. You discuss the Gem of the Dhamma—the Gem of the Buddha, the Gem of the Dhamma, the Gem of the Sangha. You pay homage to the book of Dhamma, and you give a high seat to the Dhamma preacher. Why is all of this done? Because we must protect the Dhamma. This is what the Buddha Himself respected. After attaining Buddhahood, He contemplated, "Whom shall I respect?" He found, "There is no one in this world worthy of receiving respect from Me." He looked at the custom of past Buddhas to see what they did. Every Tathāgata spent His life respecting and honoring the Dhamma itself. Therefore, it is said in this Dispensation that respect for the Dhamma is greater than respect for individuals. If respect for the Dhamma is so valuable, then this matter is also important for the preservation of the Dhamma. Today, in an era where books are abundant, when writing a book to preserve the Dhamma, we have to proofread the drafts several times. But in the era when this was preserved orally by lineages of reciters (bhāṇaka), they had to preserve it in the aforementioned manner, protecting both the meaning and the phrasing (sabyañjanaṃ)—safeguarding both attha and byañjana—to carry this Dhamma forward.

Thus, here it has aligned perfectly in a wonderful way. When we think of the perfection (pāramī) qualities, we can understand: Venerable Mahā Kaccāna, who received his definite declaration from the Buddha Padumuttara, was the most skilled expert in expounding in detail the Dhamma that the Buddha preached in brief. Then, Venerable Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa was a pupil of that very teacher. He, too, had received a definite declaration from the Buddha Padumuttara to pronounce that Dhamma correctly and present it with a beautiful voice. These two fit together perfectly. Thus, what we possess is a Dhamma that has been preserved and brought down through such lineages. There may be some shortcomings even in those. But we must try to preserve at least this much, in the aforementioned manner, by utilizing the sarabhañña method without giving prominence to a singing voice. That may be a bit difficult to understand. However, its characteristics are that the words must flow very clearly, flawlessly, and in a way that makes the meaning clear. Sometimes, during the recital of protective discourses (paritta suttas) and chanting, some people do not even know what is being said. A nice rhythm is maintained, and in the end, only that rhythm remains as the paritta. But those parittas have deep meanings. What we call paritta recitals are also the Buddha's word, the Dhamma. Just because it is included in the book of protective discourses, or just because it is chanted, it does not become a song. Within it lies a deep Dhamma. If you think about the Karaṇīyametta Sutta, the Ratana Sutta, or the Mahāmaṅgala Sutta, there is a profound meaning in every single verse, in every single word. But if, without considering the meaning of those words, we turn it into music just because it is being chanted, then that becomes something of an insult to the Gem of the Dhamma. Therefore, we are compelled to remind you of these matters in a timely manner.

Next, let us direct our attention to the matter mentioned in the verse. What did the Buddha point out through the verse? The aspect of danger (ādīnava) in this world. Now we are coming to a somewhat deeper part. After Venerable Soṇa had recited the Dhamma in that sarabhañña style, the Buddha, after praising him, asked a question: "How many rains do you have?" After he stated the number of rains, the Buddha asked another question. That question is one that is valuable enough for each of you to ask yourselves. What is that question? "What were you doing all this time? What have you been doing all this time?" What is the meaning of that? "Despite seeing so much danger in this lay life, why did you not ordain? Why did you not take this step?" On that occasion, Venerable Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa did not blame his teacher. He did not say, "I asked for ordination, but he did not give it to me." He did not say such things. He stated his own inability: "Blessed One, I did see the danger in these sensual pleasures. Yet, because of the mass of work in this household life, this was delayed for me." Perhaps you too might have to say the same thing. In any case, what we will bring up next are several points that the Buddha preached in various places regarding the danger of sensual pleasures.

One should not think of this as strange. Some might think that telling lay people about the danger of sensual pleasures is inappropriate, and that it should only be told to the Sangha. But the Sangha are not people who fell from the sky. It was only after being like the lay disciple Soṇa Kuṭikaṇṇa that he eventually became the great Elder Kuṭikaṇṇa. Therefore, this can be helpful to you as well. What we have to say is that when discussing this aspect of danger, you may have heard of the valuable similes the Buddha gave to householders. This is mentioned in a section of the Dhamma called the Potaliya Sutta. At one time, the householder Potaliya, having handed over all his wealth to his children and relinquished all his chores and business affairs, came to see the Buddha. When he came to the tree where the Buddha was sitting in seclusion, the Buddha addressed this householder as "Householder." He felt offended by this. He expected that since he had renounced these things, the Buddha would address him with a more esteemed term, and felt that he was not being respected as a layperson. But the Buddha had addressed him as "Householder." After he became angry and displeased at this, the Buddha showed him that if one truly wishes to detach the mind from the entanglements of lay life, one must direct the mind to these very matters. Among those are these seven similes. Let us take them one by one. These are the similes shown by the Buddha to express the aspect of danger, the undesirable consequences, of sensual pleasures.

The first simile is the simile of the skeleton/bone fragment (aṭṭhikankaḷūpama). You may have heard this story in brief. The Buddha describes it in this way: "Householder, suppose a dog, extremely hungry, weak and afflicted, is waiting near a slaughterhouse. A butcher or his apprentice throws a bone fragment to that dog—a bone that has been scraped clean of all meat, with just a smear of blood. The dog chews and chews on it. What do you think, householder? Would that dog's hunger be appeased by that?" "No, Venerable Sir, in the end, it only experiences fatigue." "In the same way, remember, householder, sensual pleasures have been compared by the Blessed One to a skeleton—to a fleshless bone fragment smeared with just a trace of blood, involving much Suffering / Unsatisfactoriness / Stress (dukkha), much despair, and great danger." The Buddha uttered that simile there.

The next simile: "In the same way, householder, suppose a vulture, a crow, or a hawk takes a piece of meat and flies up into the sky. Seeing this, other vultures, crows, or hawks pursue that bird, clawing and pecking at it. Now, householder, if that vulture, crow, or hawk does not let go of that piece of meat, what would happen to it? Because of those birds pecking at it, it would either meet with death or experience suffering equal to death." In that manner, the Buddha showed that sensual pleasures are compared to a piece of meat (maṃsapesūpama), illustrating the point through that simile.

Next, he presents the third simile: "Suppose, householder, a man walks against the wind holding a blazing grass torch. If he does not quickly let go of that blazing grass torch, that fire would burn his hand, his arm, or some other part of his body, and he would either meet with death or experience suffering equal to death." In that way, the Blessed One compared sensual pleasures to a grass torch (tīṇukkūpama) as the third simile.

The fourth simile: "Suppose there is a pit of glowing coals (aṅgārakāsūpama), deeper than a man's height, filled with smokeless, glowing embers. Then a man comes along who wants to live, who does not want to die, who loves pleasure and recoils from pain. Two strong men grab him by both arms and drag him towards that pit of glowing coals. What would that poor man do? He would struggle and twist this way and that." Then Potaliya says, "Blessed One, that man knows that if he falls into it, he will experience death or suffering equal to death." "In the same way, householder, understand that sensual pleasures have been compared by the Blessed One to a pit of glowing coals."

Next, he gives the fifth simile: "Suppose a man in his sleep dreams of beautiful parks, beautiful forests, beautiful ponds, and beautiful fields. But when he wakes up, he sees nothing of them. In the same way, remember, householder, sensual pleasures have been compared by the Blessed One to a dream (supinakūpama)." He told this to the householder Potaliya.

Then the next simile: "Suppose a man who needs to attend a special event, like a wedding, wants to dress up specially. What does he do? He borrows garments on loan—clothes, ornaments, and even vehicles. He borrows them saying, 'We have such an event on this day; can you lend us this dress, this pair of shoes, or this vehicle?' Having borrowed them, he dresses up in all of them, wearing the borrowed jewelry and clothes, and drives elegantly in the borrowed carriage through the bazaar street. People in the town, seeing him, say: 'This must be an exceptionally wealthy man! This is how rich people display their wealth. This is excellent!' While people are expressing admiration, the owners of those borrowed items come and say: 'We have an urgent matter. Please return those items—return the shoes, and we need this carriage.' They take them back right there. What happens to that man then? Even though he appeared to be very wealthy, all of it is lost to him on the spot." Having given that simile, the Buddha said: "In the same way, householder, understand that sensual pleasures are like borrowed goods (yācitakūpama)." That is the simile.

What is the next simile? "Suppose there is a tree in a dense forest near a village, laden with ripe fruit—let us say a mango tree. There is plenty of fruit, but none has fallen to the ground. A man comes along looking for fruit, searching for mangoes. He sees the mangoes on the tree, and though none is on the ground, he knows how to climb. So he climbs the tree, eats mangoes there, and fills his lap with them. While he is doing this, another man arrives, also searching for mangoes. In his hand, he holds a sharp axe. No fruit has fallen, and this second man does not know how to climb. He thinks: 'There are mangoes on this tree, and I have an axe, but I cannot climb. So what I must do is cut down the tree, take as much fruit as I want, fill his lap, and go.' He begins to chop down the tree. Now, householder, what do you think? If the first man who climbed the tree does not climb down quickly, what will happen to him? When the tree falls, he will fall with it, and break a hand or a foot, or even lose his life." When asked, "Is that not so?" the householder Potaliya replied, "Yes, Venerable Sir." That is how the householder replied.

In this manner, the Buddha pointed out seven similes. The deep meaning of each of these similes is such that in the news we hear in daily life—about serious crimes, murders, suicides—the underlying principle is found in these similes. If we briefly consider each simile: first, we mentioned the simile of the skeleton/bone fragment. There, as the dog chews on the thrown bone because it is smeared with a little blood, it unwittingly drinks the blood coming from its own gums, taking it as food. That is how the nature of sensual pleasures is illustrated there. The Buddha has declared: "Appassādā bahudukkhā kāmā"—"Sensual pleasures provide little gratification and much Suffering / Unsatisfactoriness / Stress (dukkha)." It is not that they have no gratification (assāda). Gratification refers to enjoying the pleasure of taste. If we say there is no gratification at all, some might find fault and say the Buddha could not have said that. But the Buddha did declare that there is an aspect of gratification, but it is little, while the aspect of Suffering / Unsatisfactoriness / Stress (dukkha) is much. The gratification is little, and the suffering is much. Thus, the dog licked the trace of blood on that bloody bone fragment. But it did not stop there; what follows is a mountain of suffering. That is the simile.

Next, the same applies to the simile of the piece of meat. When we think about it, sensual pleasures refer to what is desired. How many others desire what you desire? Consequently, when trying to possess what you desire, how many others who desire the same thing must you fight with? These are occurrences you have seen endlessly in daily life, whether regarding wealth or regarding people. That piece of meat is carried to the sky by a single vulture. How many others follow and peck at it? This principle can be understood in relation to wealth and other things.

Similarly, there is the simile of the grass torch. Unknowingly, one's hand gets burned. It shows the peril, the hazardous nature of sensual pleasures. Then, too, the simile of the pit of glowing coals. One goes toward it in a strange way. One knows that one will fall into disaster—one is aware of it—yet one is drawn to it, just as one is dragged into a pit of embers. Next, the dreamlike nature. This shows the emptiness and worthlessness of sensual pleasures. In a dream, one sees various beautiful sights. But upon waking up, not a single one is there. Not a single one remains; there is only darkness around—only the darkness of the night. In the same way are sensual pleasures: their worthlessness, emptiness, voidness, and deceptive nature are all expressed through this.

Next, regarding borrowed or loaned goods. This is also something you can actually observe in daily life. When a wedding or a similar event comes up, how many people do they have to beg to obtain the necessary items when they lack the funds themselves? And having borrowed those things, they are filled with fear: "At what moment will they ask for these back? If these get damaged slightly, I will have to pay for them, won't I? I will have to pay compensation." Thus, they use them very carefully, somehow, just until the photographs are taken. If the owners come to claim them before that, then that is the end of it. That is how it is with weddings and such events today.

Through all of this, we can see—no more illustrations are needed—you can imagine how fitting those similes given by the Buddha are. Sensual pleasures are like something borrowed from others, something taken on loan. Next, the simile of the tree. There, it actually speaks of the fruits on the tree. The fruits are on the tree, but they are sought after in two different ways. One person climbs in the proper way and tries to enjoy the fruits. While he is enjoying them, another person seeks to obtain the fruits by cutting down the tree in an improper way. The conflict between these two is what is shown there.

When one directs one's mind to these similes given by the Buddha regarding the danger of sensual pleasures, reflecting on them in the light of the events one sees, hears, and experiences in daily life, a great and deep disillusionment with saṃsāra arises. In the Dhamma, the word used for this disillusionment is nibbidā (disenchantment / disillusionment). Here, we mentioned ādinava (danger / disadvantage). Ādinava refers to the undesirable nature, the undesirable consequences, of the fivefold sensual pleasures. When one sees these, it is natural for disillusionment to arise. It is not something to be feared. The Buddha has declared that if one sees the reality of the world as it is, through that very seeing, one becomes disenchanted with the world. To prevent that, just as when a young child grows, they do not cut off parts of their body to fit into their childhood clothes, but rather discard those clothes and wear garments suited to them; in the same way, the transition from lay life to monastic life is such a process. Therefore, no one can find fault with this and say, "It is not good to talk to lay people about the danger. They should not think about it. They should only think about the pleasures of lay life." To say so is incorrect; the Dhamma of the Buddha is open.

Therefore, when reflecting on these, you can see through them the Three Characteristics of Impermanent / Inconstant (anicca), Suffering / Unsatisfactoriness / Stress (dukkha), and Not-self / Non-self / Unsubstantial (anattā). Insight (vipassanā) is something one experiences directly. We know that insight is a seeing, not a mere saying. Therefore, to achieve that seeing, one must contemplate how true the Buddha's word is, based on one's own experiences and the examples visible around. It is when contemplating in this way that one realizes internally: "Was not what I did all this time a foolishness?" That is where the question asked by the Buddha fits in—the question we mentioned: "What were you doing all this time? What have you been doing all this time?" What you did all this time was precisely expanding saṃsāra. That is what we have referred to on other occasions as walking on the path of expanding the world and expanding the cemeteries. That is why we say: "Do not be an expander of the world; do not be an expander of cemeteries." What was done until now was expanding worlds, expanding cemeteries, and expanding skeletons. But what the Buddha points out is to depart from that practice of expanding the world and expanding cemeteries, and to cross over from the world. This is Suffering / Unsatisfactoriness / Stress (dukkha). And that is what is expressed next in the verse.

The verse is very simple, yet a great many deep meanings are expressed there. Disvā ādīnavaṃ loke—having seen the danger in the world. Dhammaṃ nirūpadhiṃ—here, that term is used for Nibbāna. It is a somewhat deep word. To explain it at an understandable level, upadhi (acquisitions / assets / substrate) refers to those things on which one's sense of "I-ness" or "my-ness" relies. In daily life, the Buddha explained upadhi in this way: let us say a person who has children is proud of and delighted by their children. On one occasion, Māra came and presented a challenge before the Buddha: "One with children delights in children. One with cattle delights in cattle." He spoke thus. Those aforementioned things like acquisitions, assets, deposits—to use a modern term, deposits or assets—all of these are known as upadhi. Thus, that entire collection of animate or inanimate possessions is regarded as upadhi. Māra claimed that one who does not have them cannot be happy. But the Buddha turned that very statement around on that occasion and declared: "Socati puttehi puttima"—"One with children sorrows because of children." Ultimately, they fall into suffering. When children do not care for them, or when children die untimely, then they fall into sorrow. Similarly, with a herd of cattle: when trouble or destruction befalls the herd, they grieve over it. In that manner, the herd of cattle represents that collection of assets, deposits. So the Buddha points out all of this as Suffering / Unsatisfactoriness / Stress (dukkha). Therefore, "Acquisitions are indeed a man's sorrowing; he does not sorrow who is free from acquisitions (nirūpadhi)." The one who is free from acquisitions is the one who does not sorrow.

It is according to that concept of upadhi mentioned there that we can understand why the Buddha called Nibbāna: nirūpadhi (free from acquisitions). Nirūpadhi means, in the final analysis, that what we have done in this saṃsāra is pile up acquisitions (upadhi)—pile up deposits. When we contemplate deeply, it is not just these properties, lands, wealth, and grains, but the acquisitions we have gathered are rūpa (form), Feeling / Sensation (vedanā), saññā (perception), and Preparations / Formations / Volitional activity (saṅkhāra), which we call the five aggregates of Grasping / Holding / Fuel (upādāna). There is the word Grasping / Holding / Fuel (upādāna). Upādāna means seizing, clinging. Clinging to something, or holding onto something. Upadhi means standing on something. Often, these two can be almost the same thing. It is looking at the matter from two sides. One clings to something seeking security; one relies on something seeking security. Thus, because of Craving / Thirst (taṇhā) for rūpa, Feeling / Sensation (vedanā), etc., they cling to them, and in that sense they are called the five aggregates of Grasping / Holding / Fuel (upādāna)—five bundles of grasping. These themselves can serve as upadhi. Because when one projects a sense of self-identity saying "this is my form," "this is my feeling," etc., and develops an attachment to them, then that becomes upadhi. The state of being freed from these is sabbūpadhipaṭinissagga (the relinquishment of all acquisitions). The phrase sabbūpadhipaṭinissagga is applied to Nibbāna: the relinquishment of all acquisitions. When we say the relinquishment of all acquisitions, one does not become nirūpadhi (free from acquisitions) merely by handing over one's properties to children and retiring from industries and businesses, as that householder did. One has to let go of this very five aggregates—rūpa (form), Feeling / Sensation (vedanā), saññā (perception), Preparations / Formations / Volitional activity (saṅkhāra), and Consciousness (viññāṇa)—piled up in saṃsāra thus far. And that letting go happens at the aforementioned stage of the Path and Fruit (magga-phala). Gradually developing insight, realizing the characteristics of Impermanent / Inconstant (anicca) and Not-self / Non-self / Unsubstantial (anattā), and through that, when one directly realizes for oneself the impermanence, the Suffering / Unsatisfactoriness / Stress (dukkha) nature, the Not-self / Non-self / Unsubstantial (anattā) nature, the voidness, and the emptiness of this rūpa, Feeling / Sensation (vedanā), etc., they slip away naturally. A deep aversion, a revulsion, arises, and there comes a moment when this is cast off like a carcass suddenly hung around one's neck. It is at that moment that the realization of the Path and Fruit is attained; that is what is called Nibbāna: That indeed is what is called the greatest peace. "Laying down the burden" refers to this—laying down the burden of the five aggregates.

It is this journey toward Nibbāna: that you are undertaking today through observing the precepts, listening to the Dhamma, and so on. Therefore, you should reflect that although this Dhamma sermon—which is relevant to the Buddha's teaching—began in a simple manner, it has gradually become deeper. Reflecting on all of this and aligning these preached points with your ultimate purpose, drawing them close to your lives, may you quickly be released from all the saṃsāra suffering of Birth / Arising (jāti), Decay and Death / Aging and Death (jarāmaṇa), sickness, and so forth. Freeing yourselves from the aforementioned path of expanding the world and expanding cemeteries, may this virtue observed today, this meditation practiced, and this Dhamma heard serve as a supportive condition, a source of merit, for ending the world, crossing over from the world, and attaining that supreme ambrosial Nibbāna: taught by the Buddha—attaining that noble, acquisition-free state of Nibbāna: through the realization of the paths and fruits of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti), Once-returning (Sakadāgāmi), Non-returning (Anāgāmi), and Arahantship. Aspire thus!

Now, with the aspiration that all this mass of merit accumulated by preaching and listening to the Dhamma may be shared by whatever departed relatives of yours who have passed away, and likewise by the righteous devas and deities, including the kings of the devas and Brahmas, and indeed by all living beings from Avīci up to Akaniṭṭha; and that all may rejoice in it and quickly attain the great deathless Nibbāna: through whichever of the three Bodhis they aspire for—with this aspiration, please recite this verse:

“Ettāvatā ca amhehi.....”

Ratana-style Refuge Verses preserved in the Khuddaka tradition (non-Dhammapada source)

Dear Listeners,

Taking refuge in the Triple Gem and undertaking the precepts are merely the initial steps in this Dispensation (Sāsana). Nevertheless, the fact that even this mere act of taking refuge can yield such marvelous benefits is a testament to the powerful and majestic nature of the Triple Gem. There are numerous accounts in Buddhist literature of devotees who attained rebirth in happy realms (sugati) simply by virtue of taking refuge and observing the precepts. The story of Chatta Mānavaka is one such example.

During the time when the Buddha was residing in Sāvattihī, a young Brahmin named Chatta—a Brahmin youth from the city of Setavyā—went to the Brahmin teacher named Pokkharasāti in the city of Ukkatṭhā to complete his education. Having finished his studies, he returned to Setavyā to see his parents, and then set out again to meet his teacher, carrying a thousand gold coins (kahāpaṇa) as a teacher's fee. On that morning, as the Buddha surveyed the world with his mind of Great Compassion, the youth Chatta appeared in his vision. Knowing this, the Buddha walked to a tree along that path and sat down. When Chatta Mānavaka saw the Buddha, he approached him with great devotion and clarity of mind, took refuge in the Triple Gem, listened to the Dhamma, and prepared to depart. Before his departure, the Buddha taught Chatta Mānavaka three verses extolling the virtues of the Triple Gem to be recited when taking refuge. It was while contemplating these verses that Chatta Mānavaka set out on his journey. Those three verses are the ones we recited at the beginning of this sermon.

The first verse says: “Yo vadataṃ pavaro manujesu”—He who is the noblest or supreme among speakers of truth, “Sakyamuni”—the Sakyan Sage, “bhagavā”—the Blessed One, “katakicco”—one who has completed all that needs to be done for liberation, “pāragato balavīriyasamaṅgī”—who has crossed over the wilderness of Saṃsāra, crossed the ocean of existence—meaning he who has realized Nibbāna and is endowed with physical strength and the power of effort and energy—“taṃ sugataṃ saraṇamupemi”—in that Sugata (Well-Gone One), I take refuge, I seek shelter. That is the meaning of the first verse.

The second verse says: “Rāgavirāgamanejamasokaṃ”—that which dispels lust and passion (rāga), is free from the agitation of craving and thirst (taṇhā), and is free from sorrow (asoka); “dhammasaṅkhatamappaṭikūlaṃ”—the unrepulsive, Unprepared (asaṅkhata) Dhamma, which is Nibbāna; “madhuramimaṃ paṇaṇaṃ suvibhattaṃ”—this sweet, well-mastered, and excellently analyzed scriptural Dhamma; “dhammamimaṃ saraṇamupemi”—in this Dhamma, I seek refuge.

The final verse means: “Yaṅca dinnāṃ mahapphalaṃ māhu”—in whichever Noble Saṅgha it is said that gifts given yield great fruit; “catūsu sucīsu purisayugesu”—composed of the four pairs of pure men; “puggala-dhammadasā te”—those eight individuals who have directly realized the Dhamma of Nibbāna; “saṅghamimaṃ saraṇamupemi”—in this Saṅgha, I take refuge, I seek their shelter. This is the meaning of the final verse.

Thus, while reciting these three verses and taking step after step forward, thieves—perceiving that this youth possessed wealth—shot him with an arrow and killed him. Immediately upon his death, Chatta Mānavaka, by virtue of his refuge in the Triple Gem, his undertaking of the five precepts, and the wholesome thoughts generated by listening to the Dhamma, was spontaneously reborn in the Tāvātimsa heaven, in a celestial mansion spanning thirty leagues. Later, when his parents and the citizens of Setavyā gathered to perform his funeral rites upon hearing of his death, the Buddha arrived at the location.

When the Buddha arrived, Chatta—now a deity—descended from the heavenly realm together with his celestial mansion. In order to reveal this to the gathered crowd, the Buddha questioned the deity: “Who are you that have come from the heavenly world with a mansion shining brighter than the sun and moon? What kind of merit did you perform to achieve this state?” The Buddha allowed the deity Chatta to speak for himself. He said, “Blessed One, I am that young Brahmin whom you met today when you sat under the tree out of compassion for me. The Blessed One asked me, ‘Do you know how to take refuge in the Triple Gem?’ and I said ‘No.’ The Blessed One then taught me how. I took refuge as taught. You then asked if I knew the five precepts. I said I did not. You taught me those as well. You instructed me: ‘Abandon the killing of living beings, which is impure; it is not the practice of the wise. Similarly, taking what is not given, committing sexual misconduct, lying, and taking intoxicants are not praised by the wise; these are impure practices.’ After you said this, I firmly resolved to observe the precepts. As I went on my way, thieves shot and killed me. The other deities in the heavenly world, seeing my splendor, wonder how I obtained such a state.” Thus, Chatta the deity declared his story.

Through this brief story, we can see how immensely beneficial taking refuge in the Triple Gem and undertaking the five precepts can be. We must particularly contemplate the undertaking of precepts. As you all know, before undertaking the precepts, we first take refuge. Taking refuge in the Triple Gem is no small matter. Through it, one’s faith (saddhā) is brought to the fore. It is upon faith that morality (sīla) is put into action. To the extent that one’s faith is strong, to that extent one is motivated to protect the training rules of morality and becomes established in morality. As Chatta Mānavaka walked along reciting those verses, he was contemplating the virtues of the Triple Gem. He went while practicing recollection of the Buddha, recollection of the Dhamma, and recollection of the Saṅgha. It was because he passed away with that mind—that proximate mind (āsanna-citta)—that he achieved that state in the heavenly world. We have heard in the Dhamma that when a person’s next birth (jāti) is determined, unless there is a weighty karma (garuka-kamma) such as the five heinous crimes (killing mother, killing father, killing an Arahant, shedding the blood of a Buddha, or causing a schism in the Saṅgha) or certain fixed wrong views, a person’s next birth is decided by a karma performed at the final moment, or a past karma recalled at the final moment. This is called proximate karma (āsanna-kamma). When there is no weighty karma, proximate karma determines it. If that is also absent, then habitual karma (āciṇṇa-kamma), which is practiced continuously, comes forward. In the absence of that too, some other karma that was previously performed, known as stored karma (kaṭattā-kamma), will somehow condition the next birth. Here, we clearly see the operation of proximate karma. Indeed, the Buddha did not go there to save him from death. Through his knowledge of the attainment of Great Compassion, the Buddha saw that Chatta Mānavaka possessed the capacity to generate deep faith. Thus, the Buddha went there to prepare his final mind-state. Accordingly, Chatta Mānavaka took a refuge he had never even heard of or taken before, and undertook a training in morality he had never heard of before. It was through the wholesome volition

Therefore, we must reflect upon this. Indeed, our undertaking of precepts is established upon faith. If a person can say, ‘‘Natthi me saraṇaṃ aññaṃ, Buddhho me saraṇaṃ varaṃ’’ (‘‘I have no other refuge, the Buddha is my supreme refuge; the Dhamma is my refuge; the Saṅgha is my refuge’’), if there is such strong faith, that person truly takes refuge. Taking refuge means seeking shelter. That shelter must be sought through morality, concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). The Buddha cannot save anyone directly, but taking refuge is the beginning of cultivating morality, concentration, and wisdom. That is why, even in this day and age, before undertaking the precepts, we recite three times, ‘‘Buddhaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi’’, and so forth. This is no ordinary thing. Chatta Mānavaka lost his life suddenly due to a fatal danger and hazard that existed during the Buddha's time. You all know how many hazards and dangers exist on the roads today for young boys, girls, and children, even more so than during the Buddha's time. Before a young child can cross from one side of the road to the other, high-speed massive vehicles run down every street. Similarly, there are swindlers, thugs, and murderers at every junction waiting to rob us of our hard-earned wealth, character, and lives. In recent times, Buddhist leaders have introduced a practice for school children to recollect and recite these three verses when leaving school or returning home after school. Today, there is hardly anyone to explain the meaning of these verses. Some even distort them and turn them into a joke. But these are three extremely powerful verses. Since dangers are more abundant now than in the Buddha's time, we must say that one should recollect these verses not only when leaving school, but even when leaving home to go to school. If possible, one should leave with these three verses in mind, or at the very least, leave with a proximate mind reciting ‘‘Buddhaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi, Dhammaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi, Saṅghaṃ saraṇaṃ gacchāmi’’. At the very least, if an accident were to occur, leaving home with the recollection of the Triple Gem ensures rebirth in a good destination (sugati). Such is the current situation.

Similarly, we see that along with faith in the Triple Gem and taking refuge, the undertaking of precepts is incredibly powerful. The five precepts are no small matter; they constitute the permanent morality (nicca-sīla) of a layperson. Chatta Mānavaka must have undertaken that morality and formed a strong determination (adhiṭṭhāna) within that brief moment: ‘‘For the rest of my life, I will not kill any living being, I will not steal, I will not commit sexual misconduct, I will not lie, and I will not drink intoxicants.’’ He did not observe this determination for a long time, but through the power generated within that single split second, he received such heavenly wealth. Even more meritorious, as you have heard, is the eight-precept Uposatha morality (uposatha-aṭṭhaṅga-sīla). Many of you have undertaken the eight-precept Uposatha morality today. There are Dhamma stories illustrating the benefits of the eight precepts as well. In the Dhamma literature, there is a remarkable story about the benefits of strictly observing even a single precept for just half a day. There is a story of a certain poor man who strictly observed the precept of abstaining from untimely eating (vikāla-bhojana)—which is often not taken very seriously nowadays—with a firm resolve and even at the risk of his life, and as a result, was reborn as a tree-deity (rukkha-devatā). The story goes as follows.

There was a group of five hundred ascetics who came from the Himalayas to the city every year. They came to the city of Kosambī. At that time, three wealthy merchants named Ghosita, Kukkuṭa, and Pāvāriya had invited these ascetics, saying, “Please come and receive our support during the four months of the rainy season every year.” Acting on this invitation, the ascetics were traveling when, at one point, they stopped to rest for a moment under a massive banyan tree at the edge of the forest. The chief ascetic thought: “The deity residing in this banyan tree cannot be an ordinary being; he must be highly powerful.” He casually thought, “If this deity could provide us with drinking water through his power, it would be of great value to our group.” Instantly, water appeared there for everyone. Then he thought, “It would be wonderful if we could get water to bathe.” That too appeared immediately. Next, he thought, “It would be great if we could get some food.” Food was likewise provided for all five hundred ascetics. Then the ascetic thought, “If only we could see this deity who has the power to grant whatever we think of!” Thereupon, from among the roots of the banyan tree, the deity appeared in a majestic form. The ascetic asked him, “What kind of meritorious deed did you perform to achieve this state?” The deity felt ashamed to speak, as his merit was very small. He hesitated, but upon repeated requests, he began to tell his story. The complete account is given in the Dhamma.

In the city of Sāvattihī, it was the custom in the household of Anāthapiṇḍika the merchant that everyone observed the Uposatha precepts on every Uposatha day. It was observed so strictly that even infants who were still breastfeeding had their mouths washed, and at sunset, their mouths were rinsed and catumadhura (a sweet fourfold medicine) was placed in their mouths, training them from a very young age to observe the precept of abstaining from untimely eating. Everyone in the household strictly observed the Uposatha precepts. One day, a very poor man came to the house seeking daily-wage work. He had not been there long when, on the Uposatha day, the merchant returned from the monastery and asked the household members, “Did anyone inform the daily-wage worker that today is the Uposatha day?” They replied, “We forgot to tell him.” The merchant said, “Then prepare some food for him separately for the evening,” and while he was provided food, the others adhered to the practice, even the young children abstaining from food. Meanwhile, the man returned in the evening, extremely exhausted from his labor. When he was given the food, he fell into reflection. Despite his hunger, he did not eat immediately but thought: “Usually, in this house, there is so much noise with children asking for rice and curries. Today, there is absolute silence.” He then asked, “Have these people already eaten?” They replied, “No.” When he asked why, they explained, “On Uposatha days, it is our custom. The merchant has everyone, even the small children, observe the training rule regarding untimely eating.” Hearing this, the man asked, “Can I also observe the Uposatha precepts now?” They replied, “We do not know; you must ask the merchant.” He went to ask, and the merchant said, “Yes, you can still observe the Uposatha for half a day. Tell him to wash his mouth and make the determination.”

The man did exactly that, taking the Uposatha precept centering on the abstention from untimely eating. As night fell, due to his hunger and exhaustion, unbearable sensations (vedanā) of pain arose. What did he do? He tied a rope to something in the room and, holding onto the end of it, began to roll around on the floor, unable to bear the pain. When the servants informed the merchant, he came with catumadhura and pleaded with him, “Why this distress?” The man said, “A wind-ailment has arisen due to my exhaustion.” The merchant said, “Then take this catumadhura.” The man asked, “Do you also take it, master?” The merchant replied, “No, I have no discomfort.” The man then said, “Please allow me, master. I could not observe this Uposatha for the whole day; let me at least keep this half-day pure,” and he rejected the catumadhura. Thus, he remained completely starving. Consequently, unable to endure the pain, the man passed away at dawn and was reborn as the tree-deity in that banyan tree. This was his story. The tree-deity added, “The merchant was a devotee of the Buddha, Dhamma, and Saṅgha. It was through my association with him that I obtained this celestial fortune as a tree-deity.” Upon hearing this, the ascetics—who did not even know at that time that a Buddha had appeared, as Kosambī was far away—stood up and asked three times, “Did you say ‘Buddha’? Is it true that a Buddha has arisen?” After learning the news of the Buddha’s arising, those ascetics informed the three merchants, went to Sāvattthī, listened to the Dhamma from the Buddha, and attained Arahantship.

Thus, through that story, we see that the Uposatha morality observed for just half a day yielded such great benefits. In modern times, our logicians often argue, especially about the precept of abstaining from untimely eating, saying, “Eating food does not harm anyone. Who ever went to hell just for eating rice?” There are indeed people who ask such questions. Here, the issue is not about eating or not eating rice. By strictly observing the undertaken precepts with a firm determination (adhiṭṭhāna), he purified his mind. He straightened his mind. Through faith in the Triple Gem, undertaking the precepts, and honesty, he made his mind upright. It was the fruit of this that the poor man received. Therefore, we must reflect that even the training rule of abstaining from untimely eating is not something to be taken lightly. Whatever training rule (sikkhāpada) it may be, if it is observed correctly within the Buddha Sāsana, it yields great benefits; this is clearly illustrated here.

Furthermore, there are many other Dhamma stories related to this. Regarding the virtues of morality (sīla), another highly valuable discourse must be mentioned. During the time of the Buddha, there lived a Brahmin named Kūṭadanta. He was extremely wealthy and wished to perform a grand sacrifice (yāga). For this sacrifice, he had prepared seven hundred bulls, seven hundred calves, seven hundred goats, and seven hundred rams, tying them to posts. Then, he heard that the ascetic Gautama knew a method of performing sacrifices that was highly fruitful and of great benefit. He went to the Buddha and initiated a discussion on how to conduct a sacrifice of great fruit and benefit.

The Buddha recounted a past story where, in a previous birth, he was born as a royal advisor to King Mahāvijita. The king possessed vast wealth and, involving the entire country, conducted a grand sacrifice. In that sacrifice, no animal was harmed. No force was used against the people involved, and the grand sacrifice was conducted in an extremely righteous manner. The Buddha explained this in detail. At that moment, the Brahmin crowd uttered Sādhū in approval. The Brahmin Kūṭadanta, pleased with the explanation, first asked, “I feel that the chaplain described by the Blessed One must have been the Blessed One himself.” The Buddha confirmed this. Next, the Brahmin asked, “Is there another sacrifice that requires less preparation and effort, yet is of greater benefit?” The Buddha replied, “Yes, Brahmin, there is. If one regularly offers alms to virtuous, gone-forth ones, that sacrifice is nobler than the grand sacrifice of King Mahāvijita.” He then asked, “Is there a sacrifice that requires even less preparation, yet yields greater benefits?” The Buddha answered, “Yes. Building a monastery (vihāra) for the Saṅgha arriving from the four directions is even more beneficial, and can be done with less physical exertion.”

Then he asked, “Is there an even easier sacrifice with greater benefits?” At that point, the Buddha declared, “If a person, with a pure mind, takes refuge in the Buddha, takes refuge in the Dhamma, and takes refuge in the Saṅgha, that sacrifice is far superior to all the aforementioned sacrifices—superior to the grand sacrifice of King Mahāvijita, superior to regular alms given to virtuous families, and superior to the offering of a monastery.” He did not stop there. The Brahmin asked, “Is there an even more valuable sacrifice of great fruit and benefit?” The Buddha then declared, “Yes. If a person abstains from the killing of living beings, from taking what is not given, from sexual misconduct, from false speech, and from taking intoxicants, that sacrifice is of even greater benefit.” The next question was, “Is there a sacrifice of even greater benefit than this?” In response, the Buddha expounded the entire path of morality (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā) leading all the way to Arahantship for one who ordains in this Dispensation.

Having heard this entire sermon, the Brahmin Kūṭadanta took refuge in the Triple Gem and became a lay disciple (upāsaka). He granted freedom (the gift of fearlessness) to all the 700 bulls, calves, cows, and other animals that were tied to the posts to be slaughtered. He released them, wishing, “Let them eat grass freely and drink cool water,” and granted them their lives.

From this story too, we see how this Dispensation leads from the material (āmisa) to the spiritual (nirāmisa). In the ordinary world, material giving is considered great. But the Buddha showed the world entirely new values that are spiritual, closer to the mind and volition, such as taking refuge in the Triple Gem and undertaking the precepts. The benefits of keeping the precepts are illustrated in various stories in the Dhamma. Generally, for laypersons who observe the five precepts, five immediate benefits in this life are described. If a person is virtuous, due to their diligence (appamāda)—and here, “diligence” means avoiding unwholesome actions. If someone commits the wrongs related to the five precepts, such as killing, stealing, sexual misconduct, lying, and taking intoxicants, whether at a business or personal level, it is classified as negligence (pramāda). They have fallen into negligence. Indeed, not only through alcohol, but through any of these actions, a person eventually becomes like a madman whenever those impulses arise in the mind. They become agitated. This is a cause of negligence. Because of this negligence, even if they appear to prosper in the eyes of the ordinary world or according to the understanding of common people, at some point, they suffer a major downfall. In contrast, the Buddha states that if a person is virtuous and protects the five precepts properly, they can accumulate great wealth by virtue of their diligent practice. In modern times, people are prone to think that a person who keeps the five precepts and lives righteously has no place in society and cannot acquire wealth. But the Buddha pointed out that it is precisely the person who keeps the five precepts who can accumulate wealth.

Sometimes, wealth means the stability of one’s possessions. Even if one earns a lot, if one drinks and engages in other vices, that wealth is quickly squandered and lost. The virtuous person is not like that. The Buddha used the similes of bees building a honeycomb and termites building a mound—earning wealth through hard work and righteousness ensures that it is stable and secure. In that sense, the first benefit described is that they obtain the wealth (bhogakkhandha) that laypeople desire. The second benefit is that a good reputation (kīrti-rāva) spreads about the virtuous person. A good reputation, a noble fame among the wise, spreads gently. That is the second benefit, which is highly valuable for someone living in society. Thirdly, when such a virtuous person enters any assembly—whether it is an assembly of kings, Brahmins, householders, or ascetics—they enter with confidence (visārada), without mental hesitation.

Mental hesitation means hanging one’s head down, looking down in shame and hiding one’s face. Because their virtue is pure, they can enter any assembly with head held high, without fear, and speak with confidence. That is the third benefit. The fourth benefit is passing away with mindfulness and clear comprehension at the moment of death, without confusion. You may have heard in other stories about Cunda the pork-butcher, who slaughtered pigs. At his final moment, having lost his human consciousness, he ran around squealing like a pig, suffered immensely, and fell into the lower realms. The virtuous person, however, recollects their good deeds, rejoices, spends their final moments with clear mindfulness, and—as described in the texts—passes away as if falling asleep and waking up, to be reborn in the heavenly world. The fifth benefit is indeed the ability to go to a happy destination. If a virtuous person protects their precepts properly, like Chatta Mānavaka or that poor man, they will be reborn in a happy destination. This is the fifth benefit.

On another occasion, Venerable Ānanda asked the Buddha: “Blessed One, there are three types of fragrance in the world: the fragrance of roots, the fragrance of heartwood, and the fragrance of flowers. These three kinds of fragrance only travel with the wind, not against it. Blessed One, is there a fragrance in the world that travels both with the wind and against the wind—a fragrance that goes in both directions?” The Buddha replied: “If in any village, town, or city, there is a woman or man who has taken refuge in the Buddha, Dhamma, and Saṅgha, who abstains from the five vices of killing, stealing, sexual misconduct, lying, and taking intoxicants, who keeps these precepts and is generous, the fragrance of their virtue spreads among humans, deities, and ascetics and Brahmins alike.” The fragrance of their virtue spreads; this is how the benefits of morality are sometimes illustrated. Thus, even in this life, the virtuous person can live peacefully. You have also heard that those who observe virtue and other qualities can constantly live with great joy, free from the remorse (vipatti-sāra) mentioned in ancient books. They can experience spiritual joy. This is called the blameless happiness (anavajja-sukha). The thought “I have done no wrong, I am blameless” brings great joy. Through this, one can generate happiness.

Thus, that very joy is the initial benefit of morality in this life. Among the qualities of this Dispensation, as we all know, morality is the foundation for cultivating all spiritual qualities. In the path to ending the suffering (dukkha) of Saṃsāra, three aspects are described: morality, concentration, and wisdom. Established on morality, one develops concentration; supported by concentration, one develops wisdom. That is why they are presented as the threefold training: morality, concentration, and wisdom.

Morality is diverse. You know that the five precepts serve as the permanent lay morality. If possible, there is also the eightfold morality with right livelihood as the eighth (ājīva-aṭṭhamaka-sīla), which involves guarding one’s speech as some of you have undertaken today. In short, morality means restraint of body and speech. This is done with the assistance of the mind, led by the power of determination in the mind. Therefore, the most valuable aspect of undertaking precepts is determination. Through this determination, one establishes a certain stability. Without that stability, concentration cannot be built. Just as a pagoda cannot be built without a proper foundation, the mind cannot be established in concentration without at least the minimum level of the five precepts. This simile can be used to understand this, even if it is not directly from the texts.

We have spent infinite time in this Saṃsāra experiencing various kinds of lives. Mostly, we have been reborn as demons, hungry ghosts, and hell-beings, and only occasionally as Brahmas or humans. Thus, stored in our consciousness (viññāṇa), in our minds, there is a vast accumulation of good and bad. Mostly, the bad side is dominant. These arise constantly in our minds as karmic results. Just as when a pot is boiling on the hearth, different things bubble up to the surface from time to time, so do karmas rise to the surface. It is the determination of morality (sīla-adhiṭṭhāna) that helps to suppress these and bring the mind to a stable level. If at any moment a person who has been killing animals—whether as a livelihood or for recreation—makes a firm determination: “From this moment on, I will not harm any living being,” through that very power of determination, the past karmic forces related to that action are largely suppressed. The mind does not allow them to surface when they arise. This is the natural law. It is the same with stealing. For some, stealing is an ingrained habit from birth, reflecting past character traits. But if one determines firmly, placing that taking of refuge—taking refuge in the Triple Gem—at the forefront of that determination, that determination becomes powerful, whether regarding stealing or other vices. In short, the five precepts address the very wrongs we have committed throughout infinite time in Saṃsāra when we did not encounter the Dhamma. The Buddha grouped and presented these as the five precepts.

Therefore, if we are looking towards Nibbāna, we must, as a starting step, observe at least these five as our permanent morality (nicca-sīla). That is the value of the five precepts; it is no small matter. They must be observed not casually, but with firm determination. Beyond that, there are Uposatha eight precepts and so on.

Furthermore, the morality of a monk is even broader. If the foundation is strong, as you know in the case of building high-rise structures, they do not just build the upper part. Before that, as engineers well know, how much effort goes into laying the foundation? If built on a heap of sand, it will collapse. That is why, for the monks who work with higher targets, wishing to realize Nibbāna, the Buddha expounded an even more subtle and vast restraint of the Pātimokkha.

For the monks, the morality of fourfold purification is described: Pātimokkha restraint (pātimokkha-saṃvara-sīla), restraint of senses, purification of livelihood, and morality concerning the use of requisites. In this way, there is a gradually developing morality in this Sāsana. We must understand that Saṃsāra is entirely a muddy swamp. If we are to sit for meditation on this muddy swamp, we must build a platform. We have to construct a small platform. That platform can be built by erecting five pillars, representing the five precepts. It can also be built with eight pillars, representing the Uposatha precepts, or ten pillars for the ten precepts. That is how we must understand it. That is why the Buddha instructs us to develop concentration while established in morality. The mind can be maintained in an unshakeable state on an object only if we generate a state free from remorse. What supports this is the morality observed over a specific period of time. Morality kept over a long period is indeed strong, but even at a minimum level, one should make a determination at some point: “From today, from this moment, I am a different person. This is the foundation stone for a complete transformation of my character and life.” If, like Chatta Mānavaka, one determines such morality, then from that day on, that blameless happiness, that spiritual joy, will arise. That joy is obtained by reflecting upon it.

In morality, there are two aspects: determination and reflection. Determination is naturally present within the undertaking of the precept. It is not out of fear of someone else's words, but by saying “I undertake,” one accepts it with all one's heart and resolves upon that practice. Then, by resolving and keeping it, when one looks back—reflecting means reviewing—when one reviews the morality resolved upon in the morning and sees that it has been kept perfectly, despite various troubles in daily life, one feels great joy. If one reviews after a week and sees that it has been kept continuously, the joy is even greater. After a month, after a year, if a training rule has been kept perfectly for twenty or thirty years, it generates immense mental strength and joy. That very joy is what supports concentration, as described in the Dhamma. A virtuous person does not need to make a deliberate effort wishing, “Let joy arise in me, let happiness arise in me.” Because the virtuous person has no remorse, joy arises naturally. When joy (pāmojja) arises, it turns into rapture (pīti). Through that rapture, the mind becomes tranquil, and through physical and mental happiness (sukha), concentration arises according to the meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna) chosen. This is the natural law. Such is the value of morality.

Similarly, established on that morality, next comes concentration. Concentration means the unification of the mind. The states of a unified mind are described as meditative absorptions (jhāna-samāpatti). Supported by these, one gains the strength to understand the deepest teachings expounded by the Buddha—the reality of life, the truth of character and the mind.

All of this is done by first establishing oneself in the refuge. We must think about what this Triple Gem is. Why are they called Gems (ratna)? It is mentioned in the Dhamma:

Yassa kiñci ratanam loke vijjati vividhā puthu,

Ratanam Buddha-samam natthi, tasmā sotthī bhavantu te...

Ratanam Dhamma-samam natthi...

Ratanam Saṅgha-samam natthi...

Thus it is mentioned in blessing verses. Whatever gems exist in the world, in all their variety, there is no gem equal to the Buddha Gem, the Dhamma Gem, or the Saṅgha Gem. This is how the simile of gems has come down from the past. “Gem” here means that a person's value arises because of these three Gems deposited in their heart. Whatever one's past life status may be, these three things—Buddha, Dhamma, and Saṅgha—which appear rarest in the world, are called Gems. They are compared to gems. However, in recent times, due to various social changes, some Buddhist lay disciples defile their taking of refuge. A concept of “two gems” is spreading in the country, where one of the Gems is not given its due place. This is a defilement of one's refuge. There is no taking of refuge in two gems in this Sāsana; it is only in the Triple Gem. Therefore, we must constantly generate the perception of the Gem in the eightfold Noble Saṅgha. It is upon this perception of the Gem that we observe morality. This is clear from the story of Chatta Mānavaka. The value we give to it corresponds to the Buddha as our Teacher, his Dhamma as the practice, and the Saṅgha as those who reflect the success of that practice. This is beautifully described in suttas like the Aggappasāda Sutta, in a way that is highly meaningful to the faithful. Among whatever beings there are—whether footless, two-footed, four-footed, many-footed, with form, formless, percipient, non-percipient, or neither-percipient-nor-non-percipient—the Tathāgata, the Arahant, the Fully Enlightened One is supreme. Those who have faith in the supreme Buddha have faith in the supreme. For those who have faith in the supreme, the result is supreme. This is what is said of the Buddha Gem.

Similarly, it is said: “Among whatever conditioned states there are, the Noble Eightfold Path is the supreme. If one has faith in this Dhamma, the benefit of that faith is likewise supreme.” Then it is said: “Among whatever conditioned or unconditioned states there are, the Unprepared (asaṅkhata) which is Nibbāna, unarisen from causes and conditions, is the supreme. If one has faith in this Dhamma of Nibbāna, its benefits are likewise supreme.” Next, it is said: “Among whatever communities or groups there are in the world, the Saṅgha of the Tathāgata, the eightfold Noble Saṅgha Gem, is supreme. Therefore, if one has faith in the Saṅgha, the benefits are likewise supreme.” In this way, the Buddha has introduced the value of taking refuge and the perception of the Gem to the world on many occasions. We must constantly reflect on this. The value of all our actions arises from the strength generated through faith (saddhā) within our hearts. That is why it is said, “Saddhāya tarati oghaṃ”

— “Through faith, one crosses the flood.”

In this formidable ocean of Saṃsāra—and Saṃsāra consists of four terrible floods: the flood of sensual desire, the flood of becoming/existence (bhava), the flood of views, and the flood of ignorance—one cannot even think of crossing over to the other side. Crossing over these four terrible floods, in which we have been submerged and swept away for infinite time, is what is meant by crossing over Saṃsāra. To face this task, we must possess sufficient strength of faith. We generate faith in the Enlightenment of the Tathāgata, believing that the Teacher does not speak falsehood: *

“Saddahati Tathāgatassa bodhiṃ”*

—accepting that the Tathāgata is the Fully Enlightened One, that his practice leads out of suffering, and that there is a community of people who have proven the efficacy of this liberating path. It is through this faith that one crosses the flood, as said in * “Saddhāya tarati oghaṃ”*

. You have also heard in many places that if we compare the spiritual qualities of this Sāsana to agriculture, faith is the seed: *

“Saddhā bijaṃ”*

. Wherever spiritual qualities are described, faith is highlighted first, either as a seed or as a power (bala). To direct the physical and mental energy within a being towards a certain goal requires a major commitment. That commitment is what lies within this taking of refuge. Some cannot understand this today. We have to explain it to some scholars. What is this taking of refuge? Some cannot even comprehend why we take refuge in the Buddha or Saṅgha when it is said, “Self is indeed the refuge of self.” They completely misunderstand this. We must cross over. The Buddha cannot carry each person from this shore to the other shore. But we take refuge because there is Someone who points out the correct path, saying: “If you do it this way, it is correct; if you act this way, it is correct.” Taking refuge in the Buddha, Dhamma, and Saṅgha is not like in some other religions where another being drags you along. Here, it is to bring forth the energy (vīriya) within oneself. That is why, alongside faith, come energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom. Energy follows faith.

“Saddhāya tarati oghaṃ, appamādena aṇṇavaṃ, vīriyena... paññāya...”—thus it is sometimes stated. One crosses the flood through faith, and crosses the ocean of Samsāra through diligence. Next, through energy—energy is brought forth based on faith. Therefore, the degree to which faith becomes firm depends on the value we place on those three objects. If we equate any of these to something lesser than these Gems, we must consider whether we can generate the strength within us to cross over. A certain person asked the Buddha: “How does one become a lay disciple (upāsaka) in this Sāsana?” The Buddha replied: “By taking refuge in the Buddha, taking refuge in the Dhamma, and taking refuge in the Saṅgha, one becomes a lay disciple.” Look how easy it seems. One does not need to fill out application forms, pay fees, or anything. It seems very simple. But to be a true lay disciple, one must take refuge to the point of being able to make a truth-assertion: “Natthi me saraṇaṃ aññaṃ, Buddhho me saraṇaṃ varaṃ, etena sacca-vajjena hotu me jayamaṅgalam”—“I have no other refuge, the Buddha is my supreme refuge; by this truth, may there be victory and blessing!” That is the level. Taking refuge helps us to generate that state. Thus, when we reflect upon this, taking refuge in the Triple Gem is not something to be taken lightly. It is repeated three times to engrave it deeply in one’s mind.

The wholesome energy generated through this refuge does not merely yield heavenly rebirth. Based on this, one fulfills morality. Based on morality, one develops concentration. Established on concentration, and supported by past wholesome forces, one eventually realizes the supreme Dhamma of Nibbāna through the path, fruit, and penetration of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti), Once-returning (Sakadāgāmi), Non-returning (Anāgāmi), and Arahantship (Arahatta). Therefore, we must reflect on our own lives. Especially, like what we said about children, not only children but even adults must spend their days with the recollection of the Triple Gem. It is not that merely recollecting the Triple Gem will save us from all physical dangers or grant us eternal life without death. But if we live with that proximate mind, if death should occur at any moment, we can avoid the lower realms and secure a good state. In short, our next birth (jāti) is a photocopy of our own mind. If we shake when a photo is being taken, how will the picture turn out? Similarly, if our mind is defiled at the moment of death, we will be reborn as hungry ghosts, demons, or animals. If, on the other hand, we achieve rebirth in a happy realm, especially like that deity we mentioned, when we look back and see how such a small thing, which the world thought lightly of, brought such great benefits, we should train ourselves to think: “If we were to complete this path of Dhamma, what kind of benefits would there be?”

Therefore, looking at today's topic, it is the initial step in the Sāsana. But if we do not understand it correctly, it becomes difficult to fulfill the spiritual qualities in this Dispensation. If we grab onto deep and complex things without understanding the basic principles, they will not penetrate our hearts. Thus, if we have understood the value of the Triple Gem in this Sāsana through stories like that of Chatta Mānavaka, it is with that support that we can fulfill our other practices. Therefore, you must reflect that no matter how busy your daily lives are, you should use the Uposatha day as a pause, and during this time, review and correct the shortcomings in your life. To cross over this Samsāra, reflect quietly on what you must do, establish yourself in morality on this Uposatha day, listen to the Dhamma, meditate, and thereby end the suffering (dukkha) of Samsāra within this very Buddha Sāsana. Therefore, reflect: "May this accumulation of merit gathered through keeping the precepts, meditating, and listening to the Dhamma, serve as a strong support to strive as much as possible in this very life to end the samsāric sufferings of birth (jāti), decay and death (jarāmarāṇa), sickness, and so forth, through the realization of the path and fruit of Stream-entry, Once-returning, Non-returning, and Arahantship!"

Similarly, may all beings from Avīci to Akaniṭṭha, including the guardian deities and Brahma kings, as well as our departed relatives, rejoice in this merit of Dhamma-preaching and realize the supreme deathless Nibbāna through their aspired Bodhi! With this aspiration, please recite these verses:

From:

Verse 32 from the Appamādavagga (Chapter on Heedfulness) of the Dhammapada

Dear Listeners,

By attaining supreme enlightenment on a Vesak Full Moon Poya day such as today, the Teacher of the Three Worlds, the Fully Enlightened Buddha, discovered the path to cross over from Bhava (Becoming). This discovery made through a noble quest (ariya pariyesana) is indeed the most sublime discovery in the world—the discovery of the path to cross over from Bhava (Becoming). The Blessed Buddha obtained on that day the realization that helps the beings of the world, who have been bound to Saṃsāra for an infinite period of time, to understand what those fetters binding them to this saṃsāric Bhava (Becoming) are, and to attain liberation by cutting those fetters.

The stanza we have taken as our theme today, as well as the story related to it, speaks precisely of those saṃyojanas (fetters)—the story of those bonds.

This stanza was preached concerning a certain monk who went to a deep forest to meditate after obtaining a meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna) from the Buddha. Having obtained the meditation subject and gone to the forest, he meditated but, unable to achieve any higher attainment, he thought: "There must be some shortcoming in my meditation subject. I must go and clarify my meditation subject by meeting the Blessed One again." Thinking thus, he set out with the hope of coming to Jetavana monastery. On his way, he saw a forest fire. As the forest fire was spreading, this monk quickly climbed a high rock nearby and escaped from the fire. However, he kept watching how this forest fire was spreading. While watching it, with a deep sense of urgency (saṃvega), he thought: "Just as this fire goes on burning up all the Upādāna (Grasping)—which means the firewood or whatever else it catches—similarly, in the effort to cross over from the world through the knowledge of the path of Arahantship (arahatta-magga-ñāṇa) that I aspire to, will not the vipassanā (insight) knowledges that must be aroused also burn up those bonds that bind one to the world with the fire of that knowledge?" In this manner, a certain thought arose in that monk's mind.

The Buddha, staying at Jetavana, saw this monk's train of thoughts and, in order to direct it toward Nibbāna, uttered this stanza—which is referred to in the commentaries as an obhāsa gāthā (a stanza uttered through sending forth light). Such incidents are mentioned on many occasions. The Buddha, through psychic power, made himself appear as if standing before that monk, and uttered this stanza so that it could be heard by him:

"Appamādarato bhikkhu, pamāde bhayadassivā;

aṇum thūlaṃ dahan, aggāva gacchati."

The monk who delights in heedfulness and sees danger in heedlessness moves forward like a fire, burning all fetters, large and small. In this way, He uttered a stanza that leads to and encourages those insight knowledges (vipassanā-ñāṇa). Approving the thought-movement of that monk, the Buddha declared through this stanza, "Yes, monk, just so, like that fire burning, insight knowledges go on burning away those samyojanas (fetters)." Hearing this, it is said that the monk attained Arahatsip right there, and came to see the Buddha to declare his liberation.

When we reflect on this story, for that monk, the forest fire was not merely a sight—a mere spectacle. For us, a forest fire is only a sight. But for him, it became an object of vipassanā (insight). A forest fire—perhaps not everyone has heard of this word—often occurs in forests naturally. During a severe drought, when all the trees are dried up, when a storm comes, two trees rub against each other. Rubbing, rubbing, rubbing against each other, they catch fire. Having caught fire, those two trees themselves are burnt down. Next, catching all the surrounding trees, leaves, and vegetation, it gradually spreads in a terrifying manner, consuming everything it encounters. Now, that is a deeply moving sight. It is by directing that sight toward Nibbāna that the monk aroused insight knowledges in that manner.

Now, if we reflect a little, to the Buddha, the entire world appeared as a place on fire. There are certain sutta discourses, highly wondrous discourses. There are suttas of a nature that arouse a sense of urgency, like the Ādittapariyāya Sutta. Some of them are truly marvelous. There is a discourse preached by the Buddha at Gayāsīsa, near Buddhagaya, to a thousand monks; the discourse is very short, but it ends stating that all those thousand monks attained Arahatsip. It is an extremely powerful discourse. It begins: "Ādittam"—"All is burning, monks." Everything is on fire and burning. Next, the Buddha analyzes: "And what, monks, is that 'all'?" There, 'all'—which is called sabbam—is analyzed: the eye and forms, the ear and sounds, the nose and smells, the tongue and tastes, the body and Phassa (Contact), the mind and mind-objects (dhamma, the word used there for what comes to the mind). All these are on fire. They are on fire and burning. With what are they burning, monks? Next, He says—and you may have heard of this—about the eleven fires: with the fires of greed (rāga), hatred (dosa), and delusion (moha). Not only those three. Next, He speaks of a multitude of fires of Dukkha (Suffering) such as Jāti (Birth), Jarāmaraṇa (Decay and Death), lamentation, pain, grief, and despair. It is with these fires that the eye and forms, the ear and sounds, and finally, the mind and mind-objects, and everything else, are burning. There is a great fire within the worldly being. The Buddha saw everything as having caught fire.

So, the statement that this entire Bhava (Becoming) is a fire might sometimes be difficult for someone to understand. Next, if we reflect a little on this fire, according to our day-to-day understanding, we use the word 'firewood-fire' (gindara). The fire catches the wood. The wood burns. Thus, within that word 'fire' both are present. If we think about it a little, for this wood, the word used in the Pali language is Upādāna (Grasping). In those analyses of the Dhamma, we can say that the word Upādāna is used in two senses. There is the sense of 'grasping/holding' and there is the sense of 'the thing grasped' (fuel). Grasping/holding is the primary meaning. Then, the five aggregates of grasping (pañcupādānakkhandha) are groups of Upādāna. It is these groups that we call "I" and "mine," according to the Buddha's description. A group of form is called the form aggregate of grasping (rūpupādānakkhandha). A group of Vedanā (Feeling)... all these are designated by the name Upādāna. Thus, when we say Upādāna, just as it means 'grasping/holding', it also means 'the thing grasped'. In the sense of 'the thing grasped', it is firewood, or some kind of fuel. So, a fire has caught hold of its Upādāna (fuel). After catching hold of it, what happens? In the end, there is no distinction between the fire and the firewood.

The story of this being burning with those fires of Dukkha (Suffering) has been shown in a simple poem that we can understand, by the great Thera of Vīdāgama in the past, in the Lowāda Saṅgarāva. In a very simple poem:

- > When a heap of firewood has caught fire constantly,
- > It is called 'fire', and the name 'firewood' no longer applies;
- > In the same manner, joining them together, the Sage declared:
- > It is but Dukkha, and the name 'body' no longer applies.

After a heap of firewood catches fire, it is only called 'fire' and the name 'firewood' is no longer suitable; it "does not apply." In the same way, the Buddha brought together the fire and the firewood that is caught by the fire, and declared: "It is but Dukkha (Suffering), and the name 'body' no longer applies." It is not fitting to call this a "body."

Now, that eye, ear, nose, etc., are in this body, aren't they? What are mentioned in the Dhamma as āyatanas (sense-bases)—all those six āyatanas are within this body. So, saying that all these six āyatanas are on fire means precisely that. The entire body is on fire. That is why we all talk about the Four Noble Truths of the Buddha. We say, "Dukkha-sacca, Dukkha-sacca" (the truth of suffering/unsatisfactoriness/stress), and some say, "I have already understood it." But Dukkha (Suffering) is not fully understood. It is at the moment Dukkha-sacca is understood that those two, the firewood and the fire, come together. Once one realizes that what was set apart as a "heap of firewood" is burning completely, there is only fire there. One cannot call it "firewood." However, seeing various troubles in this world, some people say, "I have understood Dukkha." But when full realization comes, it is to such an extent that it cannot be separated; it is pure Dukkha. Pure Dukkha. The Buddha refers to this as the "entire mass of suffering" (kevala-dukkhakkhandha) when analyzing this Dukkha. In brief, the entire five aggregates of grasping (pañcupādānakkhandha)—these five grasped groups—are called Dukkha according to that very vision.

Once the fire catches the firewood, a point comes where the firewood cannot be separated. There is only a pure heap of fire. So, that is it. The path leading there is the path of vipassanā (insight). Then, how does one gain this understanding regarding this? What is the path leading to this realization? For that too, we find guidance in other suttas shown by the Buddha Himself. He speaks concerning those six āyatanas (sense-bases).

A certain monk asks the Blessed One, requesting a meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna) on how to destroy this Dukkha (Suffering)—how to bring an end to this saṃsāric Dukkha. Then the Buddha declares: "One must understand this Anicca (Impermanent)." The eye is Anicca, and forms are Anicca. The ear is Anicca, and sounds are Anicca. Everything is Anicca. But the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā) is not present in the ordinary worldling. Instead, what is present is the perception of permanence (nicca-saññā). They separate the eye and separate forms, treating them as things that actually exist. According to the Buddha's vision, all these change moment by moment. That word is used in various ways: it fluctuates (calaṃ), it decays (vayaṃ), it passes away. Everything fluctuates, decays, trembles. It is changing into another state, rapidly. But the worldling does not perceive it. Therefore, they separate them.

Separating them as eye and forms, ear and sounds—it is within that, indeed, that the bondage arises. Now, regarding this bondage, a very good simile-story comes. It is a dialogue between the chief disciple Ven. Sāriputta Maha Thera and Ven. Mahā Koṭṭhita Maha Thera. Ven. Mahā Koṭṭhita asks Ven. Sāriputta: "Is the form a bond for the eye, or is the eye a bond for the form? Is the sound a bond for the ear, or is the ear a bond for the sound?" There is talk about a bond, a saṃyojana (fetter), isn't there? So, what is the saṃyojana here? Does the form become a bond to the eye, or does the eye become a bond? Does the sound become a bond to the ear, or does the ear become a bond to the sound? In this manner, he asks about all six. Finally, "Is the mind-object a bond to the mind, or is the mind a bond to the mind-objects?" Then Ven. Sāriputta declares: "No, friend Koṭṭhita. The form is not a bond to the eye, nor is the eye a bond to forms. The sound is not a bond to the ear, nor is the ear a bond to sounds. Rather, the desire-and-lust (chandarāga)—the attachment following desire—that arises in-between, conditioned and supported by those two, is the bond here." So, we usually consider the form seen by the eye to be the bond. But here it is shown that the desire-and-lust (chandarāga)—the attachment following desire—arising due to those two, is the bond. To illustrate this, a very good simile is given:

"Friend Koṭṭhita, if a black ox and a white ox are bound together by a single strap or chain, like a yoke, and if someone were to say that the white ox is the bond for the black ox, or that the black ox is the bond for the white ox—would that assertion be correct?" Then Ven. Koṭṭhita says: "No, friend. Why? The white ox is not the bond for the black ox, nor is the black ox the bond for the white ox. Rather, the strap or the bond by which the two are bound together is the real bond there."

"Just so, the form is not the bond for the eye, nor is the eye the bond for forms. The desire-and-lust (chandarāga)—the attachment, the Taṇhā (Craving)—that arises because of those two is the bond there. That is why the Buddha declared that to bring an end to Dukkha (Suffering), one must destroy Taṇhā, destroy chandarāga. Although we might think of this as very deep, some meditators get insights through this. Why? The understanding to cross over from the entire world is gained precisely from this world of the six sense-bases (saḷāyatana) which we have so far taken to be

'the world'. The Buddha defines 'the world' as these six sense-bases—called the saḷāyatana. The six sense-bases we have are the eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind. Now, the word āyatana might have various meanings these days. But in truth, what we have to do is the management of these six sense-bases. However, what is mostly done is mismanagement. That is why we are bound to Saṃsāra. What is the management? It is understanding the Anicca (Impermanent) nature of these sense-bases, according to the word of the Buddha. The eye is Anicca. It changes moment by moment. It changes into another state. Forms too are like that—gaining that deep understanding, through the application of mindfulness on this body. Those meritorious friends who meditate know this; by applying mindfulness and clear comprehension (sati-sampajañña), they gradually understand deeply that all these change moment by moment. It is through that, indeed, that Taṇhā, or chandarāga, gradually loosens. If that Anicca nature is established in the mind to some extent, if it is realized by the mind, to that extent the understanding arises that there is nothing here to cling to or to clash with. Chandarāga means the attachment created according to desire."

So, such is the situation. There are numerous Dhamma discourses by the Buddha regarding these six sense-bases. Even in this day and age, if practicing yogis apply wisdom, if they manage these sense-bases correctly, and if they make an effort to understand the reality of the objects that come as prey to these sense-bases, then they will understand their fluctuating nature. Now, even in motion pictures, what is done is that by sending a film strip rapidly, a certain illusion (hypnosis) is created. A perception of permanence (nicca-saññā) is created toward those scenes, toward those images. Sometimes, due to a mechanical fault or a delay, one suddenly realizes, "Here, what is passing is only a collection of images." That illusion which creates the perception of compactness (ghana-saññā) is deposited in this Viññāṇa (Consciousness). That is a magical nature. That is why the Buddha points out on some occasions: "The eye is Anicca (Impermanent), forms too are Anicca."

"Next, the eye-consciousness (cakkhu-viññāṇa)—which is the consciousness regarding the eye, arising because of those two—is also Anicca. A person does not see merely because there is an eye. He does not see merely because there are forms. At the moment when the eye and forms come together through attention, a consciousness regarding the eye (Viññāṇa) arises. The Buddha declares that this eye-consciousness too is Anicca. Next, after the eye-consciousness arises, through that, Phassa (Contact) emerges. A certain impingement occurs. That too is Anicca. Next, due to that impingement (Phassa), a certain Vedanā (Feeling) arises. That too is likewise Anicca. In this very manner, the Buddha reminds us. Within that very process that takes place—within the process arising from the impingement of the eye and forms—there is only Anicca (Impermanent). It is fluctuating, changing, turning into another state, and undergoing reverse change. Then, how can those things that arise because of them be permanent? Finally, the Buddha declares: for example, the consciousness (Viññāṇa) arising from the impingement of the eye and forms is Anicca. The contacts (Phassa) arising because of that consciousness are Anicca. How can the Vedanā (Feeling) and so forth that arise based on that contact be permanent? Whether it is a pleasant, painful, or neutral feeling, every single one of them has that same nature of changing. It is when that understanding comes, indeed, that in the end, that [grasping] slips away."

In books, generally, the saṃyojanas (fetters) are explained very simply. It is said that if one wants to realize Nibbāna, one must break ten saṃyojanas, and one can list those ten at once. What are the ten? Perhaps you have heard of them. On the path leading to Nibbāna, there are ten bonds binding us to Saṃsāra that must be broken.

They are shown as saṃyojanas (fetters) as follows:

1. Sakkāya-diṭṭhi (View of existing group/body)
2. Vicikicchā (Skeptical doubt)
3. Sīlabbata-parāmaṣa (Adherence to rules and rituals)
4. Kāmarāga (Sensual lust)
5. Vyāpāda (Ill-will)
6. Rūparāga (Lust for form-existence)
7. Arūparāga (Lust for formless-existence)
8. Māna (Conceit)
9. Uddhacca (Restlessness)
10. Avijjā (Ignorance)

Sakkāya-diṭṭhi means taking the five aggregates—namely, form (rūpa), Vedanā (Feeling), perception (saññā), Saṅkhāra (Formations), and Viññāṇa (Consciousness)—as a self. Each of them is considered as a self in four ways. There too, what is present is that perception of compactness (ghana-saññā).

Likewise, vicikicchā (skeptical doubt). One holds tightly to the notion of "I". Thinking that there is someone called "I" based on this body, one rolls over and over in a heap of doubts and hesitations, such as: "Did I exist in the past? Will I exist in the future?" and so forth. One conjures up [notions] through that. That too is a bond binding one to Saṃsāra. Next, sīlabbata-parāmaṣa (adherence to rules and rituals) means, as some people think, that through difficult vows and practices—like some brahmins immersing themselves in cold water, or Jain ascetics undergoing various forms of self-mortification—by holding tightly to these, liberation is attained. In the end, that too is a bond.

Next, everyone knows that kāmarāga (sensual lust) is a force that pulls one downwards, to that Bhava (Becoming) we mentioned. Likewise, vyāpāda (ill-will) means anger—the two: attraction and repulsion (clinging and clashing). Next, what are mentioned as rūparāga and arūparāga are indeed more subtle forms of that very Taṇhā (Craving). Due to spending a long time in Samsāra, beings have a power in their minds to create various mind-born images. In the end, they grasp onto these, even if they have let go of external things. That is why, even if they have attained high states of jhāna, they still have certain desires that come from deep within—a kind of subtle desire. It is in correspondence to those that Brahma worlds and so forth are created.

Such is the highly dangerous situation present within this Bhava (Becoming). One cannot easily escape. Some go and get trapped there—in those subtle cravings such as rūparāga and so on. Next, as a result of all that, there are māna (conceit) and uddhacca (restlessness). Māna arises from taking things as "two", like separating the firewood and the fire. Because of that very thing, uddhacca (restlessness/unquietness) arises. Finally, avijjā (ignorance). Within that itself is found the ultimate end of the perception of permanence (nicca-saññā) that starts with Sakkāya-diṭṭhi (View of existing group/body). It is only when that perception of permanence is completely removed that the emptiness of the world is understood.

So, if we speak of those ten in that manner, they are shown as things that are destroyed through path-knowledges (magga-ñāṇa). However, if we take this as something that is more directly and practically helpful to the practicing yogi in meditation, it is, as the Buddha said, the bond that exists between these two in these suttas:

the eye and forms,
the ear and sounds,
the nose and smells,
the tongue and tastes,
the body and Phassa (Contact), the mind and mind-objects (dhamma).

On another occasion, the Buddha, addressing the Saṅgha, declared:

"Monks, I will teach you a dyad (two things)." When it is said, "I will teach you two," one might think of various things. But here too, the Buddha presents the teaching in this way: "Monks, I will teach you a dyad. What is the dyad? The eye and forms, the ear and sounds, the nose and smells, the tongue and tastes, the body and contacts, the mind and mind-objects." He does not stop there. "Monks, if anyone were to say there is another dyad apart from this, that talk of his would be completely empty. He would not be able to provide any proof either." What is shown by this is that the Buddha's real dyad is just this. If one takes "two" as a duality, it is precisely this division into two:

The eye—separated from forms;

The ear—separated from sounds;

The nose—separated from smells.

Taking each of them as "things". This notion of "things"—no matter what the level of education of these meritorious friends may be, while the story of the ten saṃyojanas (fettors) might be understood by those who have read books, this talk is for everyone, since everyone is a manager of these āyatanas (sense-bases), aren't they? So, to abandon that mismanagement and to manage them properly, try to realize this very understanding. That is to say, the Buddha declares that as long as we separate the eye and forms, and separate the ear and sounds, so long will that bond, so long will that idea of impingement (clashing) remain. That is why it was called "a dyad" (two). If there are "two" in the world, it is precisely this kind of division into two. It is within that division, indeed, that the forest fire we mentioned earlier arises—from the friction of two dry trees. Rubbing, rubbing, rubbing against each other, at some point, a fire is produced.

It is in that very same way that the Buddha declared concerning this Viññāṇa (Consciousness). There is no such thing as consciousness on its own. There is no separate consciousness apart from this. It must either be eye-consciousness (cakkhu-viññāṇa), which is consciousness regarding the eye; or it must be ear-consciousness (sota-viññāṇa), which is consciousness regarding the ear; or it must be nose-consciousness (ghāṇa-viññāṇa), which is consciousness regarding the nose; or it must be tongue-consciousness (jivhā-viññāṇa), which is consciousness regarding the tongue; or it must be body-consciousness (kāya-viññāṇa), which is consciousness regarding the body; or it must be mind-consciousness (mano-viññāṇa).

There are six such types of consciousness (Viññāṇa). There is no consciousness on its own. This too is shown on one occasion through a simile. Now, there is no such thing as just "fire", is there? We can either call it a paper fire, or a wood fire. In that manner, if a fire arises dependent on a certain Upādāna (Grasping), dependent on some fuel like wood, it is designated by that name. There there is no such thing as a mere "fire" in the world. Even when a matchstick catches fire, it has to be called a "matchstick fire" thereafter. Such is the situation. It is in that very same way that Viññāṇa (Consciousness) is explained.

Within it, there is this nature of separating. It is through that separating, indeed, that impingement (clashing) exists next. Thus, if one understands at some point—after those two trees rubbed together and caught fire, those two trees themselves are gone, and whatever the fire catches, it moves forward burning and burning it. It goes on burning up everything. What remains then is a pure sheet of flame. There might have been very beautiful flowering trees and good fruits in that forest. But in the end, they are all just firewood. Before the fire, they are all just firewood. In that way, it goes on burning, burning them up.

It must have been on seeing this that the monk then thought: "Just like this fire, so too are these insight knowledges (vipassanā-ñāṇa). They go on burning and burning up all saṅkhāras (Preparations / Formations / Volitional activity) that they encounter. They go on burning and burning whatever they meet ahead." With what do they burn them? With that very perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā). Through the perception of impermanence. It is extremely powerful. At the moment when it is thoroughly impressed upon our minds that "every single one of these is Anicca, Anicca", then, without taking them as "two", here there is completely a heap of fire. Just as it was said in that poem:

- > When a heap of firewood has caught fire constantly,
- > It is called 'fire', and the name 'firewood' no longer applies;
- > In the same manner, joining them together, the Sage declared...

This is understood as pure Dukkha (Suffering). As long as those two are separated, next, dividing them as agreeable and disagreeable, one creates attachment or repulsion in various ways. It is as a direct result of this, indeed, that whether it be wholesome or unwholesome (kusala or akusala), merit or demerit, created over a long period in Saṃsāra, through them, conjuring up world after world, this being goes on in Saṃsāra for an infinite time.

Out of those ten, the first five are called the lower fetters (orambhāgiya-samyojana). They are all forces that pull downwards. There is a group of fetters that pull one down to the planes of misery (apāyas), to such lower realms of Bhava (Becoming). There is also a kind of fine thread that pulls one upwards, to the Brahma worlds. Thus, pulled by these, the being spends a long time in Saṃsāra.

The Buddha taught this vision regarding the fire. Now, the ordinary worldling is frightened by this vision of fire. But that monk did not merely rejoice in having escaped from the forest fire. Climbing up that rock, he did not just satisfy himself thinking, "Now I am safe from the forest fire." He reflected on the purpose for which he had come. To derive benefit from it, he turned that sight (dassana) into insight (vipassanā). Just as this fire goes on burning and burning everything it encounters, so indeed, as one goes deeper and deeper into the understanding that every part of saṅkhāras (Preparations / Formations / Volitional activity) caught by the insight knowledge is Anicca (Impermanent), subject to change, subject to fluctuation, subject to turning into another state—then, that very momentum is lost. That bond is destroyed.

So, what is the path of meditation that helps in this understanding? Next, the question is that there are various paths of meditation. Some people think: "When we just watch the mind as it goes, we can understand the state of this mind." They let the mind run as it runs. Letting it run, they think, "Someday it will be understood by us."

That is not the correct method. For that too, the Buddha has shown a simile, an extremely valuable simile. In fact, the more one thinks about it, the deeper it gets. The Buddha gives a simile as follows:

"Monks, suppose a certain man binds a snake with a very strong rope. He binds the snake tightly with a rope. Next, he binds a crocodile. Similarly, next, he binds a bird with a rope. He binds a dog with a similar rope. He binds a jackal with a similar rope. Next, he binds a monkey with a similar rope. Having bound those six, he joins those six ropes together and ties a knot. Tying a knot in the middle, he just lets them go. After letting them go, what happens? Those six pull in six different directions."

"The snake pulls toward its anthill, the crocodile pulls toward the water,
the bird pulls toward the sky,
the dog pulls toward the village,
the jackal pulls toward the cemetery,
the monkey pulls toward the forest.

They pull in six different directions. Now, imagine for a moment these six bound by these six ropes pulling. Next, the Buddha says: having pulled and pulled, getting exhausted—indeed, they would be pulling in each direction—after getting exhausted, whichever of these six animals is the strongest, all the others are pulled along according to that animal. Suppose all are overcome by the strength of the crocodile. Lo, the crocodile drags all of them into the water. Such is the simile given here. Next, just so, it is said there that those six animals have their own separate feeding grounds (visaya). Their feeding grounds are different. Whether they are feeding grounds or habitats, they are different. Therefore, they pull toward those sides. What is this simile given for? This is said about those six āyatanas (sense-bases). The eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind. These are given as the similes for them. But the simile does not end there. That is what happens when they are dragged along."

In short, that simile is shown to demonstrate the difference between the lack of sense restraint (indriya-asamvara) and sense restraint (indriya-samvara). That simile mentioned above is about the lack of sense restraint. If they are just let go, bound by a knot in the middle, in the end, pulling this way and that, someone wins. They are dragged along that path. If one just watches the mind, that is exactly what happens. Next, the Buddha says there, that is the state of one who has not developed mindfulness directed to the body (kāyagatāsati). If someone has not developed kāyagatāsati, the functioning of those six āyatanas of that person is shown by that simile.

Next, He shows the simile regarding the restraint developed through that by one who has developed mindfulness directed to the body (kāyagatāsati). That too carries forward that same simile to some extent. Suppose someone binds a snake with a rope in the same way. A crocodile, a bird, a dog, a jackal, and a monkey. Instead of tying a knot in the middle of those six ropes, what does he do? He binds them to a very strong post. He binds them to a very strong post. Then, those six pull and pull and pull. They pull until they are exhausted. Having pulled, what do they do? All six come and lie down, leaning against the post. A few beautiful words are used there. That is, having come to the post and leaning against it, all six lie down exhausted. Now, imagine the difference. What is spoken of there is indeed sense restraint (indriya-saṁvara).

Thus, the Buddha shows: according to that second simile, such is the state of the person who has developed mindfulness directed to the body (kāyagatāsati). Whichever way those senses pull, in the end, they come and stop near the post of the meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna).

That is why, meritorious friends, the method of letting the mind go in the manner mentioned earlier, giving room to whatever thoughts that arise, and thinking "someday an understanding will come to us"—that is the method I mentioned at the beginning. Instead of that, what the Buddha points out is this kāyagatāsati. In short, there are numerous meditations that fall under kāyagatāsati. Generally, we speak of the thirty-two impure parts of the body. Apart from that, in some places, even the ten kinds of foulness (asubha) showing the nature of the body can be included in kāyagatāsati. Whichever it may be, there must be a certain stability. Consider the difference here. There must be a certain stability.

To restrain this scattering mind, the mind that tends to scatter through the senses, some meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna) is necessary. Even the word kammaṭṭhāna—since the meaning of old words is not well understood these days, we have sometimes translated it into modern Sinhala. If kamma means 'work', and ṭhāna means 'place' or 'ground', then kammaṭṭhāna means a workplace, a spiritual workplace. A person who has no workplace, no work, no job, is a vagrant, isn't he? In contrast, the person who has a workplace thinks about the workplace, focuses his mind on the workplace, and goes to the workplace. Just so, the workplace belonging to the practicing yogi working for Nibbāna is the kammaṭṭhāna, kāyagatāsati. Thus, for the one who has developed kāyagatāsati, the ability to establish that very sense restraint we spoke of is what the Buddha shows here through this profound simile. I called it profound because its meaning is deep, but on examination, it is simple. What is shown by the simile of those six animals is the eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind. Many people talk about the five senses these days. Some try to limit it to five to make it easy. In some countries, ordinary people take "senses" to mean only these five senses—the five sense-faculties. The unique feature of Buddhist philosophy is the teaching of six senses—not five, but six. Therefore, the mind cannot be left out. It is in the mind, indeed, that everything is deposited. To what extent? There too, on one occasion, the Buddha gives a simile, a fitting simile:

"The five sense-faculties, namely the eye, ear, nose, tongue, and body, consume what is corresponding to them.

The eye consumes forms, the ear consumes sounds.

The eye does not consume sounds, does it? Each has its own distinct feeding grounds. The nose consumes smells. But all that is consumed is brought and deposited in the mind-faculty (manindriya) in the middle. Everything comes and gathers in the mind. Then, if we have spent an infinite period of time in this Samsāra, the perceptions (saññā), the subtle perceptions of all those experiences—that which is indicated by various subtle words like āsava (cankers) and Anusaya (Underlying tendency)—are embedded within our Viññāṇa (Consciousness). They are embedded in our mind; they are embedded in our intellect. So, that indeed is the most subtle bond. It revolves between the mind and mind-objects, between thought and thoughts. Thus, when looking at them as faculties, or as bases (āyatana), there are six here according to Buddhist philosophy. Therefore, this problem cannot be solved by limiting it to five. Some try to take only those five existing in the world and escape through them. It is not that easy. The most subtle is this mind. What has been received from the others over an infinite time, having consumed those respective preys, all the levels of perceptions obtained from them—the anusayas (Latency / Underlying tendencies), etc.—have come and deposited in the mind. The mind, in that respect, is extremely subtle. That is why the mind is said to be the forerunner of all things: 'Manopubbaṅgamā...'

Finally, there is a wondrous revolution among those thoughts. To understand all this, one must bring that very perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā) here in the manner mentioned regarding the body. Instead of the perception of permanence (nicca-saññā) held so far regarding the eye and forms, the ear and sounds, and everything else, one must direct one's attention (manasikāra) so that the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā) is developed. It is through that mismanagement, indeed, that lack of restraint arises. If proper management is done regarding these sense-bases (āyatana), then gradually—when speaking of those insight knowledges (vipassanā-ñāṇa), and you may have heard of this—if we explain this Anicca (Impermanent) in more detail, it means arising and passing away. It is called udayabbaya (arising and passing away). A multitude of arisings and passings away. In the entire world, there is only arising and passing away. It is not visible due to that perception of compactness (ghana-saññā). The perception of compactness means the perception of permanence. To the deluded person covered in ignorance, who looks at the world believing everything is permanent, the feeling comes that all these things exist. He says even this bodily cage exists. Form exists, sound exists. He has that feeling. But by applying mindfulness and clear comprehension (sati-sampajañña) deeply, and reflecting on each of them with concentration (samādhi), at some point, one realizes that there is only a multitude of fluctuations here. Just as we said about the motion picture, a multitude of fluctuations. Subtle fluctuations—there is nothing in this to be taken as permanent anywhere. Inside, there is a multitude of fluctuations; outside, there is also a multitude of fluctuations. It is because of our ignorance (avijjā) that we separate them as "eye" and "form". Every single one of them changes moment by moment. That is why the Buddha gives various similes like a mirage. Every single one of them changes moment by moment. But due to ignorance—due to the ignorance bound over a long period—beings of the world hold tightly to all of them with the perception of compactness. Through that, indeed, as a result, they start to rub together and catch fire in that manner. When this understanding comes, lo, one understands in some way that there is only a pure heap of fire here, and nothing to be separated.

So, the path leading to that is what we called the kammaṭṭhāna (meditation subject). A means to settle the mind. It is like the post we mentioned earlier. When an ox is tied to a post near a field or a meadow, no matter how much the ox pulls, it cannot pull away to the other field, can it? It comes back and lies down right there. That is what is written in the books about the kammaṭṭhāna. The kammaṭṭhāna is sometimes shown as a post. That post helps as a stable point to tame that running mind. When a wild bull runs, if one hangs onto its tail without any foothold (leverage), one has to face a great disaster. Some foothold (leverage/momentum) is necessary. That foothold is indeed concentration (samādhi). One must make an effort to concentrate the mind. A certain kammaṭṭhāna helps in that.

Be it some part of that body—hair of the head, hair of the body, nails, teeth, and so forth—or else a state of foulness (asubha) like a bloated corpse, one must try to bring the mind to it as a kammaṭṭhāna (meditation subject) whenever it runs away. It is only then, in the manner mentioned in that second simile, that those six animals run this way and that, and having run and run and got exhausted, in the end, they somehow come right to the foot of the post, lie down, and settle. Otherwise, what happens is that, as in the first case, if they are let go with just a knot tied, running this way and that, the strongest one—if the eye is the strongest—will in the end go toward that. When there is a multitude of such temptations, a person, falling under some temptation according to his temperament, in the end destroys his own spiritual practice. Instead of that, the Buddha declares: "This is the method. For concentration (samādhi), a certain kammaṭṭhāna is necessary." Therefore, practically, we must understand through this talk we have made, that according to the Buddha's vision, there is nothing permanent here. There is nothing to be taken as permanent. The perception of permanence (nicca-saññā) exists in the worldling only because of ignorance (avijjā). In a highly dangerous manner in this world, because of being limited for so long, worldlings have separated things in this way as "two" (dyad).

But when looking at this from all sides, even looking from within, what are present are only the four elements (dhātus). Not only the Buddha, but also Ven. Sāriputta Maha Thera points out that what is inside is also the earth element (pathavī-dhātu). What is present in things like the eye, ear, and nose is also the earth element. What is present in the external world is also the earth element. This body is something constructed from the four elements of earth (pathavī), water (āpo), fire (tejo), and wind (vāyo). Similarly, what is present externally is also those four. But through this, because of that ignorance (avijjā), because of that Taṇhā (Craving)—which is why it is called craving and Upādāna (Grasping)—it is the momentum taken through Taṇhā that is present here. Due to the force of craving developed in this Saṃsāra over an infinite time, the being takes a certain momentum. That is why one grasped tightly (upādāna) to this body that is inside, spiritually speaking. It is to keep this body alive, indeed, that we use all these things to assist us.

Now, when looking at the lives of animals, every animal goes in search of prey. That prey, even alive, is put inside—inside the body. Now, that is not limited only to animals; we can say it is the same even for human beings. Even alive, they put it inside. Why? Because of the attachment to this body which has been tightly grasped (upādāna). It is this that we carry through Saṃsāra for a long period of time. So, the Buddha points out that this is precisely what has to be broken: this momentum taken through Taṇhā (Craving). It is as a result of that momentum, indeed, that each Bhava (Becoming) is created for us. This is what is meant by creating a Bhava through our thoughts.

Now, we spoke of Dukkha-sacca (the truth of suffering/unsatisfactoriness/stress) by comparing it to a pure fire. Then it becomes clear to us that what lies beneath it is Taṇhā (Craving). It is to that very Taṇhā that the term chandarāga was used—the attachment following desire. To put it in another word, it is Taṇhā. Then, as long as that Taṇhā exists, due to that strong Upādāna (Grasping), the worldly being holds tightly to some portion of those four elements. Now, we treat our human body as a great thing, casting it in this way, renovating it, piecing together parts, and trying to keep it alive for a long time—trying to keep it from dying. Similarly, other living beings prey on others to maintain their tightly-held bodies. But due to the multitude of mental impulses generated through that, as a result, more and more Bhava (Becoming) are created. That is the nature of Saṃsāra.

So, the only way to escape from this dangerous Bhava is to burn down, with the insight knowledge itself, those two trees that assisted that fire. It was because of the friction of those two trees, indeed, that all this happened. They rubbed together because of holding to the perception of permanence (nicca-saññā). For that, in vipassanā (insight), the perception of compactness (ghana-saññā) is dismantled. What should be present next in the practicing yogi is the perception of a heap (rāsi-saññā). What is called "the perception of compactness" is like taking a heap of mud, gluing it together with the sap of Taṇhā (Craving), and making a lump or ball out of it. The perception of a heap (rāsi-saññā) is, let us say, like the situation in a desert. Now, with a heap of mud, we can take a lump of mud in our hand and make something like a ball. But in a desert, if the sand of the desert is completely dry—as it is said in ancient books: "A handful of sand grasped in the fist does not remain." If one takes a handful of sand, it does not remain in the fist. It just flows away. Why? That is a heap (rāsi). It exists there as a collection. But in the world, because of that Taṇhā, we roll everything together in that manner and take it as "one", as "compact". That is what is called the perception of compactness (ghana-saññā). The perception of a heap (rāsi-saññā) means that the insight meditator begins to understand everything he looks at in a subtle manner.

A "mat"—we take it as one thing. The mind gets bound to its pattern. But to the insight meditator, a unique understanding comes: "This is not a mat; here is something that deceives through a pattern." It makes one take it as one, but in truth, if looking at it from one level, here is only a heap of rushes running this way and that. There is only a heap of rushes here—a heap (rāsi). When we make this heap according to some form, according to a pattern, we take it to be "a mat". Not only do we take it as a mat, but if that mat is stolen, because of that, because of its loss, one even generates anger through Taṇhā (Craving). Because of taking it as one, one generates strong craving. To the insight meditator, it begins to be understood that there is no "one" here. Here is a heap. Just as was said about that mat, so indeed is one's own interior—the interior is exactly the same. Let alone other things, it is shown there that because that continuity (santati) is seen as a group, sometimes the object taken is seen as one. Even that process is seen as one. The worldling takes every single one of them as "one"—"going," "coming," every single one. But keeping mindfulness according to mindfulness and clear comprehension (sati-sampajañña), one gradually realizes that, let alone other things, even in what we take as "in-breathing"—which we take as two—in-breathing is also a great process. A process is what is present there. A heap of breath-ripples. A heap of breath-ripples goes up; a heap of breath-ripples goes down. Now, when an old person lifts something heavy, he does it trembling, doesn't he? There is a multitude of fluctuations there, isn't there? Imagine it like that. Then, just so, in our process too, such a perception of compactness (ghana-saññā) operates. "I went," "I came"—we take every single one of them as "one".

But to the insight meditator, it is gradually understood that within every single one of these, what are present are saṅkhāras (Preparations / Formations / Volitional activity). That indeed is what is called saṅkhāras. A heap of saṅkhāras. A heap of preparations. It is indeed through a heap of preparations that even a motion picture is produced, isn't it? Through a heap of preparations. The person who is deluded on seeing that motion picture has no understanding of this. Here are the beautiful dances of actors and actresses. Our minds are tempted by them. But in the end, when we look, what is done by that machine is the creation of a certain illusion (hypnosis). It creates a certain illusion by running a multitude of pictures rapidly. Lo, if one takes the perception of compactness (ghana-saññā) there too, within that process... in that same way, in our actions too, we have a habit of taking things that become our objects as compact. Because of Taṇhā (Craving), because of desire, this appears and is understood by us as "one". Just as that deer took that shimmering mirage to be water.

That is why the Buddha declared every single one of these to be a mirage. Be it the perception (saññā) seen by the eye! Or the perception taken by the ear—sound, music. What we take as "music"—sometimes it could be extremely sweet music. If, due to some fault in that machine, or else as there are new methods now, if that tape is run slowly, even the most delightful music of the most talented singer in the world in the end becomes a wailing, a crying. That is why the Buddha called singing a wailing. In truth, that is what is present there. Similarly with dancing. Even dancing, even drama, is a madness. It is said to be like jumping about in madness. Here, there is a multitude of fluctuations in everything. But to the person who sees, who watches these with lust (rāga) or hatred (dosa), these become "one", "a thing". So, he conjures up in his mind: "That is a dance." It is because of the delusion (moha) arising in the mind that every single one of these appears as "one". Then, gradually going toward that very understanding is what the Buddha points out here.

If at any point that perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā) goes deep, everything is finished there. Sensual lust (kāmarāga) is finished; lust for existence (bhavarāga) is finished; ignorance (avijjā) is finished. In this manner, the Buddha has pointed out the value of the perception of impermanence in an extremely powerful way: "Monks, in one who has developed the perception of impermanence deeply, when developed, it uproots all sensual lust, then lust for existence, and finally, completely destroys ignorance." In that manner, the Buddha has declared regarding the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā). Then, it is according to that perception of impermanence that perception arises: "Yadaniccaṃ taṃ dukkhaṃ"—whatever is Anicca (Impermanent) is Dukkha (Suffering). If this is a heap of saṅkhāras (Preparations / Formations / Volitional activity), a heap of preparations, if it is something that must be repaired constantly, when reflecting on this bodily cage, that indeed is what the practicing yogi feels. As the mind is applied more and more to the effort taken to look after this, every single thing—the fate of the food consumed, the fate of the water drunk—how every single one of them goes on decaying, that very fluctuating, decaying manner begins to become manifest. He sees that same state even regarding those things in the external world that he is attached to. It is then, indeed, just as was said, "When a heap of firewood has caught fire," that the understanding comes: "This is purely a heap of Dukkha." It is right there that the First Truth of the Four Noble Truths is correctly understood.

At the stage when insight knowledges (vipassanā-ñāṇa) mature, starting from arising and passing away (udayabbaya), then dissolution (bhaṅga), fear (bhaya), and disadvantage (ādīnava) are shown as a system of insight knowledges. In that manner, after seeing a multitude of arisings and passings away, next, dissolution is seen. It is seen clearly. It is called the knowledge of dissolution (bhaṅga-ñāṇa)—seeing everything dissolving everywhere. It goes on breaking down. Because of that, a fear arises—a wondrous kind of fear (bhaya-tuppaṭṭhāna-ñāṇa). "In all of this, there is nothing to hold onto. Everything breaks down right where it is grasped." Because of that fear, next, the disadvantage is understood. "What is this? This is an extremely dangerous place—this Samsāra." It is called the knowledge of disadvantage (ādīnavānupassanā-ñāṇa). Next, because of the disadvantage, a weariness toward Saṃsāra called nibbidā (disenchantment/revulsion) arises. "I must escape from this somehow." These arise very rapidly. Because of that disenchantment, next, one looks: "Where do I escape? Which way do I escape?" (muñcitukamyatā-ñāṇa). Lo, next, what helps in that is developing even more deeply those perceptions of impermanence (Anicca) and non-self (Anattā) given by the Buddha. Thus, indeed, through a system of insight knowledges that gradually advance, one gains the ability to cross over from Bhava (Becoming) which we mentioned at the beginning. So, this is the story from the beginning to the end.

What are called saṃyojanas—the ten saṃyojanas (fettors) mentioned—are broken later on, as a result of that. However, what we have to do fundamentally is, regarding those sense-bases (āyatanas) we mentioned, to understand those saṃyojanas related to our six sense-bases, and with the help of those similes we mentioned, using sense restraint and so forth to support us, and using the kammaṭṭhāna (meditation subject) to support us, if we develop our meditation, then that message of crossing over from Bhava (Becoming) given by the Buddha on a Vesak Poya day like this can indeed be understood.

Usually, on a Vesak day, we are accustomed to hearing mostly sermons that speak only of the biography of the Buddha, developing only devotion (saddhā). But we thought on this occasion, now, more and more, Nibbāna is being hidden. The deepest part of this Buddha Sasana is slipping away more and more. Therefore, on this valuable Poya day, we give this message of crossing over from Bhava (Becoming)—which the Buddha brought forth through His knowledge of supreme enlightenment—to these meritorious friends on this occasion in these few words.

Therefore, may the mass of merit accumulated by these meritorious friends through listening to the Dhamma so far, and likewise by establishing themselves in high virtue (sīla) and practicing meditation, serve as a support (upanissaya) to further develop those insight (vipassanā) powers developed by them throughout Saṃsāra, and to realize the supreme, deathless Great Nibbāna as quickly as possible through the penetration of the paths and fruits of Sotāpanna, Sakadāgāmi, Anāgāmi, and Arahāt.

Similarly, may whatever beings there are, from the Avīci hell up to the Akaniṭṭha Brahma realm—including the departed relatives of these meritorious friends—who expect to share in the merit of listening to the Dhamma or of this Dhamma preaching, by sharing in this merit, realize the supreme, deathless Great Nibbāna as quickly as possible, in accordance with their aspirations. May you aspire thus. Now, let us share the merit by reciting the stanzas in this manner.

Tameva bālaṃ pacceṭi pāpaṃ, sukhumo rajo paṭivātaṃva khitto.*

From:

Verse 125 from the Pāpavagga (Chapter on Evil) of the Dhammapada

Dear Listeners,

For you, devotees, who have begun a new year according to the calendar system of the modern world, this Duruthu Poya day can also be made an opportunity to renew your minds. Due to wonderful scientific products, we see the environment around us being renewed day by day. We are granted the opportunity to use newer and newer consumer goods and items. Even though, in terms of material development, a modern era seems to be dawning day by day, on the other hand, when you look at this country and the world with the eye of wisdom, you may see that we are reverting very rapidly towards a barbaric age. This is an era in which human slaughter and animal slaughter, committed in the most cruel manner, are treated as minor things. For such an era, as a fitting Dhamma sermon, both the stanza we have taken as our theme today and its background story demonstrate the perilous aspect of that course of action.

The Buddha preached this thematic stanza at the Jetavana monastery due to an incident involving a hunter-with-dogs named Koka. One morning, this hunter named Koka set out into the forest for hunting with a pack of dogs. On his way, he met a member of the Saṅgha, a Bhikkhu, walking for alms. This hunter thought, "I have seen an unlucky wretch; now, today, I will not catch any game," and entering the forest, conceived anger and ill-will in his mind. Later, when that monk, having collected his alms and consumed his meal, was returning to the monastery, this hunter, having roamed all over the forest without getting any game, was coming out. On the way, he met this monk once again. Enraged, he thought, "I met this person in the morning. Because of that, I got nothing today. Now I have met him again. I must have him eaten by the dogs," and prepared to set the dogs on him. The Bhikkhu said, "Lay devotee, do not do that." But despite his saying so, this man said, "I met you when setting out today. I meet you now as well. Because of this bad luck, because of an unlucky wretch like you, I got nothing today. I will have you eaten by these dogs," and he set the dogs upon him.

This monk climbed a nearby tree. Even though he climbed it, according to a disciplinary rule of the Buddha, it is preached that climbing trees is not suitable for monks, being designated as an offense (āpatti). However, when chased by wild beasts, permission is given to climb a tree to the height of a man. Accordingly, this monk, without climbing to the very top of the tree, climbed to the height of a man. While he was sitting on a branch, that hunter-with-dogs came and said, "You will not get away like that," surrounded by his dogs. This man pricked the sole of the monk's foot with his arrow. When the monk pulled that leg up and lowered the other leg, he pricked that one too. In this manner, he began to prick his feet. The monk felt unspeakable feeling/sensation (vedanā) of pain, and because of this, without his realizing it, his robe slipped off and fell. The robe fell right on top of the hunter, covering his head. These dogs, thinking "This monk has fallen down," crawled inside the robe and ate up their own master. Having eaten him and leaving only the bones, as the dogs were coming out, that Bhikkhu broke a dry twig from the tree and threw it towards the dogs. When the dogs looked up, there was the monk. So they realized, "It is our own master we have eaten," and ran off into the forest.

A doubt arose in this monk: "Was it not because of the falling of my robe that this person lost his life? Did my virtue (sīla) become stained? Is my monkhood still intact?" Having thus developed a disciplinary doubt, the monk went to the Buddha and related the incident from the very beginning. "Was my virtue stained by this? Was it not because of my robe that this harm befell this man?" The Blessed One declared, "No, monk, nothing happened to your virtue. Your monkhood is also pure. That man, by harboring hatred towards someone who was free from hatred, experienced the result (vipāka) of it. Not only now, but in the past too, a similar incident happened to this person." Thus, drawing upon a story of the past, the Buddha spoke.

In the past, this person was a certain physician. Having been born as a physician, he went from village to village to cure patients if there were any, and to earn something by curing them. On one such day, not a single patient came forward. So, as this man was leaving the village hungry without any business, he saw some children playing near the village entrance. In the hollow of a nearby tree, a snake was sticking its head out. This man thought—this physician thought—"Now, the only small job I can do is to make this snake bite one of these children, and then by treating it, earn some money." So he said to those children, "Children, look, there is a common myna chick in this tree hollow. Catch it!" One of those children went and grabbed the snake by its neck, and upon realizing it was a snake, ran back and threw it right onto the physician's body. That snake bit him, and the physician met his death. That is the story. The Buddha declared that in the past too, this man got into trouble by trying to harm innocent people in that manner. Then, he uttered the thematic stanza:

Yo appadutṭhassa narassa dussati...

If anyone harbors hatred towards a person, a human being, who has no hatred, is pure and defilement-free—or in other words, is innocent—that evil recoils upon that very person. How? Just like fine dust thrown against the wind comes back to oneself. Just as throwing dust against the wind strikes one's own eyes, the fruit/result (vipāka) of the evil deed one committed comes back to oneself. With this simile, the Buddha briefly revealed the perilous side of evil actions on that occasion. It is recorded that upon hearing this Dhamma sermon, that monk also attained Arahantship.

This is the story. Even from this short narrative, we can extract certain points. Now, to that hunter-with-dogs, the sight of a monk walking for alms (piṇḍapāta) appeared as the sight of an unlucky wretch. This must be because of his living such a barbaric life. But not only in those days, even today there is a wrong view among some Buddhists that seeing a monk in the morning is an inauspicious sight. And so, because that hunter had conceived hatred, the second time, as if seeking revenge, he set the dogs to bite that innocent monk. Subsequently, in exact accordance with the simile declared by the Buddha, he himself was eaten up by the dogs he had set on. That incident shows us, in a somewhat dramatic manner, how this karma (kamma) recoils. The result (vipāka) of some cruel deeds recoils in a wonderfully dramatic way. Something of that nature happened here as well. In the end, he was eaten up by the very dogs he had set on. Such is the story of the hunter.

Turning to the other side and looking at the tree, we see the noble conduct of this monk—even in the face of danger, he did not violate the disciplinary rule according to the word of the Buddha. He did not climb to the very top of the tree. Likewise, he harbored no hatred towards the man who was piercing the soles of his feet. Had he conceived such hatred, when disaster befell that man, he might have rejoiced—as some people do nowadays—saying, "Serves him right! What you do to others comes back to you." Instead, this monk developed a remorseful doubt: "Alas, was it not because of my robe that this harm befell this man through me? Therefore, perhaps my virtue (sīla) too has become stained." This is a wonderful example for us in this day and age. This robe, which the Buddha has designated as the banner of Arahantship, is a symbol of non-violence. It is not a flag of violence. Thus we see from this story that the monk, in safeguarding those virtuous qualities, lived with a mind of loving-kindness (mettā), wishing that no harm should come to anyone even by his robe that had slipped and fallen. And so, it must be due to that rich store of virtue, and perhaps by understanding the nature of saṃsāra through the pain (vedanā) he experienced, that he is said to have attained Arahantship by the end of that sermon. In everything, when examined with wisdom, there is contained the story of this suffering of saṃsāra (saṃsāra-dukkha).

Just as we extracted those points from the story, let us next look at the concept of karma (kamma) that the Buddha indeed conveys through the stanza. Why is this era, as we mentioned earlier, reverting back to a barbaric age? A primary reason is the lack of a proper understanding of the natural law of karma (kamma) even among Buddhists. A lack of conviction in it, a lack of faith (saddhā). Even foreigners, Westerners—that is, even those who speak of a world created by God, which is called theistic creationism—are awakening to the doctrine of karma based on various psychological factors, yet at such a time, our own Buddhists have made it a fashion to disbelieve this. Doubting this, asking: "How do these results (vipāka) come back to oneself?" and so forth. However, the Buddha has analyzed this on various occasions, specifically, the fruit of karma (kamma-vipāka). In this context, it is called "experienced in this very life" (diṭṭhadhammavedanīya). In other words, it had to be experienced in this world itself. Even in these times, though unpublicized, we occasionally hear of such incidents—that those who commit murder or slaughter in the most cruel manner receive, for some reason, wondrous results (vipāka) in a dramatic fashion. But it does not end there. It stretches far. For many births (jāti), many lifetimes, those results (vipāka) have to be experienced.

As the general natural law concerning this, the Buddha has briefly shown how this karma (kamma) yields results over time. You devotees also may have heard that karma ripens over time in three ways: as diṭṭhadhammavedanīya (to be experienced in this very life), upapajjavedanīya (to be experienced on rebirth), and aparāpariyavedanīya (to be experienced in subsequent lifetimes). When we speak of a karma and its result (vipāka), the word vipāka carries the meaning of ripening. Karma ripens with time, just like a tree matures and bears fruit. Such a ripening occurs. The basic principles regarding this have been briefly pointed out. Here, diṭṭhadhammavedanīya means that certain karmas yield results in this very life. There are other karmas that yield results in the next life, or in other words, bring about rebirth/reconnection (paṭisandhi) in the next existence. And there are still other karmas that yield results not in the next existence, but in any existence thereafter, across a multitude of future lifetimes. Thus, the Buddha has briefly indicated the ways in which they ripen and must be experienced as diṭṭhadhammavedanīya, upapajjavedanīya, and aparāpariyavedanīya.

There are Sutta discourses in various places through which one can gain a more subtle or deeper understanding of this. On one occasion, the Buddha delivered a discourse to the monks conveying the idea that this karma (kamma) is not a form of determinism (niyati-vāda). "Monks, if anyone were to say: 'In whatever way a man performs a karma, in that very same way must he experience its result (vipāka),' if one were to say so absolutely, then this path of practice for Nibbāna, this holy life (brahmacariya), could never be successfully lived, and there would be no ending of suffering (dukkha)." That means we have committed so many evil deeds in saṃsāra. If we were to think of attaining Nibbāna only after paying back the results (vipāka) for each and every one of them in the exact same way, it would be something that could never be done. That is what the Buddha points out here. While an unwholesome act (akusala) is said to be a karma leading to states of deprivation, one cannot say with absolute certainty that everyone who performs an unwholesome act will go to hell. There is a subtle dynamic in this.

The Buddha reveals that fact in this manner. First, the Buddha presents it like a riddle. In this world, a certain person commits a minor evil deed, a trifling evil deed, and goes to hell. Another person commits a trifling evil deed of the very same measure, but experiences its result (vipāka) mildly in this very life and gets away with it. That evil deed goes no further. The Buddha himself then explains why this happens. Regarding the first person mentioned—that is, the one who commits a minor evil deed and goes to hell—his life is described thus: that person does not develop virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), or wisdom (paññā). He does not develop his mind; he does not cultivate wisdom. Furthermore, that person's mind is very narrow. He is described as one of "small self" (appātumo); his life is one nourished by extremely narrow views. Because of this, even if he commits a minor evil deed, he has to go to hell. Regarding the person who gets away by experiencing the minor evil deed triflingly in this very life, it is said that he is a person of great stature (mahātma) who develops virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). For such a person, that force of karma does not affect him severely. It is then that the Buddha presents the simile. It is a valuable simile, easy for anyone to remember.

He asks it in order to get an answer from the monks: "If someone were to dissolve a lump of salt in a small cup or bowl of water, would that water become salty? To the extent that it is undrinkable?" The monks reply, "Yes, Venerable Sir. What is the reason for that? The water in that small vessel is very little." Then: "If that very same lump of salt were dissolved in the River Ganges, and one tasted that water, would there be a salty taste?" "No, Venerable Sir. What is the reason for that? The water in that river is abundant; the volume of water is vast." That simile is shown: just as mentioned before, a person who commits a minor evil deed, but whose mind is undeveloped, who has a narrow mind, and who does not cultivate virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā), has to experience the result (vipāka) of that evil deed severely in hell. But a person of great stature (mahātma) who leads a good life and develops virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā) can experience that same evil deed mildly in this very life and put an end to it there. So there is a distinction of persons here. There is a difference in how the result (vipāka) is experienced. Therefore, the Buddha declares that there is no rule saying that when you commit karma in a certain way, it must be experienced in that exact same way. There is a certain specific natural law regarding the manner of experiencing them, regarding the experience itself. It can vary depending on the individuals and due to other different causes.

Now, to put it briefly, if we take the example of a tree: when a certain seed is planted, a tree grows. But if you fertilize it well before the tree bears fruit, behold, the yield will be abundant. If you reduce the fertilizer, or arrange it so that it cannot bear fruit, the yield decreases. Its yield increases if fertilizer is added, and decreases if fertilizer is reduced. Similarly here, even though one has committed that evil deed, because one leads a good life, the results (vipāka) of the evil deed are worn away. Through this, the Buddha highlights a certain relief, a relief for the world regarding escape from this karma. Furthermore, he did not stop there. The Buddha gives two more similes to make this point even more convincing.

Now, when fined a small amount, even half a Kahāpaṇa, a Kahāpaṇa, or a hundred Kahāpaṇas, a certain person, being unable to pay that Kahāpaṇa or hundred Kahāpaṇas, has to suffer imprisonment and go to jail because he cannot pay that small fine. But another person, when fined in that manner, does not go to jail; he gets away with it. The Buddha points out the reason for this: the first person mentioned is poor and has no assets, so when he is fined, he goes to jail because he cannot pay it. But the wealthy person can escape the jail. It is just like that there too. That is the second simile. He gives a third simile as well.

A certain person steals a sheep belonging to a sheep-owner. Sometimes, that sheep-owner can beat up, insult, and snatch it back from the thief, or even kill him. But when some other person steals, the owner cannot adopt such a harsh approach and recover the sheep. The reason shown there is: if the person who stole the sheep is a poor man, an ordinary person, the owner can beat him, abuse him, sue him, or have him sent to prison, and thereby recover his lost sheep. But if the thief is a wealthy person like a king or a royal minister, the owner has to clasp his hands in worship and entreat him, saying, "Alas, please give me this sheep or its value." There too, what is shown is that state of great power (mahesakka). For the person of lesser power (alpesakka)—and we do not use this term alpesakka in a mundane sense, or in the sense understood by ordinary worldly people. Rather, for a person who is of "lesser power" (alpesakka) in terms of meritorious deeds, virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā), the results (vipāka) of evil deeds have to be suffered severely. But for the person of "great power" (mahesakka), the true person of great stature (mahātma)—nowadays, we call everyone "gentleman" (mahattayā), but the Buddha used the term mahattā for the one who develops virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). The word mahattā is applied there. That is what we called mahātma. Therefore, to be a true gentleman, one must cultivate virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). It is for such gentlemen that the evil deed is worn away mildly, because it is like "the water of the River Ganges."

What is the message given to the world through this? This karma is not a form of determinism (niyati-vāda). In the interval between karma and its result (vipāka), one can do something to escape from it. That is why there is an escape from this saṃsāra. This is an extremely valuable fact. Why does the Buddha point this out? In those days, there were certain teachers who proclaimed such deterministic views. Likewise, some firmly declared that if someone commits an evil deed, he must definitely pay it back in that exact same way. The Buddha points out the reason for their saying so. Sometimes, those teachers would see a person who had spent his life badly being reborn in a heavenly world. And they would see a person who had led a good life being reborn in hell. That teacher sees this. When someone develops the divine eye—that is, one who has attained direct knowledge (abhiññā)—he can see such an occurrence. A certain person spends this life badly, yet goes to a heavenly world. What is meant by "badly" is a person who lives in a bad way, committing the ten unwholesome courses of action (dasa-akusala): killing living beings, taking what is not given, sexual misconduct, false speech, malicious speech, harsh speech, gossip/frivolous talk, and furthermore, covetousness (abhijjhā), ill-will (vyāpāda) which means hatred, and wrong view (micchā-diṭṭhi). Yet, he goes and is reborn in a good place. The Buddha presents this as a kind of riddle. Some people who lead a bad life in that manner go to hell, while others go to heaven. Next, there are also two sides to the one who led a good life. A certain person leads a good life; as far as the world can see, he led a good life. Yet, he is reborn in hell. Even nowadays, many people present this as an argument, saying: "We lead good lives; why does this happen to us?"

Then, the Buddha shows that the Buddha-knowledge penetrated the depth of this. It understood its subtle aspect. The Buddha points out that, regardless of how some people argue, why is it that someone who was committing the ten unwholesome deeds (dasa-akusala) goes and is reborn in a heavenly world in the next life? He shows the reason: either prior to that he had performed wholesome karmas (kusala-kamma), or subsequently he performed wholesome karmas, or at the near-death moment. Now, let us think: the one who lived badly had performed wholesome deeds either before, or performs wholesome deeds afterwards. Or, at the moment of death, he aligns his mind in accordance with right view (sammā-diṭṭhi). It is because of that difference that even though his daily life was spent in that manner, particularly due to that difference at the near-death moment, he goes and is reborn in a happy destination (sugati). But nevertheless, someday the results (vipāka) of those unwholesome actions will have to be experienced, either in this life, in the next life, or in some future life. Greatly analyzed, the Buddha points it out in that way. It is not suitable to draw an absolute conclusion just by seeing a single such incident. The underlying natural law within it is visible only to the Buddha-eye. He also points out the other side of it. Why is it that someone who leads a good life—that is, who lives abstaining from the ten unwholesome actions (dasa-akusala)—even after leading such a life, goes to hell? That person might have done bad things prior to that. Or, he might commit unwholesome deeds afterwards. Or else, at that final moment, he falls into wrong view (micchā-diṭṭhi). It is due to such causes that things different from the general pattern occur regarding karma.

Through this, we have to realize that we are living in an ocean of karma. These are karmas gathered throughout saṃsāra over a vast period of time. It is impossible to finish paying back all of these. Instead, the Buddha points out the methods to suppress/neutralize the results (vipāka) of these karmas. That is what is called virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). It is precisely there that this matter becomes extremely important to us. Devotees, this karma is deposited in our consciousness (viññāṇa). These are karmas we have performed over a long period of time. They emerge from time to time through this consciousness (viññāṇa). This is what is called "karmic attraction." Even in these times, there are certain occurrences. A certain person feels inclined to go to a place where an accident is about to occur; the mind inclines, the mind tells him to go, and drives him there. There is a certain karmic attraction. These are done through this consciousness (viññāṇa); these emerge. This is not revealed only in such incidents. In every moment of our daily lives—in short—karmas emerge in our consciousness (viññāṇa) moment by moment. Then, when these karmas emerge, because the ordinary person—the worldling (puthujjana)—has that view of self, that view of existing group/body (sakkāya-diṭṭhi), firmly in place as "I" and "mine", he accumulates more and more karma through that very event. He entangles the ball of thread. That is why the Buddha declared that this saṃsāra is like an entangled ball of thread. The ordinary person does not know that this is a certain karma performed in the past. Let us say, for instance, it is the unwholesome deed of killing. Sometimes, the very person one killed comes forward in this life and tries to kill oneself. We do not think of that. Instead, thinking of it as something entirely new, we clash with that person and accumulate even more karma. So, it is in order to prevent such instances that the Buddha has introduced this virtue (sīla) here.

Within this virtue (sīla), there are certain resolutions made voluntarily and of one's own free will beforehand: "I shall not kill living beings, I shall not steal, I shall not engage in sexual misconduct, I shall not tell lies, I shall not consume intoxicants," and so on. And so, the forces of karma (kammāvega) related to these emerge through our consciousness (viññāṇa). For example, one who was engaged in them is inclined towards them as habitual tendencies of saṃsāra. The mind tells him to do it. A person accustomed to stealing—the reason some are drawn to stealing even from childhood—is a past habit, a habitual tendency of saṃsāra. But the Buddha tells us not to submit to it. The Buddha defines karma as intention (cetanā). We have pointed this out on many occasions. "Monks, intention is what I call karma" (cetanāhaṃ bhikkhave kammaṃ vadāmi) is a fact known to everyone. "Having intended, one performs karma through body, speech, and mind" (cetayitvā kammaṃ karoti kāyena vācāya manasā). The Buddha considers it as karma because it is according to intention (cetanā) that one subsequently directs the body, speech, and mind. It is through the three doors of body, speech, and mind that we accumulate karma. In the accumulation of those new karmas, past forces of karma (kammāvega) underlie and assist. They emerge as habitual tendencies of saṃsāra in everyone. For, even our birth (jāti) was brought about by a karma. Therefore, in short, like an ocean of karma, these bubble up and emerge. Due to the dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi), that person thinks of these emerging things as brand new events, saying, "This is my adversary," or "Here, I have found something to steal," and acts accordingly. That thought arose. Next, speech was employed in accordance with that thought. Then, action was performed in the same way. Through that, there occurs a further accumulation of karma—a new addition to that karma. Having accumulated, those too sink down into consciousness (viññāṇa). That is why no end is seen to this saṃsāra. The ordinary person entangles this ball of thread—the karmic ball of thread.

Then, the solution the Buddha gives for that is indeed those precepts of virtue (sīla-sikkhāpada). If one resolutely determines: "Under no circumstance shall I kill a living being; under no circumstance shall I steal," one makes such a resolution. One does not see that these forces of karma (kammāvega) lie underneath. Yet, one knows this. According to the word of the Buddha, one guards this practice. But nowadays, it is chosen merely as something done thinking only of society. But there is a greater depth here, in this undertaking of virtue (sīla-samādāna). This "society" is something to which one also belongs. Therefore, the natural law pointed out here by the Buddha goes much deeper. This is not just for the sake of society; the reason we have led uneven lives throughout this entire saṃsāra is due to the neglect of these five precepts of virtue (pañca-sīla). The Buddha brings this out particularly to give us the strength to control our own minds on occasions when such forces of karma (kammāvega) arise. Through that resolution, by placing wisdom in command, one can conquer it at the level of virtue (sīla). At the level of virtue, one can become of great power (mahesakka). One can become rich. The person who lacks that is indeed the "poor man" mentioned earlier. The similes mentioned earlier can now be brought close to this context. Or, the lump of salt can be brought close to this. It is the meaning of those similes given by the Buddha that we point out through these Dhamma analyses.

So, it can be conquered in that way at the level of virtue (sīla). Going even higher than that, if one frees oneself—even temporarily—from incoming objects by way of concentration (samādhi), and then concentrates the mind and remains in a state of concentration, not allowing it to run to defilements, at that moment, behold, the forces of karma are largely controlled. Even though they keep emerging, one does not submit to them. One does not yield to them, by virtue of that power of concentration (samādhi-sakti). It is like keeping them suppressed. What is pointed out even more deeply is indeed "wisdom" (paññā). The method of conquering these by seeing their true nature as impermanent (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and not-self (anattā) through the realization of the paths and fruits (magga-phala), and reflecting upon them, is what the Buddha ultimately points out—as both the path to Nibbāna and the path to the destruction of all karma. Reflecting on those thoughts exactly where they arise as impermanent (anicca), one lets them go. To put it briefly, one brings the mind to equanimity (upekkhā). Controlling those arising matters by bringing them to equanimity; that belongs to the side of insight (vipassanā). That is why it was said that the wealthy person, that "noble one" (mahātma), that "gentleman" (mahattayā) mentioned before, develops virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). That gentleman does not yield to those forces of karma (kammāvega). So, one can understand that aspect through this. Next, from another angle, the Buddha analyzes this in an extremely subtle manner. To state the analysis briefly: we said that a vast number of karmas are embedded in our mental continuum, in our consciousness (viññāṇa). In yielding their results (vipāka), these karmas influence one another in various ways.

Sometimes they support, sometimes they obstruct, and sometimes one strength is broken by another karma. There are terms that express these facts.

In short, first of all, the karma that yields birth (jāti) to a person is called janaka-kamma (productive karma). In these karmas, there is a force that brings about rebirth/reconnection (paṭisandhi) or birth (jāti). To bring about rebirth or birth for someone, sometimes even a wholesome thought (kusala-citta) which we consider minor might be the cause for gaining a human existence. Through that, it is granted. But although that birth has been granted, other relevant karmas—let us say another karma comes and joins as a support. That is called upatthambhaka-kamma (supportive karma). To support (upasthambhana) means to assist or help another thing. This exists on both sides, wholesome (kusala) and unwholesome (akusala)—that is, a category of karma that assists either a wholesome karma or an unwholesome karma. To illustrate with an example: by a certain productive karma (janaka-kamma) which brings about rebirth, a person might deserve to be born in a lower hell. But if another karma comes and joins it, giving it support, he will have to be born in a hell of even greater suffering (dukkha). Conversely, in the case of a wholesome karma, if another karma comes and joins as a support (upatthambhaka) to a productive karma (janaka-kamma) that allows birth in a lower heaven, he may be born in a higher heavenly world. Likewise, even after gaining that birth (jāti), that supportive karma can make a difference in the pleasure or pain (vedanā) experienced during the existence of those born aggregates (khandha). Let us say another karma comes: behold, now a person is born in a poor family due to some unwholesome deed. But events that bring pleasant results (vipāka) occur because another karma joins in, yielding pleasant results. If an animal gains an animal birth (jāti), it has to undergo suffering (dukkha). Yet, if a supportive karma (upatthambhaka-kamma) joins with it, it assists in yielding pleasant results in various ways. In this way, the supportive karma is described. Through this, it is shown that there are certain mutual relationships even among those karmas.

Next, there is another category of karma called upapīḷaka-kamma (obstructive/weakening karma), which weakens or reduces the strength of those karmas that yield birth. In that regard, one has to understand: if, for instance, one is born in a royal family, when that obstructive karma (upapīḷaka-kamma) arises, even in that royal clan he has to suffer painful results due to various oppressions, enemy threats, and so on. Likewise, looking at the opposite side, if another karma that weakens that strength arises for someone destined to be born in a hell of immense suffering, he may be born in a hell of lesser suffering. In any case, one has to understand that there are certain karmas that assist other karmas, others that obstruct them, and still other karmas that completely cut off the productive karma of birth at its very root. There are karmas that completely cut off the strength of that productive karma (janaka-kamma) which yields birth. This is called upaghātaka-kamma (destructive/destructive-cutting karma). It is shown... indeed, what is called "untimely death" (akāla-maraṇa) is precisely the instance where that destructive karma (upaghātaka-kamma) comes forward and completely cuts off a person's life. Now, when anyone dies at a young age, we call it an untimely death. Untimely death refers to those instances where a karma comes forward and cuts off life right from the point where birth was granted. This is not within the range of an ordinary person. It is those who have attained direct knowledge (abhiññā) who see its true nature. But such a state of affairs exists regarding these karmas. What we must understand is that knowing this supportive nature of karmas, as well as their obstructive or hindering nature, we must live in our existence (bhava) in such a way that the painful resulting strength of unwholesome karmas is broken. That is what we have to learn from this.

Some people, because they committed a certain unwholesome deed, spend their entire lives grieving over it. That is not what should be done. So that the result (vipāka) of that evil deed is diluted, one must strengthen oneself through virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā) as mentioned before. One must strive to become a person of great stature (mahātma). That is what the Buddha highlights for us through this doctrine of karma (kamma-vāda). Through the teachings on this, a certain relief is brought to light. Some treat this as a form of determinism (niyati-vāda), thinking that if someone kills an animal, he must absolutely go to hell. The Buddha does not say so either. The Buddha makes a middle statement. Killing living beings is indeed an unwholesome deed leading to states of deprivation, but if someone says that everyone who kills living beings must necessarily and inevitably go to hell, the Buddha does not accept that, because of the aforementioned reason. For, sometimes other karmas come and break the strength of that karma. Do not misunderstand this because of my saying so. Now, one might think: "Therefore, it does not matter how much we sin; let us try to escape from it by giving alms (dāna) occasionally." Do not mistake this. But what the Buddha is highlighting here is a certain natural law. Karmas performed over infinite time in this saṃsāra are embedded in our consciousness (viññāṇa). They emerge. So, the methods of reducing their resulting aspect are what the Buddha highlights here through those several similes. Based on this Dhamma analysis as well, what we must realize is that karmas operate mutually. In short, the doctrine of karma (kamma-vāda) is something that pertains to the law of cause and effect (hetu-phala-dhamma). This is not determinism (niyati-vāda). Precisely because of that, there is an escape from this for us.

In the past, the Nigaṇṭhas (Jains) of that time thought: "In order to escape from all these karmas, we must inflict pain on the body, thinking that karmas that cause pain and suffering (dukkha) are present in our consciousness (viññāṇa)." So, by inflicting endless pain and suffering, they tried to wear away those karmas. And having worn them away, they would remain without accumulating new karma. They thought that through such a way of living, they could escape from this saṃsāra and realize Nibbāna. The Buddha pointed out that it is a futile effort. If they were summoned and asked: "Through that physical torture you performed, by sleeping on thorns and various other torments inflicted on the body, how much of your karmas, your past karmas, have been worn away?" they cannot give a calculation, a census of it; they cannot give an answer. "How much has been worn away?" Then: "How much more karma is there left to be worn away?" They cannot answer that either. "After wearing away how much will you be freed from this?" They cannot answer that either. The Buddha declared to the Nigaṇṭhas on one occasion that if they cannot provide such accounts and calculations, then trying to wear away karma by inflicting pain on one's body in that manner is a futile effort.

Therefore, what we must understand is that the Buddha showed the way to escape from this wheel of karma through this wonderful path of Dhamma consisting of virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). Now, through virtue (sīla), at one level, without letting that emerging karmic impulse go to body and speech, one turns it into equanimity within the mind itself and escapes from there. Or else, without letting it go to the body and speech, one conquers it there through the concept of abstinence (virati)—the resolution of detachment. For, if body and speech are involved, it becomes a new karma. Let alone that, even in the mind, if it goes on operating for a long time, that too becomes a karma. Therefore, when such a situation arises, one recalls that training rule (sikkhāpada) and abstains from it by not engaging the body and speech. Next, in concentration (samādhi), it is an even higher level. When it comes to wisdom (paññā), finally, seeing their true nature: "Here is only a heap of preparations/formations (saṅkhāra). Here is no such thing as an 'I'. It is not something done by an 'I'." Seeing it as a heap of preparations/formations (saṅkhāra), and thereby developing equanimity (upekkhā), an attitude of neutrality in the mind, is how one escapes from that entanglement of karma.

It is in this manner that the Buddha has presented the analysis of this karma. We must understand these properly. In daily life, since a society has dawning where at least the five precepts (pañca-sīla) are not bowed to or respected—which is why we referred to it as a "barbaric age"—we must reflect with wisdom. We must be responsible for these. Some say: "Everything is not-self (anattā). Now, after being born in the next birth (jāti), do I know that 'it is indeed for the karmas I performed that I am suffering this'?" Whether one knows it or not, at the moment of experiencing those results (vipāka), one falls into grief, saying, "Alas, who is the one who did this?" In that case, we sometimes give the simile: when one unwittingly drinks poison, or consumes food, once it enters the body, one does not know that there might have been poison taken along with that food. It is only the physician who knows it, yet one has to suffer for it. Similarly, if poison is put into a well from which one drinks, when one drinks from it, one has to suffer the pain oneself. We must realize that our mental continuum is also like that. There is a resulting aspect to the things put into our mental continuum. Having ripened, it recoils. This is designated as the "round of results" (vipāka-vāra). The rounds of results (vipāka-vāra) spin round and round in this consciousness (viññāṇa) in a wondrous way over a long period in saṃsāra. As recorded in some Dhamma stories, sometimes those results have been yielded in the exact same manner for a hundred times, five hundred times.

There are such incidents, depending on the powerful force of that karma. As for certain karmas, if that intention (cetanā) was intensely directed towards that evil deed, it drags one straight to hell. If it was less intensely directed, on those respective occasions, in the manner mentioned before, it ripens mildly in that very life or in a subsequent life and is worn away. Whatever the case may be, the Buddha has pointed out that there is a way to control the resulting aspect of these karmas in accordance with the Dhamma. That is why we said that the wheel of karma (kamma-cakka) can be broken by the wheel of Dhamma (Dhamma-cakka). It is only Buddhas who point that out. Until then, the world remains trapped in this very wheel of karma, and being unable to escape from it, wanders in saṃsāra for infinite time.

The nature of these karmas is that once they enter consciousness (viññāṇa), they emerge again and again. What is called the life-process of this being, what is called existence (bhava), is an existence spent with the world. In interacting with that world, those karmas emerge again and again through the five sense faculties, and subsequently, by submitting to them, one mostly accumulates unwholesome deeds (akusala). Through accumulating either wholesome (kusala) or unwholesome (akusala) deeds, one is born (jāti) again and again. There is no end to those lives, no matter what kind of birth (jāti) one gains. Next, it is the deep essence of that Dhamma that the Buddha points out. Due to the entanglement of those karmas, and also due to the defiled nature within the being—due to greed (lobha), hatred (dosa), and delusion (moha)—this karmic entanglement mostly gravitates towards the unwholesome side. One has to suffer for infinite time in states of deprivation (apāya), the animal world, and the realm of hungry ghosts. Next, even if we look at the wholesome side, there too, in those heavenly worlds, Brahma worlds, etc., one has to experience the results of those karmas for aeons. It is a Buddha who shows that this existence in saṃsāra—not only in states of deprivation etc., but even in heavenly worlds and Brahma worlds—is suffering (dukkha).

Why does it become suffering (dukkha)? Precisely because of the impermanence (aniccatā) of those formations/preparations (saṅkhāra). In none of those existences is there any stable, permanent, or pleasant (sukha) nature. There is no eternal state. There is no peace or satisfaction. That is why the Buddha pointed out this entire existence as suffering (dukkha). What we take as an existence—the five aggregates (pañcakkhandha): form (rūpa), feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), formations/preparations (saṅkhāra), and consciousness (viññāṇa)—the Buddha declared that suffering (dukkha) is embedded in every single one of them due to their impermanent (anicca) nature. If something is impermanent (anicca), for that very reason, it must be constantly repaired/reconstructed; it wears away. One expects to keep this in the same way forever. When it wears away, when it breaks down, along with that, suffering (dukkha), grief, and torment arise in one's mind. Consequently, that effort becomes futile. Therefore, it does not fit that concept of "I" and "mine". Even though one holds onto them as "I" and "mine", without one's even knowing, they wear away and go to destruction. This is why the Buddha pointed out this entire saṃsāra—comprising heavenly worlds, hells, etc., which bring pleasure and pain—as suffering (dukkha).

If so, if that is understood, what helps to understand it deeply is indeed insight (vipassanā). By directing the mind—stilled by guarding virtuous qualities like virtue (sīla), in that manner—towards insight (vipassanā) and wise attention (yoniso manasikāra), one understands the true nature of the formations/preparations (saṅkhāra) operating within this existence. That every single one of them is something that arises, exists, and ceases. The dispassion (virāga) and non-attachment developed through that help to detach the mind from this saṃsāra. This is not done by wearing away all the karmas in the mind. Rather, the wrong views (micchā-diṭṭhi) that perform these karmas and cause them to occur—specifically the dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi), which is taking the five aggregates (pañcakkhandha) such as form (rūpa) and feeling (vedanā) as "I" and "mine"—are removed first. Going even deeper than that, in the end, it is by removing even the conceit of "I am" (asmi-māna) within the entirety of existence that the seed of accumulating karma is finally destroyed. The seed of accumulating karma is the feeling of "I" and "mine", the notion of "maintaining it according to my wishes". Through that, the world mostly wanders on the unrighteous path, committing evil deeds and getting bound further in the entanglement of karma. The Buddha demonstrates this, then. First, at the level of virtue (sīla), one restrains body and speech. Next, at the level of concentration (samādhi), one reduces—even temporarily—the tendency to get bound along with those forces of karma (kammāvega). Looking at it most deeply, by penetrating this, by penetrating its true nature, and developing equanimity (upekkhā), one detaches the mind. Such is the path of Dhamma pointed out by the Buddha.

Therefore, we must realize that this is also what is contained within the Noble Eightfold Path (Ariya-aṭṭhaṅgika-magga) pointed out by the Buddha. We may have reminded you on some occasions that the Buddha declares wrong view (micchā-diṭṭhi) to be the greatest mistake in the world. In a person of wrong view, whatever thoughts (saṅkappa) arise, whatever thoughts and ideas arise, they too are wrong; they also go to the wrong side. The speech used in accordance with those thoughts also goes to that very side, as does action (kammanta) and livelihood (ājīva). The effort (vāyāma) made, the application of mind to it, and if there is any stilling or unification of the mind called concentration (samādhi), all of them go to the wrong side. The simile given for this is: if a seed of neem or bitter gourd is planted, the soil nutrients and moisture it draws in all yield only a bitter fruit. Similarly, the journey started with wrong view (micchā-diṭṭhi) leads to a wrong concentration called wrong concentration (micchā-samādhi). What we call wrong concentration is: nowadays when someone aims a firearm, a certain kind of concentration is required for that too. So those too are indeed wrong concentration (micchā-samādhi). In that manner, the other side is demonstrated. If a person of right view (sammā-diṭṭhi) has gained the correct vision, his thoughts and wishes go to the right side.

Likewise, his speech, action, livelihood, effort, and next mindfulness (sati), and the concentration developed therefrom—every single one of these goes to the right (sammā) side. The simile given for that is: if a mango seed or sugarcane seed is planted, the moisture it draws in yields only a sweet fruit. Through various such similes, the Buddha expressed that very relationship between karma and its fruit (phala), between karma and its result (vipāka). The very point shown briefly here with the lump of salt is what is demonstrated through various Dhamma analyses. The Buddha highlights for us the way to cross over this ocean of karma, or in other words, this ocean of saṃsāra. One cannot wear these away by getting entangled among them and mixed up with them, or by inflicting pain on the body to wear them away. One must realize the true state of things. What helps with that is indeed what is called the Noble Eightfold Path (Ariya-aṭṭhaṅgika-magga). First of all, if one has gained right view (sammā-diṭṭhi), through that right view one can bring forth correct thoughts and wishes. In that way, step by step, one's way of thinking is transformed. Now, all three—virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā)—are indeed included in this Noble Eightfold Path. Developing virtue, concentration, and wisdom is itself, from one perspective, what is called developing the Noble Eightfold Path. Those qualities are interconnected. Through that, a complete transformation of that person takes place.

Next, if that right concentration (sammā-samādhi) has been reached, from that point on, what that person does is direct it to his five aggregates (pañcakkhandha) and see their true nature as impermanent (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and not-self (anattā). The result of that seeing—if one sees something as it really is (yathābhūta)—it naturally turns into disenchantment—disenchantment with saṃsāra. One cannot escape from saṃsāra while holding onto wishes for saṃsāra. It is the path of disenchantment with saṃsāra that the Buddha has pointed out. It cannot be hidden. It cannot be made a secret. Whether lay or ordained, if someone hopes to escape from saṃsāra, he must bring his mind to a level where he can see those three characteristics (ti-lakkhaṇa) pointed out by the Buddha: impermanence (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and not-self (anattā). Indeed, when looked at deeply, it is for this that virtuous qualities like virtue (sīla) are supportive. It is not merely for keeping society well-functioning forever. In truth, this becomes a middle path (majjhimā-paṭipadā) because those virtuous qualities like virtue are beneficial to both parties, oneself and others. The division between oneself and others is pacified by this wonderful middle path pointed out by the Buddha. Killing living beings is harmful to both oneself and others. There is no need to speak separately of its being harmful to others. That it is harmful to oneself is now evident from this story; at least, it is clear from the narrative we took as the basis of this sermon. Such evidence is not often found. But in these times, we occasionally hear of unpublicized incidents—that for those who commit cruel human murders or animal slaughter, it recoils upon them unexpectedly, just like fine dust thrown against the wind. That is exactly what happened here too: the very dogs he had set on came and ate him up. So, from this, it is seen how the unwholesome deed of killing yields results (vipāka) right then and there. Even if it does not yield results in that manner, whether it yields results in the next life, or in a subsequent life, whether those results are visible or invisible, the Buddha declares that such is the nature of saṃsāra. Because every single one of them was visible to the Buddha-eye.

To the various kinds of psychologists of modern times, only an extremely limited area of these is visible. It is by raising various arguments based on that limited view that some Buddhists go astray. But we have the word of the Buddha (Buddha-vacana), for those who read and examine it. In an extremely subtle manner, in a way invisible to any other teacher of that time, the Buddha not only revealed this deep natural law of karma, but also brought to light the path of escape from this entire wheel of karma (kamma-cakka). Therefore, we must understand from this that this wheel of karma affects everyone. Hence, what is contained within these five precepts (pañca-sīla) pointed out by the Buddha is what is beneficial to both parties—oneself and others. Now, a certain person might say: "Be that as it may, what about intoxicants? When we drink alcohol and go to sleep without harming anyone, what is wrong with that? Who is harmed?" But even if its harmful nature is not felt in this very life through diseases and ailments, in the next life, one may be born with mental weaknesses. One is born in various other bad places. It is not just that "harm" we speak of that is present there. It is not only harm to others (para-hiṃsā). It is self-harm (atta-hiṃsā), self-torture. That is present within each of these training rules. Reflecting on that, the Buddha looked upon the world with great compassion (mahā-karuṇā), and this great compassion of the Buddha transcended all those concepts of "self" and "others" present in society. It is with thought for all living beings that he pointed out those qualities of virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). Therefore, we should not think: "Here, this 'society' is something separate, and I am someone separate." When reflecting from the other side, you too belong to society. In any case, it is by first training the body and speech, and thereby stilling the mind, that we are able to see this truth. It is precisely for this that we need these virtuous qualities like virtue (sīla).

And so, on this valuable day, you devotees have gradually made an effort to guard higher training rules in addition to the five precepts (pañca-sīla) you guard daily. Likewise, you engaged in Dhamma discussions, meditation, and so forth. What is the target of all this? It is to enter the path of escape from this saṃsāra characterized by birth (jāti), decay (jarā), disease (vyādhi), and death (maraṇa) pointed out by the Buddha—to enter the practice. Ultimately, this journey in saṃsāra is ended by gradually reducing the number of lifetimes in which those forces of karma (kamma-vega) operate. It is brought down to seven births by attaining Stream-entry (Sotāpatti). Next, that karmic force is broken to the extent of returning to this world only once, by becoming a Once-returner (Sakadāgāmi). By becoming a Non-returner (Anāgāmi), those remaining karmas are dealt with. Even so, one spends aeons in the Brahma worlds, in the Pure Abodes (Suddhāvāsa). But if one becomes an Arahant, one can free oneself from all karmas in this very life and reach a state where no further birth (jāti) is gained. That is the highest state pointed out by the Buddha, that is Arahantship.

Then, we must realize that our target—whether as a Buddhist layperson or an ordained monk—what everyone hopes for is escape from suffering (dukkha). So, in analyzing "suffering" (dukkha), it cannot be stopped at that social level mentioned. The Buddha points out that everyone is experiencing great suffering (dukkha) within. Consequently, no matter what kind of life one leads, one has to face those sufferings (dukkha) of birth (jāti), decay (jarā), disease, and death (maraṇa). That is why we have to think about crossing over saṃsāra. Therefore, this pious gathering must think: on a valuable day like today, you were able to deposit in your minds those similes given by the Buddha, which help to develop a good understanding within yourselves regarding that karma (kamma) which supports virtuous qualities like virtue (sīla). Likewise, you made an effort to guard these virtuous qualities like virtue. Likewise, while hearing the Dhamma and meditating, practicing insight meditation (vipassanā-bhāvanā), strive particularly to reach that state of paths and fruits (magga-phala) mentioned.

Therefore, in this new year that has dawning, instead of your mundane goals, you must give a higher place to supramundane (lokuttara) goals. For, this Dispensation of the Buddha (Buddha-sāsana) is moving towards an era of decline. Perhaps in the next life, in a few generations, people might ask, "Is Nibbāna something you eat?" To that extent, this Nibbāna can become hidden. Such an attitude is gradually spreading in this country. Therefore, having reflected on this, making a firm resolution to develop these virtuous qualities like virtue (sīla) even more, through the wholesome power generated from hearing the Dhamma, etc., which you devotees have accumulated so far, and through the development of virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā), and by cultivating faith (saddhā), energy (viriya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā), may you make the aspiration: "May this wholesome power be a supportive condition (hetu-vāsanā) for escaping from this extremely terrifying saṃsāra as quickly as possible, by penetrating the paths and fruits (magga-phala) of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti), Once-returning (Sakadāgāmī), Non-returning (Anāgāmī), and Arahantship, and thereby finding peace in the supreme, deathless Great Nibbāna!" Likewise, having aspired: "May my departed relatives who have passed away in my name, as well as the assembly of Devas and Brahmas, by rejoicing in this merit (kusala) of preaching and hearing the Dhamma, realize the supreme, deathless Great Nibbāna through whatever type of Awakening (bodhi) they have aspired to!"—share the merits by reciting the stanzas in this manner.

Verse 280 from the Maggavagga (Chapter on the Path) of the Dhammapada

Dear Listeners,

Our Teacher of the Three Worlds, the Blessed One, constantly reminds us that energetic striving (uṭṭhāna-viriya) is essential to make a life successful. Whether lay or ordained, He often censured a life spent lazily and sluggishly. He praised the value of ridding the mind of laziness, raising it up, and acting with wakefulness. Today, the verse we have taken as our theme, along with its corresponding story, highlights the danger of laziness as well as the value of energetic striving (uṭṭhāna).

This Dhamma verse was delivered by the Buddha at Jetavana monastery concerning a certain monk named Tissa. Five hundred clansmen of Sāvattī, having heard the Dhamma from the Buddha and gaining confidence, ordained in the Dispensation. Having ordained and completed the basic duties necessary for monks—since their main goal of ordination was the goal of Nibbāna—and in order to fulfill this, they took meditation subjects (kammaṭṭhāna) from the Buddha and departed to a remote forest area to meditate. While on the way, one monk thought, "This forest life is full of trouble. I should stay close to the Buddha," and turned back.

Meanwhile, the other four hundred and ninety-nine monks went to a remote forest, meditated with great diligence throughout the rainy season, attained Arahantship, and returned to Jetavana monastery to declare their attainment to the Buddha. On their way, while walking for alms in a village about a league (yojana) away, a certain lay devotee offered alms to the group of monks. Having heard the sermon of appreciation, he became pleased and invited them, saying, "Venerables, please visit here tomorrow as well."

So, these monks arrived at Jetavana in the evening. When they went to see and pay respects to the Buddha, the Buddha conversed with them very warmly in friendly welcome. This was seen by that lazy monk who had turned back. Seeing this, a feeling akin to jealousy arose in the lazy monk's mind: "Do you see? The Buddha converses with them without end. Since I do not possess any path-fruit (magga-phala), He does not even talk to me. Today itself, I will become an Arahant and act in such a way that the Buddha will converse with me in friendly welcome."

Those monks also informed the Buddha, "We received such an invitation on our way. May we have permission to go for alms to that village tomorrow?" Having obtained permission, they departed to their dwellings. Thereupon, the aforementioned monk Tissa, intending to meditate intensely throughout the night, went to the walking path (caṅkamaṇa). But as he was doing an unfamiliar task, in his sleepiness, he fell over a rock on the path and broke his thigh bone. As he wailed and screamed, those monks had to come, attend to this monk, and give him first aid. While doing so, dawn broke. The sun rose. Then these monks thought, "It is now too late to go for alms to that distant village," and thus canceled their journey.

Later, when they went to pay respects to the Buddha, the Buddha asked, "Why, monks? Did you not say yesterday that you would go for alms? Why did you not go?" Then the monks explained, "We had such a complication. Our Venerable brother so-and-so went to meditate throughout the night, fell, and injured himself. While we were attending to him, dawn broke, and because of that, we could not go." Thereupon, the Buddha declared, "Indeed, monks, it is not only now; in the past too, because of this same individual, this group lost a certain benefit and opportunity that was to be received." And He related the relevant Jātaka story.

In the past, the Bodhisatta was a world-renowned teacher (Disāpāṃokkha Ācariya) in the city of Takkaṣilā. He had a group of five hundred pupils. One day, this group of pupils went to the forest to gather firewood. Among them was a certain lazy young man. Seeing a Varuṇa (garlic pear) tree at the entrance of the forest, he thought: "Why should I enter this forest? I have already found a firewood tree right here, haven't I? I can sleep for a while until this group goes into the forest, gathers wood, and returns." So, spreading his upper robe under the tree, he fell asleep. When the other four hundred and ninety-nine students returned with their bundles of firewood, that young man was snoring away in deep sleep. So, waking him up, the other young men went ahead to the hermitage.

Thereupon, rubbing his eyes in a hurry, the young man climbed the Varuṇa tree, and as he was breaking a branch, it struck his eye, injuring it. Covering his injured eye, he gathered those green, wet Varuṇa sticks, carried them like a bundle of firewood, and threw them on top of the firewood pile brought by the others in the kitchen. Meanwhile, the world-renowned teacher said to his pupils: "Today I received an invitation from such-and-such village. People from a somewhat distant village are coming to have a protective ritual performed and hope to give a donation. Therefore, go there early tomorrow morning and bring my share back as well." (By 'share' he meant the requisites, etc., received). Since it was difficult to set out on an empty stomach in the morning, he told them to cook some gruel, eat, and then depart.

Early in the morning, these pupils woke up the maidservant and asked her to cook gruel for them. The maidservant took the Varuṇa wood, which was at the very top of the woodpile, put it in the hearth, and blew and blew. But the hearth would not light (since the wood was wet). In this manner, time passed until finally dawn broke. Thus, thinking, "Now it is too late," they canceled the planned journey. When they went to the teacher, and he asked, "Why? Did you not go?" they explained the matter. "Our friend, this young man, went to gather firewood, and due to his laziness, made such a mess. Ultimately, as a result of that, we could not go," they told the story. At that point, the Bodhisatta, who was the world-renowned teacher, recited a verse:

> Yo pubbe karaṇīyāni, > pacchā so kātum icchati;

> varuṇakatṭhabhaṇṇo va,

> sa pi pacchā manutappati.

> (He who wishes to do later what should have been done beforehand, repents later, just like the youth who broke the Varuṇa wood.)

"If someone wishes to do later what should be done beforehand, that person will experience regret, just like this young man who went to break Varuṇa branches."

Having related this account, the Buddha declared: "At that time, I was the teacher. Those five hundred monks were that group of pupils. And Tissa Bhikkhu was the very young man who slept under the Varuṇa tree." Having related this story, He then recited the verse we mentioned earlier, applying it to the present situation:

> Uṭṭhānakālamhi anutthahāno, yuvā balī ālasyaṃ upeto;

> saṃsannasaṅkappamano kusīto, paññāya maggaṃ alaso na vindati.

"The meaning of that verse is: One who does not exert himself when it is time to rise, who, though young and strong, is full of sloth, whose thoughts are depressed, who is lazy and sluggish—such a person does not find the path of wisdom (paññā)."

We have now told two stories. Let us now convey the essence of these stories in a way that the little lay devotees here can understand.

There was a Hare and a Tortoise who were friends. One day, the Hare says to the Tortoise, "Friend, let's run a race." The Tortoise also said, "Alright." So, they said, "That Ahala (golden shower tree) post visible in the distance is the winning post. Let's start from near this tree. Ready? One... two... three..." The Tortoise set off in a scramble. Without even looking back, he ran and ran with great effort on his short, little legs. Having run all the way to the Ahala post, when he turned back and looked, the Hare was fast asleep. Why? The Hare had thought, "By the time that Tortoise gets there, I can reach it in a bound or two." So the Hare slept. There are stories like that as well.

From this, we can reflect: what was the primary purpose of ordination for those four hundred and ninety-nine monks out of the group? They ordained to put an end to all Dukkha (Suffering), didn't they? To realize Nibbāna, didn't they? Giving priority to that, they departed to the forest for meditation, difficult though it was. For the Buddha has declared: "Monks, newly ordained novice monks in this Dispensation should be directed to practice the four foundations of mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna). They should be instructed in this." In this manner, the Buddha declared on one occasion.

According to this, it is clear that the four foundations of mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna) is the training that should be given to newly ordained monks. Thus, taking a meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna) directly related to the four foundations of mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna) from the Buddha, those monks set off to develop those very four foundations of mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna). Yet, perhaps Tissa Bhikkhu thought: "There is no point in entering the forest like this group. The Buddha is right here. I can become an Arahant whenever I feel like it." Thinking thus, attempting to achieve in a single night what those other monks accomplished in three months, he fell and broke his hip bone. That is what happened there.

It is the same with the other story, the Jātaka tale. The lazy youth thought: "There is no need to exhaust myself by going into the forest to chop wood. I have found a firewood tree right here. When they return, I can wake up. Then I can climb the tree and get my work done." Thinking so, he slept. And that was the consequence of his actions.

Thus, we can understand that when one abandons energetic striving (uṭṭhāna-viriya) and gives way to sluggishness and laziness... there is a saying, isn't there, "the lazy person has divine eyes" (meaning they make excuses or project things)? Procrastination... negligence (pamāda). These are the traits of a lazy person. "It is raining today; I can't. It is too hot today; I can't." That is the nature of a lazy person. Indeed, there is an excuse for everything. If one presents some excuse and gives pride of place to laziness, all three stories show us that one will only end up in regret. Therefore, let us now reflect a bit more on the important words found in this verse.

We spoke about energetic striving (uṭṭhāna-viriya). Now, this verse mentions a time. When we speak of the "time to rise" (uṭṭhānakāla), and when we consider a day, what is that time? What is the waking hour? In ancient times, that waking hour was known as the Brahma-muhūrta—waking at the "sublime hour." Before dawn, at the break of day. Now, monks are instructed to wake up even before dawn. Waking up in the early hours of the morning should be a valuable principle in one's life. For since ancient times, it has been said that tasks undertaken by rising at the Brahma-muhūrta, the sublime hour, become successful. Things studied and memorized are well-retained. Therefore, it is a precious opportunity, like an auspicious moment. In contrast, the Buddha described ussūraseyyā—sleeping until the sun rises. That is an extremely lazy practice. The Buddha has pointed out its dangers on many occasions. One must wake up before dawn.

Whether lay or ordained... Now, you lay devotees have often heard about the lay life. An occasion where the Buddha pointed out various factors for securing well-being and happiness in this life for a layperson is in the Vyagghapajja Sutta to Dīghajāṇu, the son of the Koliyans. What is the first of those factors? Accomplishment in energetic striving (uṭṭhāna-sampadā). That means performing one's livelihood skillfully, diligently, and on time, without procrastinating. That is regarding the lay life. Next, not only that, it is also mentioned in the Parābhava Sutta, which outlines the causes of ruin, the causes of decline. One who is fond of sleep (niddāsīlī), one who does not rise at the proper time (anuṭṭhātā), the lazy one (alaso)—it is expressed through such words that such a person meets with ruin. In this way, the Buddha has pointed out the dangers of laziness and sloth in many places.

It has been laid down especially for the monks. Now, lay devotees might sometimes think: "We are the ones who have work. As for the monks, they just consume the alms they receive and spend the day lazily in solitude." That is the common conception. However, the Buddha has instructed the monks that they must rise even before laypeople do—even before dawn. Not only that, there is a special discourse called the Uṭṭhāna Sutta. When one recites this sutta, even a sleeping person gains the energy to wake up. When reading it, one imagines the Buddha taking a torch of that era, going up to the sleeping monks, and saying: "Arise!"

> Uṭṭahatha nisīdatha, > ko attho supitena vo,

> āturānañhi kā niddā,

> sallaviddhāna ruppataṃ.

It is spoken in this manner: "Arise, sit up! What need have you of sleep? For those who are afflicted, pierced by the dart of Taṇhā (Craving) and suffering, what sleep can there be?" In this way, the Buddha rouses the monks. There are several such verses, and they are highly energetic.

They are spoken to awaken the monks. For to practicing monks (yogāvacara), sleep is a major obstacle. In saṃsāra (the round of rebirths), what we have done most is sleep. Dogs, donkeys, cattle, sleep for most of the day. In the animal realm, the general habit is to sleep most of the time. That habit manifests in us even in this human life. To break that habit, on many occasions, the Buddha pointed out the dangers of sluggishness, showed its causes, and constantly urged us to make an effort to overcome them.

In one place, the causes that lead to laziness and sleep—or let us say, the causes for the reduction of energetic striving (uṭṭhāna-viriya)—are shown:

- > Middhaṃ tandi vijambhika,
- > arati bhattasammado,
- > eteḥi na ppakāsati,
- > maggo ariyo ihāṇinaṃ.

This means that beings cannot fulfill the Noble Path, which conduces to wisdom, because of these very factors: sloth (middha), laziness (tandi), stretching and yawning (vijambhikā)... Next, arati means discontent or lack of delight in the practice of the Dispensation, and bhattasammada means food-torpor ("rice-drunk"). Food-torpor means that if one eats excessively, one has to lie down and sleep like a pig.

You lay devotees must have heard the story of King Kosala. Whether lay or ordained, consuming food beyond moderation can cause laziness. Especially for the monks, the Buddha has advised that no matter how much almsfood is available, and no matter how much the donors wish to serve, they should stop eating when there are still four or five mouthfuls of rice left, and fill the remaining space with water. That is a specific practice laid down for meditators (yogāvacara). Its meaning is to eat with moderation—not to eat excessively up to the limit of one's throat, but to stop a few mouthfuls short and drink water for the rest. In this way, the Buddha has shown a method to eliminate the food-torpor called bhattasammada for those who wish to sustain energetic striving.

The dangers of laziness are shown in many other instances as well. In one simile, the Buddha even shows the danger of associating with lazy people. In that simile, it is as follows: suppose a person falls into the great ocean. Hoping to be saved, this person clings to a small plank of wood, a tiny piece of wood. Just as that small piece of wood sinks in the great ocean along with the man clinging to it, so is the association with a lazy person. In the same way, one also sinks along with them. Therefore, do not associate with the lazy; avoid them. Instead, associate only with those who possess initiated energy (āraddha-viriya), with virtuous friends (sappurisa). It is shown in this manner too.

The Buddha highlights mindfulness (sati) and diligence (appamāda) in various ways during this rare human life and opportunity. As the saying goes, khaṇakicco loko—the world is bound by duties tied to the moment. This world is a place where tasks must be done on time. While laypeople think of "doing things on time" only in terms of lay affairs, when we think of the Dispensation, if we do not act in a timely manner, we will have to regret it. Since ancient times, it has been said that we have obtained this opportunity of the moment (khaṇa-sampatti) which is free from the eight unfortunate states. This is said in various ways. Everyone has heard this, but in addition to that, what we have to say now is to consider this as the "very last drop of oil" in the lamp of the Dispensation. I must tell you devotees that only the last drop of oil remains in this lamp of the Dispensation. If we do not make use of this last drop of oil, what lies ahead is an era of great upheaval and great darkness. A dark age is coming. If we do not make use of that final drop of oil before that, we will have to regret, just like Tissa Bhikkhu, like that young man, and like that hare.

It is so. The truth of the matter is that sleepiness affects everyone. To what extent? It presented itself as a powerful obstacle even to the Great Arahant Moggallāna. His past karma was powerful. You have heard, haven't you, that there were past deeds like killing parents, etc.? It was with great difficulty, not as easily as Ven. Sāriputta, that he attained the goal. Yet, so highly developed was his strength of perfections (pāramī) that the Buddha constantly monitored Ven. Moggallāna. He monitored him from afar. Why? Because he was one to be entrusted with a grave responsibility in the Dispensation. According to his aspiration (patthanā), he was to become a chief disciple. Not only that, he was worthy of the foremost position among those of psychic power. Therefore, in accordance with those qualifications, the Buddha trained this disciple, monitoring him from afar.

Such an occasion is mentioned as follows: Ven. Moggallāna was meditating in a forest in a certain village of the Magadha country. The Buddha, staying in the Bhesakalā forest of the Bhangga country, was observing with His divine eye (dibba-cakkhu) how this disciple was meditating. Ven. Moggallāna was nodding in sleep. The moment He saw this, just as a strong man might stretch out his bent arm or bend his outstretched arm, the Buddha, by psychic power, appeared right there. When Ven. Moggallāna prepared a seat and the Buddha sat upon it, the Buddha asked: "Moggallāna, are you nodding?" "Yes, Venerable Sir," he replied.

"Well then, Moggallāna, I will tell you some remedies. Try these out." Now, you devotees often hear about sleeping pills. These are not sleeping pills; these are "waking pills." The Buddha here gives Ven. Moggallāna seven waking pills. Listen to them one by one. Try to remember them, especially the meditating devotees (yogāvacara). Even for others, by trying out at least a few of these steps practically, you can understand the value of the Buddha's cognitive vision. The Buddha shows seven marvelous steps, such that even modern psychiatrists can study them and think deeply about them.

The first step is this: "If, at the time sleepiness approaches, there was a certain thought or a certain perception (saññā), do not direct your mind to that perception. Do not think much about that perception." That is the first step. What is demonstrated there is the application of mindfulness and clear comprehension, the application of attention. "What am I thinking about? It is because of this very thought that sleepiness came upon me." Thus, one removes it. When one does so, sleepiness might go away. Sleepiness might go away, but sometimes it might not. If the sleepiness is so powerful, then comes the second step. Just as doctors say, "If this doesn't work, take the next pill," in the same way, He gives the second pill. What is it?

"In that case, Moggallāna, direct your mind to the Dhamma you have learned and heard. Maintain your mind upon it in the form of thought-conception (vitakka)." Why? You can engage the mind. When thoughts flow, they break through the sleepiness. Therefore, direct your mind to a certain portion of the Dhamma. Thereby, sleepiness might go away. It might go away, or it might not. If it does not go, He gives the third pill. What is the third pill?

Recite that portion of the Dhamma aloud. What is the idea there? Reciting means saying it out loud. The ears also wake up. When listening to one's own voice, the mind awakens. Here is the third psychological method to awaken the mind. Even if you are in a forest, it does not matter. Recite aloud a portion of a verse or something. Recite it. Then sleepiness might go away, or it might not. If it does not go away, then the fourth step is given. As for this step, since children nowadays do not receive it in school, they must try to do it themselves. What is it?

"In that case, Moggallāna, pull both earlobes with your hands." In the past, when the teacher pulled the earlobe until it became warm, the answer to the math problem would come, wouldn't it? Nowadays, teachers cannot do those things. Therefore, children must pull their own ears. Then they wake up, and the ears become warm. This is not said in jest. There is a deep meaning here. Two actions are shown there: "Pull both ears, Moggallāna, and rub your limbs and body with your palms." That means warming up the body. When pulling the ears, that part also gets warm. Next, one rubs the body with the palms. Thereupon, sleepiness might go away. It might go away, or it might not. If sleepiness does not go away even with that, then He gives the fifth pill. What does He say?

"In that case, Moggallāna, rise from your seat, go and splash some water on your face." Next, along with that, there are a few more instructions. Splash water on the face. Now, one tries to awaken the eyes to make the sleepiness go away. Everyone knows about splashing water on the face. In addition, it is stated: "If it is daytime, look into the distance. Look towards a distant direction." This is an exercise for the eyes. Open wide the eyes that are closing due to sleepiness, and look into the distance. If it is nighttime, look at the stars in the sky. Through this, one gives an exercise to the eyes. Then sleepiness will go away. If sleepiness still does not go away, He next says—He states something special there, like a meditation:

"In that case, Moggallāna, attend to the perception of light (āloka-saññā)." Most people probably have not even heard of this "perception of light." It is a certain technique shown by the Buddha to make the mind alert. Let us say during the daytime, when there is bright sunlight, one looks out of a window or an opening for a short while and takes the perception of light into the mind. "At such-and-such time, I was looking like this." Then, that perception of light—whether round or square—impresses itself well upon the mind. At night, one can take this perception even from a lamp. Having deposited this perception of light in the mind, one recalls it at that moment. When sleepiness comes, by directing the mind to that perception of light, the mind becomes alert. It is an extremely subtle method.

This perception of light is so deep that in some places it is described as a concentration meditation (samādhi-bhāvanā) that helps bring about knowledge and vision (ñāṇa-dassana). If one develops that perception of light in the correct manner, it is described thus: > yathā rattiṃ tathā divā.

> Yathā divā tathā rattiṃ,

The night becomes just like the day, and the day is like the night. It is as if one can see through the darkness of night. Although it is completely dark, to the practicing meditator (yogāvacara), it is as if seeing with open eyes; there is no sleepiness... not even a trace of sleepiness in the vicinity. It is alert to that extent. How alert? To the extent of seeing through the darkness. This is a very powerful wakefulness. It is stated there: "Just as the day is, so is the night; just as the night is, so is the day." To that, further words are applied:

"With an open mind... a mind that is open and free from clutter, a luminous mind. That word is extremely valuable: sappabhāsaṃ cittaṃ—'Develop a luminous mind, Moggallāna.'" That is the sixth step. If, even after doing so, sleepiness still persists, then He gives the seventh step:

"In that case, Moggallāna, go to the walking path." Here, He gives permission to change postures. "Go to the walking path." And what is to be done upon going to the walking path? That too is explained in a few marvelous words. Some explain this in various ways today. Let us state how we understand it. Having gone to the walking path, the words pacchāpure-saññī are used. Make a determination to walk with the "perception of behind and before." Although the "perception of behind and before" is explained in various ways, as it occurs to us: in walking, there are two feet—the front foot and the back foot. That "perception of behind and before" means directing the mind to the foot that is behind and to the foot that one intends to place in front. That is all the mind is directed to. In that way, the mind is well-maintained without letting it wander outside. Not only that, further words are used: antogatehi indriyehi—"with the senses turned inward." This does not mean looking around, looking at animals, just because one has gone to the walking path. It means turning the senses inward, walking with full attention. Abahigatena mānasena—"without letting the mind go outside, without it being scattered externally."

> "Walk with the perception of behind and before, with the senses turned inward, and with a mind that has not gone outside."

So, that is the seventh step. In this way, seven steps were given. Seven pills were given. Let us assume that even after giving these seven pills, sleepiness still comes intensely. The Buddha gave a remedy even for that:

"In that case, Moggallāna, mindful and clearly comprehending (sati-sampajañña), lie down in the lion's posture (sīha-seyyā)." This does not mean just going and collapsing on one's side. You devotees know what the lion's posture is. When you look at a reclining statue of the Buddha, you can see how He lies down: the head rests on the right palm, and the left foot is placed over the right foot. It is an extremely calm posture. That is what is prescribed for the monks, for the meditators (yogāvacara): to lie down on the right side in the lion's posture. Thus, the Buddha says to Ven. Moggallāna: "In that case, Moggallāna, if these pills do not work, I give you permission to sleep." Yet, even that must be done in a specific way. There are many rules for that as well: lying down with mindfulness and clear comprehension in the lion's posture, with one foot over the other, but not just mindlessly.

Uṭṭhānasaññaṃ manasikarivā—"having established the perception of rising in the mind."

Nowadays, people sleep after setting an alarm clock. But when it rings, they turn it off without even realizing it. In those days, there were no such things. By some method, they would impress upon the mind: "I will rise before dawn," or "I will rise when the rooster crows"—there must have been some such perception in those days as well. In any case, go to sleep keeping the perception of rising as the very last thought. Next, the result of that is shown. It does not stop there. "Moggallāna, after rising..." Within what we call "rising," two things occur. We easily say "waking up in the morning." But it is the meditators (yogāvacara) who experience it truly. First, the mind awakens. It is only after the mind awakens that the eyes open. Now, what was placed in the mind last? The thought: "As soon as the mind awakens, I must rise." That is the value of lying down with the perception of rising (uṭṭhānasañña).

Thus, as soon as the mind awakens, He next says: "Moggallāna, as soon as you awaken, do not remain rolling around in bed." The words seyyāsukhaṃ middhasukhaṃ—the pleasure of lying down, the pleasure of torpor—are used. Without clinging to the side or to the contact of the bed, without rolling this way and that, without groaning in sleepiness and turning from side to side, one must rise immediately. One must rise immediately. It was with so many factors and with such a specific set of instructions that the Buddha gave permission even for sleep. It was by following that observation and practicing those instructions that Ven. Moggallāna ultimately stood before us as a chief disciple. To that extent is sleepiness, which is called thīna-middha (sloth and torpor).

Now, regarding this, you devotees must have heard that there are five hindering dhammas called nīvaraṇa (hindrances) which obstruct both our concentration (samādhi) and wisdom (paññā). Nīvaraṇa means a nature that covers or blocks. There are five factors that act as obstacles both to our mind's one-pointedness and to the vision of wisdom (paññā). They are identified by the Pāli words: kāmacchanda, vyāpāda, thīna-middha, uddhacca-kukkucca, and vicikicchā. They are: sensual thoughts, thoughts of ill-will, sleepiness, laziness—which constitute thīna-middha. Here is our theme: through the body, the body shrinks back and is not eager to work. The mind is the same: there is inactivity of the mind; the mind is highly sluggish, inclined to sleep. These two are what is called thīna-middha. Those two go together: the inactivity of both body and mind. The others are: uddhacca-kukkucca, which is restlessness and remorse, and vicikicchā, which is doubt. These are the five hindrances (nīvaraṇa).

Our discourse is about the third one. This hindrance of thīna-middha is an obstacle especially for monks and those devoted to meditation. It is to conquer this that the Buddha has shown various techniques, just as He did here for Ven. Moggallāna, to break through sleepiness. For if one succumbs to sleepiness as soon as it arrives, that opportunity is lost. If one goes and collapses on one's side the moment the eyes begin to close, one can never realize Nibbāna. That is why the Buddha, having utilized all seven "pills," gave permission to lie down only when they failed. So marvelous is this Dispensation!

If the life of monks is conceived of as consuming alms, eating even beyond moderation, and rolling around in sleep—which is what some think lazy monks do—the true monk's life is the one disciplined according to that very battle cry of the Buddha in the Uṭṭhāna Sutta: "Arise! Sit up!" That is the valuable life. It is by doing so that one can escape from saṃsāra. It is how one can take advantage of the opportunity of the moment (khaṇa-sampatti). If one does not do so, what happens? The opportunity slips away, and like the aforementioned Monk Tissa, like that young man, and like that hare, one has to regret not doing what should have been done at the proper time. So it is, clearly. Thus, conquering the hindrance of thīna-middha helps everyone, whether lay or ordained, to elevate themselves and live.

Next, let us now consider: just like this hindrance of thīna-middha, as we declared at the very beginning regarding the task of ordination, even according to the formula of ordination, the goal is to bring an end to this Dukkha (Suffering) of saṃsāra. For that task, He instructed us to engage in the four foundations of mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna). Not only that, at the time of His passing (*pariNibbāna), the Buddha showed the way to protect this Dispensation. Just like the discussion today on "How do we protect this Dispensation?" we hear that there are various kinds of dangers. So, everyone's talk now is about protecting this Dispensation.

The Buddha also had reflected on this. At the time of His parinibbāna, He reflected and declared in this manner:

"Monks, what are those dhammas that I have declared having known them with direct knowledge? What are those dhammas? The four foundations of mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna), the four right endeavors (sammappadhāna), the four bases of psychic power (iddhipāda), the five spiritual faculties (indriya), the five spiritual powers (bala), the seven factors of enlightenment (bojjhaṅga), and the Noble Eightfold Path (ariya-aṭṭhaṅgika-magga)."

"It is in these thirty-seven factors of enlightenment (bodhipakkhiya-dhamma), monks, that you must engage. They must be practiced, they must be developed frequently. For what purpose? For the long-lasting existence of this Buddha-Dispensation." Therefore, for the long-lasting existence of the Buddha-Dispensation, the method shown by the Buddha is the training in these thirty-seven factors of enlightenment (bodhipakkhiya-dhamma).

Although this is said, perhaps no one will accept it. However, because the Dispensation intended by the Buddha is a Dispensation of virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā), it is not something that exists externally elsewhere to be exhibited, shown to foreigners, or shouted about with pride. It is this group of qualities to be developed within one's own mind. If at any moment this is lost, the Buddha-Dispensation is not there.

Think of a relic casket. Thinking that the wood of the existing casket is not good enough, one might place it in a sandalwood casket. Over that casket, another might place a silver casket. Yet another might place a gold casket. Another might encrust it with gems. Having done all this, let us assume that a relic exhibition is held, and when a large crowd gathers and the casket is opened on that day, the relics are not there. They have disappeared. They have disappeared. Yet that casket remains beautiful. Thereupon, people will say, "Alas, there are no relics in the casket!" and walk away. A similar thing can happen to this Dispensation if we do not develop within our minds those very qualities that the Buddha, at the time of His passing, knew with His Buddha-wisdom.

Thus, no matter how much noise we make, if we expect the long-lasting existence of the Dispensation—the very word ciratthitiya is used—one must develop those mentioned qualities. And that must be done in a timely manner. That is why we said that the very last drop of oil in the lamp of the Dispensation is burning now. If you do not make your lives successful by the light of that drop of oil, you must understand that next, you will have to face an age of great darkness.

So now, you lay devotees must reflect: the mind can become weak. It is while carrying all these duties, children's affairs, lawsuits, and illnesses that many of you came here today and observed the precepts. It is extremely difficult. This journey leading to Nibbāna is a difficult task. Yet, yet, like that tortoise, one must tread this path without looking back. In the end, in that race, even if no one else follows, one's peace depends entirely on how close one gets to the winning post.

Otherwise, no matter what wealth, titles, power, degrees, or honors one has accumulated, when Māra (Death) comes and knocks on the door, one's eyes close to the world with absolute zero. "Alas, is all this empty? I did all this, but I did not do what was truly to be done! During this extremely rare period of a Buddha's appearance, having obtained a highly precious human birth, I did not benefit from the opportunity to put an end to the Dukkha (Suffering) of saṃsāra, did I? I procrastinated, didn't I? I had that young and strong energy in the body. I had the strength, I was young. Yet, during that time, I was busy doing other things. I postponed it, thinking: 'I can do this whenever I want. I know everything. I even know the entire Tripitaka.' If one remains procrastinating in this way, one falls into that very regret of not doing what was to be done at the proper time.

Khaṇakicco loko—as for laypeople, they think of the 'world' as lay life and lay work, and the world is a place where things must be done on time. It is so in this country as well. Especially in those countries called "developed," you devotees must have heard—if you do not board a vehicle on time, that opportunity is lost. Thus, running and running, there are even people to push you inside the vehicle. To such an extent is the concept of "time" in lay life that they are terrified of missing the time. One must arrive at the workplace on time. There is such a huge pile of duties. If the time is missed, everything is ruined. Such is the layperson's concept.

In the ordained life, that concept is often weak. One sleeps like the hare. 'We can do this someday. By the time that tortoise crawls here, we can easily do it.' We postpone. And there are excuses to postpone. Yet, whatever those excuses may be, when Māra comes and knocks on the door, one realizes, just like Monk Tissa: "We did not do what was to be done on time, did we? Such a valuable opportunity, a journey started with such a valuable noble purpose—has it become empty?"

Therefore, whether anyone else comes or not, without looking back, you devotees must try to get closer to the winning post, even if by that tortoise-pace. If we miss this moment too, we have nothing to say about the dark age that follows. How it will be, or where it will end—the world situation is that dangerous.

Now, of help to this very effort are the thirty-seven factors of enlightenment (bodhipakkhiya-dhamma), of which we just mentioned only the names. Today, many do not even know what they are. When asked, "What is the Buddha-Dhamma? What did the Buddha preach?" they immediately start listing a long string of book names from the bookshelves—the Nikāya texts, this and that. They recite a list. But they do not know what the Dhamma actually preached by the Buddha is.

Yet the Buddha Himself, at the time of His passing (*pariNibbāna), declared: "I have preached only this much. I have preached only these thirty-seven factors of enlightenment (bodhipakkhiya-dhamma)." Therefore, that is what we must bring to the fore. They are not things merely to be spoken about. They are practical things. What is called the four foundations of mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna) is something to be practiced. What is called the four right endeavors (sammappadhāna) is something to be developed within oneself. It is so with every one of them. They must be directly experienced. No matter how many carpentry tools there are, if there is no one who knows carpentry to teach, or if there is no one with practical experience, that carpenter's workshop is of no use. It is the same with these mentioned dhammas. If one does not develop them, one cannot provide the association of a virtuous friend (kalyāṇa-mitta) to another. One will not have the strength to say,

"This must be done at this moment." The Dispensation consisting of virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (pañña) ends right there.

So, to put it briefly, the four foundations of mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna) is indeed the primary training. In fact, if we call the battle against defilements (kilesa) a battle against Māra, or if we call the effort made for Nibbāna in this Dispensation a war against Māra, there is nothing wrong in thinking that the practicing soldier (yogāvacara) receives his basic training on the battleground of the four foundations of mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna).

Within that lies mindfulness and clear comprehension (sati-sampajañña), which means mindfulness and proper wisdom, or awareness. With mindfulness and awareness regarding the body—one's own body and the bodies of others—regarding feelings and sensations (vedanā), regarding the mind, and regarding the thoughts that arise in the mind—that is what is meant by the four foundations of mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna). Thus, as one observes them just as they arise, applying mindfulness and wisdom, one sees both their arising and passing away. It becomes directly realized that there is no self (attā) here. No matter how much one shouts, saying, "This is Anattā (Not-self), this is anattā," that mere saying is not insight (vipassanā). As we have said on a previous occasion, insight (vipassanā) is a seeing, not a saying. If it is a seeing, one must engage in it. When engaging in it, one sees: "Alas, is form (rūpa) such a thing? Is feeling/sensation (vedanā) such a thing? Is this form like a lump of foam? Is feeling/sensation (vedanā) like a water bubble? Is perception (sañña) like a mirage? Are formations (saṅkhāra) like a banana trunk? Is consciousness (viññāṇa) like an illusion?" These similes beautifully spoken by the Buddha are not poetic metaphors. These are true things understood by the meditator (yogāvacara). They come as direct realizations. These are not just beautiful similes told by the Buddha. Every single one of them is highly meaningful.

The Buddha also said that the more deeply one reflects on them, the more this True Dhamma (saddhamma) is realized. This form is a lump of foam; feeling/sensation (vedanā) is a water bubble. This is understood when one observes that body and those feelings/sensations with a concentrated mind (samādhi), applying the aforementioned mindfulness and clear comprehension. What was previously grasped through the solid perception (ghana-sañña) as 'I' and 'mine' begins to be seen as a series of arisings and passings away. It is through these arisings and passings away that this insight-wisdom (vipassanā-pañña) matures. Along with that, concentration (samādhi) also grows.

It is when one carries this out that it is called the right endeavors (sammappadhāna). Since we have analyzed these in detail on many occasions, we cannot say everything in this brief moment. To put it briefly, on the battleground of the four foundations of mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna), the meditator (yogāvacara) enters with his weapon. Having made his meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna) his weapon, it is through that weapon that he receives this training. Through wielding that weapon, next come the four right endeavors (sammappadhāna):

- * For the non-arising of unarisen defilements,
- * For the discarding of arisen defilements,
- * For the bringing forth of unarisen wholesome states,
- * For the preservation of arisen wholesome states.

This is what is called the four right endeavors (sammappadhāna).

While this is being done, there are the four bases of psychic power (iddhipāda) present within oneself: chanda (desire/zeal), viriya (energy), citta (mind/determination), and vīmaṃsā (investigation). Do not misunderstand this word chanda. This is not the contemporary meaning (like political votes); in the Dispensation, it refers to wholesome desire (kusala-chanda) used to realize Nibbāna—this must be specifically mentioned. So: chanda, citta, viriya, and vīmaṃsā. That chanda is the powerful desire within oneself to escape from this saṃsāra. That is the desire (chanda) here. Next, the energy (viriya) applied in accordance with that. Next, citta is the power of determination for it. Vīmaṃsā is the wisdom, the investigating intellect, required for it. One gains an understanding of these four bases of psychic power (iddhipāda).

Through these, next, five spiritual faculties (indriya) of a unique kind, which were not present within oneself before, emerge: faith (saddhā), energy (viriya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). The meditator (yogāvacara), shutting out those five external physical senses, brings forth these five spiritual faculties (indriya). In saṃsāra, we have often looked at and tasted those things that seek prey through the five physical senses. It is these five spiritual faculties (indriya) that he now tries to develop: faith (saddhā), energy (viriya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). If one wishes, one may call them spiritual faculties. Thus, as one develops those faculties (indriya), by utilizing them, one gains the strength to conquer whatever obstacles arise. That is why those five are also presented as powers (bala): the power of faith (saddhā-bala), the power of energy (viriya-bala), the power of mindfulness (sati-bala), the power of concentration (samādhi-bala), and the power of wisdom (paññā-bala).

Thus, as one develops these powers, the next stage of alignment is the factors of enlightenment (bojjhaṅga). Bodhi, devotees, means "awakening"; it also carries the meaning of "realization." Principally, it means awakening. Why? In saṃsāra, there is a sleep. We slept for so long in saṃsāra under the deep darkness of ignorance (avijjā). Therefore, we must awaken through the light of wisdom (paññā). We must bring forth that perception of light. This effort is to bring forth that light of wisdom (paññā). That is also why they are called the factors of enlightenment (bodhipakkhiya-dhamma).

Therefore, the "side" (pakkha) to which a Buddhist belongs is this side of enlightenment (bodhi). One must direct the mind towards the dhammas belonging to the side of enlightenment. There are thirty-seven factors of enlightenment (bodhipakkhiya-dhamma). Thus, you devotees must constantly reflect on these factors of enlightenment (bodhipakkhiya-dhamma). Among them, there are seven special factors of enlightenment (sambojjhaṅga). They are: mindfulness (sati), investigation of states (dhamma-vicaya), energy (viriya), rapture (pīti), tranquility (passaddhi), concentration (samādhi), and equanimity (upekkhā). Gradually, starting from mindfulness in one's mind, a systematic alignment occurs. A highly awakened state of the mind arises. Once that awakened state comes, the final alignment—just like a soldier who has passed all tests and steps out fully equipped—is the Noble Eightfold Path (ariya-aṭṭhaṅgika-magga). It is through this that everything is culminated.

Having completed the four foundations of mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna), the right endeavors (sammappadhāna), the spiritual faculties (indriya), powers (bala), and factors of enlightenment (bojjhaṅga), this ultimately culminates in a state where all eight factors arise simultaneously in a single supramundane (lokuttara) mind-moment. Through an extremely powerful noble concentration (samādhi), a marvelous concentration that cannot be compared to any other concentration in the world or any mundane concentration, one breaks through the levels of defilements (kilesa). Through the penetration of the path and fruit (magga-phala) of Stream-entry, Once-returning, Non-returning, and Arahantship—attainments for which we all hope, and for which people chant "Sādhu" when they are merely spoken of as words—one is able to directly realize Nibbāna, the escape from saṃsāra, which is the ultimate goal of ordination or of a lay Buddhist life, and for which we always aspire.

Therefore, devotees, even without further elaboration, you must reflect from this on what you ought to do, what must be done at this moment. According to the principle khaṇakicco loko—if the Dispensation is such a thing, something to be developed within our own minds, and not something to be exhibited to the world by counting heads, then we must understand that as long as there is even a handful of people practicing these principles in this country, the Buddha-Dispensation will endure. That is how we must understand it. If there are no such practices and it is only an empty mass, then no matter how much one shouts with external show that the Dispensation exists, there is no Dispensation there. That is why we gave that simile of the relic exhibition. On the day the relic casket is opened, one sees that the relics are not there. Similarly, if those thirty-seven factors of enlightenment (bodhipakkhiya-dhamma) declared by the Buddha at the time of His passing are not present within our minds, there is no Dispensation there.

Therefore, having well-retained these points, if you devotees proceed with this tortoise-pace despite many difficulties and troubles, your peace at the final moment will depend entirely on how close you have got to the winning post. Therefore, as usual, a large number of you, having observed a higher virtue (sīla) than the virtue of your daily lives, and established in the practice of virtue on this valuable day amidst various difficulties and troubles, have developed your concentration power (samādhi) and cultivated thoughts related to wisdom (paññā) and insight (vipassanā), or your respective meditation subjects (kammaṭṭhāna).

Now, we always preach this sermon not for any other purpose—not to develop saṃsāra, but to escape from saṃsāra. Thus, through listening to this sermon, those things that support the spiritual faculties (indriya) like faith (saddhā), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā) have also been developed in your minds. May you aspire that this indeed becomes a decisive supportive condition (upanissaya-sampatti) for directly realizing the noble Dhamma of Nibbāna in this very life, as quickly as possible, before this lamp of the Dispensation goes out, through the penetration of the path and fruit (magga-phala) of Stream-entry, Once-returning, Non-returning, and Arahantship for which you hope.

Likewise, may all beings, from the lowest hell (Avīci) to the highest heaven (Akaniṭṭha), including your own departed relatives, who are able to share in the wholesome merit of listening to this Dhamma, share in this merit and realize the supreme goals they hope for! May we, and everyone else, receive the strength and power to benefit from this Buddha-Dispensation! With this aspiration, please recite these verses and share the merits.

Verses 235-236 from the Malavagga (Chapter on Impurity) of the Dhammapada

Dear Listeners,

It is the Wheel of Dhamma (Dhamma-cakka) that helps to break the power of the Wheel of Kamma (Kamma-cakka) which operates within the cycle of Samsāra. Liberation dawned upon the worldly beings, who are subject to the Wheel of Kamma and go from suffering to suffering (Dukkha to Dukkha), through the Wheel of Dhamma brought to light by the Blessed One. By contemplating the danger of the results of kamma, one can arouse the spiritual urgency (saṃvega) necessary to enter the path of Dhamma. Today, the background story (nidāna kathā) relevant to the verses chosen as our theme also illustrates how severe results of kamma ripen in this very life, and how one has to undergo those consequences.

In Sāvattihī, there lived a cattle-butcher. For over fifty years, he made a living by slaughtering cattle, having the best portions of the meat of the slaughtered cows cooked to eat with his wife and children, and selling the rest. One day, after selling the beef, this man got ready to go and bathe. He told his wife, "Keep that good piece of meat for me," handed it to her, and left. Now, while he was away bathing, a friend of this man came and said to the wife, "Someone has arrived at our house, is it possible to buy some meat?" She replied, "Your friend finished selling the meat and went to bathe. There is no meat left to sell now." When he asked, "Is there not even a little bit?" she said, "Only this piece of meat kept aside for cooking is left." This man, thinking that the butcher would never willingly give up this piece of meat, took it by force and went away. Later, when the cattle-butcher returned and sat down to eat, his wife placed before him a plate of rice with leafy greens. The man asked, "Where is the meat?" She replied that there was no meat. "Why? Didn't I give you a piece of meat?" Then the wife told him the story: "A friend of yours came and asked for meat, and though I refused, he took it by force." The butcher declared, "I cannot eat this rice!" She said, "No, no, there is nothing else to be done now. Please eat what is there."

Then, pushing the rice away in great anger, this man took a knife, went to the back of the house, reached his hand into the mouth of a bull tethered there, pulled its tongue out, and cut it off from the root. He brought it inside, roasted it over the embers of the fire, and got ready to eat it. No sooner had he taken a mouthful of rice and placed the roasted piece of tongue in his mouth, than his own tongue—by the immediate retribution of his kamma—was severed and fell into his plate of rice. Thus, with blood dripping, the man began running up and down the house on all fours like an animal. Seeing this, his wife said to the son who was nearby, "Son, do you see this result of kamma? This may fall upon you too. Therefore, without even looking for me, save your life and flee!" So the boy bowed down to his mother and departed from the house. In the meantime, the bull also died. That man, screaming in agony and behaving like a bull, died and was reborn in hell (niraya).

With that, the story of the cattle-butcher ends. From there onwards is the account of the cattle-butcher's son. Now, this youth went to Taxila and, as the story goes, trained under a goldsmith master. Having trained well, one day, the master goldsmith had to go to his village and entrusted this youth with making a certain ornament. When the master returned, he saw that the youth had crafted it exceptionally well. Pleased, and thinking, "Now he can earn his own livelihood," he followed a custom of the world-renowned teachers (disāpāmokkha) of that era—similar to conferring a degree, they would give their daughter in marriage to the best pupil. So, he gave his daughter to him. The goldsmith, who was the cattle-butcher's son, led a "successful life," as we would say today, with children. In the course of time, this man's sons went to Sāvattthī and settled there, but the father remained in Taxila.

The children of the butcher's son who had gone to Sāvattthī, having heard the Dhamma from the Buddha and having become deeply faithful, thought: "Our father is now very old. He lives without performing any meritorious deeds. We must perform some merit on his behalf." Thus, they invited their father to their home and prepared to offer an alms-giving (dāna) to the Saṅgha led by the Buddha. When the Buddha and the Saṅgha arrived, they offered the alms-giving in a grand manner. These days, you, meritorious friends, often hear about the "death-alms" (matākabhadda), which is given after parents or relatives have passed away. But what is described here is a special kind of alms-giving. It is called jīva-bhadda. This alms-giving is offered on behalf of one's living father. So, we can imagine that when the elderly man was present, they had him touch the offerings or used some other method to instill in his mind the awareness that this was his own alms-giving, and they offered the alms to the Saṅgha led by the Buddha.

After the alms-giving, they invited the Blessed One, saying, "We offered this alms-giving on behalf of our father; please deliver an appreciation of merit (anumodanā) for our father." At that moment, the Buddha delivered a sermon. Perhaps the Buddha saw that there was some wholesome potential (kusala-sakti) in this son of the cattle-butcher. Aiming at that, He delivered a sermon. At the end of that sermon, we can understand that He uttered two verses summarizing the essence of the teaching, which we have chosen as the theme of today's sermon.

Let us look at the general meaning of those verses. Paṇḍupalāsova dānisi— paṇḍupalāsa means, now, when leaves of trees are close to falling, they turn a pale yellow color, don't they? They turn a brownish, pale yellow color. So, the Buddha gives that very simile to this elderly lay devotee. "You are now like a pale, withered leaf ready to fall from a tree." Next, yamapurisā pi ca te upatthitā—"the messengers of death (yamapurisa) stand ready to receive you." Uyyogamukhe ca— uyyogamukha means like standing at the doorway, ready to depart on a journey; "you have now arrived at the point of readiness to depart for the next world."
Pātheyyampi ca te na vijjati—"you have no provisions for the road, no journey-meal." Pātheyya means road provisions or a journey-meal, or a packet of rice.

There is no packet of rice. Thus, the first verse was spoken in a way that would arouse a sense of spiritual urgency (saṃvega) in that old man.

Then the next verse: So karohi dīpamattano—"Therefore, make an island for yourself. Establish a refuge." Khippaṃ vāyama paṇḍito bhava—"Strive quickly, become wise." Niddhantamalo anaṅgaṇo—"Having removed your rust/impurities, become free from defilements." Having become defilement-free, dibbaṃ ariyabhūmimēhisi—"go to the divine Ariya-realm." The books explain "the divine Ariya-realm" (dibbaṃ ariyabhūmi) not as a mere heaven world, but as those Pure Abodes (Suddhāvāsa), the Brahma-worlds where Non-returners (Anāgāmi) are reborn. It is mentioned that He uttered the verse in this manner, urging him to go to those worlds.

It is said that upon hearing this verse, this elderly man—the son of the cattle-butcher—attained Stream-entry (Sotāpanna). However, the story continues further. On a subsequent day, the children invited the Buddha again for alms on behalf of their father. On the second day too, they offered alms to the Saṅgha led by the Buddha in the same manner, and invited the Buddha to give a sermon. On that occasion, the two verses delivered by the Buddha were somewhat similar to the earlier verses. As a specific difference, we have to note that although not the entire verse was different, the second verse ended with "you will not come again to birth and decay" (na puna jāti-jaraṃ upehisi), whereas the first one said, "you will go to the divine Ariya-realm" (dibbaṃ ariyabhūmimēhisi). "If you strive in this way and quickly become wise, you will not come again to Birth / Arising (Jāti) and Decay." That verse was deeper and more heart-touching. Having heard the sermon with those verses—we must understand that it was not just those two verses, even though they are mentioned, but according to the Buddha's style of preaching, He usually delivered a gradual instruction (ānupubbī-kathā) in such instances, starting with talk on giving (dāna-kathā), morality (sīla-kathā), and heaven (sagga-kathā). It is said that after hearing that sermon, the man attained the stage of a Non-returner (Anāgāmi). This refers to the cattle-butcher's son.

There are the two sides of the story. We started by speaking of the Wheel of Kamma (Kamma-cakka) and the Wheel of Dhamma (Dhamma-cakka), didn't we? If the Wheel of Kamma alone had been allowed to operate, the cattle-butcher's son would have gone to hell. But now, having taken refuge in the Buddha's Wheel of Dhamma, he finally became a Non-returner (Anāgāmi). Therein lies the difference. Within this too, there is a profound meaning. Now, from here on, let us analyze this story step by step. From the beginning of this story, it is very clear that the cattle-butcher, in an extremely cruel manner, cut the tongue of that bull just to satisfy his own tongue, because his meal lacked the taste of meat. How cruel is that? Because of that, the result (vipāka) of that action was received right there. Such results are frequently mentioned in many Dhamma stories. Even nowadays, you might hear of such things. This is called "kamma-equivalent result" (kamma-sarikkha-vipāka)—a result that corresponds exactly to the action. Behind the house, the bull was running here and there without a tongue; inside the house, the cattle-butcher was running here and there without a tongue, bellowing like a bull. How about that for kamma? It matches perfectly, doesn't it? And after that, ultimately, hell (niraya). Thus, he showed a preview, a rehearsal, a demonstration of the suffering of hell to his wife and son.

It was because of the spiritual urgency (saṃvega) aroused by that demonstration that the son bowed down to his mother and left forever. He went straight to the city of Taxila. How much pain and urgency (saṃvega) must he have felt to abandon his own mother? Anyway, that is visible on that side. Based on this, you can contemplate a great deal. You might be reminded that even more cruel killings occur in present times. Even though such immediate results do not happen for every single one of them, we have to understand that sometimes, due to the sheer strength of the kamma-force that granted them this human existence, they are still able to withstand those evil deeds. But when the fall comes, it falls. They fall into hell, or else they have to undergo the results in animal births (tiracchāna-yoni) and so on. We all know these things through Dhamma stories, don't we? So, that is what we have to take from the first part of the story.

How dangerous is this state, like that of the cattle-butcher, of being greedy for the taste of meat? We can see its drawback (ādinava). The two go together. Cattle are slaughtered for meat. Is it because he did not have enough of it that the cattle-butcher reached a state where he could not eat a meal of rice without the taste of meat, and went on to cut the bull's tongue? Meat is not something that one can ever eat enough of to be fully satisfied. If so, the cattle-butcher should have been the first to be disgusted by it. You can contemplate these matters in connection with this story. Let us stop there and proceed to the next part of the story, as there are certain things we can extract from it in the brief time we have.

Now let us see: the son eventually became a goldsmith. Though there are no extensive details, he must have been a highly skilled, certified goldsmith. Next, when we think about his children—though it is not explicitly mentioned—we can understand their virtuous nature from the very meritorious deed they performed on behalf of their father. How valuable that is! Nowadays, indeed, there is a custom of offering alms-giving (dāna) with the intention of sharing merits through an appreciation sermon (anumodanā-bhaṇa) for many years after parents have passed away, even though they might have been well looked after while alive. Some people, perhaps, never look after their parents while they are alive, go abroad to enjoy luxury as they please, and then, upon hearing of their parents' death, return and hold alms-givings just to show off to the world. But a much rarer concept—and the highest form of service one can perform for living parents—has been taught by the Blessed One. You must have heard those teachings on many previous occasions.

The Blessed One once declared that there are two people in the world whom it is not easy to repay, to serve and finish serving. That is to say, there are two people in the world whom one can never fully repay or settle one's debt of gratitude to. Who are they? One's mother and father. Next, the Blessed One explains this in detail in a very wonderful way. If a son, even if he had a lifespan of a hundred years, were to carry his mother on one shoulder and his father on the other shoulder, and attend to all their needs, even cleansing their excrement and urine while carrying them, even then, he would not have repaid his debt to his mother and father. Likewise, if a son were to establish his mother and father in supreme sovereignty, as rulers over this great earth filled with the seven treasures, even then, he would not have repaid his debt. But, if a son establishes faithless parents in faith (saddhā); if he establishes unvirtuous parents in virtue (sīla); if he establishes stingy parents in generosity (cāga); if he establishes ignorant parents in wisdom (paññā); then that son has not only helped his parents, he has not only helped them sufficiently, he has helped them more than enough—so teaches the Blessed One.

In truth, this refers to a son like the Ven. Sāriputta Maha Thera, who, having entered the monastic life and become accomplished in those virtues, helps his mother and father in that manner; that is the highest level. Now, what did these children do here? They recognized the Buddha. Thus, they must have developed a deep concept of faith (saddhā) as well as a profound sense of gratitude regarding parent-care. Bearing this in mind out of gratitude, they invited their father and offered a jīva-bhatta (alms offered while alive), not a mataka-bhatta (death-alms). They did not wait until he died. They offered it as a jīva-bhatta. As a result of this, the faithless son of the cattle-butcher grew in faith (saddhā). He who lacked virtue (sīla) grew in virtue. He who lacked generosity (cāga) grew in generosity. And the culmination of his accomplishment in wisdom (paññā) was his attainment of Non-returning (Anāgāmi).

So we can understand the value of the operation of the Wheel of Dhamma (Dhamma-cakka) and the children's care of their parents. Next, let us contemplate the depth of these verses, as far as we can see. We cannot directly express things that lie within the domain of the Buddha's knowledge (Buddha-ñāṇa). The Buddha must have seen some supporting condition (upanissaya-sampatti) and kamma-force within this butcher's son, even though he grew up in such a harsh environment. We can only comment on what is visible to us through these verses. Indeed, it appears that the Buddha preached two pairs of verses within those two days. What was the first line of the verse preached on the first day? That simile is an extremely deep one. Addressing this elderly lay devotee, He says, "You are now like a pale, withered leaf." Now, when a leaf turns yellow and is about to fall from the tree, it detaches and falls at the slightest breeze, doesn't it? So, by means of that, He explained his old age. Next, what happens after falling? Or rather, to remind him of where he is heading, He spoke the second line: yamapurisā pi ca te upatṭhitā—"the messengers of death (yamapurisa) stand ready to receive you." Thus, He gave an indication of his destination. We have to think that, willingly or unwillingly, the butcher's son must have assisted in his father's trade. He must have spent his life eating beef in the same manner. If his life had ended in that way, that would have been his destination. The messengers of death (Yama-dūta) are now ready to receive you.

Likewise, uyyogamukhe ca tiṭṭhasi—"you are standing at the threshold of departure, as if you have stepped out of the doorway to begin a journey; now the time of departure has come. You are standing fully prepared." Next, pātheyyampi ca te na vijjati—"you have no provisions for the road." Even though you are ready to depart, what of it? With that first verse, the Buddha aroused spiritual urgency (saṃvega). Spiritual urgency (Dhamma-saṃvega) was aroused regarding himself. He reminded him of the absence of wholesome deeds within himself. At the same time, the cattle-butcher's son must have remembered his past. The moment he fled from home in terror, the livelihood his father did—all of that must have been recalled through this story of the messengers of death (yamapurisa). Thus, a certain spiritual urgency (saṃvega) was aroused. It is through spiritual urgency (saṃvega) that one gets inclined towards the Dhamma.

Then the second verse: So karohi dīpamattano. With the second verse, He energized him. Through the first verse, He showed him his state and aroused spiritual urgency (saṃvega). Through the second verse, He inspired effort. So karohi dīpamattano—"Therefore, make an island for yourself." The boat of your life is about to capsize; find an island. Find a refuge. Khippaṃ vāyama paṇḍito bhava—"Strive quickly, become wise." Next, niddhantamalo anaṅgaṇo—"Having removed your rust, become free from defilements." Now, this elderly man was a wise man of sorts, a master goldsmith who had graduated. So, making use of that cleverness, what was he to do next? Niddhantamalo anaṅgaṇo—as a goldsmith, this man possessed the skill to remove rust and impurities to shape gold. Now, it was not that which had to be done. He had to remove the rust of the mind and become free of defilements. Next, dibbaṃ ariyabhūmimēhisi—"If you do so, you will go to the divine Ariya-realm." The Buddha brought this to light. Hearing this, and directing his mind towards it, that man must have attained Stream-entry (Sotāpanna); that is how we have to understand it.

And then, the second occasion. We do not know how he spent that day. That man, practicing diligently in accordance with the Buddha's teaching, thinking, "Now I must fashion my mind," must have applied that skill with which he once made gold ornaments to the satisfaction of his teacher. Indeed, in certain suttas that speak of training the mind, the Buddha uses this very simile of the goldsmith. Just as a goldsmith kindles a fire—those who know the goldsmith's craft would have seen how he holds a piece of raw gold over the fire, blows on it, heats it, and from time to time moistens it with water, and from time to time lets it cool down; in this way, through systematic effort, he crafts gold ornaments. Similarly, using that simile, the Buddha states that if one is to fashion the mind for Nibbāna, if one is to direct the mind towards insight meditation (vipassanā) and other meditative practices, what is required are concentration (samādhi), energy (viriya), and equanimity (upekkhā). As shown in those factors, one does not continuously develop concentration alone. Just as the goldsmith heats the gold from time to time, moistens it with water from time to time, and lets it cool for a while from time to time, so should one systematically develop concentration, systematically develop energy, and systematically develop equanimity from time to time. We mentioned this as an additional point, but through this, we can understand that the wise son of the cattle-butcher, the goldsmith, had now developed spiritual urgency (saṃvega) and had entered the fruit of Stream-entry (Sotāpanna-phala). We do not know how he spent the rest of that day, but it is said that after hearing the sermon on the second day, he became a Non-returner (Anāgāmi).

Thus, based on this, what we have to understand is that when we contemplate the Wheel of Dhamma (Dhamma-cakka), there is something unique about it. When we reflect on the virtues of this Dhamma, there are six terms that are regularly used, which you, meritorious friends, recite almost daily: svākkhāto, sandiṭṭhiko, akālika, ehi-passiko, opānāyiko, paccattaṃ veditabbo viññūhi. These are the wonderful qualities of this Dhamma. While the Wheel of Kamma (Kamma-cakka) rolls on in that manner, the Wheel of Dhamma rolled by the Buddha is so powerful that, as you know from many Dhamma stories, there are instances where the Buddha gave just a brief piece of advice, uttered a single verse, and people attained not only Stream-entry but even Arahantship.

That is the wonder of the Wheel of Dhamma. For, when it comes directly from the mouth of the Buddha, the Dhamma is perfectly well-proclaimed (svākkhāta). There is no lack or shortcoming. Through his direct realization (pratyakṣa-jñāna), He knows the inclinations and Latency / Underlying tendency (Anusaya) of each individual. When the Buddha directs his Buddha-knowledge (Buddha-ñāṇa), the past histories of all those individuals are fully seen. The past momentum of kamma, the kamma-forces, the good and the bad, are all fully seen—this is the knowledge of inclinations and underlying tendencies (āsayānusaya-ñāṇa). Likewise, if they had practiced meditation in various past births, the Buddha even sees the meditation objects (kammaṭṭhāna) they used to support that practice. It is with that understanding that the Buddha preaches a word of Dhamma to someone. That is the quality of His teaching.

Because it is well-proclaimed (svākkhāta), the Dhamma preached by the Buddha as well-proclaimed can be seen in this very life, right before one's eyes, as sandiṭṭhika (directly visible). This is a wonderful thing about this Dhamma. Likewise, it is akālika (timeless), yielding results right then and there without delay. There is no need to wait and see in the next world; it is right here. Thus, it is akālika.

Ehi-passiko (inviting trial/investigation) means that this Dhamma has an "invite to come and see" quality. As soon as one puts the Dhamma into practice, one can experience its results for oneself. Opānāyiko (leading onwards) means that the Dhamma has a quality of pushing one forward, stage by stage. One factor connects to and leads to the next. When one fulfills one virtue, it leads and connects to the next. We have often spoken to you at length about these matters, such as the wonderful connection between Right View (sammā-diṭṭhi) and Right Thought/Intention (sammā-saṅkappa) in the Noble Eightfold Path. There is no need for someone else to come and push. Once you place yourself at one point, it proceeds naturally. Just as a person climbing a flight of stairs, when they lift one foot and place it down, the other foot is already raised; similarly, as one proceeds rightly, one is prepared for Right Thought, and as one goes into that, Right Speech (sammā-vācā) follows. In this way, from whichever point you take it, the Dhamma has an opanayika quality. It has a quality that leads onward. Sandiṭṭhiko, akāliko, ehipassiko, opanayiko. And because of these, paccattaṃ veditabbo viññūhi—if one is a wise person (viññū), even if one does not have much academic learning—for instance, this man was a certified goldsmith, but even without such qualifications, even if one is an ordinary farmer—if, through the power of past merits, one has practiced insight meditation (vipassanā-bhāvanā) in the past, then to such a wise person, the truth of the Dhamma is paccattaṃ veditabbo—directly knowable and realizable by oneself.

It must be due to that quality that this man, who was bound for hell, became a Non-returner (Anāgāmi). Instead of going to hell, he became a Non-returner. Thus, one can understand something from this. This is one aspect of the story—the value of the Dhamma. When we generally speak of "the cattle-butcher's son," we think of someone branded by society, someone marginalized. But there is a wonderful impartiality in this story. Even though this cattle-butcher's son had not engaged with the Dhamma before like his children who offered the alms-giving did, yet, due to his past wholesome potential and because the Buddha's sermon was directed precisely at him, he attained such a state. Therefore, we must not brand such a person. There is always room for someone to reform. Once the Buddha aroused spiritual urgency (saṃvega) in him, that man recalled the traumatic event of his past, how he had abandoned his mother and left his home. He must have remembered what had been forgotten through this vision, which brought about such deep spiritual urgency (saṃvega). Along with that, the fear of hell arose. Once spiritual urgency (saṃvega) was combined with that, he understood what had to be done. Now, he did not know whether death would come tomorrow or even today. With great spiritual urgency (saṃvega), that man must have applied his mind to the Dhamma principle brought to light by the Buddha. Whichever way it was, he attained that state.

Now let us return to the beginning of the story. We all know that his story involves wrong livelihood (micchā-ājīva). Trading in meat is a wrong livelihood, just like trading in poison or weapons, because it leads to violence and harm. It leads to the killing of living beings. That is one aspect. From the perspective of livelihood (ājīva), that cattle-butcher was directly headed on the path to hell. In addition to that, it is worth contemplating the attachment to the taste of meat that arose in him. Why? Various arguments are put forward, and those arguments are also presented by the tongue. But let us think a little about this tongue. This tongue is a very sensitive organ, the most sensitive organ in our body. Now, when we speak of delicious food, even if the food is not actually present, what happens to the tip of the tongue? Saliva starts to flow, doesn't it? It is that kind of thing. Thus, such a sensitive organ is hidden within this tongue. In the course of endless Saṃsāra, we have been animals of various kinds, demons and monsters, and the kamma-momentum of having eaten meat with relish is accumulated within these. A good opportunity to awaken those is the addition of meat to this.

There is another companion that goes along with the taste of meat: intoxicating liquor. If those two go together, they can go a long way. It might even be a shortcut to the world of the gods. When the taste of meat and the taste of liquor go together, there is no lack of anything. Here, even without the taste of liquor, the cattle-butcher, after taking a good bath and when his mind was quite calm, committed such a cruel deed. When the taste of liquor is also added to that, what is it that cannot be done? You have heard of many such occurrences in this society. Now they have become common events. Behind five-star hotels and entertainment complexes, there are yards. At any time, an animal can be brought, prepared as requested, and served to the table with or without seasoning—but certainly with spoons and forks—to be consumed. In this way, a lifestyle is now developing that takes us back to a primitive, savage era.

Likewise, when thinking about livelihood (ājīva), the easiest farming is today scientifically demonstrated as sowing seeds and harvesting a good yield within a few days. Through such livelihoods, one can become wealthy very quickly. Support is received from everywhere, and everyone is heard talking about such people. Some are amazed, saying they are progressing rapidly. That might be so in terms of money. But we must consider where they will end up falling.

Indeed, for all of that, encouragement for such livelihoods is received from our tongue. Because of that greed for the taste of meat, one is tempted to commit such cruel things. Likewise, the inability to eat without meat. Because we cannot eat without that putrid taste, we extend our support to the cattle-butcher or the meat merchant. That is what is taught in the Dhamma. If the precept of refraining from taking life (pāṇātipātā veramaṇī) is kept properly:

> Pāṇaṃ na hane na ca ghātayeyya,

> "One should not kill a living being, nor cause others to kill, nor approve of others killing." Whether knowingly or unknowingly, we cannot say—but in whatever way, we want meat for our food.

So, we must obtain it from somewhere, and it must be supplied from somewhere. That is all. But indeed, it is because of this desire for meat that we have to understand that wrong livelihood (micchā-ājīva) has received such support. Then, one must contemplate particularly about cattle-slaughter. The Blessed One has declared: *"Tayo rogā pure āsum"* (Formerly there were three diseases). It is mentioned that in the very ancient past, there was such a time. The Dhamma mentions wonderful things about this world-system (loka-dhātu) during times when humans had long lifespans. As the Buddha's word, we have to accept them. In the ancient past, humans had only three diseases: desire, hunger, and Decay.

That was all. There were desires, there was hunger, and they fell into Decay—those were the only illnesses. But these became ninety-eight after they began killing cattle. Slaughtering cattle is particularly significant; indeed, among the brahmins in India, and not only according to the environment of India but even if we think about human life today, the cow is the foster-mother. Sometimes there is no milk to drink from the mother in modern times. From the very beginning, they drink cow's milk. So, she is the foster-mother. It is not surprising that people are cruel enough to kill the foster-mother, perhaps because they even kill other mothers in this day and age.

One must think about how severe the consequences of these actions are. Moreover, the cow is a very innocent animal. All of this has been mentioned by the Blessed One in the Dhamma. Cattle-slaughter is particularly distinct. It is also mentioned in the Dhamma that killing animals with highly developed minds, such as elephants or cattle, is extremely dangerous. One should not think that eating fish is fine because of this. Some people do not eat meat but eat fish. They do not realize that fish is also flesh. They think fish is a different kind of creature altogether. Meat is the flesh of large animals like cows, not fish—so they eat fish. However that may be, the root of that concept lies in the tongue. It is that very tongue that presents various arguments. Such is the situation. We must consider where we are going. No matter how much this world is puffed up with great progress, suddenly, even sea water comes and sweeps it all away. After all that prosperity is beautifully shown, that is the nature of Māra. It is like throwing one up only to smash them down.

So, a millionaire, within a matter of days, finally dies either from some terrible accident, a fatal accident, or from an accident from the outside. If not, from some severe painful disease from within—diseases that are karmically correspondential (kamma-sarikkha). We hear of many such accounts. Even in modern times, those who brutally slaughtered cattle, killed animals, or slaughtered chickens, fall victim to painful diseases that remind them or force them to recall the cruel tortures they inflicted, and they go to ruin. Sometimes, efforts are made to hide these as secrets, in order to encourage this wrong livelihood (micchā-ājīva). But this is the eternal truth of kamma:

> Yādisaṃ vapate bījaṃ tādisaṃ harate phalaṃ,

> Kalyāṇakārī kalyāṇaṃ pāpakārī ca pāpaṃ.

This is the farming that the Blessed One presents: the farming of kamma. In whatever way one sows, in that way must one harvest. Kalyāṇakārī kalyāṇaṃ—if one sows good, one can harvest good; one can reap a good harvest. Pāpakārī ca pāpaṃ—by sowing evil seeds, one can never obtain good results, even if it might temporarily seem so. That is the word of the Buddha. The danger of the Wheel of Kamma (Kamma-cakka) is visible to us through this. Shaping our life and shaping our livelihood (ājīva) is something that belongs to us. Livelihood (ājīva) does not just happen on its own. One must make a great effort for it. Applying the mind to Right Livelihood (sammā-ājīva) helps to bring forth that Right Effort (sammā-vāyāma). Right Livelihood means a correct living. Indeed, the biggest problem for everyone, once they leave the protection of their parents and enter society, is the question of employment. Once parental protection is gone, one must earn a living. What is easy for that? People choose whatever can make them wealthy quickly and easily. They present it, saying, "Why, this can be done in a matter of days." But that is the point: one must be prepared to harvest exactly what one sows.

So, one must contemplate in this way with wisdom, looking at society. That very cruelty, the cruelty shown towards animals, is what people now show towards one another. Sometimes, people suddenly discover that the food they have been relishing in some restaurant for so long was actually human flesh. Then, even vomiting is not enough to make amends. But after some time, these things become normal, and that savage nature of killing and eating one another in the past might re-emerge. If there is a population problem, the easiest way to solve it is by killing and eating one another. That is what happened in the past. In the past, many did not have that population problem. The minds of humans are drawn to such cruelty from these small things. Now, that man could not eat a single meal of rice without the taste of meat. Even having eaten it every day, it was still not enough. Once that craving (taṇhā) for taste has arisen, somehow or other, it does not matter how, it must be obtained.

It is through that, then, that one is tempted into other evils. Even if we do not do it ourselves, we get someone else to do it, and arguing that there is nothing wrong with it, we enjoy and relish it. But through this, there is a progressive decline of virtues in this society. Likewise, this current wave regarding the economy. One must contemplate with wisdom, no matter how much aid is given. Aid is even given to these things from areas where it should not be given. But we do not need those. We make our own honest, Dhamma-conforming refuge, and the determination to live according to the word of the Buddha—that itself is why it is said that an effort, a special energy (virīya), is required to protect that livelihood (ājīva). There are various things that cause defilements to arise in the mind. One must not give way to them. Otherwise, one could trade in weapons. One could trade in poison. One can earn a great deal from those too. The Blessed One has shown those too as wrong livelihoods (micchā-ājīva), because they lead to harm and violence towards living beings.

According to this, we must contemplate through all of this: no matter how much we talk about the Dhamma of the Buddha, if we do not live accordingly, we can never obtain the expected results. Therefore, the responsibility of shaping one's daily lifestyle lies with oneself. Just as with livelihood (ājīva), the greed for the taste of meat must be abandoned through a firm determination. If one observes a certain principle, that principle becomes a strength and help to observe another principle. When a person addicted to liquor abandons that desire for liquor, they can develop a great strength in their mind. Taking refuge in that, they can proceed forward on the path of Dhamma. It is the same with this matter.

So we see from these Dhamma stories where these actions lead. The Blessed One has shown the consequences of the unwholesome deed of taking life (pāṇātipāta). Regarding that unwholesome deed of taking life, He speaks directly of lohitapāṇi—hands wet with blood. The person who lives by slaughtering animals in a very brutal manner goes to one of the four states: hell (niraya), the animal realm (tiracchāna-yoni), the hungry ghost realm (peta-yoni), or the demon realm (asura-yoni). Next, even if they somehow obtain a human birth, it is said that they will be short-lived. Many proofs of this are received not only from the Blessed One but also from the Ven. Mahā Moggallāna Maha Thera. We have mentioned a very good incident regarding this matter of the cattle-butcher on previous occasions.

On one occasion, Ven. Moggallāna Maha Thera and Ven. Lakkhaṇa Maha Thera were residing on the Vulture's Peak (Gijjhakūṭa). One day, Ven. Moggallāna Maha Thera said to Ven. Lakkhaṇa, "Let us go to Rājagaha for alms." Next, as they were descending the Vulture's Peak, at one spot, Ven. Moggallāna Maha Thera smiled slightly. The smiles of these Arahants are highly meaningful. Ven. Lakkhaṇa asked, "Why did you smile?" He replied, "Ask this in the presence of the Blessed One. I will not say it now." Next, after collecting alms and finishing their meal, they went to the presence of the Blessed One. There, Ven. Lakkhaṇa asked Ven. Moggallāna Maha Thera, as agreed, "Why did you smile slightly earlier during the day?" Then, in front of the Blessed One and the Saṅgha, Ven. Moggallāna Maha Thera revealed the matter:

"As I was descending the Vulture's Peak, I saw a skeleton flying through the air. Vultures, crows, and hawks were pecking at it between its ribs. That skeleton was flying along, screaming and crying out in pain. I smiled at that moment, thinking, 'How amazing that such forms of existence (ātma-bhāva) actually exist!'" Hearing this, the Blessed One declared before the Saṅgha: "Monks, I too saw that extraordinary being with my divine eye (dibba-cakkhu). However, I did not declare it because if I had said so, people might have said, 'Why can't we see it?' and if they had corrupted their minds towards Me, it would have turned out badly for them. They might even have gone to hell (niraya), thinking that the Blessed One speaks untruths. That is why I did not say it. Now, I have a witness." The Blessed One began by saying, "My disciples live with eyes open, they live with wisdom. Such things are visible not only to Me, but also to My disciples."

Then, the Blessed One, with this witness, explained that the one who went like a skeleton was a cattle-butcher. A cattle-butcher who had lived in this very city of Rājagaha. As a result of carrying out that cattle-slaughtering kamma, he had boiled in hell (niraya) for many years, many hundreds of years, many thousands of years, many hundreds of thousands of years, and had now obtained this form of existence (ātma-bhāva). Thus, having scraped off the meat of those cows, the skeleton is often seen in those butcher shops. This man was now like that skeleton. Yet, when those birds and other creatures pecked at him, that form of existence (ātma-bhāva) screamed in agony. There are extraordinary, living forms of existence (ātma-bhāva) in this world that are not visible to the ordinary physical eye. They are visible only to those with the divine eye (dibba-cakkhu).

Another story of the same kind occurs right alongside that. A piece of meat was flying through the air. Vultures and crows were pecking at it too. That piece of meat was flying through the air, crying out. What was this piece of meat? That too was a certain form of existence (ātma-bhāva). In the past, he was a cattle-butcher. In this manner, many accounts regarding bird-slaughterers and others are mentioned alongside this, as consequences of killing animals. So, those hungry ghost existences (peta-ātma) and demon existences (yakkha-ātma) in this world are obtained as the residual results, the tail-end of that committed kamma. The actual result is experienced in hell (niraya). Having suffered the pain of hell for aeons, hundreds of thousands of years, they obtain those hungry ghost existences (peta-ātma-bhāva) which are visible only to those with the divine eye. Coming even closer to this side, they obtain human births, and we occasionally hear of children born like demons, deformed individuals without hands or feet. Furthermore, wonderful illnesses occur according to past kamma-forces, according to dangerous kamma-forces. We must understand that underneath those lie such kammās.

Therefore, the unwholesome deed of taking life (pāṇātipāta) is an extremely serious matter. That is why it is presented as the first precept. Something that supports that is violence towards animals. The root of all of that is the nature of the animal world, where one devours another. An animal does not wait until the other dies. We can see certain animals where the final lament of the animal is heard from inside the stomach of the other animal—such as when water monitors swallow a creature, sometimes frogs. The final sound is heard from the stomach. Such is the habit of swallowing alive. That is why the Blessed One has declared that once one falls into the animal world, it is extremely difficult to come back up. What is the reason? The Blessed One describes the nature of hell and the animal world as: "aññamaññabhādikā vattati dubbalabhādikā"—in the animal world, it is mostly not animals like cattle, but meat-eating animals devouring one another. Likewise, dubbalabhādikā—the weak are devoured. Especially regarding creatures in the ocean. This is called the law of the fish (matsya-nyāya)—one preys upon another. So, if a human behaves in this way, it does not conform to humanity.

In truth, this is now becoming a pattern. There is not much desire for a dead animal. It is the same with wild animals. It is the habit of wild animals to prey upon the living along with their warm blood. Now, this is very modern. Before an animal draws its last breath, we must take the meat that can be taken from that animal to satisfy our tongue. That is the newest method. In those hotels, they do not wait until they die. People do these things themselves. When those forks and spoons and other external things are removed, what is actually present here is a return to a savage era. So, we must contemplate these things with wisdom. We grasp large, deep matters, but we do not make an effort to reform these weaknesses that appear ordinary in daily life but go a very long way. Instead, we present various arguments and try to "save our own skin." Even if you save your skin, meritorious friends, you cannot save your mind. The body too will eventually be joined with terrible actions at some point.

Therefore, contemplating these things, you, meritorious friends, have observed a certain virtue (sīla) on this valuable day. Virtue (sīla) means gentleness/taming. To that gentleness, all of what has been mentioned belongs. Abstaining from killing animals. Abstaining from stealing. Such abstinences—we must constantly remind ourselves of the word veramaṇī. The most valuable word in a training precept (sikkhāpada) is this. Veramaṇī means abstinence/refraining. Thus, doing is easy, refraining is difficult. It is through doing the difficult thing—it is that training (sikkhana) that helps us to shape our lives. Only then does one become tamed. That is how an elephant or a horse is tamed. How much effort does an elephant-trainer or a horse-trainer make to tame that animal? A wild animal. So, we too must tame ourselves, not just because someone else told us to. What helps in that is faith (saddhā) in the Triple Gem.

The Blessed One did not tell us this to give us pain. As mentioned, the Blessed One brought this Wheel of Dhamma to light for us to put an end to suffering, with the help of the Wheel of Dhamma which rescues those suffering. It is in accordance with that that these precepts, such as virtue (sīla), are given. Not as a burden, but for our own well-being. When we say "our own well-being," it is not only well-being in this life. Life does not end here. If life ended here, it would not matter how we lived. But not only the Blessed One, even the yogis of the past have shown that we go on for an endless time in Saṃsāra, being born and dying in various forms of existence. The Blessed One has declared:

> Na taṃ kammaṃ kataṃ sādhu, yaṃ katvā anutappati,

> Yassa assumukho rodaṃ, vipākaṃ paṭisevati.

> "That deed is not well done which, having done, one repents, and the result of which one undergoes weeping with a tearful face."

Thus, some might say, "Even if we commit this kamma now, we will not know it later. We won't be there. It won't be 'us.' We won't remember." One cannot escape in that way. At the moment of experiencing it, one cries, "Oh, how did this happen?" not knowing why. Within that experiencing, suffering (Dukkha) belongs to oneself. This is because of having done it knowingly. Even if one does not know, or does not know that so-and-so did it, one still has to undergo the experience. That is what the Blessed One has declared. Only after going to a skilled doctor do we realize that we ate something unwholesome in our childhood without knowing it. That ultimately comes out, perhaps in modern times, as a disease like cancer. Only then do we remember, "Oh, we took that delicious food!" and later this doctor says, "This is the cause."

Similarly, the Buddha points out to the world: though you now appear healthy and well, there is a certain toxic seed in the mind that is required for this disease. Until that is removed, you cannot be healthy. One must contemplate in that way. So, one cannot escape through those various arguments, saying, "Upon being reborn, that is not us." As the result of kamma, one has to take that responsibility at some point. Contemplating in that way, one must set one's life right. That elderly son of the cattle-butcher was a true wise man (paṇḍito) at his final moments. Nowadays, "wise" (paṇḍita) is used to describe academic learning. Here, "wise" does not refer to academic learning. It is not academic learning that the Blessed One urged him to do quickly. He told him to quickly purify the mind—that is wisdom. That is true wisdom.

Therefore, everyone is invited to become that kind of wise person. It is worth making that phrase, khippaṃ vāyama paṇḍito bhava, a guiding motto for one's life in accordance with these verses. Now, if this Dhamma sermon—which helps you to shape your lives, your daily living, and shows the wonderful nature of this Wheel of Dhamma—has served to bring forth faith (saddhā), energy (viriya), mindfulness (sati), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā), which are the Dhamma-forces, the spiritual faculties (bala-dhamma) that aid in the realization of Nibbāna, may all of that, supported by the association with noble friends (kalyāṇa-mitta), definitely serve as a supporting condition (upanissaya) to quickly escape from all the suffering of Saṃsāra, such as Birth / Arising (Jāti), Decay, sickness, and death, and to realize the supreme, deathless Nibbāna—the fruit of the path through the realization of the stages of Stream-entry (Sotāpanna), Once-returning (Sakadāgāmi), Non-returning (Anāgāmi), and Arahantship. Likewise, if there are any beings, from the lowest Avīci hell to the highest Akaniṭṭha heaven, who expect to share in the merit of this Dhamma-preaching and Dhamma-hearing, may all of them, by sharing in this merit, realize the supreme, deathless Nibbāna! Praying thus, let us recite these verses:

“Ettāvatā ca amhehi.....”

Dear Listeners,

It was on a Vesak Full Moon Poya day such as this that our Tathāgata, the Fully Self-Enlightened One, awakened the Eye of Wisdom. The understanding of the world, which is the domain of that Eye of Wisdom, is enshrined within the virtue of Lokavidū (Knower of the Worlds) among the nine supreme qualities of the Buddha. Based on the verse we have chosen as our theme today and its corresponding origin story (nidāna-kathā), we will be able to bring to light certain aspects of this very virtue.

At one time, while the Buddha was residing at Jeta's Grove in Sāvattthī, various ascetics, brahmins, and wanderers holding different views came to dwell in Sāvattthī. They were engaged in disputes and debates regarding their respective views in this manner:

Some said: "The world is eternal; only this is true, everything else is false."

Another group said: "The world is not eternal; only this is true, everything else is false."

Another group said: "The world is finite; only this is true, everything else is false."

Another group said: "The world is infinite; only this is true, everything else is false."

Another group said: "The soul and the body are one and the same (here 'jīva' refers to the self/soul); the soul and the body are identical. Only this is true, everything else is false."

Another group said: "The soul is one thing, the body is another. Only this is true, everything else is false."

Those who held these views also put forward their speculations there: "The Tathāgata exists after death." (Here, "Tathāgata" refers not only to our Buddha, but in those various schools and systems of belief, the person who had reached the ultimate state was known as the "Tathāgata"). Thus, some said: "The Tathāgata, the liberated person, the one who has reached the highest state, exists after death. Only this is true, everything else is false."

Another group said: "The Tathāgata does not exist after death. Only this is true, everything else is false."

Yet another group said: "The Tathāgata both exists and does not exist after death." Combining both, "exists and does not exist"—in one sense he exists, in another sense he does not. "Only this is true, everything else is false."

And another group said: "The Tathāgata neither exists nor does not exist." Rejecting both. "Only this is true, everything else is false."

In this way, bound to their respective views, they ended up quarreling and disputing, wounding one another with sharp tongues. Then, one day during that time, a group of monks, having gone into Sāvattthī for alms, heard these quarrels and disputes, and went to the Buddha and said: "Venerable Sir, various ascetics, brahmins, and wanderers holding different views are disputing and wounding each other with sharp tongues."

When this was reported to the Buddha, he said: "Indeed, monks, those ascetics and brahmins of other sects are blind; they have no eyes." The Buddha described them with the words "blind" (andhā) and "eyeless" (acakkhukā). They do not know what is beneficial; that is, they do not know what is good, they do not know what is bad, they do not know what is Dhamma, they do not know what is non-Dhamma. Remaining thus, they argue and dispute in this manner. Having stated this, the Buddha presented a story of the past as a parable.

"Monks, in the past, in this very city of Sāvattthī, there was a king. One day, the king summoned a royal officer and said: 'Go, gather all the men in this city who are blind from birth.' 'Blind from birth' (jātyandha) means those who are born blind. 'Gather all the men in Sāvattthī who are born blind and bring them here.' So, the royal officer went, gathered those men, brought them, and said: 'Your Majesty, I have brought them.'"

"Then show an elephant to these blind men,' the king said. So, the royal officer went and showed an elephant to the blind men. How did he show it? He had some of the blind men feel the elephant's head. He had another group feel its ear. Another group feel its tusk. Another feel its trunk. Another feel the elephant's belly. Another feel the elephant's foot. Another feel its thigh. Another feel its tail, and another feel the tuft of its tail. The tuft and the tail are shown as two different parts there."

"Having shown them thus, he returned to the king and said: 'I have shown the elephant to the blind men.' The king went out to the courtyard where the blind men were and asked: 'Blind men, have you seen the elephant?' They replied: 'Yes, Your Majesty.' 'What is the elephant like?' he asked. Then, those blind men who had felt the elephant's head said: 'An elephant is just like a water jar.' Those who had felt its ear said: 'An elephant is just like a winnowing basket.' Those who had felt its tusk said: 'An elephant is just like a plowshare.' Those who had felt the trunk said: 'An elephant is just like a plow-pole.' Those who had felt its body said: 'An elephant is just like a storehouse.' Those who had felt its foot said: 'An elephant is just like a pillar.' Those who had felt its thigh said: 'An elephant is just like a mortar.' Those who had felt the tuft of its tail said: 'An elephant is just like a pestle.' Those who had felt its tail said: 'An elephant is just like a broom.' Saying so, they argued with each other, shouting, 'An elephant is like this, it is not like that!' and they came to blows, striking each other with fists and feet. The king looked on and was amused."

"That is the story presented by the Buddha. Having told this, the Buddha said: 'Just so, monks, those ascetics and brahmins are blind; they have no eyes. They do not know what is beneficial, they do not know what is harmful; they do not know Dhamma, they do not know non-Dhamma. That is why they quarrel and dispute.' And then he uttered this verse:"

Imesu kira sajjanti,

eke samaṇabrāhmaṇā;

Viggayha naṃ vivadanti, janā ekāṅgadassino.

"Some ascetics and brahmins cling to these views. They are attached to these views. 'These blind people, seeing only one part, grasp onto it and engage in fierce quarrels and disputes.' This is the meaning."

So, from this story and verse, we can understand that the Buddha regarded all those who held such views as blind, as having no eyes. Why did he regard them so? There we have a question. In fact, these ten questions are frequently encountered in the Sutta discourses of the Dhamma by those devoted readers. Often, these ten questions are presented as a challenge to the Buddha, demanding a direct answer. But instead of giving a direct answer, the Buddha set aside their explanation. He rejected those questions. This is a very puzzling issue for scholars as well: why did the Buddha, possessing such an immense treasury of knowledge, not answer questions of this nature? However, here we have a point that reveals the secret. The Buddha declared here that those who held those views are blind, eyeless. We can understand why he said so.

We began by speaking of the Buddha's Eye of Wisdom. The Buddha declared that there are three types of eyes in the world: the physical eye, the divine eye, and the Eye of Wisdom. The Eye of Wisdom is the prajñā-eye. It is on the basis of the physical eye that one develops the divine eye. The one who has a physical eye is able to obtain the divine eye. Those two are connected. But the Eye of Wisdom is unique. It was the Buddha who introduced the Eye of Wisdom to the world. Therefore, it is far superior to the knowledge gained through the physical eye and the divine eye. The Eye of Wisdom surpasses them all.

Furthermore, the Buddha explains in the Dhamma the reason for not answering those questions in this way: "Monks, when it comes to answering or explaining, there are four types of questions: ekamsa-vyākaraṇīya (to be answered categorically), vibhajja-vyākaraṇīya (to be answered analytically), paṭipucchā-vyākaraṇīya (to be answered with a counter-question), and ṭhapanīya (to be set aside)." Ekamsavyākaraṇīya refers to questions that can be answered directly as "yes" or "no". There are certain questions that can be answered directly by saying "yes" or "no".

There are other questions that are vibhajja-vyākaraṇīya. Analytical questions are those that must be answered by dividing, analyzing, and impartially dissecting the question, rather than saying "yes" or "no" straightaway. Paṭipucchā-vyākaraṇīya refers to those where one must ask questions back to the questioner to clarify the root of the question. There are such questions as well.

Then there is the fourth category, ṭhapanīya—questions to be set aside. Why are they set aside? Because their foundation is wrong. Since they are formulated upon a false hypothesis, a wrong premise, they are set aside and rejected. One cannot say "yes" or "no" to them. It is to trap the one who answers that they present questions in the form of dilemmas or tetrallemmas (two-pronged or four-pronged). They try to persuade the answerer to give an answer somehow. Yet, the Buddha did not answer even one of them. This is something that scholars sometimes fail to comprehend.

But here, in relation to the Buddha's quality of Lokavidū, we bring to light what the Eye of Wisdom actually is. Wherever it is mentioned that "the Eye of Dhamma arose", it is stated: "Whatever is of the nature to arise, all that is of the nature to cease" (yaṃ kiñci samudayadhammaṃ sabbaṃ taṃ nirodhadhammaṃ). It was that very law—the law of arising and ceasing—that was visible only to the Buddha's eye. Until then, the world was harbored in the view of a self, harboring in the dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi), with the perception of compactness (ghana-saññā), feeling that the world is permanent, that there is something eternal. They see that various things in the world decay, yet there was a feeling within the world that there is some indestructible core. That is what is called the dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi). Only the Buddha brought to light the three characteristics of impermanence (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and not-self (anattā), thereby breaking that wrong view. That is why this Eye of Wisdom is far more powerful and supreme than the physical eye and the divine eye.

So, next, it was first mentioned here whether the world is eternal or not. Some said it is eternal; others said it is not eternal. Why did the Buddha not accept either of these? In that case, the Buddha had to redefine the word "world". It is not the "world" that worldly people think of. Regarding this, we find a certain Venerable monk named Samiddhi asking the Buddha directly: "Venerable Sir, it is said, 'the world, the world.' To what extent is there a world?" Then the Buddha declares: "Samiddhi, wherever there is the eye, there are forms, there is eye-consciousness (viññāṇa), and there are things cognizable by eye-consciousness—there a world exists. Likewise, where there is the ear, there are sounds, there is consciousness (viññāṇa) associated with it, and there are things cognizable by that consciousness—to that extent a world exists." In this manner, a world exists in relation to the six sense bases, including the mind.

Now, you lay devotees know that there are six sense bases (saḷāyatana). In this Dhamma, "six sense bases" refers to the eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind. These are also known as "bases" (āyatana). Why? Because it is through contact with these that a world is recognized. Having shown the world in this manner, the Buddha next says—not pointing to a specific geographical location, but directly: "Wherever there is no eye, no forms, no eye-consciousness (viññāṇa), and no things cognizable by eye-consciousness—there is no world." Going on in this manner, "Wherever there is no mind, no mind-objects (dhamma), no mind-consciousness (viññāṇa), and no things cognizable by mind-consciousness—there is no world." This demonstrates that there is an arising of the world and a cessation of the world.

The world is not an eternal thing as others think. It is something connected to and relative to these six sense bases (saḷāyatana). This thing called the world is bound up with the six sense bases (saḷāyatana). It is on their account that the designation of a "world" arises. This is something that generally escapes physical science. There is a deep matter here. This was presented to the world for the first time by the Buddha through the doctrine of Dependent Arising (paṭicca-samuppāda).

The Buddha expressed this on one occasion in a very brief verse:

Chasu loko samuppanno, chasu kubbati santhavaṃ;

Channameva upādāya, chasu loko vihaññati.

Here, cha means "six" in the Pali language. Chasu loko samuppanno—the world has arisen in the six. The world is in the six. It is in these six sense bases that the world is born. How wonderful is this way of explaining! Chasu kubbati santhavaṃ—it is within these six that all connections, all relations of the world are made. Think about it for a moment, devotees, regarding all modern gadgets. Every single one of them is designed to connect with these six. Then, channameva upādāya chasu loko vihaññati—grasping (upādāna) onto these very six, the world is afflicted within the six. This is the story of the six presented by the Buddha. Thus, the world is born in the six, the world conducts all its relations within the six, and by grasping (upādāna) these six, the world meets with affliction within the six. Such is the account the Buddha presents to the world.

Therefore, in direct relation to this, we must next consider: if the world is such a thing, something existing on account of the six sense bases (saḷāyatana), then the Buddha shows that there is a cessation for it. It can be ceased. The next question is: where does it cease? Before we discuss that, let us look at the etymological definitions given to the word "world".

On one occasion, Venerable Ānanda asked the Buddha a similar question: "It is said, 'world, world.' In what sense is it called 'world'?" The Buddha says: "Ānanda, whatever is of a crumbling nature..."—here he uses the Pali term paloka-dhamma. Whatever is of a disintegrating, crumbling nature is called the world. In the term paloka-dhamma, the word loka is contained, but there it refers to the nature of disintegrating. Asking "what disintegrates?", the Buddha says: "The eye disintegrates, forms disintegrate, the eye-consciousness (viññāṇa) that arises due to both also disintegrates. The feelings (vedanā)—whether pleasant, painful, or neither-painful-nor-pleasant—that arise as a result also disintegrate." Disintegrating means crumbling away, moment by moment. Thus, this is something that is constantly crumbling and breaking apart.

If the world is such a thing, think about it for a moment: we try to draw water from a large vessel using a ladle. If that ladle is full of holes, can you measure water with it? When you lift it up, the water leaks out of that ladle. In the same way, the entire world is disintegrating and crumbling moment by moment—the Buddha declared that it disintegrates at a speed invisible to the physical eye. That is why: "Whatever is of the nature to arise, all that is of the nature to cease" (yaṃ kiñci samudayadhammaṃ sabbaṃ taṃ nirodhadhammaṃ).

This Dhamma-nature applies even to what is called the atom in modern times. It applies from the atom up to the entire world system (loka-dhātu). Until the early part of the last century, scientists thought the atom was something indivisible. But now, even that is an "atom" only in name. They have understood to some small extent that it too is something that disintegrates. Likewise, the world system also crumbles. The Buddha has given wonderful descriptions of the beginning and destruction of aeons (kalpa) in the Sutta discourses. Thus, the world, from the atom to the world system, changes moment by moment. One cannot say whether something that changes moment by moment is eternal or not eternal. Just as it arises, it ceases in another place. Such is the process taking place in the world. That is why the Buddha set aside the questions of whether the world is eternal or not eternal.

What was the next pair of questions? "Is the world finite or infinite?" Some said: "The world has an end; only this is true." Others said: "The world has no end; only this is true." The Buddha did not answer either of these. He cast those questions aside entirely as wrong views, treating them as incorrect questions, like those asked by a feverish patient. He showed that the premise, the underlying hypothesis, was faulty. There is an excellent illustrative story about this in the Dhamma.

While the Buddha was residing at Jeta's Grove, a young deva named Rohitassa came during the night and asked the Buddha—devas have a particular way of addressing the Buddha, often rendered in Sinhala as "nidukāṇeni" (O Painless One). He asked: "Venerable Sir, is it possible, by traveling, to reach the end of the world where one is not born (jāti), does not age (jarā), does not die (maraṇa), and is not reborn?" Then the Buddha replied: "No, friend, I say it is not possible to reach the end of the world by traveling in that manner."

Then Rohitassa the deva said: "It is wonderful, Venerable Sir, it is marvelous! I have realized this very fact myself. How? In a past life, I was a great sage named Rohitassa. I had the psychic power to travel through the air. The speed of that travel is described as being like the speed of an arrow flying through the air. Moreover, I could place one foot on the eastern shore and the other foot on the western shore; I had the strength to take such giant strides across the ocean. Traveling at such a speed for a hundred years, I died without ever seeing the end of the world. What the Buddha says is absolutely true," Rohitassa the deva declared.

Then the Buddha, agreeing with him, said: "Indeed, I say that one cannot reach the end of the world by traveling. Yet, without reaching the end of the world, there is no making an end of suffering (dukkha)." Next, he declares where the end of the world actually lies. He makes this amazing statement: "I declare that within this very fathom-long body, endowed with perception and mind, lies the world, the origin of the world, the cessation of the world, and the path leading to the cessation of the world." From this too, we see that the Buddha analyzed the "world" in terms of these six sense bases (saḷāyatana). If we can bring our mind to a state where these six sense bases (saḷāyatana) cease, then we have escaped the world. We have found the end of the world. That story of eternity ends right there.

This matter becomes even clearer to us: it is not just the views present in the world, but all possible views that can arise are encompassed in the net cast in the Brahmajāla Sutta, the great Brahma Net. There is a highly profound discourse called the Brahmajāla Sutta, which categorizes all worldly views into sixty-two. All views are included within these sixty-two. How are these views rejected? The Buddha, summarizing the various views, declares that every single one of them has arisen due to contact (phassa).

Now think about the contact (phassa) of that elephant. In that story, it was said that the elephant was "shown" to the blind men. But even when shown, can blind men see the elephant? Instead, what they did was feel the elephant, and through that contact (phassa), they identified the elephant. Similarly, understand that the ordinary worldling (puthujjana) tries to understand the world just like those blind men feeling the elephant. They try to grasp it through these six. They grasp through the eye; there is the world seen by the eye. You lay devotees know: the world seen by the eye, the world heard by the ear, the world smelled by the nose, the world tasted by the tongue, the world felt by the body, and finally, the world cognized by the mind—there is no other world than this.

Worldly people grasp onto these and carry out their reasoning and arguments, even science itself. Now, among the sixty-two views mentioned, some are views held by those with higher psychic knowledges (abhiññā). These are views of yogis who, having developed jhana-powers and obtained the divine eye, saw hundreds of thousands of past births (jāti). Yet, the Buddha rejects them all, saying that all of them are things constructed by contact (phassa) through these six sense bases (saḷāyatana).

Then, what is the correct view? The correct vision? Apart from those, what is the true view? There a question arises. That is indeed the Eye of Wisdom. The Buddha explains in that very Brahmajāla Sutta how this Eye of Wisdom arises. If a monk fully understands these five aspects of the six sense bases (saḷāyatana): their arising, their passing away, their gratification, their danger, and the escape from them—if he understands these five aspects correctly, then that monk transcends that entire net of views and attains a supreme vision. From this, we can see that the cessation of the six sense bases (saḷāyatana-nirodha) is itself Nibbāna.

Worldly people, ordinary worldlings (puthujjana), trapped within these six sense bases (saḷāyatana), go in search of the end of the world. Now, the great psychic sage Rohitassa traveled at the speed mentioned earlier, flying through the sky, without any financial cost. The only cost was time. He said: "Except for the time spent eating and sleeping, even after traveling for a hundred years, I could not see the end of the world"—without any special expense, using his psychic power. Yet, our modern-day Rohitassas, who possess no such higher knowledge (abhiññā) or psychic powers whatsoever, spend billions to run around searching for the end of the world. In this lifespan of less than a hundred years, they run like this, get exhausted, and die. In the end, they go to places like the lower realms. We must reflect wisely on this state of affairs. This is because we live in an era where many people talk and think about the quality of Lokavidū. That is why we are saying this: to explain how the word Lokavidū should be understood.

The Buddha shows minutely, in terms of the minor world-systems (cūḷanikā loka-dhātu), the great thousandfold world-systems (mahāsahassī loka-dhātu), and so forth, a highly marvelous universe. He has declared world systems beyond what we think, beyond what the eye can see, and even beyond what modern astronomers with their instruments and telescopes can conceive. The Eye of Wisdom surpasses all of that. Why? Because every single one of them disintegrates. A thing that is constantly disintegrating and breaking apart cannot be measured in that way. Is it eternal? Then, the question of its end. All of these. That is what the Buddha points out.

Even more important is that this world we speak of is constructed by the mind itself. It is based on this eye, through eye-contact (phassa). In understanding this, the simile of the elephant is of great help. Just as those blind men grasped onto individual parts and declared, "This is the elephant," so too the world seen by the eye, the world heard by the ear—these are what the world takes to be "the world". But the Buddha shows that all of these are ultimately empty, void.

Furthermore, the Buddha declares the way to escape from this. That is why it was said that when a monk sees both the arising and the passing away of these six sense bases (saḷāyatana)—samudayatthagama or samudaya-vaya (arising and ceasing)—he sees a process occurring instantly. He sees their arising and ceasing. Likewise, he sees their gratification. He sees their danger. And next, he sees the escape from them, which is Nibbāna. Thus, it was when the Buddha realized that very cessation of the six sense bases (saḷāyatana-nirodha) that the Eye arose.

Now, you lay devotees know that there are classes or grades—various words like that are used. The body of knowledge required for a certain grade is completed only when one passes that class, isn't it? What does "passing" mean? It means going beyond, doesn't it? To pass exams means to go beyond them. In the same way, it is only when one has gone beyond the world that one can understand the world. Only when one has gone beyond the world does one gain a complete picture of the world. Until then, there is no real understanding. There is only that incomplete knowledge, just like grasping a part of the elephant and imagining. This is what we must understand.

Therefore, from this, consider: on what should those devotees who wish to make use of their lives focus their attention? Should it be on this Dhamma regarding the Eye of Wisdom presented by the Buddha? Or on that running around in the modern world? Spending billions to go in search of the end of the world, only to die halfway like Rohitassa. So, that is the story regarding the end of the world.

There are two other questions, aren't there? Some said that the soul (jīva) and the body are one and the same. Others said that the soul (jīva) is one thing and the body is another. Here, "soul" (jīva)—you should understand—is just another name for the self. To put it in familiar terms, one group said the self and the body are one. Others say the self is one thing, the body is another. Now, how could the Buddha answer either of these? If he answered, he would be trapped, wouldn't he? This is a self/soul that the Buddha does not accept. The Buddha declares it to be kevala-paripūro bālādhammo—completely filled with foolish notions. This concept of a "self" is entirely a wrong view of ordinary worldlings. The dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi) is a wrong concept firmly rooted within worldly beings through ignorance and craving (taṇhā). Therefore, relating an actually non-existent self to the body, and saying either that the two are one or that the two are different—both are wrong.

You lay devotees know the kind of questions asked in courts, don't you? If a clever lawyer asks a person who has never drunk alcohol in his life, demanding a "yes" or "no" without wasting the court's time: "Has the gentleman now stopped drinking alcohol?"—whether he says "yes" or "no", he gets trapped. It is for this reason that the Buddha set those questions aside. Their premise, their core assumption, is wrong. Thus, it can be easily understood; that is, why the Buddha did not answer can be easily understood.

Because we know, everyone accepts, that this is a Dhamma of not-self (anattā). To some extent, impermanence (anicca) was seen not only by the sages of the past but even by ordinary people. They also knew to some extent that what is impermanent (anicca) is suffering (dukkha). But it was the Buddha who brought to light the nature of not-self (anattā)—that there is nothing that can be taken as "I" or "mine", no core or essence. When speaking of these eyes, ears, nose, and so on: "The eye cannot be taken as self, forms cannot be taken as self." Nowhere is there a self. There is no essence; it is unsubstantial. That is why those two questions were also set aside.

Next, it is the same with the final set of questions. They are extremely profound. It concerns the word "Tathāgata". We began today's sermon by speaking of the Tathāgata, the Fully Self-Enlightened One. However, the ascetics and brahmins of other sects used the word "Tathāgata" to refer to the one who had reached the highest state in their respective teachings, described as the supreme man (uttamapurisa), the ultimate man (paramapurisa), who has attained the highest attainment (paramapattipatta). In short, it was used to refer to the liberated individual. There is an instance where this matter becomes very clear.

The wanderer Vacchagotta asked the Buddha these ten questions. In fact, it was not only the wanderer Vacchagotta; the Suttas mention that various people—sometimes even kings, and sometimes even monks of the Sangha—asked the Buddha: "Why does the Buddha not answer these questions?" We think that if there is a question, it must surely be answered. This is why we mentioned earlier that the Buddha pointed out four types of questions. The Buddha set these questions aside for a specific reason. These four questions are formulated in such a way that one cannot escape them.

The Tathāgata—let us understand "Tathāgata" here as the liberated individual. Does the liberated individual of a certain teaching exist after death? Does he not exist after death? Does he both exist and not exist after death? Fourthly, does he neither exist nor not exist after death? In this way, they make it four-cornered to corner the one who answers. They put four corners to the question so that the answerer cannot escape. Whichever one he asserts, he gets trapped. But the Buddha did not get trapped by this. Without answering even one of them, he dismissed them, calling it a wilderness of views, a joke, and declared that such questions do not even arise for a noble person. The Buddha stated that it is only the one lacking that understanding who troubles himself over why these questions were not taken seriously and answered.

Now let us try to understand "Tathāgata" in relation to our Dispensation. The term "Tathāgata" is actually applied in the Sutta discourses not only to the Buddha but in some places to Arahants as well. In short, it refers to the liberated person. The wanderer Vacchagotta did not present his questions to the Buddha using the word "Tathāgata". He asked whether a liberated person of this Dispensation, a monk of liberated mind, is reborn (jāti) after death. The Buddha said: "That question does not apply."

He asked: "Is he not reborn after death?" "That question also does not apply." Next he asked: "Is he both reborn and not reborn?" "That question also does not apply." Then he asked: "Is he neither reborn nor not reborn?" "That question also does not apply." In this way, the Buddha gave short answers. Thereupon Vacchagotta said: "Whatever faith I had in you, Master Gotama, is now gone." Then the Buddha said: "Very well, Vacchagotta, let me ask you a question in return."

"Suppose a fire were burning before you. Would you know that there is a fire before you?" "Yes, Master Gotama, I would know." "If someone were to ask you: 'On account of what does this fire burn?' what would you say?" "I would say: 'This fire burns on account of grass and wood as fuel. It burns by grasping (upādāna) onto them, using them as fuel.'" "Very well, suppose that fire before you were to go out. If someone were to ask you: 'Where has this extinguished fire gone? To the east? To the west? To the north? To the south?' what would you say?"

"The question does not apply, Master Gotama." He too was forced to say that the question does not apply. Why? He is then told the reason. To ask where the fire went after it went out—which had burned on account of grass and wood—is an absurd question. He did not say "foolish", but that it is not a fitting way of speaking. Instead, the only word to say is nibbuta—"extinguished". That is the only answer. A fire that burned by grasping (upādāna) onto various fuel materials has gone out due to the absence and exhaustion of that grasping (upādāna)/fuel. That is all. That is the whole story. So, the word used for that is nibbuta (extinguished).

So now, you devotees have to think about that word Nibbāna. This is where we have arrived: at this question of Nibbāna. Everyone in this Dispensation knows that there are said to be five heaps (aggregates) that we hold onto because of craving (taṇhā). You devotees often hear them mentioned: the aggregate of form, the aggregate of feeling (vedanā), the aggregate of perception, the aggregate of formations (saṅkhāra), and the aggregate of consciousness (viññāṇa). We are holding onto these five heaps. At the very least, a Buddhist has this basic understanding. Non-Buddhists take them as a self. Even among Buddhists, it is only when the view is purified—that is, when a Stream-enterer (sotāpanna) purifies his view—that this is truly seen.

Thus, the Buddha declares that we hold onto these five heaps in twenty ways as the dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi). Either one says form is the self, or that the self possesses form, or that form is in the self, or that the self is in form. In this way, there are four ways for each of the five. One says feeling (vedanā) is the self, or that the self possesses feeling, or that feeling is in the self, or that the self is in feeling. In this manner, there is a wrong view, a false grasping, regarding all five aggregates.

Even if they can comprehend the other aggregates, when they come to the deepest, most illusory part—which is consciousness (viññāṇa)—most people get stuck. Even if other things are seen as not-self (anattā), they think: "This consciousness (viññāṇa), or mind, has some kind of essence." The Buddha declares that even this consciousness (viññāṇa) is not-self (anattā), that there is nothing there to be taken as a self. It is instantaneous, and even faster than the others—you devotees may have heard the term lahuparivattam (swiftly changing)—this mind spins extremely fast. This consciousness (viññāṇa) revolves with immense speed. The Buddha declares that there is not even an adequate simile for it. Even with modern scientific instruments, one cannot measure it. To such a wonderful extent, this consciousness (viññāṇa) spins rapidly.

Philosophers of the past gave the simile of the alāta-cakka (whirling firebrand). When you whirl a firebrand, it appears like a circle of fire. They present the simile of the whirling firebrand. The mind moves with such speed. Because of this, the world develops a wrong understanding and takes it to be a self. That is where most people get stuck. Even those who have attained higher psychic knowledges (abhiññā) ultimately get stuck there.

However, the Buddha understood this consciousness (viññāṇa). That was when the Eye of Wisdom arose. Consciousness (viññāṇa) also arises and ceases moment by moment. If consciousness (viññāṇa) also arises and ceases, then those six types of consciousness—eye-consciousness, ear-consciousness, nose-consciousness, tongue-consciousness, body-consciousness, and mind-consciousness—all arise due to causes and conditions, and when those causes and conditions are removed, they cease.

Thus, it is in dependence on this consciousness (viññāṇa) that we construct the concept of a "world". The concept of the world is a worldly designation. The "world" is a designation we have constructed. And we are trapped within it. Now think about it for a moment: is the world seen by humans the same as that seen by other animals who have eyes different from ours? No matter how much scientific power we possess, can we understand the world of an ant? We cannot understand the ant's world, no matter how much scientific exploration and research we conduct.

A small illustration of this, which you devotees probably know better than we do, is how during the recent tsunami, animals surpassed human instruments. The instinct of those animals, whom we consider inferior—human beings cannot even conceive how that animal instinct works. That is how they escaped. While humans were waiting for warning signals, those animals sensed the tsunami. That is a good example. From that, we can see what the world of those animals is like, but we cannot comprehend it. That is why the Buddha declared that the world exists relative to the six sense bases (saḷāyatana). If the world exists relative to the six sense bases, then the cessation of the world can be brought about by the cessation of the six sense bases (saḷāyatana-nirodha).

The Buddha stated that all of these questions are like those asked by a feverish patient. When a feverish patient asks for water, it is not proper to just give him water; one must give him medicine. Likewise, the Buddha did not give "water", but gave "medicine". That medicine is the Dhamma. So, that Dhamma is what exists. When that is realized: "Whatever is of the nature to arise, all that is of the nature to cease" (yaṃ kiñci samudayadhammaṃ sabbaṃ taṃ nirodhadhammaṃ).

This applies to the atom as well. It also applies to the world system. There are indeed hundreds of thousands of such world systems, galaxies. It is true that living beings exist in them. But we must contemplate this to arouse urgency (saṃvega): for so long, we have been born and dying in this long saṃsāra. That is what the Buddha declared. Because of contact (phassa) through the six sense bases (saḷāyatana), feeling (vedanā) arises. Because of feeling, craving (taṇhā) arises. Because of craving, grasping (upādāna) arises. Because of grasping, becoming (bhava) arises. Because of becoming, those who cling to all sixty-two views do not escape from birth (jāti), aging and death (jarāmaraṇa).

Among those who held these sixty-two views were those who had attained higher psychic knowledges (abhiññā). There were those with marvelous mental powers, surpassing modern scientists, who could see past births. Yet, even of them, the Buddha declared that they too are blind because they lack the Eye of Wisdom. He said they do not have the true eye, calling them acakkhukā (eyeless). We must understand this in that light.

Thus, we have received this Dhamma. Where do we begin it? Right here. With these six sense bases (saḷāyatana). Within this fathom-long body itself. That is why the Buddha made that marvelous statement: "Within this very fathom-long body, endowed with perception and mind, I point out the world, the origin of the world, the cessation of the world, and the path leading to its cessation."

Therefore, what we are doing at this moment is, in particular, developing virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). Developing the Noble Eightfold Path means developing virtue, concentration, and wisdom. This is done through this body endowed with perception and mind. Having done this, at some point, by seeing the arising and ceasing of these things through insight (vipassanā), one traverses the path that the Buddha pointed out as the stages of Stream-entry, Once-returning, Non-returning, and Arahantship. Therein lies the effort to eliminate ignorance.

The dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi) born of ignorance, and craving (taṇhā) which reinforces it—in fact, it is due to grasping (upādāna) driven by this craving (taṇhā) that worldly beings remain trapped within becoming (bhava), seizing everything. Grasping onto this, they cry: "Save me!" Grasping onto something, they say: "Oh, save me!" But the Buddha says: "Let go." Without letting go, how can one be saved? The moment you let go, you are saved. That is the secret. But it is difficult to understand. That is why the Buddha shows it to us.

How then do we let go of these? Not by physically grabbing and throwing them away. It is seen through the Eye of Wisdom, with the Eye of Wisdom itself. That is what is called insight-knowledge (vipassanā-ñāṇa). Insight (vipassanā) means a special kind of seeing. That special seeing is not done with the physical eye. As the practitioner (yogāvacara) develops virtue, concentration, and wisdom, at some point, things that are invisible to the ordinary worldling become visible.

To one who took a candle flame as a single entity, its flow of arising and ceasing sometimes becomes visible. Looking at a waterfall, at some point, that same nature is seen. Going even further, when one removes the attachment to these things—as the Buddha declared, by removing and removing it—the cessation of the six sense bases (saḷāyatana-nirodha) occurs. That is what is meant by the escape from the six sense bases. Departing from the six sense bases (saḷāyatana) means removing the perception of a self regarding them, and gradually walking the path of insight (vipassanā).

Thus, because of not understanding that the eye crumbles in this world, and not understanding that forms crumble, we bring the two together, create a contact (phassa), and construct a world. The cinema worlds, music worlds—all these worlds we create are things manufactured within our own minds. Think about it for a moment: highly sweet music, the most beautiful music of the most talented musician of our time. If you slow it down using modern equipment, it sounds like wailing. It is like crying. That is what the Buddha declared: Ruṇṇamidam, bhikkhave, ariyassa vinaye yadidaṃ gītaṃ—"Singing is, in the discipline of the Noble Ones, a form of wailing." Thus, one can realize it directly in that manner.

The same applies to the world seen by the eye. All of those—you devotees know about cinema and related things, modern things. When we look at what is shown to us, what falls onto that screen is a mass of forms, a succession of forms. We seize them with perception, submit to them, and are deluded. But at some point, if that Eye of Wisdom is developed, the attachment to them gradually fades away.

Along with the fading of attachment—these two go together—just as attachment fades, light arrives. To the extent that darkness is dispelled, light comes in. To the extent that light enters, darkness is removed. Therefore, what we must do is depart from that path of darkness and walk along this path of light.

Therefore, you devotees must understand that the Buddha pointed out this Noble Eightfold Path within this very body. The first step in our effort to develop the mind is virtue (sīla). You devotees, at this moment, have received the basic discipline of restraining body and speech through observing the precepts (sīla). The Buddha points out various stages of virtue (sīla). Why do we do this? Because while traveling through this saṃsāra for a long time, various wholesome and unwholesome kamma have been stored in our consciousness (viññāṇa). They are also recorded as memories. These memories flood into our minds. Because of this, it becomes difficult to concentrate our minds.

But if someone sets certain boundaries and restrains his body and speech, he can arouse joy instead of remorse. One can think: "For so long I drank alcohol, killed animals, stole, and did various things. But now I have turned away from those things and established myself in this good practice." By directing the mind there, gladdening the mind, one can build up concentration (samādhi). That is why we sometimes say that this saṃsāra is a muddy swamp. We have come sinking and sinking in this muddy swamp. If we are to sit down to meditate, we must construct a small foundation. We must think of the training precepts (sikkhāpada) as planting five, eight, or ten pillars. It is with such a valuable virtue (sīla) that you devotees are now endowed.

Where do we go from there? As you devotees know, there are two aspects to meditation: calm (samatha) and insight (vipassanā). To some extent, one must develop calm by removing the hindrances. One must concentrate the mind by bringing up a wholesome object. By anchoring the scattered mind on a wholesome object, we can test the strength of the mind. Those who have attained states like absorption (jhāna) understand how small a fraction of our mental strength we utilize in our day-to-day lives. A scattered reservoir of water has no power. But when that water is collected and channeled through pipes to spin the turbine to generate hydroelectric power, with what great speed does that water travel!

In the same way, there is an immense power in our mind. Having unified and collected that power through obtaining concentration (samādhi) like absorption (jhāna), next we must spin that iron wheel. That spinning is what is called wisdom (paññā), insight (vipassanā). We must then apply that stilled mind not to anywhere else, but to this very body. The Dhamma-nature of this body and other bodies is the same. Just as this body is, so is that body; just as that body is, so is this body. The aggregate of form in that body is just like the aggregate of form in this body. Whether you look at it from that side or this side, ultimately we arrive at these six sense bases (saḷāyatana) and the five aggregates of grasping (pañcupādānakkhandha).

As one gradually understands this deeply through insight, what is the ultimate result? The entire sum of knowledge is contained within this Dhamma-nature of arising and passing away—samudaya-vaya. Within both arising and passing away. But as this knowledge of arising and ceasing goes deeper and deeper, the aspect of ceasing begins to show itself far more than the aspect of arising. It crumbles away. That is why the Buddha said lujjati palujjati (it crumbles and disintegrates). The "world" is that which crumbles away. It is something constantly crumbling and breaking apart. Thus, when one directs the mind to the five aggregates—form, feeling (vedanā), and so forth—and contemplates them with a concentrated mind at some point, this is understood.

The disenchantment (nibbidā) arising through that—that disenchantment, as it goes deeper, helps one to let go of the five aggregates of grasping (pañcupādānakkhandha) and even to escape from those bases through the cessation of the six sense bases (saḷāyatana-nirodha).

What is meant by escaping from the sense bases? We grasp onto this eye, ear, nose, and so forth, taking them as a self. We think of them as places inhabited by a self. Thus, "my eye, my ear, my nose"—there is that sense of ownership. Along with that, it is as if someone is residing inside them. But at some point, one understands that these things we took to be "mine" crumble right here, on the spot. The eye crumbles, forms crumble, the consciousness (viññāṇa) that arises due to both crumbles, contact (phassa) crumbles as a result of that consciousness, and feelings (vedanā) that arise due to that contact all crumble away. It is to this very truth that the Buddha ultimately directs our mind.

Through that, having seen the arising and ceasing of the six sense bases (saḷāyatana), and having understood their gratification, and even more so their danger, that escape from them at some point—that state of escape is what we call Nibbāna in this very life. It is said, "He saw Nibbāna in this very life" (diṭṭheva dhamme). He realized Nibbāna, he went to the other shore.

When we speak of Nibbāna, and when we speak of the Buddhas, we use the term "supramundane" (lokuttara). Why do we use the word "supramundane"? Some might think that the Buddha became supramundane only after his final passing away (*pariNibbāna). Perhaps they think so. Why? Because he lived in the world. He was in the world, and after his final passing, he crossed over the world. Some might indeed think that way. But the Buddha was supramundane while alive, because he had crossed over that world. He crossed over that world—he crossed over the world of the five aggregates, he crossed over the world of the six sense bases (saḷāyatana).

Thus, the galaxies and so forth that we speak of are based on this world. Those questions are like the questions of a feverish patient. Because once one has crossed over the world, those questions do not exist. Those questions are asked by one who stands within the dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi). The things taken as "the world" are constructed in dependence on forms contacted (phassa) by the eye, sounds contacted (phassa) by the ear, and so on. Bringing to mind the story of the elephant once more, the world obtained by contacting (phassa) through these sense bases is exactly equivalent to the world of the blind men who gained an understanding of the elephant.

It is deficient; it is not complete knowledge. But the Eye of Wisdom encounters all of those aspects we mentioned. It sees how these six sense bases (saḷāyatana) arise, and it also sees how they instantly cease. If there is any gratification in them, it sees that, and it sees the danger, and next the escape from them—it is through the ending of attachment to them that at some point, the cessation of consciousness (viññāṇa-nirodha), the cessation of the six sense bases (saḷāyatana-nirodha), and the cessation of becoming (bhava-nirodha) occur. Now, the term "cessation of becoming" (bhava-nirodha) is constantly mentioned as Nibbāna itself. It is frequently stated in the Dhamma: Bhava-nirodho nibbānaṃ, bhava-nirodho nibbānaṃ (The cessation of becoming is Nibbāna).

The cessation of becoming (bhava-nirodha) does not mean departing from the physical world we think of. It is not that final event of the Buddha's passing away which we think of as Parinibbāna. Rather, it is obtaining that supramundane state while still alive. It was obtained at the moment the Eye of Wisdom arose. There is a state where all forms hitherto seen, all sounds heard through the darkness of ignorance, entirely cease. It was by realizing that cessation directly that the Buddha gained the understanding that the world can be ceased right here. That was the state of mind the Buddha ultimately arrived at.

Sometimes we think that after his final passing, or after five thousand years, the Buddha will return. But what we must remember there is that word nibbuto (extinguished). Once a fire has gone out, where is it? Does it go to the east? To the west? To the north? To the south? Does the fire return? No. The fire existed on account of that wood. Likewise, whether we say "Tathāgata", "liberated monk", or "Arahant", that concept was created only because of attachment to those five aggregates of grasping (pañcupādānakkhandha).

That is why, on one occasion, the Venerable Rādhā asked the Buddha: "Venerable Sir, it is said, 'a being, a being' (satto, satto). According to this Dispensation, what is called 'a being'?" Until then, the past schools had defined "being" as an eternal entity. But the Buddha gave a unique etymological definition to it, in the sense of being stuck or attached to form, feeling (vedanā), and so forth: "Rūpe kho, Rādhā, yo chando yo rāgo yā nandī yā taṇhā, tatra satto, tatra visatto, tasmā satto'ti vuccati"—"Rādhā, in the sense of being attached, specially attached to form, one is called 'a being'." Thus, just as the world was defined as that which crumbles, even the word "being" was defined by the Buddha in the sense of being attached to something.

Therefore, as long as one is attached to form, feeling (vedanā), and so forth, one exists. The moment one is liberated from them, there is no "being". It ends right there. But the world usually thinks of a "being" in association with the perception of a self. The world regards a "being" as a self. They think there is some unchanging core, an essence, here. The idea that there is some unchanging element either in form, in feeling (vedanā), or ultimately in consciousness (viññāṇa), is held by those of wrong views, who hold onto the dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi). The Buddha demonstrated that there is no such thing even in consciousness (viññāṇa).

What is there is only a grasping (upādāna) created through ignorance and craving (taṇhā). As long as that grasping (upādāna) exists, as long as that grasping (upādāna) is present, that person is entitled to that designation of "being" as a conventional reality. That person claims ownership, because there is a responsibility in it. That is why one goes on and on in saṃsāra. Because of grasping (upādāna), becoming (bhava) exists, just like a spreading fire. Then, if all the wood that spreads the fire is exhausted, if the oil in the lamp is exhausted, if the wick is also exhausted, what happens?

Khīṇaṃ purāṇaṃ navaṃ natthi sambhavaṃ,

virattacittā āyatike bhavasmim;

Te khīṇabījā avirūḷhicchandā,

nibbanti dhīrā yathāyaṃ padīpo.

That very story is found in this verse. Khīṇaṃ purāṇaṃ—the past is finished.

Navaṃ natthi sambhavaṃ—nothing new arises. Virattacittā āyatike bhavasmim—there is no longer any attachment or desire for future becoming (bhava). Te khīṇabījā avirūḥhicchandā—that seed of consciousness (viññāṇa) is destroyed, and therefore desire (chanda) does not spring up. Growth does not arise. Nibbanti dhīrā yathāyaṃ paḍīpo—like this lamp, those wise ones are extinguished.

So, that is how we understood the word Lokavidū. In these times, it can be understood and explained in various ways. But we had to present this specific aspect because we give a special place to this Eye of Wisdom.

Therefore, you devotees must consider: what is there for us to do? You must decide for yourselves whether you will become like Rohitassa, or whether you will walk this path pointed out by the Buddha.

On this valuable Vesak Poya day, this pious gathering has taken leave from their daily routines, and at least temporarily observed such a valuable virtue (sīla) and engaged in meditation. At this moment, you have listened to a Dhamma sermon that supports insight (vipassanā) and meditation. Therefore, relying on this store of merit accumulated so far, supported by your meditation practice, and through the association with noble friends, may you have the strength and power to realize the path, fruit, and penetration of Stream-entry, Once-returning, Non-returning, and Arahantship as soon as possible before the lamp of this Dispensation goes out, making an end to the suffering (dukkha) of saṃsāra and reaching the supreme end of the world! You should make the aspiration: "May the merit of listening to the Dhamma be a strong support for this!"

Likewise, may all beings, from Avīci hell up to the Akanitṭha heaven, who wish to rejoice in the merit of this giving and hearing of the Dhamma, by rejoicing in it, quickly make an end to the suffering (dukkha) of saṃsāra through their preferred state of Awakening! Having made this aspiration, please recite these verses:

Sutta Nipāta

Dear Listeners,

That liberation from saṃsāra, which was discovered by the world-transcending Sammā Sambuddha, is known to all of us by the name of Nibbāna. On certain occasions, the Buddha made a special effort to explain to the world what kind of thing this liberation from saṃsāra is. The parinibbāna of the great Arahant Dabba Mallaputta is one such occasion. The two highly extraordinary verses uttered by the Buddha on that occasion are what we have chosen as our topic today.

The great Arahant Dabba Mallaputta is indeed a wonderful and miraculous monk in this Dispensation. The beginning of his life was extraordinary, and its end was also extraordinary. He was born after his mother passed away. That is to say, while he was in his mother's womb, his mother died suddenly of some illness. Or perhaps her life force had ceased. For whatever reason, when the relatives took the pregnant mother's body, placed it on a funeral pyre, and lit the fire, the heat hit the abdominal wall, causing it to rupture, and the baby was flung out and fell onto a wooden log. The relatives took this child and handed him over to his grandmother. It is said that the child was named 'Dabba' because his life was saved by falling onto that log. The word 'Dabba' refers to timber, wood, or material objects. So this Dabba Mallaputta—'Malla' means he belonged to the Malla dynasty, in the Malla country. When this young boy was seven years old, the Buddha visited the Malla country. He arrived and resided in the Anupiya Mango Grove. At that time, this child saw the Buddha, gained faith in him, and obtained permission to ordain. At the time of ordination, as a matter of custom just like today, his preceptor gave him the meditation on the five skin-tactile parts (taca-pañcaka kammaṭṭhāna). This meditation topic (kammaṭṭhāna) consists of reflecting on the five impure parts of the body: hair of the head (kesā), hair of the body (lomā), nails (nakhā), teeth (dantā), and skin (taco). It is recorded that as soon as they began shaving his head, he attained the fruit of Stream-entry (Sotāpanna), and by the time they finished shaving his head, while still in the shaving-house, he attained Arahantship. Thus, he had already become an Arahant at the very moment of his ordination. The work of ordination was complete by the time his head was fully shaved.

Consequently, when he was in seclusion, a thought occurred to him: "The ultimate goal for which I ordained has already been realized. It would be good if I could perform some service for the Saṅgha." Thinking thus, he pondered: "I should request from the Buddha the duty of assigning lodgings (Senāsana-paññāpaka) and the duty of designating meal invitations (Bhattuddesaka) from the laity, selecting and appointing monks individually." When he expressed this wish to the Buddha, the Buddha praised him saying, "Sādhū! Sādhū!", gathered the Saṅgha, and by formal act of the Saṅgha (Saṅgha-sammuti), appointed him to those two positions. That is to say, assigning lodgings to visiting monks, and systematically sending monks to various places in response to meal invitations from the laity. He discharged these two duties exceptionally well. In particular, it is mentioned that regarding the assignment of lodgings, he was extremely attentive. It is stated that he assigned lodgings to the visiting monks who came to see the Buddha in a manner fitting their inclinations and temperaments. When monks who were Suttantikas—who preserved the Suttas by reciting and guarding them—arrived, he assigned them lodgings in the same place, thinking, "Let these Venerable Ones spend the night reciting the Suttas." When Vinayadharas (monks versed in the Vinaya) arrived, he assigned them lodgings in another separate place, thinking, "Let these Venerable Ones spend the night discussing questions of discipline." When Dhamma-preachers (Dhammakathika monks) arrived, he assigned them seats in yet another distinct place, thinking, "Let these spend the night discussing the Dhamma." When visiting monks arrived who had ordained merely for a livelihood and engaged in lowly talk (tiracchāna-kathā), he assigned them another separate place, thinking, "Let these people indulge in the gossip and lowly talk they are accustomed to." In this manner, not only did he assign lodgings in accordance with the nature of each individual, but when they arrived at untimely hours, late at night, even though there was no electric light like today, he would enter into the attainment of the fire-element (tejo-dhātu samāpatti) through the power of his meditative attainments to light the way and assign those lodgings. Thus, some monks would travel from afar just to witness the psychic power of this young Arahant, Dabba Mallaputta. They would deliberately arrive late at night. Having arrived, they would say, "Venerable Dabba, please assign us lodgings." Then he would ask, "Which lodging do you prefer?" They would name far-off lodgings: "Assign us lodgings on Vulture's Peak (Gijjhakūṭa), on Isigili, on Mount Vebhāra, in the Maddakucchi Deer Park, in Jīvaka's Mango Grove—assign us lodgings in those places," they would request.

And how did this Venerable One lead that group there? By a single finger! Entering the fire-element attainment, he would extend his index finger forward and walk before them. Guiding the group by that light to those lodgings, he would point out: "Here are the beds, here are the chairs, here is the drinking water," and so forth, and then return to Veluvana Monastery. Because he assigned lodgings so skillfully in this manner, the Buddha placed him in the position of foremost eminence (Etadagga). The Buddha declared Arahant Dabba Mallaputta to be the foremost among the monks who were skillful in assigning lodgings.

Although he was such a noble monk, due to certain karmic causes, he did not live long. At a very young age, the time arrived for his parinibbāna. At that time, the Buddha was residing in the Veluvana Monastery in Rājagaha. He went to the Buddha and said, "O Sugata, the time has come for my parinibbāna." The Buddha said, "Dabba, if the time has come for something, do what must be done." As soon as this was said, the great Arahant Dabba Mallaputta rose from his seat, paid homage to the Buddha, circumambulated him, rose into the air, sat cross-legged, entered into the fire-element attainment, and emerging from it, attained parinibbāna. Through the power of that fire-element attainment, he cremated his own body. Thus, the cremation took place right in the sky. When it was over, there was neither ash nor soot. Indeed, no ash was left, nor was any soot left behind. He did not even leave behind bodily relics (dhātu) for us to worship.

Because this was an extremely special event, the Buddha uttered an inspired utterance (udāna), a declaration of joy, at that moment. Today, if such a thing happens, people express grief. But the Buddha uttered a statement of joy. What was it?

Abhedi kāyo, nirodhi saññā, vedanā sītibhaviṃsu sabbā, vūpasamiṃsu saṅkhārā, viññāṇaṃ atthaṅgamā.

"The body broke up, perception ceased, all feelings (vedanā) cooled, preparations (saṅkhāra) became stilled, and consciousness (viññāṇa) went out (came to an end)."

"Abhedi kāyo"—the body broke up. "Nirodhi saññā"—perception ceased. "Vedanā sītibhaviṃsu sabbā"—all feelings became cool. Even though consumed by fire, they did not get hot; they cooled. "Vūpasamiṃsu saṅkhārā"—preparations became stilled. "Viññāṇaṃ atthaṅgamā"—consciousness went out, came to an end.

Not only was that inspired utterance (udāna) declared there, but that event was so exceptional that when the Buddha later visited Jetavana Monastery in Sāvattihī, he recalled that incident and said to the monks: "Monks, our Dabba has attained parinibbāna in this manner. At that time, when his body cremated, neither ashes remained, nor did any soot." Having explained this matter to the Saṅgha, he uttered the two highly extraordinary verses we have taken as our topic today:

Ayoghana-hatasseva, jalato jātavedaso,

anupubbūpasantassa,

yathā na ñāyate gati.

"Ayoghana-hatasseva"—the commentators point out that this word is difficult to understand. As far as we can understand, what is meant here is a fire blazing like a glowing mass of iron. When one sees a flame, it appears thick and dense like a mass of iron when it is blazing. "Ayoghana-hatasseva jalato jātavedaso"—"Jātaveda" means fire. Therefore, it refers to a fire blazing intensely as a solid mass, like a glowing lump of iron. "Anupubbūpasantassa"—after it has gradually gone out, "yathā na ñāyate gati"—just as the destination to which that flame went cannot be known,

Evaṃ sammā vimuttānaṃ, kāma-bandhohatāriṇaṃ,

pattānaṃ acaḷaṃ sukhāṃ,

gati na paññāpayatīti.

"Evaṃ sammā vimuttānaṃ"—even so, of those who are rightly liberated, "kāma-bandhohatāriṇaṃ"—who have crossed over the flood of the bonds of sensuality, "pattānaṃ acaḷaṃ sukhāṃ"—and who have attained unshakable happiness, there is no designating of their destination. That one cannot point out a path, saying they went by such-and-such a path—this is the point the Buddha expressed in the second verse.

Now, what we have before us is this question of parinibbāna. The parinibbāna of the great Arahant Dabba Mallaputta is, in a way, an exemplary parinibbāna. Why? Because he left nothing behind. There was no indication that he had kept anything for himself to take away, for form, feeling (vedanā), perception, preparations (saṅkhāra), and consciousness (viññāṇa) had all come to an end. He left nothing behind for us either—nothing to cremate, no relics to enshrine in a stupa. It was a complete parinibbāna. That is probably why the Buddha uttered these inspired utterances, these joyful statements, on two occasions regarding this event.

Now, when this is said, some people might feel afraid. Because we know, we often see announcements of death, saying: "May the deceased Upāsaka Siyadoris attain the bliss of Nibbāna." As we generally think, it is only after passing away to the next world that one receives the Nibbāna that was not attained in this world. Not only us, but to put it briefly, more than ninety-five percent of the people today who think, reflect, preach, speak, and argue about Nibbāna prioritize that very kind of "Appuhamy's Nibbāna." They believe that for the Buddhas and Arahants, or indeed anyone who has realized Nibbāna, the great city of the Deathless Nibbāna is a place one goes to after death. Do not ask where this great city of the Deathless Nibbāna is! But it exists after death, and everyone must go there. This is the story that remains.

Now we have to examine to what extent this is acceptable. Now, it is clear from these verses that the Buddha used the phrase "ayoghana-hatasseva jalato jātavedaso" here, which contains the word "ghana" (solid/dense). Actually, the reason for this delusion is that the world possesses a dogma of existence (bhava-diṭṭhi). There is a dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi / view of an existing group). They take all these things, such as feeling (vedanā) and so on, as a self. Especially, they take consciousness (viññāṇa), which is unseen, as the self. Consequently, we want to end the suffering (dukkha) of saṃsāra, but we also want to remain in existence (bhava / becoming) in some form. We want to do both. It is like wanting to keep one's beard and drink porridge at the same time. To satisfy that, we try to present a great city of Deathless Nibbāna through logic. But here, the Buddha has spoken about the extinguished fire using the phrase "ayoghana-hatasseva"—indeed, when a flame blazes like a solid iron ball. An ordinary person would think that a solid ball of iron is blazing. In that, the view of the ordinary worldling (puthujjana) is shown. But once even a flame is extinguished in that manner, one cannot point to its path—where it went. It is through this very question—"Where did the fire go after it was extinguished?"—that the Buddha answered the questions asked by various people, such as heretics, Nigaṇṭhas, and debaters, regarding the state of an Arahant after death. To put it briefly, most people forget that Nibbāna means extinguishing/cooling.

In this extinguishing/cooling, as the Buddha shows, this becoming (bhava / existence) is entirely distorted; it is like a fire. It is like a fire that burns because of grasping (upādāna / holding / fuel). The place where this fire is extinguished is what is called Nibbāna. Even though we say "the place where it extinguished," it is the extinguishing itself. Therefore, what is spoken of here is not an extinguishment after death. It is not a Nibbāna that one goes to after death. To put it briefly, the Buddha has roared his lion's roar in the Sīhanāda Sutta:

So bhagavā bodhāya dhammaṃ deseti danto

so bhagavā damathāya dhammaṃ deseti santo so bhagavā samathāya dhammaṃ deseti tiṇṇo

so bhagavā taraṇāya dhammaṃ deseti parinibbuto

so bhagavā parinibbānāya dhammaṃ deseti

If we take "Buddha" to mean "awakened," the awakened Blessed One teaches the Dhamma for awakening. The tamed Blessed One teaches the Dhamma for taming. The stilled Blessed One, who has stilled the defilements and so forth, teaches the Dhamma for stilling. The Blessed One who has crossed over teaches the Dhamma for crossing over. But then there is: "parinibbuto so bhagavā parinibbānāya dhammaṃ deseti"—the Blessed One, having attained parinibbāna, teaches the Dhamma for parinibbāna. This is a great problem. If we take parinibbāna to be a state after death, how could he teach the Dhamma after attaining parinibbāna? From this, we can see that the state of parinibbāna is something to be realized in this very life.

Even if we think of the Arahant Dabba Mallaputta whom we mentioned, when it is said that he entered the fire-element attainment, generated that power, and attained parinibbāna, it means he brought his mind to that liberated state. He separated his mind. It was like setting fire to a piece of clothing that had been removed from the body; that was how he set fire to his body. Instead of heat, what is expressed there is a cooling of sensations (vedanā). That cooling and so forth occurred through that parinibbāna. That is the state of parinibbāna.

Yet many people point out in such contexts that Buddhas, Paccekabuddhas, and Arahants who attain parinibbāna go and gather in some place. As evidence for this, there is a certain sutta that many people bring up, called the Pahārāda Sutta. It is a discussion that the lord of Asuras, Pahārāda, had with the Buddha. There, it is first stated, in response to a question by the Buddha, that the Asuras find delight and satisfaction in the great ocean because they see eight wonderful and marvelous qualities in it. We will not discuss all eight qualities here, but only the fifth quality, as it is relevant to our topic. The lord of Asuras says that just as all the rivers in the world flow into the ocean and rain falls from the sky, yet the great ocean does not show any fullness or depletion (does not overflow). Because of this fact, the Asuras delight in the great ocean. In comparison, the Buddha then shows that just like the eight wonderful and marvelous qualities of the great ocean, there are eight wonderful and marvelous qualities in this Dhamma and Vinaya. Among them, the fifth quality is presented thus: just as the ocean does not become full despite all the rivers flowing into it, even so, though many monks attain parinibbāna in the Nibbāna-element without residue (anupādisesa nibbāna-dhātu), no decrease or increase is seen in the Nibbāna-element. No decrease or increase is seen. Based on this passage, many people imagine that Arahants go and gather in a place called "Anupādisesa parinibbāna," and no matter how many go there, it never becomes full. But that this reasoning is incorrect is clear from the very description of the eighth wonderful and marvelous quality.

Describing the eighth quality, the lord of Asuras says that in this great ocean, there are beings of immense bodies. In those days, instead of large animals like whales, it mentions beings with giant bodies like the Timiṅgala, Timira, Piṅgala, Asuras, Nāgas, and Gandhabbas dwelling in the great ocean. This too is a wonderful and marvelous quality in which the Asuras delight. Drawing a parallel, the Buddha says that in this Dhamma and Vinaya, too, there are beings of great stature. Who are they? Those beings are designated as the Saṅgha of the eight noble individuals (aṭṭha-ariya-puggalā). The one who has attained the fruit of Stream-entry, the one practicing for that path, and likewise the Sakadāgāmī, the one on the path to Sakadāgāmī, up to the Arahant and the one on the path to Arahantship—as you devotees know. These are the eight noble individuals. It is these eight who are here. The Arahants who have attained parinibbāna are not included here. Now, this is a good opportunity to ask: when describing the great beings dwelling in the ocean, why is there no mention here of the Arahants who have attained parinibbāna? Then how are we to understand the first point mentioned?

Now, we must reflect: sometimes there are whirlpools in the ocean. Suppose those whirlpools exist, and at some point, they cease to exist. Then, there is neither decrease nor increase in the water of the ocean. Indeed, there is a very deep concept in this Dhamma. The Buddha shows that this active existence (becoming) is a distorted state. What we generally think of as the true state of affairs is false to the Buddhas. What the world calls truth is untruth to the Noble Ones, and what the Noble Ones call truth is untruth to the world. The Buddha declared this on one occasion. Here too, although the world makes a great deal of existence, the Buddha points to it as a distorted state. The Buddha explains that every concept of birth, death, and existence in this world is like a whirlpool swirling around consciousness (viññāṇa). The Buddha calls this vaṭṭa (the round). "Vaṭṭam vaṭṭati, vaṭṭam vaṭṭati paññāpanāya"—a whirlpool revolves in order to designate a certain place. So, one can point to "there" or "here" in the great ocean only when there are whirlpools. But this whirlpool is a distorted state. When a certain current tries to flow against the main body of water, and fails to do so, it spins in a circle, becomes compressed, gets thrown back, and finally hollows out an abyss. That is how a whirlpool is formed.

Similarly, forgetting the true nature of things in this world, due to ignorance (avijjā), and due to ignorance and craving (taṇhā / thirst), the consciousness (viññāṇa) of beings becomes active, searching for a permanent nature in an impermanent (anicca) world. Searching for what is beautiful in a loathsome world. Searching for pleasure in a world of suffering (dukkha). Searching for a self where there is only non-self (anattā). These are presented in the Dhamma as the four distortions (vipallāsa): regarding the impermanent (anicca) as permanent; regarding the foul as beautiful; regarding suffering (dukkha) as pleasure; regarding non-self (anattā) as self. Upon this distorted state, that whirlpool is formed. Everyone who is called an "individual" or a "being" is a whirlpool. Even if we speak of the Buddha, that too was a whirlpool that had spun for a long period of time. Even if we speak of a Paccekabuddha, that too is a whirlpool. In this manner, these whirlpools exist. The Arahants too, prior to attaining Arahantship, were whirlpools. In the final moment, they understand through wisdom this futile circling. Having understood the fruitlessness of this circling between consciousness (viññāṇa) [and name-and-form], seeing them as void, the moment the mind is liberated from them—that is when the whirlpool ceases to exist. At that point, no matter how many whirlpools disappear, there is neither decrease nor increase in the water of the ocean. Therefore, it is through this analogy of the whirlpool that we must understand what happens to the Arahants.

It is just like saying that the fire has gone out. The feeling that the fire went somewhere after being extinguished is a foolish view, a foolish statement. If someone asks whether the fire, after going out, went to the east, west, north, south, up, or down, that is a foolish notion. Similarly, if something existed due to causes and conditions, the place where those causes and conditions are removed is cessation (nirodha). That is what the Buddha points to by saying, "bhava-nirodho nibbānam"—the cessation of becoming (bhava / existence) is itself Nibbāna. The cessation of becoming is itself Nibbāna. Other than that, there is no other strange Nibbāna. The Buddha shows that this Nibbāna is realized in this very life.

That is why it is stated in the Ratana Sutta, which you all chant so often:

Khayaṃ virāgaṃ amataṃ paṇītaṃ,

Sakyamunī samāhito,

Na tena dhammena samatthi kiñci.

In this verse, "khayaṃ" refers to the destruction of craving (taṇhā / thirst), "virāgaṃ" to dispassion, and "amataṃ" to the Deathless. These are all names for Nibbāna. "Amataṃ"—there is the Deathless. Therefore, the Deathless is attained in this very life. "Amataṃ paṇītaṃ"—that sublime Deathless, "sakyamunī samāhito"—the Sage of the Sakyas realized through concentration (samādhī). It is because of this that Arahants are said to experience the Deathless. It is not a Deathless that comes after death. Now, it was by directing the mind toward that Deathless that the Arahant Dabba Mallaputta did not experience the pain of death. The pain of death arises because of grasping (upādāna / holding / fuel). Because of clinging. Because of attachment to the aggregates of form, feeling (vedanā), and so forth. Where these are removed, there is extinguishing/cooling. There, only extinguishing remains. It is due to grasping (upādāna) that follows the fire of craving (taṇhā) that a future birth arises, a future becoming (bhava) arises. Therefore, that becoming (bhava) exists because of grasping (upādāna). According to the Buddha's word, where grasping (upādāna) is absent, there is total extinguishment (parinibbāna). That is what is called "Anupādā-parinibbāna" (extinguishment without grasping). So, that is the situation. Therefore, we must understand this parinibbāna—this complete cooling.

As we mentioned earlier, it was said: "The Blessed One, having attained parinibbāna, teaches the Dhamma for parinibbāna." But today, when we speak of parinibbāna, we immediately think of the state of an Arahant after death. In reality, the mind that arises at the final moment of an Arahant is the fruit-mind (phala-citta). This is called the attainment of the fruit of Arahantship (Arahattaphala-samāpatti). This is a state already attained earlier. It presents itself at the moment of death as well. It is by bringing this forward that Māra is conquered. This matter is mentioned not only in that verse but in other places too. It is mentioned in the Ratana Sutta:

Yam buddhaseṭṭho parivaṇṇayī suciṃ,

Samādhimānantarikaññamāhu,

Samādhinā tena samo na vijjati.

"That pure concentration which the supreme Buddha praised, and which the wise call 'immediate' (ānantarika), there is no concentration equal to that concentration." "Samādhinā tena samo na vijjati"—no mundane concentration can be compared to that concentration. There is no concentration that can surpass it. Such is the wonderful supramundane concentration spoken of there. "Idam pi dhamme ratanaṃ paṇītaṃ"—this is the sublime gem in the Dhamma.

Now, something must be said about what this "ānantarika-samādhī" (immediate concentration) is. Before arriving at the fruit of Arahantship—what is called the path-mind (magga-citta)—one develops insight-knowledges (vipassanā-ñāṇa), and at their peak, immediately after that, one falls into the fruit. That is why it is called "ānantarika-samādhī." The concentration which is immediately followed by the realization of the fruit is called the "immediate concentration." That is path-concentration, which is the supramundane path-concentration. To put it briefly, there is a moment when all eight factors of the Noble Eightfold Path—such as Right View (sammā-diṭṭhi) and so forth, which you often mention—arise powerfully in a single mind-moment. It is through this that one cuts through the defilements and crosses over from the world. This is what is known as supramundane concentration. That concentration is something highly extraordinary.

There is another valuable sutta that reveals this. At one time, a monk named Bhaddaji came to visit Ven. Ānanda while he was residing at the Ghositārāma in Kosambī. Ven. Ānanda asked Ven. Bhaddaji five questions: "Venerable Bhaddaji, what is the foremost of sights? What is the foremost of sounds (hearings)? What is the foremost of pleasures? What is the foremost of perceptions? What is the foremost of becomings (bhava / existences)?"

When these five questions were asked, Ven. Bhaddaji answered as follows: "There is a Great Brahmā named Vasavatti. To see that Great Brahmā is the foremost of sights. Next, the foremost of hearings is explained as follows: there is a realm of devas called Ābhassara. The Ābhassara Brahmās are those who feed on joy in the Brahma world. These Ābhassara devas occasionally utter: 'Aho sukham! Aho sukham!' (Oh, what bliss! Oh, what bliss!). If someone hears that inspired utterance of the Ābhassara devas, that is the foremost of hearings. Next, the foremost of pleasures is: there is a realm of devas called Subhakiṇṇa. Those Subhakiṇṇa devas experience a wonderful bliss. The bliss they experience is the foremost among pleasures. Next, the foremost of perceptions is: there is the formless attainment of the sphere of nothingness (ākāṅkhaññāyatana), developed based on the object 'there is nothing.' The perception of those Ākāṅkhaññāyatana Brahmās is the foremost of perceptions. Next, the foremost of becomings, or the peak of existence, is: there are devas or Brahmās who have attained the sphere of neither-perception-nor-non-perception (nevasaññānāsaññāyatana), which is the highest state. Their state of Nevasaññānāsaññāyatana is the peak of becoming." When this was explained, Ven. Ānanda said: "Venerable Bhaddaji's explanation is indeed what most people have accepted. This explanation fits the views of the majority." Then Ven. Bhaddaji understood that this was not the true answer.

Thereupon, he invited Ven. Ānanda: "Venerable Ānanda is highly learned. May the correct answers to these questions occur to Venerable Ānanda himself." Thus he invited him to give the true answer. Then Ven. Ānanda said, "Then, Bhaddaji, listen carefully. I shall speak." The explanation given by Ven. Ānanda is this:

"How is the foremost of sights explained? If, while seeing in a certain way, there is immediately the destruction of the taints (āsavas), as it is stated, 'yathā passato anantarā āsavānaṃ khayō hoti' (seeing in such a way that the destruction of taints immediately follows)—that is the foremost of sights. If, while hearing in a certain way, there is immediately the destruction of the taints—that is the foremost of hearings. If, immediately following a certain pleasant abiding, there is the destruction of the taints—that is the foremost of pleasures. Next, if, upon a certain perception, there is immediately the destruction of the taints—that is the foremost of perceptions. If, from a certain state, there is immediately the destruction of the taints—that is the peak of becoming (bhava / existence), the highest point of existence."

Thus, from this last statement, we can reflect deeply. What was meant here by the "peak of becoming"? We know that according to the Buddha's analysis, "bhava-nirodho nibbānaṃ"—the cessation of becoming is itself Nibbāna. But this cessation of becoming is a direct realization. The aid that helps one fall into that direct realization is that very immediate concentration (ānantarika-samādhī) we mentioned. Then, immediately after that immediate concentration, one falls into Nibbāna, which is the cessation of becoming. This is a direct realization. Therefore, the state of the cessation of becoming itself is Nibbāna. It is a Nibbāna experienced in this very life. It is not that Nibbāna of Siyadoris in the next world. It is not "Siyadoris's Nibbāna." It is a total parinibbāna experienced completely in this very life. It helps at the final moment of death. Because it helps, as in a verse that you devotees also know from the Ratana Sutta:

Khīṇaṃ purāṇaṃ navaṃ natthi sambhavaṃ,

Virattacittā'yatike bhavasmim,

Te khīṇabījā avirūḥhicchandā,

Nibbanti dhīrā yathāyaṃ padīpo.

"Khīṇaṃ purāṇaṃ"—whatever past kamma-forces existed have been completely destroyed. "Navaṃ natthi sambhavaṃ"—there is nothing to generate a new becoming (bhava / existence). "Virattacittā āyatike bhavasmim"—the mind is detached from any future becoming or rebirth. "Te khīṇabījā"—the consciousness-seed (viññāṇa-bīja) of those Arahants has been destroyed. If it were not destroyed, that consciousness-seed would sprout. The consciousness-seed of an ordinary person sprouts in the field of kamma as soon as it receives the water or moisture of craving (taṇhā / thirst). That is why the Buddha's word says: "Kammaṃ khettaṃ, viññāṇaṃ bījaṃ, taṇhā sineho" (Kamma is the field, consciousness is the seed, craving is the moisture). That undestroyed consciousness in the field of kamma is indeed that consciousness (viññāṇa) that is accompanied by name-and-form (nāmarūpa). Therefore, "te khīṇabījā"—the consciousness-seed of the Arahants has been destroyed. Because of this, there is no room for craving (taṇhā) to arise again. That seed has no power to grow again. Because of that, what happens next is stated: "nibbanti dhīrā yathāyaṃ padīpo"—those steadfast, wise ones go out just like this lamp. This too goes out just like the fire that is extinguished. The question of where the lamp goes after it goes out is also a foolish question. The oil is finished, the wick is finished, the lamp went out. That is all. So, this cannot be found again. And there is nothing to fear about this. For it is the end of the suffering of saṃsāra, is it not?

The soul-theorist Brahmins often accused the Buddha of being an annihilationist (ucchedavādī). Today, it is not only soul-theorist Brahmins, but even Buddhists themselves accuse people of having such views. But what is the answer the Buddha gave to this? "They accuse me falsely of saying something I do not say. In the past as well as today, I declare only this: suffering (dukkha) and the cessation of suffering." "Pubbe cāhaṃ bhikkhave etarahi ca dukkhañceva paññāpemi dukkhassa ca nirodhaṃ"—in the past as well as today, this is all I show: suffering (dukkha) and the cessation of suffering (dukkha-nirodha). The teaching of the Four Noble Truths is a very wonderful teaching. It declares that the entire five aggregates of grasping (pañcupādānakkhandhā) are suffering (dukkha); there is nothing to be salvaged or left over from this. Therefore, these aggregates of grasping (upādāna)—that is what was called that distorted state. The whirlpool is like a distorted state arising in the great ocean. From the day the whirlpool is formed, if at any point this distorted state occurs, from then on, between that consciousness (viññāṇa) and name-and-form (nāmarūpa), "vaṭṭaṃ vaṭṭati" (the round revolves). As it is said there, "ettāvatā vaṭṭaṃ vaṭṭati" (thus far does the round revolve). Wherever dependent arising (paṭiccasamuppāda) is shown and analyzed, it is pointed out that there is a round (vaṭṭa) between consciousness (viññāṇa) and name-and-form (nāmarūpa). It is upon the spinning of this saṃsāric round that the five aggregates of grasping (upādāna) are built up. Now, when a whirlpool spins, we know that at first, it tries to go forward. When it cannot do so, it spins backward, forming a circle or a wheel, and digs down into an abyss. Meanwhile, it draws into itself everything around it through that force of attraction. Our body is just like that. From the day of conception in the mother's womb, it draws in the essence of the womb, the essence of the food taken by the mother, through the umbilical cord. As if that drawing-in were not enough, after coming out, this whirlpool draws in the essence of the entire world to build up these five aggregates of grasping (upādāna). Not only food, but other things too—neighbors' lands, wealth, all of these are drawn in by that whirlpool. So, it is this very personal whirlpool that is called an "individual." Including Bodhisattas. These are whirlpools that have come down the great ocean of time for so long. Even the Buddhas, Paccekabuddhas, and Arahants must be understood by us in this way. Despite our great reverence for them, they too traveled for a long time in saṃsāra as these whirlpools, until at some point, they attained liberation through the realization of wisdom.

How did they attain liberation? They understood that instead of taking this name-and-form (nāmarūpa) as a self, it is a relationship of cause and condition—that if there is consciousness (viññāṇa), because of consciousness there is name-and-form, and not a single one of these arises on its own. The simile given by the Arahant Sāriputta for this is of two sheaves of reeds leaning against each other: if one is pulled away, the other falls; if the other is pulled away, the first falls. Such is their mutual conditionality (aññamañña-paccayatā). Only a Buddha introduces this mutual conditionality to the world. Until then, those yogis and others take something or other as a self. At the very least, they take even the attainment of Nevasaññānāsaññāyatana as a self. Only the Buddha pointed out that there is nothing here to be taken as a single unit. Even if we speak of a sense-base (āyatana), in all of them there is only a great friction, a turmoil. That itself is suffering (dukkha). Therefore, when this turmoil between consciousness (viññāṇa) and name-and-form (nāmarūpa) is stilled at some point, then there is only the great ocean. To the great ocean, there was neither decrease nor increase. That is where the analogy of the great ocean fits. It is not some mystical, indescribable, hidden place where Arahants go and gather.

Now, this matter is made clearer by what we said earlier: that the consciousness-seed (viññāṇa-bīja) has been destroyed. The undestroyed consciousness-seed lies latent; it clings tightly to name-and-form (nāmarūpa) as a self. There is a term in the Dhamma for the destroyed/ceased consciousness: "anidassana-viññāṇa" (non-manifestative consciousness). In that consciousness, there is nothing; there is nothing to be pointed out. That very state was introduced by the Buddha to the world on certain occasions as a unique sphere (āyatana). The world knows only the six sense-bases (āyatana). These sense-bases, as you devotees have heard, are the eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind. These become sense-bases when they function together with their respective objects. There is a constant activity between the eye and forms, the ear and sounds, and so forth. It is within this sixfold sense-base (saḷāyatana), which functions like that whirlpool, that the entire world exists, as he declared. No matter what modern physics says, the Buddha shows that the world is something that arises within these very six sense-bases and ceases within these very six sense-bases.

That is why the Buddha declared that within this very fathom-long body, endowed with perception and mind, he points out the world, the origin of the world, the cessation of the world, and the path leading to the cessation of the world. On certain occasions, the Buddha pointed to a state where these six sense-bases are ceased. He also described that as a sphere (āyatana) on certain occasions. The cessation of the six sense-bases, the cessation of the sense-bases, is something that can be directly realized. Pointing to that cessation, the Buddha says: "Monks, there is that sphere; what kind of sphere is it?" In that sphere, there is nothing related to the material elements we make much of, namely earth (pathavī), water (āpo), fire (tejo), and air (vāyo); nor are there any of the formless attainments. Neither the sphere of infinite space (ākāsānañcāyatana) nor the sphere of infinite consciousness (viññāṇaṇcāyatana) is there. Neither this world nor the next world is there; neither sun nor moon. There is no coming, no going, no standing, no passing away (cuti), and no birth (jāti / arising). To put it briefly, the Buddha finally describes that state as "appatiṭṭhaṃ appavattaṃ anārammaṇaṃ"—without support, without occurrence, and without object. Meaning, there is no establishing, no continuation, and no object. What is shown by this list of negations? These are all bonds. All those bonds that existed in saṃsāra have been broken. Things that had been constructed as saṃsāric things. Now, we have created those things called material forms through grasping (upādāna) those four elements. Therefore, what is shown here is the removal of that grasping (upādāna). Indeed, this highly wonderful state of non-manifestative consciousness (anidassana-viññāṇa) is itself the attainment of the fruit of Arahantship experienced by the Arahants.

If we take a good illustration of this from the Buddha's life itself, which you devotees may have heard of, on one occasion in the Mahāparinibbāna Sutta, the Buddha relates a certain experience of his to the monks: "Monks, once when I was resting in a threshing-house at Ātumā, there was a great torrential downpour of rain. At that moment, two farming brothers and four oxen were killed by a lightning strike. Consequently, a large crowd of people gathered there. I came out of the threshing-house and asked someone in the crowd, 'Why is such a large crowd gathered here?' Then the person said, 'A great rain came, lightning struck, and two men and four oxen were killed. But, Blessed One, where were you?' 'I was right here.' 'But were you asleep, Blessed One?' 'No, I was awake.' 'Did you not hear it?' 'I did not hear it.' 'Did you not see it?' 'I did not see it.'" When the Buddha spoke thus, that person remarked, "This is truly wonderful! So, while awake and conscious, you did not see any of this?" "Yes," the Buddha replied. It was in that very state that he had been. At times when the mind is separated from the world, none of those sights and sounds of the world are felt by the Buddha.

Although many instances of Arahants abiding in the attainment of the fruit of Arahantship are mentioned in the Dhamma, those who hold that "Siyadoris view" turn it into a world. That place they point to is a mystical, strange, indescribable world. They believe that is where the Arahants go. It is within this very notion that many Buddhists are trapped. We have to remind you that this is something related to that Brahminical view which nurtures the dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi) and the craving for existence (bhava-taṇhā).

To resolve this, we must understand that this active existence (becoming) is a distorted thing according to the Buddha's word. The ordinary world makes a big deal out of existence. The Buddha says it is a distorted state. It is like a current trying to do the impossible in the great ocean. Though that current tries to go forward, it is forced to turn back. When it cannot go forward due to constant friction, it digs down and creates an abyss. But we can see one thing there: we can point to the place where there is a whirlpool. In the great ocean, there is nothing to point one's finger at. But if there is a whirlpool, one can say "there it is," or "here it is." One can say "this person" or "that person." Or, in the case of the Saṅgha, one can say "that place" or "this place." One is able to say so only because a whirlpool exists. But just because one can say so, it does not mean there is a self-nature there. What is there is only a great friction; it is not a single unit. The Buddha pointed out this fact to the world—that active existence is nothing but suffering (dukkha). No other non-Buddhist teacher or founder of a religion can accept this. Why can they not accept it? Because they are trapped within that dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-ditṭhi), grasping tightly to a view of self. The Buddha pointed this out through the teaching of dependent arising (paṭiccasamuppāda). Because of ignorance (avijjā), many preparations (saṅkhāra) are constructed. A part of all those constructions is the division between consciousness (viññāṇa) and name-and-form (nāmarūpa). And having divided these two, it is like playing a game of draughts on a board. If we want to play draughts, no matter how close two friends are, we must divide into two opposing sides. You devotees know that when there is a match or a competition nowadays, even friends must divide into two sides to compete.

This active existence is exactly like that. There is a constant game going on between consciousness (viññāṇa) and name-and-form (nāmarūpa). It is a circular movement. It will never come to an end. The Buddha saw this state as a friction, as suffering (dukkha). This is exactly what is active within our own body as well. Having taken an breath in, can we just stop there? We are forced to breathe out. Having breathed out, can we stop? We are forced to breathe in again. We took food this morning; can we keep it as it is? Is there an end to it? Such is this body, the place we have taken as "myself." If we designate a "here," a "there" is also created. If we designate a "there," a "here" is also created. If we designate "this person," "that person" is created. If we designate "that person," "this person" is created. In this manner, the world is trapped within a duality. That is why the Buddha declared: "Monks, I speak to you of dyads. What is the dyad? The eye and forms, the ear and sounds, the nose and odors... other than this dyad, there is no other dyad in the world." In that manner, within this entire body and within our active existence, such a transaction is constantly taking place. This transaction is never one that can be resolved. Therefore, the Buddha shows that the entirety of active existence is suffering (dukkha). Nothing but the sheer five aggregates of grasping (pañcupānakkhandha). Now, when many people explain the truth of suffering (dukkha-sacca), they go on repeating: birth is suffering, aging is suffering, death is suffering, and so forth. But in the end, the Buddha shows that, in brief, the five aggregates of grasping (pañcupādānakkhandhā)—the five heaps of grasping—themselves are suffering (dukkha).

Now, next we have, as we mentioned earlier, that perception of solidity (ghana-saññā). There is a designation here that helps in insight meditation (vipassanā-bhāvanā). The ordinary world abides within the perception of solidity. That is why they take the flame as a single unit. Even a small child, when seeing a flame, might try to touch it as if it were a solid wall. Thus, the world remains stuck in the perception of solidity. But when the meditator, with a concentrated mind, arouses radical attention (yoniso manasikāra) as shown by the Buddha, arouses mindfulness and clear comprehension (sati-sampajañña), and understands the phenomena of name-and-form (nāmarūpa), what appeared as a single unit is seen as a mere heap. What is there is the "perception of a heap" (rāsi-saññā). It is by bringing out this perception of a heap that one gradually enters the path of insight. By entering that, what follows next is disenchantment (nibbidā). When one sees things as they really are, disenchantment arises naturally. Seeing things as they really are through the knowledge of things as they are (yathābhūta-ñāṇa), one cannot help but become disenchanted. One cannot remain without disenchantment. Together with the knowledge and vision of things as they are (yathābhūta-ñāṇadassana), disenchantment arises. Through that disenchantment, next comes relinquishment/dispassion (virāga / letting go). It is when there is relinquishment (letting go) that that parinibbāna occurs. That letting go includes those very elements we make much of in the world: earth (pathavī), water (āpo), fire (tejo), and air (vāyo).

Nowadays, as you devotees know, is an era in which views grow very strong. When speaking of this materialist view, we can once again recall the great Arahant Dabba Mallaputta. "Dabba," as we said, means matter or material object. "Dabba" means material object—not only wood, but what is referred to as "matter" today as well. Yet, because of the power of his merit, the fire on the funeral pyre could not burn the great Arahant Dabba Mallaputta's body even after his mother had died. Nevertheless, through his own power of determination and the attainment of the fire-kasiṇa (tejo-kasiṇa samāpatti), he cremated his own body in the final moment so that neither ashes nor soot remained. In that too, he threw a challenge to physical matter. That is why the Buddha declared that statement of joy so specially here. For within the Buddha's Dhamma, as you devotees all know: let us imagine this entire sublime Dhamma to be a library. This library opens in the Dhammapada with the two verses:

Manopubbaṅgamā dhammā, manoseṭṭhā manomayā.

In both verses, that fact is mentioned. It is a natural law. What is shown there is "mano-pubbaṅgamā dhammā"—this Dhamma, the Buddha's Dhamma, is mind-led. It is not matter-led. Mind precedes all things. Mind is foremost. "Manomayā"—all these are made of mind, when one looks at it ultimately.

When viewed in accordance with that mind-led philosophy, the Buddha shows that even those things taken as "matter" do not hold sway due to that supramundane concentration. It is as if they do not exist. There are none of the elements of earth (pathavī), water (āpo), fire (tejo), or air (vāyo). The concepts that arise in association with them—coming, going, standing, birth (jāti / arising), passing away—none of them are registered in that consciousness (viññāṇa). That is why that consciousness was called "khīṇa-bīja" (with seeds destroyed). It does not grow again in a mother's womb. It has been destroyed. That seed—the consciousness-seed of the Arahants—has been destroyed.

That is why, at the final moment, that incident of the Buddha at Ātumā which we mentioned is also exactly similar. If we take the Buddha's life itself as our exemplar, it is mentioned that on one occasion, when Devadatta rolled down a rock, even though the rock did not fall on the Buddha due to his Buddha-power, a splinter struck him, causing a serious injury to the Buddha's foot. A painful sensation (vedanā) also arose. In fact, Jīvaka the physician even had to treat it. But it is stated in the Dhamma that on one occasion, he overcame even that intense pain through the power of the fruit (phala-shaktiya). By directing his mind to that fruit-power. In that manner, the Arahants possessed a certain power. Whatever the case at other times, they bring this forward at the final moment, and it is through this that the Arahant sets fire to his own body, just like someone taking off and burning a worn-out piece of clothing.

Therefore, we can understand that this parinibbāna—this Nibbāna—is something right here. If one thinks of it as something that exists after death, one will never be motivated to make the effort required for it. There is nothing wrong with wishing: "May the merit performed by Siyadoris Appuhamy in this life, and the merit we share, be a supportive condition (upanissaya) for Nibbāna some day." But if one wishes: "May he be born in a strange world of Nibbāna after death," that is incorrect. It is the same regarding the Arahants and the Buddha. No matter how respectfully we speak of them, we must understand that they too were whirlpools that had spun in saṃsāra for a long time. Having understood those whirlpools as suffering (dukkha), it was said: "the cessation of suffering is Nibbāna." That is why the Buddha declared in the face of the Brahmins' accusations: "I do not say anything else. The world cries out about suffering (dukkha). It is the solution to that which I present here." "In the past as well as today, I declare only suffering (dukkha) and the cessation of suffering (dukkha-nirodha)." That is why, as you devotees know, the cessation of suffering (dukkha-nirodha) is shown to be Nibbāna in the Four Noble Truths. Yet, that many scholars bring up some strange thing in addition to this is because they have succumbed to that dogma of existence (bhava-diṭṭhi). They want to keep something back. But there is no such state in the Dhamma. This is a highly wonderful Dhamma.

This very state is what is mentioned in that passage shown as the reflection on peace (upasamanussati):

"Etaṃ santam etaṃ paṇītaṃ yadidaṃ sabbasaṅkhārasamatho sabbūpadhipaṭinissaggo taṇhakkhayo virāgo nirodho nibbānaṃ."

"This is peaceful, this is sublime, namely, the stilling of all preparations (saṅkhāra), the relinquishing of all assets (upadhi), the destruction of craving (taṇhā / thirst), dispassion (virāga), cessation (nirodha), extinguishing (Nibbāna)."

Now, you devotees must reflect: if the target you aim at is wrong, your shooting will not be successful. Correcting the target, which is Right View (sammā-diṭṭhi)—one must straighten one's view. If one holds a wrong view (micchā-diṭṭhi) under the name of Right View, one will not arrive at Nibbāna. Therefore, we wish that this Dhamma sermon delivered today may help you purify that view.

Thus, having undertaken some virtue (sīla) on this valuable day, practicing a meditation you are accustomed to, and using this sermon as an aid, may you complete your study of the Dhamma and meditation before the decline of the Buddha's Dispensation, and as quickly as possible, bring an end to this whirlpool of the terrifying saṃsāric journey, and find peace in the supreme, great Deathless Nibbāna! May you understand that this supreme, great Deathless Nibbāna is something right here! That is what we hope for. Wishing that whatever living beings from Avīci to Akaniṭṭha wish to receive merit may, through sharing in the merit of this Dhamma teaching and Dhamma hearing, as quickly as possible attain the supreme, great Deathless Nibbāna through whichever of the three Bodhi states they aspire to, please recite these verses:

Passa cittakataṃ bimbaṃ, arukāyaṃ samussitaṃ; Āturaṃ bahusaṅkappaṃ, yassa natthi dhuvaṃ ṭhiti.

From:

Verse 147 from the Jarāvagga (Chapter on Old Age) of the Dhammapada

Dear Listeners,

The Buddha realized that the perception of beauty (subha-saññā) regarding this bodily cage is a powerful bond that binds beings to saṃsāra. He taught the perception of foulness (asubha-saññā) to shatter this perception of beauty which nurtures defilements like lust, because the disillusionment with saṃsāra generated through it assists in liberation.

From today's thematic verse and the relevant story, we will be able to bring to light many facts that align with this matter. This verse of Dhamma was preached by the Buddha while residing at the Veḷuvana monastery in Rājagaha. This sermon was delivered concerning Sirimā, the famous courtesan of that city. This Sirimā of Rājagaha was the younger sister of the physician Jīvaka. She, who was a highly renowned courtesan of supreme beauty, on one occasion listened to the Dhamma from the Buddha and attained a fruit of the path [the fruit of Stream-entry]. The very next day, she offered a grand alms-giving to the Saṅgha led by the Buddha and obtained permission to offer ration-meals (salāka-bhatta) daily to eight monks in her home. There was a system of ration alms called salāka-bhatta in those days. Daily, eight monks were selected by the ration system, the lottery-rice system, and they would journey there. This woman, with great faith, offered the alms-food in an extremely exquisite manner. She offered alms-food sufficient for three or four monks to just one monk.

One day, a certain monk who partook of the alms-food at Sirimā's house went to a temple several leagues (yojanas) away. In the evening, when the Saṅgha assembled, the monks asked this monk, "Where did you partake of alms-food today?" So he replied, "I came after consuming the eight portion-meals of Sirimā." They asked, "How is it? Does she give alms well?" "Oh, it is beyond description! She offers alms in an extremely delicious manner, enough for two or three monks. However, her physical beauty is far more exquisite than the alms-food," he said. He even went on to describe her physical beauty in detail. Hearing this, a young monk who was present there conceived a thought: "Somehow, I must see this woman." Setting out that very day, by the time dawn broke the next morning, he arrived in that area and obtained the turn for the ration meal (salāka-bhatta).

Meanwhile, a certain event took place at Sirimā's house. Almost immediately after the monks had departed having consumed alms the previous day, Sirimā fell seriously ill; she removed her ornaments and lay down on her side. By the time the monk arrived for his turn of the ration-meal (salāka-bhatta) the next day, she was so weak she could not even get up. When informed that the monks had arrived, she told her maidservants, "Then you all prepare and offer the alms-food." After the alms-food was offered, Sirimā finally approached the monks with the help of those maidservants. Being supported and trembling all over, she came and paid homage to the monks. Due to some agitation (saṃvega) caused by this, that young monk did not even eat the alms-food there. Taking his bowl, he returned to the monastery, placed the bowl aside without eating, and lay down. Though other monks urged him to eat, he took no food. In this manner, three days passed.

Meanwhile, on the evening of that very day, Sirimā passed away due to that illness. The King sent a message to the Buddha: "Sirimā, the sister of physician Jīvaka, has passed away." The Buddha sent a message back to the King: "Do not cremate Sirimā's body. Keep it protected in the cemetery so that dogs and jackals cannot get close to it." After three days had passed in this manner, by the fourth day, that body, like a burst pot of cooked rice, like a nest of worms, began to ooze worms from its nine openings.

And then, in accordance with the Buddha's skillful means (upāya-kusala), the King had the drum beaten: "Everyone in this city, except for the children left to guard the houses, must come to the charnel ground. Anyone who does not come will be fined eight Kahāpaṇas." He also invited the Buddha and the Saṅgha of monks. When the Buddha and the Saṅgha were preparing to set out, the other monks near the young monk said, "Look, the Teacher is going to see Sirimā." As soon as the word "Sirimā" was heard, this monk scrambled up and asked, "What did you say?" They replied, "The Buddha is going to see Sirimā. Are you coming?" He said, "Oh, indeed I must go!" and got up, discarded the rice which had gone stale by then, washed his alms-bowl which had rusted, hung it over his shoulder, and set out.

By that time, the fourfold assembly had gathered there. The Buddha asked the King, "Whose body is this?" The King replied, "This is the body of that Sirimā." "Then, beat the drum in the city and auction this Sirimā," the Buddha said. To speak in terms of those times, the auction bid started at a thousand Kahāpaṇas, which was the amount Sirimā charged for a day. They beat the drum announcing: "Anyone who wishes to pay a thousand Kahāpaṇas and take this body of Sirimā, let him take it." There was not a sound from anyone. "Then reduce the price," the Buddha said. Five hundred Kahāpaṇas, one hundred, fifty, ten, one Kahāpaṇa, and at least a kākaṇika—an extremely small coin in those days. Even when that was said, no one was ready to take her. Then, he said to take her even for free. Yet, no one was ready to take her.

Then the Buddha declared: "Monks, do you see? The body of Sirimā, for whose companionship they used to pay a thousand Kahāpaṇas a day, no one is ready to take now even for free. This is the nature of the body." It was on that occasion that he uttered this valuable verse:

- > Passa cittakatam bimbam, arukāyam samussitam;
- > Āturam bahusaṅkappam, yassa natthi dhuvam thiti.*

Every single word is extremely profound. 'Passa cittakatam bimbam - arukāyam samussitam' — look at this image (bimbam), this statue-like body which is beautifully adorned and held upright, filled with sores. 'Āturam bahusaṅkappam - yassa natthi dhuvam thiti' — in this diseased body which awakens many prolific thoughts, there is no changelessness, permanence, or stable duration (thiti). This is what is conveyed by the verse.

It is recorded that after listening to this sermon, that monk attained the fruit of Stream-entry (Sotāpatti-phala). It is also mentioned that a large crowd of people attained realization of the Dhamma. From this story, we can reflect on how, according to the Buddha's skillful wisdom, he held a certain auction to demonstrate the reality of that body. It did not yield even as much income as a flower-basket auction held nowadays. Yet, as a priceless income, supramundane paths and fruits were attained due to that auction. So, it was to reveal the actual state of the body that the Buddha used every single word in this verse.

'Passa cittakatam bimbam' — though adorned with various sorts of grooming and fashions, this image (bimba), as it is called, is like a statue. This statue, held upright and supported by bones and sinews, is diseased (ātura). Even if we do not consider the illnesses mentioned in the Girimānanda Sutta, there are at least six basic illnesses inherent to the body, namely: cold (sīta), heat (uṇha), hunger (jighacchā), thirst (pipāsā), defecation (uccāra), and urination (passāva).

One feels cold, one feels heat, one feels hunger, one feels thirst, and one is compelled to defecate and urinate—this is the reality of this body. Another indicator of this diseased state is that the body cannot be kept in a single posture. Like a sick person, one is constantly forced to change the postures of the body. Such is the nature of the body. Yet, it is bahusaṅkappaṃ—it is an image that awakens the poetic imaginations of the world, of artists, painters, and poets. Āturaṃ bahusaṅkappaṃ; but in this, 'yassa natthi dhuvam ṭhiti', there is no stability, which is what the Buddha declared. Thus, by listening to this verse and the sermon, and by realizing the true nature of the body, a vast crowd attained Dhamma-realization on that occasion.

Even if we reflect on that monk, we can extract a certain lesson. Sometimes even a small child blows soap bubbles. Having blown a soap bubble, when it looks beautiful, they chase after it. In the end, when it bursts, what state is it reduced to? Something similar happened to that young monk. He came from far away to see the beauty of Sirimā. But by then, she was a sick Sirimā, ill and trembling, being supported by others. Then, three or four days later, as soon as he heard that name, he rose and came, thinking that today at least he could behold her beauty. But in the end, it was a corpse like a nest of worms. That alone was sufficient for the picture of the body he had hitherto imagined to shatter, and through that, to see the danger (ādīnava). In this saṃsāra, there are three lessons to be learned.

There are three stages known as gratification (assāda), danger (ādīnava), and escape (nissaraṇa). The side of gratification refers to the gratification, the sensory enjoyment, derived from forms in relation to the five-fold cords of sensual pleasure. The Buddha does not deny that it exists. The Buddha says that if there were no such gratification, the world would not run after gratification. That is acknowledged. But far greater is the aspect of danger (ādīnava). It is because of this danger that those who once ran after gratification eventually see its danger and become disillusioned. If, at the moment of disillusionment, the Dhamma is properly understood, one then reaches the state described as the third stage. That is escape (nissaraṇa). Escape means departing from it, detaching from it, being liberated. What assists in this escape is the Buddha's teaching on the three characteristics (tilakkhaṇa): impermanent (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and non-self (anattā). That escape is what we have in this world to lead us towards Nibbāna.

It is this very matter that the Buddha brought to light through this story and the verse. This is a very systematic aspect found in the Dhamma. There is a highly famous and valuable sutta in the Majjhima Nikāya called the Mahā-dukkhakkhandha Sutta. It shows how the Buddha, in a most marvelous manner through dialogue with the monks, using a question-and-answer method, tried to drive home these points. On one occasion, he asks the monks:

"Monks, suppose there is a maiden of the Khattiya class—she is described as a maiden there—or of the Brāhmaṇa class, or of the householder class, who is about fifteen or sixteen years of age, neither too tall nor too short, neither too thin nor too fat, neither too dark nor too fair, possessing exquisite beauty of complexion. What do you think, monks? Is her beauty at that time supreme? Does she possess supreme physical beauty?"

"Yes, Venerable Sir."

"Well, monks, whatever pleasure and joy arise in dependence on beauty—that is the gratification (assāda) of beauty."

Thus, the Buddha declared the gratification of forms (rūpa) there, and the monks agreed. Whatever happiness and joy arise while she is in that beautiful state, that is the aspect of gratification. Next, the Buddha begins:

"Now monks, on a later occasion, when that same sister has reached eighty, ninety, or a hundred years of age, decrepit, bent like a crooked rafter, with broken teeth, grey hair, bald-headed, wrinkled skin, and blotched body—what do you think, monks? Has her former beauty vanished, and has the danger (ādīnava) appeared?"

"Yes, Venerable Sir."

"Furthermore, monks, on a later occasion, that same sister is seen afflicted, severely ill, lying in her own excrement and urine, lifted up by others and put to bed by others. What do you think, monks? Has her former beauty vanished, and has the danger appeared?"

"Yes, Venerable Sir."

The Buddha confirms that this too is a danger of forms. Next, he says:

"Furthermore, monks, on a later occasion, that same sister is seen discarded in a charnel ground, dead for one, two, or three days, bloated, livid, and oozing purulent matter. What do you think, monks? Has her former beauty vanished, and has the danger appeared?"

"Yes, Venerable Sir."

"This too is a danger of forms."

"Furthermore, monks, on a later occasion, that same sister is seen being devoured by crows, by vultures, by hawks, by dogs, by jackals, or by various other creatures, reduced to a worm-infested carcass. What do you think, monks? Has her former beauty vanished, and has the danger appeared?"

"Yes, Venerable Sir."

"This too, monks, is a danger of forms."

"Furthermore, monks, on a later occasion, that same sister is seen discarded in the charnel ground as a skeleton held together by sinews, with flesh and blood adhering to it. What do you think, monks? Has her former beauty vanished, and has the danger appeared?"

"Yes, Venerable Sir."

"This too, monks, is a danger of forms."

"Furthermore, monks, on a later occasion, that same sister is seen discarded in the charnel ground as a skeleton held together by sinews, fleshless, smeared with blood. What do you think, monks? Has her former beauty vanished, and has the danger appeared?"

"Yes, Venerable Sir."

"This too, monks, is a danger of forms."

"Furthermore, monks, on a later occasion, that same sister is seen discarded in the charnel ground as a skeleton held together by sinews, without flesh and blood. What do you think, monks? Has her former beauty vanished at that moment, and has the danger appeared?"

"Yes, Venerable Sir."

"This too is a danger of forms."

"Furthermore, monks, on a later occasion, that same sister is seen with her bones disconnected and scattered in all directions—here a hand-bone, there a foot-bone, here a shin-bone, there a thigh-bone, here a hip-bone, there a back-bone, here a skull. At that moment, what do you think, monks? Has her former beauty vanished, and has the danger appeared?"

"Yes, Venerable Sir."

"This too is a danger of forms."

"Furthermore, monks, on a later occasion, that same sister is seen with her bones turned white, of the color of a conch-shell, after more than a year has passed, piled up in a heap. And then, after still more time has passed, those bones are seen rotted and crumbled into dust. What do you think, monks? Has the beauty she possessed when she was fifteen or sixteen years of age vanished, and has the danger appeared?"

"Yes, Venerable Sir."

"This, monks, is the danger of forms."

"And what, monks, is the escape (nissaraṇa) from forms?"

The Buddha declares the escape as well:

"Monks, the removal of desire and lust (chanda-rāga-vinaya) for forms, the subsiding of desire and lust, the abandoning of desire and lust—that is, the freeing of attachment, craving, and passion towards them—this is the escape from forms, the departure from forms."

In this manner, a scenario where the Blessed One presented and illustrated the stages of gratification, danger, and escape step-by-step to convince the monks is recorded in that Mahā-dukkhakkhandha Sutta.

We must realize from this why the Buddha did all this: it was for the abandoning of desire and lust (chanda-rāga-pahāṇa). Liberation from forms means managing one's thoughts in a way that eradicates the attachment to forms. It is to bring to the fore disillusionment, disillusionment with saṃsāra (saṃsāra-nibbidā).

The Buddha has expressed this matter on another occasion in a valuable verse:

> Na te kāmā yāni citrāni loke,

> Saṅkapparāgo purisassa kāmo,

> Tiṭṭhanti citrāni tatheva loke,

> Athettha dhīrā vinayanti chandaṃ.

'Na te kāmā yāni citrāni loke' — the beautiful things in the world are not themselves sensual pleasures. 'Saṅkapparāgo purisassa kāmo' — the lust of conceptualized intentions, the attachment to one's own thoughts and desires, is what is truly designated as sensual pleasure; this is what is sensual pleasure for a man.

'Tiṭṭhanti citrāni tatheva loke' — diverse beautiful things exist in abundance in the world. However, 'Athettha dhīrā vinayanti chandaṃ' — the wise rid themselves of the desire (chanda), the wish, the attachment towards them.

This, then, is the goal of the Dhamma. If, by understanding their aspect of danger (ādīnava), the attachment to them is at some point removed from the mind, at that moment, one gains the strength to liberate the mind. It is at that moment that a train of deep thoughts based on impermanence (anicca) arises in the mind as insight-knowledges (vipassanā-ñāṇa), leading to the realization of Nibbāna as the state of the paths and fruits (magga-phala).

So, in order for us to proceed to this step, the Buddha declared the diverse things in the world and their aspects: 'Appassādā' — their aspect of gratification (assāda) is little, 'Ādīnavā ettha bhiyyo' — the aspect of danger (ādīnava) is much. It is through the understanding that danger is much, and by paying closer attention to danger, that at some point disillusionment (nibbidā), the weariness with saṃsāra, arises. It is shown as a natural law of Dhamma: 'nibbidā-virāga-vimutti'. Disillusionment (nibbidā) means weariness, that is, disillusionment with saṃsāra. Through that disillusionment, faded lust or dispassion (virāga), which is non-attachment, arises. It is from that non-attachment that the liberation of mind (citta-vimutti) occurs. These are the points of Dhamma that we can bring to light from this story.

Devout friends who read the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta know this very matter; the stages presented as the nine charnel-ground contemplations (nava-sīvathika) are what the Buddha highlighted in that great discourse. They represent the true nature of the body relevant to the contemplation of the body (kāyānupassanā). Indeed, it is through knowledge and vision of things as they are (yathābhūta-ñāṇadassana)—which means understanding the actual facts about the body, understanding the actual facts about both the body and the world—that disillusionment (nibbidā) with saṃsāra arises. Having developed the knowledge of things as they are, one cannot remain without being disillusioned with saṃsāra. This is a law of Dhamma. Simultaneously with the arising of the knowledge of things as they are, disillusionment with saṃsāra occurs naturally. This is because the knowledge of things as they are encompasses those aforementioned states: gratification is little, danger is abundant. Moreover, everything is subject to the three characteristics: impermanent (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and non-self (anattā). Turning the mind away from them is what is called the abandoning of desire (chanda-pahāṇa).

This state is shown in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta. Not only the establishment of mindfulness, but there is also a system of thought leading to extremely deep insight (vipassanā)—referred to as satipaṭṭhāna meditation—within the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta. On this occasion, the Buddha gave a certain mental picture to the minds of the monks. First, in the Mahā-dukkhakkhandha Sutta, the picture of the beautiful complexion of a fifteen or sixteen-year-old maiden was presented like a soap bubble. Only after that did he show how it bursts. Similarly, here too, and in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, having systematically shown the true state of the body, and not limiting it to another's body, there is a method in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta of applying it to one's own body. There is a specific word used to describe that: 'upasaṃharati'. 'Upasaṃharati' means one applies it to one's own body; one directs it towards one's own body.

Now, in the passages of the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta that illustrate the nine charnel-ground contemplations, they begin with the simile 'seyyathāpi', meaning "just as one would see such and such a form." It starts with: "just as one would see a body of this sort thrown into a charnel ground..." But it ends with: 'so imameve kāyaṃ upasaṃharati' — "he applies this very vision to himself." He directs it toward himself and understands: 'Ayampi kho kāyo evaṃ dhammo evaṃ bhāvī etaṃ anātīti'. — "This body too is of such a nature, it will become like this, it is not exempt from this fate." Thus, one applies it to oneself, realizing "my body is not something that has transcended this state."

This matter is systematically shown in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta as a teaching that leads to a deep insight (vipassanā) of this sort, through both the aspect of "internally" (ajjhatta) and "externally" (bahiddhā), and then considering them together as "internally and externally" (ajjhata-bahiddhā). To describe this matter with a simile: when a knife is sharpened on a whetstone or a leather strop, sometimes one strokes it upward. At other times, one strokes it downward. At yet other times, one strokes it rapidly both upward and downward. Why is that? Not only must the two sides be sharpened, but the cutting edge itself must be honed. The cutting edge is properly sharpened precisely in that third stage. Stroking upward, upward, upward; downward, downward, downward; and then upward and downward, upward and downward, upward and downward—that is how the cutting edge is properly formed. Tempering is given to the dull knife.

Something similar happens in this insight (vipassanā) too. A person indeed uses another's body as an aid in the manner described. One cannot do it to oneself after one dies! So, one visualizes the corpse of someone who has died, or imagines it. Nowadays, there are various ways to even see such things. In those days too, they were easily seen in charnel grounds. In modern times, one can see them at least as images. But extracting the meaning therefrom is the primary thing. "Just as one would see"—based on what has been seen, or by imagining it in the mind, one then applies that state to oneself. When cultivating this as a meditation, at the moment of its culmination, there is a state where it is subtly applied to one's own body, like the simultaneous upward-and-downward strokes mentioned earlier. It is precisely there that the knowledge of things as they are (yathābhūta-ñāṇa) emerges. It is precisely there that the knowledge of things as they are emerges.

Therefore, teachers of old say that, according to temperament, some start from their own body and understand: "just like this body, so is that other body." Another person starts from another's body and culminates their insight (vipassanā) by applying it to their own body. Regarding various individuals, for those who possessed conceit regarding physical beauty like Khemā and Rūpanandā, the Buddha created and showed another body, demonstrating how it decays. "Am I not just like that? Will this not happen to me too?"—he made them think thus. Now here too, that monk who had thought so highly of Sirimā's body must have finally realized: "Is not this very state the fate of this body too?" It was through that realization that his insight (vipassanā) was perfected.

So, that distinction between inside and outside, called "external" (bahiddhā), is an artificial distinction we have created. Inside, there are the four elements; outside too, there are the four elements. Such is the state of the bodies inside; such is the state of the bodies outside. Yet, due to our ignorance (avijjā) and delusion (moha), we separate these and create attachment and aversion towards them. The Buddha brings to light that he who first reflects on the internal must, at some point, also reflect on the external body. Finally, the state where the two merge is what exists as "internally and externally" (ajjhata-bahiddhā). It is at that moment that insight (vipassanā) culminates in a marvelous way. Some practitioners of insight may have even had the direct experience, while reflecting on a skeleton, of realizing: "Oh, is not my body this very thing?" Sometimes, just like a modern X-ray, one's own body and external bodies might be seen in some instances. This is natural. Natural, that is, for insight-knowledge (vipassanā-ñāṇa). It is understood by the eye of insight, though invisible to the ordinary eye.

We have heard in stories of the past the account concerning Venerable Tissa, who, upon seeing a set of teeth, saw a skeleton walking down the road. We can see from this: a monk who had intensely developed the perception of bones (aṭṭhika-saññā), while walking for alms, saw a certain woman who, having quarreled with her husband, was traveling along a forest path. That woman laughed aloud lustfully. Hearing the sound, the monk looked. When he looked, only her teeth were visible. Because of restraint, he did not look further. Utilizing the teeth, his meditation object (kammaṭṭhāna) emerged. Later, when the husband who came searching for the woman asked if a woman had passed by, the monk replied: "Whether it was a woman or a man, I do not know. But a skeleton did go by." He did not speak a falsehood. What he expressed at that moment was precisely what appeared to his insight-knowledge (vipassanā-ñāṇa), to his eye of insight. Such things, or a bloated corpse (uddhumātaka) or similar meditation objects, when cultivated by a devout practitioner, can be realized directly. So that is the moment when the dull knife rubbed on the whetstone becomes thoroughly sharp. Through that arises the knowledge of things as they are. There is no difference between these two.

This is mentioned in the Dhamma literature as the Buddha's word; in the Sutta Nipāta, there is a valuable discourse known as the Vijaya Sutta, which contains verses on relinquishing desire for the body (kāya-vicchandani-gāthā), functioning like a complete meditation guide. It states this natural law in brief:

> Yathā idaṃ tathā etaṃ, yathā etaṃ tathā idaṃ;

> Ajjhatañca bahiddhāca, kāye chandaṃ virājaye.

'Yathā idaṃ tathā etaṃ' — as this body is, so is that body. 'Yathā etaṃ tathā idaṃ' — as that body is, so is this body. 'Bahiddhā ca' — inside and outside, 'kāye chandaṃ virājaye' — one should fade out desire (chanda), wish, and attachment for the body. That is the natural law demonstrated by this. What a marvelous Dhamma is contained within this! When observing by way of contemplation of the body (kāyānupassanā), while practicing the meditation on foulness (asubha-bhāvanā) or any other meditation object, at the moment insight (vipassanā) culminates, the distinction between inside and outside fades away.

Moreover, there is another aspect which sometimes becomes a problem for some devout friends who contemplate the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta. Just as "internally" (ajjhata) and "externally" (bahiddhā) are mentioned separately and then combined as "internally and externally" (ajjhata-bahiddhā), there are other riddle-like passages mentioned in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta:

> Samudayadhammānupassī vā kāyasmim viharati,

> Vayadhammānupassī vā kāyasmim viharati,

> Samudayavayadhammānupassī vā kāyasmim viharati.

Its meaning is that at each step, when describing the various parts of the body in the section of contemplation of the body (kāyānupassanā), one abides seeing their nature of arising, observing the side of arising (samudaya). Likewise, contemplating the nature of vanishing (vayadhammānupassī), one abides observing how it wears away. From time to time, one contemplates how the body arises, how the body is sustained through food, etc. Similarly, one observes how this wears away. Next, combining the two, just like sharpening that knife, samudaya-vayadhammānupassī vā kāyasmim viharati — it is said that one abides seeing both arising and vanishing at once. This too must be understood in that manner. It is even deeper than the previous one. The sharpest honing regarding impermanence (anicca) occurs when arising (samudaya) and vanishing (vaya) are seen simultaneously. That moment is called "penetrative wisdom" (nibbedhika-paññā). It is a penetration, a piercing through. To which side does a highly sharp cutting edge belong? To which of the two sides does it belong? It is a subtle state that is hard to conceive. Just like that, what was previously divided into two as "arising" and "vanishing", when eventually merged, at the last moment, emptiness (suññatā) and voidness are deeply understood. Right there is Nibbāna.

Now, just as we mentioned samudayadhammānupassī and vayadhammānupassī, what is to be said about that external distinction is that it applies to both the conscious (saṁvīṇāṇaka) and the unconscious (avīṇāṇaka). The conscious body is also foul (asubha). It is within the conscious body that one carries out the meditation on the thirty-two repulsive parts of the body—on the impurities contained in this body. There too, what is often presented as the perception of foulness (asubha-saññā) or foulness meditation (asubha-bhāvanā) is the section concerning this conscious body. On the other hand, looking by way of the nine charnel-ground contemplations, it is the unconscious body—the body devoid of consciousness (viññāṇa). In both of these, the state of foulness is present. Thus, by reflecting on this according to the division of "one's own" and "another's", one develops disillusionment through that perception of foulness. Furthermore, for the practitioner (yogāvacara) who observes their nature of arising and nature of vanishing, there comes a point where these two gradually merge and are understood deeply. Therein lies the most profound part of the Dhamma. It is from here that one proceeds to a highly profound part of the Dhamma. One must not be afraid of it.

We all have heard, when speaking of Nibbāna, a word called saṅkhata [prepared / formations / formations]. The meaning of the word saṅkhata is "prepared" or "put together." "Prepared" means, in modern terms, an artificial thing, a fabricated thing, something constructed by the mind. Next, when speaking of Nibbāna, for which many express approval, Nibbāna itself is called the asaṅkhata-dhātu [The Unprepared / Unconditioned / Uncompounded]. Something called asaṅkhata is also mentioned in the Dhamma. Thus, saṅkhata is on one side, and asaṅkhata is on the other. It is from here that we proceed to the analytical exposition of the Dhamma. The Buddha has declared:

"Tīṇimāni, bhikkhave, saṅkhatassa saṅkhatalakkhaṇāni."

— "Monks, there are three characteristics of the prepared (saṅkhata)." What are these characteristics?

"Uppādo paññāyati, vayo paññāyati, ṭhitassa aññathattaṃ paññāyati."

In everything that is prepared (saṅkhata), meaning put together, an arising, a birth, is observed. A wearing away, a vanishing, is observed. Between those two, 'ṭhitassa aññathattaṃ paññāyati' occurs; even within that part described as "standing" or "existing," there is a process of changing into something else (aññathābhāva). 'Ṭhiti', meaning stability or existing, refers to that which persists, that which is present. But even in that "present" state, there is constant change. Right there is a profound matter. As we said earlier regarding sharpening on a whetstone or a strop: upward, upward, upward; downward, downward, downward; and finally, upward and downward, upward and downward, upward and downward. Now, therefore, there is that uppāda [arising].

Now, saṅkhata [the prepared] refers to something constructed, demarcated by the mind. Within that demarcated thing, we see an arising. That is on one side. On the other side, we see it wearing away. But in the middle, there is ṭhiti—an existence, a persistence, that we ourselves have fabricated. The Buddha points out that this ṭhiti or stability, this state we imagined as "existing," is in truth merely a rolling-over from beginning to end. Existence, meritorious friends, is in reality a rolling-over. Thus, we call a rolling-over, a turning thing, "existence." There is not even a single moment when it does not roll over. We imagine that it does not turn. Regarding this body, we sometimes say, "Now having been beautifully young, it has started to decay. Now old age has appeared." But the Buddha says that from beginning to end, it is decay. From birth itself, there is decay. From the hair that is born, everything decays. Yet, we establish a convention: "Now the body exists. Look, only now has it started to decay." This is an illusion, a conceptualization of the mind. Thus, at the moment when this is realized, just as when both samudaya and vaya merged, it is at that point that 'ṭhitassa aññathatta' is understood—there is a moment when it is realized that even the state assumed to be "stable, existing, remaining" is constantly undergoing change. It is then that there is no place to grasp. There remains nothing to grasp.

It is because of grasping (upādāna) that there is a stable duration (ṭhiti). That is the secret. It is because of grasping that there is stability. Where there is grasping—as it is said, "upādāna-paccayā bhavo" [dependent on grasping is becoming/existence]—where there is grasping, there is becoming (bhava). Where there is letting go, there is cessation. Where there is letting go, there is the cessation of becoming (bhava-nirodha). This is the secret that the Buddha brought to light as the natural law of this universe, which no one else was able to solve.

Thus, in the ordinary world, we speak as if one escapes from the prepared (saṅkhata) and, in the unprepared (asaṅkhata) element, which is the eternal element of Nibbāna, becomes cooled, comforted, and resides eternally. That is entirely an illusion. Here lies this natural law. Within that impermanence (anicca) are the three characteristics of the prepared (saṅkhata): arising, vanishing, and the alteration of that precarious existence in between. That stability (ṭhiti), this existence we assumed as "duration," is a precarious state trapped between arising and vanishing. The precarious nature of that state is realized only when that insight-knowledge (vipassanā-ñāṇa) becomes sharp. It is not uniform even for a single moment. Therefore, within that itself lies letting go. It is solely due to grasping (upādāna) that the state of "stability" (ṭhiti) exists.

Next, the Buddha declares the characteristics of the unprepared (asaṅkhata):

"Na uppādo paññāyati, na vayo paññāyati, na ṭhitassa aññathattaṃ paññāyati."

There is no issue regarding the unprepared (asaṅkhata). In the unprepared (asaṅkhata), there is no arising, there is no vanishing, and there is no such thing as the alteration of something existing. Thus, we can understand through this that the Buddha demonstrates how, through grasping (upādāna), through holding on, one conceptualizes what is actually impermanent (anicca) as permanent (nicca). One imagines it so. Then, that assumed "stability" is merely a mental fabrication, just an imagination. A mental fabrication means just an imagination; it is not a real thing.

Therefore, at the moment when that is understood, simultaneously with that understanding, one realizes: "this is a grasping (upādāna) generated due to craving (taṇhā)." That young monk blew that soap bubble based on the name "Sirimā," imagining in his mind the exquisite beauty of that courtesan. He came with that mental picture. In the end, what did he see? It was a state imagined by the mind. It was not in accordance with reality. At the moment when that is realized, it is through letting go that the unprepared (asaṅkhata) element is said to be realized. It is not some other world. Precisely because that grasping had existed in the mind, when the alteration of what was assumed to be "stability" is understood, automatically one sees: "this is a dangerous thing; wherever it is grasped, it shatters." In that deep insight (vipassanā), there is a moment when the practitioners realize this. There is nothing to grasp anywhere in preparations / formations / volitional activity (saṅkhāra).

What is meant by "formations" (saṅkhāra)? What is meant by seeing the impermanence (anicca) of formations? A heap of preparations. What does it mean to say that all these preparations shatter? It is precisely because they are prepared that they shatter. For, in everything that is prepared, there is that arising and vanishing, and in between, a stability we have projected upon it. That is what is meant by 'ṭhitassa aññathattam'. Within the state of stability (ṭhiti), constant change is always operating.

This matter is mentioned in the Udāna Pāḷi in a highly marvelous verse. There is a most marvelous, profound verse declared by the Buddha after attaining supreme enlightenment on the banks of the Nerañjarā River, having abided for seven days in the bliss of liberation. It is a highly marvelous, deep sutta that some devout friends constantly recollect. The relevant parts of that sutta read as follows:

- > 'Ayaṃ loko santāpajāto phassapareto rogaṃ vadati attato,'
- > *'Yena yena hi maññati, tato taṃ hoti aññathā;'
- > 'Bhavasatto loko bhavapareto bhavamevābhinandati,'
- > *'Yadabhinandati taṃ bhayaṃ, yassa bhāyati taṃ dukkhaṃ;'
- > 'Bhavavippahānāya kho panidaṃ brahmacariyaṃ vussati.'

There is great depth in these words that came from his sacred mouth. 'Ayaṃ loko santāpajāto phassapareto' — "this world" means the people of the world.

'Santāpajāto' — afflicted, 'phassapareto' — plagued by contact (phassa). 'Ayaṃ loko rogaṃ vadati attato' — this world speaks of a disease as self, speaks of an illness as self. They designate a heap of illnesses as self. 'Yena yena hi maññati, tato taṃ hoti aññathā' — in whatever way they think, in whatever way they conceptualize by mental fabrication, through that very thing it becomes otherwise. It was said to become otherwise in order to shatter that fencing in, that thinking "I exist within this portion." It is because of that very thing that its alteration becomes manifest. That is why they fear that aforementioned shattering.

Then, he explains it further: 'Aññathābhāvī bhavasatto loko bhavapareto bhavamevābhinandati'. The world, which is bound to becoming (bhava), plagued by becoming, delights only in becoming, even though its very nature is to alter into something else. The nature of the world is to roll over constantly, without stopping even for a single moment, without remaining even for a single moment. Yet, they do not know this. Because of this, the beings of the world attach to it. 'Bhavasatto loko bhavapareto' — not only do they attach, but they also become enslaved; they are overwhelmed by craving for becoming (bhava-taṇhā). 'Bhavamevābhinandati' — they delight only in becoming [existence].

Next, the Buddha declares: 'Yadabhinandati taṃ bhayaṃ' — whatever they delight in is a source of fear. "Fear" means danger. It is a danger, a hazardous thing. What do they delight in? In becoming (bhava). Becoming, however, is something constantly subject to alteration. By delighting in it, fear arises; they fall into danger. That is 'yadabhinandati taṃ bhayaṃ'. 'Yassa bhāyati taṃ dukkhaṃ' — what they fear is suffering (dukkha). What do they fear? They fear that very alteration. They grasp a world that is subject to alteration, yet they do not like alteration. That is why 'yassa bhāyati taṃ dukkhaṃ'. What do they fear? They fear its changing, its alteration.

That itself is suffering (dukkha). 'Bhava-vippahānāya kho panidaṃ brahmacariyaṃ vussati' — it is for the abandoning of that state of becoming (bhava), that state imagined as "existence," for its letting go, that this holy life is lived.

Thus, the Buddha expressed the essence of his Dhamma on that day through those few short lines of Udāna verses. It is those very points we brought to light through the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta. Next, at the end of that Udāna verse, the Buddha further declares that whatever ascetics and brahmins there had been in the world attempting to solve this saṃsāric riddle, or to solve the problem of liberation, they went to two extremes. The Buddha states there that whatever ascetics and brahmins tried to solve the problem of becoming through becoming—that is, by way of eternity—tried to solve this saṃsāric riddle through an eternal existence, they too have not escaped saṃsāra. They too are not liberated. This is the view of becoming (bhava-diṭṭhi), the eternity view (sassata-diṭṭhi). Next, the other extreme is called the view of non-becoming (vibhava-diṭṭhi), which is the annihilation view (uccheda-diṭṭhi).

Devout friends have heard, and those who have an understanding of the Dhamma know, that there are those two extremes. The middle path (majjhimā paṭipadā) is what is found in our Dhamma. On the two sides lie that eternity view and the annihilation view. This second one mentioned is the view of non-becoming (vibhava-diṭṭhi). There was another group of ascetics and brahmins who, adopting the annihilation view, tried to escape from saṃsāra through it. They too misunderstood. They too did not comprehend the matter properly. Saying "once this bodily cage is destroyed, it is all over" does not offer escape. As long as ignorance (avijjā) and craving (taṇhā) remain, this saṃsāric stream of phenomena—that stream of the prepared (saṅkhata) and formations (saṅkhāra)—continues. That is why the Buddha did not go to either of those extremes.

Instead, the Buddha declares where liberation lies. At whatever moment, by the destruction of all grasping (sabbupādānakkhayā), by letting go of all grasping, and by the relinquishment of all acquisitions (sabbūpadhipatinissaggā)—grasping (upādāna) means holding on. Acquisitions (upadhi) mean that which has been grasped and accumulated. Now, devout friends constantly exert themselves to grasp wealth and various other things, heaps of material possessions. Thinking about them, they generate grasping (upādāna). Once those are obtained, they accumulate them as savings, deposit them as treasures, and try to protect them as acquisitions (upadhi). But the Buddha demonstrates that all this is a source of fear. These are things subject to alteration. Therefore, it is through grasping them that the aforementioned suffering (dukkha) and fear arise.

Therefore, the solution provided by the Buddha is neither an eternal existence nor thinking "life ends here" and indulging in pleasures as one pleases, nor seeking liberation through various other rites and rituals. It is the understanding of this very situation. Here, when that grasping (upādāna) done through ignorance (avijjā), through that lack of understanding, is let go, what is let go along with grasping is precisely what is called acquisitions (upadhi)—which are held by grasping to confirm one's sense of "I-ness." When looked at ultimately, these are none other than the five aggregates of grasping (pañc'upādānakkhandha) that we have accumulated.

It is just like hanging onto something. Relying upon something. If that onto which one hangs is let go at some point, there is a fall. If one relies upon something, when that bottom layer decays, there too is a fall. Thus, this is what is contained within the two words: grasping (upādāna) and acquisitions (upadhi). That very grasping ultimately leads to acquisitions (upadhi) for one's existence (bhava). Devout friends may have heard that word upadhi. The Buddha declares, to consider it in brief: money, vehicles, wife and children, lands, and everything one regards as one's assets.

It is in those things that one seeks security, safety, and protection. Yet, even as one looks on, they shatter and crumble to dust. To whatever extent the grasping of them is firm, to that same extent there is suffering (dukkha). If they were let go in the mind beforehand, in the manner of the abandoning of desire and lust (chanda-rāga-pahāṇa), at that moment, there is nothing there. A state arises where one can say, "there is nothing in it." Right there is Nibbāna.

Thus, Nibbāna means—do not misunderstand this when said—Nibbāna means "there is nothing." If there is "a thing," then all these problems arise. That is what is contained within the two words: the prepared (saṅkhata) and the unprepared (asaṅkhata). Within these natural phenomena which are empty, impermanent (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and non-self (anattā), the being conceptualizes "a thing" as a mental fabrication. That which was taken as "a thing"—that itself is what goes on and on in saṃsāra; it is that very stream of formations (saṅkhāra). That mental energy generated through ignorance (avijjā) and craving (taṇhā), creating more and more forms, is what we carry along in this saṃsāra. In short, if at some point, through insight-wisdom (vipassanā-paññā), having seen that state, one understands the true nature of those wrong concepts that caused acquisitions (upadhi) and grasping (upādāna), and beholds the emptiness, the voidness of the world, it is at that moment that liberation exists.

That is why the Buddha declared to the young Brahmin Mogharāja, who possessed highly profound understanding:

- > Suññato lokam avekkhassu, Mogharāja sadā sato;
- > Attānudiṭṭhiṃ ūhacca, evaṃ maccutaro siyā;
- > Evaṃ lokam avekkhantaṃ, maccurāja na passati.

"Mogharāja, look upon the world as empty. 'Suññato lokam avekkhassu, Mogharāja sadā sato' — always mindful, look upon the world as empty. 'Attānudiṭṭhiṃ ūhacca' — the view of self (attānu-diṭṭhi) refers to the conceit "I am" (asmi-māna), the deepest sense of "I-ness." Uprooting that, 'evaṃ maccutaro siyā' — thus one overcomes death, crosses over the bondage of Māra. 'Evaṃ lokaṃ avekkhantaṃ, maccurāja na passati' — one who looks upon the world in that manner as empty is not caught by Māra. He is not seen by Māra. That is why on many occasions, when Māra came to trouble him, the Buddha said: "You cannot grasp me." Why he cannot be grasped is because of having let go of everything. The portion that Māra can catch is the prepared (saṅkhata), that which is grasped. Māra is precisely there. So that is why the Buddha declared:

"Yaṃ yaṃ hi lōke upādiyanti, teneva māro anveti."

— whatever things in the world we grasp, Māra follows after through that very thing. Māra possesses himself of that grasped thing, and through it, repeatedly inflicts suffering (dukkha) upon us in saṃsāra.

Therefore, it is for that noble Nibbāna, which is the letting go of those grasping, the graspings of acquisitions (upadhi), that this devout group on this valuable day observed virtue (sīla), in accordance with the gradual training (anupubba-sikkhā), gradual action (anupubba-kiriya), and gradual practice (anupubba-paṭipadā) declared by the Buddha as the middle path. Next, established in that virtue, you cultivated meditation by way of tranquility (samatha) and insight (vipassanā). Their supreme fruit is the deathless Nibbāna that we all aspire to. It is not an eternal state as mentioned, but the liberation of mind (citta-vimutti) itself. That is a state realizable in this very life. After that, there is no problem. May you gain the strength to reach a state where you can say, "there is nothing," just like the Buddha.

Although we express this in words, when this comes as a direct experience, if the necessary deep work for it has not been done in previous lives, one must prepare to do it in this life. If one thinks "this is all there is to be done," there is no question of when it will be finished. With the thought "this is all there is to be done," may the power of merit generated today, the virtue observed, and the meditation practiced, certainly be a supportive condition for the fulfillment of the noble Dhamma aspirations of these devout friends, to escape from all saṃsāric suffering such as birth (jāti), decay (jarā), sickness, and death (maraṇa), and to find peace in the supreme deathless Nibbāna.

Likewise, may all beings from Avīci up to Akaniṭṭha, including the relatives of these devout friends, if they hope for saṃsāric liberation, realize that supreme deathless Nibbāna through whichever Bodhi they have aspired to, by the merits of listening to this Dhamma. Having aspired thus, recite these verses and share the merits:

Anguttara Nikāya 4.32, Saṅgaha Sutta

Dear Listeners,

The Duruthu Poya day is the first full-moon day of the year according to the civil calendar. At the beginning of a year, almost everyone directs their mind toward their future prosperity, progress, and forward journey. Our Teacher of the Three Worlds, the Blessed Buddha, expounded several verses showing four valuable factors that lead to the forward journey and progress of both the individual and society, which we have chosen as our theme today. Just as a linchpin is helpful to a moving chariot, the Buddha presents four factors of the Dhamma through these verses that assist in the progress of society:

> Dānañca peyyavajjañca atthacariyā ca yā idha

> Samānattatā ca dhammesu tattha tattha yathārahaṃ

Everyone knows dāna (giving/almsgiving). Peyyavajja means pleasant speech. Therefore, giving, pleasant speech, and then atthacariyā (purposeful activity). Purposeful activity means acting for the welfare of others; in modern times, the term "altruistic activity" is used for this. "Samānattatā ca dhammesu tattha tattha yathārahaṃ"—there it is expressed in a somewhat unique way: impartiality or equality (samānattatā) fittingly in each situation and place. That is the fourth factor.

Next, the Buddha states: "Ete kho saṅgahā loke rathassāṇīva yāyato." This means these four bases of sympathy assist the world just as the linchpin assists a moving chariot. Then he declared: "Ete ca saṅgahā nāssu..." If these bases of sympathy do not exist, "na mātā puttakāraṇā labhetha mānaṃ pūjaṃ vā, pitā vā puttakāraṇā"—a mother would not receive honor or respect because of her son, nor would a father receive honor, respect, or offerings from his son. It is further stated: "Yasmā ca saṅgahā ete samavekkhanti paṇḍitā"—since the wise reflect upon and understand these bases of sympathy with wisdom, "tasmā mahattaṃ papponti"—therefore, because of that, they reach greatness, abundance, and nobility. "Pāsaṃsā ca bhavanti te"—they become praiseworthy. This, indeed, is the meaning of these verses.

Now, some of the points mentioned here are well known to most people. The word dāna (giving) is very familiar to our ears. We all know that within the act of giving, there are two sides. Generally, when we talk about dāna or giving, it feels like a mere transfer of an object from hand to hand. However, beneath the act of giving, there is a certain shift in attitude. How does this giving occur? Sometimes, out of necessity, a person comes asking for something due to their hardships. At that moment, satisfying that need, even in a small way, is a great relief to that person. In such a situation, one must give to the person who expects it. At other times, what a person expects is not a gift, but a pleasant word. There are some in society who say that even if someone gives nothing, a single kind word is worth gold. Everyone knows what pleasant speech is. Just as pharusa vācā (harsh speech) is unpleasant to everyone, pleasant speech is sweet to the ear. The Buddha described pleasant speech as: "Yā sā vācā nelā kaṇṇasukhā pemaṇiyā hadayaṅgamā porī bahujaṇakantā bahujaṇamānāpā" and so on. If there is speech that is nelā (faultless), kaṇṇasukhā (pleasing to the ear), pemaṇiyā (endearing), hadayaṅgamā (heart-penetrating), porī (polite and civil), bahujaṇakantā (beloved by many), and bahujaṇamānāpā (agreeable to many)—such words, spoken in due season, are pleasant words. Sometimes, it is nothing more than words like "mother", "father", "brother", "sister" used in society, along with the pleasant feelings that accompany them. Some people expect such pleasant words.

Next is atthacariyā (purposeful activity). Another person, according to the situation, does not merely expect a gift or a pleasant word, but rather advice that leads to their progress. Nowadays, there is something called "counseling" or guidance, and there are many counselors. Giving advice for one's economic or spiritual progress in this manner is atthacariyā (purposeful activity); it conveys the meaning of altruistic activity.

Next, samānattatā (equality/impartiality) is mentioned. In this society, there are various caste and class divisions. Because of this, some people experience marginalization due to pride. Yet, most people hope, when the occasion arises, to sit together, eat together, and share joys and sorrows. Many people have a yearning for this kind of equality. One who fosters this becomes beloved and pleasing.

Impartiality or equality is something to be practiced according to the situation. Forgetting divisions, cultivating a certain equanimity (upekkhā) in the mind, and remembering human brotherhood, one acts with equality according to the circumstance.

Now, in expressing these matters, the Buddha's mention of parents here is extremely important. Why? We have all heard that in the Dhamma, parents are described as "Brahmā ti mātāpitāro" (parents are called Brahmas). They are called Brahmas because they practice the four Brahma-vihāras (sublime states). We are more accustomed to considering parents as those who develop the four Brahma-vihāras towards their children. However, it is stated here that if a mother or a father does not practice these teachings of giving, pleasant speech, purposeful activity, and equality, they will not receive honor and respect from their children. From this, we can understand that underlying these four Dhammas, as an attitude, lie the virtues of loving-kindness (mettā), compassion (karuṇā), sympathetic joy (muditā), and equanimity (upekkhā), even if they are not explicitly mentioned here. In short, these qualities of giving, pleasant speech, purposeful activity, and equality are a resonance of the four Brahma-vihāras.

Let us try to understand this. If we think about what a mother or a father, especially a mother, does after a child is born into this world, that giving (dāna) begins with the well-known act of turning her blood into milk to feed the child. The giving for the child begins with that breast milk. Next, both mother and father raise the child by spending their time, wealth, and labor, directing their love toward them. This is what is mentioned in the Dhamma as the Buddha's word regarding parents: "Āpādakā posakā lokassa dassetāro"—parents are the caretakers, the nourishers, and those who show this world to the child. If we look at it as giving, it is the sacrifice of time, wealth, and labor made by parents to raise a child.

Pleasant speech—everyone knows the affection parents have for their children. When we look at lullabies, with what great love do they soothe a crying child? As the child grows a bit more, during the mischievous stage, a parent may sometimes use harsh words. But we must consider that they use them out of compassion. That very affection turns into compassion. Although those compassionate words may seem harsh on the surface, inside them lies the protection of the child. Therefore, that compassion is pleasant speech. Pleasant speech is not merely the pleasant form we usually think of. Depending on the situation, even a harsh word becomes a pleasant word when used for the welfare of the child. Therefore, we must consider not only the lullabies of early childhood but also the words used to discipline during the mischievous stage as pleasant speech.

Next, atthacariyā (purposeful activity) means teaching arts and sciences and explaining good and bad for the welfare of the children, as everyone knows. This is why they are called pubbācariyā (the first teachers). In this way, parents provide wonderful help to their children so they can stand on their own feet in society. That is atthacariyā—wishing and working for their welfare.

Similarly, the final factor, samānattatā (equality/impartiality), can sometimes be difficult to understand. If we parallel these qualities, we can connect loving-kindness (mettā) to giving (dāna), compassion (karuṇā) to pleasant speech (peyyavajja), and sympathetic joy (muditā) to purposeful activity (atthacariyā). In purposeful activity, parents feel great joy in the growth and development of their child. While there might sometimes be envy regarding the growth and development of neighbors, there is sympathetic joy (muditā) regarding their own children; there is happiness, thinking, "Oh, it is good, it is wonderful if they succeed."

Now, next, for equality (samānattatā), we have to add equanimity (upekkhā). How does equanimity emerge? We can understand that generally, after children reach adulthood, parents hand over their inheritance and responsibilities. If it is an enterprise, there comes a time when the owners hand it over. They also distribute their lands and properties. Furthermore, if we think about it, just as children look after their parents, parents also attend to their children with equanimity and equality when they are sick or helpless. That is equality, something to be done according to the situation. Accordingly, we can understand that the four Brahma-vihāras underlie these four saṅgha-vatthu (bases of sympathy).

That was about family relationships. But we know that in discourses like the Sīgālovāda Sutta, it is mentioned that friends in the northern direction treat one another with these four bases of sympathy—giving, pleasant speech, purposeful activity, and equality. In the Sīgālovāda Sutta, where six directions are mentioned, one's friends are the northern direction. Just like worshipping the northern direction, supporting that direction is done through the four bases of sympathy.

Next, the Buddha has clearly shown in one place how this directly affects society. In the Dhamma, there is a section called the Etadagga Vagga (Chapter on the Chiefs). According to the unique strengths and abilities of lay and ordained disciples, the title of etadagga (chief) is given, declaring, "He is chief in this particular field." In such a place, it is mentioned: "Among my lay disciples who minister to a group with the four bases of sympathy, Hatthaka Ālavaka is chief," declares the Buddha. A certain event is also mentioned in the Dhamma. On one occasion, while the Buddha was residing at the Āgālava Shrine in Ālavī, Hatthaka Ālavaka—who was an Anāgāmi (non-returner) lay disciple, a lay disciple of the Buddha's time who had realized the fruits of the path and reached the state of a non-returner—came to see the Buddha with a retinue of five hundred people. After arriving, bowing to the Buddha, and sitting to one side, the Buddha remarked, "Ālavaka, your retinue is indeed very large. How do you minister to such a large assembly?"

Then, the lay disciple Hatthaka Ālavaka replied, "Venerable Sir, the Blessed One has declared four bases of sympathy, and it is through those bases of sympathy that I minister to this assembly. If someone in this assembly needs dāna (giving), needs something to be given (let us say, perhaps regarding employment, tools needed for farming, or money, giving various things according to their needs), I give dāna to that person who expects it. Likewise, if someone expects pleasant speech, having considered it with wisdom, I minister to them with pleasant speech. When one speaks with pleasant speech within an assembly in terms of 'mother', 'father', and so on, their hearts become soft; there is gentleness. That must be done with genuine sincerity."

Next, he states: "If someone expects advice regarding their progress, I give that too. That is atthacariyā (purposeful activity). Likewise, according to the situation, I practice samānattatā (equality)—eating together and practicing equality in various such situations." Then the Buddha declared: "Sādhū! Sādhū! Very good, Ālavaka. In this very way, if anyone in the past ministered to an assembly, it was through these selfsame bases of sympathy. If anyone in the future ministers to an assembly, it will be through these selfsame bases of sympathy. In the present too, one must minister to an assembly through these four bases of sympathy."

After the lay disciple Ālavaka stood up and left with his retinue, the Buddha expressed a special statement of praise to the Sangha: "Monks, consider this lay disciple Hatthaka Ālavaka as one endowed with eight wonderful and marvelous qualities." What are the eight? Seven of these are well-known to everyone as the noble treasures (ariya-dhana): saddhā (faith), sīla (virtue), hiri (shame of wrongdoing), ottappa (fear of wrongdoing). Saddhā and sīla are known to all. Hiri means shame of sin, and ottappa means fear of sin, fear of wrongdoing. Next is suta (learning)—Ālavaka is highly learned (bahussuta). Next is cāga (generosity)—he is generous. Next is paññā—wisdom; as an individual, he possesses wisdom. Finally, he is stated to be of few wishes (appiccha). Hatthaka Ālavaka has few wishes. Connected to having few wishes is that equality (samānattatā). Forgetting his own greatness at that moment, he practiced equality according to the situation. Thus, this account of ministering to an assembly is recorded in the Dhamma.

Similarly, in another important and deep discourse—deep to a certain extent—the Buddha has shown these same four bases of sympathy directed toward Nibbāna. How is that? On one occasion, the Buddha declared: "Monks, there are four powers in the world. What are the four powers? The power of wisdom (paññā-balaṃ), the power of energy (viriya-balaṃ), the power of blamelessness (anavajja-balaṃ), and the power of sympathy (saṅgha-balaṃ)." The power of wisdom, the power of energy, the power of blamelessness (faultlessness, which is also a strength), and the power of sympathy. The power of sympathy refers to those very bases of sympathy.

Now, each is analyzed. What is the power of wisdom (paññā-balaṃ)? To put it briefly, according to the Buddha's teaching, one identifies: "These things are wholesome (kusala), these things are unwholesome (akusala), these things are blameworthy (sāvajja), these things are blameless (anavajja), these things are dark dhammas (kaṇha-dhamma), these things are bright dhammas (sukka-dhamma)." Just as one distinguishes dark from bright, one correctly distinguishes good from bad. That is the power of wisdom. This is indispensable for a noble disciple.

The power of energy (virīya-balaṃ) means: if one has identified those dhammas, if one has distinguished good things from bad things separately, what is left to do? Removing the bad things and bringing the good things close. The energy applied for that is what is called the power of energy here. There too, it is briefly stated as the fourfold supreme effort (sammappadhāna) that we have all heard of. To abandon the unwholesome, faulty, and dark dhammas seen through wisdom, there is the frequently encountered passage: *"chandaṃ janeti vāyamaṭṭhi viriyam ārabhati cittaṃ paggaṇhāti padahati"* (he generates desire, endeavors, rouses energy, exerts his mind, and strives). One develops a keen interest, makes an effort, rouses energy, firmly establishes the mind, and strives. In this way, one makes a strong effort to eliminate bad and unwholesome things. Similarly, one exerts energy to acquire and achieve good and wholesome things. That is the power of energy. It too is a power, a strength, a capability—to expel bad things and bring good things close. That is shown as the power of energy.

Next, "the power of blamelessness" (anavajja-balaṃ) briefly indicates faultlessness. As a result of that aforementioned effort, a person can properly direct their bodily, verbal, and mental actions. Then, the power of blamelessness means a faultless life, the strength of a faultless life—directing the mind, body, and speech along the correct path.

Now, next is "the power of sympathy" (saṅgaha-balaṃ). It is analyzed there in a somewhat unique way. By the power of sympathy, the Buddha points to those selfsame four bases of sympathy. However, the explanation is given in a unique manner. There, the Buddha shows these four in their highest sense: *"Etadaggaṃ, bhikkhave, dānānaṃ yadidaṃ dhammadānaṃ"*—"Monks, this is the chief among gifts, namely, the gift of Dhamma (dhamma-dāna)."
Next, regarding pleasant speech: *"Etadaggaṃ, bhikkhave, peyyavajjānaṃ yadidaṃ atthikassa ohitasotassa punappunaṃ dhammaṃ deseti"*—what is pleasant speech? It is not merely the sweet words we think of. It is not saying "mother" or "father". Here it is shown more deeply. *"Ohitasotassa"* means to those who wish to hear the Dhamma, who bend their ears to listen, preaching the Dhamma to them again and again (*"punappunaṃ"*) is shown here as pleasant speech. Why is that? Everyone knows there is nothing as tasteful as the Dhamma. Well, one cannot say "everyone" knows; those who have correctly recognized the Dhamma know. There is nothing as tasteful as the Dhamma. That is why it is said: *"Sabbadānaṃ dhammadānaṃ jināti, sabbam rasam dhammaraso jināti"*—the gift of Dhamma excels all gifts, the taste of Dhamma excels all tastes. It is also said that there is nothing so healing and pleasing to the ear. Therefore, that is true pleasant speech—preaching the Dhamma again and again to those who wish to hear it. That is ministering through pleasant speech.

Now, next is atthacariyā (purposeful activity). It too is shown in a unique way. What is atthacariyā? It is not giving advice to develop businesses. It is not that kind of counseling. What is shown here is: establishing a faithless person in faith, inspiring them with faith—using words like "niveseti patitṭhāpeti"* (settles and establishes). One creates faith in a faithless person, making a special effort to establish them in the Triple Gem. Next, establishing an immoral person in virtue (sīla); that is atthacariyā. Establishing a stingy person in generosity (cāga), directing that person toward sacrifice. Next, establishing an unwise person in wisdom (paññā). Thus, we see that it is shown at a higher level, in a manner that assists Nibbāna.

In a manner perfectly fitting this, how is samānattatā (equality/impartiality) shown? There too, it is shown in a unique way. A Stream-enterer (Sotāpanna) is equal to a Stream-enterer. A Once-returner (Sakadāgāmi) is equal to a Once-returner. A Non-returner (Anāgāmi) is equal to a Non-returner. An Arahant is equal to an Arahant. How do we understand this? Once we take it to the level of the fruits of the path, whether one is an extremely poor person, a great scholar, a high-caste noble, or a king—if they have reached the state of a Stream-enterer, they are equal in their Stream-entry. If they have reached the state of a Once-returner, they are equal in their Once-returner-ship. This is how we must understand it. We all know that there is no caste division within the dispensation of the Buddha. That is why, from whichever caste one is ordained, they are called Samaṇa Sakyaputta (ascetics, sons of the Sakyan). They reach the state of a Sakyan ascetic. Similarly, here too, equality is shown according to the fruits of the path, in a deep sense. Thus, the Buddha demonstrates that these selfsame four bases of sympathy assist a person all the way to Nibbāna.

Next, there are other valuable suttas that we can connect to this. Based on this, we can understand that starting from the four Brahma-vihāras as an attitude, this social service we perform not only helps in leading daily life but also helps in inclining toward Nibbāna, as is seen from this analysis of the four bases of sympathy.

In modern times, we all know that a subject becoming popular in the field of education is "counseling". We do not know through what kinds of courses this counseling is being taught. When we consider the four bases of sympathy presented by the Buddha, and the four Brahma-vihāras underlying them, they help us to be a true counselor and to recognize what true counseling is. Why? Because it is the inner desire of a person to work for another's welfare—or rather, loving-kindness, compassion, sympathetic joy, and equanimity. It is that very quality. Everyone knows what is mentioned in the Karaṇīyametta Sutta where loving-kindness is declared: "Mātā yathā niyaṃ puttāṃ āyusā ekaputtamanurakkhe; evampi sabbabhūtesu mānasā bhāvaye aparimāṇaṃ"—just as a mother would protect her only son even at the risk of her own life, or just as the loving-kindness of a mother toward her child, "aparimāṇaṃ"—one should radiate it boundlessly to all living beings. Based on this, we can understand that loving-kindness, as well as compassion, sympathetic joy, and equanimity, are all described as appamaññā (boundless states). It is by radiating them boundlessly that the entire society is embraced, and the whole society can be won over.

Society is what was referred to here as "a group". However, it may differ from various modern social philosophies. This is the kind of thing the Buddha points out. Also, we generally consider some things in the world to be selfish. What is spoken of here is altruism (paratthacariyā). In fact, the Buddha shows both sides, just as he shows the Middle Path elsewhere in the Dhamma: attahita parahita—one's own welfare and the welfare of others. Even in the analysis of wholesome and unwholesome, the Buddha has shown that why something is unwholesome is because it leads to one's own ruin and also to the ruin of others; it leads to the ruin of both parties. Those are called unwholesome—things that arise as greed (lobha), hatred (dosa), delusion (moha), and so on. On the other hand, things that bring welfare to both sides are called wholesome.

There is a place where the Buddha made this statement directly to a monk. A certain monk—whose name is not mentioned—came and asked the Buddha: "Venerable Sir, who is fit to be called paṇḍito mahāpañño (wise and of great wisdom)? Who is called 'a wise person of great wisdom'?" The Buddha declared: "If someone does not think of their own harm or ruin, nor of the ruin of others, but instead thinks of their own well-being and the well-being of others..."—"attahitaṃ parahitaṃ ubhayahitaṃ sabbalokahitameva cinteti"* (one thinks of one's own welfare, the welfare of others, the welfare of both, indeed the welfare of the entire world). There lies a valuable statement. Some might think that a Buddhist is an isolated, selfish person. But the Buddha shows both sides in this manner: "attahitaṃ parahitaṃ ubhayahitaṃ sabbalokahitameva cinteti"*. This is how the Buddha describes the wise person of great wisdom: as one who thinks of their own welfare, the welfare of others, the welfare of both, and the welfare of the entire world.

This is made even clearer in another valuable sutta, where a unique analysis is presented by dividing people into four categories. Now, hita means welfare. If we have understood that, next it is said that there is one person—the first person—who works neither for their own welfare nor for the welfare of others: "neva attahitaṃ na parahitaṃ"*. The Buddha describes him in this way: "Just as, monks, a firebrand from a funeral pyre, smeared with excrement, cannot be used as firewood in the village, nor can it be used as firewood in the forest. In the same way, I describe that person." He has neither attahita nor parahita; he does not care for his own welfare, nor does he care for the welfare of others. There is nothing useful in him. That is the first person.

Then comes the second person. Who is the second person? "Parahitāya paṭipanno no attahitāya"*—one who practices for the welfare of others, but not for their own welfare. Mentioning this, the Buddha states: "Between these two, the second is considered superior and excellent." That is understandable. Between a completely useless person and a person who considers the welfare of others but not their own, we can accept that the second is superior.

Now comes a good point to reflect upon. Who is the third person? One who does not consider the welfare of others, but considers their own welfare; they work for their own welfare. Stating this, the Buddha declares: "Among these three, the superior person is not the second, but the third." That can be a challenge to some according to modern thinking. So, who is the second? One who does not consider their own welfare, but considers only the welfare of others. Who is the third? One who does not consider the welfare of others, but considers only their own welfare. The Buddha declares this person to be the most excellent among these three. We shall try to understand this later.

Now, fourthly, it is shown—and there is no debate about this—the fourth person considers both the welfare of others and their own welfare. That person is the most excellent among the four. Thus, the Buddha has given an extraordinary analysis here. One was stated directly. Once two were introduced, the superior of the two was shown. Once three were introduced, the superior of the three was shown. Once four were introduced, the fourth is the most supreme. Here, a doubt might arise: why was the superior status given to the one who thinks of their own progress without thinking of others? There is a verse in the Dhammapada that helps us understand this:

> Attadattham paratthena, bahunāpi na hāpaye;

> Attadatthambhññāya, sadatthapasuto siyā.

That is, "For the sake of another's benefit, however great, one should not neglect one's own benefit. Having clearly understood one's own benefit, one should be intent on one's true goal." It means: do not sacrifice your own welfare, your own progress—your spiritual progress in this long saṃsāra—even for the sake of a great deal of service to others. "Attadattham paratthena bahunāpi na hāpaye"—even for the sake of much service to others, do not destroy your own well-being—for you only have yourself. "Attadatthambhññāya... siyā"—having properly understood your own benefit and welfare, engage in it.

What does this mean? Standing in a mud pit, how can one pull another out of the mud pit? If we ourselves are in bad practices—let us say we commit the five sins to help others. To support society, we commit destruction of life, theft, lying, and other sins. But in the end, because of a bad example, society deteriorates spiritually. We too deteriorate along with it. But to the outside, it appears as altruism. That is why the true foundation of altruism is self-interest itself. By "self-interest", we do not mean that kind of narrow, selfish idea, but inner spiritual progress. That is how we must understand it.

Seeing this verse, "attadattham paratthena" in the Dhammapada, someone might raise a question: "Why, hasn't the Buddha preached a kind of extreme selfishness?" We must understand this in its context; it means committing sins under the guise of working for the world while neglecting one's own spiritual progress. As the Buddha himself declared, according to the analysis of wholesome and unwholesome, only what is beneficial to both sides is wholesome, not just to one side. Once this is correctly understood, the Buddha's analysis of the wise person of great wisdom reveals the true target. That is exactly what a Buddha does—the true target is both attahita and parahita at their respective levels.

At whatever level it is done, it must be in accordance with the Dhamma. To be in accordance with the Dhamma, we must think of those four powers. Why did we speak of "the power of wisdom" (paññā-balaṃ)? Now, if someone wants to do social service, shouldn't they have some kind of power and capability? We think that many people want to do social service. Here is the power and capability according to the Dhamma. Wisdom must be there to understand good and bad, wholesome and unwholesome, duties and non-duties, what should be done and what should not be done. Assisted by that power, assisted by that capability, when a problem arises, one does "counseling". That power of wisdom belongs to the counselor.

Next, the power of energy (viriya-balaṃ)—if that counselor has no interest at all in removing what is bad, makes no effort, and makes no effort to bring close what is good, what kind of counseling do they do? That lazy person who lacks the power of energy, that kind of lazy person cannot minister to others; they cannot engage in altruistic activity. Next, similarly, "the power of blamelessness" (anavajja-balaṃ)—one who has a blameless course of action is fit for this. If one's own character goes astray, that person cannot perform true service. Next, similarly, they cannot come anywhere near "the power of sympathy" (saṅgaha-balaṃ) in accordance with the Dhamma.

At the same time, in that very sutta, the Buddha shows how the noble disciple who possesses these four powers—the power of wisdom (paññā-balaṃ), the power of energy (viriya-balaṃ), the power of blamelessness (anavajja-balaṃ), and the power of sympathy (saṅgaha-balaṃ)—thinks. He shows that such a person can be free from four fears. What are the four fears? By "fear" we mean dangers, things that an ordinary person fears. What are the four fears? There are four fears that come to a person living in ordinary society: first, the fear concerning livelihood (ājīvika-bhaya). The fear concerning livelihood means fear regarding one's living, the fear of losing one's job—this is what the Buddha speaks of.

Next, what is the second fear? Asiloka-bhaya (fear of ill-repute). Siloka means praise. Thus, the fear of blame, insult, and censure. This too exists for a social being. What is the third fear? Parisasārajjā-bhaya (fear of assemblies/stage fright). The fear of going into an assembly. One can understand why. Fear of going into the midst of a group. This too is a fear for a social being. What is the fourth fear? The fear of death (maraṇa-bhaya). What is the fifth fear? The fear of an evil destination (duggati-bhaya). Thus, it is mentioned regarding the noble disciple that the noble disciple transcends and overcomes these five fears.

Nay, the Buddha even shows how that person thinks. He thinks like this: "I have no fear concerning this livelihood. Why should I have fear concerning my livelihood? I have the power of wisdom, I have the power of energy, I have the power of blamelessness, I have the power of sympathy." According to how that person thinks: "It is the one who lacks wisdom who should fear concerning livelihood, fearing that they will lose their living. It is the lazy person who should have fear concerning livelihood. It is the one with wrong bodily and verbal actions who should have fear concerning livelihood. It is the one who does not minister to the group who should have fear concerning livelihood."

Likewise, it is said regarding the other fears: "I have no fear regarding blame or insult. Why should I fear censure and insult? I have the power of wisdom, the power of energy, the power of blamelessness, the power of sympathy. It is the one who lacks wisdom who should fear censures and insults. It is the lazy person who should fear in that way. It is the one with wrong bodily and verbal actions who should fear censure in that way. It is the one who does not minister to others who should fear in that way."

In the same manner, it is mentioned regarding going into the midst of an assembly. How that person thinks: "I have no fear of going into the midst of an assembly. Why? Because I have the aforementioned power of wisdom, power of energy, power of blamelessness, power of sympathy." There too, it is declared: "It is the man who lacks wisdom who should fear going into the midst of an assembly. It is the lazy person who should fear in that way. It is the one with wrong bodily and verbal actions who should fear. It is the one who does not minister to others who should fear!"

In the same manner, it is mentioned regarding the fear of death. Based on this, we can understand. There too, it is said: "Why should I fear death? It is the man without wisdom who fears death. The man without energy, the one with wrong courses of action, and the one who does not minister to others are the ones who fear death." Next, regarding the evil destination too, it is the same way.

Now, this might sometimes be a bit confusing. It might be difficult for this audience to understand. It has to be understood in this way: if there are deficiencies in those aforementioned bodily and verbal actions—indeed, according to this era, there is a saying in society that "there is no place for the good man". Everyone knows how the country is going. Now, most people just support whatever is trending. They do not consider Dhamma or non-Dhamma; they support the wrong path because it is the easy thing to do, selfishly. But the Buddha has pointed that out. Such people cannot remain in those positions for long anyway.

So, be that as it may, if one lacks those aforementioned qualifications, the fear of livelihood might sometimes result in a sudden big gain. In these times, there are various things like bribery and corruption. They live in great fear, wondering at what moment this will be caught, and they will lose their post and have to step out onto the street. There is no such fear for the honest person—the person established in those aforementioned virtues has no fear. Even if they lose it there, they go elsewhere. Such a person does not need extra certificates. It is only a matter of inquiring, "What kind of person is he?" Many people expect certificates from others. For the one who lives a good life, certificates are not necessary. It is like that when one investigates a bit.

Now, on one hand, we said that there is no place for the good man in society. On the other hand, we hear in society that there is no man for a job. Even with such a large population, why is there no man for a job? There is no honest man. In these times, one can place trust in a machine, in iron machines, but one cannot place trust in humans—they have fallen to a very degraded state due to the lack of Dhamma. Therefore, we can understand that the Buddha's word is true even today. That is why it was said that that person has no fear concerning livelihood. There is always a place in society for such individuals.

So, it is the same regarding blame and insult. In these times, we hear of bribery, corruption, and so on. Regarding people who flourish, who flourish at the very top, suddenly a news item appears in big letters. After that, no one knows where that person is. Then, from that, it is seen that it is precisely due to the weakness of character strength that a person cannot go into the midst of an assembly. That is what is called the "fear of assemblies" (parisasārajja-bhaya).

Now, we can understand why the Buddha presented the thoughts and words of that noble disciple as a model for the world. That person thinks without fear: "I have no fear of those things. Why should I fear?" A strength of character arises in that person, the noble disciple, enabling them to say so. Then, there is no fear concerning livelihood, no fear concerning blame and insult, no fear of going into the midst of assemblies, no fear of death, and no fear of the evil destination. This is what we have to understand.

At the same time, let us consider. Now, this is about social service, or rather altruism. Nowadays, words like "social service" are used. Although we all talk about these things, the greatest parasite in society is envy. The opposite virtue of that is what is spoken of here as sympathetic joy (muditā). The sympathetic joy that parents develop regarding raising a child. Even the word muditā is not clear to many. Sympathetic joy (muditā) means generating happiness over the happiness of others. Or rather, seeing others in happiness, feeling happy in one's mind as if one has reached happiness oneself. This virtue is lacking in most people.

Therefore, they sometimes perform "altruistic service", but like puppeteers, they expect to keep that person under their control. They do not allow that person to rise on their own. It turns into envy: "The one who grew up eating and drinking from us—how can I give him an equal seat?" That question arises. The talk of equality (samānattatā) goes hand-in-hand with this. As long as envy exists, as long as that vice exists, that concept of altruism is not fulfilled.

Indeed, a counselor should possess—then we see—the four Brahma-vihāras, this power of sympathy (saṅgaha-bala), the bases of sympathy (saṅgaha-vatthu), and their implementation. Underlying that is the matter of the mind. Now, when we speak of the four Brahma-vihāras, we often show these at the family level. Now, the family is a unit of society. That is why the Buddha pointed out: "Mātā yathā niyaṃ puttā āyusā ekaputtamanurakkhe; evampi sabbabhūtesu mānaṣaṃ bhāvaye aparimāṇaṃ". That is only an example. Just as a mother would protect her child at the risk of her life, radiate loving-kindness boundlessly to all living beings—boundlessly.

Then we can understand that a social worker develops the loving-kindness of the four Brahma-vihāras boundlessly. The virtue that was limited to a family is developed for the entire society. Why? Because to the Buddha, although we enclose ourselves by nation or tribe, to the Buddha's eye of wisdom, it appeared like a group of people being swept away into the ocean. These are all beings in the ocean of saṃsāra. Therefore, in whatever way, that wise noble disciple, having removed those vices like envy, thinks of the welfare of everyone. Within that, one's own spiritual progress is accomplished; that is why they are called appamaññā (boundless states) and exist as high states of jhāna. These are not merely words. If one makes an effort, they can be put into practice.

Everyone has heard of loving-kindness (mettā). How to develop the meditation on loving-kindness has also been shown by us in many ways, through various methods in these sermons and so on. So, in brief, if one considers that everyone desires happiness and dislikes suffering, after grasping that concept in the mind, the meditation that begins with a word like "may they be well" is not limited to just one person. That is what is called "radiation" in the Dhamma. In developing the mind to the boundless state called appamaññā, it is described in the Dhamma regarding the meditation on loving-kindness as: "ekāṃ disaṃ dutiyaṃ disaṃ tatiyaṃ disaṃ catutthaṃ disaṃ, uddhaṃ adho"—one direction, the second direction, the third direction, the fourth direction, upward, downward, and so on, radiating the feeling "may they be happy" to the entire universe without any limit. Sometimes it is called the "dissolving of boundaries" (sīmā-sambheda), without any boundary, in a way that fences and hurdles are removed.

Just as this is stated regarding loving-kindness, it is also said regarding compassion—to develop it to a boundless state. It is the same for sympathetic joy (muditā). Then there is no room for envy. Envy is a social parasite. If a parasite grows on a tree, the tree is destroyed. Similarly, as everyone knows, there is competitiveness everywhere. Indeed, we consider examinations, competitions, and sports events as tools to measure skill, efficiency, and wholesome talent. There are competitions even in Dhamma schools. However, one must be careful of the envy that arises very subtly through these. One protects oneself through virtues like sympathetic joy (muditā). Then, it seems as though we cannot do without competition to measure talent. But what the talented person receives is not praise, but the hatred and envy of those who competed with them. Because of this, sometimes untimely death occurs. You are well aware that this has come down to the school level.

What was at the employment level—we do not need to speak of other things, of higher levels—what was at various levels of society has also entered the field of education. The one who scored more marks is sometimes killed by their own close associates. That kind of situation. Why? Although competitiveness is a necessity to test talent in the world, within that competition, instead of treating the winner as one who gave a new target to the world, as one who set a new record, and bending to praise them and give them a gift—instead of that virtue of sympathetic joy (muditā)—what exists in the world is pulling them down, destroying them, and reaching that place by wiping them out.

So then we must think of this concept of altruism shown by the Buddha. These indeed help the counselors of modern times. Counseling is not a livelihood to be exploited. It is by putting forward the inner wholesome energy, and at the same time, in a way that assists one's own spiritual progress. In an era where everything, every job, is subjugated to money, some do counseling but do not develop the true attitude within it. How can a blind person show the way to another?

Now, you have heard that when the Buddha speaks about the world, he describes the blind person, the one-eyed person, and the person with both eyes (andha, ekacakkhu, dvi-cakkhu). The blind person has no understanding of welfare in this world, nor of welfare in the next world. They do not know their own welfare, nor do they know the welfare of others. In that way. But the one-eyed person, shortsightedly, with short-term plans only for the welfare of this world, achieves their own economic progress through devious means. One cannot support another with the squinted vision of a one-eyed person.

Having understood the good and bad of both this world and the next, the Buddha declared that when we think of this journey of saṃsāra, although people are born in various castes, nations, and places, they are engaged in this same journey of saṃsāra. Sometimes, they are people who were relatives and siblings to one another in saṃsāra, living together. If one has gained that kind of understanding, that person understands that pulling another down to reach that place leads to one's own ruin. The blind person cannot do it anyway. One cannot counsel another with the squinted vision of a one-eyed person either.

Accordingly, we must act in a way that brings welfare to both sides in both worlds—not only in both worlds but also in a way that brings Nibbāna. Now, here, the Buddha has analyzed these four bases of sympathy in this way: in a manner that brings prosperity in this world and Nibbāna at the end. From the perspective of showing equality according to the fruits of the path in the power of sympathy.

Accordingly, we must reflect. Therefore, these four bases of sympathy are an extremely valuable Dhamma in this dispensation. Many people might sometimes become indifferent to our sermons, thinking that we always speak about Nibbāna. But we must understand that the path to Nibbāna lies through these very courses of action. This cannot be separated from the Dhamma. Therefore, these four bases of sympathy and the four Brahma-vihāras lead to one's own spiritual progress as well as the progress of society.

Society is not something separate from the individual. The family is not something separated from the nation or society. Although it may be considered a unit, it is fine. It is the very deficiency here that affects society. It is the very progress here that affects society. Therefore, as individuals, the four Brahma-vihāras we learned from our parents, the four bases of sympathy we recognized through our parents, we must bring close to our lives. Before giving that aforementioned counseling to others, if one strengthens oneself with the power of sympathy, then indeed, one can rise from the mud pit and raise others from that state as well.

We must reflect that the Buddha did not preach this Dhamma to make everyone attain Nibbāna in a single day. People are at various levels. That is why the Buddha began with the talk on giving (dāna-kathā). Beginning with the talk on giving, he spoke of the graduated discourse (anupubbi-kathā): talk on giving (dāna-kathā), talk on virtue (sīla-kathā), talk on heaven (sagga-kathā). Telling the one who cannot do anything else to at least do that—to give dāna. To keep that virtue (sīla) at least when giving dāna. Next, having shown the benefits of giving and virtue, the "talk on heaven". Next, the danger of sensual pleasures (kāmānaṃ ādīnava). Gradually, just as one removes children from toys and lifts them higher, the Buddha lifted the world from that mundane level, showed the Four Noble Truths, and led them toward Nibbāna.

In the same way, at the beginning of this year, we too must think: may this journey starting with these four bases of sympathy, this journey starting with the four Brahma-vihāras, lead to the realization of Nibbāna at some point. If the benefits of hearing this sermon help you in your reflections, meditations, and in calming the mind, utilizing those wholesome energies, making an effort in this very life, and through the association of spiritual friends (kalyāṇa-mitta), succeeding in Dhamma practice and meditation, may this Dhamma sermon assist in realizing the noble, supreme, deathless Nibbāna through the penetration of the fruits of the path: Stream-entry (Sotāpanna), Once-returner (Sakadāgāmi), Non-returner (Anāgāmi), and Arahantship!

While wishing so, may whatever living beings there are in the universe—from the Avīci hell to the Akaṇitṭha heaven—who expect the benefits of hearing the Dhamma and preaching the Dhamma, by rejoicing in this, be pacified by the noble, supreme, deathless Nibbāna through their aspired Bodhi! With this wish, recite these verses:

Verse 25 from the Appamādavagga (Chapter on Heedfulness) of the Dhammapada

Dear Listeners,

At times there can be a vast difference between a person's socially accepted level of intelligence and their samsaric level of intelligence. Even within an individual who is marginalized according to conventional social examinations and tests, deep understandings and special mental strengths developed through samsara may lie hidden. If such a person receives the proper association of a good spiritual friend (kalyāṇa-mitta) and strives with unyielding, unremitting effort, they can unearth wondrous abilities from within themselves. A fine illustration of this is revealed in the background story of the verse we have chosen as our theme today.

In the city of Rājagaha, the young daughter of a certain wealthy merchant family was kept by her parents on the seventh floor of a mansion for her protection. However, she developed an intimate relationship with her own male servant and ran away from the merchant's mansion. They went to live in another province, living in disguise. While living like this, when she was close to giving birth to her first child, the merchant's daughter said to her husband, "Giving birth in a place where there are no relatives is very troublesome. Let us go to my parents." But this husband was afraid to go, thinking, "If I go, they will kill me." Yet, he did not voice this. Instead, he kept putting it off, saying, "Let us go tomorrow, let us go tomorrow." The merchant's daughter understood this. Therefore, when her husband was away, she informed the neighbors, tidied up the house, and departed. After the husband returned home, he learned of this from the neighbors and went in pursuit of her. He met her along the way, and she gave birth to the child right there on the road. Thereafter, the two of them decided, "Now let us go back to our home." Because the child was born on the road (pantha), they named him "Panthaka."

While they were living back at home, when the time came for her to have her second child, the merchant's daughter again thought that she must go to meet her parents. Since her husband would not allow it, she set off alone. The husband pursued her as before and met her. It is mentioned that on this occasion, too, the child was born right on the road. Since both were born on the road, both had to be named "Panthaka." Therefore, the first-born child was called "Mahāpanthaka" (Panthaka the Elder), and the second child was called "Cūḷapanthaka" (Panthaka the Younger). While the two children, thus named, were growing up, Mahāpanthaka, while playing with his friends, heard them talk about their grandfathers, uncles, and relatives. He came and asked his mother, "Do we not have relatives? Do we not have grandfathers?" Then the mother said, "We have them in the city of Rājagaha." When she explained that the merchant and his wife of that merchant clan were their relatives, he asked, "Why do we not go there?" She could not answer that question. However, the child kept asking repeatedly, "Why do we not go there?" Finally, unable to avoid it, the merchant's daughter told her husband, "I cannot escape these children because of this question; let us take the two of them. After all, my parents are not going to eat us alive, are they?" They discussed it in this way. The husband said, "I cannot go, but I will devise some means." Then, the two of them set off with the two children. They went and stayed at a rest house for travelers near the gate of the city of Rājagaha, and sent a message to the merchant's mansion, saying that their daughter had arrived with the two children. But the merchant thought, "There is no one in this samsara who has not been our child. Yet, these two have brought great disgrace upon us. Therefore, they need not come to us. Send only the two children to us." He sent a message, along with wealth, saying, "Take this wealth, as much as you need, and live wherever you wish. Send only the two children here." In this manner, the two children were sent to the merchant.

Now, this merchant used to go regularly to see the Blessed One and listen to the Dhamma. The child Mahāpanthaka also went with him. As he listened to the Dhamma repeatedly, this child felt the desire to ordain. So, he said to his grandfather, "Please! If you would give me permission, I would like to ordain." "Oh! I would prefer your ordaining over everyone else in the entire world ordaining!" said the grandfather, and took him to the Blessed One. "This grandson of mine wishes to ordain," he told the Blessed One. The Blessed One also assigned a certain monk to ordain the boy Mahāpanthaka. Thus, he ordained, received higher ordination, learned the Dhamma, practiced meditation, and attained Arahantship. Having attained Arahantship, he thought, "Ah! How wonderful it would be if I could also give the bliss of ordination, the bliss of absorption (jhāna), and the bliss of fruition (phala) to my younger brother, Cūḷapanthaka." One day, he went to the merchant's mansion and said, "O Merchant, if you permit, I shall ordain Cūḷapanthaka." "Oh, very well. I have no objection at all," said the grandfather, granting permission. Thus, he took Cūḷapanthaka and ordained him.

Next, he assigned a verse to the young monk Cūḷapanthaka to memorize and recite. The verse was highly beautiful, of a kind suited for young children. Indeed, it pertained to the recollection of the Buddha (buddhānussati), carrying a meaning that inspires faith (saddhā) in the Blessed One:

> Padumaṃ yathā kokanadaṃ sugandhaṃ

> pāto siyā aṅgīrasaṃ passa virocamaṇaṃ

> tapantaṃ mādīyamivaṃ talikkhe

Even when judged by its rhythm, it seems easy to memorize. Yet, for some reason, the young monk Cūḷapanthaka could not memorize it; he simply could not commit this verse to memory. When he memorized the first line and moved on to the second, he would forget the first line. In this manner, he tried to memorize it for four whole months, but failed. The reason for this is given as a past karma. In the past, during the time of Kassapa Buddha, this young monk Cūḷapanthaka had been a highly intelligent monk. On an occasion when an incompetent monk in the group was reciting his lessons, he had mocked and humiliated him for his inability to memorize. Consequently, that monk eventually gave up reciting and studying altogether. It is shown that due to that unwholesome karma, in this life, Ven. Cūḷapanthaka was unable to memorize even such a small verse for four whole months. Therefore, Ven. Mahāpanthaka thought, "Now, if he cannot memorize even this single verse, what is the use?" He called Ven. Cūḷapanthaka and said, "Cūḷapanthaka, if you cannot memorize this small verse in four months, how will you complete your monkhood? How will you become an Arahant? It is better for you to go home now." He made him cry. However, by that time, Ven. Cūḷapanthaka had developed a great love for the monastic life. He did not wish to go home; he was deeply attached to the life of a monk.

Now, while things were in this state, it is mentioned—though most of these events usually took place at the Veḷuvana monastery—that on this occasion, the Blessed One was residing in the Mango Grove of the physician Jīvaka. Thus, one day—perhaps on this very day—physician Jīvaka, having visited the Blessed One and listened to the Dhamma, approached Ven. Mahāpanthaka. Why? Because by then, Ven. Mahāpanthaka held a certain office among the Sangha. What was that office? It is called the bhattuddesaka (distributor of meals). What is the meaning of that office? When there is a large number of monks and lay devotees come requesting fifty or a hundred monks for an alms-giving, it is this monk who selects and sends the monks according to their turn. Ven. Mahāpanthaka held this office. Ven. Mahāpanthaka asked physician Jīvaka how many monks were needed. Jīvaka replied that he invited the entire Sangha, led by the Buddha. He asked how many monks were residing there. When told there were five hundred monks, physician Jīvaka said, "I invite them all." At that, Ven. Mahāpanthaka said, "This young monk Cūḷapanthaka has no skill in learning. Setting him aside, I give permission to invite the rest." The young monk overheard this. Thinking, "It seems Ven. Mahāpanthaka has given up on me. I am forced to go home. I must go home and at least make merit by giving alms," the young monk prepared to return home the following morning and set off.

That morning, when the Blessed One entered the attainment of great compassion (mahā-karuṇā-samāpatti) and surveyed the world, he saw Ven. Cūḷapanthaka. What did the Blessed One do then? He was walking up and down near the gate on the path Cūḷapanthaka was taking. When Ven. Cūḷapanthaka saw the Blessed One, paid homage, and stood to one side, the Blessed One asked, "What is it, Cūḷapanthaka, at this hour? Where are you going?" He replied, "My elder brother, Ven. Mahāpanthaka, is expelling me from the monastery, saying I am incompetent. Therefore, I am going home." Then the Blessed One said, "Cūḷapanthaka, does your ordination not belong to me? When your elder brother told you to leave, why did you not come to me? Come to me." Saying this, he stroked his head, took him along, and had him sit near the Blessed One's Fragrant Chamber (gandha-kuṭi). Having had him sit down, it is said he created a piece of cloth through psychic power. In any case, placing a clean white piece of cloth in his hand, he said, "Cūḷapanthaka, face the rising sun and rub this piece of cloth while repeating: 'Rajo haraṇaṃ, rajo haraṇaṃ' (removal of dirt, removal of dirt)." He assigned him this task, telling him to rub this white cloth while repeating "removal of dirt, removal of dirt."

By that time, the group arriving to conduct them to the alms-giving arrived. Thus, the Blessed One and the entire Sangha proceeded to the house of physician Jīvaka for the alms meal. What happened next is recounted. Physician Jīvaka poured the water of dedication over the Blessed One's hands and prepared to offer the alms food. However, the Blessed One covered his bowl with his hand. When he covered his bowl with his hand, physician Jīvaka inquired about the reason. The Blessed One said, "Are there not still monks left at the monastery?" Ven. Mahāpanthaka replied, "There are no monks left, Venerable Sir." When the Blessed One repeated that there were, physician Jīvaka sent a servant to go and see.

By the time the servant went, what had occurred? In the meantime, another event had taken place. As Ven. Cūḷapanthaka was rubbing and rubbing that cloth, he noticed that it was becoming dirty. He was rubbing it with the thought, "I am removing the dirt," yet it was becoming soiled. Then he began to contemplate: "This cloth became soiled because of the impurity of my own body. Alas! Aniccā vata saṅkhārā—impermanent / inconstant indeed are preparations / formations / volitional activity!" Reflecting on the nature of preparations / formations / volitional activity (saṅkhāra) in this way, his mind turned towards insight (vipassanā). At that very moment, the Blessed One, while seated at the house of the alms-giving, projected his aura and admonished Ven. Cūḷapanthaka with a verse. He declared: "Cūḷapanthaka, it is not merely the dirt on your body; within the mind, too, there are impurities called lust, hatred, and delusion. Abandon those!"—proclaiming these verses as if through psychic power. Relying on this, Ven. Cūḷapanthaka developed insight (vipassanā) and became a great Arahant possessing the direct knowledges (abhiññā).

Thus, as mentioned before, when the Blessed One covered his bowl with his hand, Ven. Mahāpanthaka insisted, "There are no monks at the monastery." But the Blessed One asserted that there were. It was to resolve this that physician Jivaka sent a servant. When the servant arrived, the monastery was filled with monks. Some monks were sewing robes, some were dyeing robes, some were reciting texts—there resided a thousand monks, each having a different appearance. What was the reason for this? Ven. Cūḷapanthaka was observing everything that was happening. By now, he possessed direct knowledges (abhiññā). He saw with his divine eye (dibba-cakkhu) that Ven. Mahāpanthaka was saying there were no monks, while the Blessed One was saying there were. Thinking, "I shall show that I am here," he created them—he created those thousand monks. The servant could not understand it. He returned and said, "There are about a thousand monks." The Blessed One then said, "Go back and say, 'The Teacher summons Ven. Cūḷapanthaka.'" When the servant went back a second time and said this, all those thousand monks created through psychic power declared, "I am Cūḷapanthaka, I am Cūḷapanthaka!" Unable to resolve this, the servant returned and reported it. Then the Blessed One said, "In that case, hold the hand of the monk who first says 'I am Cūḷapanthaka.' The others will then vanish." The messenger went back and did exactly as told. Thereupon, Ven. Cūḷapanthaka accompanied the messenger back. After arriving, when the alms meal was finished, the Buddha assigned the delivery of the appreciation of the meal (anumodanā) to Ven. Cūḷapanthaka. Ven. Cūḷapanthaka, now a great Arahant possessing direct knowledges (abhiññā), delivered that sermon in an exceptionally eloquent manner.

This event was so wondrous that the monks, on several occasions, discussed the natural principle (dhammatā) within it. That is to say, Ven. Mahāpanthaka had deemed him incompetent and treated him as an unsuitable person (abhavya) in this Dispensation—to put it bluntly, like an unfortunate wretch. Indeed, if one cannot memorize a single verse in four months, does it not seem like an unfortunate wretch? For this reason, regarding him as unsuitable and as someone who could achieve nothing in this Dispensation, Ven. Mahāpanthaka had prepared to send him home. It is mentioned that the Sangha spoke several times in the Dhamma assembly about this wondrous fact: how such a person, through the great compassion and marvellous skillful means (upāya-kosalla) of the Buddha, became an Arahant endowed with the direct knowledges (abhiññā) within a single morning. On certain occasions, the Buddha demonstrated through Jātaka stories that in the past, too, he had assisted Cūḷapanthaka in various instances.

What is particularly important regarding this Dhamma is that on one occasion, while the monks were discussing this very topic, they remarked that it was because the young monk Cūḷapanthaka did not abandon his efforts and acted with energetic strive, that he obtained the help of the Blessed One and attained such a state so rapidly within a single morning. Upon hearing this conversation, the Blessed One declared, "So it is, monks. If anyone in this Dispensation acts without negligence (appamāda) and with energetic strive (uṭṭhāna-vīriya), they are capable of attaining their own Nibbāna." He then uttered the Dhamma verse we chose as our theme earlier:

- > Uṭṭhānen'appamādena
- > saññāmena damena ca
- > dīpaṃ kayirātha medhāvī yaṃ ogho nābhikīrati

"By energetic strive (uṭṭhāna), by diligence (appamāda)"—with unyielding energy and the practice of diligence—"and by restraint and self-control (saññāmena damena ca)"—with the restraint developed through virtues like morality, and with sensory control—the wise person (medhāvī) builds an island that cannot be swept away by those sweeping floods. Here, "island" refers to Nibbāna. "Floods" (ogha) mean the sweeping currents. These refer to the mental defilement floods of sensual desire (kāmoghā), becoming / existence (bhavoghā), views (ditṭhoghā), and ignorance (avijjoghā). The island is Nibbāna—a place where one does not get caught in these defilement floods that sweep beings along in samsara, and where one can remain safe from them. The reason "island" is a name for Nibbāna is that it represents the extinguishment enjoyed in the state of the concentration of the fruit of Arahantship (arahatta-phala-samādhī). The Buddha expounded this Dhamma verse containing this deep meaning: that one attains that very state.

Briefly, that is the summary of the story. Next, let us try to bring out the Dhamma points we can extract from this, which can also help us in our own lives.

Now, as we said, one's samsaric level of intelligence cannot be measured by conventional social examinations, tests, and so forth. Certain strengths may exist, and if one receives the association of a good spiritual friend (kalyāṇa-mitta) when the opportunity arises, those strengths can be brought out. A perfect example of this is how Ven. Cūḷapanthaka—whom Ven. Mahāpanthaka had failed in this "examination of Nibbāna," deemed unsuitable, and prepared to send home—attained the supreme state in a very short time, within a single morning, due to the help of the Buddha as his good spiritual friend (kalyāṇa-mitta) and his great compassion. From this, we see that whatever intelligence tests, interviews, examinations, and so forth we devise in this world cannot reveal a person's true worth. Highly valuable strengths can lie embedded within.

Furthermore, this story reveals that after the young monk Ven. Cūḷapanthaka attained that state, he played a little joke on his elder brother. He made a certain playful tease toward Ven. Mahāpanthaka. What was this joke? We can say that this joke was a way of teaching a certain lesson. Now, we know that in this society too, there are many—especially some scholars nowadays—who bring forward the concept of triple-root rebirth (tīhetuka-paṭisandhi) to discourage many faithful people who are striving for Nibbāna. It is as if they are failing them in the exam beforehand and sending them home. Many seem to be doing exactly that kind of thing. Something similar to that happened here from Ven. Mahāpanthaka as well. In response, Cūḷapanthaka taught Ven. Mahāpanthaka a lesson by showing him a monastery filled with a thousand monks. This means that one cannot marginalize someone so abruptly. Valuable strengths can exist within a person. Thus, we can describe this as a kind of "playfulness within the Dispensation" (sāsanika huratalayak).

Next, alongside that, a highly valuable point revealed by this story is the Buddha's quality of great compassion (mahā-karuṇā). Along with this quality of great compassion, the Buddha himself declares on certain occasions, "Monks, I have compassion (anukampā) for you." "There is compassion in me for you." We know, and we have heard, that the Buddha had attained a state, Nibbāna, that is unshakable by the eight worldly conditions. However, due to the power of the perfections (pāramī) the Buddha fulfilled over a long period, any perturbation or tremor in the thoughts and feelings of those in the world who deserve compassion and mercy is registered in the Buddha's mind. The special occasion when this is felt is indeed that attainment of great compassion (mahā-karuṇā-samāpatti). Today, you devotees might think of various modern instruments—even though these are not perfect analogies or equivalents. In whatever manner, when the Buddha enters the attainment of great compassion, the tremor of those trembling hearts that deserve compassion is captured by the Buddha's mind.

Similarly, when reflecting on that event, what goes hand-in-hand with the Buddha's great compassion, with that very sympathy, is the skillful means (upāya-kosalla) developed through wisdom. He devises a certain method. The quality known as purisa-damma-sārathī (charioteer of tameable men) is a special attribute of the Blessed One; he possesses a unique power to discipline various individuals and direct them to Nibbāna. The Buddha applies whichever method is required according to the situation. Here, too, let us think a little about Ven. Cūḷapanthaka. Now, when a young child in a home is driven out without even being given food, what great grief and helplessness would arise in that child's heart? A similar thing happened to Ven. Cūḷapanthaka. It was Ven. Mahāpanthaka who had ordained him—his own elder brother. After bringing him from home and ordaining him, he finally failed him, deemed him unsuitable, and on top of that, excluded him from the invitation to the alms-giving. What immense pain must have arisen in Ven. Cūḷapanthaka's young heart?

Now, we know how a mother would act in such a situation. Just as a mother would stroke her child's head and console him, saying, "Even if your elder brother drove you away, my son, why did you not come to me? Why did you not come and tell me?", the Buddha too, on that occasion, stroked Ven. Cūḷapanthaka's head and comforted the young monk, saying, "Come, come to my Fragrant Chamber. After all, does your ordination not belong to me? It does not belong to Mahāpanthaka, does it?" In this instance, we clearly see that quality of great compassion as well as the knowledge of skillful means (upāya-kosalla-ñāṇa). Had there been even a slight delay, Ven. Cūḷapanthaka would have returned home. However, when the Buddha came to the gate before that, questioned him, and consoled him, what great courage must have filled that young head upon being touched by his sacred hand? There is a certain natural principle (dhammatā) in this as well. It is not generally mentioned that the Buddha stroked heads like that. He did not even stroke the head of young Ven. Rāhula. Prince Rāhula followed him, hanging on to him, yet he did not stroke his head even though he followed him so. But on this occasion, he stroked his head. There is a deep natural principle (dhammatā) within this. This will be revealed further as we proceed. So, he acted exactly like a mother on that occasion. We can understand the courage derived from that. Out of his sheer faith (saddhā) and reverence, Ven. Cūḷapanthaka might have previously thought of the Buddha as someone so exalted that one could not even go near him, let alone approach him closely. Ven. Cūḷapanthaka must have thought, "The Blessed One is no ordinary person; he is someone we cannot even approach." Yet, when the Buddha came right up to him, stroked his head, and said, "Come to my chamber," what immense courage must have arisen in that young monk?

Next, in the manner described, Ven. Cūḷapanthaka, relying on that courage, obediently kept rubbing that cloth just as the Buddha had instructed. All the other monks had gone to the house of the alms-giving. Ven. Cūḷapanthaka did not even have an alms meal. Even without food, he engaged in that meditation diligently, with energetic strive (uṭṭhāna-vīriya), with unremitting effort, and with restraint and self-control, exactly as the Buddha had directed.

When considering that meditation, there is a certain natural principle (dhammatā) in it as well. Devotees, in certain Dhamma stories, there is a wondrous depth in the combination and fitting together of events. Usually, when we narrate a story, we just recount the sequence of events without tending to analyze them. However, when we reflect calmly, we see a wondrous connection within every single event.

Two karmic results (kamma-vipāka) are mentioned regarding Ven. Cūḷapanthaka. One is a bad karma. What was that bad karma? During the time of Kassapa Buddha, he had mocked and made fun of a monk who was incompetent in learning. Because of that, he was unable to memorize that verse. Next, there is also a good side. It is explained like this: How did he attain Arahantship so quickly through the meditation subject (kammatṭhāna) of that piece of cloth? In the past, when he was a king, while touring the city—we can assume he was on elephant-back—which means he must have traveled around the city during the daytime to inspect it—while making this tour, due to the intense heat of the sun, sweat poured from his forehead. He wiped his forehead with a clean white cloth, something like a handkerchief, that was nearby. After wiping his forehead, when he looked at it, he saw that the piece of cloth had become soiled. Even though he was a king, perhaps riding on an elephant, his mind turned toward insight (vipassanā): "Aniccā vata saṅkhārā—impermanent / inconstant indeed are preparations / formations / volitional activity! Every preparation / formation / volitional activity is impermanent / inconstant in this way. No matter what state one is in, this is the nature of the body." Thus, his mind turned toward insight (vipassanā). It was to connect with that mind which had turned toward insight (vipassanā) that the Blessed One, as mentioned, gave him a clean white cloth and told him to face the sun and repeat "rajo haraṇaṃ, rajo haraṇaṃ*."

Nowadays, if we think about it, some people say that lay devotees should only be given sermons necessary to develop their businesses and so forth, and that it is not worthwhile to speak to them about insight (vipassanā). They claim that insight (vipassanā) is something meant only for monks meditating alone in the forests, and that lay devotees do not need it. Now, here is an excellent example. In the past, even though Cūḷapanthaka lived as a king—no matter that he was a king, sweat still poured, for the natural principle (dhammatā) is just the same—he did not let that sweat go to waste. Nowadays, perhaps when sweat flows, we merely wipe it with a handkerchief and put it in our pocket. However, in the past, that king directed that sweat toward insight (vipassanā); he credited it to insight (vipassanā); he deposited it into insight (vipassanā). It was that very thought of insight (vipassanā) credited to his account that ultimately helped him attain Arahantship. There is a good lesson there too. Through this, we see that we should make even the saliva we spit out in our daily lives support our attainment of Nibbāna. How do we make the flowing sweat support Nibbāna? By contemplating that the nature of preparations / formations / volitional activity (saṅkhāra) is such, in accordance with the Three Characteristics (ti-lakkhaṇa) taught by the Buddha. If even for a single moment a tremor, a shock, or a sense of urgency (saṃvega) regarding the true state of the world arises, it accumulates automatically. If at some point one hopes for Nibbāna, that experience might even present itself as a meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna). A wondrous natural principle (dhammatā) of this kind is seen here.

Thus, we can gather the factors that helped Ven. Cūḷapanthaka attain Arahantship from this. This meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna) is, in truth, the dirt on a white cloth. When one gazes at a white cloth for a long time, absorption (jhāna) can arise through it, such as in the form of a kasiṇa (meditative device). Then, using that absorption as a basis, the insight (vipassanā) is developed precisely on that dirt we mentioned. While looking at the white piece of cloth and repeating "rajo haraṇaṃ, rajo haraṇaṃ," a wondrous thing occurred within a single mealtime. If we try to understand how a young monk who could not memorize a verse, without any other instruction, passed all stages of absorption (jhāna), obtained the direct knowledges (abhiññā), and reached the highest peak of insight (vipassanā) to become an Arahant, we see that it may lie within the meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna) given by the Buddha himself. He developed insight (vipassanā) based on tranquility (samatha), or based on absorption (jhāna). That white color supported tranquility (samatha), but it was that moment of soiling which served as the cause for insight (vipassanā).

If we dive deeper into this, another factor that supported this was, for whatever reason, the verse Ven. Mahāpanthaka had given him to memorize. Even if you, devotees, cannot memorize it, we mentioned that it is a highly beautiful verse. There is a certain natural principle (dhammatā) in that verse as well. For one thing, what is expressed in that verse inspires a wondrous faith (saddhā) in the Blessed One. It is a truly beautiful verse:

> Padumaṃ yathā kokanadaṃ sugandhaṃ

> pāto siyā aṅgīrasaṃ passa virocamānaṃ

> tapantaṃ mādityaṃ mivaṃ talikkhe

"Just as there is a fragrant red lotus blossomed in the morning, even so..." This is a simile applied to the Buddha. He is like a fragrant red lotus blossomed in the morning. Next, what is the other simile? "Tapantaṃ mādityaṃ mivaṃ talikkhe"—like the sun shining in the sky. Look at the Blessed One, Aṅgīrasa, who is of such characteristics, who is so exceedingly magnificent: "Aṅgīrasaṃ passa virocamānaṃ"—"Behold the radiant Aṅgīrasa Buddha!" "Behold the radiant Aṅgīrasa Buddha, who is like a fragrant red lotus fully blossomed in the morning, and who shines like the sun glowing in the sky." This is the very verse given to the young monk Cūḷapanthaka to memorize. Although he could not memorize it, the meaning must have struck his heart. Through that, recollection of the Buddha (buddhānussati) and faith (saddhā) in the Blessed One must have grown. So, that too did not go to waste. On that very background, through that very attraction, the Buddha established him.

Next, if we reflect a little, there is something more there. When the Blessed One handed him the cloth and told him to meditate facing the sun, normally a person would not like that. Even nowadays, those who meditate look for highly comfortable places. But here, as the sun rises, sweat flows. This is a difficult thing. Yet, as expressed in the verse, indeed, even for a lotus to blossom, it needs sunlight; it blossoms by looking toward the sunlight. Similarly, due to the young monk Cūḷapanthaka's faith (saddhā) in the Blessed One—where the Blessed One is compared to the sun, like the shining sun—and just as the lotus blossoms by looking at the shining sun, so did his mind open. Perhaps no one interprets it in this way. Yet, when we contemplate a bit more deeply, it comes to light like this. In whatever manner, that verse too must have helped to complete that meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna).

With unremitting effort and strive, obedient to the Buddha's word, he rubbed the cloth while facing the sun. Through this, his past experience from his life as a king became connected to it. If there was any deficiency in it, the Buddha stroked his head to complete it. When the touch of the Buddha's sacred hand met his forehead, that too was completed. Every element necessary for that thought of insight (vipassanā) that arose in the past was present here to assist Ven. Cūḷapanthaka. They came together in one way or another. Although he could not memorize that verse for four months, its meaning must have struck his heart: the Buddha is like the sun, and the sun's light is necessary for a lotus to blossom. Thus, along with the other factors—the cloth and the dirt—all these came together, and it was through this combination that Cūḷapanthaka attained Nibbāna so quickly. We must think that it is the same for anyone. In this long samsara, as said before, if we credit even a bit of spat-out saliva to Nibbāna, if we credit the sweat that flows away to Nibbāna, we will receive its ultimate benefit some day. Thus, a profound depth is seen even within the events of this story.

Next, it is the same with the Buddha's quality of great compassion and his knowledge of skillful means. It is specifically mentioned that the Blessed One possesses a wondrous wisdom of a kind not shared by other disciples. A knowledge regarding the past karmas of various beings. This is called the knowledge of the inclinations and underlying tendencies of beings (āsayānusaya-ñāṇa). "Inclination" (āsaya), generally speaking, is the place where an animal lies down. "Underlying tendency" (anusaya) refers to certain specific mental states that lie latent deep within the mind. All of these are captured by the Buddha, by his Buddha-knowledge. Thus, understanding that "in the past, this person was in such-and-such states and did such-and-such things, and through those, these kinds of mental energies lie embedded within the mind," the Buddha acts in that manner. The ordinary world cannot comprehend this. Ordinarily, one might think: why did the Blessed One stroke Ven. Cūḷapanthaka's head? Why, when there was so much work to do, did he come out to the path and walk up and down? Yet, all of these fit together in a wondrous way. These were not given by the Blessed One; they are connected to both the good and bad deeds done by Ven. Cūḷapanthaka in samsara. It was due to the bad karma that he had to go home, and that such great grief arose. His brother, by failing him, had caused him to return home, missing the alms-giving.

Next, the skillful method the Blessed One applied was intended to draw the attention of the monks to this wondrous event. Everyone must have been waiting to eat the alms meal, but the eating was delayed. A servant was sent several times to check whether Ven. Cūḷapanthaka was there or not before eating. Through this, a highly valuable natural principle (dhammatā) was revealed to us. That is the most wondrous thing. Precisely because it was a wondrous matter, as we see from the books, the monks spoke about it repeatedly. In this day and age too, we must indeed think about such things repeatedly, because, as mentioned, some people possess the attitude of completely failing others based on conventional examinations and tests, and trying to send them home. Otherwise, as mentioned, the view is spread that because one lacks a triple-root rebirth (tīhetuka-paṭisandhi) one is unsuitable (abhavya) and should not strive in insight (vipassanā) and so forth; such opinions spread due to this very kind of weakness. Therefore, as far as stories go, this is an excellent story to inspire courage in everyone.

Next, there is the verse the Buddha preached at the end. In truth, there are numerous points related to the Dhamma in it:

> Uṭṭhānen'appamādena

> saññāmena damena ca

> dīpaṃ kayirātha medhāvī yaṃ ogho nābhikīrati

Most often, in the Dhammapada verses, not a single word can be cast aside. It is truly wondrous; if one goes deep into each and every word, there is enough material to write a massive book. Thus, several points are mentioned here. We already stated the meaning earlier: the factors mentioned here are those that assist in the attainment of Nibbāna:

> "Uṭṭhānen'appamādena damena ca"

Uṭṭhāna means unremitting effort. One must rise up every time one falls. That is how success is achieved; that is the path to success. Here too, Ven. Cūḷapanthaka's mind had fallen. He was about to leave, thinking, "Now I must go home and at least make merit by giving alms." But the Buddha inspired his effort; he encouraged him. So much so, that the touch of that sacred hand might have been a blessing that exhausted his karmic momentum. In whatever manner, encouraged by it and obedient to the Buddha's word, he meditated in that way. Everyone else had gone to the house of the alms-giving. In the empty monastery, in the Mango Grove, this young monk Cūḷapanthaka meditated. It is precisely to that that "unyielding effort" refers. "Appamādena"—diligently, he meditated, disregarding even food. Next, "damena ca"—and by self-control; restraint, being obedient to the Buddha's word. It was precisely because he was attached to virtues like morality (sīla) that he did not wish to go home. Usually, some young monks are constantly waiting for the moment to go home; there are those who think to that extent, their minds always on home. But this young monk did not wish to go home. It was only when there was absolutely no other choice that he prepared to leave. From this, we see that he had already developed those virtues of restraint and self-control (sañyama, dama) to some degree by then. It was particularly because he practiced them obediently in a way that supported Nibbāna that we have "uṭṭhānen'appamādena saññamena damena ca."

Next, "medhāvī" means the person who is wise from the perspective of Nibbāna. Nowadays, there are various words to describe a wise person. Not only words, but various other things exist too. You, devotees, know that there are letters (academic titles) used to identify an educated person or a scholar. There is also a socially accepted method of appearing as a scholar through degrees obtained by passing examinations at the mundane level. However, the word "medhāvī" is special. In the Dhamma, medhā is defined as "dhammoja-paññā"—wisdom containing the essence/nutrient of the Dhamma. Wisdom containing the essence/nutrient that is the Dhamma. "Essence/nutrient" (oja) means wetness or moisture. If we state its opposite, it is dry, arid. The wisdom of most other people is a dry wisdom; virtues like faith (saddhā) are not present there. "Dhammoja" means wisdom having the essence/nutrient that is the Dhamma. It is such a person who is called "medhāvī." Most of the educated people of today are not fit to attain that state. Yet, here Ven. Cūḷapanthaka was called "medhāvī," even though he could not properly memorize a single verse despite studying it for four months. Nowadays, if one is to pass an exam, one must indeed memorize. Although he was unable to do so, the Buddha described him as "medhāvī." So, what does such a wise person do?

> Dīpaṃ kayirātha medhāvī

> yaṃ oggho nābhikīrati

The meaning is that he makes an island that is not overwhelmed by the fierce torrents, that is not swept away by the fierce torrents.

When the word "island" is used, there are those who take it upside down as well. Giving Nibbāna the name "island," "cave," and various other names have been shown regarding Nibbāna. Merely by that, some people think that Nibbāna is some hidden place, a mystical place we would like to call a place, within this very becoming (bhava). Some people think so. To that extent, the lust for becoming (bhava-rāga) is strong within beings. They want to end the suffering (dukkha) of saṃsāra, but they also want to remain in saṃsāra. This kind of thing is present here. That is how many scholars explain this Nibbāna. They use even this word "island" to support such explanations. There is a concept regarding Nibbāna that the Buddha has said to leave the ocean of saṃsāra, go to the island called Nibbāna, and remain eternally in an eternal, deathless (ajara-mara), permanent, festive, supremely beautiful place. But we should not misunderstand. Here, this "island" is a state of this mind that is not swept away by saṃsāric beings. What is meant here is a liberation of the mind (ceto-vimutti). It is the liberation of the fruit of Arahantship. That is to say, every being in saṃsāra is swept away by the fierce torrent of sensuality (kāmogha). Next, they cling to becoming (bhava), to existence. Whatever kind of existence it may be. Now, if you ask a patient in a hospital if they want to die, they say no. Even if there are worms crawling in their eyes, they prefer existence. In that manner, a wonderful desire for existence exists within this world. So, they are pulled towards it. Next, views (diṭṭhi). They hold various views, various wrong views. They create wrong feelings and philosophies of life. Next, ignorance (avijjā). Ignorance is said to be not knowing. Briefly considered, ignorance is normally explained in books as not knowing the Four Noble Truths. They do not know that saṃsāra is suffering (dukkha). They do not know that the cause of that suffering is craving (taṇhā). They do not know that the calming of craving is Nibbāna. They do not know that the path to it is the Noble Eightfold Path.

But we can understand it in another way too. Not knowing means the tendency of forgetting this nature of saṃsāric suffering. It is very easily forgotten by beings. Even if one suffers extremely severe suffering in a life in this saṃsāra, being crushed and dying in fires in a highly terrifying and horrifying manner, because of the desire for becoming (bhava), that suffering, those experiences, are quickly forgotten. Next, just as that suffering is forgotten, the fact that craving (taṇhā) is the cause of that suffering is also forgotten. Next, the fact that the place where that craving is absent is the greatest solace is also forgotten. Next, the fact that to obtain this solace, a complete transformation of our personality must take place within our minds in eight steps—through the eight steps of the Noble Eightfold Path—is also forgotten. Not only Ven. Cūla Panthaka, but all of us in this saṃsāra forget these four lines. It is because we have been unable to memorize these four lines that we have traveled in saṃsāra for this long. If a person memorizes these four lines in exact order, that person attains the paths and fruits.

Then, this saṃsāric existence is suffering (dukkha), the cause of this is craving (taṇhā), the calming of this craving is the happiness in the world, and to do this, a complete transformation of life must occur through the Noble Eightfold Path, starting with right view and ending with right concentration, as a process of development and cultivation within us—in the form of right view, right intention, right speech, right action, right livelihood, right effort, right mindfulness, right concentration—a complete transformation of the behavior of mind, body, and speech must occur. It is due to forgetting these four lines that we have traveled in saṃsāra for this long. Therefore, what happens in attaining the paths and fruits is that through the powerful concentration of all eight factors of the Noble Eightfold Path arising in a single mind-moment—through the path-concentration—all four facts become clear at once. It is exactly like memorizing the stanza. Why is that? Now, we know that when a lamp is lit, several things happen simultaneously. At every moment of lighting, the wick burns. To some extent, the oil is consumed. Light spreads. Darkness is destroyed. In the same way is this truth. The moment of realizing the Four Noble Truths is described by a similar simile. It is said that when one obtains that path-mind (magga-citta) and realizes the Four Noble Truths, all four are grasped together. Why? Because to realize that this entire existence is suffering, one must indeed see the craving underlying it completely. On one hand, suffering ceases. craving is also worn away. Through that, Arahantship, Nibbāna, which is the light, spreads. A certain development must take place within for this. The Noble Eightfold Path. Only if the lamp is lit does that light spread and darkness vanish. This is what is meant by saying that the Four Noble Truths are directly realized by someone.

Direct realization is not something like learning from books. At that moment, at the moment of attaining the paths and fruits, at the moment of becoming an Arahant, the word of the Buddha is directly realized. This entire saṃsāric existence, or the five aggregates—the five aggregates called form, feeling (vedanā), perception, formations(saṅkhāra), and consciousness (viññāṇa)—is indeed suffering. The fact that it is suffering is understood by realizing the conditioned nature of these formations. Here, there is nothing to be taken as "I" or "mine". What is here is a heap of formations, a heap of things that arise and cease. A heap of formations is the feeling. Similarly, what cultivates these, what urges them to increase, is craving—the desire that is never satisfied, the desire for pleasure, the desire for existence/becoming, and so forth. In that manner, realization is completed when all eight factors of the Noble Eightfold Path are fulfilled and that path arises directly and uprightly in a single mind. At that moment. That is called the path-mind (magga-citta). That is an extremely powerful concentration. It is through that powerful concentration that the levels of defilements are cut off, and if there is any mental energy, any force, in our mental continuities that carries on the saṃsāric existence as shown in the Dhamma, they are worn away through that powerful concentration. Through that realization. That is why it is said that upon attaining Stream-entry, it is limited to seven births; upon attaining Once-returning, one comes to this world only once more; upon attaining Non-returning, one ends suffering in the Brahma world itself without returning to this world; and upon attaining Arahantship, the nature that gives rise to rebirth is destroyed, and birth (jāti) is ended completely. If there are any levels of defilements in this mental continuity that support another birth, things that lie dormant as underlying tendencies (anusaya), they are all dried up—that is the meaning. The moment when the Four Noble Truths are properly understood and directly realized. That state is what is called the "island" here. That is the liberation of the mind.

Now, the moment of entering the attainment of fruit (phala-samāpatti) is like the moment of standing on the island that the Arahants have obtained, found, and built. Detached from the world. That state is indeed the supreme state that cannot be compared to anything in the world. It is precisely because of finding this that we pay homages, offerings, and respects to the Buddha in a way we do not do for anyone else in the world. It is not because He preached about the development of the world, about worldly growth. Although He preached according to the capabilities of each individual, through all of those, the Buddha tried to make them understand that this saṃsāra is suffering, and to ferry them across this saṃsāra. Ferrying across saṃsāra is a state of the mind. It is not ferrying across saṃsāra and landing on another island to live there. Therefore, we must contemplate that due to various influences of defilements, many people misunderstand and distort even the Buddha's Dhamma. If the view is wrong, if the vision is wrong, if one goes in the wrong direction, how can one realize Nibbāna?

Therefore, we must contemplate the deep meaning of this stanza and stories of this kind. Now, the impermanence mentioned here is the impermanence of formations. Even though he had been a king in the past—even though he was a king in the past, Ven. Cūla Panthaka must have had thoughts and wishes inclined towards the Dhamma for an infinite time in this saṃsāra. In the same way, we must think about ourselves. No matter what level we are in our lay lives now, there can be certain strengths within us that help to attain Nibbāna. They do not just appear. We must strive to bring them out. That is why we said not to let them go to waste, but to credit them to Nibbāna. Doing so, gradually, the impermanence of formations, becomes well-digested in one's mind, and step by step, that insight is understood. Insight is not like seeing something through other machines and instruments of the world. One can obtain a direct, penetrating vision. That method of penetrating vision is described in the books as emerging as insight-knowledges (vipassanā-ñāṇa) regarding the realization of the paths and fruits. Even if we do not discuss it at length as a general academic subject, we must contemplate: what is the Dhamma principle there? We all know that to realize Nibbāna, simply and briefly put, we must realize the three characteristics—impermanent (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and not-self (anattā). We all know that. Even to the extent of saying, "Alas, it is impermanent!" We know the word anicca. But if we contemplate it deeply, when it emerges as insight-knowledge, it splits into two. That is why we say that like the first two leaves emerging from the seed of impermanence, they are arising and ceasing. Arising and ceasing are also seen if one contemplates a bit deeply. Impermanence means this arising and ceasing. Arising, existing, and ceasing. Although we mentally create a state called "existing", actually there is only arising and ceasing. Something arises. There is a moment we think of as existing. Then it ceases. When this is understood rapidly, next it is seen that it ceases even faster than it arises. Along with that, disenchantment (nibbidā) comes. As disenchantment increases, understanding also increases. Because the nature of craving (taṇhā) is to arise again and again. When craving decreases, then the impermanent nature is seen. Not one of these remains. They are a heap of formations in terms of arising and ceasing, which, as described by various similes, cease very rapidly like sesame seeds popping in a frying pan, starting to be seen by the eye of insight.

Next, gradually, due to the very ceasing, destruction called "bhaṅga" (dissolution) is seen. Not only other things, when thinking about the mind, even that thought is seen to break away. When it is seen to break away so deeply, a fear also arises. What is this? There is nothing to be taken as "I" here. Here is a heap of arising and ceasing. There is nothing for me to grasp. All are decayed fences. It is thought in this manner. Thinking of this state, a fear arises through it. Because of that fear, next, a disenchantment arises regarding the five aggregates. Gradually, a disenchantment arises from within. It is not like a disenchantment of committing suicide. It is that "I must see the end of this saṃsāric existence." Next, the feeling that "I must be liberated from this" arises. "I must be liberated from this state that keeps breaking away." But it is difficult to let go all at once. Because the feeling of "this is mine" is there.

Then, when contemplating even more deeply, these are understood as formations (saṅkhāra). A heap of formations. There is nothing to be taken as mine. These only arise and cease. Sometimes, a simile is given in a way that ordinary people can understand. Now, if someone's beloved wife is talking with another man, sometimes anger arises. If at some point that woman is divorced, it does not affect the mind. In the same way, when it is thought that these things which were thought of as "I" and "mine" are only a heap of formations, the mind is prepared to be liberated from this. Next, equanimity (upekkhā) arises regarding them. Next, cultivating deeply the three characteristics of impermanent, suffering, and not-self, in that manner, finally, the mind is liberated completely from the five aggregates. That liberated mind is what was called the "island". Because that liberated mind, as the final mind of the Arahant, does not lean towards another grasping (upādāna), there is no existence/becoming (bhava). That is the Dhamma principle.

So, we do not need to tire ourselves with how they are explained at length in books. This was a general hint regarding that "island." Many people think of the island only in terms of becoming (bhava); some do not even believe that this is a cessation of becoming (bhava-nirodha), an end of the existence of becoming. This deep portion was spoken of in connection with this stanza.

On this valuable day, all of us, this group of devotees, must contemplate that if we are Buddhists, our journey is a journey towards Nibbāna. It is not a journey to turn back and cultivate becoming (bhava). Therefore, we must strive, keeping this target of Nibbāna in mind, and having done everything, we must wish, "May we attain Nibbāna through this, may we gain the ability to be liberated from this saṃsāra." What help in this are what we call meditation objects (kammaṭṭhāna). A meditation object is not some strange, mystical thing. When the opportunity comes to contemplate the nature of one's own body—the sweat, saliva, and so forth mentioned earlier—one must take full advantage of them, either through one's own body or through another's body. That insight thought of arising and ceasing is recorded somewhere. That will help ultimately for Nibbāna.

Thus, in this manner, through today's Dhamma sermon, we saw that "monastic playfulness" of young Ven. Cūla Panthaka. We saw the wonderful great compassion, mercy, and the mass of virtues of the Buddha as buddhānussati. Similarly, through this, we learned about Nibbāna, which must be our target. Nibbāna is not a non-existent thing; it exists. If we strive, having abandoned the perception of unsuitability and generated the perception of suitability, thinking "we can directly realize this today itself," we can attain it in this very life. An opportunity was provided to generate many such pure thoughts and intentions. Also, we know that all of these begin with virtues like morality (sīla). So, the eight precepts with right livelihood as the eighth (ājīvaka-aṭṭhamaka-sīla) were observed. Many of you are observing a virtue even more valuable than that. Thus, restraining body and speech through virtues like morality, associating with noble friends, obtaining meditation objects, and developing the mind through meditation, someday we can develop insight-knowledges within ourselves in the manner described, obtain those path-knowledges (magga-ñāṇa) that help to be liberated from this saṃsāra, and end this saṃsāric suffering through the penetration of the paths and fruits called Stream-entry, Once-returning, Non-returning, and Arahantship, thereby finding peace in the supreme, deathless Nibbāna.

Therefore, if we, this group of devotees, have generated any merit through listening to this Dhamma and through delivering this Dhamma sermon, let us dedicate all that merit. If there are any deities and Brahmas in this universe, including our relatives, who wish to rejoice in such merit, may this merit be shared with all of them! May all of them realize the supreme, deathless Nibbāna through their aspired Bodhi. May this merit of listening to the Dhamma serve as a supportive condition for us too, to act as quickly as possible, to become more and more interested in the Dhamma and meditation, and even though the dispensation is declining rapidly, to strive and establish these virtues within ourselves in this very life, during this period of a Buddha's appearance, and to realize the supreme, deathless Nibbāna through the penetration of the paths and fruits of Stream-entry, Once-returning, Non-returning, and Arahantship. Wishing thus, let us share merit by reciting the stanzas.

Dhammapada Verses 153-154, spoken by the Buddha at Enlightenment

Dear Listeners,

The Tathāgata, the Fully Enlightened One, attained supreme Enlightenment (sambodhi-ñāṇa) after practicing severe austerities for six long years. Out of matchless, heroic effort, a wondrous, joyful utterance (udāna)—two verses expressing the supreme liberation from saṃsāra that he had personally realized—gushed forth from his sacred lips. Today, on this noble Vesak Full Moon Day, which marks two thousand five hundred and fifty years since the Parinibbāna of the Fully Enlightened One, I have chosen this profoundly deep Dhamma as the theme for our sermon. According to the texts, the Buddha related the background of these two inspired verses (udāna gāthā) in response to a question raised by his personal attendant, Venerable Ānanda.

We can find many highly important facts about the life of the Buddha in the form of discourses directly from his sacred lips in various suttas. The Buddha once described to the Saṅgha in the Ariyapariyesana Sutta the Great Renunciation made by Prince Siddhartha in quest of supreme Enlightenment as a "Noble Quest" (ariya pariyesana). The Blessed One describes how that decisive thought and determination matured and took shape within him in this manner:

"Monks, before my Enlightenment, while I was still an unenlightened Bodhisatta, being myself subject to birth/arising (jāti), I sought what was also subject to birth/arising. Being myself subject to decay, I sought what was also subject to decay. Being myself subject to sickness, I sought what was also subject to sickness. Being myself subject to death (jarāmaraṇa), I sought what was also subject to death. Being myself subject to sorrow, I sought what was also subject to sorrow. Being myself subject to defilement, I sought what was also subject to defilement. But then, this thought occurred to me: 'Why, being myself subject to birth/arising, do I seek what is subject to birth/arising? Why, being myself subject to decay, sickness, death, sorrow, and defilement, do I seek what is subject to decay, sickness, death, sorrow, and defilement? What if, being myself subject to birth/arising, understanding the danger (ādīnava) in what is subject to birth/arising, I were to seek the unborn, supreme security from bondage, which is Nibbāna? What if, being myself subject to decay, sickness, death, sorrow, and defilement, understanding the danger in them, I were to seek the undecaying, the un-ailing, the deathless, the sorrowless, the undefiled, supreme security from bondage, which is Nibbāna?'"

The Buddha declared that a mental revolution of this nature occurred within Prince Siddhartha at that crucial moment.

Now, those among you who are well-acquainted with the life of the Buddha can understand why Prince Siddhartha, upon receiving the news of the birth of a son—whom people nowadays would call a 'precious son'—uttered: "Rāhulaṃ jātaṃ, bandhanaṃ jātaṃ" ("An impediment/bond is born, a fetter has arisen"). Based on our previous explanation, you can easily comprehend why the typical affection, joy, and delight that arise in a father's heart when a child is born in a home did not arise in Prince Siddhartha. Indeed, as you well know, the meaning of the word Rāhula is related to the astronomical Rahu that seizes the moon or the sun. In ancient lore, that which covers or obscures the light and splendor of the sun and moon was regarded as Rahu. Thus, let us consider: if Prince Siddhartha had not made that Great Renunciation on that day due to his affection and attachment for his son Rāhula, would the Buddha-sun, which illuminates the three worlds, have arisen today? Would a Vesak moon have shone for us today? From this, you can appreciate the value of the Noble Quest (ariya pariyesana). Through this very explanation, you can also understand what is meant by the "Ignoble Quest" (anariya pariyesana).

What is the Ignoble Quest? The Buddha explained this at the very beginning of that discourse:

"Someone, being himself subject to birth/arising, seeks what is subject to birth/arising. Being subject to decay, he seeks what is subject to decay. Being subject to sickness, he seeks what is subject to sickness. Being subject to death, he seeks what is subject to death. Being subject to sorrow, he seeks what is subject to sorrow.

Being subject to defilement, he seeks what is subject to defilement." This is the Ignoble Quest.

Therefore, according to those words of the Buddha, we are compelled to say that many of the researches and investigations considered supreme in the modern world actually fall under the category of this Ignoble Quest. This world, overwhelmed by the craving/thirst for becoming/existence (bhava-taṇhā), is not prepared to accept even the Buddha's statement that "birth/arising is suffering (dukkha)." Yet, we know that when describing the Noble Truth of Suffering (dukkha-ariya-sacca), the Buddha declared: "jātipi dukkhā"—"birth/arising itself is suffering/stress (dukkha)." Why? Because along with birth/arising (jāti), decay, sickness, death (jarāmaraṇa), sorrow, and defilement follow hand in hand. Usually, when a child is born in a family, we think it is an occasion to celebrate. However, my pious friends, the parents of that child, who comes crying out of the mother's womb, are not ready to realize that First Noble Truth of Suffering (dukkha). Instead, they rejoice. They harbor joyful expectations in the manner described before. Thus, this verse begins with this very question of birth/arising (jāti).

But before presenting and explaining the verse, I wish to bring to light a few other background factors. We mentioned that the Bodhisatta practiced severe austerities for six years. On one occasion, in the Mahāsīhanāda Sutta, the Buddha roared a great lion's roar to the Saṅgha, led by the chief disciple Venerable Sāriputta, detailing how wondrous and extreme his six years of austerities were. He declared that his practice during those years of severe self-mortification was so intense that no other ascetic in the world who practiced severe penances could even come close to it. That is why it is called the "Great Lion's Roar" (Mahāsīhanāda). So marvelous and wondrous was that discourse that Venerable Nāgasamāla, who was fanning the Buddha at the time, exclaimed: "Venerable Sir, it is wonderful! Venerable Sir, it is marvelous! Hearing this Dhamma discourse, my hair has stood on end!"

Having practiced such incredibly severe self-mortification for six long years without any result, he finally adopted the Middle Path (majjhimā paṭipadā), as we have all heard, and sat at the foot of the Bodhi Tree—on what we call the "Unconquered Seat" (aparājita pallaṅka)—on that memorable Vesak Full Moon Day. However, he sat there having resolved upon the highest form of effort known as "effort of four factors" (caturanga-samannāgata-vīriya). This four-factored effort is described thus: "Let only my skin, sinews, and bones remain! Let my flesh and blood dry up! What can be achieved by human strength, human energy, and human valor shall be achieved, and there shall be no relaxing of my effort until that state is reached." He resolved upon this great, foremost effort. It was when this effort bore fruit, after tasting the nectar of Nibbāna and experiencing its bliss, that the two verses we took as our theme gushed forth from his lips. An udāna refers to an inspired utterance—a sigh of relief. It contains the sigh of relief and the joyful exclamation that naturally escape someone who has successfully accomplished a momentous task. We should understand these two inspired verses (udāna gāthā) in this light.

Now let us try to understand the meaning of these verses. Let us first recall the two verses once more:

- > Anekajātisāraṃ sandhāvissaṃ anibbisaṃ
- > Gahakārakaṃ gavesanto dukkhā jāti punappunaṃ
- >
- > Gahakāraka diṭṭhosi puna gehaṃ na kāhasi
- > Sabbā te phāsukā bhaggā gahakūṭaṃ visaṅkhitaṃ
- > Visaṅkhāragataṃ cittaṃ taṇhānaṃ khayamajjhagā

Now, if we try to render this into a poetic form (gī) according to the old linguistic style, it can be expressed as follows. (These words might be somewhat difficult to comprehend, but we shall explain them. This Sinhala rendering has been done with the intention of keeping it as close as possible to the poetic style of the udāna verses uttered by the Buddha):

- > Through many a birth in the cycle of existence, alas, I ran seeking,
- > Without finding the builder of this house.
- > Painful indeed is birth/arising (jāti) again and again.
- > Oh, builder! I have seen you!
- > You shall not build this house again.
- > All your rafters have been broken by me,
- > Shattered is the ridgepole.
- > The mind has reached the state where preparations/formations (saṅkhāra) are stilled,
- > I have seen the end of cravings/thirsts (taṇhā).

To explain the meaning of these two verses more clearly: "Anekajātisāraṃ sandhāvissaṃ anibbisaṃ"—the Buddha declares that he wandered through this saṃsāra undergoing various births and existences. How? "Gahakārakaṃ gavesanto"—seeking the builder who constructed this house. But unable to find him, he was born in this saṃsāra for so long. "Dukkhā jāti punappunaṃ"—"repeated birth/arising (jāti) is suffering/unsatisfactoriness (dukkha)." Then it says: "Gahakāraka diṭṭhosi"—"O house-builder, I have seen you." "Puna gehaṃ na kāhasi"—"You cannot build a house again. You shall not construct a house anymore." "Sabbā te phāsukā bhaggā"—"I have broken all your rafters." "Gahakūṭaṃ visaṅkhitaṃ"—"The ridgepole, the roof-peak, or the main dome of the house has been shattered." "Visaṅkhāragataṃ cittaṃ"—"My mind has reached the Unprepared state (visaṅkhāra), free from all preparations/formations (saṅkhāra); it has attained Nibbāna." "Taṇhānaṃ khayamajjhagā"—"I have realized, directly experienced, the destruction and exhaustion of all cravings/thirsts (taṇhā)." This is the meaning of those verses.

Now, consider this: here, the Buddha first highlighted the suffering of birth/arising (jāti-dukkha). Why did he wander for so long seeking the house-builder? Because he wanted to tear down this house. To break it down. But he did not find him.

"Dukkhā jāti punappunaṃ"—"repeated birth/arising is suffering." What does the house-builder do? He builds houses again and again. And those houses that are built decay and collapse, as mentioned earlier. This is a great suffering (dukkha).

A Buddhist poet has presented this matter in the form of a riddle-like quaternary verse (dham gæṭṭa sivupada). Some of the elders here might have heard it:

- > Kandē gedara naidēṭṭayi kiyaṇṇē
- > Dirana gewal numba kumaṭṭada tanannē
- > Geyak hæra geyak notanā indinnē
- > Gen giyaḍā geṭṭa ginilā tæwennē
- > (O craftsman of the house on the hill,
- > Why do you build these decaying houses?
- > Why do you not remain without building house after house?
- > When you leave the house, you burn it and suffer.)

Looking at the poem, it seems easy to understand. But I do not think its true meaning is fully grasped. It is doubtful if you have correctly understood even what "the house on the hill" (kandē gedara) means. Who is this craftsman (naidē) of the house on the hill? Who is this craftsman of the house on the hill who builds these decaying houses?

Before understanding that craftsman (naidē), we must understand "the house on the hill" (kandē gedara). My pious friends, "the house on the hill" refers to the house of the five aggregates (pañcakkhandha - a play on the word kandha, which means both aggregate and hill/mountain). This house closest to us is indeed the house of aggregates. Who is the craftsman (naidē) of this house? The master and leader of this house of aggregates is consciousness (viññāṇa).

Although we say this, the commentaries (aṭṭhakathā), in explaining these verses, identify the house-builder (gahakāraka) as craving/thirst (taṇhā). Most of you have probably heard it explained that way. However, to our understanding, identifying it as craving/thirst is not quite appropriate here. Why? Because if that were the case, there would be no reason to mention "the destruction of cravings" (taṇhānaṃ khayamajjhagā) in the plural in the very last line. For this and several other reasons, it appears to us that the craftsman of the house on the hill, or the house-builder, is consciousness (viññāṇa).

Let us try to present this with more reasoned evidence. You may have heard that the Buddha gave several profound similes to illustrate the five aggregates: form (rūpa) is compared to a lump of foam; feeling/sensation (vedanā) to a water bubble; perception (saññā) to a mirage; preparations/formations (saṅkhāra) to a banana trunk; and consciousness (viññāṇa) to an illusion or magic trick (māyā). Thus, it is due to the illusory nature of consciousness (viññāṇa) that it acts as the house-building craftsman. Indeed, it is consciousness (viññāṇa) that has built this house. What is the "house" here? It is what we call this individual existence (ātmabhāva), or the five aggregates themselves. In other words, it is this cage of Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). Therefore, consciousness (viññāṇa) is the primary aid in constructing this physical cage. That is why consciousness (viññāṇa) is called the house-building craftsman.

To further substantiate this point, let us use the words of the Buddha himself. On one occasion, the Buddha preached to the monks about the four kinds of nutriment (āhāra). There are four nutriments for the maintenance of beings that have already come to be, and for the support and assistance of those seeking birth/arising (jāti). What are these four nutriments, monks? Physical food, gross or subtle, which is taken into the mouth—this is physical nutriment (kābalikārahāra). This is what we normally consider as food. Secondly, contact (phassa) is shown there as a nutriment. Thirdly, mental volition (manosañcetanā)—the volitions active within the mind—is shown. Fourthly, consciousness (viññāṇa) is shown as a nutriment.

Elsewhere, the Buddha mentions—a monk named Moliya Phagguna asked: "Venerable Sir, who consumes the nutriment of consciousness (viññāṇāhāra)?" He asked this thinking of a person who consumes food. The Buddha replied that the question itself was incorrect. There is no person who consumes the nutriment of consciousness. The correct way to ask is: "For what is it a nutriment? For what is it a condition (paccaya)?" That is how one should ask. If asked thus, the answer is: consciousness (viññāṇa) is the nutriment, the condition, for the arising of future becoming (āyatim punabbhava / renewed existence). From this, it is clear that it is not craving/thirst (taṇhā) but consciousness (viññāṇa) that actually conditions future birth/arising (jāti).

The Buddha has expressed this even more deeply in various suttas. On one occasion, he explained this to Venerable Ānanda. Today, many people are trapped in stories about intermediate states (antarābhava) and the like. Great philosophers have grasped these and created complications. Now, another term that goes hand-in-hand with consciousness (viññāṇa) is Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). Let us clarify this first. You may have heard about this consciousness (viññāṇa) to some extent, but if we contemplate its background—let us state that first.

In the Dhamma of Dependent Arising (paṭicca-samuppāda), it is said: "avijjā-paccayā saṅkhārā, saṅkhāra-paccayā viññāṇaṃ" (with ignorance as condition, preparations/formations arise; with preparations/formations as condition, consciousness arises), and so forth. Thus, conditioned by ignorance, preparations/formations (saṅkhāra) arise; conditioned by preparations/formations, consciousness (viññāṇa) arises. So it is said. Conditioned by consciousness (viññāṇa), Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) arises. It is this Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) that we actually take as "the house," "the self-identity" (ātmabhāva), as "me" and "mine." There is nothing wrong with calling this physical cage Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). Why? Because it is said that Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) descends into the mother's womb, taking birth as an individual, as a self-identity, only if consciousness (viññāṇa) descends into it.

That is to say, it is stated that a child is born only when consciousness (viññāṇa) and Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) grow together and become complete in the mother's womb. If, at any stage, consciousness (viññāṇa) departs from the mother's womb, Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) will not come to growth as a living being; it remains merely a lump of flesh. From this, we can understand something. Similarly, the Buddha states that if the consciousness (viññāṇa) of a young boy or girl were to be cut off or cease during childhood, Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) would not grow. Let us call this Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) the physical cage that we refer to as "me" and "mine"—that is more appropriate. What we identify as a person is merely a nominal form. Based on the four great elements—earth (paṭhavi), water (āpo), fire (tejo), and wind (vāyo)—this is a "form" (rūpa) existing only as a perception of form (rūpa-saññā). These four elements cannot be separated from one another. It is a form merely in name. Feeling/sensation (vedanā), perception (saññā), volition (cetanā), and attention (manasikāra) are shown as mental factors (nāma-dhamma). There, too, there is nothing to be grasped as a substantial entity. It is this Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) that we regard as our self-identity (ātmabhāva). And the Buddha declares that this Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) arises due to consciousness (viññāṇa).

Next, let us contemplate the story about illusion (māyā). It is not easy to understand the true nature of consciousness (viññāṇa). The Buddha illustrates this with another simile, presenting the previously mentioned comparison as a story. The Buddha says to the monks: "Monks, suppose a magician—in modern terms, a conjurer or illusionist—performs a magic show at a crossroads. A person sees it and is deluded. But in the end, if one looks at the reality, the magician was merely showing what is non-existent as if it existed. It is a deception. Yet, the world, failing to understand this nature of consciousness (viññāṇa), gets deceived by it. That is why they wander long in saṃsāra." This is the understanding that the Buddha reveals through Dependent Arising (paṭicca-samuppāda). The darkness of ignorance—what is ignorance? In the language of magic, ignorance is not knowing the "trick" behind the magic; it is not knowing the magician's secret. Do not try to interpret it too literally; we explained it in this manner according to the context of Dhamma analysis. It is like darkness—the darkness of delusion (moha). It is within this darkness of delusion that one derives pleasure from a magic show. If, at some point, one sneaks behind the stage and discovers the magician's secrets, the magic disappears for him. Such is the nature of a magic show. The very same thing that is done in a magic show is found nowadays in various things like motion pictures, teledramas, etc., in the world. Within all of these, the very same delusion (moha) is active. Particularly in cinema, we know how the darkness of ignorance operates. No one who is enjoying a movie thinks at that moment: "It is the darkness of ignorance that allows me to enjoy this." At that moment, it does not occur to them: "It is because of this darkness that these things appear so beautiful on the cinema screen." Immersed in that darkness, they enjoy it through that very delusion (moha). That is ignorance (avijjā). Unless a Buddha discovers it, an ordinary person cannot find it.

Thus, it is through the preparations/formations (saṅkhāra) active within that ignorance that one derives pleasure. Those preparations/formations (saṅkhāra) are what operate within that person's mind, speech, and body upon seeing the movie—all of which occur within that delusion. That is what is called preparations/formations (saṅkhāra). That is preparation/construction (saṅkharāṇa). Kamma is accumulated through this preparation/construction.

It is due to these preparations/formations (saṅkhāra) that we exist in this long saṃsāra. When we contemplate saṃsāra, it is through the kamma-force of these preparations/formations (saṅkhāra)—the kamma-force created by thinking of "me" and "mine"—that a future birth/arising occurs. That kamma will inevitably yield results; it goes on giving results. Because of this, forms are projected. Accordingly, Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) and the like arise in the mother's womb. As said before, if consciousness (viññāṇa) departs from the mother's womb at any point, it takes birth elsewhere, like an echo. Such is the situation. If we take this both in relation to this life and in a deeper sense, as a natural law (dhammatā), the deceptive or illusory nature of a magic show, a movie, or hypnotism occurs due to darkness. Based on that darkness, preparations/constructions (saṅkhāra) occur in the mind, or the physical organs are decorated for the purpose of deception. Actually, in the past, the word saṅkhāra was used for the make-up and dressing-up of actors and actresses. All those decorations are deceptions. It is due to ignorance (avijjā), due to darkness, that one is deluded by these deceptions. At some point—as you know, when one is enjoying a movie, if the lights are fully turned on suddenly—the cinema screen vanishes. It becomes blank. Something similar happens when the light of wisdom (paññā-āloka) arises. When the light of wisdom arose in the Buddha, all preparations/formations (saṅkhāra) were stilled. That is why he said: "visaṅkhāragataṃ cittaṃ" (the mind has attained the Unprepared).

Right there, we can understand the rest of it. If we regard the magician as consciousness (viññāṇa), we can understand this verse in a much more meaningful way. "Visaṅkhāragataṃ cittaṃ"—preparations/formations become de-prepared (visaṅkhāra). If preparations/formations (saṅkhāra) perform a deception, when that deception is removed, they become "un-preparations" (visaṅkhāra). They are preparations/formations (saṅkhāra) only in name. Such is the state of that mind. The liberated mind of the Buddha is free from the pressure of preparations/formations (saṅkhāra). That is what the Buddha declares to be the highest happiness in the world: "sabba-saṅkhāra-samatha"—the stilling of all preparations/formations (saṅkhāra) occurs when the darkness of ignorance is removed. Thus, one ran in saṃsāra because of the darkness of ignorance. If we regard the preparations/formations accumulated due to that darkness of ignorance as kamma, they cause repeated birth/arising (jāti). Through the ripening of those accumulated kamma-forces, more and more houses are built, giving an opportunity to Māra (the death-agent). That is what we call Māra. He builds and kills. Houses are built and broken. This is exactly what the illusion of consciousness (viññāṇa) shows us. In this manner, we can understand that the "house-builder" (gahakāraka) in this verse is consciousness (viññāṇa).

Next, "O house-builder, you are seen! You shall not build the house again." This can be understood in the same way we described how a child's life in the mother's womb can slip away. For a house to be built again, for a future becoming (āyati punabbhava / renewed existence) to occur, it is consciousness (viññāṇa) that assists. The Buddha declared that there is a mutual relationship between consciousness (viññāṇa) and Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). There is a wonderful thing there. Consciousness (viññāṇa) supports the existence of Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). The moment it is gone, there is no Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) in the mother's womb. As you know, what is conventionally called the embryonic form (kaḷala-rūpa) arises in the mother's womb. It is like a photograph. At the moment of death, through the kamma-force grasped by the final thought-process, consciousness (viññāṇa) goes and establishes itself, first as a shadow-like image. This is what grows over nine months and finally comes out crying as a child—a "golden son" or a "golden daughter." This, my pious friends, is the reality, and there are valuable discourses of the Buddha to further clarify this if evidence is needed.

On another occasion, when describing birth/arising, the Buddha declared: "kammaṃ khettaṃ, viññāṇaṃ bījaṃ, taṇhā sineho"—"Kamma is the field, consciousness (viññāṇa) is the seed, and craving/thirst (taṇhā) is the moisture." Thus, the seed of consciousness (viññāṇa) falls into the field of kamma and grows, aided by the moisture of craving/thirst (taṇhā).

There is another discourse that expresses this point even more meaningfully, concerning the Arahant Nun Selā. A verse uttered by Māra, who came to challenge the Arahant Nun Selā, is mentioned in the Dhamma. Since reciting too much Pali might be an obstacle for you, I will only give the meaning. What is the question asked by Māra? He uses a unique word there: "bimba" (image/reflection). Pratibimba means reflection. The word bimba is also used for a statue, a model, a likeness, or an image. Thus, the word bimba is used here for the physical cage. Māra asks: "Who created this image (bimba)? By whom was it created? Who is its creator?" Māra presents the concept of a creator. "Who is the creator who made this physical cage? Where did it arise? Where does it cease?" Māra asks several such questions.

In her reply, Sister Selā says: "This image (bimba), this reflection, this model, is not self-made, nor is it made by another. But due to a cause, due to a certain cause, it has arisen. With the breaking up of that cause, it ceases." Next comes the most important part of the verse, which we can connect to the words of the Buddha we discussed earlier. Sister Selā gives a simile: "Just as a seed planted in a field grows when aided by the soil's nutrients and moisture, so too this arises due to causes and conditions, and with the destruction of those causes and conditions, it ceases." This is all Sister Selā says. But if we add the Buddha's words we mentioned earlier as a commentary here, we can understand that what the Nun meant here is that the seed of consciousness (viññāṇa) in the field of kamma grows like a seed, aided by the nutrients and moisture, and thus this image (bimba)—this physical cage—manifests in the world.

In truth, we are briefly presenting many Dhamma points that would require hours to explain, so that you may understand them at your respective levels—at least through the help of similes. From this, too, we can understand that the magician, or the house-builder, is consciousness (viññāṇa). The light of wisdom (paññā-āloka) is what helps us to see the true nature of consciousness (viññāṇa). When the light of wisdom arises, it is seen that consciousness (viññāṇa), too, arises due to causes and conditions. The cause and condition is Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). Conditioned by Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa), consciousness (viññāṇa) exists. Their mutual support is conditioned by the background factors of the darkness of ignorance (avijjā) and the preparation/construction called preparations/formations (saṅkhāra). This house is constructed through some preparation/construction. That preparation/construction consists of kamma performed through mind, speech, and body: bodily preparations (kāya-saṅkhāra), verbal preparations (vacī-saṅkhāra), and mental preparations (mano-saṅkhāra). As you know, it is said that if one does bad kamma, one goes to hell; if one does good kamma, one goes to heaven. Whichever it is, a preparation/construction takes place. We usually say that the cause for this preparation/construction is ignorance (avijjā). What is ignorance (avijjā)? It is the feeling of "me" and "mine." This feeling of "me" and "mine" is contrary to the understanding of causes and conditions. The Buddhas describe this as a sequence of causes and conditions. But the ordinary worldling, who has fallen into the dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi / view of existing body), thinks: "I am doing it, I am doing it." If "I" am doing it, then "I" must also take responsibility. Those two go hand-in-hand. That is what kamma and its result (vipāka) mean. There, one cannot escape by saying "it was not I who did it." Therefore, if a kamma is done with a sense of "me" and "mine," the result of that kamma inevitably follows. That is a natural law (dhammatā). This aspect can be understood well through that. That is what was said about the house-builder (gahakāraka).

Next, there are other parts of this verse that need to be explained. "O house-builder, you are seen! You shall not build the house again." This has been understood from what was said. The Buddha cannot have a house built again because he saw the true state. Because of that sight, kamma was exhausted; the kamma-force was destroyed. Just as someone who has discovered the trick behind a magic show will not go back to the magician to watch his magic, the Buddha understood this in every way. This is something that arises due to causes and conditions; it is devoid of substance. That is why, in the end, after giving the simile of the magic show and the magician, the Buddha asked the monks: "Monks, what substance is there in a magic show?" The answer is that it is devoid of substance. Yet, the entire world thinks there is some core or substance in it. Other religionists ultimately grasp and hold onto consciousness (viññāṇa). They regard it as something with a core, a substance, as something real and permanent. But the Buddha strikes at that very point. It is merely a false show. It is because we do not know the secret that we are deceived by it. The moment the secret is known, that consciousness (viññāṇa) ceases. The magic becomes non-magic. Something of that nature happens. Consciousness (viññāṇa) ceases. Thus: "You shall not build the house again."

Now, it was said here: "sabbā te phāsukā bhaggā" (all your rafters are broken). This, too, needs to be explained. The Buddha next addresses the house-building craftsman: "Oh, builder! I have seen you! You shall not build the house again. I have broken all your rafters (gonæs)." We used this old word (gonæs) in consideration of this verse. The word gonæs is not in common usage today. My pious friends, gonæs refers to rafters. In the sense that they support the roof, they are called gonæs. However, the commentaries explain these rafters in another way. The commentaries explain rafters as "the remaining defilements" (avasesa kilesā). Why did they say so? Because craving, too, is a defilement (kilesa). Thus, the builder is craving, and the remaining defilements are the rafters. However, to our understanding, there is a deeper meaning here. These rafters represent the six sense-bases (saḷāyatana). Some of you may not know what the sense-bases (āyatana) are. They are the six bases: eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind. These are called the internal sense-bases (ajjhāyatana). The objects that range within them, as you know, are forms, sounds, smells, tastes, tangibles, and thoughts (dhamma). Dhamma here means mental objects, things that become objects of the mind. Thus, there is a base between the two—between the eye and forms is the eye-base (cakkhāyatana), between the ear and sounds is the ear-base (sotāyatana), and going on in this manner, there is also a base between the mind and thoughts, between the mind and ideas. We can think of this as the two ends of a rafter. Therefore, we have to explain this simile of the rafters through the six sense-bases (saḷāyatana). Why? Because after Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) is born, these very sense-bases become active. The eye runs after forms, just as a deer runs after a mirage. The ear runs after sounds, after sweet voices. In this manner, this running occurs between the two. That is why the six sense-bases are the rafters. Indeed, is it not these six that support the entire roof of defilements? These six rafters support all defilements. It is not appropriate to show them separately as defilements. To prove this further, let us say: "sabbā te phāsukā bhaggā"—those rafters are also broken. Why? Because once the secret of Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) and consciousness (viññāṇa) is seen, the six sense-bases (saḷāyatana) that arise due to Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) do not function anymore. If the deer recognized—if it understood: "What appears here is a mirage, this is not water, but some natural weather phenomenon"—the deer would not run after it. The deer would then abandon that perception of water. Something similar is meant by the cessation of the sense-bases (āyatana-nirodha). We can understand that according to the Buddha's cessation of ignorance (avijjā-nirodha), all other cessations occurred: preparations/ formations (saṅkhāra), consciousness (viññāṇa), Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa), and the six sense-bases (saḷāyatana). To put it another way, these sense-bases are factories of defilements. We have six factories of defilements. Thus, these sense-bases become deactivated once wisdom arises. It is through these that kamma is accumulated. Therefore, "sabbā te phāsukā bhaggā" (all your rafters are broken).

Next, it says: "gahakūṭaṃ". Gahakūṭa means the ridgepole, the roof-peak of a house. That has been shattered. Here, the commentaries say that gahakūṭa refers to ignorance (avijjā). We, too, accept that it is ignorance (avijjā). Indeed, it is from ignorance (avijjā) that all of this arises. It comes starting from "avijjā-paccayā saṅkhārā". This ignorance (avijjā) is indeed the ridgepole. For this gabled house, the six rafters are those we mentioned: eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind. These operate through ignorance (avijjā). It is through ignorance (avijjā) that objects are presented to them—defiled objects. Following them, ignorance (avijjā) is indeed the ridgepole of this house-builder. Therefore, if at any point this gabled house, this roof, is completely shattered, it cannot be built again. That is why: "gahakūṭaṃ viśaṅkhitaṃ". In the word viśaṅkhita, the word saṅkhāra is present. The builder had made some preparation/construction so that this ignorance remained unseen. But now, that has been entirely deactivated and shattered.

"Viśaṅkhāragataṃ cittaṃ". Therefore, my mind—the Buddha declares: "My mind has attained the Unprepared state (viśaṅkhāra)." In other words, it is the stilling of preparations/ formations (saṅkhāra). Where preparations/ formations (saṅkhāra) are stilled, there is no place for preparations/ formations (saṅkhāra). To put it another way, once the light is turned on in a cinema hall, no matter what colorful things are projected onto the screen, there is nothing for the viewer to grasp. The movie has stopped for him. Similarly, here too, preparations/ formations (saṅkhāra) have become de-prepared (viśaṅkhāra). "Viśaṅkhāragataṃ cittaṃ". Through that itself, when the deceptive nature of preparations/ formations (saṅkhāra) is destroyed, craving/thirst (taṇhā) ends right there. If it is a movie, at that moment, one cannot enjoy or relish it. Likewise, the end of cravings/thirsts (taṇhā) is right there.

This is a very profound verse. However, within the limited time, we have made an effort to explain it to some extent. What we must further contemplate within this is, as stated before, this repeated birth/arising (jāti) that we grasp as happiness in this life—in other words, the craving for becoming/existence (bhava-taṇhā). Deep within beings lies this craving for becoming/existence. There is never an end to this craving/thirst (taṇhā). Craving/thirst (taṇhā) is a thirst. As explained through the simile of the mirage, when this thirst within beings cannot be quenched in this life, if they have not realized the state of Nibbāna as their final thought, some sign (nimitta) appears to that mind. You may have heard about this in relation to kamma, described in the books as the sign of kamma (kamma-nimitta) or the sign of destination (gati-nimitta). Some sign appears. Why? Because this illusion is taken as real. Thus, they ran after the mirages of the world. They ran all their lives. They ran after the mirages seen by the eye, the mirages heard by the ear, and all other mirages. They ran and ran, yet there was no satisfaction. No satisfaction. By the time they reach there—suppose we find something we most desire to see with the eye, and we buy it for a large sum of money. After a few days, we get tired of it. We look for "something better." In this luxury-oriented world, you yourselves know this. At great expense, we acquire the most valuable thing our neighbor has. After a few days, it becomes outdated. We go in search of the next thing. Beings run after such a wondrous mirage. It is the same with songs. They become outdated. Then we look for another. It goes on like this. Finally, at the moment of death, because there is no satisfaction, those signs appear to the mind.

Many people who come to us say: "I do not want to be born again. I really do not like to be born again." Although they say so, they are not ready to make the necessary sacrifice for it. If birth/arising could be avoided merely by saying so! One cannot end the suffering of birth/arising (jāti-dukkha) in that way. It is for this that the Buddha, in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, preaches: "yam p'icchaṃ na labhati tam pi dukkhaṃ" (not to get what one wants is suffering). In the analysis of the Noble Truths in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta, the Buddha explains: "yam p'icchaṃ na labhati tam pi dukkhaṃ." When it is said that "not to get what one wants is suffering," an ordinary person might think: "I want to buy a car. If I cannot get it, that is suffering—that is what the Buddha is saying." But that is not what the Buddha is teaching. In that analysis, it is explained thus:

"In beings subject to birth/arising (jāti), monks, such a wish arises: 'Oh, if only we were not subject to birth/arising...' But this cannot be attained merely by wishing." That is the meaning of "yam p'icchaṃ na labhati tam pi dukkhaṃ." What the Buddha meant by "not getting what one wants is suffering" is not about failing to acquire those worldly things. It is about these supramundane matters of escaping from saṃsāra. Similarly, it is shown: "in beings subject to decay, such a wish arises: 'Oh, if only we were not subject to decay.'" Even if one thinks so, this is not something that can be achieved merely by wishing and praying. It is only by walking on the path that must be trodden, by walking on that path, that decay is brought to an end—by ending birth/arising (jāti). Therefore, keeping birth/arising (jāti) while trying to eliminate decay is a foolish task. An ignorant task. We can never attain an eternal, permanent life. I hear that in wealthy countries nowadays, they perform various surgeries to hide decay. Furthermore, they use various methods to preserve beauty. No matter how much they do, decay cannot be prevented. Along with it, sickness also comes, hand in hand with decay. Then comes death (jarāmaṇa). This is the nature of saṃsāra. One cannot escape from this merely through wishes. That is what the Buddha reminds us in the Satipaṭṭhāna Sutta.

What is the path to this? It is understanding. It is wisdom. Because it is due to lack of understanding, due to delusion (moha), that all this occurs. We are running after an illusion. The path to eliminating that delusion (moha) is what the Buddha realized on that Vesak Day. That is what we call Nibbāna—cooling down / extinguishing. Many people do not even understand that Nibbāna means extinguishment. The Buddha shows this as a bliss of stilling that the world cannot understand. In another way, it is shown as a bliss that is not felt (avedayita-sukha). No. Happiness lies where feelings/sensations (vedanā) are stilled. The world thinks that painful feelings are our trouble, and grasps pleasant feelings as happiness. But the Buddha declares that whether it is pleasant feeling or painful feeling, or even neither-painful-nor-pleasant feeling, which is the neutral middle feeling—all of them are suffering/stress (dukkha). Why did he declare them all as suffering? A pleasant feeling is felt as pleasant only as long as it lasts. When it changes, it is suffering/stress (dukkha). A painful feeling is felt as painful while it lasts; when it changes, it is felt as pleasant. Yet, my pious friends, because of that, none of us should wish for suffering. It seems this has now been turned into an argument to raise questions about the law of impermanence (aniccatā-dhamma). The nature of painful feeling is that it changes. Simply because it changes, it comes back again and again. Therefore, no one welcomes suffering, in expectation of the happiness that arises from its stilling. The neither-painful-nor-pleasant feeling that lies between pleasure and pain was regarded highly by the ancient yogis and sages—it is peaceful. But that, too, is not permanent. That, too, changes. It is when all of these are abandoned, when all preparations/formations (saṅkhāra) are stilled, and feeling/sensation (vedanā) is also removed, that we have what is called Nibbāna.

During the Buddha's time, some people, such as a certain wanderer (paribbājaka), even asked the Venerable Mahā Sāriputta: "How can this be happiness when there is no feeling? What happiness can there be where there is no feeling?" Then the Venerable Mahā Sāriputta replied: "The very absence of feeling is itself happiness." "Yaṃ kiñci vedayitaṃ taṃ dukkhasmiṃ"—whatever is felt, whether pleasant, painful, or neither-painful-nor-pleasant, was seen by the Buddha as suffering (dukkha). Thus, the stilling of all preparations/formations (sabba-saṅkhāra-samatha) includes everything. Feelings/sensations (vedanā), perceptions (saññā)—all of these ultimately rest on consciousness (viññāṇa). This consciousness (viññāṇa), which we regard so highly—which we take as a core—is in truth merely an illusion. According to Buddhist teachings, the fact that consciousness (viññāṇa) is an illusion is not found in any other doctrine. Elsewhere, it is regarded as something with a core. But the Buddha points out that through ignorance (avijjā), through not knowing—what is ignorance? It is a lack of knowledge due to which one initiates a course of action that ends in suffering (dukkha). When explaining ignorance, it is defined as not knowing the Four Noble Truths. It is due to not knowing these truths that one initiates a process that causes suffering (dukkha). Thus, due to ignorance, a certain process is initiated. Its final result is suffering (dukkha). If, at some point, one understands this correctly as merely a combination of causes and conditions, without a sense of "me" or "mine"—at that moment, through the "dissolution of causes" (hetu-bhaṅgā), when the cause is eliminated, the effect ceases. Then, a wondrous thing happens between consciousness (viññāṇa) and Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa): when Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) ceases, consciousness (viññāṇa) ceases; when consciousness (viññāṇa) ceases, Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa) ceases. It is just like two sheaves of reeds leaning against each other: if one is pulled away, both fall. The Buddha has shown in the Dhamma, in the form of Dependent Arising (paṭicca-samuppāda), that this entire existence depends on a relationship of causes and conditions, on mutual conditioning.

But the world stands on the perception of permanence (nicca-saññā). It is to the being who stands on this perception of permanence that, at the final moment, some sign grasped by him presents itself as a sign of kamma (kamma-nimitta) or a sign of destination (gati-nimitta), as mentioned before. Then, inevitably, that sign goes and, as the embryonic form (kaḷala-rūpa), a field is prepared in some mother's womb according to kamma. If one is to be born blind, it is prepared accordingly; if deaf, accordingly. It may be an illness or a deformity that the mother and father do not have. Yet, that sign falls into the embryonic form, takes root, is nourished in the mother's womb, and finally comes out crying as a blind, deaf, mute, or crippled child. This is the force of kamma. It is the sign that was grasped. This is the terrifying nature of this saṃsāra. It happens in a way we did not expect. If we have not shattered the roof-peak of this house, if we have not broken the rafters, if we have not deactivated them through the realization of the paths and fruits and the realization of Nibbāna, then, according to the sign grasped, a future birth/arising occurs. Along with it, one brings all of those things: decay, sickness, death—all of them.

Thus, if at any point—if we contemplate more deeply—what is done by the mind of an Arahant? One trains oneself to see what the world has hitherto regarded as permanent as impermanent (anicca). Now, we come to the Three Characteristics (ti-lakkhaṇa) that we have all heard of. Why did the Buddha show these Three Characteristics in brief? Because through the meditation on these Three Characteristics, that sign is gradually worn away. The delusive power of the sign is gradually worn away. The more we see it as impermanent (anicca), its ultimate end is described as the "signless deliverance of mind" (animitta-cetovimutti). The three gateways to Nibbāna are shown as the signless (animitta), the undirected (appaṇihita), and the void (suññata). The signless (animitta) means that by developing the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā), as one approaches the realization of the paths and fruits, at that final gateway, no sign of anything presents itself to the mind. At that moment, a wondrous peace and bliss are felt. It is when these signs are present that the perception of permanence operates: "Will these decay? Will these break? I must protect them." All of this occurs. Therefore, if no sign presents itself to the mind, that is a great peace. Similarly, it is due to these signs that desire arises. What we call praṇidhi (aspiration/direction) is desire or the target. Thus, appaṇihita (the undirected) means that desires disappear. When the sign slips away, the desires, wishes, and expectations that rested on that sign are stilled right there. This is the undirected (appaṇihita). When this happens—why do we harbor desires? It is because of that sense of self, is it not? It is based on the perception of self within that "me, me." According to the Dhamma, the culmination of the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā) is called the "signless liberation" (animitta-vimokkha). One approaches the signless gateway by understanding the danger in signs.

Next, if someone contemplates the characteristic of suffering (dukkha-lakkhaṇa), for some, the characteristic of suffering is understood more deeply. Wherever they look, they see: "This is a great suffering, a great trouble." For the one who understands thus, the desire called praṇidhi gradually thins out, and they arrive at the gateway of the undirected (appaṇihita), where desires have thinned out, reaching a state of peace as they approach the gateway to Nibbāna. Next, as not-self (anattā / unsubstantial)—particularly for wise people, when they contemplate with wisdom, they see that in none of this is there anything to be taken as "me." As they go on understanding it as a heap of causes and conditions, at some point they realize: "This is void (suññata), empty." If one sheaf of reeds is leaning against another, neither can stand alone. This is the primary principle of the conditioning of causes and conditions—Dependent Arising (paṭicca-samuppāda). That is the natural law (dhammatā). Nothing stands alone. There must be at least two supporting each other. That is why: "avijjā-paccayā saṅkhārā, saṅkhārā-paccayā viññāṇaṃ"—it goes on and on, everything proceeding conditioned by something else. Therefore, there is no substance in this. There is no core of a self. For the person who can see thus—for the person who has developed the vision of not-self (anattā)—the final gateway that opens is the void (suññata).

What we have expressed now—you have all heard about developing the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā). To put it simply, the perception of permanence (nicca-saññā) exists in the world. The perception of pleasure (sukha-saññā) exists in the world. The perception of self (atta-saññā) exists in the world. Contrary to these, the Buddha has declared: develop the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā); develop the perception of suffering (dukkha-saññā); develop the perception of not-self (anattā-saññā). When these reach their culmination, as one approaches Nibbāna, the one who has approached these three gateways of Nibbāna—the signless (animitta), the undirected (appaṇihita), and the void (suññata)—finally attains that light. Through the realization of the paths and fruits—Sotāpanna, Sakadāgāmi, Anāgāmi, and Arahant—he reaches the state where all preparations/formations (saṅkhāra) are stilled, and is liberated from all the suffering of birth/arising (jāti) and the like in this saṃsāra.

Therefore, on this valuable day, we have presented some ideas to you according to the occasion, regarding a profound verse that would normally require many hours to analyze. What is expected is not to argue and debate using these ideas. One must be eager to realize these through the very path of Dhamma trodden by the Buddha—the path of virtue (sīla), concentration (samādhi), and wisdom (paññā). May this hearing of the Dhamma be a strong support and a source of merit for you to achieve the height of your meditation and realize the noble, deathless Nibbāna, liberating yourselves from all the suffering of birth/arising (jāti) and the like in this saṃsāra, by virtue of the many wholesome thoughts you have accumulated on this precious day through morality, meditation, and listening to the Dhamma. Likewise, may all deities from the Avīci hell up to the Akaniṭṭha heaven, along with our departed relatives and everyone who has listened to this Dhamma sermon, be empowered by the merit of hearing this Dhamma to attain the peace of the noble, deathless Nibbāna through their aspired Bodhi. Let us share the merits by reciting these verses.

Saṃyutta Nikāya, Dhammacakkappavattana tradition verses

Dear Listeners,

In contemplating the virtues of the Buddha, through the phrase ‘satthā devamanussānam’ (Teacher of gods and humans), we accept that the Blessed One is indeed the Teacher of gods and humans. It was on a full-moon day of Āsāḷha that the appearance of such a supreme Teacher became manifest to the world including the devas. We have all heard the wonderful news that on such a noble day, the sermon of the ‘Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta’, which joined the atmosphere of the Isipatana Migadāya in Benares, was instantly broadcast from deva-world to deva-world, and from brahma-world to brahma-world. We have taken as our theme today a few verses that reveal the majestic nature of that supreme Buddhist sermon.

Before presenting these verses, the Buddha, at the Jetavana monastery in Sāvattī, declared a certain simile as an introduction to present a matter.

"Monks, the lion, the king of beasts, emerges from his lair in the evening. Emerging from his lair, he stretches his body and yawns. Having stretched his body, he roars the lion's roar three times. Having roared the lion's roar three times, he sets out in search of prey. Monks, whatever wild beasts in the forest hear that lion's roar, they all fall into fear, terror, and dismay. Creatures dwelling in holes enter their holes. Creatures dwelling in water enter the water. Birds fly into the sky. Let alone others, even royal elephants, even festive state elephants, bound with strong leather straps in villages, towns, and capitals, upon hearing that lion's roar, break and sever those straps and flee in all directions, evacuating their bowels. Monks, that lion, the king of beasts, possesses such great psychic power, such great majesty, such great influence among the wild beasts."

"In the same way, monks, when a Tathāgata, a Worthy One, a Fully Self-Awakened One, perfect in knowledge and conduct, sublime, knower of worlds, incomparable leader of men to be tamed, teacher of gods and humans, awakened, blessed, appears in the world; and when He teaches the Dhamma in this manner: ‘Such is Form (rūpa), such is the arising of Form, such is the passing away of Form; such is Feeling/Sensation (vedanā), such is the arising of Feeling/Sensation, such is the passing away of Feeling/Sensation; such is perception (saññā), such is the arising of perception, such is the passing away of perception; such are preparations/formations (saṅkhāra), such is the arising of preparations/formations, such is the passing away of preparations/formations; such is Consciousness (viññāṇa), such is the arising of Consciousness, such is the passing away of Consciousness.’ When He delivers such a Dhamma discourse, then even those devas who are long-lived, beautiful, possessing abundant retinue, who have resided for a long time in high celestial mansions, fall into fear, terror, and dismay. ‘While being impermanent (anicca), we thought ourselves to be permanent. Not being eternal, we thought ourselves to be eternal. It seems we too are impermanent! We too are unstable! It seems we are not eternal! It seems we are caught up in the dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi)!' In that manner, those devas fall into fear, terror, and dismay. Monks, in the world with its devas, the Tathāgata is one of such great psychic power, such great majesty, such great influence." Having declared this, that is the very matter the Buddha summarized in the verses we mentioned earlier, as stated in that Sutta.

Yadā buddho abhiññāya dhammacakkam pavattayī — "When the Buddha, having directly known, set rolling the Wheel of Dhamma." What is contained in that Wheel of Dhamma is found in the next verse:

Sakkāyañca nirodhañca sakkāyassa ca sambhavam

Ariyañcaṭṭhaṅgikam maggam dukkhūpasamagāminam

Here, venerable friends, sakkāya (the existing group) means none other than the five aggregates of grasping (pañcupādānakkhandha). It is those very five aggregates of grasping that are called suffering (dukkha). So, what is presented here is the Four Noble Truths. When He teaches the Four Noble Truths—namely, the suffering of those five aggregates of grasping called the existing group (sakkāya), its cessation (nirodha), its origin (sambhava), and the Noble Eightfold Path which is the way that leads to the calming of that suffering—having heard it,

Ye pi dīghāyukā devā vaṇṇavanto yasassino

Bhītā santāsamāpādam sīhassev'itare migā

Having heard that sermon, even those devas who are long-lived, beautiful, and possessing abundant retinue, fall into fear, terror, and dismay—just like wild beasts before a lion.

Avītivattā sakkāyam aniccā kira, bho, mayam

Arahato vacanam sutvā vipparamuttassa tādino'ti

Hearing the words of the Buddha—who is worthy (Arahant), well-released, and of steadfast virtue (the Such, tādī)—they declare: "We are those who have not transcended this existing group (sakkāya), this dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi). We are indeed impermanent (anicca)." Thus, those devas fall into religious urgency (saṃvega). That is the meaning of these verses.

Now, venerable friends, what we have presented is the essence of the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta, the Four Noble Truths. Everyone knows that when asked what the Buddha taught, one immediately says the Four Noble Truths, which we know as suffering (dukkha), origin (samudaya), cessation (nirodha), and path (maggā). The Buddha has analyzed this in various ways—sometimes in brief, sometimes in detail. In the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta itself, as you may know, the Noble Truth of Suffering was analyzed: birth (jāti) is suffering, decay/aging (jarā) is suffering, disease is suffering, death (maraṇa) is suffering, association with the disliked is suffering, separation from the liked is suffering, not getting what one wishes for is suffering. Having listed these, He finally says: "In brief, the five aggregates of grasping (pañcupādānakkhandha) are suffering." Venerable friends, the five aggregates of grasping refers to these five which we hold onto and grasp (upādāna) as "I" and "mine"—namely, Form (rūpa), Feeling/Sensation (vedanā), perception (saññā), preparations/ formations (saṅkhāra), and Consciousness (viññāṇa). On certain occasions, those five are also given the name sakkāya (the existing group). On certain occasions, the Buddha begins by saying, "Monks, I will teach you suffering, the cause of suffering, the cessation of suffering, and the path leading to the cessation of suffering," and declares that suffering is none other than the five aggregates of grasping. There is no need to repeat the earlier list. It is when one clings to those five that birth (jāti), decay and death (jarāmaraṇa), sickness, sorrow, lamentation, and so forth, all arise. That is how it is.

Next, that itself is what is called the existing group (sakkāya). The meaning of the word sakkāya might sometimes not be clear. 'Sat' means 'existing' or 'being'. 'Kāya' means a group, a collective noun. So when we say "this form is mine," we are catching hold of a group of forms. We grasp (upādāna) it; we seize it with the perception of compactness (ghana-saññā) as "this is mine," without regarding its nature of breaking up, its impermanent (anicca) nature. Feeling/Sensation (vedanā) is also like that; perception (saññā) is like that; preparations/ formations (saṅkhāra) are like that. This is what you have often heard presented through the similes of the lump of foam, the water bubble, the mirage, the banana trunk, and the magic illusion. Due to not knowing their true nature, one grasps them, and that itself becomes the cause of suffering.

Then why does one grasp them? If grasping (upādāna) means holding on, the cause for that holding on is indeed that craving/thirst (taṇhā). Thus, it is declared as the cause of suffering, as the origin of suffering. That craving/thirst is shown in a threefold way: craving for sensuality (kāma-taṇhā), craving for becoming (bhava-taṇhā), and craving for non-becoming (vibhava-taṇhā). It is that craving/thirst that causes a person's repeated birth/arising (jāti).

It is said: "taṇhā janeti purisaṃ" (craving gives birth to a person).

"Nandīrāgasahagatā tatrataṭṭrābhinandinī" — accompanied by delight and lust, finding delight here and there. Then, the state when that craving is ceased—that cessation is shown as cessation (nirodha), as Nibbāna. Next is the Noble Eightfold Path, which you have all heard of: right view (sammā-diṭṭhi), right intention (sammā-saṅkappa), right speech (sammā-vācā), right action (sammā-kammanta), right livelihood (sammā-ājīva), right effort (sammā-vāyāma), right mindfulness (sammā-sati), and right concentration (sammā-samādhi). That is the Noble Eightfold Path. So, that is the Four Noble Truths.

So, this Four Noble Truths is the core of the Buddha's teaching. This is especially misunderstood because of the perception of permanence (nicca-saññā) that exists in the world. It is upon hearing this sermon that those devas are shaken, particularly the long-lived devas and Brahma kings, who generate conceit (māna) thinking they are permanent. Such accounts are mentioned in the Dhamma. On certain occasions, the Buddha stepped forward and broke the conceit of the Brahmas, as mentioned in the Dhamma. It is told of Baka Brahma that because he had lived for a very long period—nearly an aeon—he forgot his past. He forgot that he had come to that place. He thought, "This is permanent, this is stable, there is no birth or death or anything here." When such conceit arose, the Buddha perceived it while at Jetavana and, with the speed described as "just as a strong man might stretch his bent arm," the Buddha went to that Brahma world by psychic power. The Brahma king then invited the Buddha, "Ah! Noble One, come, come! This is permanent, this is stable, this is eternal!" Then the Buddha told the Brahma, "You are overcome by ignorance (avijjā)." He tried to remove that wrong view (micchā-diṭṭhi). But the Brahma king said, "Many beings in this world, many humans, strive greatly to attain my status, to attain this Brahma status." When he would not let go, the Buddha then showed him, "What you think is a long time is actually seen to be a short time; your past is limitless," pointing it out with examples. He showed the Brahma king, "It was because of the wholesome deeds you performed as an ascetic who had attained direct knowledges (abhiññā) in the past that you received this status." After that past account was revealed, it is mentioned that Baka Brahma abandoned his conceit.

From that, we can understand that perception of permanence. So, we can understand how conceit arose due to the perception of permanence in those Brahmas who lived for aeons in the past. But for us, who do not live even a hundred years, if we reflect on how the conceit called the 'intoxication of life' (jīvita-mada) arises within us, how much ignorance (avijjā) must there be in us?

But in order to shatter that ignorance, to shatter the perception of permanence, the Buddha presents the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā). This meditation on the perception of impermanence is something the Buddha praised in the highest terms. To what extent? The Buddha declares: "Monks, if the perception of impermanence is properly developed, if it is made much of, through that perception of impermanence, all lust for sensuality (kāma-rāga) is completely abandoned. Lust for form (rūpa-rāga) is completely abandoned. Lust for becoming (bhava-rāga) is completely abandoned. All ignorance (avijjā) is completely abandoned. The conceit 'I am' (asmi-māna) is completely destroyed and uprooted. So powerful is this perception of impermanence." Thus, the Buddha praised this insight meditation (vipassanā-bhāvanā) of the perception of impermanence in the highest terms. He did not stop there. Next, he gave several similes. One simile is: "Monks, just as in the autumn season, when a farmer plows with a great plow, he completely uproots all the creeping roots in that field, in the very same way, if this perception of impermanence is developed and made much of, it completely uproots all the aforementioned lust for sensuality, lust for form, lust for becoming, ignorance, and the conceit 'I am'."

Next, He gives another simile: just as when the stalk of a bunch of mangoes is cut, all the mangoes connected to the stalk are detached, in the same way, through the perception of impermanence, all the aforementioned lust for sensuality, lust for becoming, and so forth, are destroyed.

Then He shows another simile: just as in the autumn season, the sun, rising into a cloudless sky, dispels all darkness, in the same way, if the perception of impermanence is properly developed and practiced abundantly, it uproots all defilements (kilesa)—namely, lust for sensuality, lust for form, lust for becoming, ignorance, and the conceit 'I am'—and completely destroys them.

So, the perception of impermanence has been praised in that manner. Then, how is this perception of impermanence to be developed? The Buddha also declared that. How is the perception of impermanence developed? It is shown in brief, but we must understand... we must reflect and understand how to bring it practically close to our lives. It is stated in this way: "Such is Form, such is the arising of Form, such is the passing away of Form; such is Feeling/Sensation, such is the arising of Feeling/Sensation, such is the passing away of Feeling/Sensation; such is perception, such is the arising of perception, such is the passing away of perception; such are preparations/ formations, such is the arising of preparations/ formations, such is the passing away of preparations/ formations; such is Consciousness, such is the arising of Consciousness, such is the passing away of Consciousness." The Buddha shows it there as a truth to be confirmed by constantly engaging the mind in wise attention / radical attention (yoniso manasikāra) in a direct, experiential way.

Next, you have all heard of this perception of impermanence. Just as was said about the Four Noble Truths, if one asks what the Buddha taught, there are three characteristics by which it can be recognized. What are the three characteristics? They are the three characteristics of impermanence (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and not-self (anattā). These three characteristics are interconnected. Sometimes nowadays people ask about this. According to the Buddha's word: "yad aniccaṃ taṃ dukkhaṃ, yaṃ dukkhaṃ tad anattā" — "what is impermanent is suffering; what is suffering is not-self." It is stated in brief like that. So, let us try to understand, with reference to the Buddha's teachings, how this impermanent thing is suffering, and how that which is suffering is not-self.

Why does this impermanence become suffering? It is because we grasp (upādāna) these impermanent things. The Buddha has given a good simile for that—the simile of the river (nadī upamā). On one occasion, the Buddha declared: "Monks, on both banks of a swift-flowing river coming down from a mountain and traveling a long distance, there grow rushes, wild oats, grasses, and other trees. All of them are leaning over the river. A man being swept away by the rapid current of this river catches hold of those rushes, wild oats, and grasses, or catches hold of the branches. Every single thing he catches hold of breaks and tears away. Consequently, that man falls into ruin and suffering." What we have to understand from this simile is that by grasping as permanent this flow of life, disregarding its impermanent (anicca) nature, we fall into various anxieties. Now we know, especially if we catch hold of a blade of kusa grass, before that grass slips away, it might even cut our hand. It was declared that one can fall into such ruin.

The Buddha also declared the manner of this grasping, and how one grasps. One regards Form as self; one regards self as possessing Form; one regards Form as in self; one regards self as in Form. In these four ways, one grasps. In the same way, four ways of grasping (upādāna) have been shown for Feeling/Sensation (vedanā), perception (saññā), preparations/formations (saṅkhāra), and Consciousness (viññāṇa). What is shown by this is the unwillingness to let go. One takes Form as self. When there is no room for that, [one thinks] "No, no, my self is something possessing Form." When there is no room for that either, "No, Form is within self." When there is no room for that either, "Self is within Form." In this manner, one is unwilling to let go of Form which has been grasped—the aggregate of Form-grasping (rūpupādānakkhandha). Those four ways, when multiplied by the five aggregates, become the twenty [views]. So, this is what is called the dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi). Now, the dogma of self-illusion means the twenty views built up by grasping "this is my self" as a self. He who transcends this is the one who has reached the fruit of Stream-entry (sotāpatti-phala), the person who has experientially understood that impermanence.

So, next, just as we spoke about impermanence, because one falls into suffering and ruin by grasping (upādāna) those impermanent things, the Buddha declared: yad aniccaṃ taṃ dukkhaṃ (what is impermanent is suffering). Next, how that which is suffering is not-self (anattā), that characteristic of not-self—you have often heard that the group of five monks attained Arahantship by listening to the sermon on the characteristic of not-self, the Anattalakkhaṇa Sutta. It is true that at Isipatana Migadāya, having heard the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta, Ven. Añña Koṇḍañña reached the fruit [of Stream-entry]. However, the other venerable monks, as well as all five of them in the end, reached the fruit of Arahantship by listening to the Anattalakkhaṇa Sutta taught by the Buddha.

Not only that, it was there that the Buddha, for the first time, declared this state of not-self (anattā) to the Saṅgha, and thereby to the world. It begins in this way: "Monks, Form is not-self." First, He declared that. Then He says the opposite side: "Monks, if Form were self, it would not lead to affliction—Form would not bring us illness, to put it briefly. If Form were self, if Form were mine, it would not bring us illness. Furthermore, we should be able to exercise control over Form, to keep it under our power: 'Let my Form be thus, let my Form not be thus.' But, monks, because Form is not-self, one cannot exercise control or power over Form, saying, 'Let my Form be thus, let my Form not be thus.' And Form also brings us illness." In the same way, the Buddha convinced the group of five monks about the not-self nature of Feeling/Sensation, perception, preparations/formations, and Consciousness.

Next, that changing, impermanent nature, alteration (vipariṇāma)—it changes, turning from what it was to another side. Because of that, the Buddha then brings out the three characteristics: "Monks, is Form permanent or impermanent?" When they reply, "Impermanent, venerable sir," He asks, "That which is impermanent, is it ease or suffering?" They have to accept that it is suffering, based on what was said earlier. Next, if something is impermanent, suffering, and subject to change—then, leaving room for their own capacity of understanding, He asks, "Is it fit to regard it as: 'This is mine,' 'This am I,' 'This is my self'?" That regarding as 'I' and 'mine' is shown in three ways: etaṃ mama, eso ham asmi, eso me attā. Etaṃ mama means 'this is mine'—grasping it through craving (taṇhā). Eso ham asmi means 'this I am'—grasping it through conceit (māna). Eso me attā means 'this is my self'—grasping it through view/dogma (diṭṭhi). One does not know what 'self' is, but grasps it through view as 'this is my self'. Thus, there is a threefold grasping through craving, conceit, and view. It was in this manner that the Buddha presented the characteristic of not-self. Then those monks had to answer that it is not fit. If something is impermanent, if all five aggregates of grasping are impermanent, if they cause suffering, if one cannot keep them under one's control, then one must let them go. It is mentioned in the Dhamma that by the end of that discourse, they all attained Arahantship.

So now it becomes clear to us that the three characteristics expressed in “yad aniccaṃ taṃ dukkhaṃ, yaṃ dukkhaṃ tad anattā” are indeed correct. If something is impermanent, it leads to suffering. If it leads to suffering, and if we cannot keep it under our control—since we expect happiness—how can we keep it under our control? We would keep it in such a way that happiness comes to us. Since that cannot be done, taking them as self is entirely wrong; that is what the Buddha shows. At some point, we must let go of those views. We cannot go forward while holding onto those views. That is why this dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi) is said to be extremely powerful. Having carried this self-illusion for a long time in Samsāra, we cling to it in four ways due to our unwillingness to let it go.

So, how do we let them go? Next, the Buddha declares that lust for sensuality, lust for form, lust for becoming, the conceit 'I am', and ignorance are all destroyed through the perception of impermanence. Therefore, we must practice seeing things as impermanent. In seeing them as impermanent, the Buddha explains this impermanence in various other ways. Now, these—Form, Feeling/Sensation, perception, preparations/formations, and Consciousness—arise due to causes and conditions (hetu-paccaya). By considering them according to causes and conditions, we can understand their impermanent nature. Dependent Arising (paṭiccasamuppāda) means 'arisen on account of'. Paṭicca means 'on account of'. Nothing arises without a cause. Everything arises only on account of causes and conditions. Not a single thing has the strength to stand alone. Such is the nature of this becoming (bhava). This is why there is no place for the view of self. When we consider with wisdom, when we subject it to attention, under everything there lie causes and conditions. Nothing arises apart from causes and conditions.

In that regard, the cause for Form is shown. The cause and condition for Form is shown as the four great elements (cattāro mahābhūtā). As you know: earth (paṭhavī), water (āpo), fire (tejo), and wind (vāyo). When we say 'earth', we usually think of something like a rock or a mountain. When we say 'water', the idea of water arises—like a well or an ocean. When we say 'fire', a great fire. When we say 'wind', a storm. Although we say so, the Buddha shows that these are four great elemental things that do not exist individually and are unrecognizable. They exist together. It is according to their relative abundance that we have given them names like 'earth', 'water', and so forth. There is an occasion when this becomes directly experienced. Just as when explaining Form to a small child, we use forms, but as understanding comes, those forms become unnecessary. When these are directly experienced, when they are understood, then those great elements are understood as existing in an unrecognizable, subtle manner. To give an analogy for those great elements: when water is frozen into an ice cube, because it is solid, one might think it is something like a stone. But when it melts, it is water; when heated further, it becomes vapor. In this way, there is a constantly changing nature in everything. Forgetting this, we grasp this Form tightly. Our body also decays without our even being aware of it. But we, saying "my Form, my Form," not only take photographs on various occasions but also grasp them as "I" and "mine" and try hard to reinforce that sense of self (mamatva). So, that is Form. The others are also like that.

The Buddha shows that what is shown by the similes mentioned earlier is the way things appear from afar—which is called 'view' (diṭṭhi). Grasping a lump of foam according to the way it appears from afar. One did not look closely. If one looks closely, what appeared like a white stone is in the end not such a thing. Sensation/feeling (vedanā) is like a water bubble, and so on. In these similes, when one gets closer and looks inside, it is something else. Magic illusion (māyā) in that respect is the highest, a wonderful thing that can deceive a person. Magic, trickery, is something meant solely to deceive a person. That is Consciousness (viññāṇa).

In this way, the Buddha has said here that the cause and condition for Form is the four great elements. As the cause and condition for Feeling/Sensation (vedanā), He points to Contact (phassa). Contact—without reflecting on this Contact, one grasps Feeling/Sensation tightly. But beneath Feeling/Sensation lies Contact. Through each subtle Contact, this Feeling/Sensation changes rapidly. But that is not caught in the attention of an ordinary person. One grasps it as a single thing, saying "this is my Feeling/Sensation." But when one looks with wisdom and a concentrated mind, each Feeling/Sensation arises because of each Contact. When that Contact ceases, that Feeling/Sensation ceases. Therefore, the condition for Feeling/Sensation is shown as Contact.

For perception (saññā) too, the cause and condition shown is also Contact (phassa). Now, a mirage seen from afar—without understanding that the mirage is seen due to the Contact made from that particular spot, the deer runs after it. Not only does the deer run, but we must understand that all the visions/perceptions that the ordinary world takes are, according to the Buddha's word, a mirage.

Next, preparations/formations (saṅkhāra) are also like that. For them too, the cause and condition shown is Contact (phassa) itself. Preparations/formations—these are the mental fabrications we make through volition (cetanā) and so forth. They also occur according to whatever Contact comes to the mind. So, that too is grasped. One takes it as something like a banana trunk. But there is only a heap of layers there. When we look at volition and so forth, there is only a heap of layers.

Next, the most wonderful thing of all, and that is where most people get stuck: as the cause and condition for Consciousness (viññāṇa), the Buddha has pointed to Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). Name-and-Form—now, regarding this matter, many people hold a wrong view. Even if not all, some of you know that there are twelve links in the teaching of Dependent Arising (paṭiccasamuppāda). Starting from ignorance (avijjā) up to suffering (dukkha), there are twelve links. Among these links, there is a conditional relationship with Consciousness. The Buddha shows: “viññāṇapaccayā nāmarūpaṃ, nāmarūpapaccayā viññāṇaṃ” — "with Consciousness as condition, Name-and-Form; with Name-and-Form as condition, Consciousness." In the analysis of Dependent Arising, it is clearly there as a mutual condition. But some people, in analyzing the five aggregates of grasping, confuse this with Name-and-Form. Now, many scholars say that to understand Name-and-Form, it is the five aggregates of grasping. They put all the other four—Feeling/Sensation, perception, preparations/formations, and Consciousness—as 'Name' (nāma). But that is a confusion. It is by confusing the analysis of the five aggregates of grasping with Dependent Arising that one thinks in that way.

Because, in the Buddha's teaching, it is clearly stated that it is Name-and-Form that is the condition. That is the deepest part. According to the Dhamma of Dependent Arising—it is through Name-and-Form that it next branches out into the six sense-spheres (saḷāyatana). Venerable friends, the six sense-spheres are shown in the Dhamma, in short, as six consciousnesses. There is no such thing as a mere consciousness. There are six consciousnesses: eye-consciousness (cakkhu-viññāṇa), ear-consciousness (sota-viññāṇa), nose-consciousness (ghāṇa-viññāṇa), tongue-consciousness (jivhā-viññāṇa), body-consciousness (kāya-viññāṇa), and mind-consciousness (mano-viññāṇa). Consciousness is not deposited in those which we take as sense organs—the eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind. The Buddha shows, according to the Dhamma of Dependent Arising, that it arises from causes and conditions. “Aññatra paccayā natthi viññāṇassa sambhavo” — "apart from conditions, there is no arising of Consciousness." That is the deepest thing. Likewise, the Buddha declares: “dvayaṃ, bhikkhave, paṭicca viññāṇaṃ sambhoti” — "monks, dependent on a dyad, Consciousness comes into being." What is the dyad? The eye and Form. Dependent on the eye and Form, eye-consciousness arises. Dependent on the ear and sound, ear-consciousness arises. Now, if one is listening to these words, if at that moment sound is not heard, there is no ear-consciousness at that moment. But we think that because the ear exists, ear-consciousness exists. That is a wrong idea. It is like thinking that fire exists inside a matchbox. Fire comes only after the match is struck, doesn't it? It is true that this is a conscious body—a body with Consciousness. But Consciousness arises in six ways only when the conditions for it come together. Understand it in that way. So, it is dependent on the eye and Form. That is where many people go wrong. Eye-consciousness is dependent on the eye and Form. Ear-consciousness is dependent on the ear and sound. In that way, the very last is mind-consciousness, which arises where the mind (manas) and the mind-objects (dhamma)—the things that become objects to the mind—come together. This is a very deep matter.

So, this very dyad is what is meant by 'with Consciousness as condition, Name-and-Form; with Name-and-Form as condition, Consciousness.' Now, the practitioner of insight meditation (vipassanā-bhāvanā-yogī) regards every object that comes to the mind as Name-and-Form. Whether it is a form coming to the eye or a sound coming to the ear, what is there is Name-and-Form. What is this Name-and-Form? Then one tries to understand. 'Name' (nāma) is a word we all use. But here, it is not a conventional name. Here it says: "What, monks, is Name? Feeling/Sensation, perception, volition, Contact, and attention—these are name-factors (nāma-dhamma)." Then, Form (rūpa) is shown as the perception one creates by catching hold of and grasping (upādāna) the four great elements together. So, Name-and-Form means a kind of artificial nature, a deceptive nature, right there. It points to the deceptive nature of the object that comes to Consciousness. Name does not stand alone. Supported by Name, Form exists. Supported by Form, Name exists. Here too, a relationship of cause and condition is mentioned. We recognize something through Feeling/Sensation, perception, the volition that arises regarding it, and then Contact (phassa) and attention (manasikāra) which is directed towards it. It is on account of those factors that we recognize even form-factors (rūpa-dhamma). We recognize their hardness, roughness, softness, heat, cold, and so forth, with the support of the aforementioned name-factors: Feeling/Sensation, perception, volition, Contact, and attention. Then, through that recognition, we take it as 'a form'. It is just like a blind man bumping into something and taking that bumped thing as an object. The ordinary world, through the dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi), takes this as a 'thing'. But the Buddha shows that what is here is only a shadow. We have shown this in so many ways.

The Buddha, Ven. Puṇṇa Mantāniputta, and Ven. Ānanda have also declared that it is only when looking in a mirror that one can say "this is I." In the same way, it is by grasping Form that the conceit 'I am' (asmi) arises. Likewise, Feeling/Sensation—it is by grasping something. That is why it is called grasping (upādāna). Within that grasping, there is the feeling of a dyad. Then, that is perceived by the mind through that grasping. When it is let go, it is not there. But one does not wish to let go. So, through that grasping, the idea 'I am' arises. That is the biggest problem for the world. That is why the simile of the dog on the footbridge is shown on some occasions. When a dog walks on a footbridge, it is deceived by its own reflection. It growls, thinking it is another dog, or it wags its tail, or it looks at it again and again. This is because it does not know the reflective nature of water. Similarly, Consciousness (viññāṇa) also has a reflective nature, known as reflection (paccavekkhaṇā). Because of not knowing this, the world thinks that the things they see exist just as they are. But to the insight meditator, it gradually becomes clear that within those things there is only a group of name-factors and a group of form-factors. So, that is the matter regarding those Name-and-Form factors.

Next, the six sense-spheres (saḷāyatana). Let us reflect. We said earlier that the analysis of the five aggregates of grasping is one thing, and the analysis of Dependent Arising (paṭiccasamuppāda) is another. Now, how do we connect them? We started this sermon with the statement where, at the end of listing 'birth is suffering, decay is suffering,' and so forth, the Buddha says: "In brief, the five aggregates of grasping (pañcupādānakkhandha) are suffering." That is where we have to go. Dependent Arising means arising from causes and conditions. The end of this arising due to causes and conditions is the five aggregates of grasping. The final result is divided into these five. Now, at this moment, during the time you are listening to this Dhamma, or when you are at home, the aggregates of grasping may accumulate in a different way. Now, after going back home, when you think about how this moment was spent, the forms related to this moment are grasped as 'my heap of forms'. The feelings related to this are taken as 'my feelings'. The perceptions related to this are taken as 'my perceptions'. The consciousness related to this is taken as 'my consciousness'. So, this was produced through the six sense-spheres (saḷāyatana). That is where it is important. It is within these six sense-spheres that it is produced. We use this word ['produced'] to drive home a meaning; it is not an ancient word. But, in short, it is within the six sense-spheres that these five aggregates of grasping are produced. That is where we come to next.

So, how does that happen? As was said earlier—Consciousness—before that, someone might ask why we did not think about ignorance (avijjā) and preparations/formations (saṅkhāra). All of this happens in the background of ignorance, because of not knowing. Just like the dog, because of not knowing, grasped its reflection, wagged its tail, and stayed there. In the person bound by the dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi)—that is why the Buddha has declared:

“Avijjānīvaraṇassa, bhikkhave, bālassa taṇhāya sampayuttassa evaṃ ayaṃ kāyo samudāgato” — "Monks, for the foolish person obstructed by ignorance and associated with craving/thirst, this body has thus come into being."

“Iti ayaṃ ceva kāyo bahiddhā ca nāmarūpaṃ” — "Thus there is this body and externally there is Name-and-Form."

“It’etaṃ dvayaṃ” — "because of this dyad, Contact and the six sense-spheres arise," as the Buddha declared. What does this mean? For the being who is obstructed by ignorance and bound by craving/thirst, this body is received. In this body, that Consciousness emerges as soon as Contact and the aforementioned conditions arrive.

Then, along with that, it branches out as the six sense-spheres. These six sense-spheres—what we said just now—what you call sense organs become sense-spheres (āyatana) only where there is activity. The place where there is activity is called a sense-sphere (āyatana). The faculty exists—the eye exists, but it does not see. The ear exists, but it does not hear. But when those conditions come and become active, that is what we call a sense-sphere (āyatana). Although the eye-faculty (cakkhundriya) exists, the eye-sphere (cakkhāyatana) is not there. The sense-sphere arises only where it connects with causes and conditions. Fire springs up only where the match strikes the matchbox. If you do not understand, that is the point to understand. It must be understood in that way. So, it divides into the six sense-spheres. Then, within the magic illusion of Consciousness, that Name-and-Form branches out.

Because of the craving/thirst (taṇhā) that clung to this body in the past, we want to see, we want to hear, we want to taste, we want to experience. Because of that unappeased craving/thirst, this body is received by the uninstructed worldling. To this body, Name-and-Form is added. From that Name-and-Form, the six sense-spheres are built up. So, it leads into Dependent Arising (paṭiccasamuppāda). With the six sense-spheres as condition, Contact (phassa). With Contact as condition, Feeling/Sensation (vedanā). With Feeling/Sensation as condition, craving/thirst (taṇhā). With craving/thirst as condition, grasping (upādāna). Finally, the five aggregates of grasping are built up. That is why we said, when we think about this moment, we can say that this moment of today in my life was spent because a certain Form was present at that moment, such a Feeling/Sensation, such a perception—all of those are finally sorted and deposited as the five aggregates of grasping.

But how this is made was also declared by the Buddha. That is a very deep discourse. In the discourse named Mahāsaḷāyatānika Sutta, the Buddha shows how these five aggregates of grasping are built up, and how they are unraveled and worn away. The two words used for that are accumulation (upacaya) and wearing away (apacaya). Upacaya means accumulation. Apacaya means wearing away. Then, how the five aggregates of grasping are worn away is presented by the Buddha in that Sutta through the term 'knowledge of things as they are' (yathābhūta-ñāṇa). Knowledge of things as they are means understanding the truth as it is. Now we have understood that the knowledge of things as they are is the vision of impermanence (aniccata-dassana). Seeing the truth as it is means the vision of impermanence. That is why the Buddha gave those kinds of similes. So here, the Buddha shows how a person builds up these five aggregates of grasping when the six sense-spheres are active: as you know, the things related to that are the eye, Form, the Consciousness related to the eye, then Contact where the eye, Form, and Consciousness meet, and then the sensations (vedayita) that come because of Contact. Because one does not know the impermanent nature of every single one of these factors in terms of things as they are, they become an aggregate of grasping, as the Buddha declared. For the person who stays with the understanding of the impermanence of this, moment by moment, they do not accumulate.

So, the vision of impermanence helps the wearing away of the five aggregates of grasping. Without the vision of impermanence, the vision of things as they are, when one acts with the perception of permanence as 'I' and 'mine', the five aggregates of grasping are built up. When one constantly remains with the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā), those things end right then and there. They end right then and there. They do not get built up or accumulated. That is what is declared there.

Then, there is a deepest Sutta that makes this matter even clearer. It is called the Aniccata Sutta. The Buddha declares this Sutta in a wonderful way. It is said that upon hearing it, one even falls into the concentration of impermanence (aniccata-samādhī). "Monks, the eye is impermanent, subject to change, subject to becoming otherwise. Form is impermanent, [subject to change], subject to becoming otherwise. Then, both of these are thus impermanent. Next, the eye-consciousness (cakkhu-viññāṇa) that arises due to them—when the eye and Form meet, whatever eye-consciousness arises, that too is impermanent, subject to change, subject to becoming otherwise." Then the Buddha declares to the monks: "The cause and condition owing to which Consciousness arises is also impermanent. Then how could Consciousness be permanent? If the cause and condition from which something arose is impermanent, how could Consciousness be permanent?" Why does He ask this? Because people take Consciousness to be permanent. So, the eye is also impermanent—meaning it is constantly shaking, constantly breaking up. Form is also like that. But where they meet, we grasp it as 'consciousness'—as permanent—as eye-consciousness and so forth. But if one sees the impermanence of the eye right then and there, and sees the impermanence of forms right then and there, if our mind is established in wisdom, there is no Consciousness there. How could Consciousness be permanent?

Next, the meeting of those three is what the Buddha declares as Contact (phassa). But the Buddha declares that eye-contact (cakkhu-samphassa) is also impermanent—it shakes, it changes constantly. Then He asks: if the causes due to which Contact arose are impermanent, how could the eye-contact arising from them be permanent? Next, it is because of eye-contact that sensation (vedayita) arises. That too is impermanent, subject to change. It is also shaking. But the world regards that sensation, that Feeling/Sensation, as permanent. In this way, step by step, the Buddha tries to convince us that every step in this factory of the six sense-spheres is shaking, subject to change, subject to becoming otherwise. But the person obstructed by ignorance and bound by craving/thirst, failing to see that impermanence, grasps them with the perception of permanence and the perception of compactness.

That is indeed what is called the perception of a mass (rāsi-saññā) when speaking of the insight meditator. There is a time when this compactness is broken. What helps to break it is the understanding of Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). By the understanding of Name-and-Form—now, if that dog sitting on the footbridge wagging its tail in that manner thought even for a moment, "This is my own reflection," it would stop that work and walk away, wouldn't it? In the same way, as the understanding of this Name-and-Form goes deeper and deeper, the Buddha declares that if Name-and-Form is fully understood, Consciousness is ceased right there. That is what was meant.

Next, we will speak of what helps this: preparations/ formations (saṅkhāra). This is one of the deepest terms in this Dhamma—saṅkhāra. All of us use the word saṅkhāra. Even in funeral announcements, we say 'all preparations/ formations are impermanent' (aniccā vata saṅkhārā). But we do not even know what preparations/ formations are. So, the general meaning of preparations/ formations we can understand as things that help to project/ create an illusion, things of a deceptive nature. Like in plays—and not only in plays, but now it is done on the highway too—various kinds of deceptions to deceive a person; what a magician or an illusionist does is that kind of thing. What an actor does is also that kind of thing. Before a dancer comes onto the stage, with how many decorations/ make-up is she sent? From ancient times, those have been called 'bodily preparations' (āṅga-saṅkhāra). Painting colors and various things—that is what is in the word saṅkhāra. Artificial deceptions. That is why you can connect it: because of ignorance, because of not knowing, we bring about preparations/ formations.

Because of that, how much is one deluded in the dark! When walking past a cemetery on a pitch-black night, what kind of thoughts come? In the end, when light comes, one understands: "This is false, this is entirely a delusion/ illusion that I created myself. There is nothing real here." In the same way, the world dwelling in the dense darkness of ignorance creates a certain set of creations through the mind. That is the meaning of the word saṅkhāra in the context of Dependent Arising as shown by the Buddha. What are preparations/ formations? They are shown in three ways; there are three kinds of preparations/ formations: bodily preparations (kāya-saṅkhāra), verbal preparations (vacī-saṅkhāra), and mental preparations (citta-saṅkhāra). These fabrications are made by body, by speech, and by mind. Making them by mind means building them up through Feeling/ Sensation, perception, and so forth—molding them through Feeling/ Sensation and perception. Preparations/ formations made by body, preparations/ formations made by speech, preparations/ formations made by mind.

Now, think about it for a moment: when a magic show takes place, what that man does is a deception on the stage. But those who watch it look with open mouths because they are deceived by those deceptions. Those are preparations/ formations made by body. Or the dances and so forth done by a dancer, plays and so forth—through those, they create things in the mind. They take the words associated with them as true. They wrongly grasp the feelings and perceptions regarding them. Those are the preparations/ formations.

So, this existence (pavāta) is a kind of performance nourished by these preparations/ formations, like a competition between two sides. That is what exists between Consciousness (viññāṇa) and Name-and-Form (nāmarūpa). To put it another way, it is like a whirlpool. How is a whirlpool formed? For some reason, a current of water separates from the flowing river and tries to go forward. When it cannot go forward, it is forced to turn back. When it spins in a circle, gradually a wheel-like thing is formed, a circle. It has two halves. Now you can understand: the half of Consciousness, and the half of Name-and-Form that turns back. That is indeed the very reflection we mentioned. So, those two halves finally become a wheel, a whirlpool, and then we give it a name as a person, as an individual. Everything we regard according to this becoming (bhava) exists between Consciousness and Name-and-Form. That is the Buddha's word. 'Monks, with Consciousness as condition, Name-and-Form; with Name-and-Form as condition, Consciousness.' The Buddha declared that it is between these two that birth (jāti), death (maraṇa), decay/aging, rebirth, and all these concepts, thoughts, and so forth, exist.

So, as a final result of that spinning between this Consciousness and Name-and-Form, it branches out through the six sense-spheres (saḷāyatana). The sense-spheres also occur within ignorance. Because of not seeing its impermanence, one takes the eye to be permanent, and one takes Form to be permanent. The consciousness that arises when those two meet, one takes that to be permanent too. The Contact that occurs within that, one takes to be permanent. The Feeling/Sensation that arises because of that Contact, one takes to be permanent. When taken in that way, in the end, as a result, this is sorted and sorted, and the five aggregates of grasping are formed, thinking: 'this is my heap of forms,' 'this is my heap of feelings,' 'this is my heap of perceptions,' 'this is my heap of preparations,' 'this is my heap of consciousness.'

So, then it can be understood that the five aggregates of grasping cannot be put inside in that manner. Rather, it is as a result of the competition between them—according to the analysis of Dependent Arising carried out between Consciousness and Name-and-Form—that we finally build up the five aggregates of grasping. The Buddha showed then that when the true nature of these Name-and-Form factors is understood through the understanding of causes and conditions, and through the attention, the constant reflection that helps it, Consciousness is ceased right there—the magic illusion called Consciousness. When the inside of the magic illusion is seen, there is no magic illusion there. In the same way, if Consciousness is a magic illusion, if it is not a real thing, when it is exposed by the light of true wisdom, it ceases. But that is what the world is afraid of. That is what they fear. That is what is taken as 'the stopping'. That is it. But that is exactly what the Buddha points to as Nibbāna. If birth (jāti) is suffering, where birth is ceased, that is no longer a world. Birth is ceased right here. What is taken as birth is indeed because of the wrong whirlpool of those two. So, where that stops is what we call Nibbāna. That is the final result. Generally, when the Buddha says 'the five aggregates of grasping,' this is entirely suffering. When He said 'this existence is suffering,' its result—the clash of those two—is suffering. So, that is calmed through understanding. It is the path leading to that understanding that the Buddha presented to the world on a day like today through the Dhammacakkappavattana Sutta.

Then, the reason why even the devas and Brahmas who were attached to becoming (bhava) trembled, just like the other wild beasts trembled at the sound of the king of beasts, is because of the craving for becoming (bhava-taṇhā) that exists within the world. It was not out of greed or stinginess that the Buddha hesitated to teach the Dhamma, but thinking, "How will the world understand this?"

You must make an effort to understand this deep Dhamma on a day like today. You must strive, if you hope to be released from this Saṃsāra. If you wish to remain in becoming (bhava), none of this is necessary. That is all there is to say.

Therefore, if you have gained some understanding from this Dhamma sermon presented so far, using it as a help for your own Dhamma practice and meditation—this period of the arising of a Buddha (buddhotpāda-kāla) is a rare opportunity. I hope you will be eager to take this opportunity to be released from Saṃsāra. May this power of merit—the virtue (sīla) kept so far, the meditation (bhāvanā) practiced, the Dhamma heard—be a support for realizing the noble, deathless, great Nibbāna through the penetration of the paths and fruits of Stream-entry (sotāpatti), Once-returning (sakadāgāmitā), Non-returning (anāgāmitā), and Arahantship within this very life. Likewise, may all beings existing in this becoming (bhava), including devas and Brahmas, rejoice in this merit of sharing and hearing the Dhamma, and through that rejoicing, may they all be stilled in the noble, deathless, great Nibbāna. Dhaniya Sutta (Sn 1.2) from the Uragavagga of the Sutta Nipāta

Dear Listeners,

The pride that arises due to wealth is introduced in the Dhamma by the name bhoga-mada (the intoxication of wealth). When one is intoxicated by the intoxication of wealth, the world appears to him as a secure place. One even tends towards an optimistic view that any adversity can be overcome through wealth. The Dhaniya Sutta of the Sutta Nipāta, a Dhamma text, mentions how the Blessed One dealt through the Dhamma with a very wealthy herdsman, a cattle-owner, who held such a view. We have set the first two stanzas of that Dhaniya Sutta as our sermon topic today.

A very wealthy herdsman, a cattle-owner named Dhaniya, lived in the country of Videha during the Buddha's time, owning a herd of about thirty thousand cattle. A cattle-owner cannot live in the same place all year round due to the problem of fodder. Usually, cattle-owners with such large herds spend the rainy season in a highland area near rivers, building cattle pens and other structures. During the other eight months, they live along riverbanks or any other suitable area. So, this herdsman Dhaniya also lived by making his dwelling on a small island near where the great river Mahī flows into the sea. He spent eight months of the year there. Then, when the rainy season approached and its signs appeared, Dhaniya went to high ground near that very riverbank with his cattle, built cattle pens, prepared a dwelling, and got ready for the rainy season. By the time all these tasks were finished, rain clouds gathered from all sides. So, Dhaniya, with a very joyful mind since food for his people, fodder for the cattle, firewood, fire, and everything else were ready, lay down on his bed and uttered this joyful stanza, a stanza of exultation:

Pakkodano duddhakhirohamasmi, anutīre mahiyā samānavāso, channā kuṭi āhito gini, atha ce patthayasī pavassa deva.

If we try to put this stanza into Sinhala verse, we can express it in this manner:

"The rice is cooked, the milk is milked, I dwell along the banks of the river Mahī surrounded by my people; the house has a roof, the fire has been blown and kindled; if it rains, let it rain, my work is done, let it rain."

"The rice is cooked, the milk is milked, I dwell along the banks of the river Mahī surrounded by my people; the house has a roof, the fire has been blown and kindled; if it rains, let it rain, my work is done, let it rain." That is to say, 'pakkodano' means the food, the rice, is already cooked. 'Duddhakhiro' means the milk of the cows has been milked. Next, 'anutīre mahiyā samānavāso' means I dwell with my companions of like-mind. 'Channā' means my house, my hut, is well thatched; there is no fear of rain. 'Āhito gini' means the fire is also kindled. Unlike in these times, in those days it was with great difficulty that a fire was kindled—by rubbing two pieces of wood. A fire kindled in such a way is preserved by constantly blowing on it. So, the fire is also kindled. All this is said with a joyful heart. 'Āhito gini', therefore, 'atha ce patthayasī pavassa deva': rain! If you wish to rain, rain. In this manner, he kept on reciting a stanza of challenge over and over again—a challenge to the rain.

When the Blessed One was in the Fragrant Chamber (Gandhakuṭī) of Jetavana monastery, He heard this stanza with His divine ear. Upon investigating the reason for this, He saw that Dhaniya and his wife possessed the necessary supportive conditions to ordain and attain Arahantship in this Dispensation, and that if He did not go and preach the Dhamma, they would both be swept away by a great flood on the following day and meet their death. Seeing this, the Blessed One travelled through the air and, sitting in space above the house of Dhaniya the herdsman in that distant country of Videha many leagues away, uttered a reply stanza that matched Dhaniya's stanza.

That is the second stanza we presented:

Akkodhano vigatakhīlohamasmi

Anutīre mahiyekarattivāso

Vivaṭā kuṭi nibbuto gini

Atha ce pavassa deva.

"I have no anger, my stubbornness is gone, on the banks of the river Mahī I dwell for only one single night, my house is open, my fire is extinguished, if it rains, let it rain, my work is done, let it rain." 'Akkodhano' means there is no anger within me.

'Vigatakhīlo'—khīla means a peg or stake. The idea represented here is that when anger or ill-will is present in someone's mind, it is like a driven-in stake. What is expressed there is the absence of hatred. I have no anger within me, no hatred. Next, 'akkodhano vigatakhīlohamasmi anutīre mahiyekarattivāso': I spend only one single night along the banks of the river Mahī. I only dwell there for one night. Next, 'vivaṭā': Dhaniya said his house was thatched. The Blessed One declares: "My house is open, unfolded, there is no roof on my house." 'Nibbuto': "My fire is extinguished." 'Atha ce pavassa': "Rain if you wish, if there is work, rain." In this way, the Blessed One also made a challenge to the rain.

But there is a deep meaning here. Since Dhaniya was intelligent, it was expressed in a way that Dhaniya could understand. Now, these kinds of stanzas also have a certain literary value. It is difficult to convey it completely even when translated into Sinhala. An aspect of the Blessed One's style of teaching is that, when preaching the Dhamma to intelligent people, He sometimes expresses the same word with two meanings, or uses words that sound alike. Pay attention to that. This is called alliterative resonance (prāsa rasaya). There is alliterative resonance in these stanzas. To Dhaniya's statement 'pakkodano duddhakhīro', the Blessed One responded with 'akkodhano vigatakhīlo'. It goes on in that manner. There is a series of stanzas, and they possess this characteristic. Here, what is expressed by saying "that hut is open"

is that defilements are compared to a roof. One is covered by defilements, isn't that so? So, the roof of defilements has been removed. "My hut is open." Dhaniya says without fear that his hut is closed and thatched. The Blessed One says, "My hut is open." Likewise, Dhaniya says he has kindled the fire and is maintaining it by blowing on it. The Blessed One also says, "I have extinguished all my fires." "My fire is extinguished." Therefore, "If it rains, let it rain, if there is work," the Blessed One challenges the rain. He challenged not only the rain but Dhaniya as well. We must understand that the Blessed One replied to Dhaniya's optimistic stanza with a Dhamma-imbued stanza. But it did not end there.

Next, Dhaniya the herdsman uttered another stanza. To that, too, the Blessed One replied with a similar Dhamma-aligned stanza. In this manner, five more stanzas are shown in that Sutta. However, we do not intend to deliver a poetic sermon at this moment. We only intend to express the meaning of those stanzas to these meritorious friends and, as usual, provide some Dhamma exposition.

If we take only the general meaning of those other stanzas: in the second stanza, Dhaniya declares the security of his herd of cattle in this way: "There are no gadflies or mosquitoes in this region. My cattle roam in the meadows and lowlands where the grass grows tall and lush. They can withstand even a heavy rain; they are cattle that can endure it. So, if you wish to rain, rain." That is the meaning of the second stanza.

The reply given by the Blessed One to that is as follows: "My raft has been well constructed and bound together. I have crossed over this raging flood and reached the further shore. Now I have no use even for the raft. If you wish to rain, rain." There, too, we have to decipher the meaning. That "raft" refers to the Noble Eightfold Path. It is mentioned in the Dhamma. The Noble Eightfold Path is compared to a raft. Similarly, it is mentioned in the Dhamma that this Noble Eightfold Path is solely for the purpose of crossing over, not for the purpose of grasping: "nittaraṇatthāya no gahaṇatthāya" (for crossing over, not for holding onto). That is why the Buddha declared here: "Now I have crossed over by the raft. I have no more use for the raft." It is meant only for crossing over. Such is the deep meaning. The replies given by the Blessed One always contain Dhamma-aligned thoughts. So, that is the second stanza.

Then, next, Dhaniya the herdsman boasts about his domestic environment: "My herd-wife, my wife, is very obedient to me. She does not have bad conduct such as longing for other men. We have lived together in a pleasing way for a very long time. I have never heard of any fault or sin regarding her. Therefore, if you wish to rain, rain."

Next, what is in the reply stanza uttered by the Buddha? "My mind is completely under my control. It is obedient to me. My mind is freed from defilements. It is well-tamed. I have cultivated my mind for a very long time, by way of meditation (bhāvanā)."

Then, in the next stanza, Dhaniya says: "I do not live by performing service for anyone. I live on my own earnings. Moreover, my sons, my children, are healthy and well just like me. If you wish to rain, rain."

Thereupon, the Blessed One declares: "I too do not live by performing service for anyone. I have finished my task. I do not expect a wage from anyone. Free from servitude, without expecting any wage, I wander throughout the entire world. I have no use for wages." These meritorious friends can understand this. Because the Blessed One has eradicated all defilements, it is mentioned in many places: "I wander debtless." If there is any debt to the world by consuming food and utilizing the four requisites with defilements, He has freed Himself from that debt. So, the Blessed One does not need a special wage anymore. That is why He said He has no concern with wages.

Then, next, Dhaniya describes his cattle wealth: "I have young bulls. I have milk-drinking calves. I have pregnant cows. I have heifers capable of breeding to carry on the herd. I have the lordly bulls (gavampati), the leaders of the herd, to control my herd. So, if you wish to rain, rain."

Now let us see the reply given by the Blessed One to that. What is the reply? "I have no young bulls, I have no milk-drinking calves, I have no pregnant cows, I have no breeding heifers, I have no lordly bulls (gavampati). If you wish to rain, rain." What must be understood from this is that the wealth of a layman is shown in the Dhamma as "pleasure" based on "having, having, having"—this is the layman's pride. The things from which they derive pride: "I have this and that." But for the monk who enjoys the taste of renunciation (nekkhamma), the "not-having" is indeed happiness. That is why the Blessed One exulted saying "I have not, I have not," while Dhaniya exulted saying "I have, I have." Now you can understand the difference. So, that is that stanza.

Then, next, Dhaniya says once again, also regarding a matter connected to the cattle: "The stakes for binding the cattle are driven in very firmly. The cattle are bound with new ropes made of muñja grass, which is a soft grass. Even the milk-drinking calves cannot pull and break them. If you wish to rain, rain."

To that, the Blessed One declares: "Like a bull that has broken all its bonds, I have broken through the fetters of this round of rebirth (saṃsāra). I have shattered Bhava (Becoming)." He also gives another simile: "Like a great lordly elephant that has broken a rotten creeper, I have broken all these bonds and remain liberated. I have attained Nibbāna." He expressed it in that manner.

Having heard all these stanzas, it is mentioned next that the Blessed One revealed Himself. Then, Dhaniya and his family must have seen the Blessed One. Immediately, at that very moment, a rain with great thunderclaps poured down. Dhaniya then expressed his faith in the Blessed One: "It is a great gain for us to see the Blessed One. May the Blessed One be our Teacher! We go to the Blessed One for refuge. My wife and I will practice the holy life under the Blessed One's Dispensation and cross over the suffering of saṃsāra such as jāti [birth / arising] and jarāmaraṇa [decay and death / aging and death]." Thus, they made their pledge. So, that series of stanzas ends there.

Next, as concluding stanzas, two stanzas are mentioned in that Sutta which are also found in other places. In fact, we have to assume that to this series of stanzas presented in a dramatic way, two stanzas have been extracted from elsewhere and appended as concluding or final summary stanzas.

The meaning of those stanzas—we have mentioned this on many previous occasions. Those stanzas were a challenge made by Māra to the Blessed One on one occasion. There, too, in short, it is the story about that "positive (wealth-oriented) thinking." What is said there is—

Nandati puttehi puttimā — gomiko gohi tatheva nandati

Upadhīhi narassa nandanā — na hi so nandati yo nirūpadhi

It is Dhaniya's philosophy that is shown in that stanza. "The one with sons rejoices because of sons. The cattle-owner likewise rejoices in cattle." What is referred to as "cattle" is indeed that collection of material objects used to reinforce one's egoism. In the Dhamma, the word upadhi [grasping / holding / fuel] is used for this. Wife and children, money and wealth, land and property—all these are known by the name upadhi. Having upadhi is a cause of joy for a human being. "He who has no upadhi does not rejoice." This challenge was presented by Māra to the Blessed One on one occasion. On that occasion, the Blessed One declared:

Socati puttehi puttimā — gomiko gohi tatheva socati

Upadhīhi narassa socanā — na hi so socati yo nirūpadhi

"The one with sons sorrows because of sons. The cattle-owner likewise sorrows because of cattle," he falls into sorrow. Upadhi—all those possessed material assets become a cause of sorrow for a person. "He who has no upadhi does not sorrow." The Blessed One declared that he who has abandoned all those upadhi [grasping / holding / fuel] and attained the state of Nibbāna, which is called nirūpadhi (without acquisitions), does not sorrow. This stanza was also placed at the end of this Sutta.

In fact, this goes much deeper than just lands, properties, and grains. The five aggregates of grasping (pañcupādānakkhandha) that we have accumulated throughout this long saṃsāra—the five accumulated aggregates of grasping: rūpa (form), Vedanā (Feeling), saññā (perception), Saṅkhāra (Formations), and viññāṇa [consciousness]—these indeed are upadhi. The Blessed One declared that the one who has abandoned all of them and attained Nibbāna does not sorrow.

So, next, this story ends as follows: it is said that the Blessed One returned to Jetavana monastery through the air, and those two actually ordained in the Dispensation, attained Arahatsip, and entered final Nibbāna. Next, it is mentioned in the books that the herdsman community built a monastery called Gokulaṅka Vihāra at that site, which existed in India for several centuries.

Now let us look at the lesson we can learn from this. If we look at this as an exposition, the first thing we have to say by way of revealing the facts is that in the ancient past, when considering wealth, the cow was the measure—the measure of money. That is why it is mentioned in the Dhamma: 'gosamitaṃ dhaṇaṃ' (there is no wealth equal to cattle). In the pastoral era of the ancient past, cattle were considered as currency. Since cattle-wealth was such a major thing, he exulted in that manner. He boasted: "I have thirty thousand cattle, I am the boss." He had no fear whatsoever and even challenged the rain to fall because of this.

Next, what is spoken of here as grain, wealth, and assets—in terms of those times—such as cattle and so forth, are all upadhi [grasping / holding / fuel]. In terms of the present era, as everyone knows, upadhi refers to money, lands, and various other things like bank accounts, savings, securities, insurance, etc., expressed in diverse words; all of these represent upadhi. The world holds the view that these provide security to oneself. But when we look at this series of stanzas, we can see that it is like a dramatic debate between the two sides of upadhi and nirūpadhi (the state without acquisitions). Every time Dhaniya praised the value of upadhi, the Blessed One declared the advantages of nirūpadhi—renunciation (nekkhamma) and Nibbāna. This is highly relevant to the present day. Because we know that even in such a disastrous era, many people lean towards "positive thinking" and are tempted to look at the world optimistically based on that.

In fact, they even try to distort and explain away the Three Characteristics—Anicca (Impermanent), Dukkha (Suffering), and Anattā (Not-self). But we know the reality of suffering declared by the Blessed One. If one forgets that, one will have to fall into suffering (dukkha) someday. Instead of facing reality, viewing everything in a positive/favorable light following capitalism—this ultimately ends in delusion, madness, and various mental aberrations. Meritorious friends know good examples of this. When the future dream-world that Paṭācārā built with her beloved shattered, she became insane and ran naked on the highway. Similarly, when the world Kisāgotamī had built out of maternal love shattered, she went from house to house looking for medicine while clutching her dead child. The Buddha helped both of them by reminding them of reality.

Therefore, we must reflect on this. Day by day, we hear of destructions occurring in the world due to floods, tsunamis, earthquakes, cyclones, etc. In the midst of these, we must decide whether to continue spinning on this saṃsāra merry-go-round or to get off it. The period of a Buddha's appearance is indeed a great opportunity to escape from saṃsāra, a good opportunity to leap out. This merry-go-round spins on top of jāti [birth / arising], jarā (decay), vyādhi (sickness), and maraṇa (death). Clutching onto an optimistic view, people keep spinning and enjoying themselves amidst the sound of the fivefold musical instruments. But through that, Nibbāna is distanced. Therefore, we must contemplate that the lesson to be learned from these stanzas is that no protection whatsoever can be obtained from such upadhi [grasping / holding / fuel].

As a reply to Māra's challenging stanzas, the Buddha preached a powerful stanza on another occasion in this manner:

Nabhaṃ phaleyya paṭhaviṃ caleyya

Sabbepi pāṇā idha santaseyyuṃ

Sallampī ve urasi pakampayeyyuṃ

Upadhīsu tāṇaṃ na karonti

— Māra Saṃyutta, Saṃyutta Nikāya.

Even if the sky should split, and the earth should shake, and all living beings here should tremble, even if a spear were driven into their chest, the Buddhas do not seek protection in upadhi. They do not expect help from upadhi [grasping / holding / fuel]. What is shown there as a challenge to Māra is the value of nirūpadhi (being free from acquisitions).

Accordingly, we must contemplate—and shape our lives according to the vision of things as they are presented by the Buddha. For the Buddha has shown these as distorted views. Perceiving the impermanent as permanent (anicce nicca-saññā) is a distorted view. It is not just a view; distortions (vipallāsa) are shown in three ways: distortion of perception (saññā-vipallāsa), distortion of mind (citta-vipallāsa), and distortion of view (diṭṭhi-vipallāsa). The perception that takes the Anicca (Impermanent) as permanent is distorted. The thought that thinks of the impermanent as permanent is also distorted. The view that considers the impermanent as permanent is distorted. In this manner, taking the impermanent as permanent in all three ways is shown by the Buddha as a distortion, a perversity.

Similarly, perceiving the foul as beautiful (asubhe subha-saññā), taking what is foul as beautiful. No matter how much one tries to hide the foulness of this body, it becomes exposed. Yet, the world possesses the view of beauty. Even when it stinks, when it falls ill, in ways that are repulsive to oneself, the world tries to present it as beautiful. They keep thinking of it as beautiful. They maintain a distorted perception, a distorted mind, and a distorted view. But there lies the reality: taking the foul as beautiful is prevalent in the world.

In the same way, taking what is painful as pleasant (dukkhe sukha-saññā). In reality, this entire body is to be regarded as a heap of feelings (Vedanā (Feeling)). We cannot remain in a single posture. By changing the posture, we conceal the Dukkha (Suffering) inherent in the body. So, the world takes what is painful (dukkha) as pleasant. They try to enjoy pleasure through this. That, too, is a distorted perception, a distorted mind, and a distorted view. Next is this perception of self (atta-saññā). Taking this as a self, as "I", "mine", and "myself". Dhaniya also spoke of his possessions with pride, with the idea that they would not change. He invited the rain. It is through rain that floods and everything else come. Yet, he invited it without fear. Without considering the disastrous nature of it, he grasped everything through the perception of self as "I" and "mine". "All this belongs to me. I have calves, milk-drinking calves, I have cows," and so he went on listing those who belong to him. The more possessions he has, the greater he considers himself to be. But the Blessed One, instead, declared the value of the nirūpadhi state. We can reflect on that too. That, too, is that distorted, perverse condition. The place where the distorted view, the distorted mind, and the distorted perception are removed is indeed Nibbāna.

The world runs entirely along that optimistic view. They have started white-washing this Noble Truth of Suffering (dukkha-sacca). In the Four Noble Truths, the Blessed One declares that, in short, this entire five aggregates of grasping—rūpa, Vedanā (Feeling), saññā, Saṅkhāra (Formations), and viññāṇa [consciousness]—are entirely Dukkha (Suffering). It is presented in the Dhamma as a simple equation. But many people try to say, "This Truth of Suffering is too dark; we need to beautify it a bit, we need to white-wash it," and they make such attempts optimistically. This is an extremely foolish effort. Through that, because of their ignorance, what do many people do next? They get lost in a luxurious, pleasure-seeking lifestyle. At the same time, if we contemplate the danger aspect of it, selfishness, competitiveness, jealousy, wrong livelihood, and wrong ways of living find space through that positive philosophy. Through looking at the world in this capitalistic, optimistic way, they run after wealth in a way that makes their egoism stand out, even by defeating or killing the other person.

But the Dhamma presents a different concept of wealth. It is the concept of wealth shown in the Dhamma that belongs to Buddhists. That is called "Noble Wealth" (ariya-dhana). In some places, it is shown as seven types of wealth: saddhā-dhanaṃ (the wealth of faith), sīla-dhanaṃ (the wealth of virtue), hiri-ottappiyaṃ dhanaṃ (the wealth of shame and fear of wrongdoing), suta-dhanañca (the wealth of learning), cāgo (generosity), and paññā ca sattamaṃ dhanaṃ (wisdom as the seventh wealth)—thus shown as the Seven Noble Wealths. In another place, it is shown as five Noble Wealths. These meritorious friends hear about them constantly: faith, virtue, shame and fear towards sin which help in protecting virtue, learning or Dhamma knowledge, the quality of sacrifice or letting go, and next, wisdom—these are the real wealth. We must bring forth this wealth. We must incline towards our Noble positive thinking, not towards the worldly-accepted capitalism. We must develop the perception of "possibility" to bring this wealth closer.

For it is said about faith: "saddhīdha vittaṃ purisassa setṭham" (faith is a man's best wealth here). In the Āḷavaka Sutta, even a yakkha accepted—the yakkha named Āḷavaka accepted: what? That faith is the greatest wealth for a person. Now, many people fail to accept the truth that even a yakkha accepted. Faith is indeed the most valuable asset in the world. Because where there is faith, all other virtuous qualities connected to Nibbāna gather there.

Similarly, on the other hand, if we look at the ultimate end: "paññā narāṇaṃ ratanaṃ" (wisdom is the jewel of human beings). The greatest jewel, the most valuable gem that humans possess is wisdom. Therefore, the path that leads to wisdom, to the supreme insight wisdom that brings about one's liberation from saṃsāra—that is the Dhamma-aligned way of thinking we must bring forth instead of this worldly way of thinking. Recalling this concept of wealth, we must reflect that various wrong views arise in society from time to time to conceal the truth. This could be due to various selfish motives. Many people get dragged into them.

At a time when the world is clearly going to ruin day by day, we must consider this as a final opportunity—how rare indeed is a human birth, and equally rare is a human birth during the period of a Buddha's appearance. Even an animal lives some sort of life. But animals do not have something called the Dhamma. The animal's life consists of food, sleep, fear, and copulation—as even the sages of the past pointed out: food, sleep, fear, and sexual indulgence are common to both humans and animals. But the Dhamma is unique to humans. It is the Dhamma that is the distinguishing characteristic of humans.

Therefore, from the perspective of Dhamma-aligned thinking, we have received an extremely rare opportunity in this long saṃsāra to end the suffering of saṃsāra. Instead of saying "it is impossible," we must bring forth the perception of "possibility." Now, in these times, many people think, considering the decline of the Dispensation: "Now is not the time for Nibbāna. We should just keep doing other things. The time for Nibbāna has now passed." Thinking in that way is a wrong idea.

Now, let us illustrate this with a small simile. Sometimes, when there is a special exhibition or a special event, large crowds queue up to see it. Sometimes, they have to stay in queues miles long, day and night. At that time, if someone gets discouraged because the queue is long and abandons their place in the queue, they can never get back in. That is to say, on the first day, space is made available for a certain number of people. On the next day too, many people remain there regardless of the sun or rain. It is to those people that the opportunity is provided. He who arrives first is the one who, despite the suffering, remained in line. We must think in the same way.

During this period of a Buddha's appearance, if one thinks "now this Nibbāna is invalid/unobtainable" and does not practice the virtues relevant to Nibbāna, that person will always have the philosophy of "tomorrow, tomorrow." Instead, we must think: while this True Dhamma is present, we must exert ourselves to the best of our ability, bring forth those Buddhist core values in accordance with that noble Dhamma, and live according to those Buddhist core values. We must not abandon the essence and grasp the non-essential. Then, if we cultivate those core values with effort, even if we fail in this life due to some reason or because our merits have not matured, according to that simile of the queue, when the next Buddha comes, we will be at the front of the queue. It is not those who just keep talking, but those who engage in the practice who are at the front of the queue. There are good examples of this; it is not said in vain. Meritorious friends have heard of Bāhiya Dārucīriya, Pukkusāti, and others.

That ascetic Bāhiya Dārucīriya, along with Pukkusāti and others—actually seven monks, as mentioned there—during the time of Kassapa Buddha, when the Dispensation was in decline. When the Dispensation was degenerating in a very dangerous manner, they climbed onto a great rock, threw away the ladder, and making a life-sacrificing effort, rejecting food, put forth great energy and strove. It is said that through that effort, one monk became an Arahāt. One became a Non-Returner. The other five monks, without food, withered and died. But they did not die in vain. Those five who meditated with life-sacrificing effort were the ones who understood the Dhamma most quickly in this Dispensation. Everyone now knows Bāhiya Dārucīriya. The Bāhiya Sutta is a Sutta that almost everyone considers highly sublime. Nibbāna was not gained by the ascetic Bāhiya Dārucīriya through just those few words without effort; he had acquired the qualification for it. That is what we must understand from this. It was the same with Ven. Pukkusāti. Pukkusāti attained the stage of Non-Returner immediately upon hearing a certain deep discourse.

They realized the Paths and Fruits very quickly in this Dispensation. It is said that they possessed the capacity for swift realization. If we cultivate the strength for swift realization, we will not just keep saying, "I will become an Arahāt next time, next time," but like in that past Buddha Sasana, we will apply the maximum possible effort. That is what we must understand from this. Therefore, we must not be lazy in this Buddha Dispensation. If we think: "Now the Dispensation is in decline. Let us abandon these things and run along that positive thinking. Let us applaud material progress"—if we think like that, we will never escape from saṃsāra, keeping on saying "tomorrow, tomorrow, in the next Buddha's Dispensation, in the next Buddha's Dispensation." That is the state of affairs.

Therefore, we must reflect wisely. This Dhaniya Sutta is a good opportunity, a great topic, to renew our understanding of our values. Indeed, even by name, he is "Dhaniya" (the wealthy one). So, he developed a great pride because of this wealth, possessing such a huge herd of cattle. Because of that herd of cattle, and that flood we spoke of—indeed, if the Blessed One had not gone and helped him in some way, they might have been destroyed the very next day. In the same way, regarding the events happening in these times, these meritorious friends have heard well, there is nothing new to say. About a year ago, after the tsunami disaster occurred—now that has become an historical event. Many people try to remove such things from the minds of these meritorious friends. But in fact, those are the very things we must bring forth if we are to cultivate a sense of urgency. When the giant multi-story buildings were being destroyed by that tsunami, and vehicles, cars were being washed away into the sea, the Buddha statues that remained unharmed, sitting in concentration (samādhi), presented a demonstration of this very concept of upadhi [grasping / holding / fuel] and nirūpadhi. While all those upadhi were washed away, those statues sitting in concentration taught a lesson to the world. It was like the challenge the Blessed One made to Dhaniya. No matter how many tsunamis came, those Buddha statues, which reflect those core values, have given us a demonstration at least through their reflection/image. We must not forget that.

Recalling that too, in this disastrous time, there is something we often express—even though it is not a Buddhist concept, it is a Western saying: "a blessing in disguise." Practically, that is an important thing for many people. Because what helped Paṭācārā to attain Arahathship was the bursting of her inflated balloon. As soon as that balloon of the future burst, Paṭācārā first lost her mind. That, too, is mentioned in the Dhamma. This principle is shown in the Dhamma in this way: there are two results of suffering (Dukkha (Suffering)). When suffering is presented, it works in two ways. That is: "sammoha-vepakkāhaṃ, bhikkhave, dukkhaṃ vadāmi, pariyesana-vepakkāhaṃ vā" (Monks, I say suffering has delusion as its result, or searching as its result). Here, "result" is not like the result of karma, but the consequence of suffering. Delusion, falling into confusion, or searching, going in search. So, when suffering is presented, one person falls into delusion—becomes mad, insane. Another person goes in search. That is present in both of the stories we mentioned. Paṭācārā, too, at first fell into madness and started running. Then how did she turn to searching? When Paṭācārā came naked before the Blessed One, He declared: "Regain your mindfulness, sister." As soon as she regained her mindfulness, she immediately realized that she was naked. From there onwards, regaining her composure, ultimately that word of the Buddha, "Regain your mindfulness, sister," helped Paṭācārā to attain the foremost position among the bhikkhunīs who were experts in the Vinaya in this Dispensation.

It is the same with Kisāgotamī. There is nothing new to say, these are stories these meritorious friends have heard hundreds of thousands of times. Yet, perhaps they have not learned the lesson they ought to take from them. In her case too, it was a similar thing. At first, she fell into delusion. That her child could die was something unthinkable to her. That future dream-world she had constructed around her infant child—she must have thought: "Because of this child, everything will help my future and my life ahead," and in various other ways. So, she did not want to let go of those. She could not believe that the child had died. The Blessed One directed Kisāgotamī, who had fallen into madness and went from house to house searching for medicine, towards searching. He guided her to search. How did He guide her to search? Everyone knows He asked her to bring a handful of mustard seeds from a house where no one had died. There, she began to search. Through that searching, wisdom arose. So, we too must reflect, taking these as blessings in disguise, and extract the true lesson from them. Instead, if we white-wash them, forget the Noble Truth of Suffering (dukkha-sacca), and cling to that distorted philosophy, we will remain in saṃsāra forever. In this very manner, we have wandered in saṃsāra for a long period, hundreds of thousands of times.

As declared by the Blessed One, covered by ignorance (avijjā) and bound by craving (Taṇhā (Craving)). Because of being covered by that veil of ignorance, we did not realize the truth. True, we did not realize it. It is a darkness, a great thick darkness. It is in a thick darkness that the world wanders. Next, bound by the fetter called taṇhā, unable to break that bond, we have run in this saṃsāra for a long period.

So, if we are to break this, we must realize the Three Characteristics—Anicca (Impermanent), Dukkha (Suffering), and Anattā (Not-self)—as shown by the Buddha. These meritorious friends have heard of the very first step of the path of insight leading to that. Now, to the person who cultivates the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā), what is first realized is that there is something called "arising" in everything in this world. And the aspect of "ceasing", which was previously unseen by us, begins to appear. Out of the two—arising and ceasing—the world always highlights "arising." After throwing one's worn-out clothes and other things into the dustbin, one does not even remember them. One keeps searching for new things. One performs a preparation/formation. Saṅkhāra (Formations). One keeps performing endless formatting. The Buddha showed this itself as Dukkha (Suffering). 'Sabbe saṅkhārā aniccā' (all formations are impermanent) is true not only in a deep sense but even in an everyday, worldly sense. None of these preparations we make are permanent. Because of those preparations, we sometimes fall into suffering. All Saṅkhāra (Formations) are anicca. But because we have no understanding of their ceasing aspect, we keep preparing the same things over and over again, rather than thinking of the stilling of preparations. The Buddha has declared the stilling of preparations as happiness. We perform these saṅkhāra because of ignorance.

So, after seeing those two—arising and ceasing—next, a word used for this Nibbāna is nirodha (cessation). The state where that ceasing aspect is more clearly realized by the mind is called cessation. Out of arising and ceasing, how this breaks down must be understood more and more subtly. That is what is called dissolution (bhaṅga). Breaking down. When looking at the world with an inquiring eye, with insight wisdom, and strengthening one's concentration (samādhi), it appears in a subtle way that everything is a stream of arising and ceasing. That this is breaking apart, dissolving. Through that dissolving, what dissolves is not just things in the external world. Thoughts also dissolve. It is the thought that is grasped in the end. One sees that this thought also dissolves very rapidly.

Within that, a great fear and sense of urgency arise. "Am I not grasping this very thought in everything? That grasped thought also passes away, dissolves." The stream of insight-consciousness that starts from this gradually leads to that weariness (nibbidā), which is disenchantment with saṃsāra. This word nibbidā is indeed a valuable word in the Dispensation. Weariness/disenchantment with saṃsāra. To many, it is an unpleasant word. Now they attach new words to it and think along an optimistic philosophy. Now, something called a "depressed" state is prevalent among the younger generation. They say there are depressive symptoms, a depressive nature. Actually, what causes those is indeed that very optimistic philosophy. Because of limitless craving (Taṇhā (Craving)) and limitless expectations, young people run after various targets, become exhausted, and when the expected target is lost, they fall into a state of depression.

So, the Buddha has given the medicine pill for that. What is the medicine pill? It is the realization of reality. If one has some understanding of the Three Characteristics—Anicca (Impermanent), Dukkha (Suffering), and Anattā (Not-self)—they will not become despondent when they face such a situation. They will accept it as, "Here, I have learned a lesson," treating it as a blessing in disguise as mentioned, and will incline towards the path of the Dhamma. Instead, calling it a depressive symptom, some kind of abnormal condition, many try to feed it through modern philosophies. But we must reflect: there is no one who can even come close to the Blessed One in terms of science, is there? We must realize that we can never attain true peace by closing our eyes to reality. That is what the Buddha has brought forth for us.

That is also what is in the Four Establishments of Mindfulness (satipaṭṭhāna). Contemplation of the body (kāyānupassanā)—to one who looks closely at the body, what is seen in the body? Is it that beautiful nature we spoke of? As one applies the mind to the body, when washing one's face and cleaning one's limbs, what is the reality? What is shown in the mirror—is that what is inside? When looking with the eye of insight, it is not the condition seen in the mirror. In that way, the weariness that leads to disenchantment with the body is a disenchantment that comes according to reality. It is not a depression caused by the shattering of targets set through one's own foolishness. That might be depression. But this is nibbidā—disenchantment, a valuable word in the Dispensation. It is when the insight knowledges are maturing and drawing close to Nibbāna that this true weariness with saṃsāra emerges.

Through that alone comes fading of lust (virāga), which is non-attachment—letting go. One cannot escape from this saṃsāra while maintaining attachment to it. One cannot say, "Let me let go," while holding onto it. "Oh, I am holding on while trying to let go!" It is not to be done in that way. Through realization, a moment comes when those things held onto so far are let go without one even knowing it. It is not that "one lets go," but "they get let go." They slip away. They slip away. Such a state arises in the mind. Until then, one must cultivate that special vision we spoke of.

So, on this occasion, these meritorious friends have indeed undertaken a valuable virtue—this large crowd undertook the appropriate virtue on this Full Moon day. Why does everyone, as Buddhists, become virtuous at various levels of virtue? Going to heaven is indeed a result of it too. But if we look at the true meaning, virtue is cultivated for the sake of concentration (samādhi)—for the purification of mind. Establishing ourselves on virtue, training our body and speech, we next develop one-pointedness of mind, concentration, which is called purification of mind. This is not to see how the moon and the sun behave in the physical world, or what lies beneath the earth. This concentration was developed to see the reality, the nature as-it-is, of this five aggregates (pañcakkhandha). To the person who dwells in the Four Establishments of Mindfulness with that concentration, the insight knowledges emerge.

So, then, using virtue as a support, concentration is attained. Next, the concentrated mind is applied to insight, to contemplation. Through that contemplation, one gradually draws closer to true realization. When one draws close to that realization, one sees that the five aggregates of grasping (pañcupādānakkhandha), which were hitherto considered as "I" and "mine" as upadhi [grasping / holding / fuel], and the houses, lands, and vehicles we build in this long saṃsāra are all breaking down. As they break down, we acquire new things. But there is one thing we do not let go of in this long saṃsāra: being deluded by this five aggregates of rūpa, Vedanā (Feeling), saññā, Saṅkhāra (Formations), and viññāṇa [consciousness], we have worked to grow them rather than working towards their passing away, their cessation. That is why we have wandered for such a long time in this saṃsāra. Within that itself lies suffering. In short, the Buddha has declared the five aggregates of grasping (pañcupādānakkhandha) as entirely Dukkha (Suffering).

In truth, this world is like a [disease]. The Blessed One is called the supreme surgeon, the physician-healer, because the Buddha gave the method—the medicine—to cross over this bound suffering of saṃsāra. That medicine is contained within the Four Noble Truths. The Noble Truth of Suffering (dukkha-ariya-sacca). Craving (Taṇhā (Craving)) is shown as its cause. Due to limitless craving, the people of this world are stuck and immersed in Bhava (Becoming). They are holding onto various things. So, these virtues such as virtue are cultivated to gradually thin out that craving.

Then, when that is removed at some point, along with the stilling of the thirst of craving and the stilling of preparations (Saṅkhāra (Formations)), the attainment of Nibbāna is achieved. That is extinguishment. The Buddha declared: "My house is open, my fire is extinguished." Those fires He spoke of are indeed the fires of lust (rāga), hatred (dosa), and delusion (moha). Now, Dhaniya was pleased saying: "The fire is kindled, the fire is in the house." The Blessed One was pleased [by saying the fire is extinguished]. Therefore, we must follow the Blessed One and not Dhaniya. We must reflect that as Buddhists, the great endeavor, the great task we have to do, is this work of extinguishing the three fires. That is what we must engage in.

For that purpose, these meritorious friends have undertaken virtue to some extent today. Through listening to this Dhamma, these meritorious friends also draw close to the Noble Wealths (ariya-dhana) we spoke of. The wealth of faith (saddhā-dhana), the wealth of virtue (sīla-dhana), the shame and fear that assist virtue itself, next, Dhamma knowledge—that also helps. That too is a valuable wealth. A person without Dhamma knowledge destroys his own life and also destroys society. Next, that letting go, the power of generosity. That is a great strength. A person without the strength of letting go falls into disaster in that manner when a misfortune or loss occurs. Finally, wisdom. The realization of the true nature of the world—wisdom—it is when that is brought forth that liberation from saṃsāra occurs.

May the store of merit gathered today by these meritorious friends through the virtue kept and the Dhamma heard, serve as a supportive cause to develop and mature the spiritual faculties and powers of faith, energy, mindfulness, concentration, and wisdom which assist in the realization of Nibbāna. Establishing oneself on those, and with the help of association with noble friends, may this power of merit definitely be a supportive cause for the realization of the supreme, deathless, great Nibbāna through the penetration of the paths and fruits of Stream-entry, Once-returning, Non-returning, and Arahantship within this very Buddha Dispensation! May you make this aspiration. Likewise, if there is any being from Avīci up to Akaniṭṭha in this universe who wishes to rejoice in this merit of preaching and hearing the Dhamma, may they all, through that rejoicing, realize the supreme, deathless, great Nibbāna in accordance with their aspirations. Now, let us recite these stanzas.

From:

Verse 142 from the Daṇḍavagga (Chapter on Punishment) of the Dhammapada

Dear Listeners,

The Blessed One declared that due to various kinds of intoxication, worldly beings fall into heedlessness in this saṃsāra. In addition to natural intoxications such as the intoxication of youth (yobbana-mada), the intoxication of health (ārogya-mada), the intoxication of life (jīvita-mada), and the intoxication of wealth (bhoga-mada), the Dhamma indicates that the most well-known intoxication in society—the intoxication of liquor—is also a cause for heedlessness. What helps one to escape from all these intoxications is saṃvega (spiritual urgency). The background story for the stanza we have chosen as our theme today reveals how saṃvega, arising out of the sorrowful situations in life, can help a person conquer all these intoxications and draw closer to Nibbāna.

The Lord Buddha preached this stanza concerning King Pasenadi Kosala's minister named Santati. When this prime minister, Santati, returned after suppressing a rebellion on the borders of King Kosala's kingdom, the king, as a special privilege, granted him royal luxury for seven days. This does not mean he gave him the kingdom itself; it was more like an honorary title. He arranged for him to enjoy pleasures equal to royal luxury—the fivefold sensual pleasures (pañca-kāma). So much so, that a female dancer skilled in dancing and singing was handed over to him for his entertainment. Thus, this minister Santati spent seven days enjoying liquor, watching those dances, and listening to songs. On the seventh day, he set out to go to the bathing ford, riding on an elephant with his retinue. On the way, seeing the Buddha walking for alms, he bowed his head in respect to the Buddha and went on. At that moment, the Buddha showed a gentle smile. Since there is a special significance to such a smile, Venerable Ānanda usually asks, "Exalted One, what is the reason for showing that smile?" When asked thus, the Buddha declared, "Even though this minister goes on like this now, today itself, adorned in all his garments and jewelry, he will come to me, listen to a stanza, and attain final extinguishment (pariNibbāna today." Among the crowd who heard this, those with wrong views thought, "This recluse Gotama says whatever comes to his mouth; today we must be prepared to expose his falsehood and disgrace him." That group prepared themselves in that manner. Those with right views and faith were eager, thinking, "We must witness this miraculous event."

Meanwhile, during the daytime, Minister Santati engaged in water sports and then went to the drinking hall in the park. There, the dancer went onto the stage and began to perform her dance. In order to display her dancing grace to the best of her ability, this woman had not eaten properly for all seven days. At this moment, due to hunger and exhaustion, a severe ailment suddenly arose, and she fell down dead right there, with her eyes and mouth wide open. When the minister asked to have her examined, the people said, "Now her life has ceased." As soon as he heard this, a great saṃvega (spiritual urgency) and grief arose in this minister. So much so, that due to the saṃvega that arose, his seven days of intoxication subsided right there. He thought, "To whom should I go to subside this grief of mine? I must go to the Buddha." In the evening, he came to the Buddha, along with his retinue, adorned in his garments and jewelry in that very manner. When he related this story to the Buddha, the Buddha said, "Santati, not only in this life, but in this long samsāra, the tears you have shed due to this woman dying in this very manner are greater than the waters of the four great oceans." Thus instilling the fear of samsāra, He preached a short stanza of deep meaning:

Yam pubbe tam visosehi, pacchā te māhu kiñcanam;

majjhe ce no gahessasi,

upasanto carissasi.

When looked at in terms of meaning, in terms of literal meaning, it has to be translated like this: 'Yam pubbe tam visosehi' — whatever there was before, dry it up; 'pacchā te māhu kiñcanam' — let there be nothing for you afterwards; 'majjhe ce no gahessasi' — if you do not grasp anything in the middle either; 'upasanto carissasi' — you will wander completely at peace.

It is said that by deeply considering this brief advice, the sorrow-stricken Minister Santati attained Arahantship at that very moment. Along with this, some texts mention that if a person has cultivated meditative absorptions (jhāna) in the past, they surface. Now, here, it is said that he obtained not only the state of jhāna, but even direct knowledges (abhiññā). For next, it is said that the Arahāt Santati, after attaining Arahantship, examined his life-formations (saṅkhāra) to see how long his life would last. Knowing that he would have to pass away (attain *pariNibbāna), he asked permission from the Buddha, saying, "Please give me permission to attain parinibbāna." The Buddha said, "Very well, but before that, declare to this assembly the past kamma that helped you to become an Arahāt. And do this not sitting on the ground, but rising into the air." At that moment, it is mentioned here that the Arahāt Santati declared his past history in this manner:

"Ninety-one aeons (kalpas) ago, during the time of Vipassī Buddha, I was born in the kingdom of Bandhumatī and wondered what would be a good livelihood to pursue. When I thought about what occupation would not cause harm or injury to others, I felt that the activity of a Dhamma announcer (Dhamma-ghosaka) was the best occupation. The activity of a Dhamma announcer means wandering about proclaiming to people, encouraging them to perform meritorious deeds like giving alms, to observe the precept days, to listen to the Dhamma, and to be devoted to the Triple Gem. So, I started to behave in this way in society as a profession. King Bandhumatī, who was the Buddha's father, came to know about this, summoned me, and asked, 'What are you doing and how are you doing it?' When I told him, 'I am practicing the profession of a Dhamma announcer,' he said, 'Very good. But you are doing this by walking on foot, aren't you? For this work, you should travel on horseback,' and he gave me a horse. He told me to perform this duty riding on a horse while wearing a garland of flowers. After I had done this for some time, the king summoned me again and said, 'A horse is not sufficient; do this work traveling in a chariot drawn by four horses.' Then, for the third time, he summoned me again and assigned me to perform this work of a Dhamma announcer adorned in garments and jewelry, riding on an elephant, having also given me various forms of wealth, possessions, and resources. In those days, the lifespan of human beings was extremely long. During the time of Vipassī Buddha, I performed this task of a Dhamma announcer for eighty thousand years." Declaring, "It is as a result of this that I obtained this state," Minister Santati entered into the fire-element attainment (tejo-dhātu-samāpatti) right there in the air and kindled fire in his own body. The blood and flesh of his body were consumed. At that time, the Buddha had a cloth spread out to collect the burnt bone relics and had a stupa built there at the four-way junction, wishing, "May people worship this stupa and accumulate merit."

After this event, after this miraculous event, a discussion arose among the monks: "This minister Santati attained Arahantship while adorned in his garments and jewelry. Do we call this person an ascetic (samaṇa), a monk (bhikkhu), or a Brahmin (brāhmaṇa)?" A discussion of this nature arose. Having heard this, the Buddha uttered the stanza on that occasion, which is presented as follows:

Alankato cepi samaṇ careyya

santo danto niyato brahmacārī

sabbesu bhūtesu nidhāya daṇḍaṃ

so brāhmaṇo so samaṇo sa bhikkhu

The meaning of it is: "Even if someone is adorned in garments and jewelry, if they are peaceful, tamed, established in celibacy, having laid aside cudgels and weapons towards all beings, having a practice of non-violence, discarding uneven conduct and practicing even conduct—to such a person, whichever word is used, whether ascetic, Brahmin, or monk, there is no wrong. This is the idea conveyed by that stanza."

That is the story. What we have to extract from this story and event is—indeed, one might wonder how a layperson, having been intoxicated for seven days in that manner, could attain Arahantship. One should not misunderstand this. However, it is connected to past kamma. Only to someone who has the power of past perfections (pāramī) does the Buddha preach the Dhamma, looking at the right moment. This Dhamma is of such a timeless nature (akālika) that, though short, if it is deeply understood, that person can escape from saṃsāra at that very moment. There are many such highly miraculous things in Dhamma stories. In this day and age, someone might even question them.

Now, if we analyze this, what we have to say is that even if we think about this story, at first glance there is only one drama. But there is no wrong in thinking that there are two dramas. Because within this entire saṃsāra existence, there are three stages: gratification (assāda), danger (ādīnava), and escape (nissaraṇa). Gratification means enjoyment. Worldly beings are tempted to enjoy sensations based on the fivefold sensual pleasures (pañca-kāma). Especially animal beings. Even human beings—ordinary persons—live in the fivefold sensual pleasures. That is where they are. What we call "stages" is also one such stage. Next, when experiencing this, at a certain point, danger arises from within it itself—gratification and danger. At that moment, worldly beings are tempted to think. They wonder, "Why does this happen to us? Why do we get such sorrowful results?" and fall into contemplation. Next, they begin to search. A way to get out of this, to be free. That is what is called "escape"

(nissaraṇa). Escape means leaping out of this circular wheel of saṃsāra—the stage of escape. For that, if one meets a noble friend (kalyāṇa-mitta), a Buddha, at the right time, one can attain the escape called Nibbāna. Those are the three stages. All of these are contained within the short seven-day experience of Minister Santati. That royal luxury of seven days was a false royal luxury. It was perhaps the liquor that helped him forget its falsity and impermanence (aniccatā). He was intoxicated for all seven days. From this sleep—instead of sleepiness, it was intoxication—he awoke from this sleep, this dream of life, when he saw the tragic drama of that actress's dance. It became a drama. When we think a little about that, it is rare to see that final scene of an actor's or actress's life on a stage. That is the final scene of the dance of all of our lives. But we can contemplate that in a deeply moving way (saṃvegī). That woman must have danced because she could not avoid dancing. Because it was her profession. But at that moment, the dancing was done in madness. A certain passage in the Buddha's Dhamma is clarified to us by this. The Buddha described this drama—now, in these times, artists who enjoy aesthetic pleasure might feel some displeasure toward the Buddha about such things—but the Buddha compared drama to madness: "Ummattakamidam, bhikkhave, ariyassa vinaye naccam" — "Monks, in the discipline of the Noble Ones, dancing is madness." So, this fits perfectly here. Indeed, she danced unable to bear the pain of hunger. That is exactly what we say on some occasions: if someone is made to stand on a heated iron stage, the effort they make to shift their feet will appear to those looking as a dance. To a foreigner, it might even be a dance worth filming. Thus, according to the Buddha's word, it is clear that this dancing is like madness. Now, this fits perfectly. In the end, it was a struggling due to the pain of hunger. She struggled and fell, with both her eyes and mouth open. That is the final dance. We do not say this in mockery of dancing; these are natural occurrences. But the world forgets this, due to various intoxications such as the aforementioned intoxication of liquor. This reality (yathābhūta) became manifest to Minister Santati. Through that, a deep weariness (nibbidā) arose. Indeed, to cross over from saṃsāra, weariness—which is called nibbidā—is essential. It arises in each individual at their own level. In daily life, we experience the suffering (dukkha) of separation from loved ones. But it does not go that deep. Here, it was immediate. Through that saṃvega, his intoxication subsided right there. That is why the Buddha declared it in that stanza. "Peaceful, tamed..." — indeed, during that short time, through the weariness (nibbidā) that arose from it, a certain restraint must have developed in that person. Time is not the issue here. A great transformation had occurred in him by the time he came to see the Buddha, due to that saṃvega. He was no longer the same minister as before.

So, somehow, through the drama we see that the minister saw gratification, and then danger (ādinava) due to the sudden death of the actress. Next, he came to the Buddha seeking escape (nissaraṇa). To help with that escape, although the Buddha's sermon was a short stanza, we know it was wonderful. It is something beyond our imagination. The Buddha sees the dispositions and latencies (anusaya) of characters, and the strengths they have brought from the past. If they have practiced meditation subjects (kammaṭṭhāna), He sees that too. It is according to those that the Buddha utters a stanza.

Now, this stanza is a deep stanza. In the past, through the merit of being a Dhamma announcer (Dhamma-ghosaka)—encouraging others towards the Dhamma is a great merit. The greatest thing one can do in the world is to establish others in the Dhamma. If he did this for his entire life, there must have been a vast mass of merit, a strength of perfections (pāramī), within that person. It surfaced, ripened, and matured through that short stanza uttered by the Buddha. That stanza is like a riddle to an ordinary person. What does it say? "Yaṃ pubbe taṃ virosehi" — if there was something before, dry it up. What is this thing that was there before? Past formations (saṅkhāra). The Buddha told Minister Santati, "The tears you have shed in this long saṃsāra due to this very woman dying in this very manner are greater than the four great oceans." Thus, such life stories are mentioned in the Dhamma—some people come together as husbands and wives five hundred times, or even more. They come together as parents and children, and in various other ways in this long saṃsāra due to the power of attraction they have for one another. What we have to understand here is that Minister Santati must have had some saṃsāric connection with that actress. Be that as it may, with that saṃsāric background, Minister Santati understood the side of danger (ādīnava)—that he had shed an ocean of tears over a long period in saṃsāra for this very woman. Now, here, it is as if the Buddha declared, "Dry up that ocean!" and what is contained within that are past formations (saṅkhāra). Let us analyze this term saṅkhāra a little.

The term saṅkhāra is used in many contexts. But to truly understand this deeply, it must be understood through meditation. Briefly, it can be explained in relation to drama. In ancient India, the word saṅkhāra was often used in connection with drama. Before an actress comes onto the stage, how much makeup and dressing up does she do? Even today you know, don't you? There are various kinds—we don't need to specify—indeed, nowadays we see actresses even on the high road. Why? Because they are not in their natural state. They come onto the stage having made a change by applying various colors. These are called makeup formations (aṅga-saṅkhāra). They make many artificial, deceptive modifications to suit the scene presented in the drama. That is basically the meaning of the word saṅkhāra. Therefore, it is in accordance with this deep meaning that the Buddha designates everything we do in our entire life as formations (saṅkhāra). In the very effort we make to live, within the good or bad kamma, when considered deeply, what exists is our making a personality, grasping it as "I" and "mine".

It is deeply shown in the Dhamma that in one place, an untaught worldling regards form as self. "Rūpaṃ attato samanupassati" — he regards form as self. "Yā kho pana samanupassanā — saṅkhāro so" — that very regarding as self is a formation (saṅkhāra). Because the Buddha has shown that what is called the dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi)—whereby an ordinary worldling thinks that there is a self, grasping it as "I" and "mine"—is a falsely assumed thing. Or rather, it is something made up. How is it projected? One has a body. One either thinks, "This is my self," or that "the self possesses a body," or thinks "my self is within form," or "form is within the self." In this manner, looking at each of the aggregates in four ways has been shown by the Buddha as a formation (saṅkhāra). One regards form as self; one regards self as possessing form; one thinks that form is within self; one thinks that self is within form. What this indicates is the inability to let go of form. It is like seeing one's photograph and saying, "Ah, this is me! This is my childhood; this is my youth." Thus, one has taken form as "I". In the same manner is feeling (vedanā). In the same manner is perception (saññā)—recognition. In the same manner are formations (saṅkhāra). Making formations is taken in that way. Now, when that actress comes onto the stage, she is not the same person who was behind the stage. At that moment she thinks, "I must perform this character." It is not like being at home. Thus, there too, we see the deceptive nature of these formations (saṅkhāra). That is why formations are compared to a banana trunk. A banana trunk has no essence, no heartwood; it is substanceless. Consciousness (viññāṇa) is this thinking of "I" and "mine", it is to that mind. In this way, when considering each of these, right there are formations (saṅkhāra). This is a small clue given to understand formations (saṅkhāra). The Buddha shows this as something occurring due to ignorance (avijjā). What is ignorance? It is not knowing that this entire saṃsāric existence is suffering (dukkha). Because of not knowing it as suffering (dukkha), we perform a great deal of preparations/formations (saṅkhāra) in this life. The Buddha says that, in the end, suffering (dukkha) is received within that. Since we do not understand this, we go on and on in saṃsāra accumulating formations (saṅkhāra). That is what is contained in this brief story—the Dhamma of Dependent Arising (paṭicca-samuppāda), in short. Thus, somehow, those formations are past formations (saṅkhāra). In the past, Minister Santati understood that all formations (saṅkhāra) associated with that woman were impermanent (anicca). "Yam pubbe tam visosehi" — he dried up those formations (saṅkhāra). He dried up that grief.

Next, "pacchā te māhu kiñcanaṃ". Those devotees who practice insight meditation (vipassanā) know that what is called investigation of formations (saṅkhāra-sammasana) means contemplating formations (saṅkhāra). Now, in the Dhamma, in insight meditation, it is said that what we take as kamma in the world are these very things. These are all our formations (saṅkhāra). Indeed, when it is said "all formations are impermanent" ("sabbe saṅkhārā aniccā"), it refers to these thoughts of ours, the thoughts (vitakka) that arise in the mind within this existence. Indeed, the past is something grasped by the mind, isn't it? There, too, are formations (saṅkhāra). The Buddha declares that every single one of those past formations (saṅkhāra) is impermanent (anicca). Likewise, they are substanceless; there is no essence to be grasped as "I" or "mine". Next, because those past formations (saṅkhāra) are no longer there, it becomes easy for us. We can contemplate it like waking up from a dream and realizing that the dream was false. Therefore, it is easy for an insight meditator (vipassanā-yogī) to understand the impermanence (aniccatā) of past formations (saṅkhāra). It is the same regarding future formations (saṅkhāra). According to that same principle, one can understand that if one generates formations (saṅkhāra) in the future, they will likewise perish.

But the most difficult thing is the present. The present is the middle: "majjhe ce no". The ordinary person grasps the formations (saṅkhāra) of this present—called paccuppanna (the present)—tightly. Otherwise, there is no existence either, is there? What is past, one can easily understand, "what is gone is gone." What comes in the future has not arrived yet; even if it comes, one can think, "it is just that much." But the form, feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), formations (saṅkhāra), and consciousness (viññāṇa) of this very moment are held onto tightly. Now, here, the feat performed by Minister Santati was seeing this with wisdom through that saṁvega that arose, through the weariness (nibbidā) towards saṁsāra. That is how the realization of the Paths and Fruits (magga-phala) occurs. The insight knowledges (vipassanā-ñāṇa) arising out of impermanence (aniccatā) mature, and through the breaking of that, weariness (nibbidā) towards saṁsāra arises. Through weariness (nibbidā), the desire to be liberated from saṁsāra arises. Through that, by deeply seeing the three characteristics, as a result of a highly rapid and subtle transformation occurring in the mind, one obtains the realization of the Paths and Fruits. Thus, what is fundamental to this is the weariness (nibbidā) towards saṁsāra, against the background of this event. That is why the Buddha, like 'hitting the nail right on the head,' waited exactly until the time of that person's arrival. That is why the Buddha showed a gentle smile. The Buddha sees the moment when this person can be helped. Otherwise, when Minister Santati bowed his head and was leaving, He could have said, "Wait a moment, listen to this sermon and then go," couldn't He? No, He waited until he had gone through all of that and returned humbled. Only after his intoxication had subsided, and when the time had arrived, did He deliver that short sermon. Santati understood it most deeply. "Majjhe ce no gahessasi" — if you do not grasp the middle, the present formations (saṅkhāra) either, "upasanto carissasi" — you will wander completely at peace, which refers to Arahantship.

That is what we have to extract from this story. Many such events are mentioned in the Dhamma. In this day and age, someone might question this. Likewise, on the other hand, we must say that taking this as a general rule, some people might think that just by hearing a short stanza, anyone can obtain this state. We should not think in that way generally. This is an extraordinary occurrence. It is not an ordinary thing; highly extraordinary events are recorded in this Dhamma. One must understand their background properly.

Then, next, what we need to bring out here is what causes weariness towards saṁsāra. We also started with this life—now, here, it was not only the intoxication of liquor; within this, what must have helped Minister Santati perform such a heroic deed were also the intoxication of youth (yobbana-mada), the intoxication of health (ārogya-mada), and so forth. It was with their support. Next, the intoxication of life (jīvita-mada)—he conquered others and returned. Next, the intoxication of wealth (bhoga-mada)—royal luxury was given. It was on that very intoxication born of wealth that he began to enjoy royal luxury for the entire seven days. If we think about it, this "middle" is indeed those seven days. He understood the emptiness of the royal luxury enjoyed during those seven days. Then, it is easy to let go of it. If it was understood in that way, the grief caused by this event subsided right there. One was able to conquer that grief. Next, the danger of this saṃsāra is understood even more deeply: "Have we not spent such a long time in saṃsāra in this manner, is it not an ocean of tears?" So, this aspect—this aspect of the Dhamma—is not brought out by most people in this day and age. We have mentioned on many occasions that now the trend is, both for protecting our Dispensation (Sāsana) and for carrying this Dhamma forward, what is mostly brought out is the side of worldly development. Developing the world. The Buddha has said: "Na siyā lokavaḍḍhano" — "Do not be a developer of the world," or "Do not be a developer of cemeteries." Developing this saṃsāra is a practice of worldly development and cemetery development—the weariness towards saṃsāra does not fit with that. Therefore, much attention is not paid to such things in this day and age. However, during the Buddha's time, on many occasions, to the monks and laypeople who listened to the Buddha's Dhamma, and to those who came to ask questions, He constantly reminded them of sermons that created a wonderful, powerful sense of urgency (saṃvega) and weariness towards saṃsāra.

These are called the Anamatagga [Suttas]. In the Anamatagga Saṃyutta, several such Dhamma sections are mentioned. Why are they called the Anamatagga Suttas? The Buddha repeatedly reminds us that this saṃsāra is something whose beginning and end are not visible. The beginning of this cannot be found; to illustrate this, there are similes—it is said that upon hearing those discourses, monks attained Arahantship right then and there. Now, here, we started by speaking about the ocean of tears. That discourse is mentioned in more detail in the Dhamma. The Buddha asks, "Monks, what do you think, which is greater? The tears you have shed over this long saṃsāra—while wandering for a long time covered by ignorance and bound by craving—due to associating with the disagreeable and separating from the agreeable, or the water in the four great oceans?" When that question is asked, the monks humbly declare, "Exalted One, if we have properly understood the Dhamma preached by you, the tears we have shed in this long saṃsāra due to associating with the disagreeable and separating from the agreeable in such situations are indeed greater, and the water in the four great oceans is less." "Sadhu! Sadhu! So it is, monks," the Buddha declares. Because this saṃsāra is something whose beginning and end are not visible. A starting point cannot be declared. For those running in saṃsāra for a long time, it cannot be said, "Here is the beginning." Preaching in this manner that the first beginning is not visible, He then says in that discourse to become weary (nibbidā) towards all those formations (saṅkhāra).

Thus, next He says, "Monks, if you collect the tears you have shed in this long saṃsāra solely for your mothers, those tears are greater than the four great oceans." Just as a teacher in a school repeatedly brings up a certain point to make the children understand it deeply, the Buddha also asks, "What do you think, monks? Are the tears shed for your mothers greater, or is the water in the four great oceans greater?" Next, He asks the same about fathers, daughters, and so on—due to the loss of relatives, the loss of wealth, and the calamity of disease—asking, "Are the tears shed due to these greater, or is the water in the four great oceans greater?" The answer given to that is that the water in the four great oceans is less, and the tears are greater. In this way, there are many discourses in various places regarding the ocean of tears.

Similarly, next there are other discourses about an "ocean of mother's milk." There, too, the same is asked: "Monks, what do you think? Is the mother's milk you drank while running in this saṃsāra—covered by ignorance and bound by craving—greater, or is the water in the four great oceans greater?" There, too, the monks reply, "If we have properly understood the Exalted One's Dhamma, that mother's milk is indeed greater, and the water in the four great oceans is less." Thus, by that too, the length of this saṃsāra and the fact that we have traveled in this saṃsāra for such a long time is shown.

Likewise, there is another discourse that is even more stirringly urgent (saṃvegajanaka): about the "ocean of blood." It is a highly famous discourse. This was preached to thirty monks who came from the city of Pāvā, who were earnest practitioners of ascetic practices (dhutaṅga). When those thirty monks came to the Buddha, they had not obtained any of the Paths and Fruits. But the Buddha began the discourse: "Monks, what do you think, which is greater? The blood that has flowed when you had your heads cut off in this long saṃsāra, or the water in the four great oceans?" the monks replied, "If we have properly understood the Buddha's Dhamma, that blood is indeed greater." He does not stop there. Next, the Buddha asks, "Is the blood shed by you solely while being cows, solely while being buffaloes, while being sheep, while being goats, while being pigs, while being chickens, greater, or is the water in the four great oceans greater?" These devotees know that even when thinking about the present times, this is not an exaggeration. When we think about the quantity of animals being killed, some of them might even be one's relatives. The Buddha never utters an exaggeration. An exaggeration is a falsehood. Therefore, this is not a falsehood. It is said that there is not even a simile for this.

In this manner, there are other highly wonderful discourses. From various perspectives, the Buddha points out the danger of this saṃsāra. Indeed, we spoke of the objects of urgency (saṃvega-vatthu), didn't we? Decay, illness, death, and so forth are well-known. There is another: the suffering (dukkha) experienced in the past saṃsāra, and the suffering (dukkha) to be experienced in the future—if one does not become an Arahāt. These, too, are objects of urgency (saṃvega-vatthu). In this day and age, not much consideration is given to them. However, to a faithful person, these suttas are highly meaningful if they sink in deeply. To put it briefly, it is mentioned that upon hearing this discourse, the thirty monks who came from Pāvā destroyed all defilements (āsava) and obtained supreme Arahantship.

From this, we see that without generating saṃvega regarding this saṃsāra, without generating weariness towards saṃsāra, one cannot attain these high states. Without being weary of the world, one cannot attain supramundane states (lokuttara-dhamma). One must become weary at various levels. Some people might be afraid, thinking, "If we do that, we cannot carry on our lay life." There are different levels. If, at that moment, the mind is directed to that supramundane state, what the Buddha preaches is nothing strange. It is the necessity of understanding the Four Noble Truths. This is what the Truth of Suffering (dukkha-sacca) in the Four Noble Truths is. Nowadays, the Truth of Suffering is explained as applying only to those who are sick in hospitals, to the poor who have nothing to eat and drink, or to those who expect various positions in the world—not getting what one wants is suffering (dukkha). If those things are provided, it is happiness. Ideas about the Buddha's Sasana are moving within such a narrow vision. But indeed, if someone hopes for Nibbāna, and if a great saṃvega arises in them, thinking, "Have we not traveled in saṃsāra for such a long time in this manner?"—it is through that that one becomes weary of existence (bhava). Without being weary of existence—what the Buddha has pointed out as the lust for existence (bhava-rāga) is the subtlest attachment within worldly beings, the attachment to existence, to continuity. To break that, one must constantly contemplate the terrifying nature of saṃsāra, and the length of saṃsāra.

There are other discourses of that very kind. In one discourse, the Buddha declares one's maternal lineage. That too is a good simile. The Buddha presents that too like a story: "Monks, if you cut all the trees, leaves, branches, and twigs in this entire land of Jambudīpa into four-inch pieces, and taking each piece, say: 'This is my mother,' and taking the next piece, say: 'This is my mother's mother,' and taking the next piece, say: 'This is my mother's mother's mother'—if you go on counting the past maternal lineage in this way, the wooden pieces will run out, but the maternal lineage will not be exhausted." He presents even that simile, which shows that we have traveled in saṃsāra for such a long time in this manner. Next, He points out the same regarding fathers.

The Buddha declares that if you make the entire earth into a heap of clay and make small clay balls, and discard one clay ball saying, "This is my father," "This is my father's father," "This is my father's father's father"—even by counting in this manner, the number of past fathers cannot be exhausted.

There are discourses of that kind. In another place, there is a discourse about the length of an aeon (kalpa). There too, a monk comes and asks the Buddha, "Exalted One, how long is this aeon?" "Monk, this aeon cannot be measured and completed in terms of years, hundreds of years, thousands of years, or hundreds of thousands of years." "In that case, Exalted One, can you give a simile?" "What is the simile?"

Suppose there is a great mountain, one league (yojana) high, one league wide, and one league long. It is a solid mountain with no crevices in the middle. Once every hundred years, a man comes with a cloth of Kāsī silk and wipes that mountain, then goes away. By such wiping with the Kāsī cloth, wiping once every hundred years, that mountain of one league in height, width, and length would wear away, but the aeon would not wear away. So long is an aeon."

Another simile is presented: Suppose there is a city with iron walls, one league in length, width, and height, filled with mustard seeds. Once every hundred years, a person comes and removes one mustard seed. Those mustard seeds would run out, but the aeon would not wear away.

In another place, it is mentioned: A Brahmin comes and asks, "Exalted One, how many aeons have there been in the past? How many past aeons?" Then, when the Buddha said that a number cannot be given and a simile was requested, He said, "Brahmin, if there is a quantity of sand from where the river Ganges begins to where it flows into the sea, and if each grain of sand could be counted, the number of aeons one has spent in the past is even greater than those grains of sand." It is pointed out in this manner.

Another person asks—though it was not in response to a question—on an occasion when the Buddha delivered a special sermon about the size of that aeon. When the Buddha came near the Vepulla Mountain, the Vepulla Mountain in India: "Monk, if the skeletons discarded by a single living being within a single aeon were collected together, and if those collected skeletons did not perish, they would be larger than this Vepulla Mountain," the Buddha declared. What this shows is how long a person goes on being born and dying, discarding skeletons in this manner, within a single aeon. There are many such discourses in the Dhamma.

Through each of these, we can understand that what the Buddha brought out based on those Anamatagga Suttas was the terrifying nature of this saṃsāra. Because, we know the uniqueness of the Buddha's Dhamma. The Buddha is not outstanding because He gave some novel social philosophy to the world. True, those things are also there. However, the most important thing—which also helps in the long-term survival of the Buddha's Sasana—is declaring the path to the problem faced by worldly beings when searching for a way to cross over from this saṃsāra over a long period of time. Then, only the person who understands the terrifying nature of saṃsāra feels like crossing over from it. Therefore, indeed, one must constantly direct the mind to these things: the suffering (dukkha) experienced in past saṃsāra. It was to help with that that the Buddha explained the length of saṃsāra in various ways. When thinking about these similes, one is filled with great wonder. They might seem like exaggerations. However, through each of them, we must contemplate that for such a long time, living beings have traveled covered by ignorance and bound by craving (taṇhā). One must contemplate: "We have swum in such an ocean [of tears], we have swum in an ocean of mother's milk, we have swum in an ocean of blood."

Even if we think about the lineages of parents, we are highly proud of various relationships. Next, the Buddha declares, "Monks, we have traveled for such a long time in this saṃsāra that it is almost impossible to find anyone in this world who has not been one's mother. It is difficult to find someone who has not been one's mother, who has not been one's father, who has not been one's son, who has not been one's daughter." Then, one might think about this distinction of male and female. One must understand that even that does not belong to oneself. Due to various demeritorious deeds (kamma), there can be changes in the distinction of male and female. Looking at it from that perspective, according to the Buddha's word, we can understand: "Those who are near us are our mothers, our fathers, our children." It is precisely because of not knowing this that it is called a drama. That is why the entire existence is a drama. The ordinary world does not understand this deep reality. The ordinary world sees only the lifespan starting from the mother's womb and ending at the cemetery. To scientists and everyone else, only that much is visible to the physical eye. Only that much is visible to the physical eye. To those with direct knowledges (abhiññā), a greater extent is visible. To us, only the animal world is visible. The ghost realm (peta-loka) can also be known by some to a certain extent by inference. But those divine realms (deva-loka) and Brahma realms (brahma-loka) are deeply visible only to those with direct knowledges (abhiññā). Other than that, ordinary persons, like blind people saying there is no sun or moon, say, "Where are they? There is only this world. So, as long as we are in this world, we should eat and drink well. It is enough if we find the necessary economy etc. and live well." Such is their view. But that is not it. We pay homage to the Buddha because He discovered liberation from this saṃsāra, which no other teacher could discover. The Buddha has shown a highly wonderful Dhamma—a path of escape (nissaraṇa-magga). Indeed, to enter upon this, one must understand gratification and danger (ādīnava). If someone is prompted to think about this, using the very danger (ādīnava) that arises within gratification as a footing, and if they are assisted by a noble friend (kalyāṇa-mitta)—if the Dhamma falls into place at the right time—even if that person cannot perform it as rapidly as Minister Santati did that escape (nissaraṇa), they can obtain those aforementioned states even today by engaging in meditation.

We must then contemplate: this is the real essence, the heartwood of this Dhamma. This is the practice leading to Nibbāna. We must do what is relevant to that. Indeed, what is called the three characteristics—impermanent (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and not-self (anattā)—that is the essence of the Buddha's Dhamma. The impermanent nature, the suffering nature, and the not-self nature of this entire existence. When we say suffering (dukkha), it is generally not just painful feeling (vedanā). Now let us look at that separation from the loved ones. In lay life, coming together with loved ones is inevitably regarded as a grand festive occasion. That is called auspicious (maṅgala). Then, when a situation arises like the one experienced by Minister Santati, the word *'ava' (un-) is prefixed to it. Next, it ends in an inauspicious event (avamāṅgala). That is the life story. Therefore, according to that, let us contemplate that every union ends in separation. It is said, "saṃyogā vijogantā" — "all unions end in separation."

That is why the Buddha points out that holding onto this entire fivefold aggregate is itself suffering (dukkha). Whether one holds onto form, feelings (vedanā), perceptions (saññā), formations (saṅkhāra), or consciousness (viññāṇa)—within all of them, the drama created through grasping (upādāna), the drama of thinking "it is I," breaks down. Now, a photograph taken during youth, or when one was good-looking, is completely distorted after several years. So, one cannot say it is oneself. Indeed, why? Because this form is not self. The nature of form is to change constantly. Yet, we take only the good part as form. It is the same with other things. Every single one of them changes. It is due to that impermanence (aniccatā). Due to that very impermanence (aniccatā), one has to constantly repair it. Within repair, too, there is what is called formation (saṅkhāra). It is like a breaking-down vehicle—the number plate is there in the same way—but after fitting parts together, we do not regard it as a new vehicle, do we? It runs with parts falling off. Now, indeed, our life is also like that. Think about it.

Through medical discoveries, although we say "this is I, this is mine," when we return from a hospital, other people's blood, other people's organs have been grafted into us. Even the few teeth in our mouth do not belong to us. Even the spectacles on our eyes. Although we say, "I can see," we see thanks to the spectacles. Wearing such artificial things, this entire life of ours is a drama. That is why all these things are called formations (saṅkhāra). That is why when someone dies, they put up notices saying "sabbe saṅkhārā aniccā" (all formations are impermanent). If only one could understand even by that little bit that this entire saṃsāra existence is a heap of formations (saṅkhāra). The Buddha understood this most deeply. The background to that is that long saṃsāra existence. Now, sometimes, this has been revealed through various empirical facts; it has been revealed through discoveries made using various modern methods regarding rebirth. Sometimes, the person who was one's mother in this life goes and is born as one's own child. There is a dramatic nature of this kind in this saṃsāric existence. That is why the Buddha declared that in this long [saṃsāra], there is no one who has not been one's mother, one's son, or one's daughter. So, if this entire saṃsāra existence is a performance of this kind, escaping from this is indeed happiness.

What is called the Truth of Suffering (dukkha-sacca) is the fact that when we look deeply into everything from birth to the end, there is the nature of suffering (dukkha). Due to impermanence (aniccatā), we have to go on repairing and preparing these things. That preparing itself is suffering (dukkha). It is something with no essence or heartwood to be called "I" or "mine". It is only by properly understanding this that one can be liberated from saṃsāra. Therefore, the person traveling on the path of insight (vipassanā) must start by observing arising and passing away (udayabbaya) to the extent they understand it in daily life, and make an effort to understand it deeply: how the parts of the body wear out, about painful feelings, and so forth. It is because we cannot remain in one posture that we turn to the other side. That is why it is deeply pointed out that we conceal the nature of suffering (dukkha) in this body by changing postures. Sometimes, the teacher advises the practitioner (yogāvacara) to remain in the same posture, experiencing the pain, and to contemplate in order to understand the painful feeling (vedanā). That is to understand the suffering (dukkha) contained in it, even for a short while. Yet, we always like to change postures and conceal that suffering (dukkha). That is where ignorance (avijjā) lies. It is the same with other things. However, the Buddha brings this out to open our eyes: "We solved this same equation over a long period, but the correct answer did not come."

Therefore, in this era of a Buddha's appearance, we must contemplate by regarding what is valuable as valuable, without narrow objectives such as meditating merely to cure minor illnesses and small ailments. We must engage in Dhamma practice and meditation with the determination: "This entire saṃsāra is like a hospital, and I must obtain complete cure and leave it." If we do so, only then can we utilize this Buddha's Dispensation properly. Only then can we help others to utilize it as well.

The essence of the Buddha's Dhamma lies within the Four Noble Truths. What is called the five aggregates of grasping (pañcupādānakkhandhā)—form, feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), formations (saṅkhāra), and consciousness (viññāṇa)—every single one of these that is held onto is pointed out by the Buddha as suffering (dukkha). "Saṅkhittena pañcupādānakkhandhā dukkhā" — in brief, the Buddha declares that the five aggregates of grasping are themselves suffering (dukkha). That is the essence of the Truth of Suffering. Next, the Buddha declares: "Why does this state of suffering (dukkha) exist? It is due to craving (taṇhā)." Due to the unquenchable thirst of craving (taṇhā), living beings run in this saṃsāra for a long time. They draw their last breath with the hope of obtaining in the next life at least the wishes they could not obtain in this life. They do not understand their substancelessness.

Therefore, according to the accumulated kamma, one is born in those various places. It is not as one wishes. According to the kamma performed by oneself over a long period, the wheel of kamma turns on one side in this manner. Subjugated to that, living beings swim in an ocean of tears and an ocean of blood over a long period of time. So, indeed, when we think in that manner, we must contemplate: if we are to protect the Buddha's Sasana, if we are to protect the Dhamma, we must enter upon this deep aspect. We must go from danger (ādīnava) to escape (nissaraṇa), without remaining in danger (ādīnava) forever. For that, one must think with wise attention (yoniso manasikāra) about one's own life. Now, some people say various things about the meditation on foulness (asubha-bhāvanā), and so forth. However, if someone wishes to be liberated from saṃsāra, this impermanent (anicca) nature—the aforementioned beauty of form fades away, the strength of the body fades away, and the state of old age arrives. Instead of one's two legs, one has to depend on the four legs of the bed. Thinking about those lives, and next, thinking about other things—even the possessions one considers one's own—every single thing is subject to impermanence (aniccatā). These are things the Buddha reminds us of. Why does He remind us of every single one of these? Because the weariness (nibbidā) towards saṃsāra is essential for escaping from saṃsāra. Sometimes, a special event can bring that out from within such sorrowful situations. That can be brought out only if a noble friend (kalyāṇa-mitta) or the necessary Dhamma instruction falls into place at the right time. Otherwise, one falls back to sleep. One falls back to sleep again and again. That is the situation in this long saṃsāra. Ignorance (avijjā) means neglecting, forgetting; it is very easy. That is why this is called a dream of life. Therefore, to escape, one must remain awake, both regarding one's own life and the nature of the world. One must practice seeing in accordance with what was pointed out by the Buddha. Instead of the perception of permanence (nicca-saññā), one must generate the perception of impermanence (anicca-saññā). That is why the mind must be brought to a level where one can look at the world without those perversions (vipallāsa)—without distorted views and distorted states. The distorted views are: regarding what is impermanent (anicca) as permanent, regarding what is foul as beautiful, regarding what is subject to suffering (dukkha) as happiness, and regarding what is not-self (anattā) as self. That is the view of perversion (vipallāsa) existing within worldly beings. To conquer that, if one constantly trains the mind to see impermanence (aniccatā), from then on, one sees this gradually breaking down. Seeing it break down, fear arises: "Oh, is it not a breaking thing? Is it not a rotting fence that I am holding onto?" Many people think their lives are highly secure. They have bank deposits, they have children who have obtained high positions. In the end, when looking at the final period, the banks also collapse, and the children do not look after them. In the end, all those rotting fences that were held onto fall down. What remains for oneself is only the four legs of the bed. At that moment, what helps is indeed the Dhamma. If one has obtained some [Dhamma] in the past, that is the consolation at that moment. One must contemplate in that manner.

We brought out various Dhamma points through this short story. We do not always say these things merely for the aesthetic interest of the story. Through each of these, certain Dhamma principles can be brought out to help our lives. In the Buddha's time, those who lived with that Dhamma—sometimes a Brahmin comes and asks the Buddha, "How long is this aeon?" Due to the faith (saddhā) generated through that, in the end, he becomes a Buddhist. But nowadays, there is a way of thinking that treats this as something not belonging to oneself, discussing this world and space. That does not help one's life. They use them as means of obtaining various degrees. However, those must be brought close to one's life. The Buddha has already declared the essence of all these things. Whether we spend millions of money to go to strange worlds or not, when we die, we travel according to kamma. No vehicle is needed for that; no strange satellite is needed. Instead, at the moment of death, automatically along with that mind, in some instances, one goes to the Brahma realms. It is through that aforementioned strength of wholesome actions, not through other artificial strengths. Therefore, because of the nature of this existence (bhava), we must bring out these Dhamma values. We must bring them out because they are now fading away rapidly. There is a tendency to bring out other things through that aforementioned practice of worldly development and cemetery development. If this Dispensation is to survive for a long period, we must bring out the path to Nibbāna pointed out by the Buddha to the world, Nibbāna, and we must direct our minds to the things that help towards it. We must teach them to others.

Thinking in that manner, now, on this valuable day, these devotees, having established themselves in a virtue (sīla) that helps in traveling the path of Dhamma according to their respective measures—at this moment, they have observed the livelihood-as-eighth virtue (ājīva-aṭṭhamaka-sīla), and the eight virtue-rules of the precept day (upoṣatha-aṭṭha-sīla). In that manner, there are also those who have observed the ten virtue-rules (dasa-sīla) that help in meditation. Having established oneself in virtue of that kind, and having directed the mind to meditation, and having brought this mind—which was scattered by globalization and other things—to this place at this moment and directed it to the Dhamma, you have brought out the power of a concentrated mind through a certain meditation subject (kammaṭṭhāna). Next, you must utilize a Dhamma sermon of this kind: if the three characteristics of impermanent (anicca), suffering (dukkha), and not-self (anattā), which help in overcoming the fear of saṃsāra, are developed more and more to some extent in daily life, they will become perfections (pāramī). Even if they are not obtained in this life, they can be obtained at some point. However, we must be energetic and, without delaying heedlessly, resolve to realize it in this very life. Before the Buddha's Sasana ends, through this path of meditation and with the association of noble friends (kalyāṇa-mitta), by practicing this Dhamma and meditation, we must obtain—at the minimum, if nothing greater—the path-knowledge of Stream-entry (sotāpatti-magga-ñāṇa), which is the greatest and most valuable power of escaping from the four planes of misery. If possible, may we be completely liberated from the entire saṃsāra and cross over from this ocean of tears and ocean of blood to obtain the supreme, deathless, great Nibbāna of Arahantship, through this strength of virtue, concentration, and wisdom (sīla-samādhi-paññā) fulfilled today! You must wish: "May this be obtained through listening to this Dhamma sermon!" Now, may all those who wish for the merit of Nibbāna—from Avīci to Akaniṭṭha, including our relatives—rejoice in this mass of merit we have accumulated so far through this Dhamma sermon! Having rejoiced, with the aspiration to escape from all saṃsāric suffering (dukkha) such as birth (jāti), decay and death (jarāmaraṇa), and sickness, and to find peace in the supreme, deathless, great Nibbāna, recite these stanzas and share the merit:

Bhaddekaratta Sutta (MN 131) from the Majjhima Nikāya

Dear Listeners,

The sole Teacher of the world, the Supreme Fully Self-Enlightened Buddha, clearly explained to the world the significance of this present moment. The world mostly lives in a dead past. Or else, in an unborn future. Without one's knowledge, the present moment slips away. It is these four verses expressing the importance of the present moment that we have chosen as our topic today. These four verses are found in the Bhaddekaratta Sutta of the Majjhima Nikāya. Indeed, four consecutive suttas under the name Bhaddekaratta can be found in the Majjhima Nikāya: the Bhaddekaratta Sutta, the Ānanda Sutta, the Mahākaccāna Sutta, and the Lomasakaṅgiya Bhaddakaratta Sutta. In all four of these suttas, these same four verses are found as the theme or the main topic. From this, one can appreciate how important and meaningful these verses are. Furthermore, detailed expositions of these verses are found in all four suttas. In truth, every single one of these expositions is directly relevant to insight meditation (vipassanā). That is why we have specifically brought up this sutta discourse.

Now, the introductory story (nidāna) of this Bhaddekaratta Sutta is briefly given as follows: While the Buddha was residing at the Jeta Grove monastery in Sāvathī, he directly addressed the Saṅgha and declared, "Monks, I shall expound to you the summary (uddesa) and the exposition (vibhaṅga) of 'one who has an auspicious day' (bhaddekaratta). Listen and pay close attention."

You may not be familiar with these two words, uddesa (summary) and vibhaṅga (exposition). They represent a distinctive feature of the Buddha's teaching style. On certain occasions, before presenting a lengthy explanation, the Buddha would first present a summary of what he intended to declare as a thematic passage. This is called the uddesa. Then, the uddesa is subsequently analyzed and explained in detail as the vibhaṅga. This is characteristic of the Buddha's method of teaching. In this sutta as well, the Buddha said, "Monks, I shall declare this summary and exposition to you," and the four verses he first presented as the summary (uddesa) are what we have taken as our topic today.

Now let us try to understand the general meaning of these four verses.

"Do not run after the past" (atītaṃ nāvagameyya); "do not long for the future" (nappaṭikāṅkhe anāgataṃ). "What is past is left behind" (yad atītaṃ pahīnaṃ taṃ); "and the future is yet unreached" (appattañca anāgataṃ)—the future has not yet arrived. "And whoever with insight sees each present state as it arises, right there, right there" (paccuppannañca yo dhammaṃ tattha tattha vipassati); "unconquerable, immovable, knowing that, the wise one should cultivate it" (asaṃhīraṃ asaṅkappaṃ taṃ vidvā manubrūhaye). Unentangled by and unprovoked by that present state, indeed, that is what the wise person should cultivate.

Next: "Today itself the effort should be made, who knows if death will come tomorrow?" (ajjeva kiccaṃ ātappaṃ, ko jaññā maraṇaṃ suve). The duty to be done must be striven for today itself. "Who knows if death will come tomorrow?" "For there is no bargaining with Death and his great army" (na hi no saṅgamaṃ tena mahāsenena maccunā). There is indeed no agreement or contract for us with the King of Death who has such a mighty army, is there? "One who dwells thus ardently" (evaṃ vihārimātāpiṇ)—one who acts and dwells in this manner, with such understanding and realization, cultivating ardent energy, "tireless day and night" (ahorattamatanditaṃ), cultivating energy day and night without laziness, "him indeed, the peaceful sage calls one who has an auspicious day" (taṃ ve bhaddekarattoti santo ācikkhate muni). The peaceful sage—meaning the Buddha Himself—declares him to be a Bhaddekaratta.

Thus, I have given the general meaning. To make this resonate more deeply in the heart, we have rendered it into Sinhala verse in this way:

Do not run after what has gone,

Do not stand yearning for what is to come.

Take what is past exactly as past,

See the future as yet unreached.

Subjecting the presently arisen things as they come,

To the wisdom of insight,

The wise one cultivates in this manner,

The unattached, unprovoked insight.
Do today itself what must be done,
For death may indeed come tomorrow.
There is surely no bargaining possible,
With Death who has such a great army.
Dwelling thus day and night without laziness,
Living in a way that burns up the defilements,
The Sage declares that such a monk
Is delighted in the supreme solitude.

Even though we translated it in that manner, the word bhaddekaratta has been a puzzle for scholars since ancient times. Both the commentators and Western scholars have offered various interpretations, particularly concerning what is meant by the word eka (one/sole) in bhaddekaratta.

Now, in an exposition written by us about forty years ago on this very sutta discourse, we presented an interpretation for this word bhaddekaratta. In short, it is based on that interpretation that we referred to "supreme solitude" here. We understood it in this way: we took the word eka—and demonstrated with supporting evidence—that the word eka signifies solitude or seclusion. Thus, bhaddra means auspicious or good, and ratta means attached or delighted. Therefore, the meaning we presented was: one who is delighted in the auspicious, or rather, the most noble seclusion or solitude.

We drew support for that meaning from a certain short sutta discourse found in the Saṃyutta Nikāya. It reads as follows: When the Buddha was residing at the Bamboo Grove (Veluvana) in Rājagaha, there was a certain monk who lived completely alone amidst the community of monks. The other monks referred to this bhikkhu as "Thera"—by the name "Thera"—though we do not know for what reason. Thus, the sutta featuring that monk named Thera is called the Theranāmakko Sutta. The unique characteristic of this bhikkhu named Thera was that he was an ekavihārī—meaning he behaved in accordance with solitary dwelling, was a solitary dweller, engaged in solitary living, and also spoke in praise of the virtues of solitary dwelling. Let us highlight here a few words that describe his conduct, as they will assist in this explanation. His daily routine is recorded in this way: So eko gāmaṃ piṇḍāya pavisati, eko paṭikkamati, eko raho nisīdati, eko caṅkamaṃ adhiṭṭhāti. The word eko (alone) was repeated several times. What does it mean regarding his daily routine? He enters the village for alms alone, departs from the village alone, sits in meditation in private (raho) alone, and walks on the ambulatory (caṅkama) alone.

Then, some other monks went and reported the uniqueness of his behavior to the Buddha, saying: "There is this bhikkhu named Thera who lives as an ekavihārī (solitary dweller) and keeps speaking in praise of the virtues of being an ekavihārī." The Buddha sent word, saying: "The Teacher is calling you, tell him to come here." When that bhikkhu arrived, the Buddha asked him: "How is it, Thera, that you dwell as an ekavihārī and speak in praise of the virtues of being an ekavihārī?" Thereupon, he declared his aforementioned daily routine: "Venerable Sir, Blessed One, I enter the village for alms alone, depart from it alone, sit in meditation alone, and walk on the ambulatory alone. That is how my dwelling as an ekavihārī is."

Then the Buddha said: "Thera, there is indeed that kind of solitary dwelling (ekavihāra). I do not say it is not so. However, I shall tell you at this moment how this solitary dwelling—this solitude—becomes perfected in every sense, and how it is detailed and made truly meaningful. Listen well." Thereupon, the Buddha declared the following words, which we have taken as our supporting evidence, as they are very closely related terms: "Thera"—this is said regarding a certain bhikkhu—"what is past is abandoned" (yaṃ atītaṃ taṃ pahīnaṃ); he has abandoned past things, treating them as gone. "What is future is relinquished" (yaṃ anāgataṃ taṃ paṭinissaṭṭhaṃ); he has let go of future things. "And desire and lust (chandarāgo) for currently acquired forms of existence (paccuppannesu ca attabhāvapaṭilābhesu)—meaning whatever presents itself in the present—is thoroughly subdued" (suppaṭivinīto). "It is in this way, Thera, that this solitary dwelling (ekavihārī) is fully completed and perfected in every sense," so the Buddha declared.

Thus, from this discourse we can see, firstly, that the meaning of the word eka is the state of being an ekavihārī—solitude. We have demonstrated this by citing other passages showing that the word eka was used in ancient times as a specific term denoting solitude. Secondly, as shown by the Buddha, this state of being an ekavihārī is not merely remaining physically apart from the conventionally accepted crowd. Now, those of you who have studied this Dhamma would know that three types of seclusion (viveka) are presented in this Dhamma. Seclusion is shown in three senses: physical seclusion (kāya-viveka), mental seclusion (citta-viveka), and seclusion from assets/defilements (upadhi-viveka). Physical seclusion (kāya-viveka) is what everyone knows. One thinks, "I will leave all this behind and go to the forest. By going to the forest and staying alone, everything will be solved." That, too, is helpful for meditation, of course. Yet, it is the lowest level of being an ekavihārī.

The second level is mental seclusion (citta-viveka). Aided by that seclusion, if one suppresses the hindrances (nīvaraṇa) and attains concentration—attaining states of meditative absorption (jhāna) in the manner of "secluded from sensual pleasures, secluded from unwholesome states" (viviceva kāmehi vivicca akusalehi dhammehi)—that is mental seclusion. The sages of the past who attained jhānas reached that point.

Behold, seclusion from assets (upadhi-viveka) is the deepest seclusion shown in this Dhamma. Seclusion from assets is Nibbāna. To help you understand this term "seclusion from assets" (upadhi-viveka), one must first understand the meaning of the word upadhi (assets/acquisitions/fuel). This word upadhi is mentioned in the Dhamma in two senses. In the mundane sense, upadhi means gold, silver, pearls, gems, houses, land, wife, and children—things regarded as one's possessions, wherein the sense of "mine-ness" dwells. In the mundane sense, these are upadhi. In the deeper sense, upadhi refers to our samsaric assets. What is that? It is a term you have heard of: the five groups of grasping (pañca-upādānakkhandha). The five groups of grasping (upādāna) are the five heaps we hold on to and cling to. Anyone would have heard these five words: the heap of form, the heap of feeling (vedanā), the heap of perception (saññā), the heap of preparations (saṅkhāra), and the heap of consciousness (viññāṇa). Thus, in the sense of holding on and clinging to them, they are grasping (upādāna). However, if one stands established upon them as though they were assets—at the moment one regards them as things upon which one's self-identity rests—those very graspings (upādāna) are regarded as assets (upadhi). So, depending on the perspective from which we look, if we take these five heaps as things clung to at a given moment, they are five heaps of grasping (upādāna). If we consider them in the sense of relying upon them, or as things gathered and piled up, behold, they are assets (upadhi).

Next, along with that, let us say that the word "heap" (or group) might be a problem for many. Why is this called the "heap of form", "heap of feeling"? The word is khandha. Indeed, the word khandha is the word used when saying "five aggregates" (pañcakkhandha). Khandha means heap, aggregate, or mass. What is this heap? The Buddha has explained this as well. This heap is eleven-fold. It is shown elsewhere as: atītānāgatapaccuppannaṃ, ajjhattaṃ vā bahiddhā vā, oḷārikaṃ vā sukhumaṃ vā, hīnaṃ vā paṇītaṃ vā, yaṃ dūre santike vā—making eleven aspects. The three periods of time mentioned here are shown first: past heap of form, future heap of form, present heap of form; then internal (ajjhatta) or external (bahiddhā), which is two-fold; then gross (oḷārika) or subtle (sukhuma); then inferior (hīna) or superior (paṇīta); then far (dūre) or near (santike). Behold, each aggregate is divided in this eleven-fold manner. So, these are indeed what we are holding on to as assets. The moment when every single such asset (upadhi) is relinquished is what is called Nibbāna. That is why a term used to describe Nibbāna is sabbūpadhipatinissagga—the relinquishment of all assets. That state of relinquishing all assets is indeed the aforementioned seclusion from assets (upadhi-viveka). That means Arahantship. That is the highest seclusion.

Now, the advice given by the Buddha to that bhikkhu named Thera is actually concluded with a certain verse—a verse that depicts an Arahant:

Sabbābhibhuṃ sabbaviduṃ sumedham,

Sabbesu dhammesu anūpalittaṃ.

Sabbañjahaṃ taṇhakkhaye vimuttaṃ,

Tamahaṃ naraṃ ekavihārīti brūmi.

Behold, that solitary dwelling (ekavihārī) is in truth found only within an Arahant; this is declared to that bhikkhu through this verse. "Sabbābhibhuṃ"—conquering all; "sabbaviduṃ"—knowing all; that wise person; "sabbesu dhammesu anūpalittaṃ"—having an unstained nature toward any thing, or rather toward all things; "sabbañjahaṃ"—having abandoned everything; "taṇhakkhaye vimuttaṃ"—liberated through the destruction of craving (taṇhā); "tamahaṃ naraṃ"—to that person, to that human being, to that Arahant, I say "solitary dweller" (ekavihārī). Thus did the Buddha conclude his advice to the Thera. From this, we can contemplate and understand: behold, seclusion from assets (upadhi-viveka) is indeed the highest, consummate seclusion. To make it resonate more deeply, we called it "supreme solitude"—the ultimate seclusion. Thus, bhaddekaratta refers to that monk who is delighted in that supreme solitude. It was to demonstrate this that we presented that supportive sutta.

Next, let us say that what we discussed so far were just the verses. The Buddha presented those verses as the summary (uddesa), as the synopsis. Along with that, the Buddha presented the exposition (vibhaṅga) to the Saṅgha in this manner: "And how, monks, does one run after the past?" Having previously said "do not run after the past," he now questions and explains how one chases after the past. Herein, a certain bhikkhu thinks thus: Evaṃrūpo—"I was of such a form in the past." He brings up that thought, thinks about the past, and generates a delight called nandi—nandi being another name for craving (taṇhā)—toward that past form. It is through generating that delight that one goes into the past. Therefore, it is not by the mere remembering of the past. Rather, one generates attachment, craving (taṇhā), for the past form. The same applies to feeling (vedanā), perception (saññā), preparations (saṅkhāra), and consciousness (viññāṇa). That is how one runs after the past.

Next, he shows: "And how, monks, does one not run after the past?" Here, it is shown that if one does not generate that delight called nandi toward the past form, feeling, etc., behold, one is freed from that. One is freed from running after the past. The same is said regarding the future. If one generates craving (taṇhā)—namely nandi—toward a form expected in the future that has not yet arisen, thinking, "May I have such a form in the future!" behold, that is yearning for the future. Understand the other aggregates in the same way.

Next, he speaks of the present. Regarding the present (paccuppanna): "And how, monks, is one drawn into presently arisen states?" A peculiar word is mentioned there, which also appeared in the verse: saṃhīrati—how is one drawn or swept away by present things? There, the Buddha shows—and some of you might already know this—that the thought pattern of the uninstructed worldling is shaped according to the dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi). The dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi) means imagining a self in four ways regarding each of these aggregates. Thinking, "This is my form." This is shown in four ways: one regards form as self; or one regards self as possessing form; or one thinks form is in self; or one thinks self is in form. In this way, being drawn to that form through a concept of self is what is meant by being drawn into presently arisen states—being drawn into present phenomena. Understand the same for feeling and so on. Such is the thought pattern of the uninstructed worldling—the ordinary person who does not know the Dhamma—being drawn into the present. It is precisely because of being drawn in that there is also the provocation (saṅkuppati) or conflict.

Next, he shows how one is not drawn into them. There he speaks of the well-instructed noble disciple—the noble disciple who has heard the Dhamma, who thinks in a way that frees them from the dogma of self-illusion (sakkāya-diṭṭhi). How does such a person think? They do not grasp this form as "mine." They do not think in those four ways we mentioned—that form is mine, self possesses form, form is in self, or self is in form. Instead, they add a "not" (na) to it. They do not think of form as self; they do not think form is self. That is all. That means the noble disciple trains themselves to look at the present moment according to the vision of non-self (anattā), just as the Buddha explained. Thus, in that manner, if we take it briefly, the Buddha shows through the five groups of grasping (pañca-upādānakkhandha) how one runs after the past and how one does not; how one yearns for the future and how one does not; and how, without being caught by present phenomena, one practices insight meditation (vipassanā) right there at each point.

So, since there is still much to cover, I have said that much about that sutta. Now, we mentioned earlier that the verses in this Bhaddekaratta Sutta are also found in three other suttas.

Next, we shall take up the Ānanda Sutta which is right next to it. It is mostly similar. Let us point out the differences. The background story (nidāna) of the Ānanda Sutta is as follows: It was a time when the Buddha was residing at the Jeta Grove monastery in Sāvattihī. Ven. Ānanda was giving a Dhamma talk to the bhikkhus in the assembly hall, inspiring them with a Dhamma talk. While inspiring them, he also declared its detailed exposition to the Saṅgha. Ven. Ānanda preached the Dhamma. After he had finished explaining, the Buddha, having arisen from his evening meditation, came to the assembly hall and asked the Saṅgha: "Monks, who was it in the assembly hall that inspired the Saṅgha with a Dhamma talk, declaring the summary (uddesa) and the exposition (vibhaṅga)?" The bhikkhus replied: "It was the Venerable Ānanda." Then the Buddha asked Venerable Ānanda: "Ānanda, how did you explain this to the Saṅgha?" Thereupon, Ven. Ānanda once again presented the very same analysis he had declared earlier, right in front of the Buddha. The Buddha said, "Sadhu! Sadhu!" and approved of it. That is the Ānanda Sutta.

Next, we come to the Mahākaccāna Bhaddekaratta Sutta. At that time, the Buddha was residing at the Tapodārāma in Rājagaha. While he was residing at the Tapodārāma, Ven. Samiddhi got up early in the morning—now, tapoda, friends, refers to the hot water springs in India. There was a hot water pool near the Tapodārāma where the Buddha resided. Having gone to that Tapoda pool, Ven. Samiddhi bathed at the crack of dawn, and stood wearing only his under-robe, waiting for his body to dry. At that moment, illuminating the Tapoda pool, a certain deity approached Ven. Samiddhi and asked: "Monk, do you know, do you remember, this exposition (vibhaṅga)?" Ven. Samiddhi replied: "No, friend, I do not know. Do you know?" The deity said: "I, too, do not know." Next, the deity asked: "Do you at least know these verses?" "I do not know. Do you know?" "I, too, do not know," said the deity. However, the deity then said: "Even so, monk, this summary (uddesa) and exposition (vibhaṅga) are extremely necessary for a monk's life. They are highly valuable. Learn them."

Because of this, after daybreak, Ven. Samiddhi went to the Buddha and said: "While I was bathing in the morning, a deity came and spoke to me thus. Venerable Sir, please kindly explain to me the summary (uddesa) and the exposition (vibhaṅga) of 'one who has an auspicious day' (bhaddekaratta)." "Very well, monk, listen," said the Buddha, and then preached those four verses to the group, including Ven. Samiddhi. Having preached them, what did he do? He rose from his seat and went into his dwelling (vihāra). That was a clever device of a teacher employed by the Buddha. He did that to train them to get Ven. Kaccāna to give an exposition on this. Once the Buddha had gone into his dwelling, the community of monks, including Ven. Samiddhi, contemplated: "Now, the Blessed One has preached this in brief and departed. We do not know its meaning. How are we to know the detailed explanation? While there is an exposition (vibhaṅga), the Buddha preached only the summary (uddesa) and retired to his dwelling." So, as they were talking, these monks said: "Now, is not Ven. Mahākaccāna highly praised by the Buddha? He is wise, and is capable of explaining in detail what has been taught in brief. Let us go to Kaccāna." So saying, this group went and invited Ven. Kaccāna, requesting him to explain to them the meaning of what the Buddha had preached in brief.

Then, as is usual in such situations, Ven. Kaccāna said: "You could have asked him right then. Your coming to me, Venerable Sirs, is just like someone looking for heartwood among the branches and leaves while bypassing the heartwood of the standing tree itself." When he spoke so humbly, the monks pleaded again: "No, no, that is alright. If it is no trouble, please kindly explain it to us. That time has passed—the time to ask the Buddha." "In that case, listen. I shall analyze it. Go later and ask the Buddha whether what I say is correct." Thereupon, what was the exposition given by Ven. Kaccāna? Ven. Mahākaccāna presented that very same matter by way of the six sense-bases (saḷāyatana). That is important. This is how he explained it there: "Behold, friends, this is how I have understood it: running after the past is explained as: 'In the past, my eye was such, forms were such.' One generates desire and lust (chandarāgo) toward them in consciousness (viññāṇa). Because of that desiring, which is desire and lust (chandarāgo), a delight called nandi arises—which is another name for craving (taṇhā). By generating that, behold, the bhikkhu is said to be running after the past." Instead of form, feeling, and so on, here he speaks of the eye and the others. When you consider the six sense-bases (saḷāyatana), what are the six? Eye, ear, nose, tongue, body, and mind, together with their corresponding forms, sounds, smells, tastes, tangibles, and ideas (dhamma). Therefore, regarding those six, including the mind, if one thinks about those things that existed in the past and generates an attachment in that manner, one has run after the past. One who does not generate such attachment does not run after the past. The fault does not lie in the mere remembering of the past. In the same way, he explained regarding the future: one makes a resolution or a wish concerning the future, thinking, 'May I be one possessing an eye in the future!' 'May I be a seer of such forms!' and so on. That is the future. He explains the present too in terms of the six sense-bases (saḷāyatana). Generating desire and lust (chandarāgo) and craving (taṇhā) in that same manner toward the present eye and its objects. Thus, Ven. Mahākaccāna clarifies this matter by way of the six sense-bases (saḷāyatana).

The monks listened to that, went to the Buddha, and reported: "Venerable Sir, Ven. Mahākaccāna explained it to us in this way." The Buddha said, "Sadhu! Sadhu!" and approved of it, saying, "If you had asked me, I too would have explained it in this very same way." From this, we can see that this teaching on the Bhaddekaratta can be understood not only by way of the five groups of grasping (pañca-upādānakkhandha) but also by way of the six sense-bases (saḷāyatana). As we mentioned, because it is an aid to insight meditation (vipassanā), one can cultivate insight by utilizing the five groups of grasping (pañca-upādānakkhandha). That also leads to Nibbāna. Insight meditation can also be cultivated by way of the six sense-bases (saḷāyatana)—which is very helpful for many people. This teaching helps in that too. So, that is what is found in the Mahākaccāna Bhaddekaratta Sutta.
